Preface to the Eighth Edition

After observing that every new edition of a constitutional law casebook addresses numerous issues that the Supreme Court had not dealt with in detail before—and implicitly observing that issues that once concerned the Court fall off the docket for years—the Preface to the Seventh Edition of this casebook referred to an “American tendency to constitutionalize political controversy” and noted:

[The] Justices present themselves and the results they reach as above politics. Their interpretive techniques, doctrinal tests, and rhetorical tropes are designed to separate—or, at least to create the appearance of separation—between constitutional analysis and political disputation. A student cannot become proficient in constitutional law without mastering these tools and taking them seriously on their own terms. [Constitutional] law is an insider’s game, and the opinions of the Justices establish the rules by which it is played. It follows that teachers must explain these rules, and students must master them.

But no thoughtful student of constitutional law can remain solely an insider. It would be odd indeed if the Court’s regular engagement with intensely controversial issues remained altogether uncontaminated by political passions. Even the most casual outside observer cannot help but notice that the Justices often divide according to familiar, if no doubt overly simple, political categories.

[The] familiar law/politics divide is itself too simple. The bifurcation obscures the different senses in which the terms “law” and “politics” are used. Constitutional law is not ordinary law, and constitutional politics is not ordinary politics. Constitutional law is inevitably embedded in the history and culture of the period in which it is made. Constitutional politics is not about—or at least not just about—partisan division, but also about the deepest questions of political theory.

We continue to offer the perspectives we described then in this Eighth Edition. As before, we present recent developments in constitutional law with what we hope is an appropriate emphasis—taking some developments as perhaps portending substantial change in the universe of constitutional doctrine and others as having more modest effects on doctrine. Examples include the apparent stabilization of doctrine dealing with central features of gay rights (while leaving other issues open, particularly those dealing with transgendered people and with whether and if so how constitutional law does and should deal with accommodating religious and other objectors to antidiscrimination law), and the continuing recasting of freedom of expression in libertarian and corporate-favoring terms. In contrast, after a flurry of interest the Court has stepped back from developing dormant commerce clause doctrine, and we have accordingly somewhat reduced our treatment of that area.

The results of the 2016 election have already inserted new issues, or revived old ones, in discussions of constitutional law. For the second time in five presidential elections since 2000, for example, the Electoral College system produced a president who received fewer votes than his principal opponent (although campaign strategies shaped by the Electoral College system undoubtedly affect raw vote total). The first months of the Trump administration have led to reflections upon the relative role of law and norms in stabilizing the U.S. constitutional system, to a degree perhaps not matched since the political turmoil that accompanied Franklin D. Roosevelt's Court-packing proposal in 1937. As of the time we write this Preface, the Supreme Court has barely begun to address these issues, in part because of the actions the Senate took with respect to the nominations of Merrick Garland and Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court—actions that, themselves, pushed questions about political norms to the fore.

We live in deeply unsettled times, and the future is even more unknowable than usual. It is at least possible that over the lifetime of this Edition, crucial issues of constitutional stability will take center stage. If that happens, our hope for this Edition is that it gives teachers of constitutional law the raw materials to foster intelligent discussion of a constitutional crisis. Whether it happens or not, teachers will have to decide for themselves how to incorporate discussions of our new and evolving situation into their courses. We have tried to write a book that is provocative but not tendentious, that suggests avenues for discussion but does not insist on a particular resolution.

Near the conclusion of the prior Preface, we wrote, “Our aim for this book is to teach students about both the inside and the outside of constitutional law. [We] have tried to ask questions of our students that, for one reason or another, the Justices have failed to ask of themselves.” As before, and now more than ever, “We are guided by the firm conviction that thinking clearly about constitutional law—both what it is and what it might be—is vital for law students and, indeed, for citizens generally.”

The Constitution of the United States

We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

ARTICLE I

Section 1. All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Section 2. [1] The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature.

[2] No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the Age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

[3] Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons. The actual Enumeration shall be made within three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by Law direct. The Number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty Thousand, but each State shall have at Least One Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

[4] When vacancies happen in the Representation from any State, the Executive Authority thereof shall issue Writs of Election to fill such Vacancies.

[5] The House of Representatives shall chuse their Speaker and other Officers; and shall have the sole Power of Impeachment.

Section 3. [1] The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six Years; and each Senator shall have one Vote.

[2] Immediately after they shall be assembled in Consequence of the first Election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three Classes. The Seats of the Senators of the first Class shall be vacated at the Expiration of the second Year, of the second Class at the Expiration of the fourth Year, and of the third Class at the Expiration of the sixth Year, so that one third may be chosen every second Year; and if Vacancies happen by Resignation, or otherwise, during the Recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary Appointments until the next Meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such Vacancies.

[3] No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

[4] The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided.

[5] The Senate shall chuse their other Officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the Office of President of the United States.

[6] The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

[7] Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law.

Section 4. [1] The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Place of chusing Senators.

[2] The Congress shall assemble at least once in every Year, and such Meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by Law appoint a different Day.

Section 5. [1] Each House shall be the judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each shall constitute a Quorum to do Business; but a smaller Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the Attendance of absent Members, in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide.

[2] Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behavior, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member.

[3] Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy; and the Yeas and Nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the Desire of one fifth of those Present, be entered on the Journal.

[4] Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other Place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

Section 6. [1] The Senators and Representatives shall receive a Compensation for their Services, to be ascertained by Law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place.

[2] No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office.

Section 7. [1] All Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with Amendments as on other Bills.

[2] Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it becomes a Law, be presented to the President of the United States; If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent, together with the Objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a Law. But in all such Cases the Votes of both Houses shall be determined by Yeas and Nays, and the Names of the Persons voting for and against the Bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the Same shall be a Law, in like Manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevents its Return, in which Case it shall not be a Law.

[3] Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to Which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.

Section 8. [1] The Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

[2] To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

[3] To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes;

[4] To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization, and uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States;

[5] To coin Money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign Coin, and fix the Standard of Weights and Measures;

[6] To provide for the Punishment of counterfeiting the Securities and current Coin of the United States;

[7] To establish Post Offices and post Roads;

[8] To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries;

[9] To constitute Tribunals inferior to the supreme Court;

[10] To define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offenses against the Law of Nations;

[11] To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water;

[12] To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a longer Term than two Years;

[13] To provide and maintain a Navy;

[14] To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces;

[15] To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions;

[16] To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;

[17] To exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten Miles square) as may, by Cession of particular States, and the Acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like Authority over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be, for the Erection of Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, dock-Yards, and other needful Buildings;—And

[18] To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

Section 9. [1] The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person.

[2] The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it.

[3] No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

[4] No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or Enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

[5] No Tax or Duty shall be laid on Articles exported from any State.

[6] No Preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another: nor shall Vessels bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay Duties in another.

[7] No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.

[8] No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

Section 10. [1] No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

[2] No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress.

[3] No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE II

Section 1. [1] The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows:

[2] Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

[3] The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by Ballot for two Persons, of whom one at least shall not be an Inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a List of all the Persons voted for, and of the Number of Votes for each; which List they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the Presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the Certificates, and the Votes shall then be counted. The Person having the greatest Number of Votes shall be the President, if such Number be a Majority of the whole Number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such Majority, and have an equal Number of Votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by Ballot one of them for President; and if no Person have a Majority, then from the five highest on the List the said House shall in like Manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the Votes shall be taken by States, the Representation from each State having one Vote, a quorum for this Purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a Majority of all the States shall be necessary to a Choice. In every Case, after the Choice of the President, the Person having the greatest Number of Votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal Votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by Ballot the Vice President.

[4] The Congress may determine the Time of chusing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States.

[5] No person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty-five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

[6] In case of the removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the Same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

[7] The President shall, at stated Times, receive for his Services, a Compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the Period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that Period any other Emolument from the United States, or any of them.

[8] Before he enter on the Execution of his Office, he shall take the following Oath or Affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Section 2. [1] The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offenses against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

[2] He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, to the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

[3] The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

Section 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Section 4. The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

ARTICLE III

Section 1. The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Section 2. [1] The Judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State;—between Citizens of different States;—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

[2] In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be a Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

[3] The trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by Law have directed.

Section 3. [1] Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the Testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

[2] The Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attainted.

ARTICLE IV

Section 1. Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

Section 2. [1] The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

[2] A Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime.

[3] No Person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein, be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered up on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due.

Section 3. [1] New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

[2] The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

Section 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

ARTICLE V

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

ARTICLE VI

[1] All Debts contracted and Engagements entered into, before the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution, as under the Confederation.

[2] This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

[3] The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

ARTICLE VII

The Ratification of the Conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the Establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the Same.

Done in Convention by the Unanimous Consent of the States present the Seventeenth Day of September in the Year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and Eighty seven and of the Independence of the United States of America the Twelfth.

ARTICLES IN ADDITION TO, AND AMENDMENT OF, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PROPOSED BY CONGRESS, AND RATIFIED BY THE LEGISLATURES OF THE SEVERAL STATES, PURSUANT TO THE FIFTH ARTICLE OF THE ORIGINAL CONSTITUTION

AMENDMENT I [1791]

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

AMENDMENT II [1791]

A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

AMENDMENT III [1791]

No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

AMENDMENT IV [1791]

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

AMENDMENT V [1791]

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

AMENDMENT VI [1791]

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

AMENDMENT VII [1791]

In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

AMENDMENT VIII [1791]

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

AMENDMENT IX [1791]

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

AMENDMENT X [1791]

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

AMENDMENT XI [1798]

The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

AMENDMENT XII [1804]

The Electors shall meet in their respective states and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate;—The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.—The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President, shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

AMENDMENT XIII [1865]

Section 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Section 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XIV [1868]

Section 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Section 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Section 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Section 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss of emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

Section 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

AMENDMENT XV [1870]

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XVI [1913]

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

AMENDMENT XVII [1913]

[1] The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

[2] When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

[3] This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

AMENDMENT XVIII [1919]

Section 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

Section 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Section 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

AMENDMENT XIX [1920]

[1] The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

[2] Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XX [1933]

Section 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

Section 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

Section 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

Section 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

Section 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

Section 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.

AMENDMENT XXI [1933]

Section 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

Section 2. The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

AMENDMENT XXII [1951]

Section 1. No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than two years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once. But this Article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this Article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which the Article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

Section 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress.

AMENDMENT XXIII [1961]

Section 1. The District constituting the seat of Government of the United States shall appoint in such manner as the Congress may direct: A number of electors of President and Vice President equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives in Congress to which the District would be entitled if it were a State, but in no event more than the least populous State; they shall be in addition to those appointed by the States, but they shall be considered, for the purposes of the election of President and Vice President, to be electors appointed by a State; and they shall meet in the District and perform such duties as provided by the twelfth article of amendment.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XXIV [1964]

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election for President or Vice President, for electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XXV [1967]

Section 1. In case of the removal of the President from office or of his death or resignation, the Vice President shall become President.

Section 2. Whenever there is a vacancy in the office of the Vice President, the President shall nominate a Vice President who shall take office upon confirmation by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress.

Section 3. Whenever the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that he is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, and until he transmits to them a written declaration to the contrary, such powers and duties shall be discharged by the Vice President as Acting President.

Section 4. Whenever the Vice President and a Majority of either the principal officers of the executive departments or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall immediately assume the powers and duties of the office as Acting President.

Thereafter, when the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that no inability exists, he shall resume the powers and duties of his office unless the Vice President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive department or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit within four days to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office. Thereupon Congress shall decide the issue, assembling within forty-eight hours for that purpose if not in session. If the Congress, within twenty-one days after receipt of the latter written declaration, or, if Congress is not in session, within twenty-one days after Congress is required to assemble, determines by two-thirds vote of both Houses that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall continue to discharge the same as Acting President; otherwise, the President shall resume the powers and duties of his office.

AMENDMENT XXVI [1971]

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States, who are eighteen years of age or older, to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of age.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XXVII [1992]

No law varying the Compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect, unless an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

Biographical Notes on Selected U.S. Supreme Court Justices

The brief sketches that follow are designed to offer at least some sense of the background, personality, and intellectual style of the justices who have had the greatest impact on modern constitutional law. Because they are no substitute for serious biography, we have frequently suggested additional sources for further investigation. On less significant justices, see Currie, The Most Insignificant Justice: A Preliminary Inquiry, 50 U. Chi. L. Rev. 466 (1983); Easterbrook, The Most Insignificant Justice: Further Evidence, 50 U. Chi. L. Rev. 481 (1983).

SAMUEL A. ALITO, JR. (1950–): The son of two school teachers (his father went on to become New Jersey's first Director of the Office of Legislative Services), Justice Alito graduated from Princeton and then from Yale Law School where he served as an editor of the Yale Law Journal. He served as an assistant to the United States Solicitor General and Deputy Assistant to the Attorney General before becoming the United States Attorney for the District of New Jersey. He developed the reputation of a tough but fair prosecutor and was known especially for his efforts directed against drug trafficking and organized crime. Before his Supreme Court appointment in 2006, he served for sixteen years as a judge on the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

HUGO L. BLACK (1886–1971): In 1937, President Roosevelt chose Hugo Black to fill the first available vacancy on the Court. A southern progressive who had defended the rights of labor organizers and investigated police brutality before coming to Washington, Black served in the U.S. Senate for ten years prior to his appointment. As a senator, he strongly defended New Deal programs, including Roosevelt's "Court-packing" plan. Shortly after his confirmation he became the subject of controversy when it was revealed that he had belonged to the Ku Klux Klan for two years in the 1920s. The controversy subsided after Black, in a dramatic radio address, admitted his prior membership, but added that he had resigned many years before and would comment no further. As a justice, Black was known for his insistence on what he claimed to be literal enforcement of constitutional guarantees, especially the first amendment guarantee of free speech. Although frequently characterized as an “activist” because of his willingness to subject to intensive review legislation that arguably violated express constitutional provisions, Black himself thought that literalism was necessary to confine judicial power. Thus, his insistence that the fourteenth amendment incorporated and made applicable to the states the guarantees of the first eight amendments was premised in part on his belief that any other approach would leave justices free to read their own values into the Constitution. See Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46 (1947). Consistent with this view, in cases such as Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), Black rejected the notion that the Constitution contained general guarantees of “privacy” or “natural rights” beyond those expressly articulated in the text. See R. Newman, Hugo Black: A Biography (1994); G. Dunne, Hugo Black and the Judicial Revolution (1977).

HARRY A. BLACKMUN (1908–1999): Harry Blackmun was President Nixon’s third choice to fill the seat vacated when Abe Fortas resigned in 1970. After failing to secure confirmation of Clement Haynsworth of South Carolina and G. Harrold Carswell of Florida, Nixon announced that the Senate “as it is presently constituted” would not confirm a southerner and turned to Blackmun, a judge on the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals. A boyhood friend of Chief Justice Burger, Blackmun was quickly dubbed “the Minnesota Twin” by the press. During his early years on the Court, he regularly voted with the chief justice. Later he distanced himself from the Court’s conservative bloc and increasingly joined Justices Marshall and Brennan in dissent. Blackmun is best known for his majority opinion in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), upholding the constitutional right of women to decide for themselves whether to have an abortion. It has been suggested that the opinion was influenced by Blackmun’s experience before joining the Court as house counsel for the Mayo Clinic, where he frequently advised doctors and defended their right to make medical judgments.

JOSEPH P. BRADLEY (1813–1892): The oldest of eleven children, Joseph Bradley was raised in poverty on a small farm. As a lawyer, he specialized in corporate and commercial law and represented several railroads. A Whig before the Civil War, Bradley was an avid supporter of the Union cause and became identified with the radical wing of the Republican Party in the postwar period. His appointment to the Court by President Grant in 1870 was later the subject of controversy because it made possible the reversal of the Court's earlier decision involving the validity of the Civil War legal tender acts. Compare Hepburn v. Griswold, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 603 (1870) with The Legal Tender Cases, 79 U.S. (12 Wall.) 457 (1871). As a justice, Bradley supported the power of Congress to regulate the interstate movement of goods, even if the regulation limited state authority. His dissent in The Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873), also showed a willingness to read the newly enacted fourteenth amendment as an important expansion of federal authority. In 1877, Bradley was a last-minute substitute on the electoral commission established to resolve the disputed presidential election of 1876. With the commission deadlocked seven to seven, Bradley cast the deciding vote to make Rutherford B. Hayes the President. See G. White, The American Judicial Tradition ch. 4 (1976); Fairman, Mr. Justice Bradley, in A. Dunham and P. Kurland, Mr. Justice 65–93 (1956).

LOUIS D. BRANDEIS (1856–1941): The son of Jewish immigrants from Bohemia, Louis Brandeis successfully practiced law in Boston for forty years before his nomination to the Court. Although he became wealthy from his practice, Brandeis preferred to live simply and set a ceiling on personal expenditures of one-fifth of his income. Even after his appointment to the Court, he provided financial support for the work of his proteges, one of whom was Felix Frankfurter. He devoted himself to a host of public causes. He defended municipal control of Boston's subway system, opposed monopolistic practices of the New Haven Railroad, arbitrated labor disputes in New York's garment industry, and argued in support of the constitutionality of state maximum hour and minimum wage statutes. His nomination to the Court by President Wilson in 1916 sparked heated opposition, including protests from seven ex-presidents of the American Bar Association. During his long tenure on the Court, Brandeis insisted on respect for jurisdictional and procedural limitations on the Court's power. His distrust of large and powerful institutions, and of dogmatic adherence to the received wisdom, led him to support the constitutional authority of the states to experiment with unconventional social and economic theories. He also frequently dissented from the Court's conservative majority when it blocked efforts of the federal government to intervene in the economy. Some of his most eloquent opinions, however, were written in defense of limits on governmental power when civil liberties were at issue. His famous concurring opinion in Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927), argued for freedom of expression on the ground that "it is hazardous to discourage thought, hope and imagination; that fear breeds repression; that repression breeds hate; that hate menaces stable government; that the path of safety lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies; and that the fitting remedy for evil counsels is good ones.” And in Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928), Brandeis dissented from the Court’s refusal to condemn wiretapping, noting that “[o]ur Government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example.” See L. Paper, Brandeis (1983); M. Urofsky, Louis B. Brandeis and the Progressive Tradition (1981).

WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR. (1906–1997): After graduating from Harvard Law School, William Brennan returned to his native Newark, where he joined a prominent law firm and specialized in labor law. As his practice grew, Brennan, a devoted family man, resented the demands it made on his time and accepted an appointment on the New Jersey Superior Court in order to lessen his workload. Brennan attracted attention as an efficient and fair-minded judge and was elevated to the New Jersey Supreme Court in 1952. President Eisenhower appointed him to the Supreme Court in 1956. The appointment was criticized at the time as “political” on the ground that the nomination of a Catholic Democrat on the eve of the 1956 presidential election was intended to win votes. Once on the Court, Justice Brennan firmly established himself as a leader of the “liberal” wing. He authored important opinions in the areas of free expression, criminal procedure, and reapportionment. Often credited with providing critical behind-the-scenes leadership during the Warren Court years, Brennan continued to play a significant role—although more often as a dissenter lamenting what he believed to be the evisceration of Warren Court precedents—as the ideological complexion of the Court shifted in the 1970s and 1980s. Brennan’s own spirit is perhaps best captured in his celebration in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 255 (1964), of “our profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open.”

STEPHEN G. BREYER (1938–): Prior to his appointment to the Supreme Court, Stephen Breyer had compiled a distinguished record as a legal academic and in all three branches of the federal government. Educated at Oxford and Harvard Law School, he served as law clerk to Justice Arthur Goldberg and in the Justice Department before returning to Harvard to teach. During leaves of absence, he worked for Watergate Special Counsel Archibald Cox and served as chief counsel to the Senate Judiciary Committee. In 1980, President Carter named him to the U.S. Court of Appeals. As chief judge of the First Circuit, Breyer gained a reputation for his ability to forge consensus and to write opinions that were clear, concise, and trenchant. An expert on administrative law and an author of important works about risk assessment, Breyer has most often voted with the Court's "liberal" bloc, although his interest in government regulation of the new technologies has sometimes led him to reject first amendment challenges to such regulation. He is known for his pragmatism, his erudition, and his willingness to rethink old ideas.

WARREN E. BURGER (1907–1995): The son of financially hard-pressed parents, Warren Burger attended college and law school at night while selling life insurance during the day. After graduation, he entered private practice and assisted Harold Stassen in his unsuccessful bid for the Republican presidential nomination in 1948. In 1953, he came to Washington to serve as assistant attorney general for the Civil Division of the Justice Department. While in that post, he attracted public attention by defending the government's dismissal of John F. Peters for disloyalty after Solicitor General Sobeloff refused to argue the case on grounds of conscience. Shortly thereafter President Eisenhower appointed him to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. His tenure on that court was marked by sharp clashes with the court's liberal majority, especially over criminal justice issues. In 1969, President Nixon named Burger chief justice to replace Earl Warren. A strong advocate of "strict construction" and a "plain meaning" approach to statutory and constitutional interpretation, Burger firmly identified himself with the Court's conservative wing and often voted to limit Warren Court decisions. But he also authored important opinions upholding the right of trial judges to order busing as a remedy for school segregation, interpreting federal civil rights statutes as imposing an "effects" test for employment discrimination, and upholding the right of the press to remain free of prior restraints in covering criminal trials. Burger wrote for a unanimous Court in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974), upholding the subpoena for the Watergate tapes, which a few days later resulted in President Nixon's resignation. The Court's legacy under his leadership is much disputed, with some seeing continuity with the Warren Court years and others claiming that he began a period of substantial retrenchment. See E. Maltz, The Chief Justiceship of Warren Burger, 1969–1989 (2000).

BENJAMIN N. CARDODOZ (1870–1938): The son of a Tammany Hall judge who was implicated in the Boss Tweed scandal and resigned, rather than face impeachment, Benjamin Cardozo began his judicial career by narrowly defeating a Tammany candidate for a position on the New York Supreme Court. Shortly thereafter he was appointed to the New York Court of Appeals, where he served for eighteen years, during the last six of which he was chief judge. Cardozo is probably best remembered for his skill as a state common law judge.

He was responsible for making the New York Court of Appeals the most respected state court in the country, and his judicial writings and lectures were immensely influential. Upon Justice Holmes's retirement, President Hoover was inundated with requests that Cardozo be elevated to the Supreme Court. But there were already two New Yorkers and one Jew serving on the Court, and Hoover resisted. Only when Justice Stone offered to resign to make way for Cardozo did the President relent. Cardozo was a bachelor who had very few friends and lived for most of his life with his unmarried sister. Called "the hermit philosopher" by some, Cardozo was remembered by others for "the strangely compelling power of [his] reticent, sensitive almost mystical personality." See R. Posner, Cardozo, A Study in Reputation (1990); G. Hellman, Benjamin N. Cardozo (1940).

WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS (1898–1980): Widely regarded as one of the most brilliant, eccentric, and independent persons to serve on the Court, William Douglas sat as an associate justice for thirty-six years, seven months—longer than any other justice. Born in poverty in Minnesota, he spent his early years in Yakima, Washington. Although financially hard pressed, he managed to go east to study law at Columbia Law School, where he taught before joining the Yale faculty in 1929. President Roosevelt named him to the newly created Securities and Exchange Commission in 1934, and Douglas became its chairman in 1937. Roosevelt nominated him to be an associate justice in 1939. Douglas's early opinions gave little hint of the controversy that would surround him in later years. Indeed, Roosevelt came close to choosing him as his running mate in 1944—a decision that would have made him President on Roosevelt's death a year later. In subsequent years, however, Douglas's controversial statements both on and off the bench, his strong support for unpopular political causes, and his unconventional lifestyle (he was married four times) stirred up a whirlwind of political opposition. Congress twice began impeachment proceedings against him, although neither effort came close to success. A prodigiously rapid worker, Douglas often ridiculed his colleagues for complaining about the Court's workload. By his own account, he once assisted a colleague who had fallen behind in his work by ghostwriting a majority opinion that responded to his own dissent. He often finished his work for the term early and retreated to his nearly inaccessible summer home in Yakima, to which lawyers were forced to trek when emergency matters arose. Critics claimed that his opinions showed the signs of haste; admirers emphasized the forceful, direct manner in which he cut through legal doctrine to reach the core issue in a case. His opinions were marked by a fierce commitment to individual rights and distrust of government power. See B. Murphy, Wild Bill: The Legend and Life of William O. Douglas (2003); W. Douglas, The Court Years 1939–1975 (1980); W. Douglas, Go East Young Man (1974); V. Countryman, Douglas of the Supreme Court (1959).

STEPHEN J. FIELD (1816–1899): In 1863, Congress authorized an additional seat on the Court in part to assure a majority sympathetic to the Union cause in the Civil War. President Lincoln named Stephen Field, a Democrat who had nonetheless staunchly opposed secession, to fill the seat. Field was part of an illustrious family: His brothers included a well-known politician and lawyer, a widely read author, and a famous entrepreneur; he served for the last seven years of his tenure on the Court with his nephew, Justice Brewer; Anita Whitney, the left-wing activist who gained notoriety in Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927), was his niece. Justice Field himself was personally involved in a landmark Supreme Court case. When his personal bodyguard killed former Chief Justice Terry of the California Supreme Court, allegedly while defending Justice Field's life, the ensuing litigation ended in In re Neagle, 135 U.S. 1 (1890). In light of the circumstances surrounding his appointment, it was ironic that, once on the Court, Field tended to defend the South in particular and state sovereignty in general against extension of federal power during the Reconstruction period. In the period before substantive due process secured majority support on the Court, Field sought to provide constitutional protection for business enterprises. His dissenting opinion in The Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873), for example, read the fourteenth amendment as providing significant protection to property rights and was an important precursor of Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905). By the time of his retirement in 1897, Field had surpassed John Marshall's record for length of service. See P. Kens, Justice Stephen Field: Shaping Liberty from the Gold Rush to the Gilded Age (1997); C. Swisher, Stephen J. Field: Craftsman of the Law (1930).

ABE FORTAS (1910–1984): Founder of the Washington law firm Arnold, Fortas, and Porter, Abe Fortas provided behind-the-scenes advice to Democratic politicians for years before his appointment to the Court in 1965. As a young man, Fortas held a series of jobs in the Roosevelt administration, including undersecretary of the interior under Harold Ickes. After entering private practice, Fortas found time to defend victims of McCarthyism and to litigate several important civil rights cases, including Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963). In 1948, Fortas successfully represented Congressman Lyndon Johnson when his forty-eight-vote victory in the Democratic senatorial primary was challenged. (The election earned Johnson the nickname “Landslide Lyndon.”) Fortas became one of Johnson’s close friends, and when Justice Goldberg resigned to become United Nations ambassador, Johnson appointed him to the Court. In 1968, when Chief Justice Warren indicated that he intended to retire, Johnson chose Fortas as Warren’s successor. The nomination had long-term consequences that neither man could have foreseen. Republicans and conservative Democrats charged Johnson with “cronyism” and ultimately forced him to withdraw the nomination, but not before it was revealed that Fortas had received $15,000 to teach a course at a local university while on the bench. The next year Life magazine revealed that Fortas had accepted and then returned $20,000 from a charitable foundation controlled by the family of an indicted stock manipulator. Although denying any wrongdoing, Fortas resigned from the Court. As a consequence, President Nixon was able to fill two vacancies early in his term, thereby helping to fulfill his campaign promise to “roll back” the Warren Court revolution. See L. Kalman, Abe Fortas: A Biography (1990); B. Murphy, Fortas: The Rise and Ruin of a Supreme Court Justice (1988).

FELIX FRANKFURTER (1882–1965): An immigrant from Austria, Felix Frankfurter grew up in poverty on New York’s lower east side. Before his appointment to the Court by President Roosevelt in 1939, he taught at the Harvard Law School, helped found The New Republic, served in a variety of public positions, and provided important, informal advice to Roosevelt in formulating the New Deal. Frankfurter’s scholarly writings contributed significantly to understanding of administrative law, labor law, and the relationship between federal and state courts. As a justice, Frankfurter’s career was marked by a preoccupation with problems of judicial legitimacy and self-restraint. He frequently clashed with Justices Douglas and Black, also Roosevelt appointees, over the “preferred position” of the first amendment and the incorporation doctrine. His concern over the countermajoritarian aspect of judicial review led him to argue for deference to legislative judgment in such landmark cases as Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951), and Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962). See Hirsch, The Enigma of Felix Frankfurter (1981); J. Lash, From the Diaries of Felix Frankfurter (1974); P. Kurland, Felix Frankfurter on the Supreme Court (1970); L. Baker, Felix Frankfurter (1969).

RUTH BADER GINSBURG (1933–): When Ruth Bader Ginsburg graduated from law school, one of her mentors suggested to Justice Felix Frankfurter that he take her on as a law clerk. Despite Ginsburg’s brilliant law school record (earned while caring for an infant daughter), Justice Frankfurter told her sponsor that he just was not ready to hire a woman. Thirty-three years after this rebuff, Ginsburg assumed her seat on the Supreme Court. In the intervening years, Ginsburg gained fame as the first tenured woman professor at Columbia Law School; as the director of the Women's Rights Project of the American Civil Liberties Union, where she won many pioneering victories in the legal battle against gender discrimination; and as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. She has been called "the Thurgood Marshall of gender equality law" and is said to be "as responsible as any one person for legal advances that women made under the Equal Protection Clause." A strong defender of abortion rights, she has nonetheless criticized Roe v. Wade for rejecting a narrower approach to the abortion question that might have "served to reduce rather than to fuel controversy." On the bench, she has often sided with her "liberal" colleagues. She authored a strong dissent in Bush v. Gore and wrote for a divided Court that invalidated the Virginia Military Institute's policy excluding women students.

NEIL MCGILL GORSUCH (1967–): After the sudden death of Justice Antonin Scalia in 2016, President Obama nominated Merrick Garland, the well-regarded chief judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, to take Justice Scalia's seat. Senate Republicans announced that they would not hold hearings or a vote on the nomination or confirm any other nominee until after the presidential election, and Judge Garland's nomination expired. When Donald Trump assumed office, he quickly nominated Neil Gorsuch to assume the seat, and Gorsuch was confirmed by a 54-45 vote. Gorsuch came to the Court after a distinguished legal career. A classmate of Barack Obama's at Harvard Law School, he also received a Ph.D. from Oxford University, where he wrote a dissertation, opposing the legalization of assisted suicide and euthanasia, that was later published in book form. He then went on to clerk for Justices Kennedy and White on the United States Supreme Court. (When he joined Justice Kennedy on the Court he became the only justice in history to serve with the justice he had clerked for). After a stint in private practice, Gorsuch was appointed to the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit by George W. Bush. Gorsuch developed a reputation as a facile writer and a strong conservative. He is especially identified with defense of the right of religious objectors to an exemption from otherwise applicable law and with vigorous judicial review of administrative decisions.

JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN (1833–1911): Although a slaveholder and a member of the southern aristocracy, John Harlan remained loyal to the Union during the Civil War and commanded a regiment of Kentucky volunteers in the Union forces. At a critical moment in the deadlocked Republican convention of 1876, Harlan threw the support of the Kentucky delegation behind Rutherford B. Hayes, who rewarded him a year later with an appointment to the Court. Before his appointment, Harlan opposed the postwar amendments ending slavery and guaranteeing equal rights for blacks. (He opposed Lincoln and supported Democrat John McClellan in the 1864 presidential election.) Once on the Court, however, he advocated a broad reading of these amendments. His famous dissenting opinions in The Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883), and Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), argued for Congress's power to defend the newly freed slaves from "private" discrimination and against the constitutionality of state-mandated separation of the races. It was in Plessy that Harlan declared that "[o]ur Constitution is color blind" and rightly predicted that "the judgment this day rendered will, in time, prove to be quite as pernicious as the decision ... in the Dred Scott case." Well known for his distinctive personal style, Harlan often delivered his opinions extemporaneously in the fashion of an old-time Kentucky stump speech. Justice Holmes described him as "the last of the tobacco-spitting judges." See F. Latham, The Great Dissenter: John Marshall Harlan (1970).

JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN (1899–1971): The grandson of the first Justice Harlan, John Harlan was appointed to the Court by President Eisenhower in 1955. Before his appointment, Harlan spent a quarter of a century in practice with a prominent Wall Street law firm, served as chief counsel to the New York State Crime Commission, and sat briefly on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. On the Court, Justice Harlan became the intellectual leader of the "conservative" wing, often dissenting from "activist" decisions during the stewardship of Chief Justice Warren. He defended the values of federalism and never accepted the incorporation of the bill of rights against the states. Nor was he ever reconciled to the Court's broad reading of the equal protection clause, especially when strict scrutiny was utilized to defend "fundamental" values. There was also a strong libertarian strain in Justice Harlan's opinions, however. His belief in federalism and rejection of "judicial activism" did not prevent him from finding, for example, that the due process clause precluded the states from restricting the use of contraceptives by married couples. He also wrote for the Court in a series of important first amendment decisions, narrowly construing federal statutes prohibiting subversive advocacy and defending the right of a Vietnam War protestor to wear a jacket inscribed with the message "Fuck the Draft." It was in the latter case that Harlan proclaimed that "one man's vulgarity is another's lyric." During his tenure, Harlan was widely respected, even by opponents of his philosophy, for his thoroughness, candor, and civility. Although he often disagreed publicly with Justice Black, they were close friends in private. They were hospitalized together during their final illnesses and died within a short period of each other. See T. Yarbrough, John Marshall Harlan: Great Dissenter of the Warren Court (1992); D. Shapiro, The Evolution of a Judicial Philosophy: Selected Opinions and Papers of Justice John M. Harlan (1969).

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR. (1841–1935): Oliver Wendell Holmes, the son of a famous poet and essayist, survived three wounds in the Civil War. He had already enjoyed a distinguished career as a practitioner, author, professor, and justice on the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts before his appointment to the Supreme Court by President Roosevelt in 1902. Holmes, then sixty-two years old, seemed to be at the close of his career. A life-long Republican, he was expected to be a loyal supporter of the President on the bench. Few could have anticipated that he would serve on the Court for twenty-nine years, that his tenure would be marked by a fierce independence, and that he would exercise virtually unparalleled influence over modern constitutional theory. Holmes is perhaps best remembered for his formulation of the "clear and present danger test" for subversive advocacy and his rejection of substantive due process as a limitation on state social and economic legislation. His judicial philosophy was marked by skepticism, particularism, and pragmatism. He doubted that general propositions decided particular cases or that broad value judgments could be objectively defended. He thought that the law was necessarily unconcerned with the thought processes of those it regulated, and that it had no independent existence apart from what people did in response to what judges said. For twenty-five years, he walked daily the two and one-half miles from his home to the Court, never missing a session. He finally retired at ninety years of age and died two days before his ninety-fourth birthday. See A. Alschuler, Law without Values: The Life, Work and Legacy of Justice Holmes (2000); G. White, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes: Law and the Inner Self (1993); M. Howe, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes: The Proving Years (1963); M. Howe, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes: The Shaping Years (1957).

CHARLES EVANS HUGHES (1862–1948): After defeating William Randolph Hearst for the governorship of New York, Charles Evans Hughes served as governor for one term and part of another until 1910, when President Taft appointed him to the Court. In 1916, Hughes resigned to run for the presidency on the Republican and Progressive tickets against Woodrow Wilson.

On election eve, he went to bed thinking that he was President, but when the final returns were counted, he had lost by a scant twenty-three electoral votes. Hughes returned to New York law practice until President Harding appointed him secretary of state. In 1930, President Hoover returned Hughes to the Court, this time as chief justice. Hughes served as chief justice during the tumultuous eleven-year period when the Court blocked much of President Roosevelt's New Deal, then survived a direct attack on its independence, and finally reconciled itself to the fundamental changes wrought by Roosevelt's program. Throughout this period, Hughes occupied a centrist position. Although closely identified with the conservative New York bar, he often joined the liberals on the Court who dissented from invalidation of social and economic legislation. But he also defended the institutional independence of the Court when it was attacked by President Roosevelt. At a crucial point in the "Court-packing" controversy, Hughes sent a letter to Senator Wheeler arguing that the Court was current in its work, and that the addition of new justices would create serious inefficiencies. Upon his retirement in 1941, Justice Frankfurter likened his leadership ability to that of "Toscanini lead[ing] an orchestra." See M. Pusey, Charles Evans Hughes (1951).

ROBERT H. JACKSON (1892–1954): A skillful advocate and brilliant legal stylist, Robert Jackson rose quickly in the early Roosevelt administration, eventually becoming one of President Roosevelt's closest advisors. After serving as counsel to the Internal Revenue Bureau, where he won a $750,000 judgment against former Treasury Secretary Andrew W. Mellon, Jackson served successively as assistant attorney general, solicitor general, and attorney general. President Roosevelt named him to the Supreme Court in 1941 to fill the seat vacated by Justice Stone when Stone was appointed chief justice. Jackson is perhaps best remembered for his graceful prose and his subtle and original efforts to articulate a coherent theory of separation of powers in his opinions in such cases as Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 342 U.S. 579 (1952), and Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944). In 1945, while still on the Court, Jackson served as the chief U.S. prosecutor at the Nuremberg war crimes trial. This exposure to German fascism may have influenced Jackson's subsequent approach to constitutional interpretation. Many of his later first amendment opinions, for example, were preoccupied with the attempt to draw a bright line between protected freedom of conscience and unprotected speech that threatened the public peace and order. Jackson's willingness to permit government regulation of subversive or abusive advocacy in cases such as Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951), and Terminiello v. Chicago, 337

U.S. 1 (1949), brought him into sharp conflict with Justices Black and Douglas —conflict that was exacerbated by deteriorating personal relationships. When Chief Justice Stone died, it was reported that several justices threatened to resign if Jackson was elevated to the chief justiceship. Jackson never became chief justice, but remained on the Court until his death in 1954. See E. Gerhart, America's Advocate: Robert H. Jackson (1958); G. White, The American Judicial Tradition ch. 11 (1976).

ELENA KAGAN (1960–): Named to the Supreme Court by Barack Obama in 2010, Elena Kagan is the first person nominated to the Court without judicial experience in almost forty years. After graduating magna cum laude from Harvard Law School, she clerked for Justice Thurgood Marshall, who nicknamed her “shorty” because of her 5'3" height. She then embarked on a distinguished academic career, first at the University of Chicago Law School and then at Harvard Law School, where she eventually became the first woman dean. For four years she served President Clinton as Associate White House Counsel, Deputy Assistant to the President for Domestic Policy, and Deputy Director of the Domestic Policy Council. In 2009, President Obama named her Solicitor General of the United States. Kagan is known for her powerful intellect, effective writing style, and puckish sense of humor.

ANTHONY M. KENNEDY (1936–): President Reagan’s effort to fill the seat vacated by the retirement of Justice Powell, who was widely viewed as a “swing vote” on a number of important issues, sparked an extraordinary controversy about the future direction of the Supreme Court. His first nominee, Robert Bork, was defeated on the Senate floor after a long and bitter debate that pitted “originalists” against those who would treat the Constitution as incorporating values not directly derived from the text. His second nominee, Douglas Ginsburg, was forced to withdraw from consideration after it was revealed that he had used marijuana. In the wake of these events, the Senate greeted with relief the nomination of Anthony Kennedy, a relatively colorless and nonideological conservative. After graduating from Harvard Law School in 1961, Kennedy worked as a lawyer and lobbyist in California until his appointment to the Ninth Circuit by President Ford in 1975. Since joining the Supreme Court, he has most often voted with the “conservative” bloc. He criticized his colleagues for “trivializing constitutional adjudication” by engaging in a “jurisprudence of minutiae” in its enforcement of the establishment clause and for moving “from ‘separate but equal’ to ‘unequal but benign’” in upholding an affirmative action plan. However, he joined some of his liberal colleagues when he twice cast the deciding vote to uphold the first amendment right of protestors to burn the American flag and disappointed some of his conservative supporters when he coauthored a joint opinion with Justices Souter and O'Connor declining to overrule Roe v. Wade and wrote for the Court to invalidate state-sponsored prayers at public school events. He is best known for a series of opinions supporting the constitutional rights of gay men and lesbians, culminating in Obergefell v. Hodges, 135 S. Ct. 2584 (2015), which invalidated prohibitions on same-sex marriage.

JOHN MARSHALL (1755–1835): A century and a half after his death, John Marshall remains perhaps the most important single figure in American constitutional history. Born in a log cabin on the Virginia frontier, he served in the Continental Army during the Revolutionary War. After only the briefest formal instruction, he began the practice of law, specializing in the defense of Virginians against British creditors. Before entering public life, Marshall himself was constantly hounded by creditors. He wrote his five-volume biography of George Washington in an unsuccessful effort to raise money to pay off his debts. In 1799, Marshall entered the House of Representatives, and the following year he became secretary of state in the Adams administration. During his brief tenure, he signed and sealed, but failed to deliver, the famous commission naming William Marbury justice of the peace for the District of Columbia. In 1800, Adams appointed Marshall chief justice after John Jay, the Court's first chief justice, declined reappointment to the position. Marshall served for thirty-four years, participated in more than one thousand decisions, and wrote over five hundred opinions. He is best remembered for establishing the Court's power to declare congressional statutes unconstitutional in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803), although his contemporaries found the portion of Marbury asserting judicial control over presidential appointees much more controversial. But in some ways his refusal to invalidate a statute enacted pursuant to Congress's powers in McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819), and his willingness to strike down state statutes interfering with federal powers or individual rights in such cases as McCulloch, Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1 (1824), and Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 87 (1810), were even more influential on modern constitutional theory. In 1807, Marshall presided over the treason trial of former Vice President Aaron Burr. In the course of that trial, he signed the famous subpoena directing President Jefferson to produce various documents relevant to the trial—a precedent much cited over a century and a half later when Richard Nixon asserted “executive privilege” to resist a judicial subpoena. See L. Baker, John Marshall: A Life in the Law (1974); A.

Beveridge, The Life of John Marshall (1916).

THURGOOD MARSHALL (1908–1993): The son of a primary school teacher and a club steward, Thurgood Marshall became the first African American to serve on the Court when he was appointed by President Johnson in 1967. But Marshall had already made an enduring mark on American legal history decades before his judicial career began. After graduating first in his class from Howard Law School, Marshall began his long involvement with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. For two decades, he traveled across the country coordinating the NAACP's attack on segregation in housing, employment, voting, public accommodations, and, especially, education. His most famous victory during this period came in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), where he successfully argued that segregated public education violated the equal protection clause. In 1961, President Kennedy nominated him to serve on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. Although southern senators blocked his confirmation for a year, he finally assumed his seat, where he served until 1965, when President Johnson appointed him solicitor general. As a justice, Marshall was known primarily for his unstinting defense of racial and other minorities, his liberal interpretation of free speech and press guarantees, his “multi-tiered” theory of equal protection analysis, and his fervent opposition to capital punishment. See J. Williams, Thurgood Marshall: An American Revolutionary (1998); M. Tushnet, Making Constitutional Law: Thurgood Marshall and the Supreme Court 1961–1991 (1997); M. Tushnet, Making Civil Rights Law: Thurgood Marshall and the Supreme Court, 1931–1961 (1994).

JAMES C. McREYNOLDS (1862–1946): Although remembered today primarily as one of the “four horsemen of reaction” who helped block Franklin Roosevelt’s New Deal, James McReynolds first came to public attention as a vigorous “trust buster” in the Theodore Roosevelt and Wilson administrations. In the year that he served as Wilson’s attorney general, he angered many members of Congress and of the administration with his arrogance and ill-temper. President Wilson named him to the Court in 1914 largely to quiet the controversy. His judicial career was marked by an unyielding commitment to strict constructionism and conservative principles. His personal manner continued to alienate many of his colleagues. After The Gold Clause Cases were decided in 1935, he proclaimed, “Shame and humiliation are on us now. Moral and financial chaos may confidently be expected.” Chief Justice Taft remarked that McReynolds “has a continual grouch” and “seems to delight in making others uncomfortable.” Widely accused of anti-Semitism, McReynolds conspicuously failed to sign the letter of affection and regret drafted by his brethren on Justice Brandeis’s retirement from the Court.

SANDRA DAY O’CONNOR (1930–): The first woman ever to serve on the Court, Sandra Day O’Connor was appointed by President Reagan in 1981. O’Connor was a classmate of Justice Rehnquist at the Stanford Law School, where she was an editor of the Stanford Law Review. Despite her outstanding academic achievements, O’Connor found it difficult to locate a job on graduation. When she applied to the firm in which future Attorney General William French Smith was a partner, she was offered the position of secretary. After briefly serving as deputy county attorney for San Mateo County in California, she worked as a civilian attorney for the army while her husband served his tour of duty. She then spent eight years as a mother, homemaker, and volunteer while her three children grew up. When she resumed her legal career, she became an assistant attorney general in Arizona. In 1970, she was elected to the Arizona senate and eventually became majority leader. She then served on the Superior Court for Maricopa County and the Arizona Court of Appeals. Perhaps more often than any other justice in the Court’s history, Justice O’Connor cast the deciding vote in important cases. She showed a preference for a balancing approach to constitutional law and case-by-case particularism—a stance that created conflict with Justice Scalia, who favored a rule-based approach. She initially urged her colleagues to reconsider the Court’s analysis of the abortion question in Roe v. Wade, but later surprised many by coauthoring an important opinion preserving Roe’s central holding at a time when many thought it would be overruled. She wrote for a five-to-four majority to permit universities to utilize affirmative action programs to help achieve racial diversity and authored the majority opinion holding that the executive could not indefinitely hold “enemy combatants” without providing a procedure under which they could challenge their detention. Widely respected for her incisive and informed questioning at oral argument, O’Connor was known for her deference to the political branches of government, for her defense of federalism, and for her original approach to the problem of church-state relations. See S. O’Connor, Lazy B: Growing up on a Cattle Ranch in the American Southwest (2002); Comment, The Emerging Jurisprudence of Justice O’Connor, 52 U. Chi. L. Rev. 389 (1985).

LEWIS F. POWELL, JR. (1907–1998): Following his graduation from Harvard Law School, Lewis Powell returned to his native Virginia, where he joined one of Richmond's most prestigious law firms. As president of the Richmond school board during a period of intense controversy concerning school desegregation, Powell gained a reputation as a racial moderate. Despite intense pressure from those advocating "massive resistance," he insisted on keeping the schools open. Powell was elected president of the American Bar Association in 1964. In that capacity, he worked to establish a legal services program within the Office of Economic Opportunity and spoke out against civil disobedience and "parental permissiveness." In 1971, President Nixon fulfilled his promise to name a southerner to the Court by selecting Powell to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Justice Black. A few years after his appointment, Powell seemed to speak for the South in his concurring opinion in Keyes v. School District, 413 U.S. 189 (1973), in which he argued that there was no significant legal distinction between northern and southern school segregation. Over time, Powell gained the reputation as an ad hoc "balancer," often casting the critical "swing vote" in important decisions. In Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978), Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762 (1977), and Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972), for example, he controlled the disposition even though he was the only justice adopting his particular view of affirmative action, the rights of nonmarital children, and press rights, respectively. See J. Jeffries, Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr. (1994).

WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST (1924–2005): After graduating from Stanford Law School, William Rehnquist came to Washington in 1952 to clerk for Associate Justice Robert Jackson. During his clerkship, he wrote a controversial memorandum for Justice Jackson supporting the constitutionality of "separate but equal" education for blacks. When the memorandum surfaced years later during Rehnquist's confirmation hearings, he explained that it represented Jackson's views and not his own. Following his clerkship, Rehnquist moved to Phoenix, Arizona, where he became involved in Republican politics. A strong supporter of Barry Goldwater, Rehnquist headed the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel in the Nixon administration. President Nixon named him to the Court in 1971, and President Reagan named him chief justice in 1986. Chief Justice Rehnquist was known for his commitment to judicial restraint and majoritarianism. His opinions in the areas of equal protection, due process, and free speech consistently reflected a narrow construction of constitutional rights. For example, he would have limited strict scrutiny under the equal protection clause to cases involving racial discrimination. Unlike conservative justices of an earlier era, however, Rehnquist maintained the same deferential stance when reviewing state legislation arguably interfering with private markets and the free flow of commerce. See, e.g., his opinion for the Court in Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Co. of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328 (1986), and his dissenting opinion in Kassel v. Consolidated Freightways Corp., 450 U.S. 662 (1981). Nonetheless, Rehnquist supported judicial intervention to protect the prerogatives of the states from federal interference and to place constitutional limits on affirmative action programs arguably discriminating in favor of racial minorities. See Shapiro, Mr. Justice Rehnquist: A Preliminary View, 90 Harv. L. Rev. 293 (1976).

JOHN G. ROBERTS, JR. (1955–): Originally nominated by President George W. Bush to replace Justice O'Connor, John Roberts was renominated for the position of Chief Justice of the United States following the death of Chief Justice Rehnquist. Upon his confirmation in 2005, he became the third youngest chief justice in American history and the first justice to replace the justice for whom he had clerked. After graduating magna cum laude from Harvard Law School, Roberts served as a special assistant to the Attorney General, Associate Counsel to the President, and the Principal Deputy Solicitor General. He is one of the most experienced and successful Supreme Court advocates ever to have been appointed to the Court. While in government service, he argued thirty-nine cases before the Supreme Court, winning twenty-five of them. Upon leaving government, he became head of the appellate practice of a major Washington law firm, in which capacity he argued fourteen additional cases before the Court. In 2003, he became a judge on the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Since becoming chief justice, he has spoken repeatedly in favor of having the Court decide cases narrowly and uniting behind a single majority opinion. He angered and disappointed many conservatives when he cast the decisive vote in National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius, 132 S. Ct. 2566 (2012) to uphold the “individual mandate” in the Affordable Care Act.

ANTONIN SCALIA (1936–2016): The son of an Italian immigrant, Antonin Scalia was the first Italian American to be appointed to the Supreme Court. A former law professor and assistant attorney general, he earned a reputation as an intelligent, hardworking, and dedicated conservative while serving as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. When elevated to the Supreme Court, Justice Scalia became a hero for many conservatives, although his unwillingness to compromise and sharply worded opinions limited his ability to assemble majorities on the Court. He was known for his spirited defense of originalism and opposition to constitutional balancing tests. This posture most often led him to “conservative” outcomes, especially with regard to gay rights, abortion, affirmative action, and gun rights. The same posture occasionally led him to vote with the Court’s “liberals,” however, especially on free speech and search and seizure questions. In a concurring opinion concerning the status of “enemy combatants,” he went further than the majority by insisting that the Constitution did not grant the President authority to hold American citizens without trial. Some commentators considered him the Court’s most accomplished stylist, while others decried the effect of his sharply worded opinions on civility in constitutional discourse.

SONIA SOTOMAYOR (1954–): Justice Sotomayor is the daughter of a factory worker with a third grade education who died when she was nine and a nurse who raised her as a single mother. She grew up in a public housing project in the South Bronx. After graduating valedictorian of her high school class, she enrolled at Princeton, where she graduated summa cum laude and Yale Law School, where she was an editor of the Yale Law Journal. She served as a prosecutor and in private practice until she was appointed to the United States District Court by George H.W. Bush. In 1995, she issued a ruling that effectively ended the Major League Baseball strike, a decision that, according to a reporter for the Philadelphia Inquirer, caused her to join “the ranks of Joe DiMaggio, Willie Mays, Jackie Robinson, and Ted Williams.” In 1998, President Bill Clinton appointed her to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, where she served as the first Latina on that court. Nominated by Barack Obama, she joined the Supreme Court in 2009. Since her elevation, Justice Sotomayor has generally voted with the Court’s liberal wing. She has become known for her probing questions at oral argument and her mastery of the record in complex cases. See Sonia Sotomayor, My Beloved World (2013).

DAVID HACKETT SOUTER (1939–): Prior to his nomination to the Supreme Court by the first President Bush, David Souter was a virtual unknown. In his long career as a justice on the New Hampshire Supreme Court, a judge on the New Hampshire trial court, and New Hampshire’s attorney general, he seldom had occasion to express his views on contentious constitutional issues such as abortion and affirmative action. Indeed, some critics suggested that President Bush, mindful of the searing controversy surrounding the nomination of Judge Bork, selected Souter principally because he lacked a “paper trail.” But although Souter had little experience in constitutional adjudication, he came to the Court with solid intellectual credentials. A Rhodes Scholar and graduate of the Harvard Law School, he was praised by liberals and conservatives alike for his intelligence and fair-mindedness. The counsel for the New Hampshire State Democratic Party and president of the New Hampshire Bar Association characterized him as “an enormous intellectual” and “about 135 pounds—and about 120 pounds of brain.” Before his appointment, Justice Souter lived by himself in a ramshackle New Hampshire farmhouse laden with stacks of books. Friends said that he liked to work seven days a week, taking time out to hike and listen to classical music. As a justice, Souter was known for careful, lawyerlike opinions and his moderate, nonideological stance toward controversial constitutional issues.

JOHN PAUL STEVENS (1920–): A graduate of Northwestern Law School, John Paul Stevens clerked for Justice Wiley B. Rutledge before joining a Chicago law firm specializing in antitrust work. He taught part-time at the University of Chicago and Northwestern Law Schools until his appointment to the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals in 1970. Although a registered Republican, Justice Stevens was never active in partisan politics. President Ford elevated him to the Supreme Court in 1975. Stevens was known for his independence and an unwillingness to be bound by rigid formulas. He rejected the position that equal protection analysis can be reduced to various “tiers” of review, for example, arguing that various factors must be weighed under the same standard in every case to ensure that the state has met its obligation to govern impartially. And in free speech cases Stevens staked out his own theory that fits comfortably within neither the traditional “liberal” nor the traditional “conservative” ideology. See, e.g., Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291 (1977); Young v. American Mini Theatres, 427 U.S. 50 (1976).

POTTER STEWART (1915–1985): Son of the Republican mayor of Cincinnati, Potter Stewart became active in Ohio Republican politics at an early age. He was twice elected to the city council and served one term as vice mayor before President Eisenhower appointed him to the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in 1954. In 1958, Eisenhower elevated him to the Supreme Court, where he served until his retirement in 1981. Although his political background was conservative, Stewart occupied a centrist position on the Court. He frequently voted with the liberal justices on first amendment issues (an orientation perhaps influenced by his experience as editor of a student newspaper while at Yale), but with conservative justices on equal protection issues. On many questions, his position simply could not be predicted in advance, and he had little difficulty in changing his mind about views he had expressed in earlier opinions. Perhaps his most famous opinion was a concurrence in Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964), in which he said of “hard core” pornography, “I shall not today attempt further to define the kinds of material I understand to be embraced within that shorthand description; and perhaps I could never succeed in intelligibly doing so. But I know it when I see it, and the motion picture involved in this case is not that.” Although sometimes ridiculed, this statement in some ways summarized Stewart’s judicial philosophy, which tended to be particularistic, intuitive, and pragmatic.

HARLAN FISKE STONE (1872–1946): For twenty-five years, Harlan Fiske Stone practiced law with a Wall Street law firm and served as a professor and the dean of Columbia Law School. In 1924, President Coolidge appointed Stone, his old friend and classmate, to head a Department of Justice demoralized by the Teapot Dome scandal. A year later Coolidge appointed Stone to the Court. Although a Republican and moderate conservative, Stone sided with the wing of the Court willing to uphold New Deal programs during the great controversy that engulfed the Court in the early 1930s. In 1941, President Roosevelt elevated Stone to chief justice, an appointment that Archibald MacLeish called “the perfect word spoken at the perfect moment.” Justice Stone’s footnote 4 in United States v. Carolene Products, 304 U.S. 144 (1938), is doubtless the most famous footnote in constitutional law and has formed the basis of much of modern constitutional theory. During his twenty-one years on the bench, Stone occupied every seat from junior associate justice to senior associate justice to chief justice. He died “with his boots on”—stricken while reading a dissenting opinion from the bench in 1946. See A. Mason, Harlan Fiske Stone: A Pillar of the Law (1956); G. White, The American Judicial Tradition ch. 10 (1976); Dunham, Mr. Chief Justice Stone, in A. Dunham and P. Kurland, Mr. Justice 229–251 (1956).

JOSEPH STORY (1779–1845): Joseph Story was only thirty-two years old and had had no judicial experience when James Madison appointed him to the Court in 1811. Although a Republican, Story had strong nationalist sympathies and sided with John Marshall throughout much of his judicial career. His opinion in Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304 (1816), established the finality of the Court’s constitutional authority against the states. His nationalist inclinations were also reflected in Swift v. Tyson, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 1 (1842), which upheld the power of federal courts to create a national commercial law. As a circuit justice, Story was said to absorb “jurisdiction as a sponge took up water,” and some claimed that, “if a bucket of water were brought into his court with a corn cob floating in it, he would at once extend the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States over it.” A serious scholar, Story was elected to the Harvard Board of Overseers and played a key role in the founding of Harvard Law School. His Commentaries on the Constitution, published in 1833, was a classic of its time. On Marshall’s death in 1835, Story hoped to be nominated chief justice, but Andrew Jackson, who had called him “the most dangerous man in America,” named Roger Taney instead. Story was frequently in dissent during the nine years he sat on the Taney Court. See, e.g., Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U.S. (11 Pet.) 420 (1837). Frustrated by the direction of the Court, which he saw as undermining the Marshall Court’s conception of the Constitution, he planned to resign in 1845, but fell ill and died before he could complete his unfinished business. See G. Dunne, Justice Joseph Story and the Rise of the Supreme Court (1970); K. Neumyer, Supreme Court Justice Joseph Story: Statesman of the Old Republic (1984).

GEORGE SUTHERLAND (1862–1942): A friend and close advisor to President Harding, George Sutherland was appointed to the Court in 1922. Before his appointment, he served in the U.S. Senate for twelve years, where he developed a reputation as an authority on constitutional questions and a conservative who nonetheless occasionally supported progressive causes. While on the Court, he was the intellectual leader of the conservative wing. He strongly objected to what he considered the evisceration of the contract clause and vigorously opposed the constitutionality of minimum wage laws. See Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398 (1934); Adkins v. Children’s Hospital, 261 U.S. 525 (1923). But his concern for the rights of individuals and broad reading of the due process clause also led him to write for the majority in Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), which reversed the conviction of the “Scottsboro Boys” and began the process of applying constitutionally based rules of criminal procedure to the states. See H. Arkes, The Return of George Sutherland: Restoring Jurisprudence of Natural Rights (1994); J. Paschal, Mr. Justice Sutherland: A Man against the State (1951).

WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT (1857–1930): The only person to serve as both President and chief justice, William Howard Taft’s career was marked by genial conservatism and a commitment to the institutional independence of each branch of the federal government. Taft served as secretary of war in Theodore Roosevelt’s administration and became one of Roosevelt’s closest advisors. With support from Roosevelt, he was elected President in 1908. Soon after his inauguration, however, he and Roosevelt split, and he lost his bid for reelection in 1912, when Roosevelt splintered the Republican vote by running as a third-party candidate. After leaving the presidency, Taft taught constitutional law at Yale University and served for a year as president of the American Bar Association. Along with several other former ABA presidents, Taft fought to block Louis Brandeis's nomination to the Court in 1916. President Harding named Taft chief justice in 1921. Taft was responsible for passage of the Judiciary Act of 1925, which gave the Supreme Court effective control over its own appellate jurisdiction and for the appropriation of funds for construction of the present Supreme Court building. See A. Mason, William Howard Taft: Chief Justice (1964).

ROGER B. TANEY (1777–1864): Prior to his appointment as chief justice by President Jackson in 1835, Roger Taney served as Jackson's attorney general and secretary of the treasury. While serving in Jackson's cabinet, he became enmeshed in the controversy surrounding the second Bank of the United States. As attorney general, Taney drafted Jackson's message vetoing the bank's recharter, and when the secretary of the treasury refused to withdraw federal funds from the Bank, Jackson named Taney to the post so that he could do so. But when Jackson submitted Taney's name to the Senate for confirmation, he was defeated and forced to withdraw. Senate Whigs, who feared that Taney was too radical, again blocked his nomination as associate justice in 1835. Shortly thereafter, however, he was successfully nominated to replace John Marshall as chief justice. Taney's career on the Court is overshadowed by his opinion in Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393 (1857), widely viewed as one of the great legal and moral blunders in the Court's history. The rest of his tenure, however, was marked by the cautious and careful use of judicial power. Contrary to the expectations of his contemporaries, he did not support the wholesale abandonment of the Marshall legacy. Instead, he steered a middle course between the extreme nationalism and extreme localism of his colleagues. But as the nation approached civil war, the ground in the middle became increasingly unstable, and Taney's one spasmodic effort to end the nation's agony over slavery by imposing a constitutional solution in Dred Scott ended in a tragedy that permanently marred his reputation. See C. Swisher, Roger B. Taney (1935); G. White, The American Judicial Tradition ch. 3 (1976).

CLARENCE THOMAS (1948–): Born into grinding poverty in segregated coastal Georgia, Clarence Thomas became the second African American and one of the youngest justices to join the Court when he was appointed by President Bush in 1991. He was confirmed by the Senate to fill the seat vacated by the retirement of Thurgood Marshall after extraordinary confirmation hearings that opened with a moving account of his personal saga and closed with charges of sexual harassment leveled against him by Anita Hill, who had worked with him at the Department of Education and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. A graduate of Yale Law School, he served as assistant secretary for civil rights at the Department of Education and chair of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in the Reagan administration. During his controversial seven-year stewardship of the EEOC, Thomas's fierce opposition to affirmative action antagonized liberals and members of the civil rights community. In 1989, President Bush appointed Thomas to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, where he served for fifteen months before his elevation to the Supreme Court. Known as a staunch conservative, Thomas's extrajudicial writings suggest an interest in natural law as a basis for constitutional adjudication. Since joining the Court, he has written a series of distinctive dissents and concurrences, often demonstrating a willingness to reject settled precedent in favor of his understanding of the constitutional text. On racial issues, he strongly opposes what he considers liberal condescension in the form of affirmative action and the assumption that majority black institutions are necessarily inferior. See K. Foskett, Judging Thomas: The Life and Times of Clarence Thomas (2004); A. Thomas, Clarence Thomas: A Biography (2001).

WILLIS VAN DEVANTER (1859–1941): A lawyer's lawyer, William Van Devanter invariably sided with the conservative wing of the Court, but, unlike some of his colleagues, never resorted to divisive ideological rhetoric. Instead, he relied on his mastery of technical doctrine to become a “master of formulas that decided cases without creating precedents.” Van Devanter, who was active in Republican politics in Wyoming, came to Washington during the McKinley administration and was named to the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals by Theodore Roosevelt. When President Taft nominated him to serve as an associate justice, William Jennings Bryan complained that he was “the judge that held that two railroads running parallel to each other for two thousand miles were not competing lines, one of the roads being that of Union Pacific,” one of Van Devanter's former clients. It has been said that Van Devanter came to the Court “fully equipped with a lawyer's understanding of federal jurisdiction, a frontiersman's knowledge of Indian affairs, and a native hostility to governmental regulation.” His years on the Court were marked by a concern for technical jurisdictional questions and opposition to government intervention in all forms. His retirement in June 1937 gave Franklin Roosevelt his first appointment and helped defuse the crisis created by the Court's opposition to the New Deal.

EARL WARREN (1891–1974): Both vilified and canonized during and since his tenure, Earl Warren presided as chief justice over one of the most tumultuous and portentous periods in the Court’s history. The emotions that he aroused are hard to reconcile with his political stance, which was, essentially, centrist and pragmatic. As Republican attorney general and governor of California, he denounced “communistic radicals” and supported the wartime order to forcibly evacuate Japanese Americans. (The Court subsequently upheld the constitutionality of the evacuation in Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944).) In his later years as governor, however, he developed a reputation as a progressive and proposed state programs for prepaid medical insurance and liberal welfare benefits. In 1948, he ran for Vice President on the ticket headed by Thomas Dewey. In 1952, he mounted his own presidential effort. At the Republican convention, however, he threw his support behind Dwight Eisenhower. President Eisenhower repaid Warren by nominating him as chief justice in 1953—a nomination Eisenhower later called “the biggest damn-fool mistake I ever made.” Perhaps Warren’s greatest accomplishment on the Court was his painstaking and successful effort to maintain a united front as the Court overturned the separate but equal doctrine in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 873 (1954), and then confronted southern violence and intransigence. Warren himself believed that his opinion in Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964), establishing the one person, one vote formula, was of greater significance. In the end, however, it may have been his opinions in the field of criminal procedure—especially Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)—that attracted the most controversy. This controversy tended to obscure the fact that there was a strong conservative and moralistic tone to many of Warren’s opinions. He opposed constitutional protection for “pornographic” literature, for example, and dissented in Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969), when the Court invalidated durational residency requirements for welfare recipients. Warren was distrustful of complex doctrinal argument. His opinions were thus marked by a confident, intuitively grounded insistence on fair play and fundamental justice. See B. Schwartz, Superchief (1983); E. Warren, The Memoirs of Earl Warren (1977); G. White, Earl Warren (1982).

BYRON R. WHITE (1917–1992): An outstanding scholar-athlete, Byron “Whizzer” White was first in his class at the University of Colorado, a Rhodes Scholar, and a professional football player with the Detroit Lions before beginning his legal career. White served in the navy during World War II and graduated from Yale Law School magna cum laude. After serving as law clerk to Chief Justice Fred Vinson, he returned to his native Colorado where he practiced with a prominent Denver law firm for fourteen years. A long-time friend of John F. Kennedy, White headed Kennedy's preconvention presidential campaign in Colorado in 1960 and subsequently became chairman of National Citizens for Kennedy. After the election, President Kennedy named him deputy attorney general and in 1962 elevated him to the Court. As a justice, White was known as a strong advocate of school desegregation and a defender of the rights of minorities. Although more ready than his colleagues to find legislation lacking in a "rational basis" when challenged under "low-level" equal protection review, he also criticized his colleagues for too aggressive use of substantive due process analysis. For example, joined only by Justice Rehnquist, White dissented in Roe v. Wade, 410 U. S. 113 (1973), which held that women have a constitutionally protected liberty interest in securing abortions. In Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), he wrote for the Court to reject a claim that "the federal Constitution confers a fundamental right upon homosexuals to engage in sodomy," noting that "to claim that a right to engage in such conduct is 'deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition' or 'implicit in the concept of ordered liberty' is, at best, facetious." See D. Hutchinson, The Man Who Was Whizzer White: A Portrait of Justice Byron R. White (1998).

*In 1863 Congress established a tenth seat, to which Stephen J. Field was appointed.

In 1866 Congress reduced the size of the Court to six justices. Consequently, the seats of Justices Catron and Wayne remained unfilled after their deaths in 1865 and 1867. Congress restored the Court to nine seats in 1869.

The Constitution and the Supreme Court

This chapter deals with the creation of the American Constitution and with the role of the Supreme Court in interpreting the Constitution. We have two central concerns: (1) What was the founding all about? (2) What is the power of the Supreme Court, and when it is interpreting the Constitution, what does it do, exactly? We begin with history.

A. THE ORIGINS OF THE U.S. CONSTITUTION

The Declaration of Independence was signed in 1776. Here are its most famous words:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.—That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed,—That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness.

Hostilities with England substantially ceased in 1781 after the Yorktown campaign; the American Revolution was formally completed in 1783 with the signing of a final peace treaty with England. In February of 1781, the thirteen colonies ratified the Articles of Confederation, under which they lived for seven years. The Constitution was written in 1787 and ratified in 1789. Two years later the bill of rights was added.

Why did the states find it necessary to adopt a new Constitution? What were the problems for which the Constitution was supposed a remedy? Did the Constitution embody the principles of the American Revolution, or did it betray those principles? Views about the Constitution and its framers span a wide range. Many Americans since have seen the framers as intellectual giants, equipped with extraordinary foresight, vision, and faith in individual rights and self-rule, who were able to rise above the squabbles of the day, or somewhat to take advantage of them, in order to institute into law principles that are timeless or at least enduring. See C. Bowen, Miracle at Philadelphia (1986); J. Fiske, The Critical Period of American History (1888). To those who think this way, the framers, and especially Alexander Hamilton and James Madison (but others too), were able to combine deep theoretical insights with practical sense, allowing them to produce new understandings of political institutions, of self-government, and of individual rights.

To skeptics, much of the Constitution is best understood as a series of ad hoc compromises, designed to rescue an immensely difficult situation and to resolve very specific issues over which the young country was divided. The compromises worked—or at least were made to work—but compromises they were. (Two examples are the maintenance of slavery and the immense power of small states.) See M. Farrand, The Framing of the Constitution of the United States (1913). A third strand in American historical thought treats the Constitution as a product, at least in part, of elitist conservatives who, far from trusting the people and believing in self-rule, intended to protect private property, and the position of the relatively well-to-do, from the workings of democratic politics. See W. Holton, Unruly Americans and the Origins of the Constitution (2007); C. Beard, An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States (1913). This third view could be given sympathetic or less sympathetic treatments.

There are, of course, numerous variations on these general approaches. For discussion, see M. Klarman, The Framers' Coup (2016); G. Wood, The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787 (1969); G. Wood, ed., The Confederation and the Constitution (1978); G. Wood, The Radicalism of the American Revolution (1993); R. Horwitz, ed., The Moral Foundations of the American Republic (2d ed. 1979); J. G. A. Pocock, The Machiavellian Moment (1975); Kloppenberg, The Virtues of Liberalism: Christianity, Republicanism and Ethics in Early American Political Discourse, 74 J. Am. Hist. 9 (1987).

To understand the Constitution and the surrounding debates on its purposes and effects, it is useful to have some understanding of the Articles of Confederation, which the Constitution replaced. The Articles were adopted in order to ensure some unification of the states regarding common foreign and domestic problems, but the overriding understanding was that the states would remain sovereign. The Articles begin without any kind of poetry:

To all to whom these Presents shall come, we the undersigned Delegates of the States affixed to our Names send greeting.

Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union between the states of New Hampshire, Massachusetts-bay Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia.

Notice that the Articles are formed by the states and their delegates—not by We the People. (Compare, if you would, the soaring start of the Constitution that followed the Articles, produced just sixteen years later.) The very first article of the Articles did give an enduring name to the Confederacy: “the United States of America.” But the second more or less took it back, announcing that “each state retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every Power, Jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled.”

To be sure, a number of powers were conferred on “the United States in Congress assembled.” These powers included “the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war”; the authority to resolve disputes between the states; the power to regulate “the alloy and value of coin struck by their own authority, or by that of the respective states”; and the authority to control dealings with Indian tribes, to establish or regulate post offices, and to appoint naval and other offices in federal service. But at least by modern standards, there were conspicuous gaps. Two of the most important powers of the modern national government were missing altogether: the power to tax and the power to regulate commerce. Moreover, two of the three branches of the national government were absent. There was no executive authority. (One reason was deep distrust of the idea of anything like a king.) There was no general national judicial authority; the only relevant provision authorized Congress to establish a national appellate tribunal to decide maritime cases. Of course, there was no bill of rights (though it should be noted that the absence of a bill of rights was not in any way the impetus behind the Constitution, and indeed the federalists thought, at the time of ratification, that a bill of rights did not belong in the Constitution at all).

As experience under the Articles of Confederation accumulated, many leading political figures became deeply dissatisfied with the performance of the government it created. In fact, the situation appeared to be disastrous. Among the complaints were that states refused to provide money owed to the federal government, refused to comply with treaties entered into by the United States, interfered with the commerce of other states, forgave debts, and issued inflated paper currency. These grievances came in the context of economic decline, which produced a general sense of unease. Just a decade after the American Revolution, the nation's high ideals and aspirations appeared doomed. James Madison wrote that people "unanimously agree that the existing Confederacy is tottering to its foundation," and added, "It is not possible that a government can last long under these circumstances." James Madison to Edmund Randolph, February 25, 1787, in Founders Online, National Archives, <http://founders.archives.gov/documents/Madison/01-09-02-0154>.

In April 1787, preparing for the Constitutional Convention, Madison wrote himself a memorandum that describes the situation from the point of view of those advocating substantial changes:

1. FAILURE OF THE STATES TO COMPLY WITH THE CONSTITUTIONAL REQUISITIONS. This evil has been so fully experienced both during the war and since the peace, results so naturally from the number and independent authority of the States and has been so uniformly exemplified in every similar Confederacy, that it may be considered as not less radically and permanently inherent in than it is fatal to the object of the present system.

2. ENCROACHMENTS BY THE STATES ON THE FEDERAL AUTHORITY. Examples of this are numerous and repetitions may be foreseen in almost every case where any favorite object of a State shall present a temptation. Among these examples are the wars and treaties of Georgia with the Indians. The unlicensed compacts between Virginia and Maryland, and between Pennsylvania & New Jersey—the troops raised and to be kept up by Massachusetts.

3. VIOLATIONS OF THE LAW OF NATIONS AND OF TREATIES. From the number of Legislatures, the sphere of life from which most of their members are taken, and the circumstances under which their legislative business is carried on, irregularities of this kind must frequently happen. Accordingly not a year has passed without instances of them in some one or other of the States. The Treaty of Peace—the treaty with France—the treaty with Holland have each been violated. [See the complaints to Congress on these subjects.] The causes of these irregularities must necessarily produce frequent violations of the law of nations in other respects.

As yet foreign powers have not been rigorous in animadverting on us. This moderation, however cannot be mistaken for a permanent partiality to our faults, or a permanent security against those disputes with other nations, which being among the greatest of public calamities, it ought to be least in the power of any part of the community to bring on the whole.

4. TRESPASSES OF THE STATES ON THE RIGHTS OF EACH OTHER. These are alarming symptoms, and may be daily apprehended as we are admonished by daily experience. See the law of Virginia restricting foreign vessels to certain ports—of Maryland in favor of vessels belonging to her own citizens—of New York in favor of the same.

Paper money, instalments of debts, occlusion of Courts, making property a legal tender, may likewise be deemed aggressions on the rights of other States. As the Citizens of every State aggregate taken stand more or less in the relation of Creditors or debtors, to the Citizens of every other State, Acts of the debtor State in favor of debtors, affect the Creditor State, in the same manner as they do its own citizens who are relatively creditors towards other citizens. This remark may be extended to foreign nations. If the exclusive regulation of the value and alloy of coin was properly delegated to the federal authority, the policy of it equally requires a controul on the States in the cases above mentioned. It must have been meant 1. to preserve uniformity in the circulating medium throughout the nation. 2. to prevent those frauds on the citizens of other States, and the subjects of foreign powers, which might disturb the tranquility at home, or involve the Union in foreign contests.

The practice of many States in restricting the commercial intercourse with other States, and putting their productions and manufacturers on the same footing with those of foreign nations, though not contrary to the federal articles, is certainly adverse to the spirit of the Union, and tends to beget retaliating regulations, not less expensive and vexatious in themselves than they are destructive of the general harmony.

5. WANT OF CONCERT IN MATTERS WHERE COMMON INTEREST REQUIRES IT. This defect is strongly illustrated in the state of our commercial affairs. How much has the national dignity, interest, and revenue, suffered from this cause? Instances of inferior moment are the want of uniformity in the laws concerning naturalization & literary property; of provision for national seminaries, for grants of incorporation for national purposes, for canals and other works of general utility, which may at present be defeated by the perverseness of particular States whose concurrence is necessary.

6. WANT OF GUARANTY TO THE STATES OF THEIR CONSTITUTIONS & LAWS AGAINST INTERNAL VIOLENCE. The confederation is silent on this point and therefore by the second article the hands of the federal authority are tied. According to Republican Theory, Right and power being both vested in the majority, are held to be synonymous. According to fact and experience a minority may in an appeal to force, be an over-match for the majority. 1. if the minority happen to include all such as possess the skill and habits of military life, & such as possess the great pecuniary resources, one-third only may conquer the remaining two-thirds. 2. one-third of those who participate in the choice of the rulers, may be rendered a majority by the accession of those whose poverty excludes them from a right of suffrage, and who for obvious reasons will be more likely to join the standard of sedition than that of the established Government. 3. where slavery exists the republican Theory becomes still more fallacious.

7. WANT OF SANCTION TO THE LAWS, AND OF COERCION IN THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CONFEDERACY. A sanction is essential to the idea of law, as coercion is to that of Government. The federal system being destitute of both, wants the great vital principles of a Political Constitution. Under the form of such a constitution, it is in fact nothing more than a treaty of amity of commerce and of alliance, between independent and Sovereign States. From what cause could so fatal an omission have happened in the articles of Confederation? from a mistaken confidence that the justice, the good faith, the honor, the sound policy, of the several legislative assemblies would render superfluous any appeal to the ordinary motives by which the laws secure the obedience of individuals: a confidence which does honor to the enthusiastic virtue of the compilers, as much as the inexperience of the crisis apologizes for their errors. The time which has since elapsed has had the double effect, of increasing the light and tempering the warmth, with which the arduous work may be revised. It is no longer doubted that a unanimous and punctual obedience of 13 independent bodies, to the acts of the federal Government ought not to be calculated on. Even during the war, when external danger supplied in some degree the defect of legal & coercive sanctions, how imperfectly did the States fulfill their obligations to the Union? In time of peace, we see already what is to be expected. How indeed could it be otherwise? In the first place, Every general act of the Union must necessarily bear unequally hard on some particular member or members of it, secondly the partiality of the members to their own interests and rights, a partiality which will be fostered by the courtiers of popularity, will naturally exaggerate the inequality where it exists, and even suspect it where it has no existence, thirdly a distrust of the voluntary compliance of each other may prevent the compliance of any, although it should be the latent disposition of all. Here are causes & pretexts which will never fail to render federal measures abortive. If the laws of the States were merely recommendatory to their citizens, or if they were to be rejudged by County authorities, what security, what probability would exist, that they would be carried into execution? Is the security or probability greater in favor of the acts of Congress which depending for their execution on the will of the State legislatures, which are tho' nominally authoritative, in fact recommendatory only?

8. WANT OF RATIFICATION BY THE PEOPLE OF THE ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. In some of the States the Confederation is recognized by, and forms a part of the Constitution. In others however it has received no other sanction than that of the legislative authority. [As] far as the union of the States is to be regarded as a league of sovereign powers, and not as a political Constitution by virtue of which they are become one sovereign power, so far it seems to follow from the doctrine of compacts, that a breach of any of the articles of the Confederation by any of the parties to it, absolves the other parties from their respective Obligations, and gives them a right if they chuse to exert it, of dissolving the Union altogether.

9. MULTIPLICITY OF LAWS IN THE SEVERAL STATES. In developing the evils which viciate the political system of the U.S., it is proper to include those which are found within the States individually, as well as those which directly affect the States collectively, since the former class have an indirect influence on the general malady and must not be overlooked in forming a compleat remedy. Among the evils then of our situation may well be ranked the multiplicity of laws from which no State is exempt. As far as laws are necessary to mark with precision the duties of those who are to obey them, and to take from those who are to administer them a discretion which might be abused, their number is the price of liberty. As far as laws exceed this limit, they are a nuisance; a nuisance of the most pestilent kind. Try the Codes of the several States by this test, and what a luxuriancy of legislation do they present. The short period of independency has filled as many pages as the century which preceded it. Every year, almost every session, adds a new volume. This may be the effect in part, but it can only be in part, of the situation in which the revolution has placed us. A review of the several Codes will shew that every necessary and useful part of the least voluminous of them might be compressed into one tenth of the compass, and at the same time be rendered ten fold as perspicuous....

11. INJUSTICE OF THE LAWS OF THE STATES. [Injustice] betrays a defect still more alarming: more alarming not merely because it is a greater evil in itself; but because it brings more into question the fundamental principle of republican Government, that the majority who rule in such governments are the safest Guardians both of public Good and private rights....

In 1786, state representatives met in Annapolis to discuss problems that had arisen under the Articles; they adopted a resolution to hold a convention in Philadelphia to remedy those problems. But the nation's charge to the framers was much narrower than the ultimate product would suggest. The framers, chosen by state legislatures, were instructed "to meet at Philadelphia [to] take into consideration the situation of the United States, to devise such further provisions as shall appear to them necessary to render the constitution of the federal government adequate to the exigencies of the Union." The limited character of this charge proved a serious embarrassment to the framers, whose product reflected their view that it was necessary to provide not "further provisions" but an entirely new governing document whose character was not clearly proportionate to the weaknesses of the Articles.

There is therefore a sense in which the Constitution was itself an unlawful act. As noted above, the Convention disregarded the amending procedure set out in the Articles, which required approval by all thirteen state legislatures. The Constitution was instead sent to Congress, with a request that it be sent in turn to state legislatures. The state legislatures would then send it to popularly elected state ratifying conventions.

The Constitution changed the framework set up by the Articles of Confederation in a number of ways. Among the most important changes were the creation of an executive branch; the grant to Congress of the powers to tax and to regulate commerce; and the creation of a federal judiciary, including the Supreme Court and, if Congress chose, lower federal courts. The tenth amendment, added two years later, was a pale echo of the first provisions of the Articles of Confederation, deleting the word "expressly," and it was countered by the clause granting Congress the authority to make "all laws necessary and proper" to effectuate the enumerated powers of the federal government.

Was there an underlying theory that justified this expansion of federal power? Many historians think so. They insist that the delegates to the Convention were responding to serious flaws under the Articles of Confederation, and that they created a document that reflected on a novel theory of self-government. Others contend that the new Constitution was an effort to solve distinctly practical problems, and that it is not best seen as a theoretical project. Still others claim that many of the delegates were motivated largely by interest-group politics advanced under the cloak of high political theory. State legislators had favored the interests of farmers and taxpayers against the interests of creditors and the commercial class. The latter group responded by attempting to change the structure of government so as to disadvantage the former group. See generally W. Holton, Unruly Americans and the Origins of the Constitution (2007). For a valuable perspective, see Klarman, The Framers' Coup, supra.

Whatever one's conclusion on these issues, there can be no doubt that the struggle over the design of the founding document, and also over its ratification, produced an outpouring of fresh thinking. As you read the material that follows, consider the extent to which the thinking of the framers and ratifiers should influence contemporary constitutional interpretation.

One of the central disputes at the Convention was disagreement over the implications of classical republican theory, fueled by the recent memory of the American Revolution. Republican theorists placed a premium on the idea of self-government. The colonists were particularly influenced by the French theorist Montesquieu, who famously divided governments into three kinds: "a republican government is that in which the body, or only a part of the people, is possessed of the supreme power; monarchy, that in which a single person governs by fixed and established laws; a despotic government, that in which a single person directs everything by his own will and caprice." Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws 8 (1906). In the period that preceded the Revolution, the colonists were seized by republican thinking, which repudiated the whole idea of a monarchy, and which ended up as a challenge to hierarchies of many different kinds. See G. Wood, The Radicalism of the American Revolution (rev. ed. 1998).

In the long history of republican thought, many theorists stressed the importance of civic virtue—the willingness of citizens to subordinate their private interests to the general good. Politics thus consisted of self-rule, but it was self-rule of a particular sort. Self-rule was a matter not of pursuing self-interest, or of aggregating "preferences," but instead of selecting the values that ought to control public and private life. Dialogue and discussion among the citizenry were critical features in the governmental process. In a republic, political participation should be active and frequent and not limited to voting or other similar statements of preference. Civil society was to operate as a sort of teacher, inculcating virtue, and not merely as a regulator of private conduct. The model for government was the town meeting, a metaphor that played an explicit role in the conception of politics put forth primarily by the proposed Constitution's opponents. Consider in this regard Thomas Jefferson's suggestion that the Constitution should be amended in every generation, partly in order to promote general attention to public affairs; this suggestion was a natural one for those who saw frequent participation and virtue as important ingredients in democratic self-government. See Letter to Samuel Kercheval, July 12, 1816, in The Portable Thomas Jefferson 557–558 (M. Peterson ed., 1975).

For republican theorists, one of government's tasks was to ensure the flourishing of the necessary public-spiritedness. Many believed in small republics and hence a high degree of decentralization; only in small communities would it be possible to find and develop the unselfishness and devotion to the public good on which genuine freedom depends. The Articles of Confederation promote such decentralization. “Brutus,” writing in opposition to the proposed Constitution, emphasized the need for homogeneity: “In a republic, the manners, sentiments, and interests of the people should be similar. If this be not the case, there will be a constant clashing of opinions; and the representatives of one part will be continually striving against those of the other.”² The Complete Antifederalist 369 (H. Storing ed., 1980).

The Constitution’s opponents, referred to as “antifederalists,” were especially hostile to a dramatic expansion in the size and power of the national government. They thought that it threatened liberty itself, and that it endangered the principles for which the Revolution had been fought. A powerful national government would threaten liberty; it could be a return to monarchy. It would undermine the spirit of civic virtue, creating heterogeneity and distance from the sphere of power, both of which would undermine deliberative processes and the citizens’ willingness to subordinate their private interests to the public good. Closely connected to this view was the antifederalists’ desire to avoid extreme disparities in wealth, education, and power.

It should not be difficult to see why the antifederalists would have had at best an ambivalent attitude toward a system in which decisions were made by representatives of the people rather than by the people themselves—certainly if the representatives were not close to the people. According to one strand of republican thought, all decisions should be made in small communities or even during a face-to-face process of deliberation and debate. Such a process would inculcate civic virtue in the public at large, virtue from which the process itself would simultaneously benefit.

The antifederalists did not go so far. By 1787, all agreed that representation was necessary at both the state and the national levels. The size of both governments made it impossible to conduct political affairs on the model of the town meeting. The proposed Constitution’s opponents believed that it would prevent citizens from having effective control over their representatives and deprive them of an opportunity to participate in public affairs. It would thus pose a severe threat to the underlying principle of civic virtue. Rule by remote national leaders would attenuate the scheme of representation, rupturing the alliance of interests between the rulers and the ruled. It would create a class of quasi-aristocrats, charging them with the task of directing a huge national government. The antifederalists foresaw a system in which the people would be effectively excluded from the world of public affairs and in which national leaders, only weakly accountable, would have enormous discretion to make law and policy.

The antifederalists were also skeptical of the emerging interest in commercial development that played a prominent role in the decision to abandon the Articles of Confederation. In the antifederalists' view, commerce was a threat to the principles underlying the Revolution, for it gave rise to ambition and avarice and thus to the dissolution of communal bonds. Montesquieu, an important source for federalists and antifederalists alike, had said that "in countries where the people are actuated only by the spirit of commerce, they make a traffic of all the humane, all the moral virtues; the most trifling things, those which humanity would demand, are there done, or there given, only for money." Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws bk. XX, ch. ii (spec. ed. 1984) (1751).

In sum, the antifederalists attacked the proposed Constitution on the ground that it was inconsistent with the underlying principles of republicanism. The removal of the people from the political process, the creation of a powerful, remote, and liberty-threatening national government, and the new emphasis on commerce—all of these threatened to undermine the purposes for which the Revolution had been fought.

The antifederalist objections to the proposed Constitution provoked a theoretical justification that amounted in many respects to a new conception of politics—in Gordon Wood's words, a "political theory worthy of a prominent place in the history of Western thought." G. Wood, The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787, at 615 (1969). That conception consisted of a reformulation of the principles of republicanism—a reformulation that attempted to synthesize elements of traditional republicanism with an emerging theory that welcomed rather than feared heterogeneity, and that understood the reality that the spirit of faction could not be eliminated.

Much of that reformulation can be found in The Federalist Papers—essays attempting to defend the proposed Constitution to the country against antifederalist attack. The Federalist Papers were published under the name "Publius," but they were in fact written by James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, and John Jay. Although the papers are rightly consulted as a means of understanding the theory underlying the Constitution, and the understandings of its drafters, it is important to keep in mind that the essays were designed to persuade the ambivalent. Nonetheless, The Federalist Papers count among the classic works in the theory of democracy and constitutionalism.

The Federalist No. 10 (Madison)
(1787)

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK:

Among the numerous advantages promised by a well-constructed Union, none deserves to be more accurately developed than its tendency to break and control the violence of faction. The friend of popular governments never finds himself so much alarmed for their character and fate, as when he contemplates their propensity to this dangerous vice. [The] instability, injustice, and confusion introduced into the public councils, have, in truth, been the mortal diseases under which popular governments have everywhere perished; as they continue to be the favorite and fruitful topics from which the adversaries to liberty derive their most specious declamations. [Complaints] are everywhere heard from our most considerate and virtuous citizens, equally the friends of public and private faith, and of public and personal liberty, that our governments are too unstable, that the public good is disregarded in the conflicts of rival parties, and that measures are too often decided, not according to the rules of justice and the rights of the minor party, but by the superior force of an interested and overbearing majority. However anxiously we may wish that these complaints had no foundation, the evidence of known facts will not permit us to deny that they are in some degree true. [The] distresses under which we labor [must] be chiefly, if not wholly, effects of the unsteadiness and injustice with which a factious spirit has tainted our public administrations.

By a faction, I understand a number of citizens, whether amounting to a majority or minority of the whole, who are united and actuated by some common impulse of passion, or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens, or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community.

There are two methods of curing the mischiefs of faction: the one, by removing its causes; the other, by controlling its effects.

There are again two methods of removing the causes of faction: the one, by destroying the liberty which is essential to its existence; the other, by giving to every citizen the same opinions, the same passions, and the same interests.

It could never be more truly said than of the first remedy, that it was worse than the disease. Liberty is to faction what air is to fire, an aliment without which it instantly expires. But it could not be less folly to abolish liberty, which is essential to political life, because it nourishes faction, than it would be to wish the annihilation of air, which is essential to animal life, because it imparts to fire its destructive agency.

The second expedient is as impracticable as the first would be unwise. As long as the reason of man continues fallible, and he is at liberty to exercise it, different opinions will be formed. As long as the connection subsists between his reason and his self-love, his opinions and his passions will have a reciprocal influence on each other; and the former will be objects to which the latter will attach themselves. The diversity in the faculties of men, from which the rights of property originate, is not less an insuperable obstacle to a uniformity of interests. The protection of these faculties is the first object of government. From the protection of different and unequal faculties of acquiring property, the possession of different degrees and kinds of property immediately results; and from the influence of these on the sentiments and views of the respective proprietors, ensues a division of the society into different interests and parties.

The latent causes of faction are thus sown in the nature of man; and we see them everywhere brought into different degrees of activity, according to the different circumstances of civil society. A zeal for different opinions, concerning religion, concerning government, and many other points, as well of speculation as of practice; an attachment to different leaders ambitiously contending for preeminence and power; or to persons of other descriptions whose fortunes have been interesting to the human passions, have, in turn, divided mankind into parties, inflamed them with mutual animosity, and rendered them much more disposed to vex and oppress each other than to co-operate for their common good. So strong is this propensity of mankind to fall into mutual animosities, that where no substantial occasion presents itself, the most frivolous and fanciful distinctions have been sufficient to kindle their unfriendly passions and excite their most violent conflicts. But the most common and durable source of factions has been the various and unequal distribution of property. Those who hold and those who are without property have ever formed distinct interests in society. Those who are creditors, and those who are debtors, fall under a like discrimination. A landed interest, a manufacturing interest, a mercantile interest, a moneyed interest, with many lesser interests, grow up of necessity in civilized nations, and divide them into different classes, actuated by different sentiments and views. The regulation of these various and interfering interests forms the principal task of modern legislation, and involves the spirit of party and faction in the necessary and ordinary operations of the government.

No man is allowed to be a judge in his own cause, because his interest would certainly bias his judgment, and, not improbably, corrupt his integrity. With equal, nay with greater reason, a body of men are unfit to be both judges and parties at the same time; yet what are many of the most important acts of legislation, but so many judicial determinations, not indeed concerning the rights of single persons, but concerning the rights of large bodies of citizens? And what are the different classes of legislators but advocates and parties to the causes which they determine? Is a law proposed concerning private debts? It is a question to which the creditors are parties on one side and the debtors on the other. Justice ought to hold the balance between them. Yet the parties are, and must be, themselves, the judges; and the most numerous party, or, in other words, the most powerful faction must be expected to prevail. Shall domestic manufacturers be encouraged, and in what degree, by restrictions on foreign manufacturers? are questions which would be differently decided by the landed and the manufacturing classes, and probably by neither with a sole regard to justice and the public good.

It is in vain to say that enlightened statesmen will be able to adjust these clashing interests, and render them all subservient to the public good. Enlightened statesmen will not always be at the helm....

The inference to which we are brought is, that the causes of faction cannot be removed, and that relief is only to be sought in the means of controlling its effects.

If a faction consists of less than a majority, relief is supplied by the republican principle, which enables the majority to defeat its sinister views by regular vote. It may clog the administration, it may convulse the society; but it will be unable to execute and mask its violence under the forms of the Constitution. When a majority is included in a faction, the form of popular government, on the other hand, enables it to sacrifice to its ruling passion or interest both the public good and the rights of other citizens. To secure the public good and private rights against the danger of such a faction, and at the same time to preserve the spirit and the form of popular government, is then the great object to which our inquiries are directed. Let me add that it is the great desideratum by which this form of government can be rescued from the opprobrium under which it has so long labored, and be recommended to the esteem and adoption of mankind.

By what means is this object attainable? Evidently by one of two only. Either the existence of the same passion or interest in a majority at the same time must be prevented, or the majority, having such coexistent passion or interest, must be rendered, by their number and local situation, unable to concert and carry into effect schemes of oppression. If the impulse and the opportunity be suffered to coincide, we well know that neither moral nor religious motives can be relied on as an adequate control. They are not found to be such on the injustice and violence of individuals, and lose their efficacy in proportion to the number combined together, that is, in proportion as their efficacy becomes needful.

From this view of the subject it may be concluded that a pure democracy, by which I mean a society consisting of a small number of citizens, who assemble and administer the government in person, can admit of no cure for the mischiefs of faction. A common passion or interest will, in almost every case, be felt by a majority of the whole; a communication and concert result from the form of government itself; and there is nothing to check the inducements to sacrifice the weaker party or an obnoxious individual. Hence it is that such democracies have ever been spectacles of turbulence and contention; have ever been found incompatible with personal security or the rights of property; and have in general been as short in their lives as they have been violent in their deaths. Theoretic politicians, who have patronized this species of government, have erroneously supposed that by reducing mankind to a perfect equality in their political rights, they would, at the same time, be perfectly equalized and assimilated in their possessions, their opinions, and their passions.

A republic, by which I mean a government in which the scheme of representation takes place, opens a different prospect, and promises the cure for which we are seeking....

The two great points of difference between a democracy and a republic are: first, the delegation of the government, in the latter, to a small number of citizens elected by the rest; secondly, the greater number of citizens, and greater sphere of country, over which the latter may be extended.

The effect of the first difference is, on the one hand, to refine and enlarge the public views, by passing them through the medium of a chosen body of citizens, whose wisdom may best discern the true interest of their country, and whose patriotism and love of justice will be least likely to sacrifice it to temporary or partial considerations. Under such a regulation, it may well happen that the public voice, pronounced by the representatives of the people, will be more consonant to the public good than if pronounced by the people themselves, convened for the purpose. On the other hand, the effect may be inverted. Men of factious tempers, of local prejudices, or of sinister designs, may, by intrigue, by corruption, or by other means, first obtain the suffrages, and then betray the interests, of the people. The question resulting is, whether small or extensive republics are more favorable to the election of proper guardians of the public weal; and it is clearly decided in favor of the latter by two obvious considerations:

In the first place, it is to be remarked that, however small the republic may be, the representatives must be raised to a certain number, in order to guard against the cabals of a few; and that, however large it may be, they must be limited to a certain number, in order to guard against the confusion of a multitude. Hence, the number of representatives in the two cases not being in proportion to that of the two constituents, and being proportionally greater in the small republic, it follows that, if the proportion of fit characters be not less in the large than in the small republic, the former will present a greater option, and consequently a greater probability of a fit choice.

In the next place, as each representative will be chosen by a greater number of citizens in the large than in the small republic, it will be more difficult for unworthy candidates to practice with success the vicious arts by which elections are too often carried; and the suffrages of the people being more free, will be more likely to center in men who possess the most attractive merit and the most diffusive and established characters.

It must be confessed that in this, as in most other cases, there is a mean, on both sides of which inconveniences will be found to lie. By enlarging too much the number of electors, you render the representative too little acquainted with all their local circumstances and lesser interests as by reducing it too much, you render him unduly attached to these, and too little fit to comprehend and pursue great and national objects. The federal Constitution forms a happy combination in this respect; the great and aggregate interests being referred to the national, the local and particular to the State legislatures.

The other point of difference is, the greater number of citizens and extent of territory which may be brought within the compass of republican than of democratic government; and it is this circumstance principally which renders factious combinations less to be dreaded in the former than in the latter. The smaller the society, the fewer probably will be the distinct parties and interests composing it; the fewer the distinct parties and interests, the more frequently will a majority be found of the same party; and the smaller the number of individuals composing a majority, and the smaller the compass within which they are placed, the more easily will they concert and execute their plans of oppression. Extend the sphere, and you take in a greater variety of parties and interests; you make it less probable that a majority of the whole will have a common motive to invade the rights of other citizens; or if such a common motive exists, it will be more difficult for all who feel it to discover their own strength, and to act in unison with each other. Besides other impediments, it may be remarked that, where there is a consciousness of unjust or dishonorable purposes, communication is always checked by distrust in proportion to the number whose concurrence is necessary.

Hence, it clearly appears, that the same advantage which a republic has over a democracy, in controlling the effects of faction, is enjoyed by a large over a small republic,—is enjoyed by the Union over the States composing it. Does the advantage consist in the substitution of representatives whose enlightened views and virtuous sentiments render them superior to local prejudices and to schemes of injustice? It will not be denied that the representation of the Union will be most likely to possess these requisite endowments. Does it consist in the greater security afforded by a greater variety of parties, against the event of any one party being able to outnumber and oppress the rest? In an equal degree does the increased variety of parties comprised within the Union, increase this security. Does it, in fine, consist in the greater obstacles opposed to the concert and accomplishment of the secret wishes of an unjust and interested majority? Here, again, the extent of the Union gives it the most palpable advantage.

The influence of factious leaders may kindle a flame within their particular States, but will be unable to spread a general conflagration through the other States. A religious sect may degenerate into a political faction in a part of the Confederacy; but the variety of sects dispersed over the entire face of it must secure the national councils against any danger from that source. A rage for paper money, for an abolition of debts, for an equal division of property, or for any other improper or wicked project, will be less apt to pervade the whole body of the Union than a particular member of it; in the same proportion as such a malady is more likely to taint a particular county or district, than an entire State.

In the extent and proper structure of the Union, therefore, we behold a republican remedy for the diseases most incident to republican government. And according to the degree of pleasure and pride we feel in being republicans, ought to be our zeal in cherishing the spirit and supporting the character of Federalists.

Note: Madisonian Republicanism

As The Federalist No. 10 reveals Madison agreed with the antifederalists that a primary problem of governance was control of factions. The antifederalists rooted the problem of faction in that of corruption, understood broadly as the capture of public institutions by private interests. Their solution rested in the effort to control the factional spirit and the power of representatives. In their view, the civic virtue of the citizenry and of its representatives would work as a safeguard against factional tyranny.

The Federalist No. 10 turned the antifederalist understanding on its head. For Madison, and for many other federalists, factions were an inevitable product of liberty, which would produce inequality in the ownership of property. Therefore, the problem could not be solved by the traditional republican means of education and inculcation of virtue. Moreover, the problem of faction was likely to be most, not least, severe in a small republic. It was in a small republic that a self-interested private group would be most likely to be able to seize political power in order to distribute wealth or opportunities in its favor. Indeed, in the view of the federalists, this was precisely what had happened in the years since the Revolution. In that period, factions had usurped the processes of state government, putting both liberty and property at risk.

Consider in this regard Madison's rejection of Jefferson's proposal of frequent constitutional amendment on the ground that such a proposal would produce "the most violent struggle between the parties interested in reviving and those interested in reforming the antecedent state of property." M. Meyers, ed., The Mind of the Founder 232 (1969). For Jefferson, by contrast, turbulence is "productive of good. It prevents the degeneracy of government, and nourishes a general attention to the public affairs. I hold that a little rebellion now and then is a good thing." Letter to Madison, Jan. 30, 1787, in The Portable Thomas Jefferson 416–417 (M. Peterson ed., 1975). For Madison, ongoing processes of self-government produced not the promise of genuine self-determination but instead the danger of factional warfare.

Madison believed that self-interest was an inevitable force in political behavior. The federalists did not, however, suppose that self-interest was all there was to human beings. "The supposition of universal venality in human nature is little less an error in political reasoning than the supposition of universal rectitude," wrote Hamilton in The Federalist No. 76. And in No. 55, Madison made the same point, claiming that "[as] there is a degree of depravity in mankind which requires a certain degree of circumspection and distrust, so there are other qualities in human nature, which justify a certain portion of esteem and confidence." In any case, the specter of faction was sufficient to justify rejection of the antifederalist understanding that in a small republic the problem of faction could be overcome. But it was in developing a solution that Madison, Hamilton, and their colleagues were particularly original. The solution began with the insight that in a direct democracy the problem posed by factions is especially acute, for a "common passion or interest will, in almost every case, be felt by a majority of the whole" and there will be no protection for the minority. But safeguards would be found in a large republic. There, the diversity of interests would reduce the risk that a common desire would be felt by sufficient numbers of people to oppress minorities. In this respect, the likelihood of factional tyranny contained a built-in check in a large republic.

On this view, heterogeneity—Brutus's fear—was a positive good. It would work against factionalism and parochialism. At the same time "differences of opinion, and the jarrings of parties [would]...promote deliberation and circumspection; and serve to check the excesses of the majority." The Federalist No. 70. Differences and disagreement were not harmful to a deliberative republic. On the contrary, they were indispensable to its successful operation.

Nor were these the only virtues of size. The other feature of the large republic was that the principle of representation would serve in that setting as a substantial solution to the problem of faction. The central phrase here is Madison's suggestion that that principle would "refine and enlarge the public views, by passing them through the medium of a chosen body of citizens, whose wisdom may best discern the true interest of their country, and whose patriotism and love of justice will be least likely to sacrifice it to temporary or partial considerations." This is so in part because in a large republic the dangers produced by undue attachment to local interests would be reduced.

This conception of representation appears throughout The Federalist Papers and indeed throughout the work of both Madison and Hamilton. In No. 57, Madison urges that "the aim of every political constitution is, or ought to be, first to obtain for rulers men who possess most wisdom to discern, and most virtue to pursue, the common good of society; and in the next place, to take the most effectual precautions for keeping them virtuous while they continue to hold the public trust." Elsewhere he suggests that "wisdom" and "virtue" will characterize national representatives. Where the antifederalists accepted representation as a necessary evil, Madison regarded it as an opportunity for achieving governance by officials devoted to a public good distinct from the struggle of private interests.

For these reasons, Madison favored long length of service and large election districts—precisely what the antifederalists most feared. In the Madisonian account, representatives were to have the time and temperament to engage in a form of collective reasoning. They were not to be mere "transmission belts" for the will of the various constituencies, much less to be a mechanism for aggregating interests. The hope, in short, was for a genuinely national politics. The representatives of the people—not the people themselves—would be free to engage in the process of discussion and debate from which the common good would emerge. Consider the fact that the first Congress rejected a right to instruct, by which constituents would be authorized to give binding instructions to representatives. Those who opposed this right contended that it would be inconsistent with the point of the legislative meeting: public-spirited deliberation among people with different points of view.

Even if The Federalist No. 10 is taken to set out some central themes in the new Constitution, it is far from the entire story. The Constitution embodies a set of structural provisions designed to bring about public-spirited representation, to provide safeguards in the event that it is absent, and to ensure an important measure of popular control. The various systems of representation in the different branches of the national government were designed to promote deliberation in government and to control possible abuses. Recognizing that sovereignty lay in the people, the framers designed a system in which no branch could speak authoritatively for the people themselves. On this view, the Constitution's structural provisions can be seen as a kind of bill of rights, designed to protect against tyranny. Many of the framers, including Hamilton, saw the structural provisions in exactly that way.

Bicameralism—the division of Congress into the House and the Senate, with two-year and six-year terms, respectively—was intended to ensure that some representatives would be relatively isolated from the people and that others would be relatively close to them. The fact that the houses of the legislature were divided in this way would combine political accountability (on the part of the House) with a degree of independence (on the part of the Senate), enabling the Senate to serve a kind of “cooling” function. Indirect election of representatives played a far more important role at the time of ratification than it does today. Only the House of Representatives was to be directly elected. The original Constitution provided that Senators would be chosen by state legislatures, and envisioned an electoral college whose members would deliberate over the choice of the president. These features provided additional insulation from political pressure and factional tyranny.

Perhaps most important, the system of checks and balances was designed with the recognition that even national representatives may be prone to the influence of “interests” that is inconsistent with the public welfare. In The Federalist No. 10 itself, Madison recognizes that “[enlightened] statesmen will not always be at the helm.” The Federalist No. 51 is the most celebrated elaboration of this point.

In order to lay a due foundation for that separate and distinct exercise of the different powers of government, which to a certain extent is admitted on all hands to be essential to the preservation of liberty, it is evident that each department should have a will of its own; and consequently should be so constituted that the members of each should have as little agency as possible in the appointment of the members of the others. Were this principle rigorously adhered to, it would require that all the appointments for the supreme executive, legislative, and judiciary magistracies should be drawn from the same fountain of authority, the people, through channels having no communication whatever with one another. [Some] difficulties, and some additional expense would attend the execution of it. Some deviations, therefore, from the principle must be admitted. In the constitution of the judiciary department in particular, it might be inexpedient to insist rigorously on the principle: first, because peculiar qualifications being essential in the members, the primary consideration ought to be to select that mode of choice which best secures these qualifications; secondly, because the permanent tenure by which the appointments are held in that department, must soon destroy all sense of dependence on the authority conferring them.

It is equally evident, that the members of each department should be as little dependent as possible on those of the others, for the emoluments annexed to their offices. Were the executive magistrate, or the judges, not independent of the legislature in this particular, their independence in every other would be merely nominal.

But the great security against a gradual concentration of the several powers in the same department, consists in giving to those who administer each department the necessary constitutional means and personal motives to resist encroachments of the others. The provision for defence must in this, as in all other cases, be made commensurate to the danger of attack. Ambition must be made to counteract ambition. The interest of the man must be connected with the constitutional rights of the place. It may be a reflection on human nature, that such devices should be necessary to control the abuses of government. But what is government itself, but the greatest of all reflections on human nature? If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself. A dependence on the people is, no doubt, the primary control on the government; but experience has taught mankind the necessity of auxiliary precautions.

This policy of supplying, by opposite and rival interests, the defect of better motives, might be traced through the whole system of human affairs, private as well as public. We see it particularly displayed in all the subordinate distributions of power, where the constant aim is to divide and arrange the several offices in such a manner as that each may be a check on the other—that the private interest of every individual may be a sentinel over the public rights. These inventions of prudence cannot be less requisite in the distribution of the supreme powers of the State.

But it is not possible to give to each department an equal power of self-defence. In republican government, the legislative authority necessarily predominates. The remedy for this inconveniency is to divide the legislature into different branches; and to render them, by different modes of election and different principles of action, as little connected with each other as the nature of their common functions and their common dependence on the society will admit. It may even be necessary to guard against dangerous encroachments by still further precautions. As the weight of the legislative authority requires that it should be thus divided, the weakness of the executive may require, on the other hand, that it should be fortified. An absolute negative on the legislature appears, at first view, to be the natural defence with which the executive magistrate should be armed. But perhaps it would be neither altogether safe nor alone sufficient. On ordinary occasions it might not be exerted with the requisite firmness, and on extraordinary occasions it might be perfidiously abused. May not this defect of an absolute negative be supplied by some qualified connection between this weaker department and the weaker branch of the stronger department, by which the latter may be led to support the constitutional rights of the former, without being too much detached from the rights of its own department?

There are, moreover, two considerations particularly applicable to the federal system of America, which place that system in a very interesting point of view.

First. In a single republic, all the power surrendered by the people is submitted to the administration of a single government; and the usurpations are guarded against by a division of the government into distinct and separate departments. In the compound republic of America, the power surrendered by the people is first divided between two distinct governments, and then the portion allotted to each subdivided among distinct and separate departments. Hence a double security arises to the rights of the people. The different governments will control each other, at the same time that each will be controlled by itself.

Second. It is of great importance in a republic not only to guard the society against the oppression of its rulers, but to guard one part of the society against the injustice of the other part. Different interests necessarily exist in different classes of citizens. If a majority be united by a common interest, the rights of the minority will be insecure. There are but two methods of providing against this evil: the one by creating a will in the community independent of the majority—that is, of the society itself; the other, by comprehending in the society so many separate descriptions of citizens as will render an unjust combination of a majority of the whole very improbable, if not impracticable. The first method [is] but a precarious security; because a power independent of the society may as well espouse the unjust views of the major, as the rightful interests of the minor party, and may possibly be turned against both parties. The second method will be exemplified in the federal republic of the United States. Whilst all authority in it will be derived from and dependent on the society, the society itself will be broken into so many parts, interests and classes of citizens, that the rights of individuals, or of the minority, will be in little danger from interested combinations of the majority. In a free government the security for civil rights must be the same as that for religious rights. It consists in the one case in the multiplicity of interests, and in the other in the multiplicity of sects. The degree of security in both cases will depend on the number of interests and sects; and this may be presumed to depend on the extent of country and number of people comprehended under the same government. This view of the subject must particularly recommend a proper federal system to all the sincere and considerate friends of republican government, since it shows that in exact proportion as the territory of the Union may be formed into more circumscribed Confederacies, or States, oppressive combinations of a majority will be facilitated; the best security, under the republican forms, for the rights of every class of citizens, will be diminished; and consequently the stability and independence of some members of the government, the only other security, must be proportionally increased.

[In] a society under the forms of which the stronger faction can readily unite and oppress the weaker, anarchy may as truly be said to reign as in a state of nature, where the weaker individual is not secured against the violence of the stronger; and as, in the latter state, even the stronger individuals are prompted, by the uncertainty of their condition, to submit to a government which may protect the weak as well as themselves; so, in the former state, will the more powerful factions or parties be gradually induced, by a like motive, to wish for a government which will protect all parties, the weaker as well as the more powerful. It can be little doubted that if the State of Rhode Island was separated from the Confederacy and left to itself, the insecurity of rights under the popular form of government, within such narrow limits would be displayed by such reiterated oppressions of factious majorities that some power altogether independent of the people would soon be called for by the voice of the very factions whose misrule had proved the necessity of it. In the extended republic of the United States, and among the great variety of interests, parties, and sects which it embraces, a coalition of a majority of the whole society could seldom take place on any other principles than those of justice and the general good; whilst there being thus less danger to a minor from the will of a major party, there must be less pretext, also, to provide for the security of the former, by introducing into the government a will not dependent on the latter, or, in other words, a will independent of the society itself. It is no less certain than it is important, notwithstanding the contrary opinions which have been entertained, that the larger the society, provided it lie within a practical sphere, the more duly capable it will be of self-government. And happily for the republican cause, the practicable sphere may be carried to a very great extent, by a judicious modification and mixture of the federal principle.

Note: Madisonian Republicanism and Checks and Balances

The system of checks and balances within the federal structure was intended to prevent both factionalism and self-interested representation. If a segment of rulers was influenced by interests that diverged from those of the people, other national officials would have both the incentive and the means to resist. The result is an additional protection against tyranny. We might also think of the system as one in which the sovereign people can pursue a strategy of divide and conquer. Rather than undemocratically limiting majority will, the distribution of national powers might be seen, at least in part, as a way of maximizing the power of the public by fragmenting the power of the governors. See, on this and related questions, Sunstein, Constitutionalism after the New Deal, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 421, 430–437 (1989). Of course, this view is controversial. The fragmentation allows the status quo to remain undisturbed, and many have argued that this effect insulates existing practices, including distributions of wealth, from democratic control. This was a particular theme in the New Deal period, when President Franklin Delano Roosevelt succeeded in concentrating power—including lawmaking and law interpreting power—in the executive branch. See id.; 2 B. Ackerman, We the People: Transformations (1998).

The federal system, too, would act as an important safeguard. The “different governments will control each other” and ensure stalemate rather than action at the behest of particular private interests. The jealousy of state governments, and the attachment of the citizenry to local interests, would provide additional protection against the aggrandizement of power in national institutions. The federal system would allow flexibility, experimentation, accountability, and diversity and permit a measure of self-determination through the classically republican institution of small governmental units. At the same time, the power of individual citizens to move from one state to another would operate as a check on governmental tyranny. The right of “exit” would deter local oppression, as people could vote with their feet.

The result is a complex system of checks: National representation, bicameralism, indirect election, distribution of powers, and the federal-state relationship would operate in concert to counteract the effects of faction in spite of the inevitability of the factional spirit. And the Constitution itself, enforced by disinterested judges and adopted at a moment in which that spirit had perhaps been temporarily extinguished, would prevent majorities or minorities from usurping government power to distribute wealth or opportunities in their favor.

The protection of property rights and contractual liberty were principal interests of the framers, and one of their principal targets was debtor-relief legislation. Some of the framers saw a close practical relationship between the desire to protect private property (along with other forms of private liberty) from governmental intrusion and devices to guard against the dangers posed by faction. For the framers, the problem of faction lay partly in the danger that a self-interested group would obtain governmental power in order to put rights of property at risk. The experience under the Articles of Confederation, in which popular majorities had operated as factions in state legislatures, confirmed the existence of this danger.

In this respect, the federalists may be contrasted with their antifederalist opponents, whose generally weaker objections to laws redistributing property coexisted easily with their preference for decentralized democracy. Indeed, many of the antifederalists approved of debtor-relief laws and saw economic equality as indispensable to a republic. As “Centinel” wrote, a “republican, or free government, can only exist where the body of the people are virtuous, and where property is pretty equally divided; in such a government the people are the sovereign and their sense or opinion is the criterion of every public measure; for when this ceases to be the case, the nature of the government is changed, and an aristocracy, monarchy, or despotism will rise on its ruin.” The Antifederalist 16 (H. Storing ed., M. Dry abr. 1985). Moreover, the federalists’ hospitable view toward lengthy deliberation and government inaction may be associated with a desire to protect property rights. Inaction, of course, preserves the existing distribution of wealth.

The picture that emerges is in an important sense one of a government that was intended to engage in deliberation. But politics was to be deliberative in a special sense. Representatives were to be accountable to the public; their deliberative task was not disembodied. The framers were thus careful to create political checks designed to ensure that representatives would not stray too far from the desires of their constituents. The result was a kind of hybrid conception of representation, in which legislators were neither to respond blindly to constituent pressures nor to undertake their deliberations in a vacuum. (Note also the restrictions on who would do the deliberating: The framers appeared comfortable with many limits on the franchise; women and slaves, among others, could not vote.)

Where does judicial review fit into this framework? Notice that the Constitution does not explicitly authorize judicial review, but at least in some form it appears to have been widely anticipated—a kind of background understanding. As part of doing their duty, and speaking for the law of the land, judges would strike down legislation that violated the founding document. See P. Hamburger, Law and Judicial Duty (2008). To that extent, the Court would enforce the lines of division set down in the Constitution to ensure that the areas marked off from politics would not be subject to political revision. The boundaries set in the Constitution, and thus by “We the People,” were to be unrevisable by electoral majorities—a safeguard that would buttress the other institutional checks. In this sense, judicial review would ensure the supremacy of the Constitution, embodying the will of the sovereign public, against temporary majorities. This idea responded to the distinction drawn by the framers between “law”—the realm of judgment—and “politics”—the realm of will, or personal preference. See The Federalist No. 78, infra. The existence of a realm of “law” immune from “politics” fit securely within a system intended to protect both the public good and private rights from perceived majoritarian excesses.

Note finally, and importantly, that this entire framework reflects a new conception of sovereignty, which lay with the people, not with any king, and not with any branch or set of rulers. Recall that one of the most important contributions of the new Constitution consisted in the rejection of the monarchical legacy in favor of this new understanding of where sovereignty could be found.

Note: Madisonian Republicanism and Contemporary Constitutionalism

The foregoing materials raise a large set of questions; we will be exploring them at many places in this book. Here are a few problems that might be kept in mind at the outset.

1. The complexity of history versus the simplifications of theory. The account that we have offered—of a particular understanding of Madisonian republicanism—is an attempt to reconstruct the founders’ views, but any such attempt is bound to be controversial. Some people think that an account of the kind offered here gives too little emphasis to the framers’ belief in individual rights, operating as checks against politics—even deliberative politics. Others think that the framers offered a highly complex set of ideas not reducible to any single “account.” Still others think that deliberation was a theme in the founding generation but not an entirely central one; in their view, the framers were well aware of the importance of interest groups, and they did not place a great premium on political deliberation. For discussions, see M. Klarman, supra; W. Bessette, The Mild Voice of Reason (1994).

2. Republican theory and judicial review. What does republicanism, Madisonian or otherwise, have to offer to people currently assessing American constitutional law? In the light of history, how should we think about current politics, and about associated constitutional issues, for example, those involving campaign finance restrictions and access to the ballot? With respect to judicial review, republican thought might argue in favor of a deferential rather than an aggressive judicial role. If democratic self-determination is the end, a powerful judiciary hardly seems the means. But consider the view that under modern circumstances the Supreme Court provides one of the few sites where true deliberation over the public good remains possible. See generally Michelman, Foreword: Traces of Self-Government, 100 Harv. L. Rev. 4 (1986).

3. Problems with deliberation and direct democracy. Contrary to Madison's view, many people have argued in favor of a larger role for popular referenda, in which decisions are made on particular issues not by representatives but instead by popular vote. It might be urged that the process of referendum is far more democratic than the process of decision by representative bodies. In recent years, popular referenda in the states have both grown out of and produced constitutional confrontations. Uses of the Internet and discussions of "electronic town meetings" have heightened interest in more direct forms of democracy; modern technologies make direct popular input far more feasible. On referenda generally, see S. Tierney, Constitutional Referendums (rev. ed. 2014); T. Cronin, Direct Democracy (1989); D. Magleby, Direct Legislation (1991); Charlow, Judicial Review, Equal Protection and the Problem with Plebiscites, 79 Cornell L. Rev. 527 (1994); Eule, Judicial Review of Direct Democracy, 99 Yale L.J. 1503 (1990).

4. Adapting or living with an old constitution. In some ways, the original constitutional commitments have been severely qualified in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. For example, the national government engages in many tasks originally thought to be within the province of the states—a phenomenon that can be attributed in large part to the Civil War and Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal, which saw a huge expansion in federal power. The system of checks and balances has been altered by the grant of broad adjudicatory and policymaking power to the President and regulatory agencies. The American conception of constitutional rights has come to include rights of political participation, of freedom of expression, of antidiscrimination on the basis of race and sex, and of “privacy” that were either unanticipated by the founders or are far broader than what they expected. On some of these issues, see T. Lowi, The Personal President (1985).

5. “Constitutional moments” revisited. Consider Bruce Ackerman’s argument that we have a “dualist democracy” where constitutional change occurs at “constitutional moments” involving popular mobilization. 1 B. Ackerman, We the People: Foundations (1991), argues that there have been three such moments: the founding period, the Civil War era, and the New Deal period. In his view, much of the work of the Supreme Court can be understood as efforts to synthesize the commitments of these three different republics. Ackerman’s arguments are controversial, but as we will see, both the Civil War period and the New Deal did help inaugurate major changes in constitutional law, not all of which can be explained by changes in the Constitution’s text. See also M. Tushnet, The New Constitutional Order (2003), for an argument that the constitutional arrangements that prevailed in the United States from the 1930s to the 1990s have ended. Tushnet suggests that the nation’s new constitutional order is characterized by divided government, ideologically organized parties, and subdued constitutional ambition.

Note: Why (and How) Does the Constitution Bind?

1. Popular sovereignty. Why is the Constitution binding? One reason might be that it is a reflection of popular sovereignty. The first three words of the document claim that it is legitimate because it is the work of “We the People.” Can popular sovereignty make the text of a new constitution binding?

The American constitutional text was widely debated in what amounted to a national symposium on constitutional theory and ratified by popularly elected state conventions. For the definitive account, see P. Maier, Ratification: The People Debate the Constitution, 1787–1788 (2010). Do these facts create a duty to obey the Constitution?

Although the ratification process was relatively democratic by the standards of the time, African Americans, American Indians, women, and most people who did not own property were excluded from the process. Even aside from these deficiencies, the ratification project lacked democratic legitimacy in several ways. [Behind] the closed doors of the Philadelphia convention, some Founders referred to democracy in disparaging terms—“the worst...of all political evils,” according to Elbridge Gerry. Madison opposed a second convention specifically on the ground that the People, at least at that moment, were neither well enough informed nor sufficiently dispassionate to participate responsibly in making a constitution. In Massachusetts, Federalists were horrified at the idea that the state ratifying convention should be adjourned in order to enable delegates to consult their constituents. In Congress, some Federalists were so distrustful of the People that they preferred to close the House galleries before debating possible amendments to the Constitution.

Klarman, Book Review, 125 Harv. L. Rev. 544, 571 (2011).

2. The dead hand problem. Even if the Constitution was supported by mobilized popular majorities in the late eighteenth century, no one alive today voted to ratify it. Why should the “dead hand” of the framers control people alive today? Consider in this regard Thomas Jefferson’s insistence that “[the] earth belongs in usufruct to the living; the dead have neither powers nor rights over it,” and that “one generation is to another as one independent nation to another.” Letter from Thomas Jefferson to James Madison (Sept. 6, 1789), in 6 The Works of Thomas Jefferson 3–4, 8–9 (1904).

Sometimes constitutions are justified on the theory that one aspect of freedom is the ability of a people to bind itself in the future. According to ancient myth, Ulysses had his men bind him to the mast so that he could listen to the song of the Sirens without succumbing. So, too, perhaps constitution makers, fearful of their own future weakness, bind themselves to behave in certain ways. Perhaps the ability to make these decisions is part of what it means for a people to be free and to exist as a continuing entity. See generally J. Elster, Ulysses Unbound: Studies in Rationality, Precommitment, and Constraints (2000).

Consider the extent to which the United States “commitments over time” have involved resistance to, as well as embrace of, constitutional obligation. For example, some of our most revered Presidents have exhibited at best an ambivalent attitude toward constitutional obligation. Thomas Jefferson negotiated the Louisiana Purchase despite his belief that he lacked the constitutional power to do so. Explaining his actions years after he left office, Jefferson wrote that “[a] strict observance of the written laws is doubtless one of the high duties of a good citizen, but it is not the highest. The laws of necessity, of self-preservation, of saving our country when in danger, are of higher obligation.” Letter from Thomas Jefferson to John B. Colvin (Sept. 20, 1810), in 11 The Works of Thomas Jefferson 146 (1905). Abraham Lincoln defended the constitutionality of many (but, importantly not all) of his actions at the beginning of the Civil War, but he also made clear that he thought those actions were justified even if they violated the Constitution. See Abraham Lincoln, Special Session Message (July 4, 1861), in 7 A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents 3226 (1917) (“Are all the laws, but one, to go unexecuted, and the government itself go to pieces, lest that one be violated?”). See also Barron and Lederman, The Commander in Chief at the Lowest Ebb, 121 Harv. L. Rev. 689, 997–1008 (2008).

Franklin Roosevelt believed that the Constitution was “a layman’s document, not a lawyer’s contract,” Roosevelt, Address on Constitution Day, Washington, DC (Sept. 19, 1937), in 1 The Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt 359 (1941), and in his first inaugural address provided clear hints that he was prepared to go beyond commonly understood limits on executive authority if necessary to meet the emergency created by the Great Depression. See Franklin D. Roosevelt, First Inaugural Address, available at <http://www.bartleby.com/124/pres49.html> (“It is to be hoped that the normal balance of executive and legislative authority may be wholly adequate to meet the unprecedented task before us. But it may be that an unprecedented demand and need for undelayed action may call for temporary departure from that normal balance of public procedure.”).

3. A quick dead hand solution. Consider a simple answer to the dead hand question: Ideas about democracy and legitimacy are a distraction, and a dead end. We have to ask about human welfare. That is an admittedly large idea, but we might be able to make progress in terms of human welfare without getting into deep philosophical waters. The fact is that if we take the Constitution as binding, we are a lot better off in terms of welfare. What would we do without it?

4. The problem of constitutional mistake (or worse). If a constitution contained only provisions that the people of the United States today thought wise, the problem of constitutional obligation would never arise. The people would then follow constitutional commands because of an independent judgment that they would reach even if there were no constitution. The problem of obedience becomes acute only when constitutional commands depart from these independent judgments.

For an example illustrating the problem, consider the fact that the Constitution, as originally drafted, had many provisions that protected the rights of slave holders at the expense of enslaved individuals. Article I, section 2, clause 3 inflated the representation of slave states in Congress by counting three-fifths of all slaves as persons for purposes of congressional apportionment. Article I, section 9, clause 1 prohibited Congress from outlawing the slave trade until 1808. Article IV, section 2, clause 3 required free states to return enslaved persons who had escaped to their territory. Citing these provisions, Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall once wrote that he did not “find the wisdom, foresight, and sense of justice exhibited by the framers particularly profound. To the contrary, the government they devised was defective from the [start].” Marshall, Commentary: Reflections on the Bicentennial of the United States Constitution, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 2 (1987). Why should anyone have felt obligated to obey provisions in the original Constitution that protected slavery?

Of course, the modern, amended Constitution outlaws, rather than protects slavery. See U.S. Const. amend. XIII. Still, even as amended, the Constitution contains provisions that many think anachronistic, foolish, or morally questionable. See generally S. Levinson, Our Undemocratic Constitution: Where the Constitution Goes Wrong (and How We the People Can Correct It) (2006).

For example, article II, section 1, clause 5 requires the President to be a “natural born Citizen” of the United States. Suppose a substantial majority of the people of the United States believe that a particular naturalized citizen would make the best President. Why should the text of the Constitution prevent the election of this person? Consider the following possibilities:

5. Amendments and supermajorities. Perhaps the Constitution is entitled to respect because if the people disapprove of specific constitutional commands, they can change them through the amendment process. Note, though, that the requirements to amend the United States Constitution are extraordinarily arduous. Article V provides that amendments can be proposed by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress or by application for a constitutional convention proposed by two-thirds of the states. In either event, proposed amendments must be approved by three-fourths of the states. What makes the requirements of article V legitimate?

Does the very difficulty of amendment, as well as the supermajority requirements for initial ratification, provide a built-in guarantee that constitutional provisions are wise? Consider McGinnis and Rappaport, Originalism and the Good Constitution, 98 Geo. L.J. 1693, 1696 (2010):

[Supermajority] rule helps assure the bipartisan consensus that facilitates the widespread allegiance of citizens and guarantees rights for minorities. [Supermajority rule also] improves the erratic judgment of legislators about entrenchment by restricting the agenda of proposals and creating a veil of ignorance that promotes disinterested decision making.

Notice, though, that supermajority requirements can also give a relatively small group veto power over the entire constitution and therefore create the potential of constitutionalizing narrow, special interest provisions. For example, as noted above, delegates to the constitutional convention from slave states made clear that they would not vote for the new constitution unless slavery was granted constitutional protection.

6. The good (enough) constitution. Back to well-being: Is constitutional obligation justified on the ground that, for the most part, the Constitution is substantively sound and that it is worth putting up with its suboptimal features given the risk of chaos or tyranny if it were ignored? One's reaction to this suggestion depends on how deficient one thinks the Constitution is, on the one hand, and on how great one thinks the risk of chaos or tyranny would be if provisions were ignored, on the other. In this regard, skeptics might want to consider:

a. the fact that the Constitution as currently written allows for the election of a President who loses the popular vote and gives wildly disproportionate representation to small states in the Senate;

b. the fact that we have in the past ignored some clear constitutional provisions without obvious adverse consequences. For example, article I, section 3, clause 2 provides that all senators, except for the first set of senators, are to serve for six years, yet ever since Vermont was admitted as the first new state in 1791, one senator from new states has always served less than six years so as to provide for the staggered election of senators.

7. Modern acquiescence. The framers of the Constitution have no actual power over us. If the Constitution is obeyed today, it is because of the consent of living people who could disregard it if they chose to do so. Can constitutional obligation be grounded on modern acquiescence? See Dorf, The Undead Constitution, 125 Harv. L. Rev. 2011, 2015–2016 (2012) (“The Constitution is not law today simply because its provisions were adopted by the People in 1789, 1791, 1868, and so forth. The Constitution is law today because it continues to be accepted today.”) But if the Constitution’s legitimacy rests on this ground, “[h]ow do we know [it] is accepted today? Is the absence of a revolution sufficient to legitimate the Constitution?” Id. at 2016. Moreover, if the acquiescence is founded on the belief that there is an obligation to obey, but the obligation to obey rests on acquiescence, the argument is circular. If modern acquiescence is the basis for obligation, does it follow that particular provisions of the Constitution should not be enforced when public opinion (measured how?) opposes enforcement?

8. The relevance of the question. For better or worse, constitutional obligation is generally taken to be an axiom of our system. See, e.g., Monaghan, Our Perfect Constitution, 56 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 353, 383–384 (1981) (“The authoritative status of the written constitution is a legitimate matter of debate for political theorists interested in the nature of political obligation. [For] purposes of legal reasoning, the binding quality of the constitutional text is itself incapable of and not in need of further demonstration.”).

Note, however, recent polling data showing that 76 percent of the American people think that justices of the Supreme Court at least sometimes decide cases because of their personal or political views rather than because of legal analysis. See Results of New York Times/CBS Poll, available at <http://www.nytimes.com/interactive/2012/06/08/us/politics/08scotus-poll-documents.html?ref=politics>.

Moreover, although justices on the Supreme Court, presidents, and members of Congress rarely or never question constitutional obligation, constitutional law is dominated by debate about what the Constitution consists of and how it should be interpreted. Contending sides in this debate regularly make claims that various forms of constitutional interpretation are inconsistent with true obligation.

B. THE BASIC FRAMEWORK

Marbury v. Madison

5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803)

[William Marbury had been appointed a justice of the peace by the defeated incumbent Federalist President, John Adams, in the closing stages of the Adams administration. The Federalist-controlled Senate confirmed the appointments of Adams's last-minute appointees, including Marbury, on March 3, 1801. The formal commissions had not been delivered when Thomas Jefferson, the Republican President, assumed office several days later. Jefferson refused to deliver the commissions of the justices appointed by Adams. Marbury and others sought a writ of mandamus to compel Madison, Jefferson's Secretary of State (replacing John Marshall, Adams's Secretary of State), to deliver the commissions. (The underlying controversy is set out in more detail in a historical note that follows the opinion.)]

Opinion of the Court [by MARSHALL, CHIEF JUSTICE].

At the last term on the affidavits then read and filed with the clerk, a rule was granted in this case, requiring the secretary of state to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, directing him to deliver to William Marbury his commission as a justice of the peace for the county of Washington, in the district of Columbia.

No cause has been shown, and the present motion is for a mandamus. The peculiar delicacy of this case, the novelty of some of its circumstances, and the real difficulty attending the points which occur in it, require a complete exposition of the principles on which the opinion to be given by the court is founded.

In the order in which the court has viewed this subject, the following questions have been considered and decided.

1st. Has the applicant a right to the commission he demands?

2dly. If he has a right, and that right has been violated, do the laws of his country afford him a remedy?

3dly. If they do afford him a remedy, is it a mandamus issuing from this court?

The first object of inquiry is,

1st. Has the applicant a right to the commission he demands?

His right originates in an act of congress passed in February, 1801, concerning the district of Columbia....

In order to determine whether he is entitled to this commission, it becomes necessary to inquire whether he has been appointed to the office. For if he has been appointed, the law continues him in office for five years, and he is entitled to the possession of those evidences of office, which, being completed, became his property.

The last act to be done by the president is the signature of the commission: he has then acted on the advice and consent of the senate to his own nomination. The time for deliberation has then passed....

It is, [decidedly] the opinion of the court, that when a commission has been signed by the president, the appointment is made; and that the commission is complete, when the seal of the United States has been affixed to it by the secretary of state.

Where an officer is removable at the will of the executive, the circumstance which completes his appointment is of no concern; because the act is at any time revocable; and the commission may be arrested, if still in the office. But when the officer is not removable at the will of the executive, the appointment is not revocable, and cannot be annulled: it has conferred legal rights which cannot be resumed. [To] withhold his commission, therefore, is an act deemed by the court not warranted by law, but violative of a vested legal right.

2. This brings us to the second inquiry; which is: If he has a right, and that right has been violated, do the laws of his country afford him a remedy? The very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws, whenever he receives an injury. One of the first duties of government is to afford that protection. In Great Britain, the king himself is sued in the respectful form of a petition, and he never fails to comply with the judgment of his court.

The government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws, and not of men. It will certainly cease to deserve this high appellation, if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of a vested legal right. If this obloquy is to be cast on the jurisprudence of our country, it must arise from the peculiar character of the case.

It behooves us, then, to inquire whether there be in its composition any ingredient which shall exempt it from legal investigation, or exclude the injured party from legal redress....

Is it in the nature of the transaction? Is the act of delivering or withholding a commission to be considered as a mere political act, belonging to the executive department alone, for the performance of which entire confidence is placed by our constitution in the supreme executive; and for any misconduct respecting which, the injured individual has no remedy? That there may be such cases is not to be questioned; but that every act of duty, to be performed in any of the great departments of government, constitutes such a case, is not to be admitted.

It follows, then, that the question, whether the legality of an act of the head of a department be examinable in a court of justice or not, must always depend on the nature of that act. If some acts be examinable, and others not, there must be some rule of law to guide the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction. In some instances, there may be difficulty in applying the rule to particular cases; but there cannot, it is believed, be much difficulty in laying down the rule.

By the constitution of the United States, the president is invested with certain important political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character, and to his own conscience. To aid him in the performance of these duties, he is authorized to appoint certain officers, who act by his authority, and in conformity with his orders. In such cases, their acts are his acts; and whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which executive discretion may be used, still there exists, and can exist, no power to control that discretion. The subjects are political: they respect the nation, not individual rights, and being entrusted to the executive, the decision of the executive is conclusive. The application of this remark will be perceived, by adverting to the act of congress for establishing the department of foreign affairs. This officer, as his duties were prescribed by that act, is to conform precisely to the will of the president: he is the mere organ by whom that will is communicated. The acts of such an officer, as an officer, can never be examinable by the courts. But when the legislature proceeds to impose on that officer other duties; when he is directed peremptorily to perform certain acts; when the rights of individuals are dependent on the performance of those acts; he is so far the officer of the law; is amenable to the laws for his conduct; and cannot, at his discretion, sport away the vested rights of others.

The conclusion from this reasoning is, that where the heads of departments are the political or confidential agents of the executive, merely to execute the will of the president, or rather to act in cases in which the executive possesses a constitutional or legal discretion, nothing can be more perfectly clear, than that their acts are only politically examinable. But where a specific duty is assigned by law, and individual rights depend upon the performance of that duty, it seems equally clear, that the individual who considers himself injured, has a right to resort to the laws of his country for a remedy.

The question whether a right has vested or not, is, in its nature, judicial, and must be tried by the judicial authority. If, for example, Mr. Marbury had taken the oaths of a magistrate, and proceeded to act as one; in consequence of which, a suit has been instituted against him, in which his defence had depended on his being a magistrate, the validity of his appointment must have been determined by judicial authority. So, if he conceives that, by virtue of his appointment, he has a legal right either to the commission which has been made out for him, or to a copy of that commission, it is equally a question examinable in a court, and the decision of the court upon it must depend on the opinion entertained of his appointment. That question has been discussed, and the opinion is, that the latest point of time which can be taken as that at which the appointment was complete, and evidenced, was when, after the signature of the president, the seal of the United States was affixed to the commission.

It is, then, the opinion of the Court: 1st. That by signing the commission of Mr. Marbury, the President of the United States appointed him a justice of peace [and] that the appointment conferred on him a legal right to the office for the space of five years. 2d. That, having this legal title to the office, he has a consequent right to the commission; a refusal to deliver which is a plain violation of that right, for which the laws of his country afford him a remedy.

3. It remains to be inquired whether he is entitled to the remedy for which he applies? This depends on—1st. The nature of the writ applied for; and 2d. The power of this court.

1st. The nature of the writ....[To] render the mandamus a proper remedy, the officer to whom it is to be directed, must be one to whom, on legal principles, such writ may be directed; and the person applying for it must be without any other specific and legal remedy.

1. With respect to the officer to whom it would be directed. The intimate political relation subsisting between the president of the United States and the heads of departments, necessarily renders any legal investigation of the acts of one of those high officers peculiarly irksome, as well as delicate; and excites some hesitation with respect to the propriety of entering into such investigation. Impressions are often received, without much reflection or examination, and it is not wonderful, that in such a case as this, the assertion, by an individual, of his legal claims in a court of justice, to which claims it is the duty of that court to attend, should at first view be considered by some, as an attempt to intrude into the cabinet, and to intermeddle with the prerogatives of the executive.

It is scarcely necessary for the court to disclaim all pretensions to such a jurisdiction. An extravagance, so absurd and excessive, could not have been entertained for a moment. The province of the court is, solely, to decide on the rights of individuals, not to inquire how the executive, or executive officers, perform duties in which they have a discretion. Questions in their nature political, or which are, by the constitution and laws, submitted to the executive, can never be made in this court.

But, if this be not such a question; if, so far from being an intrusion into the secrets of the cabinet, it respects a paper which, according to law, is upon record, and to a copy of which the law gives a right, on the payment of ten cents; if it be no intermeddling with a subject over which the executive can be considered as having exercised any control; what is there, in the exalted station of the officer, which shall bar a citizen from asserting, in a court of justice, his legal rights, or shall forbid a court to listen to the claim, or to issue a mandamus, directing the performance of a duty, not depending on executive discretion, but on particular acts of congress, and the general principles of law? [Where the head of a department] is directed by law to do a certain act affecting the absolute rights of individuals, [it] is not perceived on what grounds the courts of the country are [excused] from the duty of giving judgment....[This,] then, is a plain case for a mandamus, either to deliver the commission, or a copy of it from the record; and it only remains to be inquired,

Whether it can issue from this court.

The act to establish the judicial courts of the United States authorizes the supreme court "to issue writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed, or persons holding, office, under the authority of the United States."[*]

The secretary of state, being a person holding an office under the authority of the United States, is precisely within the letter of the description; and if this court is not authorized to issue a writ of mandamus to such an officer, it must be because the law is unconstitutional, and therefore absolutely incapable of conferring the authority, and assigning the duties which its words purport to confer and assign.

The constitution vests the whole judicial power of the United States in one supreme court, and such inferior courts as congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish. This power is expressly extended to all cases arising under the laws of the United States; and, consequently, in some form, may be exercised over the present case; because the right claimed is given by a law of the United States.

In the distribution of this power it is declared that "the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party. In all other cases, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction."

It has been insisted, at the bar, that as the original grant of jurisdiction, to the supreme and inferior courts, is general, and the clause, assigning original jurisdiction to the supreme court, contains no negative or restrictive words, the power remains to the legislature, to assign original jurisdiction to that court in other cases than those specified in the article which has been recited; provided those cases belong to the judicial power of the United States.

If it had been intended to leave it in the discretion of the legislature to apportion the judicial power between the supreme and inferior courts according to the will of that body, it would certainly have been useless to have proceeded further than to have defined the judicial power, and the tribunals in which it should be vested. The subsequent part of the section is mere surplusage, is entirely without meaning, if such is to be the construction. If congress remains at liberty to give this court appellate jurisdiction, where the constitution has declared their jurisdiction shall be original; and original jurisdiction where the constitution has declared it shall be appellate; the distribution of jurisdiction, made in the constitution, is form without substance.

Affirmative words are often, in their operation, negative of other objects than those affirmed; and in this case, a negative or exclusive sense must be given to them, or they have no operation at all.

It cannot be presumed that any clause in the constitution is intended to be without effect; and, therefore, such a construction is inadmissible, unless the words require it....When an instrument organizing fundamentally a judicial system, divides it into one supreme, and so many inferior courts as the legislature may ordain and establish; then enumerates its powers, and proceeds so far to distribute them, as to define the jurisdiction of the supreme court by declaring the cases in which it shall take original jurisdiction, and that in others it shall take appellate jurisdiction; the plain import of the words seems to be, that in one class of cases its jurisdiction is original, and not appellate; in the other it is appellate, and not original. If any other construction would render the clause inoperative, that is an additional reason for rejecting such other construction, and for adhering to their obvious meaning.

To enable this court, then, to issue a mandamus, it must be shown to be an exercise of appellate jurisdiction, or to be necessary to enable them to exercise appellate jurisdiction.

It has been stated at the bar that the appellate jurisdiction may be exercised in a variety of forms, and that if it be the will of the legislature that a mandamus should be used for that purpose, that will must be obeyed. This is true, yet the jurisdiction must be appellate, not original.

It is the essential criterion of appellate jurisdiction, that it revises and corrects the proceedings in a cause already instituted, and does not create that cause. Although, therefore, a mandamus may be directed to courts, yet to issue such a writ to an officer for the delivery of a paper, is in effect the same as to sustain an original action for that paper, and, therefore, seems not to belong to appellate, but to original jurisdiction. Neither is it necessary in such a case as this, to enable the court to exercise its appellate jurisdiction.

The authority, therefore, given to the supreme court, by the act establishing the judicial courts of the United States, to issue writs of mandamus to public officers, appears not to be warranted by the constitution; and it becomes necessary to inquire whether a jurisdiction so conferred can be exercised.

The question, whether an act, repugnant to the constitution, can become the law of the land, is a question deeply interesting to the United States; but, happily, not of an intricacy proportioned to its interest. It seems only necessary to recognize certain principles, supposed to have been long and well established, to decide it.

That the people have an original right to establish, for their future government, such principles as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness is the basis on which the whole American fabric has been erected. The exercise of this original right is a very great exertion; nor can it, nor ought it, to be frequently repeated. The principles, therefore, so established, are deemed fundamental. And as the authority from which they proceed is supreme, and can seldom act, they are designed to be permanent.

This original and supreme will organizes the government, and assigns to different departments their respective powers. It may either stop here, or establish certain limits not to be transcended by those departments.

The government of the United States is of the latter description. The powers of the legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken, or forgotten, the constitution is written. To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may, at any time, be passed by those intended to be restrained? The distinction between a government with limited and unlimited powers is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed, are of equal obligation. It is a proposition too plain to be contested, that the constitution controls any legislative act repugnant to it; or, that the legislature may alter the constitution by an ordinary act.

Between these alternatives there is no middle ground. The constitution is either a superior paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and, like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it.

If the former part of the alternative be true, then a legislative act contrary to the constitution is not law: if the latter part be true, then written constitutions are absurd attempts, on the part of the people, to limit a power in its own nature illimitable.

Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and, consequently, the theory of every such government must be, that an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void.

This theory is essentially attached to a written constitution, and, is consequently, to be considered, by this court, as one of the fundamental principles of our society. It is not therefore to be lost sight of in the further consideration of this subject.

If an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void, does it, notwithstanding its invalidity, bind the courts, and oblige them to give it effect? Or, in other words, though it be not law, does it constitute a rule as operative as if it was a law? This would be to overthrow in fact what was established in theory; and would seem, at first view, an absurdity too gross to be insisted on. It shall, however, receive a more attentive consideration.

It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases, must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each.

So if a law be in opposition to the constitution; if both the law and the constitution apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the constitution; or conformably to the constitution, disregarding the law; the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty. If, then, the courts are to regard the constitution, and the constitution is superior to any ordinary act of the legislature, the constitution, and not such ordinary act, must govern the case to which they both apply.

Those, then, who controvert the principle that the constitution is to be considered, in court, as a paramount law, are reduced to the necessity of maintaining that courts must close their eyes on the constitution, and see only the law.

This doctrine would subvert the very foundation of all written constitutions. It would declare that an act which, according to the principles and theory of our government, is entirely void, is yet, in practice, completely obligatory. It would declare that if the legislature shall do what is expressly forbidden, such act, notwithstanding the express prohibition, is in reality effectual. It would be giving to the legislature a practical and real omnipotence, with the same breath which professes to restrict their powers within narrow limits. It is prescribing limits, and declaring that those limits may be passed at pleasure.

That it thus reduces to nothing what we have deemed the greatest improvement on political institutions, a written constitution, would of itself be sufficient, in America, where written constitutions have been viewed with so much reverence, for rejecting the construction. But the peculiar expressions of the constitution of the United States furnish additional arguments in favor of its rejection.

The judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases arising under the constitution.

Could it be the intention of those who gave this power, to say that in using it the constitution should not be looked into? That a case arising under the constitution should be decided without examining the instrument under which it arises?

This is too extravagant to be maintained.

In some cases, then, the constitution must be looked into by the judges. And if they can open it at all, what part of it are they forbidden to read or to obey?

There are many other parts of the constitution which serve to illustrate this subject.

It is declared that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state." Suppose a duty on the export of cotton, of tobacco, or of flour; and a suit instituted to recover it. Ought judgment to be rendered in such a case? Ought the judges to close their eyes on the constitution, and only see the law?

The constitution declares "that no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

If, however, such a bill should be passed, and a person should be prosecuted under it; must the court condemn to death those victims whom the constitution endeavors to preserve?

"No person," says the constitution, "shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."

Here the language of the constitution is addressed especially to the courts. It prescribes, directly for them, a rule of evidence not to be departed from. If the legislature should change that rule, and declare one witness, or a confession out of court, sufficient for conviction, must the constitutional principle yield to the legislative act?

From these, and many other selections which might be made, it is apparent, that the framers of the constitution contemplated that instrument as a rule for the government of courts, as well as of the legislature.

Why otherwise does it direct the judges to take an oath to support it? This oath certainly applies in an especial manner, to their conduct in their official character. How immoral to impose it on them, if they were to be used as the instruments, and the knowing instruments, for violating what they swear to support!

The oath of office, too, imposed by the legislature, is completely demonstrative of the legislative opinion on this subject. It is in these words: "I do solemnly swear that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich; and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge all the duties incumbent on me as, according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the constitution and laws of the United States."

Why does a judge swear to discharge his duties agreeably to the constitution of the United States, if that constitution forms no rule for his government? if it is closed upon him, and cannot be inspected by him? If such be the real state of things, this is worse than solemn mockery. To prescribe, or to take this oath, becomes equally a crime.

It is also not entirely unworthy of observation, that in declaring what shall be the supreme law of the land, the constitution itself is first mentioned; and not the laws of the United States generally, but those only which shall be made in pursuance of the constitution, have that rank.

Thus, the particular phraseology of the constitution of the United States confirms and strengthens the principle, supposed to be essential to all written constitutions, that a law repugnant to the constitution is void; and that courts, as well as other departments, are bound by that instrument.

The rule must be discharged.

Note: Marbury v. Madison

1. Background. The Marbury case was decided against a complex background and was in some respects the culmination of a lengthy political battle. The Federalist President, John Adams, had been defeated by the Republican candidate, Thomas Jefferson, who was to take office on March 4, 1801. The Federalist Congress responded by, among other things, attempting to retain control of the federal judiciary. On February 16, 1801, that Congress enacted the Circuit Court Act, creating sixteen new circuit judges and eliminating the circuit-riding duties of the Supreme Court. Congress also decreased the size of the Supreme Court in order to deny the incoming President Jefferson the power to appoint a successor to Justice Cushing. Two weeks later Congress enacted another statute creating forty-two positions for justices of the peace in the District of Columbia. President Adams nominated the authorized judges, who were confirmed on March 2 and 3, just one day before President Jefferson was to assume office.

At this point, John Marshall, then Secretary of State under President Adams—who had appointed Marbury and the other petitioners in the Marbury case—became involved in the circumstances that gave rise to the case. Although Marshall took his oath of office as Chief Justice on February 4, 1801, he continued to serve as Secretary of State at least until March 3 of that year. President Adams and Acting Secretary of State Marshall had signed the commissions of the petitioners in the Marbury case by March 3, but the commissions had not been delivered by the time Adams and Marshall left the executive branch. Adams's successor, Thomas Jefferson, thereafter refused to deliver the commissions, claiming that they were nullities. (Should Marshall have disqualified himself from Marbury?) In the next year—before Marbury was decided—the Circuit Court Act was repealed by the Republican Congress; the statute creating justices of the peace was left intact. But Congress also abolished the June and December terms of the Court, leaving the Court adjourned from December 1801 until February 1803—and thus abolishing the 1802 term. The reason for Congress's actions was to avoid a constitutional challenge to the repeal of the Circuit Court Act.

A footnote: Six days after Marbury was decided, the Court upheld the repeal. Stuart v. Laird, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 299 (1803). The history is illuminatingly discussed in O'Fallon, Marbury, 44 Stan. L. Rev. 219 (1992).

2. Method, antecedents. What does the opinion in Marbury v. Madison indicate about opinion-writing method? What are the sources of the decision? What in the Constitution supports judicial review?

a. Chief Justice Marshall does not begin the opinion in Marbury with the question of jurisdiction, although a court's jurisdiction is usually the first problem to be examined. Why did Chief Justice Marshall fail to deal first with the jurisdictional issue?

b. The actual holding of Marbury is that the Supreme Court lacks power to direct the President to deliver Marbury's commission. This conclusion allowed the Court to avoid the problem of ordering President Jefferson to deliver commissions to President Adams's appointees. There was, of course, no assurance that President Jefferson would have complied with such a decree. The existence of judicial review was therefore established in a case in which the Court concluded that it had no power to do anything to remedy official illegality. Consider in this regard the suggestion that the "decision is a masterwork of indirection, a brilliant example of Chief Justice Marshall's capacity to sidestep danger while seeming to court it, to advance in one direction while his opponents are looking in another." R. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 40 (1960).

What is the basis for Chief Justice Marshall's conclusion that the Court lacked jurisdiction? Consider the following rejoinders to his reasoning: (1) The categories of original and appellate jurisdiction are not mutually exclusive. The Constitution sets up a provisional allocation, which Congress can alter if it wishes. The power to alter is recognized in the "exceptions" clause. It is therefore constitutional for Congress to grant to the Court original jurisdiction over cases over which it had appellate jurisdiction under the Constitution's provisional allocation. (2) The Constitution defines an irreducible minimum of original jurisdiction but permits Congress to expand original jurisdiction if it chooses to do so. Is either of these views less persuasive, as a textual matter, than Chief Justice Marshall's?

Note in this regard that the reasoning of Marbury has been rejected insofar as it suggests that Congress may not give the lower courts jurisdiction over cases falling within the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. See, e.g., Illinois v. Milwaukee, 406 U.S. 91 (1972).

c. Chief Justice Marshall acknowledges that, “where the heads of departments are the political or confidential agents of the executive, merely to execute the will of the president, or rather to act in cases in which the executive possesses a constitutional or legal discretion, nothing can be more perfectly clear, than that their acts are only politically examinable.” This acknowledgment created the category of cases involving “political questions,” which are not subject to judicial review. See section E infra. What falls in this category? In Chief Justice Marshall’s view, is there any case of official illegality that is not judicially cognizable? On one view, the answer is no: Political questions, as Chief Justice Marshall understands them, are questions in which there is no constitutional obstacle to the acts in question. Note also the contrast drawn by Chief Justice Marshall between cases involving “individual rights” and cases involving “discretion.” What is the relationship between those two categories of cases?

d. The most important holding in the case is that the Supreme Court has the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional—that is, that it has the power of judicial review. It is striking to many modern readers that Chief Justice Marshall’s principal arguments rely not on the text of the Constitution but instead on its structure and on the consequences of a conclusion that judicial review was unavailable.

Consider the following view:

[The] issue of judicial review was by no means new. The Privy Council had occasionally applied the ultra vires principle to set aside legislative acts contravening municipal or colonial charters. State courts had set aside state statutes under constitutions no more explicit about judicial review than the federal. The Supreme Court itself had measured a state law against a state constitution in Cooper v. Telfair, 4 U.S. (4 Dall.) 14 (1800), and had struck down another under the supremacy clause in Ware v. Hylton, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 199 (1796); in both cases the power of judicial review was expressly affirmed. Even Acts of Congress had been struck down by federal circuit courts, and the Supreme Court, while purporting to reserve the question of its power to do so, had reviewed the constitutionality of a federal statute in Hylton v. United States, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 171 (1796). Justice James Iredell had explicitly asserted this power both in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419 (1793) and in Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 386 (1798), and Chase had acknowledged it in [Cooper]. In the Convention, moreover, both proponents and opponents of the proposed Council of Revision had recognized that the courts would review the validity of congressional legislation, and Alexander Hamilton had proclaimed the same doctrine in The Federalist. Yet though Marshall's principal arguments echoed those of Hamilton, he made no mention of any of this material, writing as if the question had never arisen before.

Currie, The Constitution in the Supreme Court: The Powers of the Federal Courts, 1801–1835, 49 U. Chi. L. Rev. 646, 655–656 (1982). For a comprehensive account, see P. Hamburger, Law and Judicial Duty (2008). In what ways was the issue in Ware and Cooper different from that in Marbury? Consider the proposition that Marshall's arguments for judicial review supported what has been called “departmentalism.” According to one version of departmentalism, each branch has the power to determine for itself, and finally, the constitutionality of legislation affecting its own functions. How expansive would judicial review be under this version of departmentalism?

3. The justifications for judicial review. Consider the various arguments for judicial review.

a. Written Constitution. Chief Justice Marshall's first argument is that judicial review is a necessary inference from the fact of a written Constitution. “The distinction between a government with limited and unlimited powers is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed, are of equal obligation.” But this argument seems to confound two different issues. (1) Is the Constitution binding on the national government? (2) Are the courts authorized to enforce their interpretation of the Constitution against that of other branches of the national government? Even if the answer to the first question is “yes,” that answer does not dictate an answer to the second question. Many countries have had written constitutions without having judicial review. Would it be plausible to respond that the Constitution would be ineffective or merely hortatory if it were not subject to judicial enforcement?

Consider in this regard The Federalist No. 78, infra; and note that in Eastern Europe, emerging from communism, and South Africa, emerging from apartheid, nations have chosen both a written constitution and judicial review of one sort or another. Indeed, judicial review has been seen as a central part of the new constitutional orders. Consider also Currie, supra, at 657: “Surely the Framers were reasonable people, and surely they could not have meant to appoint the fox as guardian of the henhouse.” But on the facts of Marbury, who was the fox? Note also that in some nations, certain constitutional provisions, such as those involving social and economic guarantees and environmental protection, are expressly made nonjusticiable.

b. Notions of judicial role. Chief Justice Marshall claims that the ordinary role of the courts is to interpret the law. That role, he claims, requires judges to construe the Constitution in the ordinary course of conducting judicial business. But it might be responded that constitutional interpretation—when it takes the form of invalidation of the outcomes reached by the more political branches—is special because of its highly intrusive and largely final character. Should this difference mean that the ordinary interpretive task is no longer appropriate? For an emphatic negative answer, grounded in history, see P. Hamburger, supra.

c. Supremacy clause. The supremacy clause provides that the “Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof... shall be the supreme Law of the Land.” Does this establish the existence of judicial review?

Assuming that an act repugnant to the Constitution is not a law “in pursuance thereof” and thus must not be given effect as the supreme law of the land, who according to the Constitution, is to make the determination as to whether any given law is in fact repugnant to the Constitution itself? [Chief Justice Marshall] never confronts this question. His substitute question, whether a law repugnant to the Constitution still binds the courts, assumes that such repugnance has appropriately been determined by those granted such power under the Constitution. It is clear, however, that the supremacy clause itself cannot be the clear textual basis for a claim by the judiciary that this prerogative to determine repugnancy belongs to it.

Van Alstyne, A Critical Guide to Marbury v. Madison, 1969 Duke L.J. 1, 22.

Note also that Chief Justice Marshall gains rhetorical force for his position by referring to clauses that in his view have a “plain” meaning opposed to acts of Congress. But one might doubt whether constitutional provisions are likely to have such meanings in many cases on which Congress and Court will differ. In any event, consider the possibility that the use of these hypothetical cases is misleading in light of the more open-ended character of most constitutional interpretation—of which Marbury itself is an example.

d. Grant of jurisdiction. The Constitution extends the judicial power of the United States to all cases arising under the Constitution. Chief Justice Marshall argues that the grant of jurisdiction would be meaningless if the courts did not have authority to examine the constitutionality of acts of Congress. Consider A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch 6 (1962):

If it were impossible to conceive a case “arising under the Constitution” which would not require the Court to pass on the constitutionality of congressional legislation, then [Marshall might be correct, for without judicial review] this clause [would be] quite senseless. But there are such cases which may call into question the constitutional validity of judicial, administrative, or military actions without attacking legislative or even presidential acts as well, or which call upon the Court, under appropriate statutory authorization, to apply the Constitution to acts of the states. Any reading but his own was for Marshall “too extravagant to be maintained.” His own, although out of line with the general scheme of Article III, may be possible; but it is optional. This is the strongest bit of textual evidence in support of Marshall’s view, but it is merely a hint.

e. Judges’ oath. Chief Justice Marshall relies on the fact that judges take an oath to uphold the Constitution. But consider the fact that the oath to support the Constitution is not peculiar to the judges, but is taken indiscriminately by every officer of the government, and is designed rather as a test of the political principles of the man, than to bind the officer in the discharge of his duty. [But] granting it to relate to the official conduct of the judge, as well as every other officer, and not to his political principles, still it must be understood in reference to supporting the constitution, only as far as that may be involved in his official duty; and consequently, if his official duty does not comprehend an inquiry into the authority of the legislature, neither does his oath.

Eakin v. Raub, 12 Serg. & Rawle 330, 353 (Pa. 1825). In short, the oath requires judges to support the Constitution; however, if the Constitution assigns ultimate interpretive power to the legislature, or to the President, then judicial review is not contemplated by the Constitution but is in violation of it. Does this suggest that the “oath” argument is a makeweight?

Perhaps these various arguments appear more forceful in combination than they appear when separated. One might claim that while none is independently decisive, the various arguments together suggest that judicial review is a part of the constitutional structure.

4. The view of the framers and the ratifiers. The relevant documents at the time of the framing, and before, indicate that judicial review was generally contemplated. See also A. Bickel, supra, at 15–16:

[It] is as clear as such matters can be that the Framers of the Constitution specifically, if tacitly, expected that the federal courts would assume a power—of whatever exact dimensions—to pass on the constitutionality of actions of the Congress and the President, as well as of the several states. Moreover, not even a colorable showing of decisive historical evidence to the contrary can be made. Nor can it be maintained that the language of the Constitution is compellingly the other way. At worst it may be said that the intentions of the Framers cannot be ascertained with finality.

Consider Hamilton's views in The Federalist No. 78:

There is no position which depends on clearer principles, than that every act of a delegated authority, contrary to the tenor of the commission under which it is exercised, is void. No legislative act, therefore, contrary to the Constitution, can be valid. To deny this, would be to affirm, that the deputy is greater than his principal; that the servant is above his master; that the representatives of the people are superior to the people themselves; that men acting by virtue of powers, may do not only what their powers do not authorize, but what they forbid.

If it be said that the legislative body are themselves the constitutional judges of their own powers, and that the construction they put upon them is conclusive upon the other departments, it may be answered, that this cannot be the natural presumption, where it is not to be collected from any particular provisions in the Constitution. It is not otherwise to be supposed, that the Constitution could intend to enable the representatives of the people to substitute their will to that of their constituents. It is far more rational to suppose, that the courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority. The interpretation of the laws is the proper and peculiar province of the courts. A constitution is, in fact, and must be regarded by the judges, as a fundamental law. It therefore belongs to them to ascertain its meaning, as well as the meaning of any particular act proceeding from the legislative body. If there should happen to be an irreconcilable variance between the two, that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents.

Nor does this conclusion by any means suppose a superiority of the judicial to the legislative power. It only supposes that the power of the people is superior to both; and that where the will of the legislature, declared in its statutes, stands in opposition to that of the people, declared in the Constitution, the judges ought to be governed by the latter rather than the former. They ought to regulate their decisions by the fundamental laws, rather than by those which are not fundamental....

It can be of no weight to say that the courts, on the pretence of a repugnancy, may substitute their own pleasure to the constitutional intentions of the legislature. This might as well happen in the case of two contradictory statutes; or it might as well happen in every adjudication upon any single statute. The courts must declare the sense of the law; and if they should be disposed to exercise WILL instead of JUDGMENT, the consequence would equally be the substitution of their pleasure to that of the legislative body. The observation, if it prove any thing, would prove that there ought to be no judges distinct from that body.

How, if at all, do Hamilton's justifications for judicial review differ from Chief Justice Marshall's?

For a detailed treatment of some relevant historical issues, see Kramer, Foreword: We the Court, 115 Harv. L. Rev. 4 (2001). Kramer urges that for the framers the "Constitution was not ordinary law, not peculiarly the stuff of courts and judges." Instead it was "a special form of popular law, law made by the people to bind their governors." Id. at 10. For many members of the revolutionary generation, constitutional principles were subject to "popular enforcement," id. at 40, that is, public insistence on compliance with the Constitution, rather than judicial activity. "It was the legislature's delegated responsibility to decide whether a proposed law was constitutionally authorized, subject to oversight by the people. Courts simply had nothing to do with it, and they were acting as interlopers if they tried to second-guess the legislature's decision." Id. at 49. Kramer traces the controversial early growth of the practice of judicial review, with many seeing it as an "act of resistance." Id. at 54. At the founding, a "handful of participants saw a role for judicial review, though few of these imagined it as a powerful or important device, and none seemed anxious to emphasize it. Others were opposed....The vast majority of participants were still thinking in terms of popular constitutionalism and so focused on traditional political means of enforcing the new charter; the notion of judicial review simply never crossed their minds." Id. at 66.

In Kramer's account, constitutional limits would be enforced not through courts, but as a result of republican institutions and the citizenry's own commitment to its founding document. Kramer raises serious doubts about the account in Marbury v. Madison and in particular about judicial supremacy in the interpretation of the Constitution. He suggests that for some of the framers, judicial review was "a substitute for popular resistance" and to be used "only when the unconstitutionality of a law was clear beyond dispute." See also L. Kramer, The People Themselves (2004), for an expanded version of this argument.

Note, however, that many and probably most historians and historically minded lawyers disagree, and believe that Marbury v. Madison had it essentially right. See P. Hamburger, supra; R. Clinton, Marbury v. Madison and Judicial Review (1989). For valuable historical treatments, see W. Nelson, Marbury v. Madison: The Origins and Legacy of Judicial Review (2000); B. Ackerman, The Failure of the Founding Fathers: Jefferson, Marshall, and the Rise of Presidential Democracy (2007).

Martin v. Hunter's Lessee

14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304 (1816)

[This case arose out of a dispute over the ownership of land in Virginia. Hunter claimed the land pursuant to a grant from the state of Virginia in 1789, which confiscated lands owned by British subjects. Martin, a British subject, claimed that the attempted confiscation was ineffective under anticonfiscation clauses of treaties between the United States and England.

[The Virginia trial court held in favor of Martin; the Virginia Court of Appeals reversed, concluding that the state's title to the land had vested before the relevant treaties, and alternatively that Martin's claim was defeated by a 1796 Act of Compromise between the state and Martin's uncle, from whom Martin's claim derived. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the Virginia Court of Appeals, neglecting to mention the Act of Compromise, but claiming that Virginia had not perfected its title before the relevant treaties. Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee, 7 Cranch 603 (1813). The Supreme Court remanded the case to the Virginia Court of Appeals with instructions to enter judgment for the appellant. But on remand the Virginia court declined. The court said that section 25 of the Judiciary Act was unconstitutional insofar as it extended the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to the Virginia court.

[In its opinion, the court emphasized that the act placed the courts of one sovereign—Virginia—under the direct control of another, an arrangement incompatible with the notion of sovereignty. “It must have been foreseen that controversies would sometimes arise as to the boundaries of the two jurisdictions. Yet the constitution has provided no umpire, has erected no tribunal by which they shall be settled. The omission proceeded, probably, from the belief, that such a tribunal would produce evils greater than those of the occasional collisions which it would be designed to remedy.”

[The excerpts here deal only with the question of whether the Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction over constitutional decisions by state courts.]

MR. JUSTICE STORY delivered the opinion of the Court....

[The] appellate power is not limited by the terms of the third article to any particular courts. The words are, "the judicial power (which includes appellate power) shall extend to all cases," &c., and "in all other cases before mentioned the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction." It is the case, then, and not the court, that gives the jurisdiction. If the judicial power extends to the case, it will be in vain to search in the letter of the constitution for any qualification as to the tribunal where it depends. [If] the text be clear and distinct, no restriction upon its plain and obvious import ought to be admitted, unless the inference be irresistible.

If the constitution meant to limit the appellate jurisdiction to cases pending in the courts of the United States, it would necessarily follow that the jurisdiction of these courts would, in all the cases enumerated in the constitution, be exclusive of state tribunals. How otherwise could the jurisdiction extend to all cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, or to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction? If some of these cases might be entertained by state tribunals, and no appellate jurisdiction as to them should exist, then the appellate power would not extend to all, but to some cases. If state tribunals might exercise concurrent jurisdiction over all or some of the other classes of cases in the constitution without control, then the appellate jurisdiction of the United States might, as to such cases, have no real existence, contrary to the manifest intent of the constitution. [This] construction would abridge the jurisdiction of such court far more than has been ever contemplated in any act of congress....

[It] is plain that the framers of the constitution did contemplate that cases within the judicial cognizance of the United States not only might but would arise in the state courts, in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction. With this view the sixth article declares, that "this constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." It is obvious that this obligation is imperative upon the state judges in their official, and not merely in their private, capacities. From the very nature of their judicial duties they would be called upon to pronounce the law applicable to the case in judgment. They were not to decide merely according to the laws or constitution of the state, but according to the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States—"the supreme law of the land."

A moment's consideration will show us the necessity and propriety of this provision in cases where the jurisdiction of the state courts is unquestionable. Suppose a contract for the payment of money is made between citizens of the same state, and performance thereof is sought in the courts of that state; no person can doubt that the jurisdiction completely and exclusively attaches, in the first instance, to such courts. Suppose at the trial the defendant sets up in his defence a tender under a state law, making paper money a good tender, or a state law, impairing the obligation of such contract, which law, if binding, would defeat the suit. The constitution of the United States has declared that no state shall make any thing but gold or silver coin a tender in payment of debts, or pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts. If congress shall not have passed a law providing for the removal of such a suit to the courts of the United States, must not the state court proceed to hear and determine it? [Suppose] an indictment for a crime in a state court, and the defendant should allege in his defence that the crime was created by an ex post facto act of the state, must not the state court, in the exercise of a jurisdiction which has already rightfully attached, have a right to pronounce on the validity and sufficiency of the defence? It would be extremely difficult, upon any legal principles, to give a negative answer to these inquiries. Innumerable instances of the same sort might be stated, in illustration of the position; and unless the state courts could sustain jurisdiction in such cases, this clause of the sixth article would be without meaning or effect, and public mischiefs, of a most enormous magnitude, would inevitably ensue.

It must, therefore, be conceded that the constitution not only contemplated, but meant to provide for cases within the scope of the judicial power of the United States, which might yet depend before state tribunals. It was foreseen that in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction, state courts would incidentally take cognizance of cases arising under the constitution, the laws, and treaties of the United States. Yet to all these cases the judicial power, by the very terms of the constitution, is to extend. It cannot extend by original jurisdiction if that was already rightfully and exclusively attached in the state courts, which (as has been already shown) may occur; it must, therefore, extend by appellate jurisdiction, or not at all. It would seem to follow that the appellate power of the United States must, in such cases, extend to state tribunals; and if in such cases, there is no reason why it should not equally attach upon all others within the purview of the constitution.

It has been argued that such an appellate jurisdiction over state courts is inconsistent with the genius of our governments, and the spirit of the constitution. That the latter was never designed to act upon state sovereignties, but only upon the people, and that if the power exists, it will materially impair the sovereignty of the states, and the independence of their courts....

It is a mistake that the constitution was not designed to operate upon states, in their corporate capacities. It is crowded with provisions which restrain or annul the sovereignty of the states in some of the highest branches of their prerogatives. The tenth section of the first article contains a long list of disabilities and prohibitions imposed upon the states. Surely, when such essential portions of state sovereignty are taken away, or prohibited to be exercised, it cannot be correctly asserted that the constitution does not act upon the states. The language of the constitution is also imperative upon the states as to the performance of many duties. It is imperative upon the state legislatures to make laws prescribing the time, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, and for electors of president and vice-president. And in these, as well as some other cases, congress have a right to revise, amend, or supercede the laws which may be passed by state legislatures. When, therefore, the states are stripped of some of the highest attributes of sovereignty, and the same are given to the United States; when the legislatures of the states are, in some respects, under the control of congress, and in every case are, under the constitution, bound by the paramount authority of the United States; it is certainly difficult to support the argument that the appellate power over the decisions of state courts is contrary to the genius of our institutions. The courts of the United States can, without question, revise the proceedings of the executive and legislative authorities of the states, and if they are found to be contrary to the constitution, may declare them to be of no legal validity. Surely the exercise of the same right over judicial tribunals is not a higher or more dangerous act of sovereign power.

Nor can such a right be deemed to impair the independence of state judges. It is assuming the very ground in controversy to assert that they possess an absolute independence of the United States. In respect to the powers granted to the United States, they are not independent; they are expressly bound to obedience by the letter of the constitution; and if they should unintentionally transcend their authority, or misconstrue the constitution, there is no more reason for giving their judgments an absolute and irresistible force, than for giving it to the acts of the other co-ordinate departments of state sovereignty.

The argument urged from the possibility of the abuse of the revising power, is equally unsatisfactory. It is always a doubtful course, to argue against the use or existence of a power, from the possibility of its abuse. It is still more difficult, by such an argument, to ingraft upon a general power a restriction which is not to be found in the terms in which it is given. From the very nature of things, the absolute right of decision, in the last resort, must rest somewhere—wherever it may be vested it is susceptible of abuse. In all questions of jurisdiction the inferior, or appellate court, must pronounce the final judgment; and common sense, as well as legal reasoning, has conferred it upon the latter.

It is further argued, that no great public mischief can result from a construction which shall limit the appellate power of the United States to cases in their own courts: first, because state judges are bound by an oath to support the constitution of the United States, and must be presumed to be men of learning and integrity; and, secondly, because congress must have an unquestionable right to remove all cases within the scope of the judicial power from the state courts to the courts of the United States, at any time before final judgment, though not after final judgment. As to the first reason—admitting that the judges of the state courts are, and always will be, of as much learning, integrity, and wisdom, as those of the courts of the United States, (which we very cheerfully admit,) it does not aid the argument. It is manifest that the constitution has proceeded upon a theory of its own, and given or withheld powers according to the judgment of the American people, by whom it was adopted. [The] constitution has presumed (whether rightly or wrongly we do not inquire) that state attachments, state prejudices, state jealousies, and state interests, might sometimes obstruct, or control, or be supposed to obstruct or control, the regular administration of justice. Hence, in controversies between states; between citizens of different states; between citizens claiming grants under different states; between a state and its citizens, or foreigners, and between citizens and foreigners, it enables the parties, under the authority of congress, to have the controversies heard, tried, and determined before the national tribunals. No other reason than that which has been stated can be assigned, why some, at least, of those cases should not have been left to the cognizance of the state courts. In respect to the other enumerated cases—the cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, cases affecting ambassadors and other public ministers, and cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction—reasons of a higher and more extensive nature, touching the safety, peace, and sovereignty of the nation, might well justify a grant of exclusive jurisdiction.

This is not all. A motive of another kind, perfectly compatible with the most sincere respect for state tribunals, might induce the grant of appellate power over their decisions. That motive is the importance, and even necessity of uniformity of decisions throughout the whole United States, upon all subjects within the purview of the constitution. Judges of equal learning and integrity, in different states, might differently interpret a statute, or a treaty of the United States, or even the constitution itself: If there were no revising authority to control these jarring and discordant judgments, and harmonize them into uniformity, the laws, the treaties, and the constitution of the United States would be different in different states, and might, perhaps, never have precisely the same construction, obligation, or efficacy, in any two states. The public mischiefs that would attend such a state of things would be truly deplorable; and it cannot be believed that they could have escaped the enlightened convention which formed the constitution. What, indeed, might then have been only prophecy, has now become fact; and the appellate jurisdiction must continue to be the only adequate remedy for such evils.

There is an additional consideration, which is entitled to great weight. The constitution of the United States was designed for the common and equal benefit of all the people of the United States. The judicial power was granted for the same benign and salutary purposes. It was not to be exercised exclusively for the benefit of parties who might be plaintiffs, and would elect the national forum, but also for the protection of defendants who might be entitled to try their rights, or assert their privileges, before the same forum. Yet, if the construction contended for be correct, it will follow, that as the plaintiff may always elect the state court, the defendant may be deprived of all the security which the constitution intended in aid of his rights. Such a state of things can, in no respect, be considered as giving equal rights....

On the whole, the court are of opinion, that the appellate power of the United States does extend to cases pending in the state courts; and that the 25th section of the judiciary act, which authorizes the exercise of this jurisdiction in the specified cases, by a writ of error, is supported by the letter and spirit of the constitution. We find no clause in that instrument which limits this power; and we dare not interpose a limitation where the people have not been disposed to create one....

Note: Supreme Court Review of State Courts and State Laws

1. Supreme Court review of state court decisions—underlying concerns. In what ways does the issue in Martin differ from that in Marbury? Why is it important to have Supreme Court jurisdiction over the state courts? Justice Story's opinion stresses that, if there were "no revising authority," the federal system would make possible "jarring and discordant judgment." The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is, in this view, necessary to ensure the uniformity of federal law. But that raises the question why federal law must be uniform. As a general rule, legal requirements may vary from one state to another. What would be the evil in having disparate interpretations of the federal Constitution?

The Virginia judges in Martin made two arguments for their conclusion. First, they claimed not that the Constitution did not bind state judges, but that one sovereign could not control another; the risk of centralization thus outweighed the risk of disharmony. Second, they contended that other devices were available in order to minimize that latter risk and to bring about uniformity. Congress could, for example, allow removal to federal court of all cases involving a federal question. The position of the Virginia judges was that Congress had to take action to eliminate the risk of lack of uniformity through creating lower federal courts and expanding removal jurisdiction. The Court's view, by contrast, is that the more direct mechanism of control—appellate jurisdiction—is constitutionally permissible.

In addition to the uniformity point, note the possibility that Supreme Court review is necessary because of state hostility to, or lack of sufficient sympathy for, federal rights. The argument here is that state judges will be less likely to react sympathetically to federal claims—either because they lack the tenure and salary protections of article III, and are thus more susceptible to political influence, or because they have a natural alliance with the legislative and executive parts of state government. Perhaps, in short, state judges are insufficiently independent of the forces against which constitutional guarantees are supposed to run. Neuborne, The Myth of Parity, 90 Harv. L. Rev. 1105, 1127–1128 (1977), speaks of the difference between federal district judges and state trial judges, but the arguments are applicable to appellate judges as well:

Federal district judges [are] as insulated from majoritarian pressures as is functionally possible, precisely to insure their ability to enforce the Constitution without fear of reprisal. State trial judges, on the other hand, generally are elected for a fixed term, rendering them vulnerable to majoritarian pressure when deciding constitutional cases. [This] insulation factor, I suggest, explains the historical preference for federal enforcement of controversial constitutional norms.

This view has often played an important role in constitutional history. But one might ask whether it might not be the federal judges who are likely to be biased.

Another justification for Supreme Court review of state court decisions stresses the comparative expertise of the federal courts in dealing with federal constitutional questions. Neuborne, supra, at 1120, suggests that “federal trial courts tend to be better equipped to analyze complex, often conflicting lines of authority and more likely to produce competently written, persuasive opinions than are state trial courts.” Why should this be the case?

2. Supreme Court review of state laws—constitutional basis. Martin involved Supreme Court review of state court decisions, not of state laws; but elements of the Court’s reasoning are applicable to the latter problem. Do the arguments, textual and otherwise, for the power of judicial review of state laws carry more force than those for judicial review of federal laws? Consider Justice Holmes’s view: “I do not think the United States would come to an end if we lost our power to declare an Act of Congress void. I do think the Union would be imperiled if we could not make that declaration as to the laws of the several States.” O. W. Holmes, Collected Legal Papers 295–296 (1920).

3. Justice Story and article III. In Martin, Justice Story interpreted article III to require that the whole judicial power of the United States should be at all times vested, either in an original or appellate form, in some courts created under its authority. If it were accepted, this conclusion would have dramatic practical consequences. It means that, at any time, some federal court must have the power to decide any case to which the federal judicial power extends. On what does Justice Story base his conclusion?

Consider Currie, The Constitution in the Supreme Court: The Powers of the Federal Courts, 1801–1835, 49 U. Chi. L. Rev. 646, 685–686 (1982), suggesting that Story’s conclusion was contrary to Supreme Court precedent [as] well as to consistent congressional practice. [The] strongest argument against giving a natural reading to the ostensibly unlimited discretion of Congress to limit federal jurisdiction is Marbury’s principle that the courts were intended to enforce constitutional limits on legislative power. Story’s interpretation poorly comports with that principle, for it outlaws such minor caseload adjustments as the jurisdictional amount while allowing Congress to evade any substantial check by vesting sole power over important constitutional questions in a single lower court selected for the complaisance of its judges.

4. Cohens v. Virginia. In Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 264 (1821), the Court reaffirmed Martin in the context of review of state criminal proceedings. The case involved defendants who had been convicted of the unlawful sale of lottery tickets in Virginia. They defended on the ground that an act of Congress authorized the local government of the District of Columbia to establish a lottery. The Court, per Chief Justice Marshall, affirmed, concluding that the congressional statute did not authorize the sale outside the territorial boundaries of the District of Columbia. But the importance of the case lies in the holding that the Supreme Court could exercise jurisdiction over decisions of the state courts in criminal cases and in cases in which the state was a party. As to the fact that the state was a party, Chief Justice Marshall noted that “the judicial power, as originally given, extends to all cases arising under the constitution or a law of the United States, whoever may be the party.” The language of article III, Chief Justice Marshall claimed, referred to “all” federal question cases. The same reasoning applied to the claim that the fact that a criminal case was involved made Cohens different from Martin.

5. Federal supremacy reaffirmed. In James v. City of Boise, 136 S. Ct. 685 (2016), the Supreme Court reaffirmed that its interpretations of federal law are supreme and binding on state courts. In Hughes v. Rowe, 449 U.S. 5 (1980) (per curiam), the Supreme Court had interpreted 42 U.S.C. §1988 to permit a prevailing defendant in a civil rights suit to recover fees only if “the plaintiff’s action was frivolous, unreasonable, or without foundation.” The Idaho Supreme Court concluded that it was not bound by the Court’s interpretation, reasoning that “[although] the Supreme Court may have the authority to limit the discretion of lower federal courts, it does not have the authority to limit the discretion of state courts where such limitation is not contained in the statute.” The Idaho Supreme Court proceeded to award attorney’s fees under section 1988 without first determining whether the plaintiff’s action was frivolous, unreasonable, or without foundation. In reversing, the Supreme Court stated:

“It is this Court’s responsibility to say what a [federal] statute means, and once the Court has spoken, it is the duty of other courts to respect that understanding of the governing rule of law. (citations omitted)....As Justice Story explained 200 years ago, if state courts were permitted to disregard this Court’s rulings on federal law, ‘the laws, the treaties, and the constitution of the United States would be different in different states, and might, perhaps, never have precisely the same construction, obligation, or efficacy, in any two states. The public mischiefs that would attend such a state of things would be truly deplorable.’ Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee, 14 U.S. (1 Wheat) 304, 348 (1816).”

Note: Judicial Exclusivity in Constitutional Interpretation?

In Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1 (1958), Arkansas had failed to comply with a district court order requiring desegregation. The school board’s petition for certiorari described the situation: “[the] legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the state government opposed the desegregation of Little Rock schools by enacting laws, calling out troops, making statements vilifying federal law and federal courts, and failing to utilize state law enforcement agencies and judicial processes to maintain public peace.”

The state argued that desegregation would lead to undue violence and disorder and that those consequences justified disobedience of the decree. The Court rejected that argument on the ground that “law and order are not here to be preserved by depriving the Negro children of their constitutional rights.” But the Court went on to meet the view that “the Governor and Legislature [are] not bound by our holding in the Brown case”:

Article VI of the Constitution makes the Constitution the “supreme Law of the Land.” In 1803, Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for a unanimous Court, referring to the Constitution as “the fundamental and paramount law of the nation,” declared in the notable case of Marbury v. Madison [that] “It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is.” This decision declared the basic principle that the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution, and that principle has ever since been respected by this Court and the Country as a permanent and indispensable feature of our constitutional system. It follows that the interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment enunciated by this Court in the Brown case is the supreme law of the land, and Art. VI of the Constitution makes it of binding effect on the States “any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.” Every state legislator and executive and judicial officer is solemnly committed by oath taken pursuant to Art. VI, cl. 3, “to support this Constitution.”

Cooper might well be thought to go beyond Marbury. Marbury established that in the course of deciding cases, courts must look to the Constitution as an enforceable source of law. When there is a conflict between the Constitution and a statute, and when the conflict is relevant to the resolution of a justiciable controversy, the courts must allow the Constitution, as they interpret it, to prevail. But this principle might not establish any special judicial authority to interpret the Constitution. On one view, Marbury means only that every branch of government, acting within its sphere, is authorized to interpret the Constitution.

Cooper v. Aaron suggests that the courts should see themselves as having been entrusted with a special and distinctive role as ultimate guardians of the meaning of the Constitution, and that other government officials must not interpret the Constitution for themselves but instead must look to the courts’ interpretation and take it as authoritative. The result would be that judicial rulings are authoritative, even if there is no decree against the relevant officials in a litigated case. Perhaps more generally such a view would suggest that Presidents, members of Congress, and others should not think independently about what the Constitution requires, but should instead ask how the Supreme Court would be likely to decide.

If the passage from Cooper should be so understood, does it go too far in establishing “judicial supremacy”? What are the practical differences between Cooper and the narrower interpretation of Marbury?

1. The view from the presidency. Consider in this regard the responsibility of political actors, including most prominently the President, in circumstances in which (a) they believe that a statute is unconstitutional in the face of a court’s conclusion that it is constitutional, or in the expectation that the court will uphold it, and (b) they believe that the statute or measure is constitutional in the face of a judicial conclusion that it is unconstitutional, or in the expectation that the court will invalidate it. The two circumstances might seem very different.

Consider the view that in the first situation, political officials can legitimately make their own judgments about what the Constitution means, and act on the basis of those judgments. More particularly: Suppose that the Supreme Court has upheld or would uphold a statute that the President believes unconstitutional. (It might be an environmental statute, regulating private property owners and attacked as a “taking” of property, or it might be a restriction on commercial advertising, or it might be discrimination against transgender persons.) The Constitution imposes on all branches of government, not just the courts, a duty to comply with the Constitution. A necessary inference is that the President and members of Congress must make their own judgments on constitutional issues.

This responsibility might seem especially insistent in light of the fact that moral issues frequently become constitutional issues. If the courts’ duty is exclusive, politics becomes drained of morality, and political actors will be making decisions on the basis of expediency alone. Thus, for example, if the President or a member of Congress believes that a statute is unconstitutional, he or she must ignore it, even if the Court would uphold it. The Constitution plainly speaks to all public officials, and it is simply too important to be left entirely to the justices. See the veto message of Andrew Jackson, 1832, on an act to recharter the Bank of the United States, 2 Messages and Papers of the Presidents 576, 581–582 (J. Richardson ed., 1900) (vetoing on constitutional grounds a measure that had been upheld by the Court: “[The] opinion of the judges has no more authority over Congress than the opinion of Congress has over the judges, and on that point the President is independent of both”).

In support of this general conclusion, consider the views expressed by Jefferson, Letter to Abigail Adams, Sept. 11, 1804, in 8 The Writings of Thomas Jefferson 310 (M. Ford ed., 1897):

You seem to think it devolved on the judges to decide on the validity of the sedition law. But nothing in the Constitution has given them a right to decide for the Executive, any more than to the Executive to decide for them. Both magistracies are equally independent in the sphere of action assigned to them. The judges, believing the law constitutional, had a right to pass a sentence of fine and imprisonment, because that power was placed in their hands by the Constitution. But the Executive, believing the law to be unconstitutional, was bound to remit the execution of it; because that power has been confided to him by the Constitution. That instrument meant that its coordinate branches should be checks on each other. But the opinion which gives to the judges the right to decide what laws are constitutional, and what not, not only for themselves in their sphere of action, but for the Legislature and Executive also, would make the judiciary a despotic branch.

The second situation might be a lot harder. Suppose the President, or some other public official, believes that the Supreme Court has wrongly invalidated a statute. Examples include decisions invalidating laws restricting abortions, laws forbidding the President from engaging in certain actions designed to reduce the risk of a terrorist attack, or laws requiring states to recognize same-sex marriage. What is the President's duty in the face of such laws? May he sign or propose legislation that would run afoul of the Court's decision? May he attempt to get the Court to overrule its decision through such acts and through repetitive and insistent litigation? May he campaign against the Court? See Lincoln's First Inaugural Address, Mar. 4, 1861, in 6 Messages and Papers of the Presidents 5 (J. Richardson ed., 1900):

I do not forget the position assumed by some that constitutional questions are to be decided by the Supreme Court; nor do I deny that such decisions must be binding, in any case, upon the parties to a suit, as to the object of that suit, while they are also entitled to a very high respect and consideration in all parallel cases by all other departments of the government. And, while it is obviously possible that such decision may be erroneous in any given case, still the evil effect following it, being limited to that particular case, with the chance that it may be overruled and never become a precedent for other cases, can better be borne than could the evils of a different practice. At the same time, the candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the government, upon vital questions affecting the whole people, is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made, in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned the government into the hands of that eminent tribunal. Nor is there in this view any assault upon the court or the judges. It is a duty from which they may not shrink to decide cases properly brought before them, and it is no fault of theirs if others seek to turn their decisions to political purposes.

Other Presidents, including Franklin Roosevelt and Richard Nixon, have expressed similar views. Can this position be distinguished from the refusal of Governor Faubus of Arkansas to comply with the decision in Brown v. Board of Education? See if you can draw a distinction that does not speak of the moral or legal correctness of Brown.

Consider the views of President Reagan's Attorney General Edwin Meese in The Law of the Constitution, 61 Tul. L. Rev. 979 (1987):

[There] is [a] necessary distinction between the Constitution and constitutional law. The two are not synonymous....

Obviously [a Supreme Court decision] does have binding quality: It binds the parties in a case and also the executive branch for whatever enforcement is necessary. But such a decision does not establish a "supreme Law of the Land" that is binding on all persons and parts of government, henceforth and forevermore....

To confuse the Constitution with judicial pronouncements allows no standard by which to criticize and to seek the overruling of [cases] such as Dred Scott, and Plessy v. Ferguson. To do otherwise, as Lincoln said, is to submit to government by judiciary. But such a state could never be consistent with the principles of our Constitution. Indeed, it would be utterly inconsistent with the very idea of the rule of law to which we, as a people, have always subscribed.

2. "Underenforced" constitutional norms. It might be argued that the Constitution sometimes invalidates official action, even if the Supreme Court declines so to hold. There is, in this view, a difference between what the Constitution requires and what the Court says it requires. The Court might decide that, because of the need to defer to other branches of government or because of other limitations on its own competence, some measure does not violate the Constitution; but such a holding might not bind other officials in the process of deciding whether a proposed course of action is constitutional, since those officials are not constrained by principles of deference.

See Sager, Fair Measure: The Status of Underenforced Constitutional Norms, 91 Harv. L. Rev. 1212, 1220–1221, 1227 (1978):

Conventional analysis does not distinguish between fully enforced and underenforced constitutional norms; as a general matter, the scope of a constitutional norm is considered to be coterminous with the scope of its judicial enforcement. [Where] a federal judicial construct is found not to extend to certain official behavior because of institutional concerns rather than analytical perceptions, it seems strange to regard the resulting decision as a statement about the meaning of the constitutional norm in question. After all, what the members of the federal tribunal have actually determined is that there are good reasons for stopping short of exhausting the content of the constitutional concept with which they are dealing; the limited judicial construct which they have fashioned or accepted is occasioned by this determination and does not derive from a judgment about the scope of the constitutional concept itself.

[The] most direct consequence of adopting this revised view is the perception that government officials have a legal obligation to obey an underenforced constitutional norm which extends beyond its interpretation by the federal judiciary to the full dimensions of the concept which the norm embodies. This obligation to obey constitutional norms at their underenforced margins requires governmental officials to fashion their own conceptions of these norms and measure their conduct by reference to these conceptions. Public officials cannot consider themselves free to act at what they perceive or ought to perceive to be peril to constitutional norms merely because the federal judiciary is unable to enforce these norms at their margins.

On this view, branches of government other than courts act properly when they interpret the Constitution more expansively than does the Court. Perhaps, then, political branches are within their rights if they conclude (for example) that the death penalty is unconstitutional, that affirmative action programs are unconstitutional, that environmental statutes violate the takings clause, or that government must fund abortions—even if the Supreme Court disagrees.

3. Settlement. Consider the position that the view of judicial supremacy suggested in Cooper v. Aaron can be defended simply as a way of ensuring settlement of questions that badly need to be settled. See Alexander and Schauer, On Extrajudicial Constitutional Interpretation, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 1377 (1997). In this argument, “good institutional design requires norms that compel decision-makers to defer to the judgments of others with which they disagree.” Id. at 1387. But it might be asked whether it is possible, or desirable, for the Supreme Court to have the power to “settle” constitutional questions.

C. THE SOURCES OF JUDICIAL DECISIONS: TEXT, ORIGINAL MEANING, STRUCTURE, MORALITY

This section explores several sources of constitutional doctrine that have, in one or another form, played an important role in constitutional adjudication: the text; the original meaning; structure; and natural law and natural rights, sometimes understood in the modern era as moral or philosophical argument about rights.

Of course, these are hardly the only sources of constitutional doctrine. At various times, the Supreme Court has also considered tradition, the meaning of its own prior precedent, public policy, contemporary mores, and international norms in resolving constitutional disputes. The use of all of these sources of law is discussed at much greater length throughout this book.

1. Text and Original Meaning

For purposes of exposition, we are putting text and original meaning in the same section, but as we shall emphasize, the two can be, and often are, separated. Almost everyone agrees that the text of the Constitution is binding. (We will raise some questions about this view, but in general, it is true.) It is more controversial to say that the original meaning of the text is binding. In the following opinion, the text is understood to mean what (in the Court’s view) it originally meant:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA v. HELLER, 554 U.S. 570 (2008). The second amendment provides: “A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms shall not be infringed.” The issue in this case was whether a District of Columbia statute, which prohibited possession of usable handguns in a home, violated the amendment. In a five-to-four decision, the Court, per Justice Scalia, held that the statute was unconstitutional.

The Court’s opinion begins by distinguishing between an “individual right” view of the amendment, which protects the right of individuals to bear arms, especially for self-defense, and a “collective right” view, which protects the right only in connection with militia service. The Court endorses the first view.

The Court’s argument for this position begins by carefully focusing on the language of the second clause of the amendment, which it refers to as the “operative clause.” Justice Scalia points out that the phrase “right of the people” or a very similar phrase is used three other times in the Constitution (in the first, fourth, and ninth amendments) and that on each occasion it refers to an individual right and to all members of the political community, not just to a subset like members of a militia.

Turning to the phrase “keep and bear arms,” Justice Scalia consults eighteenth-century dictionaries to determine that “arms” referred to all weapons, not just those specifically designed for military use or employed in a military capacity. On the other hand, “arms” was not limited to weapons in existence at the time the second amendment was adopted. “We do not interpret constitutional rights that way. Just as the First Amendment protects modern forms of communications, and the Fourth Amendment applies to modern forms of search, the Second Amendment extends, prima facie, to all instruments that constitute bearable arms, even those that were not in existence at the time of the founding.”

Examination of eighteenth-century sources also established that the words “keep” and “bear” were unconnected to the possession of arms for military purposes. According to the Court,

[the] phrase “bear Arms” also had at the time of the founding an idiomatic meaning that was significantly different from its natural meaning: “to serve as a soldier, do military service, fight” or “to wage war.” But it unequivocally bore that idiomatic meaning only when followed by the preposition “against,” which was in turn followed by the target of the hostilities.

The Court’s conclusion was reinforced by English legal history, which the Court found relevant because the second amendment codified a preexisting right. The right guaranteed by William and Mary in the Declaration of Right was an individual right not related to militias; Blackstone had understood the right as “having the use of arms for self-preservation and defence.”

Having established the meaning of the “operative clause,” the Court turned its attention to the “prefatory clause” (“A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State”). The Court interpreted the word “Militia” to mean “all males physically capable of acting in concert for the common defense.” It found that “‘Well-regulated’ implies nothing more than the imposition of proper discipline and training.” Such a militia might be “necessary to the security of a free State” because it could counter invasion or insurrection and render large standing armies unnecessary and because “able-bodied men of a nation [trained] in arms and organized [are] better able to resist tyranny.”

The Court then turned to the relationship between the prefatory and operative clauses. The Court concluded that [history] showed that the way tyrants had eliminated a militia consisting of all the able-bodied men was not by banning the militia but simply by taking away the people's arms and enabling a select militia or standing army to suppress political opponents....

It is therefore entirely sensible that the Second Amendment's prefatory clause announces the purpose for which the right was codified: to prevent elimination of the militia. The prefatory clause does not suggest that preserving the militia was the only reason Americans valued the ancient right; they most undoubtedly thought it was even more important for self-defense and hunting. But the threat that the new Federal Government would destroy the citizens' militia by taking away their arms was the reason that right—unlike some other English rights—was codified in a written Constitution.

Finally, the Court examined postratification commentary and case law. In the Court's view this material was relevant because it helped "to determine the public understanding of a legal text in the period after its enactment or ratification. That sort of inquiry is a critical tool of constitutional interpretation." The Court concluded that "virtually all interpreters of the Second Amendment in the century after its enactment interpreted the amendment as we do."

It did not follow that the right to bear arms was unlimited, however.

From Blackstone through the 19th-century cases, commentators and courts routinely explained that the right was not a right to keep and carry any weapon whatsoever in any manner whatsoever and for whatever purpose. For example, the majority of the 19th-century courts to consider the question held that the prohibitions on carrying concealed weapons were lawful under the Second Amendment or state analogues. Although we do not undertake an exhaustive historical analysis today of the full scope of the Second Amendment, nothing in our opinion should be taken to cast doubt on longstanding prohibitions on possession of firearms by felons and the mentally ill, or laws forbidding the carrying of firearms in sensitive places such as schools and government buildings or laws imposing conditions and qualifications on the commercial sale of arms.

The Court added that "another important limitation on the right" was that it was limited to those weapons "in common use at the time." And in a footnote, the Court noted that "[we] identify these presumptively lawful regulatory measures only as examples; our list does not purport to be exhaustive.”

Turning to the constitutionality of the particular District of Columbia statute at issue, the Court rejected what it characterized as an “interest balancing” approach advocated by Justice Breyer in his dissenting opinion.

We know of no other enumerated constitutional right whose core protection has been subjected to a freestanding “interest-balancing” approach. The very enumeration of the right takes out of the hands of government—even the Third Branch of Government—the power to decide on a case-by-case basis whether the right is really worth insisting upon. A constitutional guarantee subject to future judges’ assessments of its usefulness is no constitutional guarantee at all. Constitutional rights are enshrined with the scope they were understood to have when the people adopted them, whether or not future legislatures or (yes) even future judges think that scope too broad....

We are aware of the problem of handgun violence in this country, and we take seriously the concerns raised by the many amici who believe that prohibition of handgun ownership is a solution. The Constitution leaves the District of Columbia a variety of tools for combating that problem, including some measures regulating handguns. But the enshrinement of constitutional rights necessarily takes certain policy choices off the table.

In a dissenting opinion joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, Justice Stevens characterized the question presented as whether the second amendment protects the right to possess and use guns for nonmilitary purposes such as hunting and self-defense. Examining the same language that the Court parsed, he concluded that it did not protect these uses. In his view, the prefatory clause’s omission of any statement of purpose related to hunting or personal self-defense was especially striking in light of the fact that other contemporary statements of similar rights mentioned this purpose. Justice Stevens argued that other portions of the Constitution referred to “the people” in their collective capacity, and that the Court, itself, did not hold that all individual people (for example, convicted felons or the mentally ill) had the right to bear arms. In contemporary discourse, the words “bear arms” meant “to serve as a soldier, do military service, fight.” The word “keep” referred to “the requirement that militia members store their arms at their homes, ready to be used for service when necessary.”

Justice Stevens concluded by arguing that [today’s decision] will surely give rise to a far more active judicial role in making vitally important national policy decisions than was envisioned at any time in the 18th, 19th, or 20th centuries.

The Court properly disclaims any interest in evaluating the wisdom of the specific policy choice challenged in this case, but it fails to pay heed to a far more important policy choice—the choice made by the Framers themselves. The Court would have us believe that over 200 years ago, the Framers made a choice to limit the tools available to elected officials wishing to regulate civilian uses of weapons, and to authorize this Court to use the common-law processes of case-by-case judicial lawmaking to define the contours of acceptable gun control policy. Absent compelling evidence that is nowhere to be found in the Court’s opinion, I could not possibly conclude that the Framers made such a choice.

In a separate dissenting opinion, joined by Justices Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg, Justice Breyer argued that the protection the Amendment provides is not absolute. The Amendment permits government to regulate the interests that it serves. Thus, irrespective of what those interests are—whether they do or do not include an independent interest in self-defense—the majority view cannot be correct unless it can show that the District’s regulation is unreasonable or inappropriate in Second Amendment terms. This the majority cannot do....

[Any] self-defense interest at the time of the Framing could not have focused exclusively upon urban-crime related dangers. Two hundred years ago, most Americans, many living on the frontier, would likely have thought of self-defense primarily in terms of outbreaks of fighting with Indian tribes, rebellions such as Shays’ Rebellion, marauders, and crime-related dangers to travelers on the roads, on footbaths, or along waterways....

The majority derides my approach as “judge empowering.” I take this criticism seriously, but I do not think it accurate....

The majority’s methodology is, in my view, substantially less transparent than mine....

Given the purposes for which the Framers enacted the Second Amendment, how should it be applied to modern-day circumstances that they could not have anticipated? Assume for argument’s sake that the Framers did intend the Amendment to offer a degree of self-defense protection. Does that mean that the Framers also intended to guarantee the right to possess a loaded gun near swimming pools, parks, and playgrounds? That they would not have cared about the children who might pick up a loaded gun on their parents’ bedside table? That they (who certainly showed concern for the risk of fire) would have lacked concern for the risk of accidental deaths or suicides that readily accessible loaded handguns in urban areas might bring? Unless we believe that they intended future generations to ignore such matters, answering questions such as the questions in this case requires judgment—judicial judgment exercised within a framework for constitutional analysis that guides that judgment and which makes its exercise transparent. One cannot answer those questions by combining inclusive historical research with judicial ipse dixit.

Note: Text and “Original Public Meaning”

1. The role of text. Consider the following view: “Whatever else you might think, you should agree with one proposition: The text of the Constitution is binding.” On this view, judges have a duty of fidelity above all to the Constitution’s words. If the Second Amendment question is difficult, it is because judges cannot be sure what the words mean, just by reading them. Actually that happens a lot. The First Amendment protects “the freedom of speech,” but it is not clear, in the abstract, whether it forbids restrictions on commercial advertising, on libel, on hate speech, and on campaign finance regulation. Consider, then, the following view: “Of course the text is binding, but it leaves so many hard questions unresolved!”

2. The original meaning. Contemporary “originalists” usually argue that the Constitution’s meaning is settled by asking about its “original public meaning.” See A. Scalia, A Matter of Interpretation (1998); Solum, Originalist Methodology, 84 U. Chi. L. Rev. 269 (2017). If we are speaking about a provision ratified in 1787, the question is: What was the public meaning of that provision, at the time that it was ratified?

While that is the dominant view, some people think that we should investigate not the original public meaning, but the intentions of those who wrote and/or ratified constitutional provisions. The two views about originalism will often lead in the same direction, but they are importantly different. If you ask about original public meaning, you are asking about something that seems objective, whereas if you ask about original intentions, you are asking about what is inside people’s minds. And if you ask about original meaning, you will focus on what We the People, the Constitution’s ratifiers, thought—not on what the Constitution’s drafters thought.

Note that if you investigate the original meaning, you might find concrete answers to concrete questions. Perhaps the original meaning of the Second Amendment was that individuals have a right to possess firearms. Perhaps the original meaning of the First Amendment was that commercial advertising can be regulated. But if you investigate the original meaning, you might find instead that some provisions were originally meant to be broad concepts whose specific meaning is not meant to be frozen in time. In that case, judges might be licensed to decide on specific meanings. If so, originalism would leave important gaps. The central point is that for originalists, the initial question is always historical.

3. The authority of the original meaning. You might ask why, exactly, the original meaning is binding. Here are three kinds of answers: (1) If the Constitution is law, it just follows that the text, as originally understood, is binding. That's what it means for something to be law. (2) If judges are interpreting the Constitution, they must ask about the original meaning. That's what it means to interpret a text. If the judges do not focus on the original meaning, they are not engaged in interpretation at all. (3) Originalism is justified on pragmatic grounds. It promotes stability; it ensures that the meaning of the Constitution does not change over time. It reduces the discretion of judges, which can be a real threat to self-rule. It ensures that We the People are ultimately in charge. As Justice Antonin Scalia put it, "If you somehow adopt a philosophy that the Constitution itself is not static, but rather, it morphs from age to age to say whatever it ought to say—which is probably whatever the people would want it to say—you've eliminated the whole purpose of a constitution. And that's essentially what the 'living constitution' leaves you with." All Things Considered, "Scalia Vigorously Defends a 'Dead' Constitution," NPR, April 28, 2008.

4. The Second Amendment. Both the majority and Justice Stevens's dissent are preoccupied with the task of determining how the language of the second amendment would have been understood in the late eighteenth century. What are we to make of the fact that the justices, all presumably acting in good faith and working with the same historical materials, read the text differently? That the different readings correlate with the widely perceived split between the "conservative" and "liberal" justices? It might, be a problem, for originalism, that when originalist judges seem to be affected by their political predilections. See F. Cross, The Failed Promise of Originalism (2013). How much of a problem is that?

5. Original meaning and historical change. If constitutional interpretation consists of uncovering the meaning that people would have attached to words at the time the words were written, how are we to make sense of changed circumstances? Consider, in this regard, the Court's assertion that second amendment protection is not limited to weapons that the framers knew about. Did the "original public meaning" of "arms" as used in the second amendment include rifles, machine guns, and automatic pistols, none of which had been invented in the eighteenth century? If not, are these weapons nonetheless covered because the framers, if they had thought about the matter, would have included these weapons in their definition of arms? How do we know that? If the text allows us to take account of weapons that did not exist at the time of framing, then what about other circumstances that did not exist, like widespread urbanization or increases in gun violence?

6. Original public meaning and discretion. The Court insists that its approach precludes considerations of policy and that “[a] constitutional guarantee subject to future judges’ assessments of its usefulness is no constitutional guarantee at all.” Yet the Court strongly implies that the second amendment right does not extend to the carrying of concealed weapons, the possession of weapons by felons or the mentally ill, or the possession of weapons in “sensitive places.” Does the original public meaning of the text support these limitations? If not, and if the Court’s assessment of the “usefulness” of a constitutional guarantee has no role in constitutional interpretation, where do the limitations come from?

7. Justice Breyer’s approach. According to Justice Breyer, interpreting the second amendment requires the exercise of “judicial judgment [within] a framework of constitutional analysis that guides that judgment and which makes its exercise transparent.” Is “judicial judgment” different from the sort of public policy judgments that a legislator would make? How, precisely, are these judgments constrained by “a framework of constitutional analysis”? If the justices are in fact deciding cases by reference to their personal value preferences, are these decisions made legitimate by the fact that justices are doing so transparently?

8. Stun guns. In Caetano v. Massachusetts, 136 S. Ct. 1027 (2016), the Court disapproved of three reasons given by a lower court to justify the state’s categorical ban on stun guns.

The [Massachusetts] court offered three explanations to support its holding that the Second Amendment does not extend to stun guns. First, the court explained that stun guns are not protected because they “were not in common use at the time of the Second Amendment’s enactment.” This is inconsistent with Heller’s clear statement that the Second Amendment “extends...to...arms...that were not in existence at the time of the founding.” District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 582 (2008).

The court next asked whether stun guns are “dangerous per se at common law and unusual,” in an attempt to apply one “important limitation on the right to keep and carry arms,” Heller, 554 U.S. at 627; see id. (referring to “the historical tradition of prohibiting the carrying of ‘dangerous and unusual weapons’”). In so doing, the court concluded that stun guns are “unusual” because they are “a thoroughly modern invention.”...By equating “unusual” with “in common use at the time of the Second Amendment’s enactment,” the court’s second explanation is the same as the first; it is inconsistent with Heller for the same reason.

Finally, the court used “a contemporary lens” and found “nothing in the record to suggest that [stun guns] are readily adaptable to use in the military.”... But Heller rejected the proposition “that only those weapons useful in warfare are protected.” 554 U.S. at 624-25.

For these three reasons, the explanation the Massachusetts court offered for upholding the law contradicts this Court’s precedent....

With a more elaborate opinion, Justice Alito (joined by Justice Thomas) concurred in the judgment. The reasoning of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, he wrote, “defies our decision in Heller, which rejected as ‘bordering on the frivolous’ the argument ‘that only those arms in existence in the 18th century are protected by the Second Amendment.’ 554 U.S. at 582....[T]he pertinent Second Amendment inquiry is whether stun guns are commonly possessed by law-abiding citizens for lawful purposes today....While less popular than handguns, stun guns are widely owned and accepted as a legitimate means of self-defense across the country. Massachusetts’ categorical ban of such weapons therefore violates the Second Amendment.”

Justice Alito further emphasized that the Second Amendment “vindicates the ‘basic right’ of ‘individual self-defense,’” and noted that the defendant had acquired the stun gun in order to defend herself against a violent ex-boyfriend. He concluded that “[t]he decision below [does] a grave disservice to vulnerable individuals like Caetano who must defend themselves because the State will not. ...The Supreme Judicial Court suggested that Caetano could have simply gotten a firearm to defend herself....But the right to bear other weapons is ‘no answer’ to a ban on the possession of protected arms. Heller, 554 U.S. at 629. Moreover, a weapon is an effective means of self-defense only if one is prepared to use it, and it is presumptuous to tell Caetano she should have been ready to shoot the father of her two young children if she wanted to protect herself. Courts should not be in the business of demanding that citizens use more force for self-defense than they are comfortable wielding.”

McCulloch v. Maryland

17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819)

[This was an action brought by John James, for himself and the state of Maryland, against James McCulloch, cashier of a branch of the Bank of the United States. James alleged that McCulloch had failed to pay a state tax assessed against the bank. The court below held for the plaintiff. For background, see the Note following the opinion.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

In the case now to be determined, the defendant, a sovereign State, denies the obligation of a law enacted by the legislature of the Union, and the plaintiff, on his part, contests the validity of an act which has been passed by the legislature of that State. The constitution of our country, in its most interesting and vital parts, is to be considered; the conflicting powers of the government of the Union and of its members, as marked in that constitution, are to be discussed; and an opinion given, which may essentially influence the great operations of the government. No tribunal can approach such a question without a deep sense of its importance, and of the awful responsibility involved in its decision. But it must be decided peacefully, or remain a source of hostile legislation, perhaps of hostility of a still more serious nature; and if it is to be so decided, by this tribunal alone can the decision be made. On the Supreme Court of the United States has the constitution of our country devolved this important duty.

The first question made in the cause is, has Congress power to incorporate a bank?

It has been truly said, that this can scarcely be considered as an open question, entirely unprejudiced by the former proceedings of the nation respecting it. The principle now contested was introduced at a very early period of our history, has been recognized by many successive legislatures, and has been acted upon by the judicial department, in cases of peculiar delicacy, as a law of undoubted obligation.

It will not be denied, that a bold and daring usurpation might be resisted, after an acquiescence still longer and more complete than this. But it is conceived that a doubtful question [ought] to receive a considerable impression from that practice. An exposition of the constitution, deliberately established by legislative acts, on the faith of which an immense property has been advanced, ought not to be lightly disregarded.

The power now contested was exercised by the first Congress elected under the present constitution. The bill for incorporating the bank of the United States did not steal upon an unsuspecting legislature, and pass unobserved. Its principle was completely understood, and was opposed with equal zeal and ability. After being resisted, first in the fair and open field of debate, and afterwards in the executive cabinet, with as much persevering talent as any measure has ever experienced, and being supported by arguments which convinced minds as pure and as intelligent as this country can boast, it became a law. The original act was permitted to expire; but a short experience of the embarrassments to which the refusal to revive it exposed the government, convinced those who were most prejudiced against the measure of its necessity, and induced the passage of the present law. It would require no ordinary share of intrepidity to assert that a measure adopted under these circumstances was a bold and plain usurpation, to which the constitution gave no countenance.

These observations belong to the cause; but they are not made under the impression that, were the question entirely new, the law would be found irreconcilable with the constitution.

In discussing this question, the counsel for the State of Maryland have deemed it of some importance, in the construction of the constitution, to consider that instrument not as emanating from the people, but as the act of sovereign and independent States. The powers of the general government, it has been said, are delegated by the States, who alone are truly sovereign; and must be exercised in subordination to the States, who alone possess supreme dominion.

It would be difficult to sustain this proposition. The Convention which framed the constitution was indeed elected by the State legislatures. But the instrument, when it came from their hands, was a mere proposal, without obligation, or pretensions to it. It was reported to the then existing Congress of the United States, with a request that it might "be submitted to a Convention of Delegates, chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its Legislature, for their assent and ratification." This mode of proceeding was adopted; and by the Convention, by Congress, and by the State Legislatures, the instrument was submitted to the people. They acted upon it in the only manner in which they can act safely, effectively, and wisely, on such a subject, by assembling in Convention. It is true, they assembled in their several States—and where else should they have assembled? No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States, and of compounding the American people into one common mass. Of consequence, when they act, they act in their States. But the measures they adopt do not, on that account, cease to be the measures of the people themselves, or become the measures of the State governments.

From these Conventions the constitution derives its whole authority. The government proceeds directly from the people; is “ordained and established” in the name of the people; and is declared to be ordained, “in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and to their posterity.” The assent of the States, in their sovereign capacity, is implied in calling a Convention, and thus submitting that instrument to the people. But the people were at perfect liberty to accept or reject it; and their act was final. It required not the affirmance, and could not be negatived, by the State governments. The constitution, when thus adopted, was of complete obligation, and bound the State sovereignties....

The government of the Union, then, (whatever may be the influence of this fact on the case), is emphatically, and truly, a government of the people. In form and in substance it emanates from them. Its powers are granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them, and for their benefit.

This government is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers. The principle that it can exercise only the powers granted to it [is] now universally admitted. But the question respecting the extent of the powers actually granted, is perpetually arising, and will probably continue to arise, as long as our system shall exist.

In discussing these questions, the conflicting powers of the general and State governments must be brought into view, and the supremacy of their respective laws, when they are in opposition, must be settled.

If any one proposition could command the universal assent of mankind, we might expect it would be this—that the government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action. This would seem to result necessarily from its nature. It is the government of all; its powers are delegated by all; it represents all, and acts for all. Though any one State may be willing to control its operations, no State is willing to allow others to control them. The nation, on those subjects on which it can act, must necessarily bind its component parts. But this question is not left to mere reason: the people have, in express terms, decided it, by saying, “this constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof,” “shall be the supreme law of the land,” and by requiring that the members of the State legislatures, and the officers of the executive and judicial departments of the States, shall take the oath of fidelity to it....

Among the enumerated powers, we do not find that of establishing a bank or creating a corporation. But there is no phrase in the instrument which, like the articles of confederation, excludes incidental or implied powers; and which requires that every thing granted shall be expressly and minutely described. Even the 10th amendment, which was framed for the purpose of quieting the excessive jealousies which had been excited, omits the word “expressly,” and declares only that the powers “not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people” thus leaving the question, whether the particular power which may become the subject of contest has been delegated to the one government, or prohibited to the other, to depend on a fair construction of the whole instrument. The men who drew and adopted this amendment had experienced the embarrassments resulting from the insertion of this word in the articles of confederation, and probably omitted it to avoid those embarrassments. A constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires, that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves. That this idea was entertained by the framers of the American constitution, is not only to be inferred from the nature of the instrument, but from the language. Why else were some of the limitations, found in the ninth section of the 1st article, introduced? It is also, in some degree, warranted by their having omitted to use any restrictive term which might prevent its receiving a fair and just interpretation. In considering this question, then, we must never forget, that it is a constitution we are expounding.

Although, among the enumerated powers of government, we do not find the word “bank” or “incorporation,” we find the great powers to lay and collect taxes; to borrow money; to regulate commerce; to declare and conduct a war; and to raise and support armies and navies. The sword and the purse, all the external relations, and no inconsiderable portion of the industry of the nation, are entrusted to its government. It can never be pretended that these vast powers draw after them others of inferior importance, merely because they are inferior. Such an idea can never be advanced. But it may with great reason be contended, that a government, entrusted with such ample powers, on the due execution of which the happiness and prosperity of the nation so vitally depends, must also be entrusted with ample means for their execution. The power being given, it is the interest of the nation to facilitate its execution. It can never be their interest, and cannot be presumed to have been their intention, to clog and embarrass its execution by withholding the most appropriate means. Throughout this vast republic, from the St. Croix to the Gulf of Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, revenue is to be collected and expended, armies are to be marched and supported. The exigencies of the nation may require that the treasure raised in the north should be transported to the south, that raised in the east conveyed to the west, or that this order should be reversed. Is that construction of the constitution to be preferred which would render these operations difficult, hazardous, and expensive? Can we adopt that construction, (unless the words imperiously require it,) which would impute to the framers of that instrument, when granting these powers for the public good, the intention of impeding their exercise by withholding a choice of means?...

It is not denied, that the powers given to the government imply the ordinary means of execution. That, for example, of raising revenue, and applying it to national purposes, is admitted to imply the power of conveying money from place to place, as the exigencies of the nation may require, and of employing the usual means of conveyance....

But the constitution of the United States has not left the right of Congress to employ the necessary means, for the execution of the powers conferred on the government, to general reasoning. To its enumeration of powers is added that of making "all laws which shall be necessary and proper, for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution, in the government of the United States, or in any department thereof." The counsel for the State of Maryland have urged various arguments, to prove that this clause, though in terms a grant of power, is not so in effect; but is really restrictive of the general right, which might otherwise be implied, of selecting means for executing the enumerated powers....

[The] argument on which most reliance is placed, is drawn from the peculiar language of this clause. Congress is not empowered by it to make all laws, which may have relation to the powers conferred on the government, but such only as may be "necessary and proper" for carrying them into execution. The word "necessary" is considered as controlling the whole sentence, and as limiting the right to pass laws for the execution of the granted powers, to such as are indispensable, and without which the power would be nugatory. That it excludes the choice of means, and leaves to Congress, in each case, that only which is most direct and simple. Is it true, that this is the sense in which the word "necessary" is always used? Does it always import an absolute physical necessity, so strong, that one thing, to which another may be termed necessary, cannot exist without that other? We think it does not. If reference be had to its use, in the common affairs of the world, or in approved authors, we find that it frequently imports no more than that one thing is convenient, or useful, or essential to another. To employ the means necessary to an end, is generally understood as employing any means calculated to produce the end, and not as being confined to those single means, without which the end would be entirely unattainable. Such is the character of human language, that no word conveys to the mind, in all situations, one single definite idea; and nothing is more common than to use words in a figurative sense. Almost all compositions contain words, which, taken in their rigorous sense, would convey a meaning different from that which is obviously intended. It is essential to just construction, that many words which import something excessive, should be understood in a more mitigated sense—in that sense which common usage justifies. The word “necessary” is of this description. It has not a fixed character peculiar to itself. It admits of all degrees of comparison; and is often connected with other words, which increase or diminish the impression the mind receives of the urgency it imports. A thing may be necessary, very necessary, absolutely or indispensably necessary. To no mind would the same idea be conveyed, by these several phrases. This comment on the word is well illustrated, by the passage cited at the bar, from the 10th section of the 1st article of the constitution. It is, we think, impossible to compare the sentence which prohibits a State from laying “imposts, or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws,” with that which authorizes Congress “to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution” the powers of the general government, without feeling a conviction that the convention understood itself to change materially the meaning of the word “necessary,” by prefixing the word “absolutely.” This word, then, like others, is used in various senses; and, in its construction, the subject, the context, the intention of the person using them, are all to be taken into view.

Let this be done in the case under consideration. The subject is the execution of those great powers on which the welfare of a nation essentially depends. It must have been the intention of those who gave these powers, to insure, as far as human prudence could insure, their beneficial execution. This could not be done by confiding the choice of means to such narrow limits as not to leave it in the power of Congress to adopt any which might be appropriate, and which were conducive to the end. This provision is made in a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs. To have prescribed the means by which government should, in all future time, execute its powers, would have been to change, entirely, the character of the instrument, and give it the properties of a legal code. It would have been an unwise attempt to provide, by immutable rules, for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly, and which can be best provided for as they occur. To have declared that the best means shall not be used, but those alone without which the power given would be nugatory, would have been to deprive the legislature of the capacity to avail itself of experience, to exercise its reason, and to accommodate its legislation to circumstances. If we apply this principle of construction to any of the powers of the government, we shall find it so pernicious in its operation that we shall be compelled to discard it....

So, with respect to the whole penal code of the United States: whence arises the power to punish in cases not prescribed by the constitution? All admit that the government may, legitimately, punish any violation of its laws; and yet, this is not among the enumerated powers of Congress. The right to enforce the observance of law, by punishing its infraction, might be denied with the more plausibility, because it is expressly given in some cases. Congress is empowered "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States," and "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations." The several powers of Congress may exist, in a very imperfect state to be sure, but they may exist and be carried into execution, although no punishment should be inflicted in cases where the right to punish is not expressly given.

Take, for example, the power "to establish post offices and post roads." This power is executed by the single act of making the establishment. But, from this has been inferred the power and duty of carrying the mail along the post road, from one post office to another. And, from this implied power, has again been inferred the right to punish those who steal letters from the post office, or rob the mail. It may be said, with some plausibility, that the right to carry the mail, and to punish those who rob it, is not indispensably necessary to the establishment of a post office and post road. This right is indeed essential to the beneficial exercise of the power, but not indispensably necessary to its existence. So, of the punishment of the crimes of stealing or falsifying a record or process of a Court of the United States, or of perjury in such Court. To punish these offenses is certainly conducive to the due administration of justice. But courts may exist, and may decide the causes brought before them, though such crimes escape punishment.

The baneful influence of this narrow construction in all the operations of the government, and the absolute impracticability of maintaining it without rendering the government incompetent to its great objects, might be illustrated by numerous examples drawn from the constitution, and from our laws....

In ascertaining the sense in which the word "necessary" is used in this clause of the constitution, we may derive some aid from that with which it is associated. Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution" the powers of the government. If the word "necessary" was used in that strict and rigorous sense for which the counsel for the State of Maryland contend, it would be an extraordinary departure from the usual course of the human mind, as exhibited in composition, to add a word, the only possible effect of which is to qualify that strict and rigorous meaning; to present to the mind the idea of some choice of means of legislation not straitened and compressed within the narrow limits for which gentlemen contend.

But the argument which most conclusively demonstrates the error of the construction contended for by the counsel for the State of Maryland, is founded on the intention of the Convention, as manifested in the whole clause. To waste time and argument in proving that, without it, Congress might carry its powers into execution, would be not much less idle than to hold a lighted taper to the sun. As little can it be required to prove, that in the absence of this clause, Congress would have some choice of means. That it might employ those which, in its judgment, would most advantageously effect the object to be accomplished. That any means adapted to the end, any means which tended directly to the execution of the constitutional powers of the government, were in themselves constitutional. This clause, as construed by the State of Maryland, would abridge, and almost annihilate this useful and necessary right of the legislature to select its means. That this could not be intended, is, we should think, had it not been already controverted, too apparent for controversy. We think so for the following reasons:

1st. The clause is placed among the powers of Congress, not among the limitations on those powers.

2nd. Its terms purport to enlarge, not to diminish the powers vested in the government. It purports to be an additional power, not a restriction on those already granted. No reason has been, or can be assigned for thus concealing an intention to narrow the discretion of the national legislature under words which purport to enlarge it....

The result of the most careful and attentive consideration bestowed upon this clause is, that if it does not enlarge, it cannot be construed to restrain the powers of Congress, or to impair the right of the legislature to exercise its best judgment in the selection of measures to carry into execution the constitutional powers of the government. If no other motive for its insertion can be suggested, a sufficient one is found in the desire to remove all doubts respecting the right to legislate on that vast mass of incidental powers which must be involved in the constitution, if that instrument be not a splendid bauble.

We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the constitution must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional....

If a corporation may be employed indiscriminately with other means to carry into execution the powers of the government, no particular reason can be assigned for excluding the use of a bank, if required for its fiscal operations. To use one, must be within the discretion of Congress, if it be an appropriate mode of executing the powers of government. That it is a convenient, a useful, and essential instrument in the prosecution of its fiscal operations, is not now a subject of controversy. All those who have been concerned in the administration of our finances, have concurred in representing its importance and necessity; and so strongly have they been felt, that statesmen of the first class, whose previous opinions against it had been confirmed by every circumstance which can fix the human judgment, have yielded those opinions to the exigencies of the nation. Under the confederation, Congress, justifying the measure by its necessity, transcended perhaps its powers to obtain the advantage of a bank; and our own legislation attests the universal conviction of the utility of this measure. The time has passed away when it can be necessary to enter into any discussion in order to prove the importance of this instrument, as a means to effect the legitimate objects of the government.

But, were its necessity less apparent, none can deny its being an appropriate measure; and if it is, the degree of its necessity, as has been very justly observed, is to be discussed in another place. Should Congress, in the execution of its powers, adopt measures which are prohibited by the constitution; or should Congress, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not entrusted to the government; it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say that such an act was not the law of the land. But where the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects entrusted to the government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity, would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department, and to tread on legislative ground. This court disclaims all pretensions to such a power....

It being the opinion of the Court, that the act incorporating the bank is constitutional; and that the power of establishing a branch in the State of Maryland might be properly exercised by the bank itself, we proceed to inquire

2. Whether the State of Maryland may, without violating the constitution, tax that branch?

That the power of taxation is one of vital importance; that it is retained by the States; that it is not abridged by the grant of a similar power to the government of the Union; that it is to be concurrently exercised by the two governments: are truths which have never been denied. But, such is the paramount character of the constitution, that its capacity to withdraw any subject from the action of even this power, is admitted. The States are expressly forbidden to lay any duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing their inspection laws. If the obligation of this prohibition must be conceded—if it may restrain a State from the exercise of its taxing power on imports and exports; the same paramount character would seem, to restrain, as it certainly may restrain, a State from such other exercise of this power, as is in its nature incompatible with, and repugnant to, the constitutional laws of the Union. A law, absolutely repugnant to another, as entirely repeals that other as if express terms of repeal were used.

On this ground the counsel for the bank place its claim to be exempted from the power of a State to tax its operations. There is no express provision for the case, but the claim has been sustained on a principle which so entirely pervades the constitution, is so intermixed with the materials which compose it, so interwoven with its web, so blended with its texture, as to be incapable of being separated from it, without rendering it into shreds.

This great principle is, that the constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof are supreme; that they control the constitution and laws of the respective States, and cannot be controlled by them. From this, which may be almost termed an axiom, other propositions are deduced as corollaries, on the truth or error of which, and on their application to this case, the cause has been supposed to depend. These are, 1st. that a power to create implies a power to preserve. 2nd. That a power to destroy, if wielded by a different hand, is hostile to, and incompatible with these powers to create and to preserve. 3d. That where this repugnancy exists, that authority which is supreme must control, not yield to that over which it is supreme....

That the power of taxing it by the States may be exercised so as to destroy it, is too obvious to be denied. But taxation is said to be an absolute power, which acknowledges no other limits than those expressly prescribed in the constitution, and like sovereign power of every other description, is trusted to the discretion of those who use it. But the very terms of this argument admit that the sovereignty of the State, in the article of taxation itself, is subordinate to, and may be controlled by the constitution of the United States. How far it has been controlled by that instrument must be a question of construction. In making this construction, no principle not declared, can be admissible, which would defeat the legitimate operations of a supreme government. It is of the very essence of supremacy to remove all obstacles to its action within its own sphere, and so to modify every power vested in subordinate governments, as to exempt its own operations from their own influence. This effect need not be stated in terms. It is so involved in the declaration of supremacy, so necessarily implied in it, that the expression of it could not make it more certain. We must, therefore, keep it in view while construing the constitution.

The argument on the part of the State of Maryland, is, not that the States may directly resist a law of Congress, but that they may exercise their acknowledged powers upon it, and that the constitution leaves them this right in the confidence that they will not abuse it.

Before we proceed to examine this argument, and to subject it to the test of the constitution, we must be permitted to bestow a few considerations on the nature and extent of this original right of taxation, which is acknowledged to remain with the States. It is admitted that the power of taxing the people and their property is essential to the very existence of government, and may be legitimately exercised on the objects to which it is applicable, to the utmost extent to which the government may choose to carry it. The only security against the abuse of this power, is found in the structure of the government itself. In imposing a tax the legislature acts upon its constituents. This is in general a sufficient security against erroneous and oppressive taxation.

The people of a State, therefore, give to their government a right of taxing themselves and their property, and as the exigencies of government cannot be limited, they prescribe no limits to the exercise of this right, resting confidently on the interest of the legislator, and on the influence of the constituents over their representative, to guard them against its abuse. But the means employed by the government of the Union have no such security, nor is the right of a State to tax them sustained by the same theory. Those means are not given by the people of a particular State, not given by the constituents of the legislature, which claim the right to tax them, but by the people of all the States. They are given by all for the benefit of all—and upon theory, should be subjected to that government only which belongs to all....

We find, then, on just theory, a total failure of this original right to tax the means employed by the government of the Union, for the execution of its powers. The right never existed, and the question whether it has been surrendered, cannot arise.

But, waiving this theory for the present, let us resume the inquiry, whether this power can be exercised by the respective States, consistently with a fair construction of the constitution?

That the power to tax involves the power to destroy; that the power to destroy may defeat and render useless the power to create; that there is a plain repugnance, in conferring on one government a power to control the constitutional measures of another, which other, with respect to those very measures, is declared to be supreme over that which exerts the control, are propositions not to be denied. But all inconsistencies are to be reconciled by the magic of the word CONFIDENCE. Taxation, it is said, does not necessarily and unavoidably destroy. To carry it to the excess of destruction would be an abuse, to presume which, would banish that confidence which is essential to all government.

But is this a case of confidence? Would the people of any one State trust those of another with a power to control the most insignificant operations of their State government? We know they would not. Why, then, should we suppose that the people of any one State should be willing to trust those of another with a power to control the operations of a government to which they have confided their most important and most valuable interests? In the legislature of the Union alone, are all represented. The legislature of the Union alone, therefore, can be trusted by the people with the power of controlling measures which concern all, in the confidence that it will not be abused. This, then, is not a case of confidence, and we must consider it as it really is....

If we apply the principle for which the State of Maryland contends, to the constitution generally, we shall find it capable of changing totally the character of that instrument. We shall find it capable of arresting all the measures of the government, and of prostrating it at the foot of the States. [If] the states may tax one instrument, [they] may tax any and every other instrument. [The] American people [did] not design to make their government dependent on the states....

It has also been insisted, that, as the power of taxation in the general and State governments is acknowledged to be concurrent, every argument which would sustain the right of the general government to tax banks chartered by the States, will equally sustain the right of the States to tax banks chartered by the general government.

But the two cases are not on the same reason. The people of all the States have created the general government, and have conferred upon it the general power of taxation. The people of all the States, and the States themselves, are represented in Congress, and, by their representatives, exercise this power. When they tax the chartered institutions of the States, they tax their constituents; and these taxes must be uniform. But, when a State taxes the operations of the government of the United States, it acts upon institutions created, not by their own constituents, but by people over whom they claim no control. It acts upon the measures of a government created by others as well as themselves, for the benefit of others in common with themselves. The difference is that which always exists, and always must exist, between the action of the whole on a part, and the action of a part on the whole—between the laws of a government declared to be supreme, and those of a government which, when in opposition to those laws, is not supreme.

But if the full application of this argument could be admitted, it might bring into question the right of Congress to tax the State banks, and could not prove the right of the States to tax the Bank of the United States....

[We] conclude that the states have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control, the operations of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress....

This opinion does not deprive the States of any resources which they originally possessed. It does not extend to a tax paid by the real property of the bank, in common with the other real property within the State, nor to a tax imposed on the interest which the citizens of Maryland may hold in this institution, in common with other property of the same description throughout the State.

[Reversed.]

Note: Constitutional Methodology and Interpretation in McCulloch

McCulloch resolves several important questions, relating both to the judicial role and to the allocation of powers as between the federal government and the states.

1. Background. The first Bank of the United States was created in 1790, shortly after ratification of the Constitution, to furnish loans to the federal government and to help collect taxes. The constitutional issue was sharply debated. Madison, a member of the House of Representatives, spoke against the bank, claiming that Congress had no constitutional authority to create it. Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, was one of its staunchest supporters and indeed drafted the plan for the bank. Jefferson also opposed the first bank on constitutional grounds, invoking the tenth amendment and venturing as well that “the Constitution allows only the means which are necessary, not merely ‘convenient,’ for effecting the enumerated powers. If such a latitude of construction be allowed to this phrase as to give any non-enumerated power [to Congress,] it would swallow up all the delegated powers, and reduce the whole to one power.” Opinion on the Constitutionality of the Bill for Establishing a National Bank, in 19 Papers of Thomas Jefferson 275, 279–280 (J. Boyd ed., 1974).

In 1811, the bank's charter lapsed, and Congress did not renew it. The private business and banking communities vigorously opposed renewal. In 1815, however, Congress created a second Bank of the United States, responding to a period of considerable economic turmoil following the War of 1812. At this stage, there was little discussion of the constitutional question. Jefferson himself supported the bank, partly in response to political pressures and perceived practical necessities, and Madison wrote that the issue had been settled in favor of its constitutionality. But many states objected to the creation of a second bank and imposed taxes of the sort at issue in McCulloch. To what extent, if any, do you think the decision in McCulloch was or should have been different in 1819 from what it would have been had the issue arisen in 1791?

2. Methods of constitutional interpretation. Note Chief Justice Marshall's remarks on the distinctive character of constitutions and of constitutional interpretation.

Chief Justice Marshall's suggestion that "it is a constitution we are expounding" has been called, by no less an authority than Justice Frankfurter, "the single most important utterance in the literature of constitutional law—most important because most comprehensive and most comprehending." Frankfurter, John Marshall and the Judicial Function, 69 Harv. L. Rev. 217, 219 (1955). But the statement and the interpretive strategies to which it has led are not universally admired. Compare, for example, Justice Frankfurter's suggestion that "precisely because 'it is a constitution we are expounding,' we ought not to take liberties with it." National Mutual Insurance Co. v. Tidewater Transfer Co., 337 U.S. 581, 647 (1949) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting). See also Kurland, Curia Regis: Some Comments on the Divine Right of Kings and Courts to Say What the Law Is, 23 Ariz. L. Rev. 582, 591 (1981), suggesting that, whenever a judge quotes this passage, "you can be sure that the court will be throwing the constitutional text, its history, and its structure to the winds in reaching its conclusion."

Consider the following possible interpretations of Chief Justice Marshall's position: (a) The power-granting provisions of the Constitution should be broadly construed. Those provisions are meant to endure over time. They should be interpreted flexibly as new and unforeseen problems arise. But to say this is emphatically not to say that courts ought to have a license, often or ever, to expand national authority beyond what the Constitution authorizes—or to strike down legislative action on grounds of changed circumstances. (b) All provisions of the Constitution, including those granting powers and those creating rights, should be broadly construed. Constitutions simply do not contain specific answers to all questions for all times. (c) The meaning of the Constitution changes with changing circumstances, in accordance with changing social norms and needs. Judges need not adhere to the original meaning of the text, but must interpret the document flexibly in light of contemporary necessities.

3. Structural approaches to constitutional interpretation. In the view of some, the approach in McCulloch is distinctive in large part because of Chief Justice Marshall's willingness to rely on the "structures and relationships" set up by the Constitution, and not only the text, in resolving constitutional questions.

I am inclined to think well of the method of reasoning from structure and relation. I think well of it, above all, because to succeed it has to make sense—current, practical sense. The textual-explication method, operating on general language, [contains] within itself no guarantee that it will make sense, for a court may always present itself or even see itself as being bound by the stated intent, however nonsensical, of somebody else. [With structural approaches] we can and must begin to argue at once about the practicalities and proprieties of the thing, without getting out dictionaries whose entries will not really respond to the question we are putting. [We] will have to deal with policy and not with grammar.

C. Black, Structure and Relationship in Constitutional Law 22–23 (1969). Consider this objection: Black's position means that the Constitution should be interpreted to mean whatever the judges think it should mean. Once judges are asking about "the practicalities and proprieties," they can do whatever they want. Does a structural approach leave more or less interpretive freedom than a textual approach? Compare Amar, Intratextualism, 112 Harv. L. Rev. 747 (1999), which argues that textualism can impose more than usual discipline if judges look at how constitutional terms are used in different contexts. In support of that view, a narrow version of structural interpretation might see if we can learn about the meaning of a disputed phrase by inquiring into its meaning in a different part of the Constitution. Most obviously, the word "treason," in the impeachment clause, might be construed by looking at the specific definition of "treason" that the Constitution elsewhere provides. Perhaps we could make a lot of progress, in hard cases, by an approach of this kind.

4. The necessary and proper clause; implied powers.

a. What, if anything, does the necessary and proper clause add, in the Court's view, to the constitutional powers granted to the Congress? Does the McCulloch decision recognize implied powers at all? Perhaps it merely recognizes that a power naturally includes the appropriate means for achieving the intended end. Would that be a better understanding of the opinion?

b. The Court’s construction of the necessary and proper clause resolved an extraordinarily important interpretive question that had divided, among others, Thomas Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton. On what does Chief Justice Marshall base his acceptance of the Hamilton position? Note the pertinence of the suggestion that that “provision is made in a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs.”

c. Even with the Court’s interpretation of the necessary and proper clause, it remains to explain how the creation of a national bank is “necessary and proper” to the exercise of one of Congress’s enumerated powers. What enumerated powers are helpful here? Consider Currie, The Constitution in the Supreme Court: State and National Powers, 1801–1835, 49 U. Chi. L. Rev. 887, 932–933 (1982), noting that Chief Justice Marshall “mentioned in passing various enumerated powers to which the creation of a bank might be incidental. [What] is striking is that he made no serious effort to demonstrate how the bank was necessary and proper, or even conducive, to any one of them.” But consider the implications of Chief Justice Marshall’s reference to the extended territory of the United States. Is Hamilton’s explanation persuasive in this regard?

d. What limitations does Chief Justice Marshall recognize on congressional power? The key sentence here, frequently quoted by the Supreme Court throughout its history, is this: “Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.” The Court adds that if Congress enacts a law “for the accomplishment of objects not entrusted to the national government,” and if Congress has acted under the “pretext” of using its enumerated powers, the law will be invalidated. Does this mean that the Court will scrutinize the motivations of legislators? (The benefits and disadvantages of motivation-centered inquiries are explored in Chapters 3 and 5 infra.) What else might it mean? See Barnett, Necessary and Proper, 44 UCLA L. Rev. 745 (1997).

5. The tenth amendment. The second principal provision interpreted in McCulloch is the tenth amendment. How does Chief Justice Marshall construe this provision? Does the tenth amendment add anything of substance to the Constitution in Chief Justice Marshall’s view? Perhaps it does not, but the tenth amendment might nonetheless have important civic purposes, by reminding everyone of the limited nature of the federal government. Note that in the Articles of Confederation the word “expressly” preceded the limitation analogous to the tenth amendment. How much support does the deletion of that word add to Chief Justice Marshall's construction?

6. Representation reinforcement. Chief Justice Marshall finds an implicit prohibition on state taxation of the national bank. What constitutional provision does the tax violate?

Chief Justice Marshall's analysis of the problem is largely an inquiry not into the constitutional text and history but into the operations of representative government. "In imposing a tax the legislature acts upon its constituents. This is in general a sufficient security against erroneous and oppressive taxation." And in "the legislature of the Union alone, are all represented." The claim here is that the power to elect representatives will act as a safeguard against the abuse of political power by elected officials. The judicial role is defined by reference to the understanding that the political process itself will ensure against improper conduct. Does Chief Justice Marshall overlook the possibility that constituents, or subgroups thereof, might not have sufficient political power to prevent oppression?

Chief Justice Marshall also indicates that the ordinary presumption—that the processes of representation are an effective safeguard against abuse—disappears when a state imposes taxes on a national instrumentality because in so doing, the state is harming people who are not represented in the state legislature. Judicial intervention is justified in order to make up for the absence of political remedies for those burdened by legislative action. But if citizens generally are oppressed by state taxation of national banks, doesn't Congress have the power to enact a law to outlaw state taxation? Why is judicial intervention necessary or appropriate? Consider the possibility that the immunity is conferred by the statute creating the bank, interpreted in light of the concerns about representation.

Note, by contrast, Chief Justice Marshall's suggestion that, while the federal government has an (implicit) immunity from state taxation, states may not be immune from federal taxation.

How does Chief Justice Marshall's theory of representation operate differently here? For further discussion of intergovernmental immunity, see Chapter 2 infra.

McCulloch might be understood as the foundation for the notion of "representation-reinforcement" as a justification of and guide for judicial action—an occasionally prominent theme in constitutional law. The central idea is that the judicial role is to make up for defects in the ordinary operation of representative government; the source of judicial decision is a breakdown in political processes. See generally J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust (1980). How does this approach differ from that in Marbury? The problem of representation-reinforcement is taken up in Chapters 2, 3, and 5 infra.

3. Natural Law and Natural Rights

CALDER v. BULL, 3 U.S. (3 DALL.) 386 (1798). The Connecticut legislature ordered a new trial in a will contest, setting aside a judicial decree. The Court unanimously held that the legislature's action was not an "ex post facto Law" forbidden the states by article I, section 10. Although Justices Chase and Iredell agreed on the "ex post facto" issue, they disagreed over the appropriate role of "natural law" in constitutional interpretation. Justice Chase wrote:

"I cannot subscribe to the omnipotence of a state legislature, or that it is absolute and without control; although its authority should not be expressly restrained by the constitution, or fundamental law of the state. The people of the United States erected their constitutions or forms of government, to establish justice, to promote the general welfare, to secure the blessings of liberty, and to protect their persons and property from violence. The purposes for which men enter into society will determine the nature and terms of the social compact; and as they are the foundation of the legislative power, they will decide what are the proper objects of it. The nature, and ends of legislative power will limit the exercise of it. This fundamental principle flows from the very nature of our free republican governments. [There] are acts which the federal, or state legislature cannot do, without exceeding their authority. There are certain vital principles in our free republican governments, which will determine and overrule an apparent and flagrant abuse of legislative power. [An] act of the legislature (for I cannot call it a law), contrary to the great first principles in the social compact, cannot be considered a rightful exercise of legislative authority. [A] law that punishes a citizen for an innocent [action;] a law that destroys or impairs the lawful private contracts of citizens; a law that makes a man a judge in his own cause; or a law that takes property from A. and gives it to B.: it is against all reason and justice, for a people to entrust a legislature with such powers; and therefore, it cannot be presumed that they have done it. The genius, the nature and the spirit of our state governments, amount to a prohibition of such acts of legislation; and the general principles of law and reason forbid them. [To] maintain that our federal, or state legislature possesses such powers, if they had not been expressly restrained, would, in my opinion, be a political heresy, altogether inadmissible in our free republican governments." (Chase upheld the legislature's action, however, on the ground that it impaired no vested right.)

Justice Iredell replied: "[Some] speculative jurists have held, that a legislative act against natural justice must, in itself, be void; but I cannot think that, under such a government any court of justice would possess a power to declare it so. [It] has been the policy of all the American states, [and] of the people of the United States, [to] define with precision the objects of the legislative power, and to restrain its exercise within marked and settled boundaries. If any act of congress, or of the legislature of a state, violates those constitutional provisions, it is unquestionably void. [If,] on the other hand, the legislature of the Union, or the legislature of any member of the Union, shall pass a law, within the general scope of their constitutional power, the court cannot pronounce it to be void, merely because it is, in their judgment, contrary to the principles of natural justice. The ideas of natural justice are regulated by no fixed standard: the ablest and the purest men have differed upon the subject; and all that the court could properly say, in such an event, would be, that the legislature (possessed of an equal right of opinion) had passed an act which, in the opinion of the judges, was inconsistent with the abstract principles of natural justice. [If] the legislature pursue the authority delegated to them, their acts are valid. [In such circumstances,] they exercise the discretion vested in them by the people, to whom alone they are responsible for the faithful discharge of their trust.”

Note: Natural Law, Moral Argument, and the Supreme Court

In one form or another, the dispute between Justice Chase and Justice Iredell has proved fundamental to constitutional law.

1. The original understanding. Marbury v. Madison rested in part on the understanding that a written Constitution necessarily contemplated judicial enforcement of its terms. Otherwise, the restrictions imposed by the Constitution would be meaningless. We have seen that the argument is in some respects vulnerable. But Justice Chase goes further. His position is that there is an “unwritten” Constitution, consisting of principles of natural law, which is enforceable as against the states even though it cannot be found in the Constitution.

Justice Iredell’s response is that the very fact of a written Constitution is authority against the position that courts may call on principles of natural justice. But does Justice Chase’s position itself show that at least some of the framers and ratifiers believed in the existence of a natural law supplement to the Constitution’s explicit prohibitions? Sherry, The Founders’ Unwritten Constitution, 54 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1127 (1987), contains an extended argument for that view, with multiple references. See also Grey, Do We Have an Unwritten Constitution?, 27 Stan. L. Rev. 703 (1975); Grey, Origins of the Unwritten Constitution, 30 Stan. L. Rev. 843 (1978), suggesting that the framers believed that judges would enforce a category of natural law constraints on state and federal legislation. But see J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust (1980), for a skeptical view. For provocative treatments, emphasizing the centrality of liberty, see R. Barnett, Restoring the Lost Constitution (rev. ed. 2013); Barnett, Our Republican Constitution (2016).

2. Judges as political philosophers? What would be the advantages and disadvantages of recognizing judicial authority of the sort claimed by Justice Chase? Think, for example, of the following questions: (1) Are maximum hour laws unconstitutional? (2) Are rent control laws unconstitutional? (3) Must states recognize same-sex marriage? (4) Does the first amendment protect pornography? (5) What are the limits of the federal government's power to look at people's email and social media postings? (6) Can the national government ban people from majority-Muslim nations from getting visas? Consider M. Perry, The Courts, the Constitution, and Human Rights 100–101 (1982):

In any recent generation, certain political issues have been widely perceived to be fundamental moral issues as well—issues that challenge and unsettle conventional ways of understanding the moral universe and that serve as occasions for forging alternative ways of understanding....Our electorally accountable policymaking institutions are not well suited to deal with such issues in a way that is faithful to the notion of moral evolution. [Those] institutions, when finally they confront such issues at all, tend simply to rely on established moral conventions and to refuse to see in such issues occasions for moral revaluation and possible moral growth. [Executive] and especially legislative officials tend to deal with fundamental political-moral problems, at least highly controversial ones, by reflexive reference to the established moral conventions of the greater part of their particular constituencies.

See also A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch (1962); R. Dworkin, Freedom's Law (1997); Dworkin, The Forum of Principle, 56 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 469 (1981); Wellington, Common Law Rules and Constitutional Double Standards: Some Notes on Adjudication, 83 Yale L.J. 221 (1973).

But don't executive and legislative officials think about what morality requires? Aren't they subject to their constituents, who certainly think about that issue? Perry's view may depend on an unduly skeptical view of the political process. In its most extreme form, this view treats politics as an unprincipled power struggle among self-interested groups, or factions. This view has played a prominent role in modern political and economic theory. See Stigler, The Theory of Economic Regulation, 2 Bell. J.L. & Mgmt. Sci. 3 (1971); R. Dahl, A Preface to Democratic Theory (1956). In this view, Justice Chase's classic violation of natural law—taking from A to give to B—is a frequent occurrence. If the skeptical view is accepted, an active judicial role in deciding moral issues might seem attractive. At the very least, it might seem to make sense to embrace an active judicial role in preventing any situation in which legislators steal from A to give to B. (But how do we know that A deserved what he had in the first place?)

Consider the possibility that Perry's view says too little about the role of morality in politics, and is rooted as well in an unduly optimistic view of judicial decisionmaking. Whether representatives in fact respond mechanically to political pressures is a sharply disputed question. A. Maass, Congress and the Common Good (1983), suggests that members of Congress often engage in some form of deliberation about what the public good requires. See also S. Kelman, Making Public Policy (1985). If representative processes embody a large measure of deliberation—as Madison anticipated—the comparative advantage claimed for courts may not exist at all. Indeed, the comparative advantage may not exist if citizens themselves deliberate and if representatives respond to them. Many of the largest advances in American conceptions of rights have come from the democratic process, not the courts; consider the Americans with Disabilities Act.

Are justices likely to know what the right answers are? What makes judges so good at thinking well about difficult moral issues? One might respond to a natural law court in the same way as did Judge Learned Hand: “For myself it would be most irksome to be ruled by a bevy of nine Platonic Guardians, even if I knew how to choose them, which I assuredly do not.” L. Hand, The Bill of Rights 73 (1958). Consider also Hand’s claim that “[a] society so riven that the spirit of moderation is gone, no court can save; a society where that spirit flourishes, no court need save; and in a society which evades its responsibilities by thrusting upon the courts the nurture of that spirit, that spirit in the end will perish.” L. Hand, The Contribution of an Independent Judiciary to Civilization (1944), in The Spirit of Liberty 155, 164 (I. Dilliard ed., 1960).

See also A. Cox, The Role of the Supreme Court in American Government 116 (1976): “I should be no less irked than Judge Hand if the Supreme Court were to void an ordinance adopted in the open Town Meeting in the New England town in which I live—a meeting in which all citizens can participate—but I should have little such feeling about a statute enacted by the Massachusetts legislature in the normal political pattern, and none about a law made in that pattern by the Congress of the United States.” Does this view undervalue the fact that state and federal laws are at least in some sense the product of representative processes? For an emphasis on what the author, himself an influential judge, sees as the unmistakably political nature of Supreme Court decisions, see R. Posner, How Judges Think (2008).

3. The ninth amendment. The ninth amendment provides, “The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.” Does the amendment provide a textual grounding for the enforcement of natural rights that are not, themselves, enumerated in the text? Consider the following views:

a. Testimony of Robert Bork, Nomination of Robert H. Bork to Be Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States: Hearings Before the S. Comm. on the Judiciary, 100th Cong., 249 (1987): “I do not think you can use the ninth amendment unless you know something of what it means. For example, if you had an amendment that says ‘Congress shall make no’ and then there is an ink blot and you cannot read the rest of it and that is the only copy you have, I do not think the court can make up what might be under the ink blot.”

b. Barnett, The Ninth Amendment: It Means What It Says, 81 Tex. L. Rev. 1, 1 (2006): “[The] evidence establishes that the Ninth Amendment actually meant at the time of its enactment what it appears now to say: the unenumerated (natural) rights that people possessed prior to the formation of government, and which they retain afterwards, should be treated in the same manner as those (natural) rights that were enumerated in the Bill of Rights.

c. Seidman, Our Unsettled Ninth Amendment: An Essay on Unenumerated Rights and the Impossibility of Textualism, 98 Cal. L. Rev. 2129 (2010): “Because of the Ninth Amendment, the Constitution does not ‘deny’ or ‘disparage [natural] rights, but neither does it embrace or imply them. The Amendment puts off to another day a final reckoning of the extent to which we are bound by constitutional text.”

d. McConnell, The Ninth Amendment in Light of Text and History, 2010 Cato S. Ct. Rev. 13, 23 “[The] rights retained by the people are indeed individual natural rights, but those rights enjoy precisely the same status, and are protected in the same way, as before the Bill of Rights was added to the Constitution. They are not relinquished, denied, or disparaged. Nor do natural rights become ‘constitutional rights.’ They are simply what all retained rights were before the enactment of the Bill of Rights: a guide to equitable interpretation and a rationale for narrow construction of statutes that might be thought to infringe them, but not superior to explicit positive law.”

For further discussion of the ninth amendment, see Chapter 6, section F1, infra.

D. POLITICAL CONTROL OVER THE SUPREME COURT

This section examines how the Court's authority is subject to external political control.

Note: Amendment, Appointment, Impeachment, and the Election Returns

1. Constitutional amendment. The most straightforward way for the people to respond to a Supreme Court decision with which they disagree is to amend the Constitution. But an amendment is exceedingly difficult to obtain. Under article V, the amending process may begin only if two-thirds of both Houses propose an amendment or if the legislatures of two-thirds of the states call for a constitutional convention. No amendment may be adopted until it is ratified by three-fourths of the states. These requirements were a deliberate effort to make it difficult to amend the Constitution. Why were constitutional amendments to be discouraged? And is discouraging them a good idea?

Consider in this regard Jefferson's view that the Constitution should be rewritten by the people every generation, on the theory that without frequent constitution-making there would be too little participation in and concern for the affairs of government. See Letter to Samuel Kercheval, July 12, 1816, in The Portable Thomas Jefferson 552, 558–561 (M. Peterson ed., 1975). Note in particular the view that [some] men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence, and deem them like the ark of the covenant, too sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the men of the preceding age a wisdom more than human, and suppose what they did to be beyond amendment. I knew that age well. [It] was very like the present, but without the experience of the present. [Let] us [not] weakly believe that one generation is not as capable as another of taking care of itself, and of ordering its own affairs....The dead have no rights.

Id. at 558–559. See generally H. Arendt, On Revolution (1965), for discussion of Jefferson's preference for citizen participation in affairs of government and for frequent constitutional revision.

Madison rejected such proposals on the ground that they would produce “the most violent struggle between the parties interested in reviving and those interested in reforming the antecedent state of property.” Letter to Thomas Jefferson, Feb. 4, 1790, in The Mind of the Founder 232 (M. Meyers ed., 1969). Compare The Federalist Nos. 10 and 51, section A, supra. Jefferson’s contrary view was that even turbulence “is productive of good. It prevents the degeneracy of government, and nourishes a general attention to the public affairs. I hold that a little rebellion now and then is a good thing.” Letter to Madison, Jan. 30, 1787, in The Portable Thomas Jefferson, supra, at 416–417. Under this view, frequent revision of basic institutional arrangements might be welcomed.

But as Madison’s view suggests, the stability of the Constitution is often taken to be one of its great virtues. Consider in this regard the discussion of the separation of the realm of law and the realm of politics in The Federalist No. 78 and in Marbury itself. If frequent constitutional amendments were permitted, that distinction would be much less crisp; the effect of insulating certain decisions from politics would be undermined. Would that be a good or a bad thing? See generally Citizens for the Constitution, “Great and Extraordinary Occasions”: Developing Guidelines for Constitutional Change (1999); S. Holmes, Passions and Constraint (1995); S. Levinson, ed., Responding to Imperfection (1995).

Note also that many states make it possible to amend their state constitutions through simple referendum. As a result, state constitutions are frequently altered. Thus, the Alabama Constitution has been amended over 700 times; the New York Constitution, over 200 times; the California Constitution, over 500 times; and the Texas Constitution, over 300 times. Under such regimes, the public is frequently involved in the process of constitutional decisionmaking—in such areas as budget deficits, permissible tax levels, environmental protection, and discrimination on the basis of race and sexual orientation. Consider the fact that constitutional amendments have frequently been on the national agenda in the last two decades. Might systems that allow frequent amendment operate as a salutary check on judicial review, or do they erase the advantages of ensuring that an insulated body will decide constitutional issues? Note also that many other nations, especially those emerging from communism, make it relatively easy to amend the Constitution.

There are now over two dozen amendments to the federal Constitution. Four of them represent successful efforts to overturn decisions by the Supreme Court. See U.S. Const. amends. XI (limiting jurisdiction of federal courts to hear suits brought against states), XIV (deeming Americans of African descent citizens of the United States), XVI (expanding power of Congress to tax), XXVI (setting voting age). Numerous other amendments have been offered but thus far without success. They have dealt with, for example, gay marriage, child labor, abortion, school desegregation, school prayer, flag burning, the line-item veto, and a balanced budget. Proposed constitutional amendments were especially popular in the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s. Consider also the lengthy history of the proposed equal rights amendment, discussed in Chapter 5 infra, which would have provided that equality under the law may not be denied on the basis of sex. See J. Mansbridge, Why We Lost the ERA (1986). For what issues is constitutional amendment desirable?

Where does an individual rights provision fit in this framework? Consider the efforts in the wake of Texas v. Johnson, Chapter 7 infra, to amend the Constitution to protect the American flag against desecration. Many constitutional scholars argued vigorously that it would be especially risky to allow a constitutional amendment to counteract a Supreme Court decision protecting individual rights. Might there be a Jeffersonian response to this concern?

Even if efforts at amendment are unsuccessful, perhaps they should be welcomed because of the effect that they have on the public and the Court itself. Consider the possibility that amendment efforts, like political pressures generally, exercise some influence over Supreme Court decisions. The effort to amend the Constitution might be a salutary part of an ongoing conversation among the Court, other branches, and the public at large.

If a constitutional convention were called, would its authority be limited to particular issues or would it have general authority to amend the constitution as it chooses? See Special Constitutional Convention Study Committee, American Bar Association, Amendment of the Constitution by the Convention Method under Article V (1974). Should a court decide the issue? See the materials on the political question doctrine, section F infra.

On the amending process generally, see S. Levinson, ed., Responding to Imperfection (1995); C. Vose, Constitutional Change: Amendment Politics and Supreme Court Litigation Since 1900 (1972); Corwin and Ramsey, The Constitutional Law of Constitutional Amendment, 26 Notre Dame Law. 165 (1951); Dellinger, The Legitimacy of Constitutional Change: Rethinking the Amendment Process, 97 Harv. L. Rev. 386 (1983); Symposium on the Article V Convention Process, 66 Mich. L. Rev. 837 (1968). For an excellent overview, see D. Kyvig, Explicit and Authentic Acts: Amending the U.S. Constitution 1776–1995 (1996). For recommendations, see Citizens for the Constitution, “Great and Extraordinary Occasions”: Developing Guidelines for Constitutional Change (1999).

Note also that many nations allow constitutional amendment through a process that is far less arduous than the American one, and also that some constitutions allow legislatures to “overrule” decisions of the highest court. Consider in this regard article 33 of the Canadian Constitution Act of 1982, which allows Parliament to declare expressly that a particular statute shall stand despite its conflict with many (not all) of the enumerated rights of the citizen.

2. The power to appoint. Members of the Supreme Court are appointed by the President, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate. As a result, the President has an opportunity to put justices on the Court who share his views. The appointing power has been important in controlling the direction of the Supreme Court. President Roosevelt responded to the efforts of the Court to invalidate aspects of the New Deal by appointing, among others, Justices Black, Douglas, Frankfurter, and Jackson. All of them turned out to be generally sympathetic to government regulation of the economy, although there developed sharp disputes over the scope of judicial protection of individual rights. After election campaigns marked by an emphasis on obtaining “strict constructionists” on the Court, President Nixon appointed Chief Justice Burger and Justices Blackmun, Powell, and Rehnquist. Those appointments led to a more conservative Court and brought about some significant changes of direction, albeit of disputed scope. See V. Blasi, ed., The Burger Court: The Counterrevolution That Wasn’t (1983).

President Reagan’s appointees—Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices O’Connor, Scalia, and Kennedy—generally moved the Court in directions favored by President Reagan, although on several issues of individual autonomy—for example, abortion and gay rights—the cohort of Reagan-appointed justices has been divided. Similarly, President Clinton’s appointees—Justices Ginsburg and Breyer—have generally resisted the Court’s more conservative turn. President George W. Bush’s appointees—Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito—have not disappointed the expectations of the Bush White House, and Justices Sotomayor and Kagan have generally been the liberal voices that the Obama administration expected them to be. Early evidence strongly suggests that Justice Gorsuch will be the conservative member sought by President Trump.

The overall picture, then, is that Supreme Court appointees vote in ways that broadly fit with the hopes and expectations of appointing Presidents, at least over the past century or so. But Presidents have sometimes been surprised to find that their appointees’ performance on the bench was more “liberal” or more “conservative” than expected. President Eisenhower, for example, appointed Earl Warren as Chief Justice, relying in part on Warren’s conservative, law-and-order reputation as governor of California. Eisenhower later claimed that the appointment was one of the worst mistakes he had ever made. Eisenhower also appointed Justice Brennan, whose record turned out to be quite different from what had been expected. Some of the votes of Justices O'Connor, Kennedy, and Souter were a disappointment to many supporters of Presidents Reagan and Bush; consider their failure to vote to overrule Roe v. Wade, discussed in Chapter 6 infra.

Events of this sort indicate that the appointments process is not a guarantee of political control; justices do not move in lockstep with the President who appointed them. But the record strongly suggests that presidential control can shift the Court significantly, and that the appointments process makes it unlikely that Supreme Court justices will diverge too sharply or for too long from the desires of those with political power. For detailed treatments, showing the complexities here, see generally L. Epstein and J. Siegel, Advice and Consent (2007); Epstein et al., Ideological Drift among Supreme Court Justices, 101 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1483 (2007); H. Abraham, Justices and Presidents (1985); J. Schmidhauser, Judges and Justices (1979). Note, however, that ideology is far from the only consideration in the appointments process. Region, race, gender, and religion of the appointee will sometimes play a role in the President's decision. For general discussion, see id. at 41–82.

The appointment decision is not the President's alone. Early Senates often exercised an active role, and the Senate has regularly failed to confirm lower court judges. See generally L. Tribe, God Save This Honorable Court (1985). Consider the view that "the role of the Senate as well as interest groups cannot be overlooked. Particularly in periods in which a President lacked party or ideological support in the Senate, the influence of senatorial confirmation assumed far-reaching importance. Approximately one-fifth of the presidential nominations for Supreme Court appointments have been dealt with negatively by the Senate." Id. at 91. The Senate's power to advise and consent may affect the composition of the Court in two ways. First, it may lead the President to avoid highly controversial appointees. Second, the Senate may refuse to confirm presidential appointees—for reasons of incompetence, venality, or ideology.

Since 1900, Supreme Court nominees have been explicitly rejected, by vote, on only four occasions—President Reagan's appointment of Judge Robert Bork, President Nixon's appointments of Judges Clement Haynesworth and Harold Carswell, and President Hoover's appointment of Judge John Parker. Some cases are more ambiguous. A Republican-led Senate refused to hold hearings for President Obama's nominee, Merrick Garland. George W. Bush's nomination of White House Counsel Harriet Miers was withdrawn in the face of strong, conservative opposition. President Reagan's nominee Judge Douglas Ginsburg withdrew after reports that he had smoked marijuana.

Is an aggressive role from the Senate desirable? Should the Senate disapprove Supreme Court nominees who are perceived to be too “conservative” or too “liberal”?

Consider, as a starting point, the extraordinary public debate in 1987 over President Reagan’s nomination of Judge Robert Bork. Judge Bork had been known as a distinguished lawyer, professor, and judge; he was also one of the most outspoken critics of what he saw as unjustified judicial activism on the part of the Supreme Court under Chief Justices Warren and Burger. An especially controversial article, Bork, Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems, 47 Ind. L.J. 1 (1971), was taken by many readers as a broadside attack on the Supreme Court’s decisions in such areas as privacy, voting rights, and discrimination. This Indiana Law Journal article—and other writings by Judge Bork—provided the focus for a heated and lengthy confirmation process in which the Senate Judiciary Committee heard testimony from Judge Bork himself and from numerous lawyers and law professors. There was intense lobbying on both sides; the lobbying efforts included national advertisements, in newspapers and journals as well as on television and radio, predicting the consequences of Judge Bork’s confirmation. See generally Bork’s own account in The Tempting of America (1989) and The Bork Nomination: Essays and Reports, 9 Cardozo L. Rev. 1 (1987).

Judge Bork’s nomination was defeated by the largest margin of any Supreme Court nominee in American history. What, if any, implications does the defeat have for constitutional interpretation? It is possible to think that the nation in some sense rejected Judge Bork’s views; it is also possible to think that his defeat was a result of an intense and in many ways misleading lobbying effort—producing a new word, “Borking,” said to involve an all-out, often personal campaign against a public figure.

Does the experience with Judge Bork suggest that an aggressive senatorial role in the confirmation process is valuable? What does it suggest about the idea that the appointments process weakens the countermajoritarian difficulty? For varying views on these and related questions, see Essays on the Supreme Court Appointment Process, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1146 (1988); S. Carter, The Confirmation Mess (1993), deplored the role of caricature and “soundbite politics.” Many people believe that the defeat of the Bork nomination has contributed to general caution on the part of Presidents, ensuring that they will not appoint controversial candidates, and that they will avoid nominees with a contestable “paper trail.”

Return to the Senate’s failure to hold hearings on Merrick Garland, President Obama’s choice and a widely admired judge, purportedly on the grounds that the President should not be able to seat a new Supreme Court justice in a final year.

Is that a good principle? Or is the real principle this: In the modern era, there is a real possibility that Republicans or Democrats, or both, will use every device they have, and every argument they can make, to defeat nominees who won't vote as they like?

3. Impeachment. Justices of the Supreme Court "hold their Offices during good Behavior." U.S. Const. art. III, §1. They may "be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." Under what circumstances may federal judges be impeached? See, for general discussion, Chapter 4 infra; R. Berger, Impeachment (1970), C. Sunstein, Impeachment: A Citizen's Guide (2017). In the context of judges, here's a big question: What, exactly, counts as high crime and misdemeanor?

No Supreme Court justice has been removed from office in the nation's history, although Justice Abe Fortas was forced to resign after revelation of financial improprieties; Justice Samuel Chase was impeached but not convicted. Members of the lower federal courts have been impeached and removed from office, and there have been efforts to impeach Supreme Court justices. See K. Hall, The Politics of Justice (1979). The most celebrated example involved Justice Douglas. A resolution calling for an investigation referred, among other things, to Justice William O. Douglas's having married four times; to the fact that one of his former wives was "a cocktail waitress"; to his votes in favor of defendants in cases involving "subversive questions"; to his traveling to Peking; and to various "left-wing" statements in his book, Points of Rebellion. See 116 Cong. Rec. H12,111–12,114 (daily ed. Apr. 16, 1970). An impeachment resolution was introduced against him in part on the basis of articles published in Playboy magazine, in which Justice Douglas, among other things, expressed some sympathy for rebellious groups in the 1960s. In the course of the proceedings, then-Representative Gerald Ford argued that the grounds for impeachment were "whatever a majority of the House of Representatives considers them to be at a given moment in history." 116 Cong. Rec. H3113–3114 (daily ed. Apr. 15, 1970).

Notwithstanding the latter suggestion, the device of impeachment has not been used as a means of obtaining political control over the Supreme Court. This phenomenon may be attributable in part to the prestige of an independent judiciary, in part to general acceptance of Marbury v. Madison, and in part to legal doubts about the wisdom and legality of using the impeachment mechanisms for this purpose. On the latter question, see Chapter 4 infra.

4. Life tenure. Under the Constitution, federal judges are appointed for life. This provision is obviously associated with the goal of promoting judicial independence. But there are other ways to promote independence. Some states and some nations impose an age ceiling on judges, requiring retirement at age sixty-five or seventy. The “independent regulatory commissions,” including for example the Federal Trade Commission, allow members to serve for multiyear terms, and they can be removed for “neglect of duty, malfeasance, or inefficiency in office.” If you were starting a constitutional order from scratch—in, say, South Africa, Romania, or Poland—what sort of design would you favor?

5. Controlling sitting judges; informal mechanisms and self-imposed limits. To what extent is the Supreme Court subject to informal mechanisms of control? Mr. Dooley—the pen name and principal character of Finley Peter Dunne, who wrote around the turn of the twentieth century—explained in a now-celebrated statement that “[no] matter whether th’ constitution follows th’ flag or not, th’ supreme court follows th’ iletion returns.” F. P. Dunne, The Supreme Court’s Decisions, in Mr. Dooley’s Opinions 26 (1900). This statement is not literally true, but there can be little doubt that the Court has exhibited reluctance to make decisions that depart too sharply from what it perceives as a political consensus. Many of the Court’s most controversial decisions—involving, say, school segregation, women’s rights, the individual right to have guns—actually fit with, and did not contradict, widespread social convictions. See C. Sunstein, A Constitution of Many Minds (2009).

Why is this? On one view, the appointment process is a big part of the picture; because justices are selected by Presidents, and must be confirmed by the Senate, there is a link between their views and the views of the citizenry. Perhaps inescapably, people’s views about the meaning of the Constitution are affected by their deepest convictions, and so it appears, whether you are appointed by President Clinton, Bush, Obama, or Trump. But there is another point: Justices also live in society, and for that reason, their beliefs may well be affected by what society thinks or is perceived to think. The Court’s decisions striking down racial segregation and sex discrimination, vindicating the individual right to have guns, and requiring states to recognize same-sex marriage can easily be seen as examples.

Some have suggested that the Court has, or perceives itself as having, a limited amount of “political capital,” and it tends to budget its expenditure of that capital in the number and kinds of controversial decisions it renders. See J. Choper, Judicial Review and the National Political Process (1981); A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch (1962). The Court’s perception of its limited political capital may sometimes manifest itself in sensitivity to the views of elected officials and private citizens. Thus, for example, the end of the Lochner period—in which the Court struggled against government regulation of the economy, see Chapter 6 infra—may be understood in part as a response to popular pressures, though the problem of identifying “cause and effect” is formidable. See C. Vose, supra. There are few occasions in the nation’s history in which the Court has persisted in a course to which the country is sharply opposed. See A. Bickel, supra.

On the other hand, the Court’s decisions may themselves help to shape a national consensus (is that a good or a bad thing?), and it is undoubtedly true that on occasion the Court has been willing to insist on a course of action notwithstanding considerable public disagreement. Consider in this regard the school prayer controversy, Chapter 8 infra; the problem of school desegregation, Chapter 5 infra; and the abortion controversy, Chapter 6 infra.

There is helpful but sparse empirical work on the effect of popular opinion on Supreme Court decisions, perhaps because of the difficulties in tracing causation. For a valuable collection, see Public Opinion and Constitutional Controversy (N. Persily et al. eds. 2008). It does seem clear that the Court is sometimes sensitive to the perceived mood of the country, and that it is generally unwilling to continue for long periods on courses that face intense popular disagreement. A provocative, important, and controversial discussion is G. Rosenberg, The Hollow Hope (rev. ed. 2008), which discusses what the author claims to be the surprisingly limited effectiveness of the Supreme Court in producing social change, even in the area of race relations, and which suggests that the Court’s lack of political authority is connected with its lack of effectiveness.

74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506 (1869)

[McCardle published articles in a newspaper in Mississippi, which was then under the control of the national army pursuant to the Reconstruction plan adopted by Congress after the Civil War. He was arrested under charges of libel; disturbing the peace; inciting insurrection, disorder, and violence; and impeding reconstruction. McCardle sought habeas corpus from a federal court in Mississippi, claiming that Congress lacked constitutional authority to establish a system of military government in the states. The case was in this sense a fundamental challenge to Congress’s reconstruction power. After losing in the trial court, McCardle appealed, invoking a habeas corpus act enacted in 1867. Congress feared that the case would be a vehicle for invalidating the reconstruction plan. Congress therefore enacted—while the case was pending, and over presidential veto on constitutional grounds—a statute that repealed the provision of the 1867 habeas corpus act that McCardle had invoked.]

THE CHIEF JUSTICE [CHASE] delivered the opinion of the court.

The first question necessarily is that of jurisdiction; for, if the act of March, 1868, takes away the jurisdiction defined by the act of February, 1867, it is useless, if not improper, to enter into any discussion of other questions.

It is quite true, as was argued by the counsel for the petitioner, that the appellate jurisdiction of this court is not derived from acts of Congress. It is, strictly speaking, conferred by the Constitution. But it is conferred "with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make." It is unnecessary to consider whether, if Congress had made no exceptions and no regulations, this court might not have exercised general appellate jurisdiction under rules prescribed by itself. For among the earliest acts of the first Congress, at its first session, was the act of September 24th, 1789, to establish the judicial courts of the United States. That act provided for the organization of this court, and prescribed regulations for the exercise of its jurisdiction....

The principle that the affirmation of appellate jurisdiction implies the negation of all such jurisdiction not affirmed having been thus established, it was an almost necessary consequence that acts of Congress, providing for the exercise of jurisdiction, should come to be spoken of as acts granting jurisdiction, and not as acts making exceptions to the constitutional grant of it.

The exception to appellate jurisdiction in the case before us, however, is not an inference from the affirmation of other appellate jurisdiction. It is made in terms. The provision of the act of 1867, affirming the appellate jurisdiction of this court in cases of habeas corpus is expressly repealed. It is hardly possible to imagine a plainer instance of positive exception. We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution; and the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this court is given by express words.

What, then, is the effect of the repealing act upon the case before us? We cannot doubt as to this. Without jurisdiction the court cannot proceed at all in any cause. Jurisdiction is power to declare the law, and when it ceases to exist, the only function remaining to the court is that of announcing the fact and dismissing the cause. And this is not less clear upon authority than upon principle.

Counsel seem to have supposed, if effect be given to the repealing act in question, that the whole appellate power of the court, in cases of habeas corpus, is denied. But this is an error. The act of 1868 does not except from that jurisdiction any cases but appeals from Circuit Courts under the act of 1867. It does not affect the jurisdiction which was previously exercised.

The appeal of the petitioner in this case must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Note: Political Control over Jurisdiction of Article III Courts

Does Ex parte McCardle stand for the proposition that Congress has plenary power over the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court? In Ex parte Yerger, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 85 (1869), the Court converted into a holding the last paragraph of the McCardle opinion. In Yerger, the Court asserted appellate jurisdiction over a habeas corpus proceeding brought by a petitioner in military detention. The source of jurisdiction was certiorari based on pre-1867 legislation. The language of Ex parte McCardle suggests that there are no constitutional constraints on Congress's power over the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court; but its holding might be read more narrowly in light of the conclusion, noted in McCardle itself and made clear in Yerger, that there was an alternative means of obtaining Supreme Court review.

The question of congressional power over the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court has occasionally assumed considerable importance, with proposals to prevent the Supreme Court from hearing cases involving (among other things) school prayer, reapportionment, school desegregation, and abortion. No such proposal has passed Congress. But there has been substantial debate about the constitutionality of the proposals, versions of which have been introduced at numerous stages in the history of the nation. Consider the following proposal:

The Supreme Court shall not have jurisdiction to review, by appeal, writ of certiorari, or otherwise, any case arising out of any State statute, ordinance, rule, regulation, or any part thereof, or arising out of any act interpreting, applying, or enforcing a State statute, ordinance, rule, or regulation, which relates to voluntary prayers in public schools and public buildings.

Would this proposal be constitutional? If one thought that Supreme Court decisions restricting school prayer should be overruled, why might one think that this proposal would be counterproductive?

1. Restricting jurisdiction and the separation of powers. If plenary power to restrict jurisdiction existed, Congress could immunize state and federal laws from Supreme Court review. Congress could, for example, enact a law and provide that the Supreme Court could not assess its constitutionality. Indeed, Congress could for all practical purposes cut the Supreme Court out of the constitutional scheme—for example, by depriving the Court of jurisdiction in all federal question cases. At first glance, such a power might seem to be a striking intrusion on the separation of powers system.

Would it be possible to argue that the power to restrict jurisdiction is not such an intrusion at all but is instead a means of making it tolerable to have judicial review in a system of representative government? See C. Black, Decision According to Law (1981). Under this view, the availability of the power to limit jurisdiction is an important check on the Supreme Court, discouraging it from straying too far from “popular will,” as expressed in legislative and executive enactments, and allowing the legislature to retain ultimate control over the Court. At the same time, the existence of an unexercised, but broad, exceptions power gives reason to find public acquiescence in or ratification of Supreme Court decisions. But perhaps such arguments attribute too much to legislative inaction.

In any event, the nature and limits of the exceptions power remain shrouded in uncertainty. The remainder of this Note outlines some of the competing views.

2. The plenary power argument. To some, the exceptions clause grants Congress plenary power over the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Congress may make exceptions whenever and for whatever reasons it chooses. This view draws support from the literal language of the Constitution. The text itself contains no limits on congressional power to make “exceptions” to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The only limits in this view are those that derive from the political process. The plenary power argument obtains support from McCordle and from numerous dicta in early cases. See Van Alstyne, A Critical Guide to Ex parte McCordle, 15 Ariz. L. Rev. 229 (1973).

3. Separation of powers constraints: the “essential functions” hypothesis. One argument against recognition of a plenary power under the exceptions clause is based on the proposition that Congress cannot “destroy the essential role of the Supreme Court in the constitutional plan.” Hart, The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic, 66 Harv. L. Rev. 1362, 1365 (1953). The argument is largely a structural one. The framers and ratifiers, it is claimed, intended the Court to perform an important function in the separation of powers scheme: to ensure that Congress, the President, and the states are kept within constitutional limits. (Consider The Federalist No. 78 and Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee.) If Congress had power to remove the Court’s jurisdiction, it could insulate its own laws, or those of the states, from constitutional attack, effectively writing the Court out of the constitutional system. Such a power, it is sometimes claimed, is not consistent with the intended function of courts in the constitutional order. See Ratner, Congressional Power over the Appellate Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, 109 U. Pa. L. Rev. 157 (1960).

Can this view be reconciled with the language of the exceptions clause? Proponents suggest that the use of the term “exceptions” itself contemplates a narrow power, one that is consistent with the general view that the Court would exercise jurisdiction in all or most federal question cases. See Ratner, supra; Sager, Foreword: Constitutional Limitations on Congress’ Authority to Regulate the Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts, 95 Harv. L. Rev. 17 (1981). On this view, the extent of Congress’s power may not be subject to precise limits, but it is clear that Congress cannot deprive the Court of jurisdiction in (all or some?) constitutional cases. See also R. Berger, Congress vs. the Supreme Court (1969) (suggesting that the exceptions power is limited to issues of fact).

Is this position supported or undermined by Marbury v. Madison? Consider Wechsler, The Courts and the Constitution, 65 Colum. L. Rev. 1001, 1005–1006 (1965):

The plan of the Constitution for the courts [was] quite simply that the Congress would decide from time to time how far the federal judicial institution should be used within the limits of the federal judicial power. [Federal] courts, including the Supreme Court, do not pass on constitutional questions because there is a special function vested in them to enforce the Constitution or police the other agencies of government. They do so rather for the reason that they must decide a litigated case that is otherwise within their jurisdiction and in doing so must give effect to the supreme law of the land. That is, at least, what Marbury v. Madison was all about.

Is this a proper reading of Marbury? Consider the following view: Marbury and The Federalist No. 78 rest on the broader ground that the Supreme Court was accorded a distinctive role as the guarantor of the supremacy of the federal Constitution as against the states and the federal legislature. Recognition of an unlimited power to make exceptions would be inconsistent with the intended role of the Supreme Court in the separation of powers scheme, generating precisely the evils that led Hamilton to support the existence of judicial review. Compare Cooper v. Aaron, supra.

Does it matter whether the exceptions power is used to insulate federal or state laws from judicial review? Would the dangers be different in the two different cases? See Sager, supra, at 55:

To remove or permit the removal from the entire federal judiciary, including the Supreme Court, of the constitutional review of state conduct would be to alter the balance of federal authority fundamentally and dangerously. In an observation intended to defuse rather than ignite the sense of crisis that surrounded the Court in 1913, Justice Holmes uttered his famous words on the matter of Supreme Court jurisdiction: “I do not think the United States would come to an end if we lost our power to declare an Act of Congress void. I do think the Union would be imperiled if we could not make that declaration as to the laws of the several States.” [The] case for regarding federal judicial supervision of the states as essential to the scheme of the Constitution is a strong one.

Even if it is accepted that there is an “essential functions” limitation on jurisdictional restrictions, the question remains whether particular provisions are inconsistent with the Court’s “essential function.” Would the bill reprinted above, eliminating federal court jurisdiction in school prayer cases, destroy the Supreme Court’s “essential role”? Consider the fact that the Court would retain jurisdiction in all other cases raising constitutional questions.

4. Independent constitutional barriers. There is little doubt that other constitutional provisions, like the equal protection component of the due process clause, limit Congress’s power under the exceptions clause. For example, Congress could not constitutionally provide that Republicans, but no one else, may have access to the Supreme Court. Such a provision would violate the first amendment and thus would be independently unconstitutional.

How far does this rationale extend? Does it justify a conclusion that selective withdrawals of jurisdiction—for example, busing, abortion, or school prayer—are unconstitutional? See Tribe, Jurisdictional Gerrymandering: Zoning Disfavored Rights out of the Federal Courts, 16 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L. Rev. 129 (1981). Consider Bator, Congressional Power over the Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts, 27 Vill. L. Rev. 1030, 1036–1037 (1982):

Neither the equal protection clause nor any other clause of the Constitution requires equal jurisdiction treatment for different subject-matters of litigation. [A] somewhat narrower argument is that if it is shown that Congress’ motive in requiring a certain category of case to be brought in the exclusive original jurisdiction of the state courts is “hostility” to the substantive constitutional right in question, it can be struck down. I do not understand how such a rule could be administered. What would be an adequate indication of hostility? [The] state courts, equally with the federal, are charged with the task of enforcing and protecting federal constitutional rights.

5. The relevance of United States v. Klein. Consider in this regard United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 128 (1872). Klein had sued for indemnification of property taken during the Civil War. It was a necessary predicate for relief that the claimant show that he was not a supporter of the rebellion against the national government, and the courts had held that a presidential pardon was evidence that the claimant had not in fact participated.

A statute, enacted while the United States' appeal was pending from a decision awarding indemnification to Klein, provided that a presidential pardon was to be used as evidence that the person pardoned had participated in a rebellion. The statute added that courts should dismiss suits involving such claimants for want of jurisdiction. The Court invalidated the statute on the ground that dismissal would allow Congress to "prescribe rules of decision to the Judicial Department of the government in cases pending before it." According to the Court, this was inconsistent with the separation of powers. The Court added that the statute would be permissible under the exceptions clause if it were a denial of "the right to appeal in a particular class of cases." The problem here was that it was "a means to an end," that is, denial "to pardons granted by the President of the effect which this court had adjudged them to have."

Perhaps Klein is different from McCordle because it involved not merely a withdrawal of jurisdiction but also an effort "to bind the Court to decide [the] case in accordance with a rule of law [that is] independently unconstitutional." See P. Bator, P. Mishkin, D. Shapiro, and H. Wechsler, Hart & Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System 316 (2d ed. 1973).

Note also Justice Douglas's contention that "[there] is a serious question whether the McCordle case could command a majority view today." Glidden Co. v. Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530, 605 (1962) (dissenting opinion).

6. The lower federal courts. The power of Congress over the jurisdiction of the lower federal courts raises somewhat different issues. It is generally agreed that article III imposes on Congress no obligation to create lower federal courts at all. See Sheldon v. Sill, 49 U.S. (8 How.) 441 (1850). If Congress need not create lower federal courts, a natural inference might be that Congress has plenary power over the sorts of issues that lower courts might hear. This is a classic "lesser included" argument: The authority to create the lower courts necessarily includes the power to restrict the lower courts to certain specified issues.

The argument is also, however, based on the fact that this reading is the only one consistent with the understanding which animated the compromise adopted by the Framers. The essence of that compromise was an agreement that the question whether access to the lower courts was necessary to assure the effectiveness of federal law [should] be left a matter of political and legislative judgment, to be made from time to time in the light of particular circumstances. It would make nonsense of that notion to hold that the only power to be exercised is the all-or-nothing power to decide whether none or all of the cases to which the federal judicial power extends need the haven of a lower court.

Bator, supra, at 1031.

Are there any limits on Congress's power over the lower federal courts? Suppose, for example, that Congress bars the lower federal courts from hearing cases involving abortion, school prayer, or desegregation—as numerous bills introduced in the late 1970s and 1980s threatened to do. Consider the following possibilities.

a. Eisenberg, in Congressional Authority to Restrict Lower Federal Court Jurisdiction, 83 Yale L.J. 498, 532–533 (1974), relies on the expansion of the caseload of the lower federal courts and their important role in protecting federal rights to argue:

The inability of the Supreme Court to do justice in every case within the Article III grant of jurisdiction has broad implications. It means that Congress cannot deny lower federal courts jurisdiction on the ground that Supreme Court review of state court judgments provides an adequate vindication for federal rights. [The] lower federal courts are thus indispensable if the judiciary is to be a co-equal branch and if the “judicial Power of the United States” is to remain the power to protect rights guaranteed by the Constitution and its amendments. Abolition of the lower federal courts is no longer constitutionally permissible.

b. The “independent constitutional constraints” on congressional limits on the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court apply as well to limits on the jurisdiction of the lower courts. Here, the same considerations apply as discussed above.

c. Note also the position of Justice Story in Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee, supra, to the effect that at any time some federal court must have jurisdiction over any case to which the article III power extends. This view, however, has been rejected in modern practice. Note, for example, that diversity jurisdiction extends only to cases in which the amount in controversy is over $75,000 and that Congress has never granted the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction over diversity cases brought in state courts.

For a careful elaboration on these questions of a position similar to that of Justice Story, see Amar, A Neo-Federalist View of Article III: Separating the Two Tiers of Federal Jurisdiction, 65 B.U. L. Rev. 205 (1985).

Note: The Power of Reprisal—General Thoughts

What conclusions do these various mechanisms of control—constitutional amendment, appointment, impeachment, popular opinion, and jurisdictional limits—suggest? Do Congress and the President have enough, or too much, authority over the Court?

Consider the following views: (1) In light of the various mechanisms of control, the countermajoritarian difficulty said to be produced by the existence of judicial review is much less severe than it appears at first glance. The various safeguards make it much less troublesome that interpretation is often or inevitably discretionary; there is usually a political corrective, even in the short run. (2) The mechanisms of control make the courts so dependent on the political branches that justifications for Marbury that rely on the political insulation of the judges ultimately break down. It turns out that the judges are not insulated at all. They are emphatically political actors. (3) The various mechanisms are insufficient to eliminate and even to reduce the countermajoritarian difficulty. It remains the case that the power of judicial review permits unelected judges to have what is in effect the final say on issues of public importance. The fact that the judges are subject to some control through other means does not respond to the basic problem.

Consider, finally, the question of efficacy. Sometimes Supreme Court decisions have less fundamental consequences for the real world than its advocates and its critics think. For example, only about 2 percent of black children in the South attended desegregated schools ten years after the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education. Especially when the Court is attempting to engage in large-scale social reform, its efforts are likely to be disappointing. Frequently lawyers and law students assume that society will simply follow Supreme Court decisions, but difficulties of implementation severely complicate this assumption. It may be that these difficulties provide an additional argument against an active judicial role in social reform. For elaborations of this theme, see G. Rosenberg, The Hollow Hope (rev. ed. 2008); D. Horowitz, The Courts and Social Policy (1979).

E. “CASE OR CONTROVERSY” REQUIREMENTS AND THE

PASSIVE VIRTUES

A number of devices require or permit federal courts not to resolve certain cases. Most of these devices are, in whole or in part, an inference from article III, section 2, providing that the “Judicial Power shall extend” to enumerated “Cases” and “Controversies.” This provision, it is often said, forbids the courts from invalidating legislative or executive action “merely” because it is unconstitutional. The courts may rule only in the context of a constitutional case.

This principle has a number of concrete implications. In general, it means that courts may not issue “advisory opinions”; may not decide “political questions”; must have before them someone with “standing,” or with some kind of personal stake in the controversy; and may not decide issues that are either “premature” or “moot.” What purposes are served by the “case or controversy” requirement? There are several candidates.

First, the requirement might promote democratic self-government by ensuring a measure of judicial restraint. By limiting the occasions for judicial intervention into legislative or executive processes, the case or controversy requirement reduces the presence of the federal judiciary in American life—and so too friction between the branches produced by judicial review. This rationale is often tied to a concern with the countermajoritarian difficulty. The questions raised by this rationale are whether judicial restraint, thus understood, is desirable, and, if so, whether the case or controversy requirement is a sensible way to promote such restraint. Note in particular that judicial restraint is promoted by these devices not by requiring a deferential approach to the merits but by preventing the courts from reaching the merits at all.

Second, the case or controversy requirement might ensure that constitutional issues will be resolved only in the context of concrete disputes rather than in response to problems that may be hypothetical, abstract, or speculative. This consequence, it is sometimes said, distinguishes legislative and judicial decisionmaking and promotes sound constitutional conclusions. Notice, however, that even if a decision comes in a concrete setting, the decision’s effects extend far more broadly. When the Supreme Court held that Jane Roe had a right to an abortion in Roe v. Wade or that Linda Brown had the right to attend a nonsegregated school in Brown v. Board of Education, no one thinks that the Court’s primary focus was on the particular cases before it.

Third, the case or controversy requirement is said to promote the ends of individual autonomy and self-determination, by ensuring that constitutional decisions are rendered at the behest of those actually injured rather than at the behest of bystanders attempting to disrupt mutually advantageous accommodations or to impose their own views of public policy on government. Consider, for example, the fact that people can object to racial discrimination or environmental harm only if they have been subject to those injuries. Outsiders with an ideological interest are barred. This rationale is sometimes accompanied by a suggestion that case or controversy limitations ensure real adversity between the parties and thus ensure against collusive litigation. But note that sometimes the fact that a lawsuit has not resulted stems from ignorance, poverty, or alienation rather than from satisfaction with the status quo.

Consider also A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch 115–116 (1962):

One of the chief faculties of the judiciary, which is lacking in the legislature and which fits the courts for the function of evolving and applying constitutional principles, is that the judgment of courts can come later, after the hopes and prophecies expressed in legislation have been tested in the actual workings of our society; the judgment of courts may be had in concrete cases that exemplify the actual consequences of legislative or executive actions. [It] may be added that the opportunity to relate a legislative policy to the flesh-and-blood facts of an actual case [to] observe and describe in being what the legislature may or may not have foreseen as probable—this opportunity as much as, or more than, anything else enables the Court to appeal to the nation’s second thought. Moreover, [these requirements] create a time lag between legislation and adjudication. [Hence] it cushions the clash between the Court and any given legislative majority.

In Bickel’s view, the “passive virtues” of inaction operate as a necessary means of mediating between the two (competing) ideas at work in U.S. government: electoral accountability and governance according to principle. The “passive virtues” operate to ensure that the latter idea does not swallow up the former, by permitting the Court to defer to the political process without resolving the issue either way. But see Gunther, The Subtle Vices of the Passive Virtues, 64 Colum. L. Rev. 1 (1964), objecting that an “unprincipled” approach to justiciability issues is unacceptable and will ultimately undermine the Court’s role. Note also that some of the various justiciability doctrines are largely a creation not of the founding period but of the twentieth century—in particular, of efforts by Justices Brandeis, Frankfurter, and others seeking to immunize what they considered to be progressive government, and especially administrative agencies, from judicial review. The fact that some justiciability constraints are mostly traceable to this period, rather than to the founding, might have significant implications for current approaches to those constraints. But see Woolhandler and Nelson, Does History Defeat Standing Doctrine?, 102 Mich. L. Rev. 689 (2004) (arguing that during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, American courts imposed various limitations on the standing of private individuals that were “influenced by... ideas about the proper role of the judiciary, its relationship to the political branches of the state and federal governments, and the legitimate allocations of public and private power”).

1. Advisory Opinions

One justiciability doctrine is unquestionably traceable to the early period. Under the first President, the Supreme Court said that it was constitutionally forbidden to issue “advisory opinions”—opinions on the constitutionality of legislative or executive actions that did not grow out of a case or controversy. President Washington, through Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson, asked the justices whether he might request their views about legal questions growing out of a war, in which the United States was neutral, between England and France. The justices responded:

The three departments of the government [being] in certain respects checks upon each other, and our being judges of a court in the last resort, are considerations which accord strong arguments against the propriety of our extrajudicially deciding the questions alluded to, especially as the power given by the Constitution to the President, of calling on the heads of departments for opinions, seems to have been purposely as well as expressly united to the executive departments. We exceedingly regret every event that may cause embarrassment to your administration, but we derive consolation from the reflection that your judgment will discern what is right.

Is the Court’s conclusion a natural or an inevitable interpretation of article III? Suppose that a President asked the Chief Justice to provide him with advice about a policy matter in an unofficial capacity. Would it be unconstitutional for the Chief Justice to respond? Is not the clear implication of the justice’s response to President Jefferson that any opinion the justices offered would be in their unofficial capacity? Note in this regard that Chief Justice Earl Warren served as head of the commission that investigated the assassination of President Kennedy and that by statute the Chief Justice serves on the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institute. The Chief Justice also regularly testifies before Congress and makes recommendations regarding matters relating to the federal judiciary. Surely these activities are constitutional? Some state supreme courts, including the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, are authorized to issue advisory opinions; many courts in Eastern Europe have been given this power in the aftermath of communism.

Note also that the Office of Legal Counsel of the Department of Justice has, at least for the executive branch, assumed an advice-giving role, informing the President and other members of the executive branch of its views about the constitutionality of proposed courses of action. See 28 U.S.C. §§511–513 (authorizing the Attorney General to give his advice and opinion on questions of law to the President and to heads of executive departments). The Office of Legal Counsel has made public a wide variety of legal opinions issued since 1977. Perhaps, however, advisory bodies of this kind end up having close collegial relations with those to whom they give advice. Note, for example, that the assistant attorney general in charge of the Office of Legal Counsel is a political appointee. As a result, the judgments of that office might suffer from an absence of independence—an issue that received considerable attention in connection with the war on terror and the administration of George W. Bush. See J. Goldsmith, The Terror Presidency (2007). See also B. Ackerman, The Decline and Fall of the American Republic 146 (2010) (calling for creation of a “Supreme Executive Tribunal” of nine presidentially nominated, Senate-confirmed “judges for the executive branch.”).

Some of the gains provided by advisory opinions are furnished by the declaratory judgment procedure, which enables a party under certain circumstances to obtain a declaration of its rights and obligations before engaging in contemplated conduct. Why is that procedure constitutional? See Nashville, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railway v. Wallace, 288 U.S. 249 (1933).

2. Standing

Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife

504 U.S. 555 (1992)

JUSTICE SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III-A, and IV, and an opinion with respect to Part III-B in which [CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST], JUSTICE WHITE, and JUSTICE THOMAS join.

This case involves a challenge to a rule promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior interpreting §7 of the Endangered Species Act of 1973 (ESA), in such fashion as to render it applicable only to actions within the United States or on the high seas. The preliminary issue, and the only one we reach, is whether the respondents here, plaintiffs below, have standing to seek judicial review of the rule.

I

The ESA seeks to protect species of animals against threats to their continuing existence caused by man. The ESA instructs the Secretary of the Interior to promulgate by regulation a list of those species which are either endangered or threatened under enumerated criteria, and to define the critical habitat of these species. Section 7(a)(2) of the Act then provides, in pertinent part:

Each Federal agency shall, in consultation with and with the assistance of the Secretary [of the Interior], insure that any action authorized, funded, or carried out by such agency...is not likely to jeopardize the continued existence of any endangered species or threatened species or result in the destruction or adverse modification of habitat of such species which is determined by the Secretary, after consultation as appropriate with affected States, to be critical.

In 1978, the Fish and Wildlife Service (FWS) and the National Marine Fisheries Service (NMFS), on behalf of the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Commerce respectively, promulgated a joint regulation stating that the obligations imposed by §7(a)(2) extend to actions taken in foreign nations. The next year, however, the Interior Department began to reexamine its position. A revised joint regulation, reinterpreting §7(a)(2) to require consultation only for actions taken in the United States or on the high seas, was proposed in 1983, and promulgated in 1986.

Shortly thereafter, respondents, organizations dedicated to wildlife conservation and other environmental causes, filed this action against the Secretary of the Interior, seeking a declaratory judgment that the new regulation is in error as to the geographic scope of §7(a)(2), and an injunction requiring the Secretary to promulgate a new regulation restoring the initial interpretation....

II

Over the years, our cases have established that the irreducible constitutional minimum of standing contains three elements: First, the plaintiff must have suffered an “injury in fact”—an invasion of a legally-protected interest which is (a) concrete and particularized, and (b) “actual or imminent, not ‘conjectural’ or ‘hypothetical.’” Second, there must be a causal connection between the injury and the conduct complained of—the injury has to be “fairly...traceable to the challenged action of the defendant, and not...the result [of] the independent action of some third party not before the court.” Third, it must be “likely,” as opposed to merely “speculative,” that the injury will be “redressed by a favorable decision.”

The party invoking federal jurisdiction bears the burden of establishing these elements. [At] the pleading stage, general factual allegations of injury resulting from the defendant’s conduct may suffice, for on a motion to dismiss we “presume that general allegations embrace those specific facts that are necessary to support the claim.” In response to a summary judgment motion, however, the plaintiff can no longer rest on such “mere allegations,” but must “set forth” by affidavit or other evidence “specific facts,” Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 56(e), which for purposes of the summary judgment motion will be taken to be true. And at the final stage, those facts (if controverted) must be “supported adequately by the evidence adduced at trial.” When the suit is one challenging the legality of government action or inaction, the nature and extent of facts that must be averred (at the summary judgment stage) or proved (at the trial stage) in order to establish standing depends considerably upon whether the plaintiff is himself an object of the action (or forgone action) at issue. If he is, there is ordinarily little question that the action or inaction has caused him injury, and that a judgment preventing or requiring the action will redress it. When, however, as in this case, a plaintiff’s asserted injury arises from the government’s allegedly unlawful regulation (or lack of regulation) of someone else, much more is needed. In that circumstance, causation and redressability ordinarily hinge on the response of the regulated (or regulable) third party to the government action or inaction—and perhaps on the response of others as well. The existence of one or more of the essential elements of standing “depends on the unfettered choices made by independent actors not before the courts and whose exercise of broad and legitimate discretion the courts cannot presume either to control or to predict,” ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 615 (1989) (opinion of Kennedy, J.); and it becomes the burden of the plaintiff to adduce facts showing that those choices have been or will be made in such manner as to produce causation and permit redressability of injury. Thus, when the plaintiff is not himself the object of the government action or inaction he challenges, standing is not precluded, but it is ordinarily “substantially more difficult” to establish....

III

Respondents' claim to injury is that the lack of consultation with respect to certain funded activities abroad "increases the rate of extinction of endangered and threatened species." Of course, the desire to use or observe an animal species, even for purely aesthetic purposes, is undeniably a cognizable interest for purpose of standing....

[With] respect to this aspect of the case, the Court of Appeals focused on the affidavits of two Defenders' members—Joyce Kelly and Amy Skilbred. Ms. Kelly stated that she traveled to Egypt in 1986 and "observed the traditional habitat of the endangered Nile crocodile there and intends to do so again, and hopes to observe the crocodile directly," and that she "will suffer harm in fact as a result of [the] American...role...in overseeing the rehabilitation of the Aswan High Dam on the Nile...and [in] developing...Egypt's...Master Water Plan." Ms. Skilbred averred that she traveled to Sri Lanka in 1981 and "observed the habitat" of "endangered species such as the Asian elephant and the leopard" at what is now the site of the Mahaweli Project funded by the Agency for International Development (AID), although she "was unable to see any of the endangered species"; "this development project," she continued, "will seriously reduce endangered, threatened, and endemic species habitat including areas that I visited...[, which] may severely shorten the future of these species"; that threat, she concluded, harmed her because she "intends to return to Sri Lanka in the future and hopes to be more fortunate in spotting at least the endangered elephant and leopard." When Ms. Skilbred was asked at a subsequent deposition if and when she had any plans to return to Sri Lanka, she reiterated that "I intend to go back to Sri Lanka," but confessed that she had no current plans: "I don't know when. There is a civil war going on right now. I don't know. Not next year, I will say. In the future."

We shall assume for the sake of argument that these affidavits contain facts showing that certain agency-funded projects threaten listed species—though that is questionable. They plainly contain no facts, however, showing how damage to the species will produce "imminent" injury to Ms. Kelly and Skilbred. That the women "had visited" the areas of the projects before the projects commenced proves nothing. [Such] "some day" intentions—without any description of concrete plans, or indeed even any specification of when the some day will be—do not support a finding of the "actual or imminent" injury that our cases require.

Besides relying upon the Kelly and Skilbred affidavits, respondents propose a series of novel standing theories. The first, inelegantly styled "ecosystem nexus," proposes that any person who uses any part of a "contiguous ecosystem" adversely affected by a funded activity has standing even if the activity is located a great distance away. This approach, as the Court of Appeals correctly observed, is inconsistent with our opinion in [Lujan v. National Wildlife Federation, 497 U.S. 871, 887–889 (1990)], which held that a plaintiff claiming injury from environmental damage must use the area affected by the challenged activity and not an area roughly “in the vicinity” of it. It makes no difference that the general-purpose section of the ESA states that the Act was intended in part “to provide a means whereby the ecosystems upon which endangered species and threatened species depend may be conserved,” 16 U.S.C. §1531(b). To say that the Act protects ecosystems is not to say that the Act creates (if it were possible) rights of action in persons who have not been injured in fact, that is, persons who use portions of an ecosystem not perceptibly affected by the unlawful action in question.

Respondents’ other theories are called, alas, the “animal nexus” approach, whereby anyone who has an interest in studying or seeing the endangered animals anywhere on the globe has standing; and the “vocational nexus” approach, under which anyone with a professional interest in such animals can sue. Under these theories, anyone who goes to see Asian elephants in the Bronx Zoo, and anyone who is a keeper of Asian elephants in the Bronx Zoo, has standing to sue because the Director of AID did not consult with the Secretary regarding the AID-funded project in Sri Lanka. This is beyond all reason. Standing is not “an ingenious academic exercise in the conceivable,” United States v. Students Challenging Regulatory Agency Procedures (SCRAP), 412 U.S. 669, 688 (1973), but as we have said requires, at the summary judgment stage, a factual showing of perceptible harm. It is clear that the person who observes or works with a particular animal threatened by a federal decision is facing perceptible harm, since the very subject of his interest will no longer exist. It is even plausible—though it goes to the outermost limit of plausibility—to think that a person who observes or works with animals of a particular species in the very area of the world where that species is threatened by a federal decision is facing such harm, since some animals that might have been the subject of his interest will no longer exist, see Japan Whaling Assn. v. American Cetacean Soc., 478 U.S. 221, 231, n.4 (1986). It goes beyond the limit, however, and into pure speculation and fantasy, to say that anyone who observes or works with an endangered species, anywhere in the world, is appreciably harmed by a single project affecting some portion of that species with which he has no more specific connection....

The most obvious problem in the present case is redressability. Since the agencies funding the projects were not parties to the case, the District Court could accord relief only against the Secretary: He could be ordered to revise his regulation to require consultation for foreign projects. But this would not remedy respondents' alleged injury unless the funding agencies were bound by the Secretary's regulation, which is very much an open question....

Respondents assert that this legal uncertainty did not affect redressability (and hence standing) because the District Court itself could resolve the issue of the Secretary's authority as a necessary part of its standing inquiry. Assuming that it is appropriate to resolve an issue of law such as this in connection with a threshold standing inquiry, resolution by the District Court would not have remedied respondents' alleged injury anyway, because it would not have been binding upon the agencies. They were not parties to the suit, and there is no reason they should be obliged to honor an incidental legal determination the suit produced....

A further impediment to redressability is the fact that the agencies generally supply only a fraction of the funding for a foreign project. AID, for example, has provided less than 10% of the funding for the Mahaweli Project. Respondents have produced nothing to indicate that the projects they have named will either be suspended, or do less harm to listed species, if that fraction is eliminated. As in [Simon v. Eastern Kentucky Welfare Rights Organization, 426 U.S. 26 (1976)], it is entirely conjectural whether the nonagency activity that affects respondents will be altered or affected by the agency activity they seek to achieve. There is no standing.

IV

The Court of Appeals found that respondents had standing for an additional reason: because they had suffered a "procedural injury." The so-called "citizen-suit" provision of the ESA provides, in pertinent part, that "any person may commence a civil suit on his own behalf (A) to enjoin any person, including the United States and any other governmental instrumentality or agency...who is alleged to be in violation of any provision of this chapter." The court held that, because §7(a)(2) requires interagency consultation, the citizen-suit provision creates a "procedural right" to consultation in all "persons"—so that anyone can file suit in federal court to challenge the Secretary's (or presumably any other official's) failure to follow the assertedly correct consultative procedure, notwithstanding their inability to allege any discrete injury flowing from that failure. To understand the remarkable nature of this holding one must be clear about what it does not rest upon: This is not a case where plaintiffs are seeking to enforce a procedural requirement the disregard of which could impair a separate concrete interest of theirs (e.g., the procedural requirement for a hearing prior to denial of their license application, or the procedural requirement for an environmental impact statement before a federal facility is constructed next door to them).⁷ Nor is it simply a case where concrete injury has been suffered by many persons, as in mass fraud or mass tort situations. Nor, finally, is it the unusual case in which Congress has created a concrete private interest in the outcome of a suit against a private party for the government's benefit, by providing a cash bounty for the victorious plaintiff. Rather, the court held that the injury-in-fact requirement had been satisfied by congressional conferral upon all persons of an abstract, self-contained, noninstrumental "right" to have the Executive observe the procedures required by law. We reject this view.

We have consistently held that a plaintiff raising only a generally available grievance about government—claiming only harm to his and every citizen's interest in proper application of the Constitution and laws, and seeking relief that no more directly and tangibly benefits him than it does the public at large—does not state an Article III case or controversy....

To be sure, our generalized-grievance cases have typically involved Government violation of procedures assertedly ordained by the Constitution rather than the Congress. But there is absolutely no basis for making the Article III inquiry turn on the source of the asserted right. Whether the courts were to act on their own, or at the invitation of Congress, in ignoring the concrete injury requirement described in our cases, they would be discarding a principle fundamental to the separate and distinct constitutional role of the Third Branch—one of the essential elements that identifies those "Cases" and "Controversies" that are the business of the courts rather than of the political branches. "The province of the court," as Chief Justice Marshall said in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 170 (1803), "is, solely, to decide on the rights of individuals." Vindicating the public interest (including the public interest in government observance of the Constitution and laws) is the function of Congress and the Chief Executive. The question presented here is whether the public interest in proper administration of the laws (specifically, in agencies' observance of a particular, statutorily prescribed procedure) can be converted into an individual right by a statute that denominates it as such, and that permits all citizens (or, for that matter, a subclass of citizens who suffer no distinctive concrete harm) to sue. If the concrete injury requirement has the separation-of-powers significance we have always said, the answer must be obvious: To permit Congress to convert the undifferentiated public interest in executive officers' compliance with the law into an “individual right” vindicable in the courts is to permit Congress to transfer from the President to the courts the Chief Executive’s most important constitutional duty, to “take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed,” Art. II, §3. It would enable the courts, with the permission of Congress, “to assume a position of authority over the governmental acts of another and co-equal department,” Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S., at 489, and to become ““virtually continuing monitors of the wisdom and soundness of Executive action.”” [Allen v. Wright,] 468 U.S., at 760 (quoting Laird v. Tatum, 408 U.S. 1, 15 (1972)). We have always rejected that vision of our role:

When Congress passes an Act empowering administrative agencies to carry on governmental activities, the power of those agencies is circumscribed by the authority granted. This permits the courts to participate in law enforcement entrusted to administrative bodies only to the extent necessary to protect justiciable individual rights against administrative action fairly beyond the granted powers....This is very far from assuming that the courts are charged more than administrators or legislators with the protection of the rights of the people. Congress and the Executive supervise the acts of administrative agents. ...But under Article III, Congress established courts to adjudicate cases and controversies as to claims of infringement of individual rights whether by unlawful action of private persons or by the exertion of unauthorized administrative power.

Stark v. Wickard, 321 U.S. 288, 309–310 (1944). “Individual rights,” within the meaning of this passage, do not mean public rights that have been legislatively pronounced to belong to each individual who forms part of the public. See also [Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727, 740–741 n.16 (1972)].

Nothing in this contradicts the principle that “the...injury required by Art. III may exist solely by virtue of ‘statutes creating legal rights, the invasion of which creates standing.’” [Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 500 (1975) (quoting Linda R. S. v. Richard D., 410 U.S. 614, 617 n.3 (1973)).] Both of the cases used by Linda R. S. as an illustration of that principle involved Congress’s elevating to the status of legally cognizable injuries concrete, de facto injuries that were previously inadequate in law (namely, injury to an individual’s personal interest in living in a racially integrated community, see Trafficante v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 409 U.S. 205, 208–212 (1972), and injury to a company’s interest in marketing its product free from competition, see Hardin v. Kentucky Utilities Co., 390 U.S. 1, 6 (1968)). As we said in Sierra Club, “[Statutory] broadening [of] the categories of injury that may be alleged in support of standing is a different matter from abandoning the requirement that the party seeking review must himself have suffered an injury.” 405 U.S., at 738. Whether or not the principle set forth in Warth can be extended beyond that distinction, it is clear that in suits against the government, at least, the concrete injury requirement must remain.

We hold that respondents lack standing to bring this action.

JUSTICE KENNEDY, with whom JUSTICE SOUTER joins, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment....

While it may seem trivial to require that Ms. Kelly and Skilbred acquire airline tickets to the project sites or announce a date certain upon which they will return, this is not a case where it is reasonable to assume that the affiants will be using the sites on a regular basis, nor do the affiants claim to have visited the sites since the projects commenced. [I] am not willing to foreclose the possibility, however, that in different circumstances a nexus theory similar to those proffered here might support a claim to standing. See Japan Whaling Assn. v. American Cetacean Soc., 478 U.S. 221, 231, n.4 (1986) (“respondents... undoubtedly have alleged a sufficient ‘injury in fact’ in that the whale watching and studying of their members will be adversely affected by continued whale harvesting”).

In light of the conclusion that respondents have not demonstrated a concrete injury here sufficient to support standing under our precedents, I would not reach the issue of redressability....

I also join [the] Court’s opinion with the following observations. As government programs and policies become more complex and far-reaching, we must be sensitive to the articulation of new rights of action that do not have clear analogs in our common-law tradition. [In] my view, Congress has the power to define injuries and articulate chains of causation that will give rise to a case or controversy where none existed before, and I do not read the Court’s opinion to suggest a contrary view. In exercising this power, however, Congress must at the very least identify the injury it seeks to vindicate and relate the injury to the class of persons entitled to bring suit. The citizen-suit provision of the Endangered Species Act does not meet these minimal requirements, because while the statute purports to confer a right on “any person...to enjoin...the United States and any other governmental instrumentality or agency...who is alleged to be in violation of any provision of this chapter,” it does not of its own force establish that there is an injury in “any person” by virtue of any “violation.”

JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring in the judgment....

In my opinion a person who has visited the critical habitat of an endangered species has a professional interest in preserving the species and its habitat, and intends to revisit them in the future has standing to challenge agency action that threatens their destruction. [We] have no license to demean the importance of the interest that particular individuals may have in observing any species or its habitat, whether those individuals are motivated by aesthetic enjoyment, an interest in professional research, or an economic interest in preservation of the species. Indeed, this Court has often held that injuries to such interests are sufficient to confer standing, and the Court reiterates that holding today.

The Court nevertheless concludes that respondents have not suffered “injury in fact” because they have not shown that the harm to the endangered species will produce “imminent” injury to them. I disagree. An injury to an individual’s interest in studying or enjoying a species and its natural habitat occurs when someone (whether it be the government or a private party) takes action that harms that species and habitat....

The plurality also concludes that respondents’ injuries are not redressable in this litigation for two reasons. First, respondents have sought only a declaratory judgment that the Secretary of the Interior’s regulation interpreting §7(a)(2) to require consultation only for agency actions in the United States or on the high seas is invalid and an injunction requiring him to promulgate a new regulation requiring consultation for agency actions abroad as well. But, the plurality opines, even if respondents succeed and a new regulation is promulgated, there is no guarantee that federal agencies that are not parties to this case will actually consult with the Secretary. Furthermore, the plurality continues, respondents have not demonstrated that federal agencies can influence the behavior of the foreign governments where the affected projects are located. Thus, even if the agencies consult with the Secretary and terminate funding for foreign projects, the foreign governments might nonetheless pursue the projects and jeopardize the endangered species. Neither of these reasons is persuasive.

We must presume that if this Court holds that §7(a)(2) requires consultation, all affected agencies would abide by that interpretation and engage in the requisite consultations. Certainly the Executive Branch cannot be heard to argue that an authoritative construction of the governing statute by this Court may simply be ignored by any agency head. Moreover, if Congress has required consultation between agencies, we must presume that such consultation will have a serious purpose that is likely to produce tangible results....

Although I believe that respondents have standing, I nevertheless concur in the judgment of reversal because I am persuaded that the Government is correct in its submission that §7(a)(2) does not apply to activities in foreign countries....

JUSTICE BLACKMUN, with whom JUSTICE O'CONNOR joins, dissenting....

[By] requiring a “description of concrete plans” or “specification of when the some day [for a return visit] will be” the Court, in my view, demands what is likely an empty formality. No substantial barriers prevent Kelly or Skilbred from simply purchasing plane tickets to return to the Aswan and Mahaweli projects....

The Court also rejects respondents’ claim of vocational or professional injury. The Court says that it is “beyond all reason” that a zoo “keeper” of Asian elephants would have standing to contest his government’s participation in the eradication of all the Asian elephants in another part of the world. I am unable to see how the distant location of the destruction necessarily (for purposes of ruling at summary judgment) mitigates the harm to the elephant keeper. If there is no more access to a future supply of the animal that sustains a keeper’s livelihood, surely there is harm.

I have difficulty imagining this Court applying its rigid principles of geographic formalism anywhere outside the context of environmental claims. As I understand it, environmental plaintiffs are under no special constitutional standing disabilities....

I find myself unable to agree with the plurality’s analysis of redressability, based as it is on its invitation of executive lawlessness, ignorance of principles of collateral estoppel, unfounded assumptions about causation, and erroneous conclusions about what the record does not say. In my view, respondents have satisfactorily shown a genuine issue of fact as to whether their injury would likely be redressed by a decision in their favor....

The Court expresses concern that allowing judicial enforcement of “agencies’ observance of a particular, statutorily prescribed procedure” would “transfer from the President to the courts the Chief Executive’s most important constitutional duty, to ‘take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed,’ Art. II, sec. 3.” In fact, the principal effect of foreclosing judicial enforcement of such procedures is to transfer power into the hands of the Executive at the expense—not of the courts—but of Congress, from which that power originates and emanates....

[There] may be factual circumstances in which a congressionally imposed procedural requirement is so insubstantially connected to the prevention of a substantive harm that it cannot be said to work any conceivable injury to an individual litigant. But, as a general matter, the courts owe substantial deference to Congress’ substantive purpose in imposing a certain procedural requirement. In all events, “our separation-of-powers analysis does not turn on the labeling of an activity as ‘substantive’ as opposed to ‘procedural.’” There is no room for a per se rule or presumption excluding injuries labeled “procedural” in nature.

In conclusion, I cannot join the Court on what amounts to a slash-and-burn expedition through the law of environmental standing. In my view, “the very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws, whenever he receives an injury.” Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 163 (1803).

I dissent.

Massachusetts v. EPA

549 U.S. 497 (2007)

JUSTICE STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

A well-documented rise in global temperatures has coincided with a significant increase in the concentration of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere. Respected scientists believe the two trends are related. For when carbon dioxide is released into the atmosphere, it acts like the ceiling of a greenhouse, trapping solar energy and retarding the escape of reflected heat. It is therefore a species—the most important species—of a “greenhouse gas.”

Calling global warming “the most pressing environmental challenge of our time,” a group of States, local governments, and private organizations, alleged in a petition for certiorari that the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has abdicated its responsibility under the Clean Air Act to regulate the emissions of four greenhouse gases, including carbon dioxide. Specifically, petitioners asked us to answer two questions concerning the meaning of §202(a)(1) of the Act: whether EPA has the statutory authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new motor vehicles; and if so, whether its stated reasons for refusing to do so are consistent with the statute....

I

Section 202(a)(1) of the Clean Air Act, provides:

The [EPA] Administrator shall by regulation prescribe (and from time to time revise) in accordance with the provisions of this section, standards applicable to the emission of any air pollutant from any class or classes of new motor vehicles or new motor vehicle engines, which in his judgment cause, or contribute to, air pollution which may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare....

The Act defines “air pollutant” to include “any air pollution agent or combination of such agents, including any physical, chemical, biological, radioactive...substance or matter which is emitted into or otherwise enters the ambient air.” §7602(g). “Welfare” is also defined broadly: among other things, it includes “effects on...weather...and climate.” §7602(h)....

IV

Article III of the Constitution limits federal-court jurisdiction to “Cases” and “Controversies.”...

The parties’ dispute turns on the proper construction of a congressional statute, a question eminently suitable to resolution in federal court. Congress has moreover authorized this type of challenge to EPA action. That authorization is of critical importance to the standing inquiry: “Congress has the power to define injuries and articulate chains of causation that will give rise to a case or controversy where none existed before.” Lujan, 504 U.S., at 580 (Kennedy, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). “In exercising this power, however, Congress must at the very least identify the injury it seeks to vindicate and relate the injury to the class of persons entitled to bring suit.” We will not, therefore, “entertain citizen suits to vindicate the public’s nonconcrete interest in the proper administration of the laws.”

EPA maintains that because greenhouse gas emissions inflict widespread harm, the doctrine of standing presents an insuperable jurisdictional obstacle. We do not agree....

To ensure the proper adversarial presentation, Lujan holds that a litigant must demonstrate that it has suffered a concrete and particularized injury that is either actual or imminent, that the injury is fairly traceable to the defendant, and that it is likely that a favorable decision will redress that injury. However, a litigant to whom Congress has “accorded a procedural right to protect his concrete interests”—here, the right to challenge agency action unlawfully withheld, §7607(b)(1)—“can assert that right without meeting all the normal standards for redressability and immediacy.” When a litigant is vested with a procedural right, that litigant has standing if there is some possibility that the requested relief will prompt the injury-causing party to reconsider the decision that allegedly harmed the litigant.

Only one of the petitioners needs to have standing to permit us to consider the petition for review. We stress here [the] special position and interest of Massachusetts. It is of considerable relevance that the party seeking review here is a sovereign State and not, as it was in Lujan, a private individual.

Well before the creation of the modern administrative state, we recognized that States are not normal litigants for the purposes of invoking federal jurisdiction. As Justice Holmes explained in Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U.S. 230, 237 (1907), a case in which Georgia sought to protect its citizens from air pollution originating outside its borders:

The case has been argued largely as if it were one between two private parties; but it is not. The very elements that would be relied upon in a suit between fellow-citizens as a ground for equitable relief are wanting here. The State owns very little of the territory alleged to be affected, and the damage to it capable of estimate in money, possibly, at least, is small. This is a suit by a State for an injury to it in its capacity of quasi-sovereign. In that capacity the State has an interest independent of and behind the titles of its citizens, in all the earth and air within its domain. It has the last word as to whether its mountains shall be stripped of their forests and its inhabitants shall breathe pure air.

Just as Georgia’s “independent interest...in all the earth and air within its domain” supported federal jurisdiction a century ago, so too does Massachusetts’ well-founded desire to preserve its sovereign territory today. That Massachusetts does in fact own a great deal of the “territory alleged to be affected” only reinforces the conclusion that its stake in the outcome of this case is sufficiently concrete to warrant the exercise of federal judicial power. [Given][its] procedural right and Massachusetts’ stake in protecting its quasi-sovereign interests, the Commonwealth is entitled to special solicitude in our standing analysis.

With that in mind, it is clear that petitioners’ submissions as they pertain to Massachusetts have satisfied the most demanding standards of the adversarial process. EPA’s steadfast refusal to regulate greenhouse gas emissions presents a risk of harm to Massachusetts that is both “actual” and “imminent.” [Lujan, 504 U.S., at 560 (internal quotation marks omitted).]

There is, moreover, a “substantial likelihood that the judicial relief requested” will prompt EPA to take steps to reduce that risk.

The Injury

The harms associated with climate change are serious and well recognized. Indeed, the NRC Report itself—which EPA regards as an “objective and independent assessment of the relevant science,”—identifies a number of environmental changes that have already inflicted significant harms, including “the global retreat of mountain glaciers, reduction in snow-cover extent, the earlier spring melting of rivers and lakes, [and] the accelerated rate of rise of sea levels during the 20th century relative to the past few thousand years....” NRC Report 16.

Petitioners allege that this only hints at the environmental damage yet to come. According to the climate scientist Michael MacCracken, “qualified scientific experts involved in climate change research” have reached a “strong consensus” that global warming threatens (among other things) a precipitate rise in sea levels by the end of the century, “severe and irreversible changes to natural ecosystems,” a “significant reduction in water storage in winter snowpack in mountainous regions with direct and important economic consequences,” and an increase in the spread of disease. He also observes that rising ocean temperatures may contribute to the ferocity of hurricanes.

That these climate-change risks are “widely shared” does not minimize Massachusetts’ interest in the outcome of this litigation. See Federal Election Comm’n v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11, 24 (1998) (“[W]here a harm is concrete, though widely shared, the Court has found ‘injury in fact’”). According to petitioners’ unchallenged affidavits, global sea levels rose somewhere between 10 and 20 centimeters over the 20th century as a result of global warming. These rising seas have already begun to swallow Massachusetts’ coastal land. Because the Commonwealth “owns a substantial portion of the state’s coastal property,” it has alleged a particularized injury in its capacity as a landowner. The severity of that injury will only increase over the course of the next century: If sea levels continue to rise as predicted, one Massachusetts official believes that a significant fraction of coastal property will be “either permanently lost through inundation or temporarily lost through periodic storm surge and flooding events.” Remediation costs alone, petitioners allege, could run well into the hundreds of millions of dollars.

Causation

EPA does not dispute the existence of a causal connection between man-made greenhouse gas emissions and global warming. At a minimum, therefore, EPA’s refusal to regulate such emissions “contributes” to Massachusetts’ injuries.

EPA nevertheless maintains that its decision not to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new motor vehicles contributes so insignificantly to petitioners’ injuries that the agency cannot be haled into federal court to answer for them. For the same reason, EPA does not believe that any realistic possibility exists that the relief petitioners seek would mitigate global climate change and remedy their injuries. That is especially so because predicted increases in greenhouse gas emissions from developing nations, particularly China and India, are likely to offset any marginal domestic decrease.

But EPA overstates its case. Its argument rests on the erroneous assumption that a small incremental step, because it is incremental, can never be attacked in a federal judicial forum. Yet accepting that premise would doom most challenges to regulatory action. Agencies, like legislatures, do not generally resolve massive problems in one fell regulatory swoop. They instead whittle away at them over time, refining their preferred approach as circumstances change and as they develop a more-nuanced understanding of how best to proceed. That a first step might be tentative does not by itself support the notion that federal courts lack jurisdiction to determine whether that step conforms to law.

And reducing domestic automobile emissions is hardly a tentative step. Even leaving aside the other greenhouse gases, the United States transportation sector emits an enormous quantity of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere—according to the MacCracken affidavit, more than 1.7 billion metric tons in 1999 alone. That accounts for more than 6% of worldwide carbon dioxide emissions. To put this in perspective: Considering just emissions from the transportation sector, which represent less than one-third of this country's total carbon dioxide emissions, the United States would still rank as the third-largest emitter of carbon dioxide in the world, outpaced only by the European Union and China. Judged by any standard, U.S. motor-vehicle emissions make a meaningful contribution to greenhouse gas concentrations and hence, according to petitioners, to global warming.

The Remedy

While it may be true that regulating motor-vehicle emissions will not by itself reverse global warming, it by no means follows that we lack jurisdiction to decide whether EPA has a duty to take steps to slow or reduce it. Because of the enormity of the potential consequences associated with man-made climate change, the fact that the effectiveness of a remedy might be delayed during the (relatively short) time it takes for a new motor-vehicle fleet to replace an older one is essentially irrelevant. Nor is it dispositive that developing countries such as China and India are poised to increase greenhouse gas emissions substantially over the next century: A reduction in domestic emissions would slow the pace of global emissions increases, no matter what happens elsewhere.

We moreover attach considerable significance to EPA's "agree[ment] with the President that 'we must address the issue of global climate change,'" (quoting remarks announcing Clear Skies and Global Climate Initiatives, 2002 Public Papers of George W. Bush, Vol. 1, Feb. 14, p. 227 (2004)), and to EPA’s ardent support for various voluntary emission-reduction programs....

In sum—at least according to petitioners’ uncontested affidavits—the rise in sea levels associated with global warming has already harmed and will continue to harm Massachusetts. The risk of catastrophic harm, though remote, is nevertheless real. That risk would be reduced to some extent if petitioners received the relief they seek. We therefore hold that petitioners have standing to challenge the EPA’s denial of their rulemaking petition....

[On the merits, the Court ruled that the EPA does have statutory authority to regulate greenhouse gases and that it would be required on remand to ground any decision not to take regulatory action in the text of the relevant statute.]

VIII

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS, with whom JUSTICE SCALIA, JUSTICE THOMAS, and JUSTICE ALITO join, dissenting.

Global warming may be a “crisis,” even “the most pressing environmental problem of our time.” Indeed, it may ultimately affect nearly everyone on the planet in some potentially adverse way, and it may be that governments have done too little to address it. It is not a problem, however, that has escaped the attention of policymakers in the Executive and Legislative Branches of our Government, who continue to consider regulatory, legislative, and treaty-based means of addressing global climate change.

Apparently dissatisfied with the pace of progress on this issue in the elected branches, petitioners have come to the courts claiming broad-ranging injury, and attempting to tie that injury to the Government’s alleged failure to comply with a rather narrow statutory provision. I would reject these challenges as nonjusticiable....

I...

[Petitioners] bear the burden of alleging an injury that is fairly traceable to the Environmental Protection Agency’s failure to promulgate new motor vehicle greenhouse gas emission standards, and that is likely to be redressed by the prospective issuance of such standards.

Before determining whether petitioners can meet this familiar test, however, the Court changes the rules. It asserts that “States are not normal litigants for the purposes of invoking federal jurisdiction,” and that given “Massachusetts’ stake in protecting its quasi-sovereign interests, the Commonwealth is entitled to special solicitude in our standing analysis.”

Relaxing Article III standing requirements because asserted injuries are pressed by a State, however, has no basis in our jurisprudence, and support for any such “special solicitude” is conspicuously absent from the Court’s opinion. [The] Court has to go back a full century in an attempt to justify its novel standing rule, but even there it comes up short. The Court’s analysis hinges on Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U.S. 230 (1907)—a case that did indeed draw a distinction between a State and private litigants, but solely with respect to available remedies. The case had nothing to do with Article III standing....

In contrast to the present case, there was no question in Tennessee Copper about Article III injury. There was certainly no suggestion that the State could show standing where the private parties could not; there was no dispute, after all, that the private landowners had “an action at law.” Tennessee Copper has since stood for nothing more than a State’s right, in an original jurisdiction action, to sue in a representative capacity as parens patriae. Nothing about a State’s ability to sue in that capacity dilutes the bedrock requirement of showing injury, causation, and redressability to satisfy Article III.

[Far] from being a substitute for Article III injury, parens patriae actions raise an additional hurdle for a state litigant: the articulation of a “quasi-sovereign interest” “apart from the interests of particular private parties.” Just as an association suing on behalf of its members must show not only that it represents the members but that at least one satisfies Article III requirements, so too a State asserting quasi-sovereign interests as parens patriae must still show that its citizens satisfy Article III. Focusing on Massachusetts’s interests as quasi-sovereign makes the required showing here harder, not easier....

II

It is not at all clear how the Court’s “special solicitude” for Massachusetts plays out in the standing analysis, except as an implicit concession that petitioners cannot establish standing on traditional terms. But the status of Massachusetts as a State cannot compensate for petitioners’ failure to demonstrate injury in fact, causation, and redressability.

[If] petitioners rely on loss of land as the Article III injury,...they must ground the rest of the standing analysis in that specific injury....The very concept of global warming seems inconsistent with this particularization requirement. Global warming is a phenomenon “harmful to humanity at large,” 415 F.3d, at 60 (Sentelle, J., dissenting in part and concurring in judgment), and the redress petitioners seek is focused no more on them than on the public generally—it is literally to change the atmosphere around the world.

If petitioners’ particularized injury is loss of coastal land, it is also that injury that must be “actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical.”

As to “actual” injury, the Court observes that “global sea levels rose somewhere between 10 and 20 centimeters over the 20th century as a result of global warming” and that [these] rising seas have already begun to swallow Massachusetts’ coastal land. But none of petitioners’ declarations supports that connection. One declaration states that “a rise in sea level due to climate change is occurring on the coast of Massachusetts, in the metropolitan Boston area,” but there is no elaboration. And the declarant goes on to identify a “significan[t]” non-global-warming cause of Boston’s rising sea level: land subsidence. Thus, aside from a single conclusory statement, there is nothing in petitioners’ 43 standing declarations and accompanying exhibits to support an inference of actual loss of Massachusetts coastal land from 20th century global sea level increases. It is pure conjecture.

The Court’s attempts to identify “imminent” or “certainly impending” loss of Massachusetts coastal land fares no better. One of petitioners’ declarants predicts global warming will cause sea level to rise by 20 to 70 centimeters by the year 2100. Another uses a computer modeling program to map the Commonwealth’s coastal land and its current elevation, and calculates that the high-end estimate of sea level rise would result in the loss of significant state-owned coastal land. But the computer modeling program has a conceded average error of about 30 centimeters and a maximum observed error of 70 centimeters. As an initial matter, if it is possible that the model underrepresents the elevation of coastal land to an extent equal to or in excess of the projected sea level rise, it is difficult to put much stock in the predicted loss of land. But even placing that problem to the side, accepting a century-long time horizon and a series of compounded estimates renders requirements of imminence and immediacy utterly toothless....

Petitioners’ reliance on Massachusetts’s loss of coastal land as their injury in fact for standing purposes creates insurmountable problems for them with respect to causation and redressability. To establish standing, petitioners must show a causal connection between that specific injury and the lack of new motor vehicle greenhouse gas emission standards, and that the promulgation of such standards would likely redress that injury....And importantly, when a party is challenging the Government's allegedly unlawful regulation, or lack of regulation, of a third party, satisfying the causation and redressability requirements becomes "substantially more difficult."

Petitioners view the relationship between their injuries and EPA's failure to promulgate new motor vehicle greenhouse gas emission standards as simple and direct: Domestic motor vehicles emit carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases. Worldwide emissions of greenhouse gases contribute to global warming and therefore also to petitioners' alleged injuries. Without the new vehicle standards, greenhouse gas emissions—and therefore global warming and its attendant harms—have been higher than they otherwise would have been; once EPA changes course, the trend will be reversed.

The Court ignores the complexities of global warming, and does so by now disregarding the "particularized" injury it relied on in step one, and using the dire nature of global warming itself as a bootstrap for finding causation and redressability. First, it is important to recognize the extent of the emissions at issue here. Because local greenhouse gas emissions disperse throughout the atmosphere and remain there for anywhere from 50 to 200 years, it is global emissions data that are relevant. According to one of petitioners' declarations, domestic motor vehicles contribute about 6 percent of global carbon dioxide emissions and 4 percent of global greenhouse gas emissions. The amount of global emissions at issue here is smaller still; §202(a)(1) of the Clean Air Act covers only new motor vehicles and new motor vehicle engines, so petitioners' desired emission standards might reduce only a fraction of 4 percent of global emissions.

This gets us only to the relevant greenhouse gas emissions; linking them to global warming and ultimately to petitioners' alleged injuries next requires consideration of further complexities. As EPA explained in its denial of petitioners' request for rulemaking, predicting future climate change necessarily involves a complex web of economic and physical factors including: our ability to predict future global anthropogenic emissions of [greenhouse gases] and aerosols; the fate of these emissions once they enter the atmosphere (e.g., what percentage are absorbed by vegetation or are taken up by the oceans); the impact of those emissions that remain in the atmosphere on the radiative properties of the atmosphere; changes in critically important climate feedbacks (e.g., changes in cloud cover and ocean circulation); changes in temperature characteristics (e.g., average temperatures, shifts in daytime and evening temperatures); changes in other climatic parameters (e.g., shifts in precipitation, storms); and ultimately the impact of such changes on human health and welfare (e.g., increases or decreases in agricultural productivity, human health impacts).

Petitioners are never able to trace their alleged injuries back through this complex web to the fractional amount of global emissions that might have been limited with EPA standards. In light of the bit-part domestic new motor vehicle greenhouse gas emissions have played in what petitioners describe as a 150-year global phenomenon, and the myriad additional factors bearing on petitioners' alleged injury—the loss of Massachusetts coastal land—the connection is far too speculative to establish causation.

Redressability is even more problematic. To the tenuous link between petitioners' alleged injury and the indeterminate fractional domestic emissions at issue here, add the fact that petitioners cannot meaningfully predict what will come of the 80 percent of global greenhouse gas emissions that originate outside the United States. As the Court acknowledges, "developing countries such as China and India are poised to increase greenhouse gas emissions substantially over the next century," so the domestic emissions at issue here may become an increasingly marginal portion of global emissions, and any decreases produced by petitioners' desired standards are likely to be overwhelmed many times over by emissions increases elsewhere in the world.

Petitioners offer declarations attempting to address this uncertainty, contending that "[if] the U.S. takes steps to reduce motor vehicle emissions, other countries are very likely to take similar actions regarding their own motor vehicles using technology developed in response to the U.S. program." In other words, do not worry that other countries will contribute far more to global warming than will U.S. automobile emissions; someone is bound to invent something, and places like the People's Republic of China or India will surely require use of the new technology, regardless of cost. The Court previously has explained that when the existence of an element of standing "depends on the unfettered choices made by independent actors not before the courts and whose exercise of broad and legitimate discretion the courts cannot presume either to control or to predict," a party must present facts supporting an assertion that the actor will proceed in such a manner. The declarations' conclusory (not to say fanciful) statements do not even come close.

No matter, the Court reasons, because any decrease in domestic emissions will “slow the pace of global emissions increases, no matter what happens elsewhere.” Every little bit helps, so Massachusetts can sue over any little bit.

The Court’s sleight-of-hand is in failing to link up the different elements of the three-part standing test. What must be likely to be redressed is the particular injury in fact. The injury the Court looks to is the asserted loss of land. The Court contends that regulating domestic motor vehicle emissions will reduce carbon dioxide in the atmosphere, and therefore redress Massachusetts’ injury. But even if regulation does reduce emissions—to some indeterminate degree, given events elsewhere in the world, the Court never explains why that makes it likely that the injury in fact—the loss of land—will be redressed. Schoolchildren know that a kingdom might be lost “all for the want of a horseshoe nail,” but “likely” redressability is a different matter. The realities make it pure conjecture to suppose that EPA regulation of new automobile emissions will likely prevent the loss of Massachusetts coastal land.

Petitioners’ difficulty in demonstrating causation and redressability is not surprising given the evident mismatch between the source of their alleged injury—catastrophic global warming—and the narrow subject matter of the Clean Air Act provision at issue in this suit. The mismatch suggests that petitioners’ true goal for this litigation may be more symbolic than anything else. The constitutional role of the courts, however, is to decide concrete cases—not to serve as a convenient forum for policy debates.

[The] good news is that the Court’s “special solicitude” for Massachusetts limits the future applicability of the diluted standing requirements applied in this case. The bad news is that the Court’s self-professed relaxation of those Article III requirements has caused us to transgress “the proper—and properly limited—role of the courts in a democratic society.”

I respectfully dissent.

Clapper v. Amnesty International USA

133 S. Ct. 1138 (2013)

JUSTICE ALITO delivered the opinion of the Court.

Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, 50 U.S.C. §1881a (2006 ed., Supp. V), allows the Attorney General and the Director of National Intelligence to acquire foreign intelligence information by jointly authorizing the surveillance of individuals who are not “United States persons” and are reasonably believed to be located outside the United States. Before doing so, the Attorney General and the Director of National Intelligence normally must obtain the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court’s approval. Respondents are United States persons whose work, they allege, requires them to engage in sensitive international communications with individuals who they believe are likely targets of surveillance under §1881a. Respondents seek a declaration that §1881a is unconstitutional, as well as an injunction against §1881a-authorized surveillance. The question before us is whether respondents have Article III standing to seek this prospective relief.

Respondents assert that they can establish injury in fact because there is an objectively reasonable likelihood that their communications will be acquired under §1881a at some point in the future. But respondents’ theory of future injury is too speculative to satisfy the well-established requirement that threatened injury must be “certainly impending.” And even if respondents could demonstrate that the threatened injury is certainly impending, they still would not be able to establish that this injury is fairly traceable to §1881a. As an alternative argument, respondents contend that they are suffering present injury because the risk of §1881a-authorized surveillance already has forced them to take costly and burdensome measures to protect the confidentiality of their international communications. But respondents cannot manufacture standing by choosing to make expenditures based on hypothetical future harm that is not certainly impending. We therefore hold that respondents lack Article III standing.

The present case involves a constitutional challenge to §1881a. Surveillance under §1881a is subject to statutory conditions, judicial authorization, congressional supervision, and compliance with the Fourth Amendment. Section 1881a provides that, upon the issuance of an order from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court [FISC], “the Attorney General and the Director of National Intelligence may authorize jointly, for a period of up to 1 year..., the targeting of persons reasonably believed to be located outside the United States to acquire foreign intelligence information.” Surveillance under §1881a may not be intentionally targeted at any person known to be in the United States or any U.S.

person reasonably believed to be located abroad. Additionally, acquisitions under §1881a must comport with the Fourth Amendment. Moreover, surveillance under §1881a is subject to congressional oversight and several types of Executive Branch review.

Section 1881a mandates that the Government obtain the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court’s approval of “targeting” procedures, “minimization” procedures, and a governmental certification regarding proposed surveillance. Among other things, the Government’s certification must attest that (1) procedures are in place “that have been approved, have been submitted for approval, or will be submitted with the certification for approval by the [FISC] that are reasonably designed” to ensure that an acquisition is “limited to targeting persons reasonably believed to be located outside” the United States; (2) minimization procedures adequately restrict the acquisition, retention, and dissemination of nonpublic information about unconsenting U.S. persons, as appropriate; (3) guidelines have been adopted to ensure compliance with targeting limits and the Fourth Amendment; and (4) the procedures and guidelines referred to above comport with the Fourth Amendment.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court’s role includes determining whether the Government’s certification contains the required elements....

Respondents are attorneys and human rights, labor, legal, and media organizations whose work allegedly requires them to engage in sensitive and sometimes privileged telephone and e-mail communications with colleagues, clients, sources, and other individuals located abroad. [Respondents] claim that they communicate by telephone and e-mail with people the Government “believes or believed to be associated with terrorist organizations,” “people located in geographic areas that are a special focus” of the Government’s counterterrorism or diplomatic efforts, and activists who oppose governments that are supported by the United States Government.

Respondents claim that §1881a compromises their ability to locate witnesses, cultivate sources, obtain information, and communicate confidential information to their clients. Respondents also assert that they “have ceased engaging” in certain telephone and e-mail conversations. According to respondents, the threat of surveillance will compel them to travel abroad in order to have in-person conversations. In addition, respondents declare that they have undertaken “costly and burdensome measures” to protect the confidentiality of sensitive communications....

Respondents assert that they can establish injury in fact that is fairly traceable to §1881a because there is an objectively reasonable likelihood that their communications with their foreign contacts will be intercepted under §1881a at some point in the future. This argument fails....

[Respondents'] argument rests on their highly speculative fear that: (1) the Government will decide to target the communications of non-U.S. persons with whom they communicate; (2) in doing so, the Government will choose to invoke its authority under §1881a rather than utilizing another method of surveillance; (3) the Article III judges who serve on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court will conclude that the Government's proposed surveillance procedures satisfy §1881a's many safeguards and are consistent with the Fourth Amendment; (4) the Government will succeed in intercepting the communications of respondents' contacts; and (5) respondents will be parties to the particular communications that the Government intercepts....

[Respondents'] theory of standing, which relies on a highly attenuated chain of possibilities, does not satisfy the requirement that threatened injury must be certainly impending. Moreover, even if respondents could demonstrate injury in fact, the second link in the above-described chain of contingencies—which amounts to mere speculation about whether surveillance would be under §1881a or some other authority—shows that respondents cannot satisfy the requirement that any injury in fact must be fairly traceable to §1881a.

First, it is speculative whether the Government will imminently target communications to which respondents are parties. Section 1881a expressly provides that respondents, who are U.S. persons, cannot be targeted for surveillance under §1881a....

Accordingly, respondents' theory necessarily rests on their assertion that the Government will target other individuals—namely, their foreign contacts.

Yet respondents have no actual knowledge of the Government's §1881a targeting practices. Instead, respondents merely speculate and make assumptions about whether their communications with their foreign contacts will be acquired under §1881a. For example, journalist Christopher Hedges states: "I have no choice but to assume that any of my international communications may be subject to government surveillance, and I have to make decisions...in light of that assumption." Similarly, attorney Scott McKay asserts that, "[b]ecause of the [FISA Amendments Act], we now have to assume that every one of our international communications may be monitored by the government.”...

[Because] §1881a at most authorizes—but does not mandate or direct—the surveillance that respondents fear, respondents’ allegations are necessarily conjectural. Simply put, respondents can only speculate as to how the Attorney General and the Director of National Intelligence will exercise their discretion in determining which communications to target.

Second, even if respondents could demonstrate that the targeting of their foreign contacts is imminent, respondents can only speculate as to whether the Government will seek to use §1881 authorized surveillance (rather than other methods) to do so. The Government has numerous other methods of conducting surveillance, none of which is challenged here. Even after the enactment of the FISA Amendments Act, for example, the Government may still conduct electronic surveillance of persons abroad under the older provisions of FISA so long as it satisfies the applicable requirements, including a demonstration of probable cause to believe that the person is a foreign power or agent of a foreign power. The Government may also obtain information from the intelligence services of foreign nations....Even if respondents could demonstrate that their foreign contacts will imminently be targeted—indeed, even if they could show that interception of their own communications will imminently occur—they would still need to show that their injury is fairly traceable to §1881a. But, because respondents can only speculate as to whether any (asserted) interception would be under §1881a or some other authority, they cannot satisfy the “fairly traceable” requirement.

Third, even if respondents could show that the Government will seek the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court’s authorization to acquire the communications of respondents’ foreign contacts under §1881a, respondents can only speculate as to whether that court will authorize such surveillance....

We decline to abandon our usual reluctance to endorse standing theories that rest on speculation about the decisions of independent actors. In sum, respondents’ speculative chain of possibilities does not establish that injury based on potential future surveillance is certainly impending or is fairly traceable to §1881a.

Respondents’ alternative argument—namely, that they can establish standing based on the measures that they have undertaken to avoid §1881a-authorized surveillance—fares no better. Respondents assert that they are suffering ongoing injuries that are fairly traceable to §1881a because the risk of surveillance under §1881a requires them to take costly and burdensome measures to protect the confidentiality of their communications. Respondents claim, for instance, that the threat of surveillance sometimes compels them to avoid certain e-mail and phone conversations, to “tal[k] in generalities rather than specifics,” or to travel so that they can have in-person conversations....

Respondents’ contention that they have standing because they incurred certain costs as a reasonable reaction to a risk of harm is unavailing—because the harm respondents seek to avoid is not certainly impending. In other words, respondents cannot manufacture standing merely by inflicting harm on themselves based on their fears of hypothetical future harm that is not certainly impending. Any ongoing injuries that respondents are suffering are not fairly traceable to §1881a.

If the law were otherwise, an enterprising plaintiff would be able to secure a lower standard for Article III standing simply by making an expenditure based on a nonparanoid fear....

Thus, allowing respondents to bring this action based on costs they incurred in response to a speculative threat would be tantamount to accepting a repackaged version of respondents’ first failed theory of standing.

Another reason that respondents’ present injuries are not fairly traceable to §1881a is that even before §1881a was enacted, they had a similar incentive to engage in many of the countermeasures that they are now taking....

Respondents incorrectly maintain that “[t]he kinds of injuries incurred here —injuries incurred because of [respondents’] reasonable efforts to avoid greater injuries that are otherwise likely to flow from the conduct they challenge—are the same kinds of injuries that this Court held to support standing in cases such as” Laidlaw [and] Meese v. Keene, 481 U.S. 465 (1987)....

[Each] of these cases was very different from the present case.

In Laidlaw, plaintiffs’ standing was based on “the proposition that a company’s continuous and pervasive illegal discharges of pollutants into a river would cause nearby residents to curtail their recreational use of that waterway and would subject them to other economic and aesthetic harms.” Because the unlawful discharges of pollutants were “concededly ongoing,” the only issue was whether “nearby residents”—who were members of the organizational plaintiffs—acted reasonably in refraining from using the polluted area. Laidlaw is therefore quite unlike the present case, in which it is not “concede[d]” that respondents would be subject to unlawful surveillance but for their decision to take preventive measures. Laidlaw would resemble this case only if (1) it were undisputed that the Government was using §1881a-authorized surveillance to acquire respondents’ communications and (2) the sole dispute concerned the reasonableness of respondents’ preventive measures.

In Keene, the plaintiff challenged the constitutionality of the Government’s decision to label three films as “political propaganda.” The Court held that the plaintiff, who was an attorney and a state legislator, had standing because he demonstrated, through “detailed affidavits,” that he “could not exhibit the films without incurring a risk of injury to his reputation and of an impairment of his political career.” Unlike the present case, Keene involved “more than a ‘subjective chill’” based on speculation about potential governmental action; the plaintiff in that case was unquestionably regulated by the relevant statute, and the films that he wished to exhibit had already been labeled as “political propaganda.”...

Respondents also suggest that they should be held to have standing because otherwise the constitutionality of §1881a could not be challenged. It would be wrong, they maintain, to “insulate the government’s surveillance activities from meaningful judicial review.” Respondents’ suggestion is both legally and factually incorrect. First, “[t]he assumption that if respondents have no standing to sue, no one would have standing, is not a reason to find standing.”

Second, our holding today by no means insulates §1881a from judicial review. As described above, Congress created a comprehensive scheme in which the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court evaluates the Government’s certifications, targeting procedures, and minimization procedures—including assessing whether the targeting and minimization procedures comport with the Fourth Amendment. Any dissatisfaction that respondents may have about the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court’s rulings—or the congressional delineation of that court’s role—is irrelevant to our standing analysis.

Additionally, if the Government intends to use or disclose information obtained or derived from a §1881a acquisition in judicial or administrative proceedings, it must provide advance notice of its intent, and the affected person may challenge the lawfulness of the acquisition....

Finally, any electronic communications service provider that the Government directs to assist in §1881a surveillance may challenge the lawfulness of that directive before the FISC. Indeed, at the behest of a service provider, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court of Review previously analyzed the constitutionality of electronic surveillance directives issued pursuant to a now-expired set of FISA amendments.

* * *

We hold that respondents lack Article III standing because they cannot demonstrate that the future injury they purportedly fear is certainly impending and because they cannot manufacture standing by incurring costs in anticipation of non-imminent harm. We therefore reverse the judgment of the Second Circuit and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE BREYER, with whom JUSTICE GINSBURG, JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR, and JUSTICE KAGAN join, dissenting.

I...

No one here denies that the Government's interception of a private telephone or e-mail conversation amounts to an injury that is "concrete and particularized." Moreover, the plaintiffs, respondents here, seek as relief a judgment declaring unconstitutional (and enjoining enforcement of) a statutory provision authorizing those interceptions; and, such a judgment would redress the injury by preventing it. Thus, the basic question is whether the injury, i.e., the interception, is "actual or imminent."

A...

The addition of §1881a in 2008 changed [prior] law in three important ways. First, it eliminated the requirement that the Government describe to the court each specific target and identify each facility at which its surveillance would be directed, thus permitting surveillance on a programmatic, not necessarily individualized, basis. Second, it eliminated the requirement that a target be a "foreign power or an agent of a foreign power." Third, it diminished the court's authority to insist upon, and eliminated its authority to supervise, instance-specific privacy-intrusion minimization procedures (though the Government still must use court-approved general minimization procedures). Thus, using the authority of §1881a, the Government can obtain court approval for its surveillance of electronic communications between places within the United States and targets in foreign territories by showing the court (1) that “a significant purpose of the acquisition is to obtain foreign intelligence information,” and (2) that it will use general targeting and privacy-intrusion minimization procedures of a kind that the court had previously approved.

Plaintiff Scott McKay [says] in an affidavit (1) that he is a lawyer; (2) that he represented “Mr. Sami Omar Al-Hussayen, who was acquitted in June 2004 on terrorism charges”; (3) that he continues to represent “Mr. Al-Hussayen, who, in addition to facing criminal charges after September 11, was named as a defendant in several civil cases”; (4) that he represents Khalid Sheik Mohammed, a detainee, “before the Military Commissions at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba”; (5) that in representing these clients he “communicate[s] by telephone and email with people outside the United States, including Mr. Al-Hussayen himself,” “experts, investigators, attorneys, family members...and others who are located abroad”; and (6) that prior to 2008 “the U.S. government had intercepted some 10,000 telephone calls and 20,000 e-mail communications involving [his client] Al-Hussayen.”...

[Another] plaintiff, Joanne Mariner, says in her affidavit (1) that she is a human rights researcher, (2) that “some of the work [she] do[es] involves trying to track down people who were rendered by the CIA to countries in which they were tortured”; (3) that many of those people “the CIA has said are (or were) associated with terrorist organizations”; and (4) that, to do this research, she “communicate[s] by telephone and e-mail with...former detainees, lawyers for detainees, relatives of detainees, political activists, journalists, and fixers” “all over the world, including in Jordan, Egypt, Pakistan, Afghanistan, [and] the Gaza Strip.”...

Several considerations, based upon the record along with commonsense inferences, convince me that there is a very high likelihood that Government, acting under the authority of §1881a, will intercept at least some of the communications just described. First, the plaintiffs have engaged, and continue to engage, in electronic communications of a kind that the 2008 amendment, but not the prior Act, authorizes the Government to intercept. These communications include discussions with family members of those detained at Guantanamo, friends and acquaintances of those persons, and investigators, experts, and others with knowledge of circumstances related to terrorist activities. These persons are foreigners located outside the United States. They are not “foreign power[s]” or “agent[s] of...foreign power[s].” And the plaintiffs state that they exchange with these persons “foreign intelligence information,” defined to include information that “relates to” “international terrorism” and “the national defense or the security of the United States.”

Second, the plaintiffs have a strong motive to engage in, and the Government has a strong motive to listen to, conversations of the kind described. A lawyer representing a client normally seeks to learn the circumstances surrounding the crime (or the civil wrong) of which the client is accused. A fair reading of the affidavit of Scott McKay, for example, taken together with elementary considerations of a lawyer’s obligation to his client, indicates that McKay will engage in conversations that concern what suspected foreign terrorists, such as his client, have done; in conversations that concern his clients’ families, colleagues, and contacts; in conversations that concern what those persons (or those connected to them) have said and done, at least in relation to terrorist activities; in conversations that concern the political, social, and commercial environments in which the suspected terrorists have lived and worked; and so forth. Journalists and human rights workers have strong similar motives to conduct conversations of this kind.

At the same time, the Government has a strong motive to conduct surveillance of conversations that contain material of this kind. The Government, after all, seeks to learn as much as it can reasonably learn about suspected terrorists (such as those detained at Guantanamo), as well as about their contacts and activities, along with those of friends and family members. And the Government is motivated to do so, not simply by the desire to help convict those whom the Government believes guilty, but also by the critical, overriding need to protect America from terrorism.

Third, the Government’s past behavior shows that it has sought, and hence will in all likelihood continue to seek, information about alleged terrorists and detainees through means that include surveillance of electronic communications. As just pointed out, plaintiff Scott McKay states that the Government (under the authority of the pre-2008 law) “intercepted some 10,000 telephone calls and 20,000 e-mail communications involving [his client] Mr. Al-Hussayen.”

Fourth, the Government has the capacity to conduct electronic surveillance of the kind at issue. To some degree this capacity rests upon technology available to the Government. [This] capacity also includes the Government’s authority to obtain the kind of information here at issue from private carriers such as AT&T and Verizon. We are further told by amici that the Government is expanding that capacity.

Of course, to exercise this capacity the Government must have intelligence court authorization. But the Government rarely files requests that fail to meet the statutory criteria. As the intelligence court itself has stated, its review under §1881a is “narrowly circumscribed.” There is no reason to believe that the communications described would all fail to meet the conditions necessary for approval. Moreover, compared with prior law, §1881a simplifies and thus expedites the approval process, making it more likely that the Government will use §1881a to obtain the necessary approval.

The upshot is that (1) similarity of content, (2) strong motives, (3) prior behavior, and (4) capacity all point to a very strong likelihood that the Government will intercept at least some of the plaintiffs’ communications, including some that the 2008 amendment, §1881a, but not the pre-2008 Act, authorizes the Government to intercept....

Consequently, we need only assume that the Government is doing its job (to find out about, and combat, terrorism) in order to conclude that there is a high probability that the Government will intercept at least some electronic communication to which at least some of the plaintiffs are parties. The majority is wrong when it describes the harm threatened plaintiffs as “speculative.”

A

The majority more plausibly says that the plaintiffs have failed to show that the threatened harm is “certainly impending.” But [certainty] is not, and never has been, the touchstone of standing. The future is inherently uncertain. Yet federal courts frequently entertain actions for injunctions and for declaratory relief aimed at preventing future activities that are reasonably likely or highly likely, but not absolutely certain, to take place. And that degree of certainty is all that is needed to support standing here.

The Court’s use of the term “certainly impending” is not to the contrary....

Taken together the case law uses the word “certainly” as if it emphasizes, rather than literally defines, the immediately following term “impending.”

B

More important, the Court's holdings in standing cases show that standing exists here. The Court has often found standing where the occurrence of the relevant injury was far less certain than here. Consider a few, fairly typical, cases. Consider Pennell. A city ordinance forbade landlords to raise the rent charged to a tenant by more than 8 percent where doing so would work an unreasonably severe hardship on that tenant. A group of landlords sought a judgment declaring the ordinance unconstitutional. The Court held that, to have standing, the landlords had to demonstrate a “realistic danger of sustaining a direct injury as a result of the statute’s operation.” It found that the landlords had done so by showing a likelihood of enforcement and a “probability,” that the ordinance would make the landlords charge lower rents—even though the landlords had not shown (1) that they intended to raise the relevant rents to the point of causing unreasonably severe hardship; (2) that the tenants would challenge those increases; or (3) that the city’s hearing examiners and arbitrators would find against the landlords. Here, even more so than in Pennell, there is a “realistic danger” that the relevant harm will occur....

How could the law be otherwise? Suppose that a federal court faced a claim by homeowners that (allegedly) unlawful dam-building practices created a high risk that their homes would be flooded. Would the court deny them standing on the ground that the risk of flood was only 60, rather than 90, percent?

Would federal courts deny standing to a plaintiff in a diversity action who claims an anticipatory breach of contract where the future breach depends on probabilities? The defendant, say, has threatened to load wheat onto a ship bound for India despite a promise to send the wheat to the United States. No one can know for certain that this will happen. Perhaps the defendant will change his mind; perhaps the ship will turn and head for the United States. Yet, despite the uncertainty, the Constitution does not prohibit a federal court from hearing such a claim....

Neither do ordinary declaratory judgment actions always involve the degree of certainty upon which the Court insists here. See, e.g.,...Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Haworth, 300 U.S. 227, 239–244 (1937).

In some standing cases, the Court has found that a reasonable probability of future injury comes accompanied with present injury that takes the form of reasonable efforts to mitigate the threatened effects of the future injury or to prevent it from occurring....

Virtually identical circumstances are present here. Plaintiff McKay, for example, points out that, when he communicates abroad about, or in the interests of, a client (e.g., a client accused of terrorism), he must “make an assessment” whether his “client’s interests would be compromised” should the Government “acquire the communications.” If so, he must either forgo the communication or travel abroad....

In sum [the] word “certainly” in the phrase “certainly impending” does not refer to absolute certainty. As our case law demonstrates, what the Constitution requires is something more akin to “reasonable probability” or “high probability.” The use of some such standard is all that is necessary here to ensure the actual concrete injury that the Constitution demands. The considerations set forth in Parts II and III, supra, make clear that the standard is readily met in this case.

* * *

While I express no view on the merits of the plaintiffs’ constitutional claims, I do believe that at least some of the plaintiffs have standing to make those claims. I dissent, with respect, from the majority’s contrary conclusion.

Note: The Law of Standing

1. Underlying concerns. What functions are served by standing limitations? Consider the following possibilities.

(a) They ensure that the courts will decide cases that are concrete rather than abstract or hypothetical. To what extent is this so? Was the dispute in Lujan abstract or hypothetical?

(b) They promote judicial restraint by limiting the occasions for judicial intervention into the political process. But are standing limitations a good means of limiting such intrusions? Maybe they are, if the consequence of such limitations is to ensure that, if citizens generally or as a whole have a complaint, they have to go to the political process, not to the federal courts.

(c) They ensure that decisions will be made at the behest of those directly affected rather than on behalf of outsiders with a purely ideological interest in the controversy. This factor will simultaneously promote vigorous advocacy. Was there a danger of insufficiently vigorous advocacy in Lujan, Massachusetts v. EPA, or Clapper? Note that sometimes those directly affected will fail to sue for reasons other than contentment with the status quo. Note also that one needs a theory with which to decide who is “directly affected” and who is an “outsider.” And note the potential preclusive effects that litigation by a relatively uninterested party might have, especially given devices such as class actions.

(d) Standing doctrines are an important part of the separation of powers system. They ensure that courts will not hear cases simply because they want to; they require a concrete stake and thus give the executive and legislative branches a range of breathing space. For discussion of some of these considerations, see Scalia, The Doctrine of Standing as an Essential Element of the Separation of Powers, 17 Suffolk U. L. Rev. 881 (1983); Sunstein, Standing and the Privatization of Public Law, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 1432 (1988).

(e) Standing doctrines ensure that people can bring suit only if some source of law has given them a cause of action. People cannot sue simply because they are unhappy, dissatisfied, or outraged. They must be able to point to some source of law that entitles them to have access to federal court.

2. The constitutional and prudential components of standing doctrine. The Court has divided standing requirements into several parts. Our focus is on article III, which is now taken to require (a) an injury in fact that (b) is due to the defendant's behavior and (c) is likely to be redressed by a decree in the plaintiff's favor. For many years, the Court has also said that prudential requirements, not based on article III and subject to congressional override, require that the plaintiff's injury (a) be arguably within the zone of interests protected or regulated by the statutory or constitutional provision at issue and (b) not be too generalized, that is, be particular and not shared by all or almost all citizens. See Federal Election Commission v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11 (1998). Prudential requirements are "judicially self-imposed limits on the exercise of federal jurisdiction," Allen, 468 U.S. at 751, while the article III-based components of standing are binding constraints on judicial power.

More recently, however, the Court has said that the zone of interests test is not prudential but is instead a reading of the Administrative Procedure Act, and also that the ban on generalized injuries is an Article III requirement. See Lexmark International, Inc. v. Static Control Components, Inc., 134 S. Ct. 1377 (2014). We will return to this suggestion.

3. Standing—what are injuries, in fact? A significant part of standing doctrine focuses on what sorts of injuries can confer standing.

a. Injury in fact. Standing limitations, in their current form, are actually relatively new. The injury in fact requirement evolved from the earlier requirement of a "legal injury." A "legal injury" pointed to different considerations from those embodied in the requirement of "injury in fact." To show a legal injury, one had to show that some law entitled one to relief; this showing could be made by identifying an injury to an interest that was protected at common law, or that entitled the plaintiff to redress under a relevant statute. On this view, the question whether there was standing was essentially the question whether there was a cause of action. Without a cause of action, there was no “case” and no “controversy.” Someone would have “standing” if she had a claim to relief under a statute. In this sense, the questions of standing, cause of action, and the merits were fused. Some of current doctrine reflects the view that people need a cause of action in order to bring suit; but the law is not adequately captured in that phrase.

In the early days of standing doctrine—the first decades of the twentieth century—a common law interest was often treated as a necessary basis for standing. Standing limits, like other justiciability doctrines, were elaborated by justices allied with the progressive movement or the New Deal—most notably Justices Brandeis and Frankfurter, defenders of the regulatory state—who sought to develop devices immunizing government from judicial review. See, e.g., Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U.S. 123, 154–155 (1951) (Frankfurter, J., concurring); Alabama Power Co. v. Ickes, 302 U.S. 464, 479–480 (1938); Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 297 U.S. 288, 341–345 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring); Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U.S. 126, 129–130 (1922).

Although these justices were hardly critical of government intervention into the economy, the consequence of the new standing requirements was a body of doctrine that was in fact rooted in a sharp split between the public and private spheres. Usually one had to show at least a common law interest to obtain standing. Beneficiaries of government action—consumers, public interest groups, victims of discrimination—were denied standing. Judicial intervention could be invoked by those trying to fend off government activity but not by those trying to obtain government protection. Invasion of private property rights was the usual basis for obtaining review. This understanding was an amalgam of common law and statutory interpretation. For the most part it was not thought to be constitutional in nature. For a detailed discussion of the relevant history, along with an evaluation of standing limits, see Winter, The Metaphor of Standing and the Problem of Self-Governance, 40 Stan. L. Rev. 1371 (1988). For a contrary view, see Woolhandler and Nelson, Does History Defeat Standing Doctrine?, 102 Mich. L. Rev. 689 (2004).

In the 1960s and 1970s, however, courts emphasized that people invoking statutory interests also suffered “legal injury.” On this view, the fact that an interest protected by statute was at stake gave rise to an inference that Congress had intended to allow someone invoking that interest to bring suit. For example, people who listened to the radio could challenge decisions of the Federal Communications Commission, and people who enjoyed the environment could challenge the building of a power plant near a river. See Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ v. FCC, 359 F.2d 994 (D.C. Cir. 1966); Scenic Hudson Preservation Conference v. FPC, 354 F.2d 608 (2d Cir. 1965). Notably, this broadening of standing was done under the rubric of statutory interpretation. It continued the original idea that whether someone had standing depended on whether Congress had conferred on that person a right to relief. Thus far, no “injury in fact” was required, and article III was implicated only insofar as courts treated a congressional grant of a right to relief as a necessary condition for standing.

The real roots of modern standing law can be found not in the founding period, and not even during the New Deal, but instead in Association of Data Processing Services Organizations v. Camp, 397 U.S. 150 (1970). In that case, the Court boldly altered previous law by abandoning the legal interest test altogether in favor of a new inquiry into whether there was injury in fact. It is noteworthy that the injury in fact requirement seemed to be an interpretation of the Administrative Procedure Act, not an interpretation of the Constitution, though the Court was ambiguous on that point. It is also noteworthy that the Court clearly intended to broaden, rather than to narrow, standing. It emphasized that the injury in fact requirement is relatively lenient. According to the Court, it may include a wide variety of economic, aesthetic, environmental, and other harms.

The consequence of Data Processing is that beneficiaries of government regulation, not merely those trying to fend off government action, can have standing to sue. But even under Data Processing, a merely ideological interest—or an interest in bringing about compliance with the law—is insufficient. But what is the line between an “injury in fact” and a “mere” ideological injury? Might not that line turn on whether Congress has created a right to relief?

Standing was denied on injury in fact grounds in Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727 (1972). The case involved an effort by an organization with “a special interest in the conservation and sound maintenance of the national parks” to challenge construction of a recreation area in a national forest. In the plaintiffs’ view, the construction would have violated federal law. The Court denied standing, saying that the fact that an aesthetic, conservational, or recreational harm would be sufficient did not mean that the Court would abandon “the requirement that the party seeking review must have himself suffered an injury.” In this case, the “Sierra Club failed to allege that it or its members” used the site in question.

What is the purpose of denying standing in Sierra Club? Would the Sierra Club have been an ineffective or a half-hearted advocate? Was there no case or controversy? Consider the view that the Sierra Club was litigating the rights of others who had a more direct stake in the controversy and the idea that those others, and not an intermeddling bystander, should have an exclusive right to raise the underlying legal issues.

Sierra Club might also be contrasted with United States v. SCRAP, 412 U.S. 669 (1973), in which the Court held that environmental groups could challenge the Interstate Commerce Commission's failure to suspend a surcharge on railroad freight rates as unlawful under the Interstate Commerce Commission Act. The plaintiffs claimed that their members "used the forests, streams, mountains, and other resources in the Washington metropolitan area for camping, hiking, fishing, and sightseeing." According to the Court, the Constitution was satisfied by the attenuated line of causation to the eventual injury of which the [plaintiffs] complained—a general rate increase would allegedly cause increased use of nonrecyclable commodities as compared to recyclable goods, thus resulting in the need to use more natural resources to produce such goods, some of which resources might be taken from the Washington area, and resulting in more refuse that might be discarded in national parks in the Washington area.

It is not at all clear, however, that SCRAP could command a majority today, as Massachusetts v. EPA reveals. The Court distinguished SCRAP in Summers v. Earth Island Institute, 555 U.S. 488 (2009). Plaintiffs, a group of environmental organizations, challenged the failure of the United States Forest Service to enforce regulations requiring it to establish notice, comment, and appeal procedures for proposed actions implementing land and resource management plans. The Court held that an affidavit submitted by a member of one of the organizations that he "has visited many National Forests and plans to visit several unnamed National Forests in the future" was insufficient to establish standing because it failed to allege that any particular timber sale or other project claimed to be unlawfully subject to regulations will impede a specific and concrete plan of [the affiant's] to enjoy the National Forests. The National Forests occupy more than 190 million acres, an area larger than Texas. There may be a chance, but it is hardly a likelihood, that [affiant's] wanderings will bring him to a parcel about to be affected by a project unlawfully subject to the regulations. Indeed, without further specification, it is impossible to tell which projects are in respondents' view unlawfully subject to regulations.

Compare Justice Breyer's dissenting opinion, joined by Justices Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg. He observed that the plaintiff organizations had "hundreds of thousands of members who use forests regularly across the nation." The members' activities led him to this analogy: "To know, virtually for certain, that snow will fall in New England this winter is not to know the name of each particular town where it is bound to arrive. The law of standing does not require the latter kind of specificity."

b. Injuries to third parties. The notion that a plaintiff may not litigate the rights of third parties is closely related to the "injury in fact" requirement. The plaintiff must litigate on the basis of an injury to him or her; it is up to third parties to litigate their own rights. See, e.g., Tileston v. Ullman, 318 U.S. 44 (1943) (doctor may not challenge statute on ground that it would deprive patients of their lives without due process). See generally Monaghan, Third Party Standing, 84 Colum. L. Rev. 567 (1984); Brilmayer, The Jurisprudence of Article III: Perspectives on the "Case or Controversy" Requirement, 93 Harv. L. Rev. 297 (1979).

c. Procedural violations. To what extent can procedural violations count as injury in fact to establish constitutional standing? Consider Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540 (2016).

The Fair Credit Reporting Act of 1970 requires consumer reporting agencies to "follow reasonable procedures to assure maximum possible accuracy of" consumer reports, and imposes liability on "[a]ny person who willfully fails to comply with any requirement [of the Act] with respect to any" individual. 15 U.S.C. §§1681e(b), 1681n(a). Robins brought a class action alleging that Spokeo's online "people search engine" generated a profile of him that contained inaccurate information and thus violated the FCRA's requirements. The District Court dismissed, finding that Robins had not satisfied article III's injury-in-fact test. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed, concluding that Robins had established injury in fact because "Spokeo violated his statutory rights" and because his "personal interests in the handling of his credit information [were] individualized."

Writing for the Court, Justice Alito elaborated on the meaning of the injury-in-fact test's particularization and concreteness requirements, finding that the Ninth Circuit's standing analysis was "incomplete" because it failed to address the question "whether the particular procedural violations alleged in [the] case [entailed] a degree of risk sufficient to meet the concreteness requirement."

For an injury to be "particularized," it "must affect the plaintiff in a personal and individual way." [Particularization] is necessary to establish injury in fact, but it is not sufficient. An injury in fact must also be “concrete.” Under the Ninth Circuit’s analysis, however, that independent requirement was elided. [The] Ninth Circuit concluded that Robins’ complaint alleges “concrete, de facto” injuries for essentially two reasons. [First], the court noted that Robins “alleges that Spokeo violated his statutory rights, not just the statutory rights of other people.” [Second], the court wrote that “Robins’s personal interests in the handling of his credit information are individualized rather than collective.” [Both] of these observations concern particularization, not concreteness. We have made it clear time and time again that an injury in fact must be both concrete and particularized....

A “concrete” injury must be “de facto”; that is, it must actually exist. [When] we have used the adjective “concrete,” we have meant to convey the usual meaning of the term—“real,” and not “abstract.” [Concreteness], therefore, is quite different from particularization. [“Concrete”] is not, however, necessarily synonymous with “tangible.” Although tangible injuries are perhaps easier to recognize, we have confirmed in many of our previous cases that intangible injuries can nevertheless be concrete....

In determining whether an intangible harm constitutes injury in fact, both history and the judgment of Congress play important roles. Because the doctrine of standing derives from the case-or-controversy requirement, and because that requirement in turn is grounded in historical practice, it is instructive to consider whether an alleged intangible harm has a close relationship to a harm that has traditionally been regarded as providing a basis for a lawsuit in English or American courts. See Vermont Agency of Natural Resources v. United States ex rel. Stevens, 529 U.S. 765, 775–777 (2000). In addition, because Congress is well positioned to identify intangible harms that meet minimum Article III requirements, its judgment is also instructive and important. Thus, we said in Lujan that Congress may “elevat[e] to the status of legally cognizable injuries concrete, de facto injuries that were previously inadequate in law.” [Similarly], Justice Kennedy’s concurrence in that case explained that “Congress has the power to define injuries and articulate chains of causation that will give rise to a case or controversy where none existed before.”...

Congress’ role in identifying and elevating intangible harms does not mean that a plaintiff automatically satisfies the injury-in-fact requirement whenever a statute grants a person a statutory right and purports to authorize that person to sue to vindicate that right. Article III standing requires a concrete injury even in the context of a statutory violation. For that reason, Robins could not, for example, allege a bare procedural violation, divorced from any concrete harm, and satisfy the injury-in-fact requirement of Article III. See Summers v. Earth

Island Institute, 555 U.S. 488, 496 (2009) (“[D]eprivation of a procedural right without some concrete interest that is affected by the deprivation...is insufficient to create Article III standing”); see also Lujan, supra, at 572.

This does not mean, however, that the risk of real harm cannot satisfy the requirement of concreteness. See, e.g., Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, 568 U.S. —(2013). For example, the law has long permitted recovery by certain tort victims even if their harms may be difficult to prove or measure. [Just] as the common law permitted suit in such instances, the violation of a procedural right granted by statute can be sufficient in some circumstances to constitute injury in fact. In other words, a plaintiff in such a case need not allege any additional harm beyond the one Congress has identified. See Federal Election Comm'n v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11, 20–25 (1998) (confirming that a group of voters’ “inability to obtain information” that Congress had decided to make public is a sufficient injury in fact to satisfy Article III); Public Citizen v. Department of Justice, 491 U.S. 440, 449 (1989) (holding that two advocacy organizations’ failure to obtain information subject to disclosure under the Federal Advisory Committee Act “constitutes a sufficiently distinct injury to provide standing to sue”).

The Court concluded that although “Congress plainly sought to curb the dissemination of false information by adopting procedures designed to decrease that risk,” Robins “[could not] satisfy the demands of article III by alleging a bare procedural violation.” It reasoned:

A violation of one of the FCRA’s procedural requirements may result in no harm. For example, even if a consumer reporting agency fails to provide the required notice to a user of the agency’s consumer information, that information regardless may be entirely accurate. In addition, not all inaccuracies cause harm or present any material risk of harm. An example that comes readily to mind is an incorrect zip code. It is difficult to imagine how the dissemination of an incorrect zip code, without more, could work any concrete harm.

Justice Thomas concurred in the judgment and wrote a separate opinion “to explain how, in [his] view, the injury-in-fact requirement applies to different types of rights.” He stated:

The judicial power of common-law courts was historically limited depending on the nature of the plaintiff’s suit. Common-law courts more readily entertained suits from private plaintiffs who alleged a violation of their own rights, in contrast to private plaintiffs who asserted claims vindicating public rights....

Historically, common-law courts possessed broad power to adjudicate suits involving the alleged violation of private rights, even when plaintiffs alleged only the violation of those rights and nothing more. [Generally], only the government had the authority to vindicate a harm borne by the public at large, such as the violation of the criminal laws, and [e]ven in limited cases where private plaintiffs could bring a claim for the violation of public rights, they had to allege that the violation caused them “some extraordinary damage, beyond the rest of the [community]....

Noting that this distinction underlies modern standing doctrine, Justice Thomas explained:

Congress can create new private rights and authorize private plaintiffs to sue based simply on the violation of those private rights. [A] plaintiff seeking to vindicate a statutorily created private right need not allege actual harm beyond the invasion of that private right....A plaintiff seeking to vindicate a public right embodied in a federal statute, however, must demonstrate that the violation of that public right has caused him a concrete, individual harm distinct from the general population. [Thus], Congress cannot authorize private plaintiffs to enforce public rights in their own names, absent some showing that the plaintiff has suffered a concrete harm particular to him.

Justice Thomas concluded:

The Fair Credit Reporting Act creates a series of regulatory duties. Robins has no standing to sue Spokeo, in his own name, for violations of the duties that Spokeo owes to the public collectively, absent some showing that he has suffered concrete and particular harm. [But] a remand is required because one claim in Robins’ complaint rests on a statutory provision that could arguably establish a private cause of action to vindicate the violation of a privately held right. Section 1681e(b) requires Spokeo to “follow reasonable procedures to assure maximum possible accuracy of the information concerning the individual about whom the report relates.” §1681e(b) (emphasis added). If Congress has created a private duty owed personally to Robins to protect his information, then the violation of the legal duty suffices for Article III injury in fact. If that provision, however, vests any and all consumers with the power to police the “reasonable procedures” of Spokeo, without more, then Robins has no standing to sue for its violation absent an allegation that he has suffered individualized harm. On remand, the Court of Appeals can consider the nature of this claim.

Justice Ginsburg wrote a dissenting opinion (joined by Justice Sotomayor) in which she argued that Robins' injury was sufficiently "concrete." She wrote:

Robins would not qualify, the Court observes, if he alleged a "bare" procedural violation [one] that results in no harm, for example, "an incorrect zip code." Far from an incorrect zip code, Robins complains of misinformation about his education, family situation, and economic status, inaccurate representations that could affect his fortune in the job market. The FCRA's procedural requirements aimed to prevent such harm. [I] therefore see no utility in returning this case to the Ninth Circuit to underscore what Robins' complaint already conveys concretely: Spokeo's misinformation "cause[s] actual harm to [his] employment prospects."

d. Threatened injury. The "injury in fact" requirement is usually met by those who can show a sufficient threat of future injury. As Clapper holds, this threat must be real and immediate rather than "merely" speculative or hypothetical. The refusal to recognize speculative or hypothetical harms plays an important role in suits seeking injunctive relief. Consider City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95 (1983), an action brought against the Los Angeles police department and city officials, seeking injunctive relief to prevent the use of "chokeholds" in arrests. Lyons, the plaintiff, had in fact been the victim of a chokehold; he also brought an action for damages. But the Court said that the fact that he was also seeking damages did not mean he could obtain an injunction when he was not "likely to suffer future injury from the use of chokeholds by police officers." To show such a likelihood, he would have "to make the incredible assertion either, (1) that all police officers in Los Angeles always choke any citizen with whom they happen to have an encounter whether for the purpose of arrest, issuing a citation or for questioning or, (2) that the City ordered or authorized police officers to act in such a manner." Assume the practice at issue in Lyons is unconstitutional. Would anyone have standing to enjoin it?

e. Widely diffused harms. Should the Court refuse to decide cases in which the harm caused by government action is widely diffused—in the sense that many or all citizens feel it equally? Consider in this regard Schlesinger v. Reservists to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208 (1974), which involved a claim, made by an association of present and former members of the Reserves, that the Reserve membership of certain members of Congress violated the incompatibility clause. That clause provides that "no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his Continuance in Office." The Court said:

The only interest [is one] shared by all citizens. [The] claimed nonobservance [of that Clause], standing alone, would adversely affect only the generalized interest of all citizens in constitutional governance, and that is an abstract injury.

To permit a complainant who has no concrete injury to require a court to rule on important constitutional issues in the abstract would create the potential for abuse of the judicial process, distort the role of the Judiciary in its relationship to the Executive and the Legislature and open the Judiciary to an arguable charge of "government by injunction."

The Court added that the plaintiffs did not meet the requirements of Flast v. Cohen, infra. Justices Douglas, Brennan, and Marshall dissented.

Consider also United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166 (1974), an effort by a taxpayer to challenge the Central Intelligence Agency Act of 1949, which provides that Central Intelligence Agency expenditures may not be made public. According to the plaintiff, the act violated article I, section 9, clause 7 of the Constitution, which provides that "a regular statement of Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time." The Court responded that the plaintiff's claim was only "a generalized grievance" that was "common to all members of the public. While we can hardly dispute that this respondent has a genuine interest in the use of funds and that his interest may be prompted by his status as a taxpayer, he has not alleged that, as a taxpayer, he is in danger of suffering any particular concrete injury as a result of the operation of this statute." The Court added:

It can be argued that if respondent is not permitted to litigate this issue, no one can do so. In a very real sense, the absence of any particular individual or class to litigate these claims gives support to the argument that the subject matter is committed to the surveillance of Congress, and ultimately to the political process. Any other conclusion would mean that the Founding Fathers intended to set up something in the nature of an Athenian democracy or a New England town meeting to oversee the conduct of the National Government by means of lawsuits in federal courts. The Constitution created a representative Government with the representatives directly responsible to their constituents at stated periods of two, four, and six years; that the Constitution does not afford a judicial remedy does not, of course, completely disable the citizen who is not satisfied with the “ground rules” established by the Congress for reporting expenditures of the Executive Branch. Lack of standing within the narrow confines of Art. III jurisdiction does not impair the right to assert his views in the political forum or at the polls. Slow, cumbersome, and unresponsive though the traditional electoral process may be thought at times, our system provides for changing members of the political branches when dissatisfied citizens convince a sufficient number of their fellow electors that elected representatives are delinquent in performing duties committed to them.

In an influential concurring opinion, Justice Powell added:

The power recognized in [Marbury] is a potent one. Its prudent use seems to me incompatible with unlimited notions of taxpayer and citizen standing. [Due] to what many have regarded as the unresponsiveness of the Federal Government to recognized needs or serious inequities in our society, recourse to the federal courts has attained an unprecedented popularity in recent decades. Those courts have often acted as a major instrument of social reform. But this has not always been the case, as experiences under the New Deal illustrate. The public reaction to the substantive due process holdings of the federal courts during that period requires no elaboration, and it is not unusual for history to repeat itself.

Quite apart from this possibility, we risk a progressive impairment of the effectiveness of the federal courts if their limited resources are diverted increasingly from their historic role to the resolution of public-interest suits brought by litigants who cannot distinguish themselves from all taxpayers or all citizens. The irreplaceable value of the power articulated by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall lies in the protection it has afforded the constitutional rights and liberties of individual citizens and minority groups against oppressive or discriminatory government action. It is this role, not some amorphous general supervision of the operations of government, that has maintained public esteem for the federal courts and has permitted the peaceful coexistence of the countermajoritarian implications of judicial review and the democratic principles upon which our Federal Government in the final analysis rests.

The considerations outlined above underlie, I believe, the traditional hostility of the Court to federal taxpayer or citizen standing where the plaintiff has nothing at stake other than his interest as a taxpayer or citizen. It merits noting how often and how unequivocally the Court has expressed its antipathy to efforts to convert the Judiciary into an open forum for the resolution of political or ideological disputes about the performance of government.

The problem of widely diffused injuries is associated with that of taxpayer standing. The Court has rarely recognized such standing, but did so in Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968), which involved a taxpayer challenge to aid to religious schools. The Court said that taxpayer standing would be permitted in Flast because there was “a logical nexus between the status asserted and the claim thought to be adjudicated.” According to the Court, the nexus demanded of federal taxpayers has two aspects to it. First, the taxpayer must establish a logical link between that status and the type of legislative enactment attacked. [It] will not be sufficient to allege an incidental expenditure of tax funds in the administration of an essentially regulatory measure. Secondly, the taxpayer must establish a nexus between that status and the precise nature of the constitutional infringement alleged. Under this requirement, the taxpayer must show that the challenged enactment exceeds specific constitutional limitations imposed upon the exercise of the congressional taxing and spending powers.

The Court held that the requirement was satisfied in the case of a taxpayer challenging an expenditure of public funds as violative of the establishment clause.

In other cases, the Court has denied taxpayer standing. See Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447 (1923) (refusing to allow taxpayer to enjoin under the tenth amendment expenditures made to reduce maternal and infant mortality under federal statute), and Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United, 454 U.S. 464 (1982), in which the Court refused to permit a taxpayer to challenge under the establishment clause a conveyance of property formerly used as a military hospital to the Valley Forge Christian College. In Valley Forge, the Court emphasized that the plaintiffs challenged a property transfer, not an expenditure of funds.

In Hein v. Freedom from Religion Foundation, 551 U.S. 587 (2007), the Court essentially confined Flast to its facts. Hein involved a challenge to President Bush’s Faith-Based and Community Initiatives Program. Taxpayers complained that the executive branch had used public money to fund conferences with the purpose and effect of promoting religion. They contended that the resulting expenditures violated the establishment clause. Justice Alito, writing for himself, Chief Justice Roberts, and Justice Kennedy, said that Flast meant only that taxpayers could challenge an explicit congressional decision to use taxpayer funds for arguably religious purposes. If the executive branch used a general appropriation to promote religion, taxpayers could not bring suit.

Justice Scalia, writing for himself and Justice Thomas, contended that Flast was an anomaly and should be overruled. Justice Souter, joined by Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer, contended that for purposes of standing, there was no relevant distinction between a specific congressional appropriation and the executive's use of taxpayer funds for religious purposes.

In DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332 (2006), the Supreme Court held that municipal taxpayers in Toledo, Ohio, lacked standing to challenge a state tax credit offered to DaimlerChrysler as an incentive for it to expand its operations in the city. The taxpayers alleged that the tax breaks, which they asserted violated the commerce clause, would increase their own tax burdens. The Court held that "affording state taxpayers standing to press such challenges simply because their tax burden gives them an interest in the state treasury would interpose the federal courts as 'virtually continuing monitors of the wisdom and soundness' of state fiscal administration, contrary to the more modest role Article III envisions for federal courts."

Compare Federal Election Commission v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11 (1998). At issue there was an effort by interested citizens to require the Federal Election Commission (FEC) to classify the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) as a "political committee," and thus to require AIPAC to make disclosures to the public about its membership, contributions, and expenditures. The FEC contended that because the plaintiffs could not distinguish themselves from all other citizens, standing should be denied. The Court held that the ban on generalized grievances was prudential, and not rooted in article III, and hence that standing was available here because Congress had expressly given a cause of action to "any person." The Court said that the injury in fact "consists of their inability to obtain information [that], on respondents' view of the law, the statute requires that AIPAC make public."

The Court acknowledged that it had "sometimes determined that where large numbers of Americans suffer alike, the political process, rather than the judicial process, may provide the more appropriate remedy for a widely shared grievance." In those cases, however, the injury was "not only widely shared, but [also] of an abstract and indefinite nature." Here, the injury was "concrete, though widely shared," and hence sufficient for standing. The Court distinguished United States v. Richardson, supra, on the ground that in Akins there was a statute that "does seek to protect individuals such as respondents from the kind of harm they say they have suffered." Justice Scalia dissented, joined by Justices O'Connor and Thomas.

Consider the following views. (1) Richardson, Schlesinger, Valley Forge, and Hein were rightly decided, and Flast and Akins wrongly. If a harm is shared by the plaintiff in common with all other citizens or taxpayers, the appropriate forum is the legislature, not the court. The mechanisms of political accountability are a sufficient guaranty. And if those mechanisms fail, the problem must not be severe in any event. The Constitution requires more than able litigants and a legal question. (2) Constitutional requirements are not meant to vary with popular opinion; they operate largely as constraints on outcomes, even if they accurately reflect popular opinion. Richardson, Schlesinger, Valley Forge, and Hein were incorrectly decided because they render constitutional constraints unenforceable. If the plaintiffs in those cases do not have standing, no one ever will. (3) The real standing question is whether any law creates a cause of action. When a constitutional provision benefits all citizens, courts should not infer from it a cause of action on behalf of any citizen in particular. Flast is a sensible exception because of the distinctive character of the establishment clause, a guarantee against the expenditure of taxpayer funds for religion.

Why, under Akins, is the “generalized injury” requirement prudential, rather than constitutional, in nature?

4. Nexus. The nexus requirement has two prongs. The plaintiff must show that (1) the allegedly unlawful conduct has caused his or her “injury in fact” and (2) the injury is likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. In practice, these two prongs almost always amount to the same thing.

The nexus requirement has been an important limitation in standing cases. One of the key cases is Linda R. S. v. Richard D., 410 U.S. 614 (1972), which involved an action by an unwed mother to enjoin discriminatory application of a Texas criminal statute that penalized any parent who failed to support his children. The plaintiff contended that judicial interpretation had excluded unwed fathers from prosecution and sought to require a prosecutor to initiate criminal proceedings against the father of her child for failure to provide child support. The Court denied standing, asserting that, because prosecution might lead only to the father’s incarceration, the “prospect that prosecution will [result] in payment of support can, at best, be termed only speculative.” Linda R. S. took place in an unusual setting, for criminal prosecutors have usually been held to have unreviewable discretion whether to bring enforcement actions. Should the decision have been based on standing grounds? Consider Easterbrook, Foreword: The Court and the Economic System, 98 Harv. L. Rev. 4, 40 (1984): “[It] is hard to take seriously the claim that enforcement of legal rules does not affect bystanders. [I] suffer an injury if the police announce that they will no longer enforce [the rule against murder] in my neighborhood. [A] plaintiff need not show a sure gain from winning in order to prove that some probability of gain is better than none, and thus he suffers injury in fact.” Consider also the view that the plaintiff’s claim in Linda R. S. was of unequal treatment, and if the injury is one of inequality under the law, there is no problem of redressability.

Another case in the same vein as Linda R. S. is Simon v. Eastern Kentucky Welfare Rights Organization (EKWRO), 426 U.S. 26 (1976). Several indigents and organizations brought suit challenging an Internal Revenue Service Revenue ruling that granted favorable tax treatment to certain nonprofit hospitals that limited aid to indigents for emergency room services. According to the plaintiffs, the ruling was unlawful because it reduced the amount of services necessary to qualify as charitable corporations. The consequence, plaintiffs claimed, was that the indigents would have less in the way of medical services available to them.

The Court, in an opinion by Justice Powell, held that there was no standing. In the Court’s view, the plaintiffs’ contention that the new ruling “encouraged” denial of services to indigents was inadequate.

It is purely speculative whether the denials of service specified in the complaint fairly can be traced to the Service’s “encouragement” or instead result from decisions made by hospitals without regard to their tax implications. [It] is equally speculative whether the desired exercise of the court’s remedial powers in this suit would result in the availability [of] such services. So far as the complaint sheds light, it is just as plausible that the hospitals to which plaintiffs may apply for service would elect to forego favorable tax treatment to avoid the undetermined financial drain of an increase in the level of uncompensated services.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented. Justice Brennan claimed that the relevant injury was to the “opportunity and ability” to receive free medical services, that that interest was not too diffuse to support standing, and that the further requirement imposed by the Court served no purpose. Under what circumstances should a plaintiff have standing to bring suit against the government for “encouraging” harmful activity? Should the intervening conduct of third parties—hospitals in Simon v. Eastern Kentucky Welfare Rights Organization and schools in Allen v. Wright—play a role in the standing inquiry?

Compare Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental Study Group, 438 U.S. 59 (1978). In that case, the plaintiffs—forty people who lived near planned power plants, an environmental group, and a labor organization—sought to challenge the Price-Anderson Act, which limited aggregate liability for a single nuclear power plant accident to $560 million. Plaintiffs claimed that the plant would produce environmental and aesthetic injuries. The Court found a sufficiently concrete injury: “It is enough that several of the ‘immediate’ impacts were found to harm appellees. Certainly the environmental and aesthetic consequences of the thermal pollution of the two lakes in the vicinity of the disputed power plants is the type of harmful effect which has been deemed adequate in prior cases to satisfy the ‘injury in fact’ standard.”

Note also Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978), where plaintiff challenged an affirmative action program established by the University of California at Davis without alleging that, if the program were not in place, he would have been admitted to the medical school. The Court responded:

The constitutional element of standing is plaintiff’s demonstration of any injury to himself that is likely to be redressed by favorable decision of his claim. The trial court found such an injury, apart from failure to be admitted, in the University’s decision not to permit Bakke to compete for all 100 places in the class, simply because of his race. Hence the constitutional requirements of Art. III were met. The question of Bakke’s admission vel non is merely one of relief.

If the Court is correct on this point, is EKWRO wrongly decided? Compare with Lujan the striking decision in Northeastern Florida Chapter of Associated General Contractors v. Jacksonville, 508 U.S. 656 (1993). Jacksonville enacted an ordinance requiring that 10 percent of the money spent on city contracts be “set aside” for minority business enterprises. A contractors’ association, consisting mostly of members who would not qualify as minority enterprises, brought suit, claiming that the set-aside violated the equal protection clause. The lower court denied standing on the ground that no member of the association had demonstrated that, “but for the program, any AGC member would have bid successfully for any of these contracts.” There was therefore no injury in fact.

The Supreme Court responded:

When the government erects a barrier that makes it more difficult for members of one group to obtain a benefit than it is for members of another group, a member of the former group seeking to challenge the barrier need not allege that he would have obtained the benefit but for the barrier in order to establish standing. The “injury in fact” in an equal protection case of this variety is the denial of equal treatment resulting from the imposition of the barrier, not the ultimate inability to obtain the benefit. And in the context of a challenge to a set-aside program, the “injury in fact” is the inability to compete on an equal footing in the bidding process, not the loss of a contract. To establish standing, therefore, a party challenging a set-aside program like Jacksonville's need only demonstrate that it is able and ready to bid on contracts and that a discriminatory policy prevents it from doing so on an equal basis.

In an intriguing footnote, the Court added, "It follows from our definition of 'injury in fact' that petitioner has sufficiently alleged both that the city's ordinance is the 'cause' of its injury and that a judicial decree directly to the city to discontinue its program would 'redress' the injury."

What is the purpose of the "nexus" or "causation" requirement? Is that requirement merely one of pleading—or does it establish a threshold requirement of proof on the plaintiff's part? One possibility is that the requirement operates as a safeguard against advisory opinions. If the plaintiff is unable to show that the requested relief would remedy his injury, it becomes necessary to ask why the court should become involved at all. Is this a persuasive justification for the results in Linda R. S. and EKWRO? What level of certainty should be necessary in order to justify judicial relief?

A divided Court built on Northeastern Florida Chapter in Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244 (2003). Patrick Hamacher, a plaintiff in the case, objected to an affirmative action program used by the University of Michigan in undergraduate admissions. The problem was that although Hamacher said that he intended to apply for admission as a transfer student, he had not actually made any such application. Dissenting, Justice Stevens urged that because Hamacher had not yet applied, his claim of injury was conjectural and hypothetical. The Court disagreed. It said that for standing, it was enough that Hamacher claimed that "he was 'able and ready' to apply as a transfer student" if the university stopped using race in undergraduate admissions. This claim of intent supported standing "to seek prospective relief with respect to the University's continued use of race in undergraduate admissions."

Consider the view that whether an injury is speculative depends on how it is characterized. If the injury in Bakke and Gratz is characterized as a denial of admission, standing should be denied; if it is characterized as an opportunity to compete, standing should be available. So, too, in EKWRO, standing should be denied if the injury is described as a refusal to grant medical care; but if it is described as a denial of the opportunity to receive such care in a system undistorted by unlawful tax incentives, standing should be granted. When should an injury be treated as a harm to an "opportunity," and when should it be treated as a narrower and more discrete, common law-like one? For discussion, see Sunstein, What's Standing after Lujan? Of Citizen Suits, "Injuries," and Article

III, 91 Mich. L. Rev. 163 (1992); Fallon, Of Justiciability, Remedies, and Public Law Litigation: Notes on the Jurisprudence of Lyons, 59 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1 (1984); Nichol, Causation as a Standing Requirement: The Unprincipled Use of Judicial Restraint, 69 Ky. L. Rev. 185 (1980–1981).

In this regard, it is useful to compare Steel Company v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 523 U.S. 83 (1998), with Friends of the Earth v. Laidlaw Environmental Services, 528 U.S. 167 (2000). In Steel Company, the plaintiffs, an environmental organization, sued a company that had released discharges of toxic pollutants in excess of those allowed by its permit. After the suit was filed, the company agreed to comply with its duties under its permit. The plaintiffs nonetheless continued the suit, attempting to ensure that the company would pay civil penalties to the U.S. Treasury. The Court held that plaintiffs lacked standing because they could not meet the redressability requirement. There was no showing that the payment of civil penalties to the Treasury would benefit the plaintiffs at all.

In Laidlaw, the plaintiffs contended that they used certain areas for swimming and recreational activity, and that these areas had been polluted by the defendants' unlawful discharges. The plaintiffs sought civil damages, partly to "encourage defendants to discontinue current violations and deter them from committing future ones." The Court distinguished Steel Company on the ground that "in that case there was no allegation in the complaint of any continuing or imminent violation." Here, by contrast, the violations were "ongoing at the time of the complaint" and "could continue into the future if undeterred." See also Federal Election Commission v. Akins, supra, where the Court rejected the claim that standing should be denied on the ground that "even had the FEC agreed with respondent's view of the law, it would still have decided in the exercise of its discretion not to require AIPAC to produce the information." The Court said: "Agencies often have discretion about whether or not to take a particular action. Yet those adversely affected by a discretionary agency decision generally have standing to complain that the agency based its decision upon an improper legal ground." Consider the view that this holding is inconsistent with the views of the plurality on the issue of redressability in Lujan. Is there a way to reconcile the two?

An emerging issue involves the status of "probabilistic injuries." Suppose that, because of an agency's action, someone faces a 1 in 10,000 risk of dying from contaminated food or from air pollution. Should courts conclude that the injury is "too speculative"? Or is the (small) probability of injury enough? Note that many people would be willing to pay some amount of money (say, $50) to eliminate a risk of 1 in 10,000. If a loss of $50 is enough for standing, why not a risk that is its equivalent? But what about a risk of 1 in 100,000? 1 in 1,000,000? The Court has yet to answer these questions.

5. Congressional power and citizens' suits. Does Lujan mean that Congress is completely without constitutional power to grant standing to citizens as such? If so, what is the source of this conclusion in article III or the relevant history? Consider the view that citizen standing was fairly common in England and the colonies at the time of the framing. See Berger, Standing to Sue in Public Actions: Is It a Constitutional Requirement?, 78 Yale L.J. 816 (1969); Jaffe, Standing in Public Actions, 74 Harv. L. Rev. 1265, 1274 (1961); Sunstein, What's Standing after Lujan?, supra. Is Lujan an "originalist" opinion? Should it have been?

Compare the following cases after Lujan.

(a) The plaintiffs obtain a plane ticket to go to the relevant nations. The implication of Lujan is that the injury in fact requirement would be met in that event—but four justices indicated that there would continue to be a problem of redressability.

(b) Congress tries to grant standing to citizens to enforce the environmental law against both private defendants and government officials—but unlike in Lujan, it also says that every victorious plaintiff receives a $200 bounty. In Vermont Agency of Natural Resources v. United States, 529 U.S. 765 (2000), the Court held that Congress has the power to create "qui tam" actions, by which citizens can sue to obtain damages on behalf of the United States, to recover damages done to the United States. In a qui tam action, the plaintiff receives money as a kind of bounty. In upholding this action, the Court emphasized the long history of support for its validity. The Court also said that the qui tam action should be understood to create an assignment from the United States to the plaintiff as "assignee," recovering money not as a stranger but as a result of the assignment. But is a simple bounty the same as a qui tam action, in which there is a suit on behalf of the United States?

Recall Federal Election Commission v. Akins, supra, where the Court upheld a legislative grant of standing to "any person" to bring suit to compel disclosure of information from political committees. The Court held that Congress could create an "injury in fact," in the form of deprivation of legally required information, and allow every citizen in the nation to bring suit to redress that injury. Is it sensible to say that the difference between Akins and Lujan is that in the latter case, unlike the former, there was no injury in fact? (For discussion of the tension between the two cases, see Sunstein, Informational Regulation and Informational Standing: Akins and Beyond, 147 U. Pa. L. Rev. 613 (1999).) Suppose that you have answered "yes" to the question just asked. Now suppose that Congress amends the Endangered Species Act to create a “property interest,” on the part of each American, in the continued existence of some or all endangered species—and that Congress then gives each American a right to bring suit against any action, or failure to act, that threatens to infringe that “property interest.” Is the case more like Lujan or more like Akins?

Finally, suppose that members of Congress bring suit to object to a statute that, in their view, intrudes on their powers as representatives. How can they show injury in fact? See Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811 (1997), where six members brought suit to challenge the Line Item Veto Act, which, in their view, violated the separation of powers. (The Court subsequently agreed; see Clinton v. New York, 524 U.S. 417 (1998).) The Court held that no “personal injury” had been established, a judgment informed by the suggestion that “our standing inquiry has been especially rigorous when reaching the merits of the dispute would force us to decide whether an action taken by one of the other two branches was unconstitutional.” In this case, the plaintiffs “have not alleged that they voted for a specific bill, that there were sufficient votes to pass the bill, and that the bill was nonetheless deemed defeated.” In this way the Court distinguished Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), where, by a five-to-four vote, standing had been granted to twenty of Kansas’s state senators, complaining that the child labor amendment had been unlawfully adopted. The Coleman plaintiffs claimed that with a twenty-twenty split, the amendment would not have been ratified, but that a procedural irregularity, in the form of a tie-breaking vote by the Lieutenant Governor, produced a false and unlawful claim of ratification. “There is a vast difference between the level of vote nullification at issue in Coleman and the abstract dilution of institutional legislative power that is alleged here.” What, then, must members of Congress show in order to have standing?

The Court distinguished Raines and relied on Coleman to uphold the standing of the Arizona Legislature in Arizona State Legislature v. Arizona Independent Redistricting Commn., 135 S. Ct. 2652 (2015). At issue was a proposition adopted by Arizona voters through the initiative process that vested redistricting decisions in an independent redistricting commission. The Arizona legislature brought suit, alleging that the proposition violated article I, §4, cl. 1 of the Constitution, which provides that “[the] Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each state by the Legislature [thereof].” The Arizona legislature maintained that by depriving it of the power to engage in redistricting, the proposition violated its rights. In an opinion by Justice Ginsburg, the Court held that the Legislature had standing to raise this claim. The Court noted that in Raines it was significant that the plaintiffs had not been authorized to represent their respective houses of Congress. In contrast, “the Arizona legislature was an institutional plaintiff, asserting an institutional injury, and it commenced this action after authorizing votes in both chambers.” Because the proposition would nullify votes by the Legislature on redistricting plans, the Legislature had standing to raise the claim. Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, dissented on the standing question.

6. Perry and Windsor. The Court divided five-to-four on standing questions in two important cases involving same-sex marriage. The facts of United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675 (2013), were as follows. New York recognized the marriage of Edith Windsor and Thea Spyer, who wed in Ontario, Canada, in 2007. Spyer died in 2009, leaving her estate to Windsor, who sought to claim the federal estate tax exemption for surviving spouses. She was barred from doing so by section 3 of the federal Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA), which defines “marriage” and “spouse” as excluding same-sex partners. Windsor paid $363,053 in estate taxes and sought a refund, which the Internal Revenue Service denied. Windsor brought suit, objecting that DOMA is inconsistent with the Fifth Amendment.

While the case was pending, the Attorney General notified the Speaker of the House of Representatives that the Department of Justice would no longer defend the constitutionality of section 3. In response, the Bipartisan Legal Advisory Group (BLAG) of the House of Representatives sought to intervene in the litigation to defend the constitutionality of section 3. The district court allowed intervention and ruled in Windsor’s favor, ordering the Treasury to refund her tax with interest. The court of appeals affirmed. Although the United States agreed with the court’s conclusion, it did not comply with the judgment, but instead sought certiorari in the Supreme Court.

In an opinion by Justice Kennedy (joined by Justices Breyer, Ginsburg, Sotomayor, and Kagan), the Court held that there was no standing problem:

In this case the United States retains a stake sufficient to support Article III jurisdiction on appeal and in proceedings before this Court. The judgment in question orders the United States to pay Windsor the refund she seeks. An order directing the Treasury to pay money is “a real and immediate economic injury,” indeed as real and immediate as an order directing an individual to pay a tax. That the Executive may welcome this order to pay the refund if it is accompanied by the constitutional ruling it wants does not eliminate the injury to the national Treasury if payment is made, or to the taxpayer if it is not. The judgment orders the United States to pay money that it would not disburse but for the court’s order. The Government of the United States has a valid legal argument that it is injured even if the Executive disagrees with §3 of DOMA, which results in Windsor's liability for the tax. Windsor's ongoing claim for funds that the United States refuses to pay thus establishes a controversy sufficient for Article III jurisdiction. It would be a different case if the Executive had taken the further step of paying Windsor the refund to which she was entitled under the District Court's ruling.

The Court acknowledged that “[a] party who receives all that he has sought generally is not aggrieved by the judgment affording the relief and cannot appeal from it.” But it said that this rule “does not have its source in the jurisdictional limitations of Art. III. In an appropriate case, appeal may be permitted [at] the behest of the party who has prevailed on the merits, so long as that party retains a stake in the appeal satisfying the requirements of Art. III.”

The Court also noted that there was a risk that the case lacked “concrete adversariness,” because the executive branch was in agreement with Windsor. It concluded, however, that this problem involved not article III but prudential considerations, and that those considerations were not sufficient to justify a refusal to rule on the merits:

In the case now before the Court the attorneys for BLAG present a substantial argument for the constitutionality of §3 of DOMA. BLAG's sharp adversarial presentation of the issues satisfies the prudential concerns that otherwise might counsel against hearing an appeal from a decision with which the principal parties agree. Were this Court to hold that prudential rules require it to dismiss the case, and, in consequence, that the Court of Appeals erred in failing to dismiss it as well, extensive litigation would ensue. The district courts in 94 districts throughout the Nation would be without precedential guidance not only in tax refund suits but also in cases involving the whole of DOMA's sweep involving over 1,000 federal statutes and a myriad of federal regulations. For instance, the opinion of the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, addressing the validity of DOMA in a case involving regulations of the Department of Health and Human Services, likely would be vacated with instructions to dismiss, its ruling and guidance also then erased. Rights and privileges of hundreds of thousands of persons would be adversely affected, pending a case in which all prudential concerns about justiciability are absent. [In] these unusual and urgent circumstances, the very term “prudential” counsels that it is a proper exercise of the Court's responsibility to take jurisdiction. For these reasons, the prudential and Article III requirements are met here; and, as a consequence, the Court need not decide whether BLAG would have standing to challenge the District Court's ruling and its affirmation in the Court of Appeals on BLAG's own authority.

Justice Scalia (joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Thomas) dissented. He wrote that "the plaintiff and the Government agree entirely on what should happen in this lawsuit. They agree that the court below got it right; and they agreed in the court below that the court below that one got it right as well. What, then, are we doing here?" He added:

What the petitioner United States asks us to do in the case before us is exactly what the respondent Windsor asks us to do: not to provide relief from the judgment below but to say that that judgment was correct. And the same was true in the Court of Appeals: Neither party sought to undo the judgment for Windsor, and so that court should have dismissed the appeal (just as we should dismiss) for lack of jurisdiction. Since both parties agreed with the judgment of the District Court for the Southern District of New York, the suit should have ended there. The further proceedings have been a contrivance, having no object in mind except to elevate a District Court judgment that has no precedential effect in other courts, to one that has precedential effect throughout the Second Circuit, and then (in this Court) precedential effect throughout the United States.

In a separate dissenting opinion, Justice Alito essentially agreed with Justice Scalia with respect to the United States, but concluded that "the House of Representatives, which has authorized BLAG to represent its interests in this matter," suffered injury in fact, because the adverse decision had injured its ability to legislate. "In the narrow category of cases in which a court strikes down an Act of Congress and the Executive declines to defend the Act, Congress both has standing to defend the undefended statute and is a proper party to do so."

Having disposed of the standing issue, the Court reached the merits and held that DOMA was unconstitutional.

In Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652 (2013), the merits involved the constitutionality of a ballot initiative known as Proposition 8, which amended the California Constitution to define marriage as a union between a man and a woman. Same-sex couples, seeking to marry, filed suit in federal court, challenging Proposition 8 under the fourteenth amendment. After California officials (the named defendants) refused to defend the law, the district court allowed the initiative's official proponents to intervene to defend it. After a trial, the court declared Proposition 8 unconstitutional, and enjoined public officials from enforcing it. Those officials elected not to appeal, but the proponents did so. The court of appeals certified to the California Supreme Court the question whether official proponents of a ballot initiative have authority to assert the State's interest in defending the constitutionality of the initiative when public officials refuse to do so. The California Supreme Court answered that they did.

Notwithstanding that answer, the Court concluded that the requirements of article III were not met. Chief Justice Roberts (joined by Justices Scalia, Ginsburg, Breyer, and Kagan) explained that the proponents of the law had only a generalized grievance and no "direct stake" in the case. "Their only interest in having the District Court order reversed was to vindicate the constitutional validity of a generally applicable California law." To be sure, the proponents of a ballot proposition have a particular interest under California law, "but only when it comes to the process of enacting the law." After enactment, they "have no 'personal stake' in defending its enforcement that is distinguishable from the general interest of every citizen of California."

The Court acknowledged the proponents' argument that "even if they have no cognizable interest in appealing the District Court's judgment, the State of California does, and they may assert that interest on the State's behalf." But the Court responded that it is "a 'fundamental restriction on our authority' that '[i]n the ordinary course, a litigant must assert his or her own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest a claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties.'" Exceptions to that presumption could not be found here. To the argument that California itself recognized a right here, the Court said that "no matter its reasons, the fact that a State thinks a private party should have standing to seek relief for a generalized grievance cannot override our settled law to the contrary. [We] have never before upheld the standing of a private party to defend the constitutionality of a state statute when state officials have chosen not to. We decline to do so for the first time here."

In dissent, Justice Kennedy (writing for himself and for Justices Thomas, Alito, and Sotomayor) emphasized that "[under] California law, a proponent has the authority to appear in court and assert the State's interest in defending an enacted initiative when the public officials charged with that duty refuse to do so." In his view, that authority is akin to a property right, one that gives rise to injury in fact. "Proponents' authority under state law is not a contrivance. It is not a fictional construct. It is the product of the California Constitution and the California Elections Code." As a matter of state law, the purpose of the initiative process "is undermined if the very officials the initiative process seeks to circumvent are the only parties who can defend an enacted initiative when it is challenged in a legal proceeding."

Is the Court's majority saying that a state lacks the constitutional power to create a legal right to defend the outcome of a referendum? If so, how is its decision consistent with Akins? Is Windsor consistent with Perry?

ELK GROVE UNIFIED SCHOOL DISTRICT v. NEWDOW, 542 U.S. 1 (2004).

The plaintiff, Newdow, was the father of a girl who attended elementary school in the Elk Grove Unified School District. Pursuant to state law, every day her teacher led the children in a group recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance. The plaintiff argued that because the pledge contains the words “under God,” it constituted religious indoctrination in violation of the first amendment. The court of appeals agreed.

The Supreme Court, however, reversed the court of appeals, holding that Newdow lacked standing. Justice Stevens delivered the opinion of the Court.

“Our standing jurisprudence contains two strands: Article III standing, which enforces the Constitution’s case or controversy requirement; and prudential standing, which embodies ‘judicially self-imposed limits on the exercise of federal jurisdiction.’ Although we have not exhaustively defined the prudential dimensions of the standing doctrine, we have explained that prudential standing encompasses ‘the general prohibition on a litigant’s raising another person’s legal rights, the rule barring adjudication of generalized grievances more appropriately addressed in the representative branches, and the requirement that a plaintiff’s complaint fall within the zone of interests protected by the law invoked.’”

He concluded that as a matter of prudence, the Court should decline to adjudicate Newdow’s claim:

“[One] of the principal areas in which this Court has customarily declined to intervene is the realm of domestic relations. Long ago we observed that ‘the whole subject of the domestic relations of husband and wife, parent and child, belongs to the laws of the States and not to the laws of the United States.’ In re Burrus, 136 U.S. 586 (1890). [So] strong is our deference to state law in this area that we have recognized a ‘domestic relations exception’ that ‘divests the federal courts of power to issue divorce, alimony, and child custody decrees.’ Ankenbrandt v. Richards, 504 U.S. 6 (1992). We have also acknowledged that it might be appropriate for the federal courts to decline to hear a case involving ‘elements of the domestic relationship.’ [Thus,] while rare instances arise in which it is necessary to answer a substantial federal question that transcends or exists apart from the family law issue, in general it is appropriate for the federal courts to leave delicate issues of domestic relations to the state courts.” In this case, it turned out that although Newdow and Banning (the child’s mother) shared legal custody of their daughter, a state-court custody order provided that Banning “makes the final decisions if the two...disagree....Newdow’s rights, as in many cases touching upon family relations, cannot be viewed in isolation. This case concerns not merely Newdow’s interest in inculcating his child with his views on religion, but also the rights of the child’s mother as a parent generally and under the Superior Court orders specifically. And most important, it implicates the interests of a young child who finds herself at the center of a highly public debate over her custody, the propriety of a widespread national ritual, and the meaning of our Constitution.

“The interests of the affected persons in this case are in many respects antagonistic. Of course, legal disharmony in family relations is not uncommon, and in many instances that disharmony poses no bar to federal-court adjudication of proper federal questions. What makes this case different is that Newdow’s standing derives entirely from his relationship with his daughter, but he lacks the right to litigate as her next friend. [The] interests of this parent and this child are not parallel and, indeed, are potentially in conflict.” The Court concluded that although, as a matter of state law, Newdow had a “cognizable right to influence his daughter’s religious upbringing,” that right had not been impaired by the school board’s actions, since “[the] California cases simply do not stand for the proposition that Newdow has a right to dictate to others what they may and may not say to his child respecting religion....The cases speak not at all to the problem of a parent seeking to reach outside the private parent-child sphere to restrain the acts of a third party. A next friend surely could exercise such a right, but the Superior Court’s order has deprived Newdow of that status....In our view, it is improper for the federal courts to entertain a claim by a plaintiff whose standing to sue is founded on family law rights that are in dispute when prosecution of the lawsuit may have an adverse effect on the person who is the source of the plaintiff’s claimed standing. When hard questions of domestic relations are sure to affect the outcome, the prudent course is for the federal court to stay its hand rather than reach out to resolve a weighty question of federal constitutional law. There is a vast difference between Newdow’s right to communicate with his child—which both California law and the First Amendment recognize—and his claimed right to shield his daughter from influences to which she is exposed in school despite the terms of the custody order. We conclude that, having been deprived under California law of the right to sue as next friend, Newdow lacks prudential standing to bring this suit in federal court.” In a footnote, the Court rejected Newdow’s other asserted bases for standing: that he “at times has himself attended—and will in the future attend—class with his daughter”; that he “has considered teaching elementary school students in [the School District]”; that he “has attended and will continue to attend” school board meetings at which the Pledge is “routinely recited”; and that the school district used tax dollars to implement its pledge policy: “Even if these arguments suffice to establish Article III standing, they do not respond to our prudential concerns. As for taxpayer standing, Newdow does not reside in or pay taxes to the School District; he alleges that he pays taxes to the District only ‘indirectly’ through his child support payments to Banning. That allegation does not amount to the ‘direct dollars-and-cents injury’ that our strict taxpayer-standing doctrine requires. Doremus v. Board of Ed. of Hawthorne, 342 U.S. 429 (1952).”

Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justices O’Connor and Thomas, argued that Newdow did have standing: “[Here] is the Court’s new prudential standing principle: ‘It is improper for the federal courts to entertain a claim by a plaintiff whose standing to sue is founded on family law rights that are in dispute when prosecution of the lawsuit may have an adverse effect on the person who is the source of the plaintiff’s claimed standing.’....

“The Court does not take issue with the fact that, under California law, respondent retains a right to influence his daughter’s religious upbringing and to expose her to his views. But it relies on Banning’s view of the merits of this case to diminish respondent’s interest, stating that the respondent ‘wishes to forestall his daughter’s exposure to religious ideas that her mother, who wields a form of veto power, endorses, and to use his parental status to challenge the influences to which his daughter may be exposed in school when he and Banning disagree.’ As alleged by respondent and as recognized by the Court of Appeals, respondent wishes to enjoin the School District from endorsing a form of religion inconsistent with his own views because he has a right to expose his daughter to those views without the State’s placing its imprimatur on a particular religion. Under the Court of Appeals’ construction of California law, Banning’s ‘veto power’ does not override respondent’s right to challenge the pledge ceremony....

“Respondent asserts that the School District’s pledge ceremony infringes his right under California law to expose his daughter to his religious views. While she is intimately associated with the source of respondent’s standing (the father-daughter relationship and respondent’s rights thereunder), the daughter is not the source of respondent’s standing; instead it is their relationship that provides respondent his standing, which is clear once respondent’s interest is properly described....

“Although the Court may have succeeded in confining this novel principle almost narrowly enough to be, like the proverbial excursion ticket—good for this day only—our doctrine of prudential standing should be governed by general principles, rather than ad hoc improvisations.”

Note: Prudential Standing

1. Prudential standing and injury in fact. Even when article III's standing requirements are met, courts nonetheless sometimes decline to hear a case for "prudential" reasons connected to standing. That is, although there is undeniably an injury in fact, caused by the defendant, and likely to be redressed by a favorable ruling, courts sometimes decline to allow a particular plaintiff to raise the claim. Why doesn't Newdow, as biological father, have a legally protected interest, under the establishment clause, sufficient to permit him to challenge the pledge? Would the standing issue be different if the relevant public school were attempting to indoctrinate his child in a particular religion?

2. Prudential concerns and the political process. Consider the following view: The Court worked very hard to avoid deciding this case. It did so because the underlying issue seemed genuinely difficult to some of the justices, and because a ruling in favor of Newdow, while not implausible on the merits, would have been a political catastrophe for the Court. This was a case in which the Court attempted to display the passive virtues to avoid a contestable constitutional ruling that would undoubtedly have divided the nation, especially but not only if the Court had accepted Newdow's argument.

In thinking about the prudence of the Court's decision in Newdow, consider that while the case was pending, Congress passed, and the President signed into law, Pub. L. 107-293, "reaffirm[ing] the reference to one Nation under God in the Pledge of Allegiance." And in the fall of 2004, following the Court's decision, the House of Representatives passed H.R. 2028, which would have created a new jurisdictional statute, 28 U.S.C. §1632, providing in pertinent part that "No court created by Act of Congress shall have any jurisdiction, and the Supreme Court shall have no appellate jurisdiction, to hear or decide any question pertaining to the interpretation of, or the validity under the Constitution of, the Pledge of Allegiance...or its recitation."

3. The abandonment of prudential limits? The Court offered a new account of the foundations of the prudential requirements in Lexmark International v. Static Control Components, 134 S. Ct. 1377 (2014). Static Control Components contended that Lexmark had violated the Lanham Act by engaging in certain false and misleading conduct. In particular, Static Control Components claimed that Lexmark falsely advised companies that it was illegal to use Static Control's products to refurbish cartridges used for printing. Lexmark responded that courts should use "prudential standing" doctrines, and especially the zone-of-interests test, to deny standing to Static Control Components.

The Court unanimously disagreed. In an opinion by Justice Scalia, the Court said that the zone-of-interests test should be understood as posing an issue of statutory construction:

Whether a plaintiff comes within “the ‘zone of interests’” is an issue that requires us to determine, using traditional tools of statutory interpretation, whether a legislatively conferred cause of action encompasses a particular plaintiff’s claim. As Judge Silberman of the D.C. Circuit recently observed, “‘prudential standing’ is a misnomer” as applied to the zone-of-interests analysis, which asks whether “this particular class of persons ha[s] a right to sue under this substantive statute.” [In] sum, the question this case presents is whether Static Control falls within the class of plaintiffs whom Congress has authorized to sue under [the Lanham Act]. In other words, we ask whether Static Control has a cause of action under the statute. That question requires us to determine the meaning of the congressionally enacted provision creating a cause of action. In doing so, we apply traditional principles of statutory interpretation.

In a potentially important footnote, the Court added:

The zone-of-interests test is not the only concept that we have previously classified as an aspect of “prudential standing” but for which, upon closer inspection, we have found that label inapt. Take, for example, our reluctance to entertain generalized grievances—i.e., suits “claiming only harm to [the plaintiff’s] and every citizen’s interest in proper application of the Constitution and laws, and seeking relief that no more directly and tangibly benefits him than it does the public at large.” Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 573–574 (1992). While we have at times grounded our reluctance to entertain such suits in the “counsels of prudence” (albeit counsels “close[ly] relat[ed] to the policies reflected in” Article III), Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United for Separation of Church and State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 475 (1982), we have since held that such suits do not present constitutional “cases” or “controversies.” They are barred for constitutional reasons, not “prudential” ones.

On the merits, the Court concluded that Static Control did indeed have a right to sue, because the zone-of-interests test is “an appropriate tool for determining who may invoke the cause of action,” because that test is not meant to be especially demanding, and because that “lenient approach is an appropriate means of preserving the flexibility of the APA’s omnibus judicial-review provision, which permits suit for violations of numerous statutes of varying character that do not themselves include causes of action for judicial review.” Under the Lanham Act, a plaintiff must allege an injury to a commercial interest in reputation or sales. Under that test, standing was available here:

To begin, Static Control’s alleged injuries—lost sales and damage to its business reputation—are injuries to precisely the sorts of commercial interests the Act protects....There is no doubt that it is within the zone of interests protected by the statute.

Static Control also sufficiently alleged that its injuries were proximately caused by Lexmark’s misrepresentations....[A]lthough diversion of sales to a direct competitor may be the paradigmatic direct injury from false advertising, it is not the only type of injury cognizable under [the Lanham Act].

First, Static Control alleged that Lexmark disparaged its business and products by asserting that Static Control’s business was illegal. When a defendant harms a plaintiff’s reputation by casting aspersions on its business, the plaintiff’s injury flows directly from the audience’s belief in the disparaging statements. As we have observed, a defendant who “seeks to promote his own interests by telling a known falsehood to or about the plaintiff or his product” may be said to have proximately caused the plaintiff’s harm.

In addition, Static Control adequately alleged proximate causation by alleging that it designed, manufactured, and sold microchips that both (1) were necessary for, and (2) had no other use than, refurbishing Lexmark toner cartridges. [To] invoke the Lanham Act’s cause of action for false advertising, a plaintiff must plead (and ultimately prove) an injury to a commercial interest in sales or business reputation proximately caused by the defendant’s misrepresentations. Static Control has adequately pleaded both elements.

Query: How, exactly, does the Court’s formulation of the zone-of-interests test change preexisting law?

4. Concluding thoughts. Consider the following view: Standing doctrine went wrong in Data Processing. The real question is whether Congress has created a cause of action, not whether there is an “injury in fact” or adequate causation. The existence of an injury in fact is necessary only when Congress has said that people with an injury in fact have standing—as, arguably, Congress did in the Administrative Procedure Act. But what article III requires is a congressional grant of a right to bring suit, not an “injury in fact.” It follows that there are few or perhaps no limits on Congress’s power to confer standing. It also follows that the Court has both denied standing where it should be allowed and granted it where it should be denied. In any case, the Court has failed to ask the relevant question. That question is not always easy to answer, but it is the right one. It is also the one that prevailed at the time of the framing.

This view is set out in Fletcher, The Structure of Standing, 98 Yale L.J. 221, 229 (1988): “The essence of a true standing question is the following: Does the plaintiff have a legal right to judicial enforcement of an enforceable legal duty? This question should be seen as a question of substantive law, answerable by reference to the statutory or constitutional provision whose protection is invoked.” Fletcher goes on to suggest that this question would call for a reexamination of all of current standing law. He also urges that, where a constitutional violation is at issue, the question is whether the constitutional provision confers on the plaintiff a right to relief. Similar views are expressed in Albert, Standing to Challenge Administrative Action: An Inadequate Surrogate for Claims for Relief, 83 Yale L.J. 425 (1974); Currie, Misunderstanding Standing, 1981 Sup. Ct. Rev. 41; Sunstein, *What’s Standing after Lujan?*, supra. If Fletcher’s view were to prevail, how would the cases in this section come out?

3. Political Questions

Baker v. Carr

369 U.S. 186 (1962)

[Voters in Tennessee brought suit challenging a provision enacted in 1901 that apportioned the members of the state General Assembly among the state’s ninety-five counties. Under the 1901 standard, representation had been allocated among counties in accordance with the number of qualified voters in each county. But substantial population growth and redistribution over the ensuing years meant that by 1961 legislative districts contained dramatically different numbers of people. The plaintiffs claimed that their voting power was unconstitutionally diluted by the continued use of the 1901 apportionment.]

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

[We] hold that this challenge to an apportionment presents no nonjusticiable “political question.”...

Of course the mere fact that the suit seeks protection of a political right does not mean it presents a political question. Such an objection “is little more than a play upon words.” Rather, it is argued that apportionment cases, whatever the actual wording of the complaint, can involve no federal constitutional right except one resting on the guaranty of a republican form of government, and that complaints based on that clause have been held to present political questions which are nonjusticiable.

Our discussion [requires] review of a number of political question cases, in order to expose the attributes of the doctrine—attributes which, in various settings, diverge, combine, appear, and disappear in seeming disorderliness.

We have said that “In determining whether a question falls within [the political question] category, the appropriateness under our system of government of attributing finality to the action of the political departments and also the lack of satisfactory criteria for a judicial determination are dominant considerations.” The nonjusticiability of a political question is primarily a function of the separation of powers. Much confusion results from the capacity of the “political question” label to obscure the need for case-by-case inquiry. Deciding whether a matter has in any measure been committed by the Constitution to another branch of government, or whether the action of that branch exceeds whatever authority has been committed, is itself a delicate exercise in constitutional interpretation, and is a responsibility of this Court as ultimate interpreter of the Constitution....

It is apparent that several formulations which vary slightly according to the settings in which the questions arise may describe a political question, although each has one or more elements which identify it as essentially a function of the separation of powers. Prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is found a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court’s undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.

Unless one of these formulations is inextricable from the case at bar, there should be no dismissal for nonjusticiability on the ground of a political question’s presence. The doctrine of which we treat is one of “political questions,” not one of “political cases.”...

But it is argued that this case shares the characteristics of decisions... concerning the Constitution’s guaranty [of] a republican form of government. [Guaranty] Clause claims involve those elements which define a “political question,” and for that reason and no other, they are nonjusticiable. In particular, [the] nonjusticiability of such claims has nothing to do with their touching upon matters of state governmental organization.

Luther v. Borden, [7 How. 1 (1849)], though in form simply an action for damages for trespass was, as Daniel Webster said in opening the argument for the defense, “an unusual case.” The defendants, admitting an otherwise tortious breaking and entering, sought to justify their action on the ground that they were agents of the established lawful government of Rhode Island, which State was then under martial law to defend itself from active insurrection; that the plaintiff was engaged in that insurrection; and that they entered under orders to arrest the plaintiff. The case arose “out of the unfortunate political differences which agitated the people of Rhode Island in 1841 and 1842,” [and] which had resulted in a situation wherein two groups laid competing claims to recognition as the lawful government. The plaintiff’s right to recover depended upon which of the two groups was entitled to such recognition; but the lower court’s refusal to receive evidence or hear argument on that issue, its charge to the jury that the earlier established or “charter” government was lawful, and the verdict for the defendants, were affirmed upon appeal to this Court.

Chief Justice Taney’s opinion for the Court reasoned as follows: (1) If a court were to hold the defendants’ acts unjustified because the charter government had no legal existence during the period in question, it would follow that all of that government’s actions—laws enacted, taxes collected, salaries paid, accounts settled, sentences passed—were of no effect; and that “the officers who carried their decisions into operation [were] answerable as trespassers, if not in some cases as criminals.” [A] decision for the plaintiff would inevitably have produced some significant measure of chaos....

(2) No state court had recognized as a judicial responsibility settlement of the issue of the locus of state governmental authority. Indeed, the courts of Rhode Island had in several cases held that “it rested with the political power to decide whether the charter government had been displaced or not,” and that that department had acknowledged no change.

(3) Since “[t]he question relates, altogether, to the constitution and laws of [the]...State,” the courts of the United States had to follow the state courts’ decisions unless there was a federal constitutional ground for overturning them.

(4) No provision of the Constitution could be or had been invoked for this purpose except Art. IV, §4, the Guaranty Clause. Having already noted the absence of standards whereby the choice between governments could be made by a court acting independently, Chief Justice Taney now found further textual and practical reasons for concluding that, if any department of the United States was empowered by the Guaranty Clause to resolve the issue, it was not the judiciary:

Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State....

[After] the President has acted and called out the militia, is a Circuit Court of the United States authorized to inquire whether his decision was right?...If the judicial power extends so far, the guarantee contained in the Constitution of the United States is a guarantee of anarchy, and not of order....

Clearly, several factors were thought by the Court in Luther to make the question there “political”: the commitment to the other branches of the decision as to which is the lawful state government; the unambiguous action by the President, in recognizing the charter government as the lawful authority; the need for finality in the executive’s decision; and the lack of criteria by which a court could determine which form of government was republican.

But the only significance that Luther could have for our immediate purposes is in its holding that the Guaranty Clause is not a repository of judicially manageable standards which a court could utilize independently in order to identify a State’s lawful government....

We come, finally, to the ultimate inquiry whether our precedents as to what constitutes a nonjusticiable “political question” bring the case before us under the umbrella of that doctrine. A natural beginning is to note whether any of the common characteristics which we have been able to identify and label descriptively are present. We find none: The question here is the consistency of state action with the Federal Constitution. We have no question decided, or to be decided, by a political branch of government coequal with this Court. Nor do we risk embarrassment of our government abroad, or grave disturbance at home if we take issue with Tennessee as to the constitutionality of her action here challenged. Nor need the appellants, in order to succeed in this action, ask the Court to enter upon policy determinations for which judicially manageable standards are lacking. Judicial standards under the Equal Protection Clause are well developed and familiar, and it has been open to courts since the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment to determine, if on the particular facts they must, that a discrimination reflects no policy, but simply arbitrary and capricious action.

This case does, in one sense, involve the allocation of political power within a State, and the appellants might conceivably have added a claim under the Guaranty Clause. Of course, as we have seen, any reliance on that clause would be futile. But because any reliance on the Guaranty Clause could not have succeeded it does not follow that appellants may not be heard on the equal protection claim which in fact they tender. True, it must be clear that the Fourteenth Amendment claim is not so enmeshed with those political question elements which render Guaranty Clause claims nonjusticiable as actually to present a political question itself. But we have found that not to be the case here.

[Reversed and remanded.]

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, whom MR. JUSTICE HARLAN joins, dissenting. The Court today reverses a uniform course of decision established by a dozen cases, including one by which the very claim now sustained was unanimously rejected only five years ago. The impressive body of rulings thus cast aside reflected the equally uniform course of our political history regarding the relationship between population and legislative representation—a wholly different matter from denial of the franchise to individuals because of race, color, religion or sex. [Disregard] of inherent limits in the effective exercise of the Court's "judicial Power" not only presages the futility of judicial intervention in the essentially political conflict of forces by which the relation between population and representation has time out of mind been and now is determined. It may well impair the Court's position as the ultimate organ of "the supreme Law of the Land" in that vast range of legal problems, often strongly entangled in popular feeling, on which this Court must pronounce. The Court's authority—possessed of neither the purse nor the sword—ultimately rests on sustained public confidence in its moral sanction. Such feeling must be nourished by the Court's complete detachment, in fact and in appearance, from political entanglements and by abstention from injecting itself into the clash of political forces in political settlements....

[There should be] a frank acknowledgment that there is not under our Constitution a judicial remedy for every political mischief, for every undesirable exercise of legislative power. [Appeal] must be to an informed, civically militant electorate. In a democratic society like ours, relief must come through an aroused popular conscience that sears the conscience of the people's representatives. In any event there is nothing judicially more unseemly nor more self-defeating than for this Court to make in terrorem pronouncements, to indulge in merely empty rhetoric, sounding a word of promise to the ear, sure to be disappointing to the hope.

[From] its earliest opinions this Court has consistently recognized a class of controversies which do not lend themselves to judicial standards and judicial remedies....

1. The cases concerning war or foreign affairs, for example, are usually explained by the necessity of the country's speaking with one voice in such matters. While this concern alone undoubtedly accounts for many of the decisions, others do not fit the pattern. It would hardly embarrass the conduct of war were this Court to determine, in connection with private transactions between litigants, the date upon which war is to be deemed terminated. But the Court has refused to do so. [A] controlling factor in such cases is that [there] exists no standard ascertainable [by] reference to which a political decision affecting the question at issue between the parties can be judged....

2. The Court has been particularly unwilling to intervene in matters concerning the structure and organization of the political institutions of the States. The abstention from judicial entry into such areas has been greater even than that which marks the Court's ordinary approach to issues of state power challenged under broad federal guarantees....

3. The cases involving Negro disfranchisement are no exception to the principle of avoiding federal judicial intervention into matters of state government in the absence of an explicit and clear constitutional imperative. For here the controlling command of Supreme Law is plain and unequivocal. An end of discrimination against the Negro was the compelling motive of the Civil War Amendments....

4. The Court has refused to exercise its jurisdiction to pass on "abstract questions of political power, of sovereignty, of government." [The] "political question" doctrine, in this aspect, reflects the policies underlying the requirement of "standing": that the litigant who would challenge official action must claim infringement of an interest particular and personal to himself, as distinguished from a cause of dissatisfaction with the general frame and functioning of government—a complaint that the political institutions are awry....[Courts] are not fit instruments of decision where what is essentially at stake is the composition of those large contests of policy traditionally fought out in non-judicial forums, by which governments and the actions of governments are made and unmade....

5. The influence of these converging considerations—the caution not to undertake decision where standards meet for judicial judgment are lacking, the reluctance to interfere with matters of state government in the absence of an unquestionable and effectively enforceable mandate, the unwillingness to make courts arbiters of the broad issues of political organization historically committed to other institutions and for whose adjustment the judicial process is ill-adapted—has been decisive of the settled line of cases, reaching back more than a century, which holds that Art. IV, §4, of the Constitution, guaranteeing to the States "a Republican Form of Government," is not enforceable through the courts....

The present case involves all of the elements that have made the Guarantee Clause cases nonjusticiable. It is, in effect, a Guarantee Clause claim masquerading under a different label....

[Appellants] invoke the right to vote[, but] they are permitted to vote and their votes are counted. [Their] complaint is simply that the representatives are not sufficiently numerous or powerful. [It] will add a virulent source of friction and tension in Federal-state relations to embroil the Federal judiciary in [apportionment battles]....

[Concurring opinions by Justices Douglas, Clark, and Stewart are omitted here. Justice Clark stressed that Tennessee's apportionment scheme was "a crazy quilt." A dissenting opinion by Justice Harlan, arguing that no federal constitutional right was at stake, is also omitted.]

Note: The Bases for Finding a Political Question

Baker identifies a variety of bases for finding an issue nonjusticiable. Do these various reasons for finding a case nonjusticiable add up to a coherent "political question" doctrine?

1. A "textually demonstrable commitment" of the issue to one of the political branches. In Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 166 (1803), Chief Justice Marshall wrote that in cases where "the executive possesses a constitutional or legal discretion, nothing can be more perfectly clear than that [his] acts are only politically examinable." Does this state a doctrine of nonjusticiability or is it instead actually a judgment on the merits?

Consider an application of this strand of the political question doctrine. In Nixon v. United States, 506 U.S. 224 (1993), Nixon, a former district court judge who was convicted at a criminal trial of making false statements before a federal grand jury, sought judicial review of his subsequent removal from office. He claimed that the Senate had failed to "try" him within the meaning of the impeachment clause of article I, section 3, which provides that the Senate "shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments." Upon receiving articles of impeachment from the House, the Senate referred the matter to a committee, which reported to the full body. Although the committee presented the Senate with a transcript of the proceedings and Nixon was permitted to make a personal appeal to the Senate, the full body did not receive any of the evidence.

Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion for the Court held that Nixon's challenge presented a nonjusticiable political question. Nixon had argued that the word "try" required that he receive the kind of process normally accorded in a criminal trial. But the Court disagreed:

The word "try," both in 1787 and later, has considerably broader meanings than those to which petitioner would limit it. [Based] on the variety of definitions, [we] cannot say that the Framers used the word [as] an implied limitation on the method by which the Senate might proceed in trying impeachments....

The conclusion that the use of the word “try” [lacks] sufficient precision to afford any judicially manageable standard of review of the Senate’s actions is fortified by the existence of the three very specific requirements that the Constitution does impose on the Senate when trying impeachments: the members must be under oath, a two-thirds vote is required to convict, and the Chief Justice presides when the President is tried. These limitations are quite precise, and their nature suggests that the Framers did not intend to impose additional limitations on the form of the Senate proceedings by the use of the word [“try”].

Given the fact that the impeachment clause also accorded the Senate “sole” power to try impeachments, the Court concluded that “the Senate alone shall have authority to determine whether an individual should be acquitted or convicted.”

In addition to the textual commitment argument, we are persuaded that the lack of finality and the difficulty of fashioning relief counsel against justiciability. [Opening] the door of judicial review to the procedures used by the Senate in trying impeachments would “expose the political life of the country to months, or perhaps years, of chaos.” This lack of finality would manifest itself most dramatically if the President were impeached. The legitimacy of any successor, and hence his effectiveness, would be impaired severely, not merely while the judicial process was running its course, but during any retrial that a differently constituted Senate might conduct if its first judgment of conviction were invalidated. Equally uncertain is the question of what relief a court may give other than simply setting aside the judgment of conviction. Could it order the reinstatement of a convicted federal judge, or order Congress to create an additional judgeship if the seat had been filled in the interim?....

Justice Souter concurred in the judgment, reserving the question whether courts might intervene in impeachment proceedings under some circumstances:

One can...envision different and unusual circumstances that might justify a more searching review of impeachment proceedings. If the Senate were to act in a manner seriously threatening the integrity of its results, convicting, say, upon a coin-toss, or upon a summary determination that an officer of the United States was simply “a bad guy,” judicial interference might well be appropriate. In such circumstances, the Senate’s action might be so far beyond the scope of its constitutional authority, and the consequent impact on the Republic so great, as to merit a judicial response despite the prudential concerns that would ordinarily counsel silence.

By contrast, Justice White, joined by Justice Blackmun, concurred in the judgment, but because they thought, on the merits, that Nixon’s challenge to the procedures used to try him lacked merit.

Justice Stevens also concurred in the decision.

Consider the view that invocation of political question doctrine in cases such as Nixon “does no work not already done by substantive provisions of constitutional law.” Seidman, The Secret Life of the Political Question Doctrine, 37 J. Marshall L. Rev. 441, 444 (2004). On this view,

It should be obvious that [the Court’s] holding amounts to a determination that Nixon’s constitutional rights were not violated. Like many constitutional provisions, the impeachment clause affords Congress discretion—in this case, discretion in its choice of methods by which an impeached official is “tried.” Because the Senate’s conduct fell within this zone of discretion, Nixon had no ground for complaint. Had the Senate’s conduct fallen outside the zone of discretion, it would have “transgressed identifiable textual limits.” This transgression, in turn, would have meant that there were “judicially discoverable and manageable standards”—viz., the textual limits. Moreover, the textual limits themselves would have demonstrated that there was no textual commitment permitting the Senate to use this method of trying impeachments. Thus, Nixon’s case posed a political question only because he lost. If he had had a valid claim on the merits, the political question doctrine would not have shielded it from judicial vindication.

Id. at 446–447. See also Henkin, Is There a Political Question Doctrine?, 85 Yale L.J. 597 (1976).

Consider also whether prudential concerns, rather than textual commitment, are driving the Court’s analysis. Does the Court’s reference to the possible implications of judicial review of a presidential impeachment shed light on this issue? Article II, section 4 provides that the President “shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.” Suppose that the House were to impeach, and the Senate were to convict, a President because Congress disagrees with a policy choice the President has made, or because, to use Justice Souter's phraseology, it decides, for partisan reasons, that the President is "a bad guy."

In 1998, the House of Representatives impeached President Clinton. Both of the articles of impeachment arose out of the President's involvement as a defendant in a lawsuit alleging he had sexually harassed a state employee when he was governor of Arkansas. The articles of impeachment charged that he had lied during the lawsuit and during a subsequent grand jury investigation and had obstructed justice. Suppose that President Clinton had objected, in court, that the impeachment was unconstitutional, because not telling the truth in a civil deposition involving his conduct prior to becoming President did not amount to a high crime or misdemeanor within the meaning of the Constitution. Would his claim have been justiciable? Would permitting litigation of that question pose serious dangers to the operation of the government?

President Clinton was acquitted by the Senate. Suppose in a future case that the President were to be convicted on the basis of articles of impeachment that the Court believed did not set out a high crime or misdemeanor. Could the Court order a President to be reinstated?

Contrast Nixon with Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969). Powell involved a House resolution that forbade Adam Clayton Powell from taking his seat in the House of Representatives because of a finding that Powell had, among other things, "wrongfully diverted House funds for the use of others and himself" and had "made false reports on expenditures of foreign currency to the Committee on House Administration." Noting that he satisfied the age, citizenship, and residence requirements of article I, section 2, clause 2, Powell sued various members and officers of the House, including Speaker John McCormack, seeking a declaration that his exclusion was unconstitutional.

Article I, section 5, clause 1 states that "each House shall be the Judge of the...Qualifications of its own Members." Faced with a claim that the qualifications clause revealed a textually demonstrable commitment to the House of the power to set qualifications for membership and to judge whether those qualifications had been met, the Court explained that:

[if] examination of §5 disclosed that the Constitution gives the House judicially unreviewable power to set qualifications for membership and to judge whether prospective members meet those qualifications, further review of the House determination might well be barred by the political question doctrine. On the other hand, if the Constitution gives the House power to judge only whether elected members possess the three standing qualifications set forth in the Constitution, further consideration would be necessary to determine whether any of the other formulations of the political question doctrine are inextricable from the case at bar.

In other words, whether there is a “textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department” of government and what is the scope of such commitment are questions we must resolve for the first time in this case....

Our examination of the relevant historical materials leads us to the conclusion that [Powell is] correct and that the Constitution leaves the House without authority to exclude any person, duly elected by his constituents, who meets all the requirements for membership expressly prescribed in the Constitution.

[Respondents’] alternate contention is that the case presents a political question because judicial resolution of petitioners’ claim would produce a “potentially embarrassing confrontation between coordinate branches” of the Federal Government. But, as our interpretation of Art. I, §5, discloses, a determination of petitioner Powell’s right to sit would require no more than an interpretation of the Constitution. Such a determination falls within the traditional role accorded courts to interpret the law, and does not involve a “lack of the respect due [a] coordinate [branch] of government,” nor does it involve an “initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion.” [Baker v. Carr.]

2. The political question doctrine and foreign affairs. A substantial number of “political question” cases have been connected in some way to foreign affairs, and even when the Court does review a claim of unconstitutionality in that context, it is often quite deferential to the President and Congress. How might this phenomenon be justified? Is it a textual argument, in that some of the very few specified powers of the executive under article II involve the conduct of foreign affairs, or is the argument more functional? Perhaps it is because the costs of error on the part of the Court are unusually high, and because the courts’ expertise and accountability are low. Or is there something distinctive about foreign affairs that makes it more important for the nation to speak with one voice?

Consider in this regard Goldwater v. Carter, 444 U.S. 996 (1979). At the end of the Chinese Revolution, both the Republic of China (ROC), headquartered in Taiwan, and the People’s Republic of China (PRC), which controlled the mainland, claimed to be the sole legitimate government of China. The United States sided with the ROC, and in 1954 signed a mutual defense treaty, which was approved by the Senate in 1955. Article X of the treaty provided that it would remain in force “indefinitely,” but gave either party the ability to terminate the treaty “one year after notice has been given to the other Party.” In the 1970s, the United States began to pursue normalization of relations with the PRC. The PRC pressed the United States to withdraw its various support for the ROC, including the mutual defense treaty.

In September 1978 Congress passed and the President signed an act containing a provision stating that “[it] is the sense of the Congress that there should be prior consultation between the Congress and the executive branch on any proposed policy changes affecting the continuation in force of the Mutual Defense Treaty of 1954.” Nonetheless, on December 15, 1978, President Carter announced that the United States would recognize the PRC as the sole government of China, would withdraw recognition from the ROC, and would terminate the mutual defense treaty at the end of the one-year notice period.

Several senators and representatives (along with one former senator) brought suit, arguing that the President could not terminate the treaty without the advice and consent of the Senate or the approval of both houses of Congress. The plaintiffs argued that the President’s unilateral notice of termination “violated their legislative right to be consulted and to vote on the termination and also impaired the effectiveness of prior votes approving the 1954 Mutual Defense Treaty.” The district court found that the current legislators had standing and that the case did not present a nonjusticiable political question. Reaching the merits, it granted summary judgment to the plaintiffs. The court of appeals agreed that the legislators had standing—because the President’s action had deprived the senators of the right to vote on the question whether the treaty should be terminated—but held on the merits that the President was entitled to terminate the treaty without congressional approval.

The Supreme Court summarily vacated the judgment of the court of appeals and remanded the case with directions to dismiss the complaint. Justice Rehnquist, joined by Chief Justice Burger, and Justices Stewart and Stevens, wrote an opinion concurring in the judgment:

I am of the view that the basic question presented by the petitioners in this case is “political” and therefore nonjusticiable because it involves the authority of the President in the conduct of our country’s foreign relations and the extent to which the Senate or the Congress is authorized to negate the action of the President....

Here, while the Constitution is express as to the manner in which the Senate shall participate in the ratification of a treaty, it is silent as to that body’s participation in the abrogation of a treaty. [In] light of the absence of any constitutional provision governing the termination of a treaty, and the fact that different termination procedures may be appropriate for different treaties the instant case in my view also “must surely be controlled by political standards.” I think that the justifications for concluding that the question here is political in nature are [especially] compelling...because it involves foreign relations—specifically a treaty commitment to use military force in the defense of a foreign government if attacked.

[Here we] are asked to settle a dispute between coequal branches of our Government, each of which has resources available to protect and assert its interests, resources not available to private litigants outside the judicial forum. Moreover, [the] effect of this action, as far as we can tell, is “entirely external to the United States, and [falls] within the category of foreign affairs.” Finally, as already noted, the situation presented here is closely akin to that presented in Coleman, where the Constitution spoke only to the procedure for ratification of an amendment, not to its rejection.

Justice Powell wrote a separate concurring opinion:

Although I agree with the result reached by the Court, I would dismiss the complaint as not ripe for judicial review....

Prudential considerations persuade me that a dispute between Congress and the President is not ready for judicial review unless and until each branch has taken action asserting its constitutional authority....The Judicial Branch should not decide issues affecting the allocation of power between the President and Congress until the political branches reach a constitutional impasse. Otherwise, we would encourage small groups or even individual Members of Congress to seek judicial resolution of issues before the normal political process has the opportunity to resolve the conflict.

In this case, a few Members of Congress claim that the President’s action in terminating the treaty with Taiwan has deprived them of their constitutional role with respect to a change in the supreme law of the land. Congress has taken no official action. In the present posture of this case, we do not know whether there ever will be an actual confrontation between the Legislative and Executive Branches. Although the Senate has considered a resolution declaring that Senate approval is necessary for the termination of any mutual defense treaty...no final vote has been taken on the resolution. It cannot be said that either the Senate or the House has rejected the President’s claim. If the Congress chooses not to confront the President, it is not our task to do so.

In response to Justice Rehnquist's assertion that the case involved a nonjusticiable political question, Justice Powell replied:

[No] constitutional provision explicitly confers upon the President the power to terminate treaties. Further, Art. II, §2, of the Constitution authorizes the President to make treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate. Article VI provides that treaties shall be a part of the supreme law of the land. These provisions add support to the view that the text of the Constitution does not unquestionably commit the power to terminate treaties to the President alone.

[There] is no "lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving" this case; nor is a decision impossible "without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion." We are asked to decide whether the President may terminate a treaty under the Constitution without congressional approval. Resolution of the question may not be easy, but it only requires us to apply normal principles of interpretation to the constitutional provisions at issue. The present case involves neither review of the President's activities as Commander in Chief nor impermissible interference in the field of foreign affairs. [This] case "touches" foreign relations, but the question presented to us concerns only the constitutional division of power between Congress and the President.

[Interpretation] of the Constitution does not imply lack of respect for a coordinate branch. If the President and the Congress had reached irreconcilable positions, final disposition of the question presented by this case would eliminate, rather than create, multiple constitutional interpretations. The specter of the Federal Government brought to a halt because of the mutual intransigence of the President and the Congress would require this Court to provide a resolution pursuant to our duty "to say what the law is."

Justice Brennan would have affirmed the court of appeals' decision on the merits:

In stating that this case presents a nonjusticiable "political question," Mr. Justice Rehnquist, in my view, profoundly misapprehends the political-question principle as it applies to matters of foreign relations. Properly understood, the political-question doctrine restrains courts from reviewing an exercise of foreign policy judgment by the coordinate political branch to which authority to make that judgment has been "constitutional[ly] commit[ted]." But the doctrine does not pertain when a court is faced with the antecedent question whether a particular branch has been constitutionally designated as the repository of political decisionmaking power. The issue of decisionmaking authority must be resolved as a matter of constitutional law, not political discretion; accordingly, it falls within the competence of the courts.

The constitutional question raised here is prudently answered in narrow terms. Abrogation of the defense treaty with Taiwan was a necessary incident to Executive recognition of the Peking Government, because the defense treaty was predicated upon the now-abandoned view that the Taiwan Government was the only legitimate political authority in China. Our cases firmly establish that the Constitution commits to the President alone the power to recognize, and withdraw recognition from, foreign regimes. That mandate being clear, our judicial inquiry into the treaty rupture can go no further.

Justices Blackmun and White believed that the case should have been set for plenary consideration, after full briefing and oral argument. Justice Marshall concurred in the judgment without explanation.

Compare Goldwater to Zivotofsky ex rel. Zivotofsky v. Clinton, 566 U.S. 189 (2012). A federal statute provides that Americans born in Jerusalem may have “Israel” listed as their place of birth on their passports. The United States has never recognized Jerusalem as Israel’s capital, and the executive branch has consistently claimed that the statute unconstitutionally infringes on the executive power over foreign affairs and to determine the terms on which recognition is given to foreign states. Instead of complying with the statute, the State Department directs that passports refer to “Jerusalem” as the place of birth. Zivotofsky sued to enforce his statutory rights, but the court of appeals held that the suit was barred by the political question doctrine.

In an eight-to-one decision written by Chief Justice Roberts, the Supreme Court reversed:

The lower courts ruled that this case involves a political question because deciding Zivotofsky’s claim would force the Judicial Branch to interfere with the President’s exercise of constitutional power committed to him alone. The District Court understood Zivotofsky to ask the courts to “decide the political status of Jerusalem.” [This] misunderstands the issue presented. Zivotofsky does not ask the courts to determine whether Jerusalem is the capital of Israel. He instead seeks to determine whether he may vindicate his statutory right [to] choose to have Israel recorded on his passport as his place of birth....

The federal courts are not being asked to supplant a foreign policy decision of the political branches with the courts’ own unmooored determination of what United States policy toward Jerusalem should be. Instead, Zivotofsky requests that the courts enforce a specific statutory right....

[The] only real question for the courts is whether the statute is constitutional.

[Determining] the constitutionality of [the statute] involves deciding whether the statute impermissibly intrudes upon Presidential powers under the Constitution. If so, the law must be invalidated and Zivotofsky's case should be dismissed for failure to state a claim. If, on the other hand, the statute does not trench on the President's powers, then the Secretary must be ordered to issue Zivotofsky a passport that complies with [the statute]. Either way, the political question doctrine is not implicated.

The Court remanded the case to the court of appeals to rule in the first instance on the constitutionality of the statute.

Does the Court's reasoning successfully distinguish Nixon? Just as the issue in Zivotofsky was not the political status of Jerusalem, so, too, the issue in Nixon was not whether Judge Nixon should be impeached. Are the cases different because Zivotofsky relied on a statute, whereas Nixon relied on a provision in the Constitution? Consider in this regard Justice Sotomayor's opinion in Zivotofsky concurring in part and concurring in the judgment:

[If] Congress passed a statute [purporting] to award financial relief to those improperly "tried" of impeachment offenses[, adjudication of] claims under such a statute would require a court to resolve the very same issue we found nonjusticiable in Nixon. Such examples are atypical, but they suffice to show that the foreclosure altogether of political question analysis in statutory cases is unwarranted.

Consider also Justice Breyer's dissent:

Four sets of prudential considerations, taken together, lead me to [the conclusion that a court should not decide the case].

First, the issue before us arises in the field of foreign affairs....

Second, if the courts must answer the constitutional question before us, they may well have to evaluate the foreign policy implications of foreign policy decisions....

Third, the countervailing interest in obtaining judicial resolution of the constitutional determination are not particularly strong ones. Zivotofsky does not assert the kind of interest, e.g., an interest in property or bodily integrity, which courts have traditionally sought to protect. [Nor], importantly, does he assert an interest in vindicating a basic right of the kind that the Constitution grants individuals....

Fourth, insofar as the controversy reflects different foreign policy views among the political branches of Government, those branches have nonjudicial methods of working out their differences.

Justice Alito filed a separate opinion concurring in the judgment.

Consider the following case: The President initiates a war in circumstances in which he is not constitutionally authorized to do so. (On the question of presidential warmaking authority, see Chapter 4, section C1, infra.) If a declaration or injunction is sought, is judicial review available? Some of these issues arose in the context of the Vietnam War. See Mora v. McNamara, 389 U.S. 934 (1967) (Stewart, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari in case involving legality of Vietnam War); Orlando v. Laird, 443 F.2d 1039 (2d Cir. 1971) (finding some issues raised by Vietnam War to be justiciable). See generally Tigar, The “Political Question” Doctrine and Foreign Relations, 17 UCLA L. Rev. 1135 (1970); Velvel, The War in Viet Nam: Unconstitutional, Justiciable, and Jurisdictionally Attackable, 16 Kan. L. Rev. 449 (1968).

Are political safeguards sufficient in this context? See J. Ely, War and Responsibility: Constitutional Lessons of Vietnam and Its Aftermath 55–56 (1993) (arguing that the Court’s first duty is “to try to fashion manageable standards” for deciding whether the President’s use of military force complies with constitutional restrictions).

3. Justiciable standards. The primary ground on which the Court has found a case to involve a nonjusticiable political question is that there are no “judicially cognizable standards” by which to assess the claim of unconstitutionality. This understanding means that, in order to say whether there is a political question, the court has to examine both the relevant constitutional provision and the plaintiff’s legal claim: Does the former set out criteria by which a court can assess the latter? If it does not, the question is labeled “political.” Note also that in cases in which there are no legal standards for assessing a claim of unconstitutionality, there is no tension between the political question doctrine and Marbury v. Madison. The Court retains the authority to “say what the law is.” The reason the case is nonjusticiable is that the law does not say anything that is relevant to the particular dispute.

For an example of the Court’s treatment of this branch of the political question doctrine, see Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., 556 U.S. 868 (2009), where the Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, held that the due process clause required a state supreme court justice to recuse himself from a case involving an individual who had spent roughly $3 million in support of the justice's election. The Court found that the applicable standard was whether there is a serious risk of actual bias—based on objective and reasonable perceptions—[that] a person with a personal stake in a particular case had a significant and disproportionate influence in placing the judge on the case by raising funds or directing the judge's election campaign when the case was pending or imminent. The inquiry centers on the contribution's relative size in comparison to the total amount of money contributed to the campaign, the total amount spent in the election, and the apparent effect such contribution had on the outcome of the election....

It is true that extreme cases often test the bounds of established legal principles, and sometimes no administrable standard may be available to address the perceived wrong. But it is also true that extreme cases are more likely to cross constitutional limits, requiring this Court's intervention and formulation of objective standards.

In a dissenting opinion, Chief Justice Roberts asserted that “the standard the majority articulates [fails] to provide clear, workable guidance for future cases,” and provided a numbered list of forty questions he claimed the Court’s opinion left open, such as “How much money is too much money?,” “Must the judge recuse in cases involving individuals or groups who spent large amounts of money trying unsuccessfully to defeat him?,” and “If causation is a pertinent factor, how do we know whether the contribution or expenditure had any effect on the outcome of the election?” He concluded: “The Court’s inability to formulate a ‘judicially discernible and manageable standard’ strongly counsels against the recognition of a novel constitutional right.”

Compare the Court’s treatment of the justiciable standards problem in Caperton with its treatment of the same issue regarding political gerrymandering, discussed at pages 138–141, infra.

4. Constitutional amendments. Assume there is some irregularity in the process by which a constitutional amendment is ratified. Should a court declare the amendment ineffective? The principal case here is Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), which involved a child labor amendment to the Constitution proposed by Congress in 1924. Initially, in 1925, the Kansas Legislature rejected the amendment, but in 1937, the state revisited the issue and voted to ratify the amendment. The senators who had voted against ratification brought suit, claiming that because of the passage of time since approval by Congress, the amendment had lost its vitality.

The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Hughes, concluded that the case was not justiciable:

Where are to be found the criteria for such a judicial determination? None are to be found in the Constitution itself. In their endeavor to answer this question petitioners' counsel have suggested that at least two years should be allowed; that six years would not seem to be unreasonably long. [To] this list of variables, counsel add that "the nature and extent of publicity and the activity of the public and of legislatures of the several States in relation to any particular proposal should be taken into consideration." This statement is pertinent, but there are additional matters to be examined and weighed. [In] short, the question of a reasonable time in many cases would involve, as this case does involve, an appraisal of a great variety of relevant conditions, political, social and economic, which can hardly be said to be within the appropriate range of evidence receivable in a court of justice. [These] conditions are appropriate for the consideration of the political departments of the Government.

Several separate opinions were filed. Justice Black, joined by Justices Roberts, Frankfurter, and Douglas, expressed a somewhat broader view. He wrote that the Constitution grants Congress exclusive power to control submission of constitutional amendments. [In] the exercise of that power, Congress, of course, is governed by the Constitution. However, whether submission, intervening procedure, or Congressional determination of ratification conforms to the commands of the Constitution, calls for decisions by a "political department" of questions of a type which this Court has frequently designated "political."

Justice Frankfurter expressed the view that the state senators had no standing to bring suit. Justice Butler dissented. In his view, "[article] V impliedly requires amendments submitted to be ratified within a reasonable time after proposal," and "more than a reasonable time had elapsed" in this case. To what extent should Coleman be read to immunize the amendment process from judicial supervision?

Consider the history of the twenty-seventh amendment, which requires that congressional pay raises take effect only after an election has intervened. The amendment had been among the first proposed by James Madison and sent to the states for ratification by the first Congress. Five states ratified the amendment in 1789–1791 and one in 1873. From 1978 on, ratifications gradually accumulated, and the Michigan legislature became the thirty-eighth state to ratify the amendment on May 7, 1992, over two hundred years after it was proposed.

Is the amendment now part of the Constitution? A federal statute provides that the National Archivist must certify the receipt of a sufficient number of ratifications, after which a constitutional amendment becomes “valid.” If the Archivist refused to so certify on the ground that there was insufficient indication of contemporaneous consensus on the amendment, who would have standing to challenge that refusal? If the Archivist did so certify, who might have standing to challenge that decision and to make the ensuing claim that the amendment was unlawfully included in the Constitution? In any event, is certification necessary under the Constitution?

Suppose no one—member of the public or member of Congress—has standing to raise the question whether the amendment was part of the Constitution and the Supreme Court never answers that question. Is it meaningful to say that the amendment is (or is not) part of the Constitution in the same way that the third amendment, or the guaranty clause, is? Suppose Congress adopts the practice of deferring the effective date of pay raises, consistent with the amendment. Does that strengthen or weaken the claim that the amendment is part of the Constitution?

The Office of Legal Counsel in the Department of Justice issued an opinion concluding that the amendment was ratified pursuant to article V and is accordingly now part of the Constitution and that the Archivist was required to publish the amendment along with a certification that the amendment was now part of the Constitution. See <http://www.usdoj.gov/olc/congress.17.htm>.

In thinking through these questions, consider Dellinger, The Legitimacy of Constitutional Change: Rethinking the Amendment Process, 97 Harv. L. Rev. 386, 397–398, 411 (1983), which labels Coleman an “aberration” and contends that [the] assumption that judicial review is precluded by the existence of the exclusive power of the promulgating Congress to determine the validity of ratifications is, in my view, wholly unwarranted. Neither the text of the Constitution nor prior congressional practice nor judicial precedent supports this bestowal of exclusive power on Congress. [Whether] or not judicial review of Article V issues would materially advance larger goals of the amendment process, such review is justified as an initial matter by the same considerations that have made judicial review an accepted part of the Constitution since Marbury v. Madison.

Dellinger stresses the increased certainty that would result from some judicial supervision of the amendment process.

Compare Tribe, A Constitution We Are Amending: In Defense of a Restrained Judicial Role, 97 Harv. L. Rev. 433, 435–446 (1983). Tribe identifies the danger [of] having the Supreme Court closely “oversee the very constitutional process used to reverse its decision.” [The] resort to amendment—to constitutional politics as opposed to constitutional law—should be taken as a sign that the legal system has come to a point of discontinuity, a point at which something less radical than revolution but distinctly more radical than ordinary legal evolution is called for. To say that at such a moment in history we should necessarily conduct our legal business as usual, seeking certainty and harmony rather than tolerating discord, is to miss the very essence of the event at hand.

5. Miscellaneous cases. In many cases, of course, the Court has reached the merits of a constitutional controversy notwithstanding the implications for foreign affairs, the high stakes, or the fact of interbranch disagreement. In INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983), the Court rejected a political question challenge to its power to consider the legality of the “legislative veto”—a device, opposed by every President from Woodrow Wilson to Ronald Reagan, by which one House of Congress might “veto” executive action by a majority vote. The Court observed that the controversy “may, in a sense, be termed ‘political.’ But the presence of constitutional issues with significant political overtones does not automatically invoke the political question doctrine. Resolution of litigation challenging the constitutional authority of one of the three branches cannot be evaded by courts because the issues have political implications in the sense urged by Congress.”

See also Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654 (1981) (reaching merits of dispute over legality of President Carter’s executive agreement for the release of U.S. hostages in Iran); United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974) (ordering President Nixon to turn over Watergate tapes); Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952) (invalidating President Truman’s seizure of the steel mills despite President’s claim that national emergency required seizure); United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304 (1936) (reaching merits of congressional delegation of power to President to prohibit sale of arms to countries engaged in armed conflict). In Supreme Court cases involving the war on terror, no serious political question argument has even been raised. See, e.g., Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 548 U.S. 557 (2006).

6. The peculiar case of the “Republican Form of Government” clause.

Section 4 of article IV of the Constitution provides that “[the] United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government.” Several times this provision has been invoked by private litigants, but as Baker v. Carr suggests, the Supreme Court appears to have definitively determined that the question is not justiciable.

The key case is Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1 (1849), an action for trespass. Luther grew out of the Dorr Rebellion in Rhode Island and a conflict between various people claiming authority to act for the government of Rhode Island. The defendants claimed that the acts charged as a trespass were done under the authority of the charter government during a period of martial law. The plaintiffs claimed that the charter government was unlawful. The case thus turned on which of the two groups was entitled to recognition as the lawful government.

The Court responded:

[It] rests with congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For, as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the senators and representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal. It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue; and as no senators or representatives were elected under the authority of the government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, congress was not called upon to decide the controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there, and not in the courts.

Recall the Court’s explanation of Luther in Baker v. Carr. Is the explanation faithful to the opinion in Luther?

In Pacific Telephone Co. v. Oregon, 223 U.S. 118 (1912), plaintiffs challenged a citizen initiatives provision in the Oregon constitution, which permitted citizens to have issues placed on the ballot for a popular vote. Any proposal approved in that way would become law. The law at issue in Pacific Telephone taxed certain telephone and telegraph companies at a particular rate. According to those companies, direct democracy through the initiative procedure violated the republican form of government clause.

The Court responded by referring to “the inconceivable expansion of the judicial power” that would result from adjudicating that claim, and refused to decide whether the initiative process was consistent with republican government. Note that the republican form of government clause is addressed to the “United States,” not only to Congress. Suppose a state set up a monarchy. Would the guarantee clause be unavailable? For discussion, see W. Wiecek, The Guarantee Clause of the United States Constitution (1947); Bonfield, The Guarantee Clause of Article IV, Section 4: A Study in Constitutional Desuetude, 46 Minn. L. Rev. 513 (1962); Note, A Niche for the Guarantee Clause, 94 Harv. L. Rev. 681 (1981). For an argument that the guarantee clause, rather than the equal protection clause, would have provided a better basis for the Court’s holding in Baker, see McConnell, The Redistricting Cases: Original Mistakes and Current Consequences, 24 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y. 103–114 (2000).

Note: The Development of Standards for Reviewing Political Fairness

In Baker, the Court rejected the argument that no judicially administrable standards were available to evaluate the constitutionality of malapportioned districts. Two years after Baker in Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964), the Court announced the standard it would use: a one person, one vote test that required equality of population across districts. Consider the following defense of the standard:

Justice Frankfurter used to say that reapportionment was a “political thicket” that the courts should avoid. The critics love to quote him, but in truth the meaning of the point is blurred. Sometimes it has meant that there can be no administrable standard. [That] is nothing short of silly. For the very standard the Court chose [is] certainly administrable. In fact administrability is its long suit, and the more troublesome question is what else it has to recommend it.

J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust 120–121 (1980). According to Ely, one person, one vote might initially seem an extraordinarily intrusive judicial intervention into the apportionment process—imposing nationwide a rigid mathematical test plucked from nowhere in the constitutional text. But any more nuanced rule, he concluded, would ultimately be more intrusive, or at least more subject to judicial value imposition, because it would require “difficult and unseemly inquiries into the power alignments prevalent in the various states whose plans came before it.” Id. at 124.

Shortly after announcing the one person, one vote rule, the Court acknowledged the possibility that even if a redistricting plan complied with one person, one vote, “[it] might well be that, designedly or otherwise,” a particular “apportionment scheme, under the circumstances of a particular case, would operate to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial or political elements of the voting population.” Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 439 (1965). During the 1970s and 1980s, the Court developed a jurisprudence identifying the circumstances under which a plan unconstitutionally diluted a racial minority group’s voting strength.

In Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109 (1986), the Supreme Court held that claims of partisan gerrymandering were also justiciable. Justice White delivered the Court’s opinion with respect to the political question issue: “Disposition of this question does not involve us in a matter more properly decided by a coequal branch of our Government. There is no risk of foreign or domestic disturbance, and in light of our cases since Baker we are not persuaded that there are no judicially discernible and manageable standards by which political gerrymander cases are to be decided.” Justice White acknowledged that “the type of claim that was presented in Baker v. Carr was subsequently resolved in this Court by the formulation of the ‘one person, one vote’ rule. See, e.g., Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. at 557–561. The mere fact, however, that we may not now similarly perceive a likely arithmetic presumption in the instant context does not compel a conclusion that the claims presented here are nonjusticiable.” Justice O’Connor, writing in dissent for herself, Chief Justice Burger, and Justice Rehnquist, would have held claims of unconstitutional political gerrymandering nonjusticiable.

The six justices in Bandemer who agreed that political gerrymandering claims were justiciable split into two camps with respect to the substantive standard to be applied to such claims, with Justice White (now writing for himself and three other justices) adopting a relatively stringent standard that required plaintiffs to show that “the electoral system is arranged in a manner that will consistently degrade [a] group of voters’ influence on the political process as a whole,” while Justice Powell, writing for himself and Justice Stevens, proposed a more plaintiff-friendly standard that looked at factors such as the nature of the procedures by which the challenged redistricting was accomplished and the intent behind the redistricting; the shapes of the districts and their conformity with political subdivision boundaries and other “neutral” geographic criteria; and the lack of any nonpartisan explanation for the district boundaries. (The substantive standard for proving claims of unconstitutional political gerrymandering is covered in more detail in Chapter 6 infra.) Following Bandemer, although a significant number of political gerrymandering cases were brought, they were uniformly unsuccessful, essentially because it was impossible to meet Bandemer’s “consistent degradation” test.

Two decades later, the Court twice revisited the justiciability of political gerrymandering without resolving the issue.

VIETH v. JUBELIRER, 541 U.S. 267 (2004). This case involved an overt political gerrymander of Pennsylvania's congressional districts following the 2000 census. The case produced five separate opinions. Justice Scalia, writing for himself, Chief Justice Rehnquist, and Justices O'Connor and Thomas, announced the judgment of the Court. He would have held the plaintiffs' claims nonjusticiable. At one point in his opinion, Justice Scalia seemed to be pointing to a demonstrable textual commitment of the question to another branch, observing that “[it] is significant that the Framers provided a remedy for such practices in the Constitution. Article 1, §4, while leaving in state legislatures the initial power to draw districts for federal elections, permitted Congress to ‘make or alter’ those districts if it wished.” But the bulk of his opinion was devoted to arguing that there was no judicially manageable standard for addressing claims of political gerrymandering:

“Eighteen years of judicial effort with virtually nothing to show for it justify us in revisiting the question whether the standard promised by Bandemer exists. As the following discussion reveals, no judicially discernible and manageable standards for adjudicating political gerrymandering claims have emerged. Lacking them, we must conclude that political gerrymandering claims are nonjusticiable and that Bandemer was wrongly decided.

“We begin our review of possible standards with that proposed by Justice White’s plurality opinion in Bandemer because, as the narrowest ground for our decision in that case, it has been the standard employed by the lower courts....

“In the lower courts, the legacy of the plurality’s test is one long record of puzzlement and consternation....The test has been criticized for its indeterminacy by a host of academic commentators....

“[The standard proposed by Justice Powell in Bandemer] is essentially a totality-of-the-circumstances analysis, where all conceivable factors, none of which is dispositive, are weighed with an eye to ascertaining whether the particular gerrymander has gone too far—or, in Justice Powell’s terminology, whether it is not ‘fair.’ ‘Fairness’ does not seem to us a judicially manageable standard....Some criterion more solid and more demonstrably met than that seems to us necessary to enable the state legislatures to discern the limits of their districting discretion, to meaningfully constrain the discretion of the courts, and to win public acceptance for the courts’ intrusion into a process that is the very foundation of democratic decisionmaking.”

Justice Scalia also dismissed the standards proposed by the three dissenting opinions in Vieth, “prefac[ing]” his rejection “with the observation that the mere fact that these four dissenters come up with three different standards—all of them different from the two proposed in Bandemer and the one proposed here by appellants—goes a long way to establishing that there is no constitutionally discernible standard....

“Much of [Justice Stevens’s] dissent is addressed to the incompatibility of severe partisan gerrymanders with democratic principles. We do not disagree with that judgment, any more than we disagree with the judgment that it would be unconstitutional for the Senate to employ, in impeachment proceedings, procedures that are incompatible with its obligation to ‘try’ impeachments. The issue we have discussed is not whether severe partisan gerrymanders violate the Constitution, but whether it is for the courts to say when a violation has occurred, and to design a remedy.”

With respect to the tests proposed by Justice Souter (joined by Justice Ginsburg) and Justice Breyer, Justice Scalia argued that the tests failed to provide determinate answers because they were based on substantive notions of fairness or unjustified entrenchment of the incumbent party.

Justice Kennedy concurred in the judgment. While he agreed with the plurality that the plaintiffs’ complaint should have been dismissed, he “would not foreclose all possibility of judicial relief if some limited and precise rationale were found to correct an established violation of the Constitution in some redistricting cases”:

“That no such standard has emerged in this case should not be taken to prove that none will emerge in the future. Where important rights are involved, the impossibility of full analytical satisfaction is reason to err on the side of caution. Allegations of unconstitutional bias in apportionment are most serious claims, for we have long believed that ‘the right to vote’ is one of ‘those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities.’ United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 153, n.4 (1938)....

“The plurality says that 18 years, in effect, prove the negative....[By] the time-line of the law 18 years is rather a short period. In addition, the rapid evolution of technologies in the apportionment field suggests yet unexplored possibilities....[These] new technologies may produce new methods of analysis that make more evident the precise nature of the burdens gerrymanders impose on the representational rights of voters and parties. That would facilitate court efforts to identify and remedy the burdens, with judicial intervention limited by the derived standards.

“If suitable standards with which to measure the burden a gerrymander imposes on representational rights did emerge, hindsight would show that the Court prematurely abandoned the field. That is a risk the Court should not take.

There were three separate dissents in Vieth. Justice Stevens’s dissent took issue with the plurality’s claim that no judicially manageable standards existed:

“The plurality candidly acknowledges that legislatures can fashion standards to remedy political gerrymandering that are perfectly manageable and, indeed, that the legislatures in Iowa and elsewhere have done so. If a violation of the Constitution is found, a court could impose a remedy patterned after such a statute. Thus, the problem, in the plurality’s view, is not that there is no judicially manageable standard to fix an unconstitutional partisan gerrymander, but rather that the Judiciary lacks the ability to determine when a state legislature has violated its duty to govern impartially.

“Quite obviously, however, several standards for identifying impermissible partisan influence are available to judges who have the will to enforce them.... What is clear is that it is not the unavailability of judicially manageable standards that drives today’s decision. It is, instead, a failure of judicial will to condemn even the most blatant violations of a state legislature’s fundamental duty to govern impartially.”

Justice Souter, joined by Justice Ginsburg, recognized that political fairness “cannot possibly be described with the hard edge of one person, one vote,” but proposed a “fresh start” involving a new five-part test for identifying cases of unconstitutional partisanship. “The enquiries I am proposing are not, to be sure, as hard-edged as I wish they could be, but neither do they have a degree of subjectivity inconsistent with the judicial function.” Similarly, Justice Breyer’s dissent set out “a set of circumstances in which the use of purely political districting criteria could conflict with constitutionally mandated democratic requirements,” and for which courts could devise a workable test.

Two years later, in League of United Latin Am. Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399 (2006), the Court once again found itself unable to generate a controlling opinion. The case involved a challenge to Texas’s mid-decade congressional redistricting, a redistricting undertaken with the express purpose of favoring Republican candidates. Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, reiterated his position in Vieth that political gerrymanders are nonjusticiable. Justice Kennedy did not “revisit the justiciability holding” in Vieth, but found that appellants had failed to “offer the Court a manageable, reliable measure of fairness for determining whether a partisan gerrymander violates the Constitution.” In particular, he rejected their claim that the decision to conduct a mid-decade redistricting rendered the plan unconstitutional.

Chief Justice Roberts, joined by Justice Alito—both of whom had joined the Court after the decision in Vieth—agreed with Justice Kennedy’s conclusion that the challengers “ha[d] not provided ‘a reliable standard for identifying unconstitutional political gerrymanders,’” and asserted, somewhat surprisingly, that “[t]he question whether any such standard exists—that is, whether a challenge to a political gerrymander presents a justiciable case or controversy—has not been argued in these cases.” He therefore took “no position on that question, which has divided the Court,” and joined the Court’s disposition of the political gerrymandering claims “without specifying whether appellants have failed to state a claim on which relief can be granted, or have failed to present a justiciable controversy.”

The other four justices all reiterated their view that claims of unconstitutional political gerrymandering are justiciable. Justices Stevens and Breyer would have reached the merits of the challengers’ claims and struck down the plan. In light of the Court’s continued division, Justice Souter, joined by Justice Ginsburg, “[saw] nothing to be gained by working through these cases on the standard I would have applied in [Vieth,] because here as in Vieth we have no majority for any single criterion of impermissible gerrymander.” He would “therefore [have] treat[ed] the broad issue of gerrymander much as the subject of an improvident grant of certiorari.”

Bush v. Gore

531 U.S. 98 (2000)

PER CURIAM:

[Following an agonizingly close presidential election in Florida, the Florida Supreme Court ordered a manual recount of undervotes—ballots on which no vote had been registered during the machine count—in all counties that had not yet completed a recount. In addition, it ordered that additional votes recovered during prior but untimely manual recounts in several other counties be included in the vote total.]

II...

The individual citizen has no federal constitutional right to vote for electors for the President of the United States unless and until the state legislature chooses a statewide election as the means to implement its power to appoint members of the Electoral College. U.S. Const., Art. II, §1. This is the source for the statement in McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U.S. 1, 35 (1892), that the State legislature's power to select the manner for appointing electors is plenary; it may, if it so chooses, select the electors itself, which indeed was the manner used by State legislatures in several States for many years after the Framing of our Constitution. History has now favored the voter, and in each of the several States the citizens themselves vote for Presidential electors. When the state legislature vests the right to vote for President in its people, the right to vote as the legislature has prescribed is fundamental; and one source of its fundamental nature lies in the equal weight accorded to each vote and the equal dignity owed to each voter....

The right to vote is protected in more than the initial allocation of the franchise. Equal protection applies as well to the manner of its exercise. Having once granted the right to vote on equal terms, the State may not, by later arbitrary and disparate treatment, value one person's vote over that of another. See, e.g., Harper v. Virginia Bd. of Elections, 383 U.S. 663, 665 (1966) ("[Once] the franchise is granted to the electorate, lines may not be drawn which are inconsistent with the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment"). It must be remembered that "the right of suffrage can be denied by a debasement or dilution of the weight of a citizen's vote just as effectively as by wholly prohibiting the free exercise of the franchise." Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 555 (1964)....

Much of the controversy seems to revolve around ballot cards designed to be perforated by a stylus but which, either through error or deliberate omission, have not been perforated with sufficient precision for a machine to count them. In some cases a piece of the card—a chad—is hanging, say by two corners. In other cases there is no separation at all, just an indentation.

The Florida Supreme Court has ordered that the intent of the voter be discerned from such ballots. For purposes of resolving the equal protection challenge, it is not necessary to decide whether the Florida Supreme Court had the authority under the legislative scheme for resolving election disputes to define what a legal vote is and to mandate a manual recount implementing that definition. The recount mechanisms implemented in response to the decisions of the Florida Supreme Court do not satisfy the minimum requirement for non-arbitrary treatment of voters necessary to secure the fundamental right. Florida's basic command for the count of legally cast votes is to consider the "intent of the voter." This is unobjectionable as an abstract proposition and a starting principle. The problem inheres in the absence of specific standards to ensure its equal application. The formulation of uniform rules to determine intent based on these recurring circumstances is practicable and, we conclude, necessary....

The State Supreme Court ratified this uneven treatment. It mandated that the recount totals from [several] counties [be] included in the certified total [even though] each of the counties used varying standards to determine what was a legal vote. Broward County used a more forgiving standard than Palm Beach County, and uncovered almost three times as many new votes, a result markedly disproportionate to the difference in population between the counties....

The recount process, in its features here described, is inconsistent with the minimum procedures necessary to protect the fundamental right of each voter in the special instance of a statewide recount under the authority of a single state judicial officer. Our consideration is limited to the present circumstances, for the problem of equal protection in election processes generally presents many complexities.

The question before the Court is not whether local entities, in the exercise of their expertise, may develop different systems for implementing elections. Instead, we are presented with a situation where a state court with the power to assure uniformity has ordered a statewide recount with minimal procedural safeguards. When a court orders a statewide remedy, there must be at least some assurance that the rudimentary requirements of equal treatment and fundamental fairness are satisfied....

Upon due consideration of the difficulties identified to this point, it is obvious that the recount cannot be conducted in compliance with the requirements of equal protection and due process without substantial additional work. It would require not only the adoption (after opportunity for argument) of adequate statewide standards for determining what is a legal vote, and practicable procedures to implement them, but also orderly judicial review of any disputed matters that might arise....

The Supreme Court of Florida has said that the legislature intended the State's electors to "participat[e] fully in the federal electoral process," as provided in 3 U.S.C. §5.¹ That statute, in turn, requires that any controversy or contest that is designed to lead to a conclusive selection of electors be completed by December 12. That date is upon us, and there is no recount procedure in place under the State Supreme Court's order that comports with minimal constitutional standards. Because it is evident that any recount seeking to meet the December 12 date will be unconstitutional for the reasons we have discussed, we reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of Florida ordering a recount to proceed....

None are more conscious of the vital limits on judicial authority than are the members of this Court, and none stand more in admiration of the Constitution's design to leave the selection of the President to the people, through their legislatures, and to the political sphere. When contending parties invoke the process of the courts, however, it becomes our unsought responsibility to resolve the federal and constitutional issues the judicial system has been forced to confront.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Florida is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST, with whom JUSTICE SCALIA and JUSTICE THOMAS join, concurring.

We join the per curiam opinion. We write separately because we believe there are additional grounds that require us to reverse the Florida Supreme Court's decision.

I

We deal here not with an ordinary election, but with an election for the President of the United States....

[In] Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 794–795 (1983), we said: “In the context of a Presidential election, state-imposed restrictions implicate a uniquely important national interest. For the President and the Vice President of the United States are the only elected officials who represent all the voters in the Nation.” In most cases, comity and respect for federalism compel us to defer to the decisions of state courts on issues of state law. That practice reflects our understanding that the decisions of state courts are definitive pronouncements of the will of the States as sovereigns. Of course, in ordinary cases, the distribution of powers among the branches of a State’s government raises no questions of federal constitutional law, subject to the requirement that the government be republican in character. See U.S. Const., Art. IV, §4. But there are a few exceptional cases in which the Constitution imposes a duty or confers a power on a particular branch of a State’s government. This is one of them. Article II, §1, cl. 2, provides that “each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct,” electors for President and Vice President. (Emphasis added.) Thus, the text of the election law itself, and not just its interpretation by the courts of the States, takes on independent significance....

In any election but a Presidential election, the Florida Supreme Court can give as little or as much deference to Florida’s executives as it chooses, so far as Article II is concerned, and this Court will have no cause to question the court’s actions. But, with respect to a Presidential election, the court must be both mindful of the legislature’s role under Article II in choosing the manner of appointing electors and deferential to those bodies expressly empowered by the legislature to carry out its constitutional mandate....

III

The scope and nature of the remedy ordered by the Florida Supreme Court jeopardizes the “legislative wish” to take advantage of the safe harbor provided by 3 U.S.C. §5. December 12, 2000, is the last date for a final determination of the Florida electors that will satisfy §5. Yet in the late afternoon of December 8th—four days before this deadline—the Supreme Court of Florida ordered recounts of tens of thousands of so-called “undervotes” spread through 64 of the State’s 67 counties. This was done in a search for elusive—perhaps delusive—certainty as to the exact count of 6 million votes. But no one claims that these ballots have not previously been tabulated; they were initially read by voting machines at the time of the election, and thereafter reread by virtue of Florida’s automatic recount provision. No one claims there was any fraud in the election. The Supreme Court of Florida ordered this additional recount under the provision of the election code giving the circuit judge the authority to provide relief that is “appropriate under such circumstances.” Fla. Stat. §102.168(8) (2000).

Surely when the Florida Legislature empowered the courts of the State to grant “appropriate” relief, it must have meant relief that would have become final by the cut-off date of 3 U.S.C. §5. In light of the inevitable legal challenges and ensuing appeals to the Supreme Court of Florida and petitions for certiorari to this Court, the entire recounting process could not possibly be completed by that date....

Given all these factors, and in light of the legislative intent identified by the Florida Supreme Court to bring Florida within the “safe harbor” provision of 3 U.S.C. §5, the remedy prescribed by the Supreme Court of Florida cannot be deemed an “appropriate” one as of December 8. It significantly departed from the statutory framework in place on November 7, and authorized open-ended further proceedings which could not be completed by December 12, thereby preventing a final determination by that date.

For these reasons, in addition to those given in the per curiam, we would reverse.

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE GINSBURG and JUSTICE BREYER join, dissenting.

The Constitution assigns to the States the primary responsibility for determining the manner of selecting the Presidential electors. See Art. II, §1, cl. 2. When questions arise about the meaning of state laws, including election laws, it is our settled practice to accept the opinions of the highest courts of the States as providing the final answers. On rare occasions, however, either federal statutes or the Federal Constitution may require federal judicial intervention in state elections. This is not such an occasion.

The federal questions that ultimately emerged in this case are not substantial. Article II provides that “[e]ach State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors.” It does not create state legislatures out of whole cloth, but rather takes them as they come—as creatures born of, and constrained by, their state constitutions. [The] legislative power in Florida is subject to judicial review pursuant to Article V of the Florida Constitution, and nothing in Article II of the Federal Constitution frees the state legislature from the constraints in the state constitution that created it. [The] Florida Supreme Court’s exercise of appellate jurisdiction therefore was wholly consistent with, and indeed contemplated by, the grant of authority in Article II.

Admittedly, the use of differing substandards for determining voter intent in different counties employing similar voting systems may raise serious concerns. Those concerns are alleviated—if not eliminated—by the fact that a single impartial magistrate will ultimately adjudicate all objections arising from the recount process....

What must underlie petitioners’ entire federal assault on the Florida election procedures is an unstated lack of confidence in the impartiality and capacity of the state judges who would make the critical decisions if the vote count were to proceed. Otherwise, their position is wholly without merit. The endorsement of that position by the majority of this Court can only lend credence to the most cynical appraisal of the work of judges throughout the land. It is confidence in the men and women who administer the judicial system that is the true backbone of the rule of law. Time will one day heal the wound to that confidence that will be inflicted by today’s decision. One thing, however, is certain. Although we may never know with complete certainty the identity of the winner of this year’s Presidential election, the identity of the loser is perfectly clear. It is the Nation’s confidence in the judge as an impartial guardian of the rule of law.

I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE SOUTER, with whom JUSTICE BREYER joins, [dissenting]....

Petitioners have raised an equal protection claim (or, alternatively, a due process claim), in the charge that unjustifiably disparate standards are applied in different electoral jurisdictions to otherwise identical facts. It is true that the Equal Protection Clause does not forbid the use of a variety of voting mechanisms within a jurisdiction, even though different mechanisms will have different levels of effectiveness in recording voters' intentions; local variety can be justified by concerns about cost, the potential value of innovation, and so on. But evidence in the record here suggests that a different order of disparity obtains under rules for determining a voter's intent that have been applied (and could continue to be applied) to identical types of ballots used in identical brands of machines and exhibiting identical physical characteristics (such as "hanging" or "dimpled" chads). I can conceive of no legitimate state interest served by these differing treatments of the expressions of voters' fundamental rights. The differences appear wholly arbitrary.

In deciding what to do about this, we should take account of the fact that electoral votes are due to be cast in six days. I would therefore remand the case to the courts of Florida with instructions to establish uniform standards for evaluating the several types of ballots that have prompted differing treatments, to be applied within and among counties when passing on such identical ballots in any further recounting (or successive recounting) that the courts might order.

Unlike the majority, I see no warrant for this Court to assume that Florida could not possibly comply with this requirement before the date set for the meeting of electors, December 18....

I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE GINSBURG, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS joins, and with whom JUSTICE SOUTER and JUSTICE BREYER join as to Part I, dissenting.

I...

The Chief Justice says that Article II, by providing that state legislatures shall direct the manner of appointing electors, authorizes federal superintendence over the relationship between state courts and state legislatures, and licenses a departure from the usual deference we give to state court interpretations of state law. The Framers of our Constitution, however, understood that in a republican government, the judiciary would construe the legislature's enactments. See U.S. Const., Art. III; The Federalist No. 78 (A. Hamilton). In light of the constitutional guarantee to States of a "Republican Form of Government," U.S. Const., Art. IV, §4, Article II can hardly be read to invite this Court to disrupt a State's republican regime. Yet the Chief Justice today would reach out to do just that. By holding that Article II requires our revision of a state court's construction of state laws in order to protect one organ of the State from another, The Chief Justice contradicts the basic principle that a State may organize itself as it sees fit. See, e.g., Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 460 (1991) ("Through the structure of its government, and the character of those who exercise government authority, a State defines itself as a sovereign.”); Highland Farms Dairy v. Agnew, 300 U.S. 608, 612 (1937) (“How power shall be distributed by a state among its governmental organs is commonly, if not always, a question for the state itself.”). Article II does not call for the scrutiny undertaken by this Court....

II...

I cannot agree that the recount adopted by the Florida court, flawed as it may be, would yield a result any less fair or precise than the certification that preceded that recount....

I dissent.

JUSTICE BREYER... dissenting....

II

[This portion of Justice Breyer’s opinion was joined by Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, and Souter.] Despite the reminder that this case involves “an election for the President of the United States,” (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring), no preeminent legal concern, or practical concern related to legal questions, required this Court to hear this case, let alone to issue a stay that stopped Florida’s recount process in its tracks. With one exception, petitioners’ claims do not ask us to vindicate a constitutional provision designed to protect a basic human right. See, e.g., Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954). Petitioners invoke fundamental fairness, namely, the need for procedural fairness, including finality. But with the one “equal protection” exception, they rely upon law that focuses, not upon that basic need, but upon the constitutional allocation of power....

Of course, the selection of the President is of fundamental national importance. But that importance is political, not legal. And this Court should resist the temptation unnecessarily to resolve tangential legal disputes, where doing so threatens to determine the outcome of the election.

The Constitution and federal statutes themselves make clear that restraint is appropriate. They set forth a road map of how to resolve disputes about electors, even after an election as close as this one. That road map foresees resolution of electoral disputes by state courts. See 3 U.S.C. §5. [But] it nowhere provides for involvement by the United States Supreme Court.

To the contrary, the Twelfth Amendment commits to Congress the authority and responsibility to count electoral votes. A federal statute, the Electoral Count Act, enacted after the close 1876 Hayes-Tilden Presidential election, specifies that, after States have tried to resolve disputes (through “judicial” or other means), Congress is the body primarily authorized to resolve remaining disputes. See Electoral Count Act of 1887, 24 Stat. 373, 3 U.S.C. §§5, 6, and 15.

The legislative history of the Act makes clear its intent to commit the power to resolve such disputes to Congress, rather than the courts:

“The two Houses are, by the Constitution, authorized to make the count of electoral votes. They can only count legal votes, and in doing so must determine, from the best evidence to be had, what are legal votes....The power to determine rests with the two Houses, and there is no other constitutional tribunal.” H. Rep. No. 1638, 49th Cong., 1st Sess., 2 (1886) (report submitted by Rep. Caldwell, Select Committee on the Election of President and Vice-President)....

Given this detailed, comprehensive scheme for counting electoral votes, there is no reason to believe that federal law either foresees or requires resolution of such a political issue by this Court. Nor, for that matter, is there any reason to think that the Constitution’s Framers would have reached a different conclusion. Madison, at least, believed that allowing the judiciary to choose the presidential electors “was out of the question.” Madison, July 25, 1787 (reprinted in 5 Elliot’s Debates on the Federal Constitution 363 (2d ed. 1876)).

The decision by both the Constitution’s Framers and the 1886 Congress to minimize this Court’s role in resolving close federal presidential elections is as wise as it is clear. However awkward or difficult it may be for Congress to resolve difficult electoral disputes, Congress, being a political body, expresses the people’s will far more accurately than does an unelected Court. And the people’s will is what elections are about....

[The history of the disputed election of 1876, including] the participation in the work of the electoral commission by five Justices, including Justice Bradley, did not lend that process legitimacy. Nor did it assure the public that the process had worked fairly, guided by the law. Rather, it simply embroiled Members of the Court in partisan conflict, thereby undermining respect for the judicial process. And the Congress that later enacted the Electoral Count Act knew it.

This history may help to explain why I think it not only legally wrong, but also most unfortunate, for the Court simply to have terminated the Florida recount. Those who caution judicial restraint in resolving political disputes have described the quintessential case for that restraint as a case marked, among other things, by the “strangeness of the issue,” its “intractability to principled resolution,” its “sheer momentousness,...which tends to unbalance judicial judgment,” and “the inner vulnerability, the self-doubt of an institution which is electorally irresponsible and has no earth to draw strength from [citing A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch 184 (1962)].” Those characteristics mark this case....

I fear that in order to bring this agonizingly long election process to a definitive conclusion, we have not adequately attended to that necessary “check upon our own exercise of power,” “our own sense of self-restraint.” United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 79 (1936) (Stone, J., dissenting). Justice Brandeis once said of the Court, “The most important thing we do is not doing.” Bickel, supra, at 71. What it does today, the Court should have left undone. I would repair the damage done as best we now can, by permitting the Florida recount to continue under uniform standards.

I respectfully dissent.

Note: Political Questions and Partisan Issues

1. Reconciling Bush v. Gore and Vieth. Note the diametrically opposite lineups of the Court in these cases. The five justices who thought the Florida recount procedure violated the equal protection clause are the same five justices who professed an inability to discern a judicially manageable standard for assessing political fairness in the redistricting process. Are these positions consistent?

In Vieth, Justice Scalia states that article I, section 4 “provide[s] a remedy for [unfair redistricting] practices” by authorizing “Congress to ‘make or alter’ those districts if it wished.” If this is arguably a textual commitment of constitutional oversight over redistricting to Congress, is the twelfth amendment a similar commitment of resolution of disputes over presidential elections to Congress?

2. Standing and the political question doctrine. The Court’s opinion in Bush v. Gore implicates many of the considerations raised in the prior sections’ discussions of standing and political questions. On the issue of standing, consider the following: If the injury identified in the per curiam is the exclusion of valid undervotes in some counties because those counties are using a more stringent standard for assessing voter intent and the exclusion of valid overvotes by an incomplete recount process, who has standing to raise these claims?

Does George W. Bush have standing? Why? Bush was not himself a registered voter in Florida who could claim a violation of his equal protection rights.

In this respect, consider Tribe, EroG v. HsuB and Its Disguises: Freeing Bush v. Gore from Its Hall of Mirrors, 115 Harv. L. Rev. 170, 229–231 (2001):

[I]t is hardly credible—indeed, it borders on the fantastic—to argue that Bush himself lacked standing to press an equal protection claim in the Florida lawsuit. ...[H]e surely had third-party standing. His injury was obvious: the Florida Supreme Court was in essence [replacing the certification he had received with] ...a recount to be conducted by a process he regarded as an unconstitutional roulette game rigged in favor of his opponent....Bush potentially had standing on this theory to represent at least those who had voted for him and whose votes stood to be devalued during a recount. More generally, he shared with all the voters a sufficiently common interest in protecting the integrity of the vote count to ensure his standing as third-party plaintiff....Because of the significant obstacles any individual voter would face in seeking to ensure a fair count, Bush not only had standing but was particularly well placed to assert voters' equal protection rights—even though his ultimate goal was to have some of their votes excluded.

Is “insuring the integrity of the vote count” the kind of “shared individuated right” as to which the Court has traditionally denied standing? Consider in this regard Karlan, Nothing Personal: The Evolution of the Newest Equal Protection from Shaw v. Reno to Bush v. Gore, 79 N.C. L. Rev. 1345, 1357–1360, 1363–1364 (2001):

One striking thing about the Supreme Court’s opinion in Bush v. Gore is that it doesn’t distinguish [among the different potential claims of injury in fact]. But its general tone seems to focus largely on the claims of individual excluded voters, rather than on voters whose preferred candidate was potentially disadvantaged by the recount the Florida Supreme Court ordered. Perhaps this was a tactical decision by the majority, which sought to avoid having its decision appear partisan: to say that the injury was suffered only by Republican voters whose overall voting strength was diluted by the recount standard would have made explicit that this was a case about partisan outcomes rather than abstract principles....

[George W. Bush] is an especially unlikely candidate for third-party standing. It is hard to see George W. Bush as the champion of a claim by undervoters in overwhelmingly Democratic Palm Beach County that they are being denied equal protection because their votes would have been included under the more liberal Broward County standard. Indeed, Bush’s third-party complaint...alleged, among other things, that the standard used in Broward County was partisan, inconsistent, and unfair. The relief he sought was a declaration that “the illegal votes counted in Broward County under the new rules established after the election should be excluded under the Due Process Clause....” Nothing in that proposed remedy vindicates the rights of excluded voters in Palm Beach County or elsewhere....

The equal protection right of individual voters to participate can really be vindicated only by expanding the scope of the prescribed recount. The only equal protection right that can be vindicated by abolishing recounts altogether is a group-based aggregation interest that depends on the partisan composition of the unrecovered pool, precisely the issue the Supreme Court seemed to want to avoid by couching its discussion in individualistic, atomistic terms....

Whatever interest the Supreme Court’s decision vindicated, it was not the interest of an identifiable individual voter. Rather it was a perceived systemic interest in having recounts conducted according to a uniform standard or not at all....

Is Bush an appropriate plaintiff to raise this more systemic claim? Would he be an appropriate plaintiff to raise the article II claim?

3. The twelfth amendment as a “textual commitment” to the political branches? On the subject of the political question doctrine, consider whether article II and the twelfth amendment represent a textual commitment of the question of who is entitled to a state’s electoral votes to Congress. Is this an implication of Justice Breyer’s dissent? Does this explain the per curiam’s decision to rely on the equal protection clause in light of Baker’s assurance that the equal protection clause provides judicially enforceable standards for overseeing the political process? See Karlan, Equal Protection: Bush v. Gore and the Making of a Precedent, in The Unfinished Election of 2000 (J. Rakove ed., 2001).

For an extensive discussion of the evolution of the political question doctrine and its relevance to Bush v. Gore, see Issacharoff, Political Judgments, in The Vote: Bush, Gore & the Supreme Court 55 (C. Sunstein and R. Epstein eds. 2001). Issacharoff argues that the overall structure of the Electoral Count Act of 1887—the source for 3 U.S.C. §5—commits the questions raised in the Florida process to political actors. He quotes Senator John Sherman—coincidentally both one of the sponsors of the act and one of the prime movers behind the equal protection clause—arguing on the floor of the Senate against Supreme Court involvement in presidential election controversies:

Another plan which has been proposed in the debates at different times and I think also in the constitutional convention, was to allow questions of this kind to be certified at once to the Supreme Court for its decisions in case of a division between the two Houses. If the House should be one way and the Senate the other, then it was proposed to let the case be referred directly to the prompt and summary decision of the Supreme Court. But there is a feeling in this country that we ought not to mingle our great judicial tribunal with political questions, and therefore this proposition has not met with much favor. It would be a very grave fault indeed and a very serious objection to refer a political question in which the people of the country were aroused, about which their feelings were excited, to this great tribunal, which after all has to sit upon the life and property of all the people of the United States. It would tend to bring that court into public odium of one or the other of the two great parties. Therefore that plan may probably be rejected as an unwise provision. I believe, however, that it is the provision made in other countries.

17 Cong. Rec. 817–818 (1886) (Sen. Sherman). Issacharoff argues that had the Electoral Count Act been followed more faithfully, the relevant players in the dispute would have been Florida's governor and its legislature and the newly elected members of Congress. He observes:

No doubt, this scenario would look to many modern observers like a pure power grab, a partisan circumvention of orderly legal processes. But why is it either surprising or alarming that an electoral deadlock should be resolved by political officials and bodies elected by the same voters? [In] the heated rhetorical battle of Election 2000, no charge was bandied about with greater derision than the claim that one or another group of partisans was engaged in partisanship. But it was, after all, a partisan election that was at stake. It hardly seems an affront to democratic self-governance to channel the ultimate resolution of a true electoral deadlock into other democratically-elected branches of government.

4. Questions of institutional respect and institutional competence. On the more general question of what Bush v. Gore shows about the Supreme Court's role in the constitutional order, consider Garrett, Institutional Lessons from the 2000 Presidential Election, 29 Fla. St. U. L. Rev. 975, 975–976, 979–980, 982–983 (2001):

[T]he Bush-Gore election concretely illustrates that institutional design is a crucial consideration in determining which part of the government is best suited to render particular decisions. When institutions must become involved in majoritarian political decisions such as the selection of a President, it may be better to rely largely on the political branches than on the judiciary for several reasons. This allocation of decisionmaking authority is preferable because of the greater democratic credentials of Congress....In addition, there is a less-often recognized advantage of institutional design enjoyed by the legislature....[T]he legislature can adopt procedural frameworks to shape decisionmaking and restrain partisan opportunism before a particular controversy arises. In the case of the 2000 election, the United States Congress actually had a framework in place....[The Electoral Count Act long antedated the Bush-Gore election and] would have ensured that decisions were made transparently so voters could have held politicians accountable both for their ultimate decision and for the manner in which they reached it.

In contrast,...the Supreme Court's early intervention into the 2000 election reveals the greater possibility for strategic behavior when an institution acts ex post with relatively full information about how its decisions will affect particular and concrete interests. The presidential election thus provides on the federal level both an example of ex ante rules—the Electoral Count Act—and an example of ex post decisionmaking—the judicial interventions into the political process. While the former contained gaps because its drafters did not foresee all the problems that could arise in a presidential election, the latter provided substantial leeway for opportunistic behavior designed to advance the Justices' preferences....

Although the Constitution's equal protection guarantee was adopted long before the presidential dispute in 2000, it is so open-textured and vague that virtually all the specification occurs when it is applied to particular cases. As an ex ante framework, it is essentially all gap to be filled in the future. Not only did the Court articulate its specification of equal protection for the first time in this case, but it also explicitly limited the doctrine's applicability to the case before it, evading the protection against self-interested decisionmaking that generality in rules can provide....

Others have defended the Supreme Court's repeated intervention into the election contest as a courageous move to save the country from crisis—courageous because the Justices adopted an aggressive role at some risk to the reputations of their institution and themselves. Such fears of a political disaster are overstated, and they reflect an elitist distrust of the relatively messy arena of politics. Congress would not have discharged its responsibility to determine any election contest without some amount of heated rhetoric, opportunistic behavior, and partisan wrangling. However, Congress had the ability to apply [the Electoral Count Act] in a transparent and accountable way.

Consider also Barkow, More Supreme than Court? The Fall of the Political Question Doctrine and the Rise of Judicial Supremacy, 102 Colum. L. Rev. 237, 295–297 (2002):

The Court was well aware that its decision essentially would determine the outcome of the 2000 presidential election. Never before in our nation’s history has the Court held that it had the power to issue such a ruling....

Nor was the Court applying “judicially discoverable and manageable standards” in determining whether the state court overstepped its bounds. Rather, the Article II question required the Court to address fundamental questions of state allocation of authority with no constitutional benchmarks or precedent to guide it. The Article II question presented the same type of anterior question of governance found to be so problematic in the Guarantee Clause cases and described by the Baker Court as involving a “policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion.”

Taking the decision away from the political process left little room for deliberation or protest. The Court itself obviously recognized the importance of the case and the need for the public to have some access to the proceedings. The Court permitted an unprecedented same day audio rebroadcast of the oral argument, an acknowledgement that there was a special need for transparency. The Court was injecting itself into the democratic process in a way that it had not done before, and therefore special public access seemed necessary. But the public never heard the Court’s deliberations as it would have if Congress had resolved the controversy. The people were left with nothing more than rushed opinions—and no formal outlet to express their disagreement or to demand answers. Because the Supreme Court Justices hold their terms for life, the people cannot express their discontent or satisfaction at the ballot box. At most, and unfortunately, the only political outlet is the next Supreme Court confirmation hearing.

With respect to the pragmatic defense of the Court’s decision—that it avoided the “constitutional trainwreck” that would have occurred had the election been thrown into the House of Representatives—see R. Posner, Breaking the Deadlock: The 2000 Election, the Constitution, and the Courts 137–145 (2001). Consider Sunstein, Order without Law, 68 U. Chi. L. Rev. 757, 758–759 (2001):

The Court's decision in Bush v. Gore did have two fundamental virtues. First, it produced a prompt and decisive conclusion to the chaotic post-election period of 2000. Indeed, it probably did so in a way that carried more simplicity and authority than anything that might have been expected from the United States Congress. The Court might even have avoided a genuine constitutional crisis. Second, the Court's equal protection holding carries considerable appeal. On its face, that holding has the potential to create the most expansive, and perhaps sensible, protection for voting rights since the Court's one-person, one-vote decisions of mid-century....

The Court's decision also had two large vices. First, the Court effectively resolved the presidential election not unanimously, but by a 5-4 vote, with the majority consisting entirely of the Court's most conservative justices. Second, the Court's rationale was not only exceedingly ambitious but also embarrassingly weak. However appealing, its equal protection holding had no basis in precedent or in history. It also raises a host of puzzles for the future, which the Court appeared to try to resolve with its minimalist cry of "here, but nowhere else."...

From the standpoint of constitutional order, the Court might well have done the nation a service. From the standpoint of legal reasoning, the Court's decision was very bad. In short, the Court's decision produced order without law....

5. The merits of the Court's decision. The Court's decision has been subjected to voluminous scholarly and popular discussion. In general, the scholarship has been scathing in its treatment of the per curiam's equal protection analysis. For representative examples, see Klarmann, Bush v. Gore through the Lens of Constitutional History, 89 Cal. L. Rev. 1721 (2001); Sunstein, Order without Law, supra; Seidman, What's So Bad about Bush v. Gore: An Essay on Our Unsettled Election, 47 Wayne St. L. Rev. 953 (2001). Much of the criticism focuses not on the abstract equal protection question of whether a vote should have the same likelihood of being included regardless of where the vote was cast—a sort of "equal protection for ballots"—but on the question of remedy: Did stopping the manual recount actually protect any voter's equal protection interest? For a defense of the equal protection holding, see Lund, The Unbearable Rightness of Bush v. Gore, 23 Cardozo L. Rev. 1219 (2002).

Most defenders of the outcome of Bush v. Gore have defended the case either on the grounds advanced in the Chief Justice's concurrence or on more pragmatic grounds—in Judge Richard Posner's phrase, that it averted a “constitutional trainwreck.” For representative samples of this scholarship, see Epstein, “In Such Manner as the Legislature Thereof May Direct”: The Outcome in Bush v. Gore Defended, in The Vote, supra; R. Posner, Breaking the Deadlock: The 2000 Election, the Constitution, and the Courts (2001).

4. Questions of Timing—Ripeness and Mootness

Additional justiciability barriers involve the timing of judicial review. The doctrine of ripeness bars courts from deciding cases that are premature—too speculative or remote to warrant judicial intervention. A classic example would be a case brought to challenge a criminal statute before a prosecution is initiated, in circumstances in which the mere existence of the statute is not alleged to produce actual harm. The doctrine of mootness prevents courts from hearing cases when changed circumstances deprive the plaintiff of a stake in the action. A classic example would be a case brought by a plaintiff challenging a statute prohibiting her from obtaining employment where the plaintiff has been given the job before the appeal. A case is not ripe when it is brought too soon; it is moot when it is brought too late.

Ripeness. Laird v. Tatum, 408 U.S. 1 (1972), involved a class action brought for injunctive relief against alleged “surveillance of lawful citizen political activity” by the U.S. Army. According to the plaintiffs, the army had collected information about political activities that had some potential for civil disorder; plaintiffs also claimed that they were targets of the surveillance, and that, as a result, they were “chilled” from engaging in constitutionally protected activity. The Court held that the plaintiffs did not present “a case for resolution by the courts.” According to the Court, a “chilling effect” was insufficient if it arose “merely from the individual’s knowledge that a government agency was engaged in certain activities or from the individual’s concomitant fear that, armed with the fruits of those activities, the agency might in the future take some other and additional action detrimental to that individual.” The Court said that the plaintiff’s “approach would have the federal courts as virtually continuing monitors of the wisdom and soundness of Executive action; such a role is appropriate for the Congress rather than the judiciary, absent actual present or immediately threatened injury resulting from unlawful governmental action.” Justice Douglas, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented. What was the timing problem in Tatum? When might these litigants be able to challenge the surveillance?

Compare with Tatum the decision in Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 485 (1952), which involved a challenge to a state law disqualifying from employment in public schools anyone who was a member of assorted “subversive organizations.” The plaintiffs seeking a declaratory judgment included parents and teachers of school children. The Court reached the merits without discussion, notwithstanding a dissent on ripeness grounds by Justice Frankfurter, who invoked United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75 (1947). In Mitchell, federal civil service employees sought a declaratory judgment against the Hatch Act, which prohibits federal employees from participating in the management of political campaigns. The Court said that the plaintiffs’ affidavits declare a desire to act contrary to the rule against political activity but not that the rule has been violated. [Appellants] seem clearly to seek advisory opinions upon broad claims. [Appellants] want to engage in “political management and political campaigns,” [but] such generality of objection is really an attack on the political expediency of the Hatch Act, not a presentation of legal issues. It is beyond the competence of courts to render such a decision.

Did Mitchell in fact involve a legal question? Why was the threat of prosecution in Mitchell (or Tatum) insufficient to justify judicial relief? Was the abstract character of the dispute a real problem?

See also Socialist Labor Party v. Gilligan, 406 U.S. 583 (1972) (refusing to hear challenge to a statute requiring party members to pledge that they were not engaged in “an attempt to overthrow the government by force”; Court notes that the pleadings did not allege that party members have ever refused in the past or will now refuse to sign the oath, which has been in existence since 1941); Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961) (refusing to hear challenge to Connecticut prohibition on use of contraceptive devices on ground that there was no allegation that state threatened prosecution).

Mootness. DeFunis v. Odegaard, 416 U.S. 312 (1974), involved a challenge to a preferential admissions program adopted by the University of Washington Law School. By the time the case reached the Court, DeFunis was in his third year of law school as a result of a decision below ordering his admission. According to the law school, his registration would not be cancelled regardless of the Supreme Court’s decision. The Court noted that voluntary cessation of allegedly unlawful conduct does not make the case moot; if it did, the defendant would be “free to return to his old ways.” Here, however, mootness “depends not at all upon a ‘voluntary cessation’ of the admissions practices that were the subject of this litigation. It depends, instead, upon the simple fact that DeFunis is now in the final quarter of the final year of his course of study, and the settled and unchallenged policy of the Law School to permit him to complete the term for which he is now enrolled.” The lower court found the case moot.

Compare Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), involving a challenge to abortion statutes. Roe herself was no longer pregnant by the time the case came to the Supreme Court. The Court nonetheless held that it was not moot, relying on an established exception for cases that are “capable of repetition, yet evading review.” If the termination of a pregnancy, the Court said, “makes a case moot, pregnancy litigation seldom will survive much beyond the trial stage, and appellate review will be effectively denied.”

F. THE JURISDICTION OF THE SUPREME COURT

Note: Jurisdiction, Certiorari, and the U.S. Supreme Court

1. Jurisdiction in general. For constitutional purposes, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is set out in article III. But Congress has never granted litigants access to the Court in all cases for which article III provides authorization. The governing provisions are set out in 28 U.S.C. §§1251–1257.

These provisions furnish two principal routes to the Supreme Court. The first, abandoned in 1988 except for rare cases, is through an appeal; the second is through certiorari.

It is generally said that the Supreme Court’s appellate jurisdiction is “mandatory.” If a party who has lost below seeks review, the Court must hear any case that falls within its appellate jurisdiction. Today, the two largest classes of cases falling within the Court’s mandatory jurisdiction concern judicial regulation of the political process. Title 28 U.S.C. §2284(a) provides, in pertinent part, that “[a] district court of three judges shall be convened when otherwise required by Act of Congress, or when an action is filed challenging the constitutionality of the apportionment of congressional districts or the apportionment of any statewide legislative body.” Similarly, section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. §1973c, also requires the use of three-judge district courts and direct appellate review in cases involving a particularly stringent remedial statute that forbids certain jurisdictions from changing their election laws without prior federal approval. 28 U.S.C. §1253 provides that “[except] as otherwise provided by law, any party may appeal to the Supreme Court from an order granting or denying, after notice and hearing, an interlocutory or permanent injunction in any civil action, suit or proceeding required by any Act of Congress to be heard and determined by a district court of three judges.” Consider why Congress retained the three-judge court, direct mandatory appeal process for these cases. Is the decision connected to a desire to resolve cases touching on fundamental questions of state self-government quickly? See Solimine, The Three-Judge District Court in Voting-Rights Litigation, 30 U. Mich. J.L. Reform 79 (1996).

Certiorari jurisdiction, by contrast, is discretionary. The Court may deny certiorari for a range of reasons other than its agreement with the decision below —the unimportance of the issue, the unusual character of the particular facts, the desire to see the issue “percolate” in the lower courts, the controversial character of the problem, or the wish to allow the political process time to consider the problem before an authoritative resolution is obtained. For a classic discussion of the denial of certiorari as an exercise of the Court’s “passive virtues,” see A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch 115–116 (1965).

2. The certiorari process. Litigants seeking certiorari must file a petition for certiorari, setting out the reasons the case deserves plenary consideration. Supreme Court Rule 10, “although neither controlling nor fully measuring the Court’s discretion, indicate[s] the character of the reasons” the Court considers:

(a) a United States court of appeals has entered a decision in conflict with the decision of another United States court of appeals on the same important matter; has decided an important federal question in a way that conflicts with a decision by a state court of last resort; or has so far departed from the accepted and usual course of judicial proceedings, or sanctioned such a departure by a lower court, as to call for an exercise of this Court’s supervisory power;

(b) a state court of last resort has decided an important federal question in a way that conflicts with the decision of another state court of last resort or of a United States court of appeals;

(c) a state court or a United States court of appeals has decided an important question of federal law that has not been, but should be, settled by this Court, or has decided an important federal question in a way that conflicts with relevant decisions of this Court.

Rules of the Supreme Court, <http://www.supremecourtus.gov/ctrules/ctrules.html> (2007). After the petitioner files its petition, the respondents are entitled to file a brief in opposition, explaining why the Court should not consider the case.

Roughly 8,000 petitions for certiorari are filed with the Court each year. The manner of screening cases varies among the justices. For discussions of these practices over time, see, e.g., Caldeira and Wright, The Discuss List: Agenda Building and the Supreme Court, 24 Law & Soc. Rev. 807, 811–812 (1990).

Most of the justices now on the Court participate in a “cert pool,” in which one law clerk is assigned responsibility for writing a memorandum circulated to many of the chambers. Some members of the Court supplement the pool by having their own clerks prepare an additional memorandum. Two members of the Court do not participate in the pool, but instead rely on their own clerks. Prior justices sometimes handled the petition review entirely by themselves.

Normally, the Court provides no reason for its denial of a petition for certiorari, although justices who voted to hear the case will on occasion dissent from the denial of certiorari, explaining why they thought the petition should have been granted.

Far less often, justices who voted to deny the petition for certiorari will explain their reasons. See, e.g., Padilla v. Hanft, 547 U.S. 1062 (2006) (giving prudential reasons for voting to deny the petition); McCray v. New York, 461 U.S. 961 (1983) (urging lower courts to continue addressing the question presented).

Until sometime in the 1930s, the justices apparently discussed all petitions for certiorari. Since then, however, the Court has discussed as an institution only those petitions that at least one justice asks to have put on a “discuss list.” See Caldeira and Wright, supra, at 812. The vast majority of all petitions are placed instead on a “dead list” and are denied without further discussion.

The general rule is that a denial of certiorari does not have any precedential value. See Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288, 296 (1989). Why might the Court be careful to ensure the perpetuation of that rule?

The Court normally agrees to give plenary consideration to any case that at least four justices wish to hear. For a discussion of the history of the so-called Rule of Four, see Revesz and Karlan, Nonmajority Rules and the Supreme Court, 136 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1067, 1069–1071 (1988). For an evaluation of the rule, consider Justice Stevens’s observations. Justice Stevens notes that in recent years somewhere between a quarter and a third of the Court’s cases have been granted by the votes of only four justices:

Mere numbers, however, provide an inadequate measure of the significance of the cases that were heard because of the rule. For I am sure that some Court opinions in cases that were granted by only four votes have made a valuable contribution to the development of our jurisprudence. My experience has persuaded me, however, that such cases are exceptionally rare. I am convinced that a careful study of all of the cases that have been granted on the basis of only four votes would indicate that in a surprisingly large number the law would have fared just as well if the decision of the court of appeals or the state court had been allowed to stand....

The Rule of Four is sometimes justified by the suggestion that if four justices of the Supreme Court consider a case important enough to warrant full briefing and argument on the merits, that should be sufficient evidence of the significance of the question presented. But a countervailing argument has at least equal force. Every case that is granted on the basis of four votes is a case that five members of the Court thought should not be granted. For the most significant work of the Court, it is assumed that the collective judgment of its majority is more reliable than the views of the minority. Arguably, therefore, deference to the minority's desire to add additional cases to the argument docket may rest on an assumption that whether the Court hears a few more or a few less cases in any term is not a matter of first importance.

History and logic both support the conclusion that the Rule of Four must inevitably enlarge the size of the Court's argument docket and cause it to hear a substantial number of cases that a majority of the Court deems unworthy of review.

Stevens, The Life Span of a Judge-Made Rule, 58 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1, 17–20 (1983). At the time Justice Stevens wrote, the Court was hearing roughly 150 cases a year. In recent years, in part as a result of the 1988 change to its jurisdiction, but in part as a result of the justices' voting behavior at the certiorari stage, the Court has dramatically decreased the number of cases it hears, giving plenary consideration to roughly eighty cases each term. See Cordray and Cordray, The Calendar of the Justices: How the Supreme Court's Timing Affects Its Decisionmaking, 36 Ariz. St. L.J. 183, 201 (2004); O'Brien, Join-3 Votes, the Rule of Four, the Cert. Pool, and the Supreme Court's Shrinking Plenary Docket, 13 J.L. & Pol. 779 (1997). For a now-classic, if outdated, account of the Supreme Court's workload, see Hart, The Time Chart of the Justices, 73 Harv. L. Rev. 84 (1959). For general discussion of the caseload problem of the federal courts, see R. Posner, Federal Courts: Crisis and Reform (1985); for the caseload in the Supreme Court, see the annual Supreme Court issues of the Harvard Law Review.

Krattenmaker, Inside the Supreme Court: The Institution and Its Procedures (2d ed. 2008); E. Gressman, K. Geller, S. Shapiro, T. Bishop, and E. Hartnett, Supreme Court Practice (9th ed. 2007).

* [The full text of Section 13 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 73, reads:

And be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies of a civil nature, where a state is a party, except between a state and its citizens; and except also between a state and citizens of other states, or aliens, in which latter case it shall have original but not exclusive jurisdiction. And shall have exclusively all such jurisdiction of suits or proceedings against ambassadors, or other public ministers, or their domestics, or domestic servants, as a court of law can have or exercise consistently with the law of nations; and original, but not exclusive jurisdiction of all suits brought by ambassadors, or other public ministers, or in which a consul, or vice consul, shall be a party. And the trial of issues of fact in the Supreme Court, in all actions at law against citizens of the United States, shall be by jury. The Supreme Court shall also have appellate jurisdiction from the circuit courts and courts of the several states, in the cases herein after specially provided for; and shall have power to issue writs of prohibition to the district courts, when proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed, or persons holding office, under the authority of the United States.]

7 There is this much truth to the assertion that “procedural rights” are special: The person who has been accorded a procedural right to protect his concrete interests can assert that right without meeting all the normal standards for redressability and immediacy. Thus, under our case law, one living adjacent to the site for proposed construction of a federally licensed dam has standing to challenge the licensing agency’s failure to prepare an Environmental Impact Statement, even though he cannot establish with any certainty that the Statement will cause the license to be withheld or altered, and even though the dam will not be completed for many years. (That is why we do not rely, in the present case, upon the Government’s argument that, even if the other agencies were obliged to consult with the Secretary, they might not have followed his advice.) What respondents’ “procedural right” argument seeks, however, is quite different from this: standing for persons who have no concrete interests affected—persons who live (and propose to live) at the other end of the country from the dam.

1 [This provision is part of a complex scheme dealing with congressional procedures for the counting of electoral votes, enacted in the wake of the disputed presidential election of 1876. The statute provides that [if] any State shall have provided, by laws enacted prior to the day fixed for the appointment of the electors, for its final determination of any controversy or contest concerning the appointment of [electors] by judicial or other [methods], and such determination shall have been made at least six days before the time fixed for the meeting of the electors, such determination made pursuant to such law so existing on said day, and made at least six days prior to said time of meeting of the electors, shall be [conclusive].

Federalism at Work: Congress and the National Economy

Article I, section 8 lists a number of legislative powers given to Congress. Enumeration is one technique by which the Constitution creates, or confirms the existence of, federalism. Over the course of U.S. history, one of the enumerated powers most important for defining the contours of federalism has been the power to “regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes.” This chapter uses the power to regulate interstate commerce as the vehicle for examining fundamentals about federalism —the allocation of governing power between the nation and the states. Those fundamentals include (1) what, if any, are the limits on the power to regulate interstate commerce; (2) what are the mechanisms by which any such limits are enforced; and (3) in particular, what is the role of the courts in enforcing such limits?

The chapter begins with an overview of the values of federalism and the techniques for implementing it. Section B presents some doctrinal fundamentals through three classic cases, each of which articulates a different view of the limits, if any, on congressional power and of the mechanisms for enforcing such limits. Section C then examines the historical development of commerce clause doctrine, deepening the presentation of the doctrinal frameworks the Supreme Court has used. Section D concludes by examining the limits the commerce clause places on state legislation affecting interstate commerce, in the absence of express congressional legislation (the so-called dormant commerce clause).

A. THE VALUES OF FEDERALISM AND SOME TECHNIQUES FOR IMPLEMENTING THEM

Note: A Government of Enumerated Powers

1. The origins of enumeration. The experience of the new American nation prior to the framing of the Constitution made it clear to the framers that the primary defect in the Articles of Confederation was the failure to give sufficient power to the national government. The framers therefore wanted to increase the power of the new government as compared to the old. This raised two problems: (1) The framers believed that states ought to remain as significant units of government, and that the national government ought to exercise its power only on distinctively national subjects, while states would exercise control over most matters of general government. (2) Power granted to the national government might be improvidently used, so as to suppress liberty and choke economic development. The framers sought to respond to those concerns by enumerating the powers granted to the national government.

The framers regarded it as significant that, whereas the prior government was a federation created by the states, the new one was created by “the People.” The contemporary significance of this choice was discussed in U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779 (1995). In arguing that states could not impose term limits on members of Congress, Justice Stevens wrote:

Prior to the adoption of the Constitution, the States had joined together under the Articles of Confederation. In that system, “the States retained most of their sovereignty, like independent nations bound together only by treaties.” Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1, 9 (1964). After the Constitutional Convention convened, the Framers [adopted] “[a] plan not merely to amend the Articles of Confederation but to create an entirely new National [Government].” In adopting that plan, the Framers envisioned a uniform national system, rejecting the notion that the Nation was a collection of States, and instead creating a direct link between the National Government and the people of the United States. In that National Government, representatives owe primary allegiance not to the people of a State, but to the people of the Nation. [The] Congress of the United States, therefore, is not a confederation of nations in which separate sovereigns are represented by appointed delegates, but is instead a body composed of representatives of the people.

Justice Kennedy, concurring, added:

The Framers split the atom of sovereignty. It was the genius of their idea that our citizens would have two political capacities, one state and one federal, each protected from incursion by the other. [A] distinctive character of the National Government [is] that it owes its existence to the act of the whole people who created it. [There] can be no doubt [that] there exists [a] relationship between the people of the Nation and their National Government, with which the States may not interfere.

Justice Thomas, in dissent, responded, “Our system of government rests on one overriding principle: all power stems from the consent of the people. [The] ultimate source of the Constitution’s authority is the consent of the people of each individual State, not the consent of the undifferentiated people of the Nation as a whole.” Do these different conceptions of the relations among individuals, states, and the nation imply different conceptions of the scope of national power? Of the scope of state power?

2. How enumeration limits powers: explicit limitations as an alternative. In The Federalist No. 84, Hamilton argued that the enumeration of national powers made unnecessary a bill of rights, which would explicitly limit Congress’s powers:

It has been several times truly remarked that bills of rights are, in their origin, stipulations between kings and their subjects, abridgments of prerogative in favor of privilege, reservations of rights not surrendered to the prince. [Here,] in strictness, the people surrender nothing; and as they retain everything they have no need of particular reservations....

I go further and affirm that bills of rights [are] not only unnecessary in the proposed Constitution but would even be dangerous. They would contain various exceptions to powers not granted; and, on this very account, would afford a colorable pretext to claim more than were granted. For why declare that things shall not be done which there is no power to do? Why, for instance, should it be said that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given by which restrictions may be imposed? I will not contend that such a provision would confer a regulating power; but it is evident that it would furnish, to men disposed to usurp, a plausible pretense for claiming that power. They might urge with a semblance of reason that the Constitution ought not to be charged with the absurdity of providing against the abuse of an authority which was not given, and that the provision against restraining the liberty of the press afforded a clear implication that a power to prescribe proper regulations concerning it was intended to be vested in the national government....

On the subject of the liberty of the press, [I] infer that its security, whatever fine declarations may be inserted in any constitution respecting it, must altogether depend on public opinion, and on the general spirit of the people and of the government.* And here, after all, [must] we seek for the only solid basis of all our rights.

As you study the materials that follow, consider whether Hamilton was right.

Note: The Values of Federalism

What values are served by a system that distributes governmental authority between state and nation, that is, by federalism? For an overview of contemporary issues, see D. L. Shapiro, Federalism: A Dialogue (1995).

1. Efficiency. Given wide variations in the circumstances obtaining in different areas of the country, it is likely that different solutions to specific problems will be appropriate in different areas. But a national government can respond to problems created for one state or region by activities elsewhere. Economic integration means that economic problems in one area can be addressed with assistance from other areas, and it allows all regions to gain the benefits of goods such as defense, transportation, and communications, which are more efficiently provided on larger scales.

2. Promoting individual choice. A national government can enforce the values shared by a majority in the nation as a whole, even against those who are a majority in one or a few states. Consider these observations by James Madison, from The Federalist No. 46:

[The] federal and State governments are in fact but different agents and trustees of the people, constituted with different powers and designed for different purposes. [The] ultimate authority, wherever the derivative may be found, resides in the people alone, and [it] will not depend merely on the comparative ambition or address of the different governments whether either, or which of them, will be able to enlarge its sphere of jurisdiction at the expense of the other.

If, therefore, [the] people should in future become more partial to the federal than to the State governments, the change can only result from such manifest and irresistible proofs of a better administration as will overcome all their antecedent propensities. And in that case, the people ought not surely to be precluded from giving most of their confidence where they may discover it to be most due; but even in that case the State governments could have little to apprehend, because it is only within a certain sphere that the federal power can, in the nature of things, be advantageously administered....

In contrast, disabling the national government from acting on some subjects while allowing states to act in varying ways allows people to move from one area to another in order to select the kind of government policies they prefer.

Prichard, Securing the Canadian Economic Union: Federalism and Internal Barriers to Trade, in Federalism and the Canadian Economic Union 17–18 (M. Trebilcock et al. eds., 1983), suggests that the political process is likely to favor decentralization:

First, interest groups that may be minorities nationally are more likely to be majorities locally. Second, [the] greater the homogeneity of interests on a geographical basis, the more often minorities become majorities as decentralization increases. Third, decentralization of functions in a hierarchical way disaggregates policy packages and allows a citizen to cast different votes on different components of policy because they are vested in different levels of government in the jurisdictional hierarchy. Fourth, decentralization, by creating a diversity of jurisdictions, allows a better matching of preferences and policies because voters can choose that jurisdiction which offers the most preferred policy package. That is, citizens may “vote with their feet,” searching out the jurisdiction offering the most attractive set of policies. Simultaneously, the threat of exit by voters from a jurisdiction forces the decentralized governments to reflect the policy preferences of their existing or potential constituents as the jurisdictions compete for voters. Fifth, given the greater homogeneity of tastes as boundaries contract, decentralization reduces the likelihood of policy compromises being adopted that create minimum winning coalitions but do not accurately reflect the interests of any particular interest group....

A sixth advantage of decentralization is the reduction of “signalling” and other “transactions costs” for expressing citizen preferences [such as] participation in efforts to influence the actions of lobbies and large pressure groups [and] voting or the act of giving one’s support to or withholding it from a candidate of a political party or, in very special cases, a policy.

The origin of this approach is Tiebout, A Pure Theory of Local Expenditures, 64 J. Pol. Econ. 416 (1956). Note that this view of federalism may overestimate the ease with which voters may relocate. For elaboration and critique, see A. Hirschman, Exit, Voice, and Loyalty (1970); D. Mueller, Public Choice 125–147 (1979).

3. Encouraging experimentation. Justice Brandeis, dissenting in New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262 (1932), wrote:

To stay experimentation in things social and economic is a grave responsibility. Denial of the right to experiment may be fraught with serious consequences to the Nation. It is one of the happy incidents of the federal system that a single courageous State may, if its citizens choose, serve as a laboratory; and try novel social and economic experiments without risk to the rest of the country. This Court has the power to prevent an experiment. [But] in the exercise of this high power, we must ever be on our guard, lest we erect our prejudices into legal principles. If we would guide by the light of reason, we must let our minds be bold.

Note that experiments on the local level can teach the people of the whole nation that particular innovations are valuable enough to be adopted throughout the nation.

A national government with plenary power might choose to exercise that power in ways that encourage experimentation, efficiency, and choice. It could divide the nation into administrative regions and give revocable grants of autonomy to the regions with respect to certain subjects. It could create a system in which national laws were applicable unless national administrators waived them to allow states to pursue their own paths. What values of federalism would be impaired by such a system? Do national lawmakers have incentives to set up such a system?

4. Promoting democracy. State and local governments provide the opportunity for people to participate directly in the activities of governments that have significant effects on their lives. This participation would make them the active citizens valued in one version of democratic theory rather than the passive subjects of a remote national government. Does federalism serve this value today?

5. Preventing tyranny. Consider Rapaczynski, From Sovereignty to Process: The Jurisprudence of Federalism after Garcia, 1985 Sup. Ct. Rev. 341, at 341, 385–386, 388–389:

[Although] the states are more easily captured by relatively undifferentiated majoritarian interests intent on suppressing small minorities, the federal government may be a more likely subject of capture by a set of special minoritarian interests, precisely because the majority interest of the national constituency is so large, diffuse, and enormously difficult to organize....

[Should] the federal government ever be captured by an authoritarian movement [the] resulting oppression would almost certainly be much more severe and durable than that of which any state would be capable. [It] is precisely because the states are governmental bodies that break the national authorities' monopoly on coercion that they constitute the most fundamental bastion against a successful conversion of the federal government into a vehicle of the worst kind of oppression.

6. Protecting liberty. As the Court stated in Bond v. United States, 564 U.S. 211 (2011):

Federalism secures the freedom of the individual. It allows States to respond, through the enactment of positive law, to the initiative of those who seek a voice in shaping the destiny of their own times without having to rely solely upon the political processes that control a remote central power. [Federalism] also protects the liberty of all persons within a State by ensuring that laws enacted in excess of delegated governmental power cannot direct or control their actions. By denying any one government complete jurisdiction over all the concerns of public life, federalism protects the liberty of the individual from arbitrary power. When government acts in excess of its lawful powers, that liberty is at stake.

Note two themes. (a) State-level legislation can affirmatively promote freedom. (b) Legislation “in excess of delegated power” threatens liberty. How can that be so with respect to national-level legislation of a sort that states could permissibly adopt without violating (state- or national-level) protections of liberty?

7. A skeptical view of federalism’s values. Feeley and Rubin, Federalism: Political Identity and Tragic Compromise 15, 16 (2009), argue that federalism “serves as a means of modulating, or varying, political identity. [If] people’s political identity is associated with some region that has been subsumed into a larger polity, federalism provides a means by which the disjunction between their political identity and their territorial mode of governance can be reduced. [Federalism] will only be appealing to people if the region itself [relates] to their sense of political identity.” On this understanding, is federalism an appropriate form of governance for the United States?

Feeley and Rubin distinguish federalism from decentralization and local democracy. Decentralization “is a managerial strategy by which a centralized regime can achieve the results it desires in a more effective manner.” Id. at 20. “[Federalism] does not necessarily increase participation; it simply authorizes a set of specified political subunits to decide for themselves how much participation is desirable. Some might choose to encourage participation, but others might choose to suppress it.” National policymakers could “achiev[e] the same goal [by] hiring community organizers, funding local organizations, and requiring approvals for government decisions from different sectors of the population,” and “[in] a truly federal regime, some states might opt for elections, while others might not.” Id. at 22, 23.

On the argument that federalism promotes economic efficiency, Feeley and Rubin argue that “[federalism] allows a multiplicity of norms, not simply a multiplicity of rules. In a truly federal system, some subunits might not be interested in economic efficiency; [they] might be primarily motivated by the desire to preserve an agrarian lifestyle, to protect the environment, or to encourage individual spirituality. [They] might lose out in the competition for factories and corporate executives [but] rather than perceiving their losses as a chastening lesson [they] might perceive them as a necessary cost or as a positive advantage.” Id. at 24.

Calabresi & Fish, Federalism and Moral Disagreement, 101 Minn. L. Rev. 1 (2016), argue that “states form federalist unions when they want to align for economic and security reasons in spite of fundamental moral disagreements. [But] such federalist compromises are frequently unstable, because one part of a union will sometimes seek to impose its strong moral views on the whole.” Among the possible responses to this instability are secession and compromise and de-escalation. “Embracing moral federalism might entail a kind of epistemic humility, recognizing that one’s own moral view may not be the correct one, or even adopting a principle that even correct moral views should not be imposed on the unwilling.” But, they conclude, “[One] cannot help but ask: When is nationalizing [moral issues] worth the risk? And when is not taking the risk itself moral?” Frame the questions Calabresi and Fish raise with reference to (a) racial discrimination, (b) abortion, (c) LGBTQ rights, and (d) accommodations of antidiscrimination laws to religious beliefs.

For a collection of essays on secession, see Levinson ed., Nullification and Secession in Modern Constitutional Law (2016).

8. Doctrinal implications. Assuming that a political system should advance the values of federalism, do the ones listed above provide guidance on the content of a judicially enforced doctrine of federalism?

9. The forms of federalism. In considering the material in this chapter, keep in mind that there are a number of ways to distribute power in a federal system.

a. Neither state nor nation may have power to act. The first amendment, applicable to the states through the fourteenth amendment, exemplifies this situation: If some regulation violates the first amendment, neither state governments nor Congress may adopt it (although sometimes the substantive standards applicable to analyze the constitutional question will vary depending on whether the enacting body is a state government or Congress).

b. The national government may be given exclusive power to regulate in some area. Article I, section 10 itemizes a number of activities in which states may not engage even though Congress is given power in article I, section 8 to do so: States may not, but Congress may, “coin Money,” for example.

c. State governments may have exclusive power to regulate in some area. The central controversies in this chapter involve two related questions about this category: Are there any subjects in the category, and, if so, what subjects may the states, but not Congress, regulate?

d. State and national governments may have concurrent power to regulate in some area. The supremacy clause, article VI, paragraph 2, establishes that, where the nation and the states have concurrent power that Congress chooses to exercise, the national legislation prevails over conflicting state legislation. Section D examines such questions as these: Has Congress chosen to exercise its concurrent power? Does state legislation conflict with national statutes? Does Congress’s failure to exercise its power authorize—or prohibit—state legislation in the area?

10. Cooperative federalism. A substantial literature on cooperative federalism is summarized in Ryan, Negotiating Federalism and the Structural Constitution: Navigating the Separation of Powers Both Vertically and Horizontally, 115 Colum. L. Rev. Sidebar 4 (April 2015). Cooperative federalism takes many forms, but all involve sustained interactions in the development, implementation, and enforcement of policy nominally determined by the national government. Cooperative federalism is sometimes suggested as a way of avoiding the problems associated with a constitutional federalism whose defining characteristic is the allocation of powers between the nation and the states. Are there any constitutional objections to truly cooperative federalism? Note that sometimes states may object that their cooperation has been coerced.

B. DOCTRINAL FUNDAMENTALS: FEDERALISM AND JUDICIAL REVIEW

Gibbons v. Ogden

22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1 (1824)

[The New York legislature enacted a statute granting Robert Fulton and Robert Livingston the exclusive right to operate steamboats in New York waters. The statute was designed to encourage investment in the development of the then-novel technology of steamboats. Fulton and Livingston licensed Ogden to operate a ferry between New York City and Elizabethtown Point in New Jersey. Gibbons began operating a competing ferry service that, because it necessarily entered New York waters, violated the grant to Fulton and Livingston and the license to Ogden. Gibbons’s ferries were, however, licensed as “vessels [in] the coasting trade" under a statute enacted by Congress in 1793. Ogden obtained an injunction against Gibbons from the New York courts.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court....

[The] subject to be regulated is commerce; and our constitution being [one] of enumeration, and not of definition, to ascertain the extent of the power, it becomes necessary to settle the meaning of the word. The counsel for the appellee would limit it to traffic, to buying and selling, or the interchange of commodities, and do not admit that it comprehends navigation. This would restrict a general term, applicable to many objects, to one of its significations. Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more: it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse....

[All] America understands [the] word "commerce," to comprehend navigation. [The] power over commerce, including navigation, was one of the primary objects for which the people of American adopted their government....

The subject to which the power is next applied, is to commerce "among the several States." The word "among" means intermingled with. A thing which is among others, is intermingled with them. Commerce among the States, cannot stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior.

It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce, which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States. Such a power would be inconvenient, and is certainly unnecessary.

Comprehensive as the word "among" is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more States than one. The phrase is not one which would probably have been selected to indicate the completely interior traffic of a State. [The] enumeration presupposes something not enumerated; and that something, if we regard the language or the subject of the sentence, must be the exclusively internal commerce of a State. The genius and character of the whole government seem to be, that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally; but not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere, for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the government. The completely internal commerce of a State, then, may be considered as reserved for the State itself.

But, in regulating commerce with foreign nations, the power of Congress does not stop at the jurisdictional lines of the several States. It would be a very useless power, if it could not pass those lines. [The] deep streams which penetrate our country in every direction, pass through the interior of almost every State in the Union, and furnish the means of exercising this right. If Congress has the power to regulate it, that power must be exercised whenever the subject exists....

This principle is [still] more clear when applied to commerce “among the several States.” They either join each other, in which case they are separated by a mathematical line, or they are remote from each other, in which case other States lie between them. What is commerce “among” them; and how is it to be conducted? Can a trading expedition between two adjoining States, commence and terminate outside of each? And if the trading intercourse be between two States remote from each other, must it not commence in one, terminate in the other, and probably pass through a third? Commerce among the States must, of necessity, be commerce with the States. [The] power of Congress, then, whatever it may be, must be exercised within the territorial jurisdiction of the several States....

[What] is this power?

It is the power [to] prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the constitution. [If,] as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the constitution of the United States. The wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections, are, in this, as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they have relied, to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints on which the people must often rely solely, in all representative governments.

[Ogden argued that state laws requiring inspections of cargo demonstrated that the power to regulate commerce was not exclusively in Congress.] That inspection laws may have a remote and considerable influence on commerce, will not be denied; but that a power to regulate commerce is the source from which the right to pass them is derived, cannot be admitted. The object of inspection laws, is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labour of a country; to fit them for exportation; or, it may be, for domestic use. They act upon the subject before it becomes an article of foreign commerce, or of commerce among the States, and prepare it for that purpose. They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation, which embraces everything within the territory of a State, not surrendered to the general government: all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass.

No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress; and, consequently, they remain subject to State legislation. If the legislative power of the Union can reach them, it must be for national purposes; it must be where the power is expressly given for a special purpose, or is clearly incidental to some power which is expressly given....

Powerful and ingenious minds, taking, as postulates, that the powers expressly granted to the government of the Union, are to be contracted by construction, into the narrowest possible compass, and that the original powers of the States are retained, if any possible construction will retain them, may, by a course of well digested, but refined and metaphysical reasoning, founded on these premises, explain away the constitution of our country, and leave it, a magnificent structure, indeed, to look at, but totally unfit for use. They may so entangle and perplex the understanding, as to obscure principles, which were before thought quite plain, and induce doubts where, if the mind were to pursue its own course, none would be perceived. In such a case, it is peculiarly necessary to recur to safe and fundamental principles to sustain those principles, and when sustained, to make them the tests of the arguments to be examined.

[The Court interpreted the 1793 statute to authorize the entry of Gibbons's ferries into New York waters. The New York monopoly was therefore invalid under the supremacy clause, and the injunction was accordingly dissolved.]

Note: Gibbons v. Ogden

1. The purposes of the commerce clause. What were the purposes for which Congress was given the power to regulate interstate commerce? Consider the description of the problems under the Articles of Confederation from Justice Johnson's concurring opinion in Gibbons: "For a century the States had submitted, with murmurs, to the commercial restrictions imposed by the parent State; and now, finding themselves in the unlimited possession of those powers over their own commerce, which they had so long been deprived of, and so earnestly coveted, that selfish principle which, well controlled, is so salutary, and which, unrestricted, is so unjust and tyrannical, guided by inexperience and jealousy, began to show itself in iniquitous laws and impolitic measures, from which grew up a conflict of commercial regulations, destructive to the harmony of the States, and fatal to their commercial interests abroad.” Does this history justify interpreting the commerce clause to do more than authorize Congress to override state laws obstructing the free flow of trade across state and national borders? On this view, does the commerce clause authorize Congress to enact regulations that it regards as appropriate to the development of the national economy?

2. Limiting the commerce clause. The commerce clause could be limited in two ways: (a) “Internal” limits: The clause might define a specific subject matter, such that Congress could not “regulate” anything but “interstate and foreign commerce.” Doctrine would define “regulate” and “commerce among the several States.” This subject matter limit protects the values of federalism. (b) “External” limits: The clause might allow Congress to do anything reasonably regarded as regulation of anything reasonably regarded as interstate or foreign commerce, but other provisions of the Constitution, such as the first amendment, might bar the exercise of a power concededly granted. Recall here Chief Justice Marshall’s statement in McCulloch, Chapter 1 supra:

Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional. [Should] Congress, in the execution of its powers, adopt measures which are prohibited by the constitution; or should Congress, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not entrusted to the government; it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say that such an act was not the law of the land. But where the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects entrusted to the government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity, would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department, and to tread on legislative ground.

Does this imply that the courts will enforce both internal and external limits?

The distinction between internal and external limits is closely tied to resolution of questions about judicial enforcement of limits on Congress’s powers: It is usually conceded that the courts can enforce external limits such as the first amendment. But judicial enforcement of federalism-based limits is more controversial. Consider the implications of the claim that, although limits such as the first amendment are relatively clear, there are no equivalently clear provisions available for the courts to rely on in enforcing federalism-based limits on Congress's power.

3. Internal limits. What "internal" limits might be found in the commerce clause? Chief Justice Marshall considers three:

a. "Commerce." Is there a plausible theory under which the operation of a ferry, or navigation, is not commerce? Note that, when discussing state inspection laws, Chief Justice Marshall suggests that they act on the subject "before it becomes an article of" interstate commerce. Does this indicate a retreat from the broad definition earlier in the opinion? This phrase occurs when Chief Justice Marshall is considering whether the national power is exclusive. Does the difference in context explain or justify a difference in definition?

b. "Among the several States." Chief Justice Marshall says that the clause does not extend to "that commerce which is completely internal [and] which does not [affect] other States." Later he adds that Congress may lack power only if, in addition to these conditions being satisfied, it was "unnecessary" to regulate commerce. Note the conjunctive form of the statements. Was there such commerce in 1824? Can any commercial activity today satisfy all three requirements? Are the courts in a good position to determine whether congressional regulation of some (arguably or clearly) intrastate commerce is necessary? Whether that intrastate commerce affects other states? Why would giving power to Congress to regulate "completely internal" commerce be "inconvenient"?

c. "Regulate." How does Chief Justice Marshall define "regulation"? According to his definition, must a statute, in order to qualify as a "regulation," be directed at commercial goals?

Hammer v. Dagenhart (The Child Labor Case)

247 U.S. 251 (1918)

[In 1916, Congress responded to a decade-long lobbying effort by enacting the Child Labor Act. The act prohibited the transportation in interstate commerce of goods produced in factories employing children under age fourteen or employing fourteen- to sixteen-year-olds for more than eight hours a day, or six days a week, or at night. Two children, one under age fourteen and the other under age sixteen, were employed in a cotton mill in North Carolina. Their father secured an injunction against the enforcement of the act on grounds of its unconstitutionality.]

MR. JUSTICE DAY delivered the opinion of the Court....

[The] thing intended to be accomplished by this statute is the denial of the facilities of interstate commerce to those manufacturers in the States who employ children within the prohibited ages. The act in its effect does not regulate transportation among the States, but aims to standardize the ages at which children may be employed in mining and manufacturing within the States. The goods shipped are of themselves harmless. [When] offered for shipment, and before transportation begins, the labor of their production is over, and the mere fact that they were intended for interstate commerce transportation does not make their production subject to federal control under the commerce power....

It is further contended that the authority of Congress may be exerted to control interstate commerce in the shipment of child-made goods because of the effect of the circulation of such goods in other States where the evil of this class of labor has been recognized by local legislation, and the right to thus employ child labor has been more rigorously restrained than in the State of production. In other words, that the unfair competition, thus engendered, may be controlled by closing the channels of interstate commerce to manufacturers in those States where the local laws do not meet what Congress deems to be the more just standard of other States.

There is no power vested in Congress to require the States to exercise their police power so as to prevent possible unfair competition. Many causes may cooperate to give one State, by reason of local laws or conditions, an economic advantage over others. The Commerce Clause was not intended to give to Congress a general authority to equalize such conditions....

[To] sustain this statute would not be in our judgment a recognition of the lawful exertion of congressional authority over interstate commerce, but would sanction an invasion by the federal power of the control of a matter purely local in its character, and over which no authority has been delegated to Congress in conferring the power to regulate commerce among the States....

In our view the necessary effect of this act is, by means of a prohibition against the movement in interstate commerce of ordinary commercial commodities, to regulate the hours of labor of children in factories and mines within the States, a purely state authority. Thus the act in a twofold sense is repugnant to the Constitution. It not only transcends the authority delegated to Congress over commerce but also exerts a power as to a purely local matter to which the federal authority does not extend. The far reaching result of upholding the act cannot be more plainly indicated than by pointing out that if Congress can thus regulate matters entrusted to local authority by prohibition of the movement of commodities in interstate commerce, all freedom of commerce will be at an end, and the power of the States over local matters may be eliminated, and thus our system of government be practically destroyed.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES, dissenting....

[If] an act is within the powers specifically conferred upon Congress, it seems to me that it is not made any less constitutional because of the indirect effects that it may have, however obvious it may be that it will have those effects, and that we are not at liberty upon such grounds to hold it void....

[The] statute in question is within the power expressly given to Congress if considered only as to its immediate effects and [if] invalid it is so only upon some collateral ground. The statute confines itself to prohibiting the carriage of certain goods in interstate or foreign commerce. Congress is given power to regulate such commerce in unqualified terms....

[The] question then is narrowed to whether the exercise of its otherwise constitutional power by Congress can be pronounced unconstitutional because of its possible reaction upon the conduct of the States in a matter upon which I have admitted that they are free from direct control....

[The] manufacture of oleomargarine is as much a matter of state regulation as the manufacture of cotton cloth. Congress levied a tax upon the compound when colored so as to resemble butter that was so great as obviously to prohibit the manufacture and sale. In a very elaborate discussion the present Chief Justice excluded any inquiry into the purpose of an act which apart from that purpose was within the power of Congress. McCray v. United States, 195 U.S. 27....

The notion that prohibition is any less prohibition when applied to things now thought evil I do not understand. But if there is any matter upon which civilized countries have agreed, [it] is the evil of premature and excessive child labor. I should have thought that if we were to introduce our own moral conceptions where in my opinion they do not belong, this was preeminently a case for upholding the exercise of all its powers by the United States....

The act does not meddle with anything belonging to the States. They may regulate their internal affairs and their domestic commerce as they like. But when they seek to send their products across the state line they are no longer within their rights. [The] national welfare as understood by Congress may require a different attitude within its sphere from that of some self-seeking State. It seems to me entirely constitutional for Congress to enforce its understanding by all the means at its command.

MR. JUSTICE MCKENNA, MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS, and MR. JUSTICE CLARKE

concur in this opinion.

Wickard v. Filburn

317 U.S. 111 (1942)

[Under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the Secretary of Agriculture set a quota for wheat production, after finding that the total supply of wheat would substantially exceed a normal year's domestic consumption and export needs. The 1941 quota was approved in a referendum of wheat growers, required by the act, by 81 to 19 percent. Under the quota, each wheat grower was given an allotment. Filburn had a dairy farm in Montgomery County, Ohio, on which he also raised small amounts of wheat for his livestock, for making flour at home, for seed purposes, and for sale. His 1941 allotment was 222 bushels, but he harvested 461 bushels. Under the act, he was penalized $117. Filburn sued the Secretary of Agriculture to enjoin enforcement of the penalty. The lower court issued the injunction.]

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON delivered the opinion of the Court....

It is urged that under the Commerce Clause, [Congress] does not possess the power it has in this instance sought to exercise. The question would merit little consideration [except] for that fact that this Act extends federal regulation to production not intended in any part for commerce but wholly for consumption on the farm. [Marketing] quotas not only embrace all that may be sold without penalty but also what may be consumed on the premises....

Appellee says that this is a regulation of production and consumption of wheat. Such activities are, he urges, [local] in character, and their effects upon interstate commerce are at most "indirect." ...

[Questions] of the power of Congress are not to be decided by reference to any formula which would give controlling force to nomenclature such as "production" and "indirect" and foreclose consideration of the actual effects of the activity in question upon interstate commerce.

At the beginning Chief Justice Marshall described the federal commerce power with a breadth never yet exceeded. [Gibbons v. Ogden.] He made emphatic the embracing and penetrating nature of this power by warning that effective restraints on its exercise must proceed from political rather than from judicial processes....

The Court's recognition of the relevance of the economic effects in the application of the Commerce Clause [has] made the mechanical application of legal formulas no longer feasible. Once an economic measure of the reach of the power granted to Congress in the Commerce Clause is accepted, questions of federal power cannot be decided simply by finding the activity in question to be "production," nor can consideration of its economic effects be foreclosed by calling them "indirect."...

Whether the subject of the regulation in question was "production," "consumption," or "marketing" is, therefore, not material for purposes of deciding the question of federal power before us. [But] even if appellee's activity be local and though it may not be regarded as commerce, it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce, and this irrespective of whether such effect is what might at some earlier time have been defined as "direct" or "indirect." The parties have stipulated a summary of the economics of the wheat industry....

The wheat industry has been a problem industry for some years. Largely as a result of increased foreign production and import restrictions, annual exports of wheat and flour from the United States during the ten-year period ending in 1940 averaged less than 10 per cent of total production, while during the 1920's they averaged more than 25 per cent. The decline in the export trade has left a large surplus in production which, in connection with an abnormally large supply of wheat, [caused] congestion in a number of markets; tied up railroad cars; and caused elevators in some instances to turn away grains, and railroads to institute embargoes to prevent further congestion....

The effect of consumption of home-grown wheat on interstate commerce is due to the fact that it constitutes the most variable factor in the disappearance of the wheat crop. Consumption on the farm where grown appears to vary in an amount greater than 20 per cent of average production. The total amount of wheat consumed as food varies but relatively little, and use as seed is relatively constant.

The maintenance by government regulation of a price for wheat undoubtedly can be accomplished as effectively by sustaining or increasing the demand as by limiting the supply. The effect of the statute before us is to restrict the amount which may be produced for market and the extent as well to which one may forestall resort to the market by producing to meet his own needs. That appellee's own contribution to the demand for wheat may be trivial by itself is not enough to remove him from the scope of federal regulation where, as here, his contribution, taken together with that of many others similarly situated, is far from trivial.

[A] factor of such volume and variability as home-consumed wheat would have a substantial influence on price and market conditions. This may arise because being in marketable condition such wheat overhangs the market and, if induced by rising prices, tends to flow into the market and check price increases. But if we assume that it is never marketed, it supplies a need of the man who grew it which would otherwise be reflected by purchases in the open market. Home-grown wheat in this sense competes with wheat in commerce. The stimulation of commerce is a use of the regulatory function quite as definitely as prohibitions or restrictions thereon. This record leaves us in no doubt that Congress may properly have considered that wheat consumed on the farm where grown, if wholly outside the scheme of regulation, would have a substantial effect in defeating and obstructing its purpose to stimulate trade therein at increased prices....

[Reversed.]

Note: Political Constraints versus Judicial Enforcement

The Constitution's enumeration of congressional powers, including the power to regulate commerce among the states, allocates power between the nation and the states. Is that allocation to be enforced by the courts or through political checks on Congress? Note that both the courts and the political process are imperfect. Courts may invalidate laws that are consistent with the proper allocation, and Congress may enact laws inconsistent with the proper allocation despite the political constraints. Note also that the courts have the opportunity to review only laws Congress has enacted.

1. Madison's argument. In The Federalist No. 45 and No. 46, Madison suggests that members of Congress will be so imbued with respect for local governments that they will rarely exercise even broad grants of power improvidently. From The Federalist No. 45:

The State governments will have the advantage of the federal government, whether we compare them in respect to the immediate dependence of the one on the other; to the weight of personal influence which each side will possess; to the powers respectively vested in them; to the predilection and probable support of the people; to the disposition and faculty of resisting and frustrating the measures of each other.

The State governments may be regarded as constituent and essential parts of the federal government; whilst the latter is nowise essential to the operation or organization of the former. Without the intervention of the State legislatures, the President of the United States cannot be elected at all. They must in all cases have a great share in his appointment. [The] Senate will be elected absolutely and exclusively by the State legislatures. Even the House of Representatives, though drawn immediately from the people, will be chosen very much under the influence of that class of men whose influence over the people obtains for themselves an election into the State legislatures. Thus, each of the principal branches of the federal government will owe its existence more or less to the favor of the State governments, and must consequently feel a dependence, which is much more likely to beget a disposition too obsequious than too overbearing towards them. On the other side, the component parts of the State governments will in no instance be indebted for their appointment to the direct agency of the federal government, and very little, if at all, to the local influence of its members.

The number of individuals employed under the Constitution of the United States will be much smaller than the number employed under the particular States. There will consequently be less of personal influence on the side of the former than of the latter....

The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the federal government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce; with which last the power of taxation will, for the most part, be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State.

The operations of the federal government will be most extensive and important in times of war and danger; those of the State governments in times of peace and security. As the former periods will probably bear a small proportion to the latter, the State governments will here enjoy another advantage over the federal government. The more adequate, indeed, the federal powers may be rendered to the national defense, the less frequent will be those scenes of danger which might favor their ascendancy over the governments of the particular States....

From The Federalist No. 46:

Many considerations [seem] to place it beyond doubt that the first and most natural attachment of the people will be to the governments of their respective States. Into the administration of these a greater number of individuals will expect to rise. From the gift of these a greater number of offices and emoluments will flow. By the superintending care of these, all the more domestic and personal interests of the people will be regulated and provided for. With the affairs of these, the people will be more familiarly and minutely conversant. And with the members of these will a greater proportion of the people have the ties of personal acquaintance and friendship, and of family and party attachments; on the side of these, therefore, the popular bias may well be expected most strongly to incline....

[The] prepossessions, which the members themselves will carry into the federal government, will generally be favorable to the States; whilst it will rarely happen that the members of the State governments will carry into the public councils a bias in favor of the general government. A local spirit will infallibly prevail much more in the members of Congress than a national spirit will prevail in the legislatures of the particular States. Everyone knows that a great proportion of the errors committed by the State legislatures proceeds from the disposition of the members to sacrifice the comprehensive and permanent interest of the State to the particular and separate views of the counties or districts in which they reside. And if they do not sufficiently enlarge their policy to embrace the collective welfare of their particular State, how can it be imagined that they will make the aggregate prosperity of the Union, and the dignity and respectability of its government, the objects of their affections and consultations? [Measures] will too often be decided according to their probable effect, not on the national prosperity and happiness, but on the prejudices, interests, and pursuits of the governments and people of the individual States. [The] new federal government [will] partake sufficiently of the spirit of both to be disinclined to invade the rights of the individual States, or the prerogatives of their governments. The motives on the part of the State governments to augment their prerogatives by defalcations from the federal government will be overruled by no reciprocal predispositions in the members.

Were it admitted, however, that the federal government may feel an equal disposition with the State governments to extend its power beyond the due limits, the latter would still have the advantage in the means of defeating such encroachments. If an act of a particular State, though unfriendly to the national government, be generally popular in that State, and should not too grossly violate the oaths of the State officers, it is executed [immediately]. The opposition of the federal government, or the interposition of federal officers, would but inflame the zeal of all parties on the side of the State, and the evil could not be prevented or repaired, if at all, without the employment of means which must always be resorted to with reluctance and difficulty. On the other hand, should an unwarrantable measure of the federal government be unpopular in particular States, which would seldom fail to be the case, or even a warrantable measure be so, which may sometimes be the case, the means of opposition to it are powerful and at hand. The disquietude of the people; their repugnance and, perhaps, refusal to co-operate with the officers of the Union; the frowns of the executive magistracy of the State; the embarrassments created by legislative devices, which would often be added on such occasions, would oppose, in any State, difficulties not to be despised; would form, in a large State, very serious impediments; and where the sentiments of several adjoining States happened to be in unison, would present obstructions which the federal government would hardly be willing to encounter.

But ambitious encroachments of the federal government on the authority of the State governments would not excite the opposition of a single State, or of a few States only. They would be signals of general alarm. Every government would espouse the common cause. A correspondence would be opened. Plans of resistance would be concerted. One spirit would animate and conduct the whole.

Do Madison's reasons seem persuasive under modern conditions?

2. Wechsler's argument. Herbert Wechsler updated Madison's argument in The Political Safeguards of Federalism, in H. Wechsler, Principles, Politics, and Fundamental Law 49–82 (1961; first published in 1954). To Wechsler, "Madison's analysis has never lost its thrust," despite "the rise of national parties [and] the shift to popular election of the Senate." Wechsler began by noting that "national action has [always] been regarded as exceptional in our polity. [Those] who would advocate [the] exercise [of national power] must [answer] the preliminary question why the matter should not be left to the states." Wechsler augmented Madison's argument by invoking more modern political devices that led the Senate "to function as the guardian of state interests as such," including seniority and the filibuster. As to the House, he relied on "the states' control of voters' qualifications [and] of districting." Even though the President must "balance the localism and the separatism of the Congress by presenting programs that reflect the needs of the entire nation," that office is influenced by localism as well. The allocation of votes in the electoral college affects the allocation of time in presidential campaigns; party rules allocate convention votes based on some localist considerations. To build a winning coalition, a presidential candidate must appeal to groups that "approach balance-of-power status in important states"; some of these groups may promote "local values." For Wechsler, the size of the present national government is attributable "mainly to the magnitude of unavoidable responsibility under the circumstances of our time." Wechsler drew the following conclusion:

[Judicial review was intended to maintain] national supremacy against nullification or usurpation by the individual states. [The] Court is on weakest ground when it opposes its interpretation of the Constitution to that of Congress in the interest of the states, whose representatives control the legislative process and, by hypothesis, have broadly acquiesced in sanctioning the challenged Act of Congress. Federal intervention as against the states is thus primarily a matter for congressional determination in our system as it now stands.

See also J. Choper, Judicial Review and the National Political Process 171–259 (1980).

3. The New Nationalism/Federalism. For a collection of essays on federalism and nationalism, see Feature, Federalism as the New Nationalism, 123 Yale L.J. 1888 (2014). The essays draw upon an account of the way in which state and local governments actually interact with the national government. Evoking older notions of states as laboratories of experimentation, the authors note that many issues are initially crystallized into policies at the local and state levels, generating support for their expansion elsewhere, including at the national level. In addition, many national programs are—by national choice—administered by state and local officials. This gives them the opportunity both to communicate with executive and legislative officials on the national level about how the program works, and to implement the programs—within parameters set, sometimes loosely, by national legislation—in locally distinctive ways. (The latter possibility is enhanced by the inclusion of provisions authorizing national officials to waive some requirements of the national statute.) These opportunities, in turn, can contribute to reshaping the national statute in practice and by prompting formal amendments. NFIB v. Sebelius, below, places some limits on the extent to which the national government can require that states participate in national programs, which in turn gives state officials bargaining leverage in shaping the national programs. In addition, political parties dominant at the national level might not be dominant in all states, which creates loci of potential resistance to national policies.

These arguments differ from Wechsler's by relying not on the Constitution's structural features but on an analysis of contemporary political realities.

To what extent should understandings of the Constitution or constitutional doctrine be shaped by such an analysis? For a discussion, see Pildes, Romanticizing Democracy, Political Fragmentation, and the Decline of American Government, 124 Yale L.J. 804 (2014). Note that (a) those political realities change from time to time, (b) accurately describing them can be controversial, and (c) the normative implications of even agreed upon descriptions may be controversial. Consider the possibility that such realities might be relevant to understanding the Constitution but not to the development of constitutional doctrine.

4. Some views from the justices. In Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528 (1985), writing for a majority upholding the constitutionality of the application of federal wage and hour laws to state and local employees, Justice Blackmun wrote:

[The] principal means chosen by the Framers to ensure the role of the States in the federal system lies in the structure of the Federal Government itself. It is no novelty to observe that the composition of the Federal Government was designed in large part to protect the States from overreaching by Congress.¹¹ ...

The extent to which the structure of the Federal Government itself was relied on to insulate the interests of the States is evident in the views of the Framers. [Citing The Federalist No. 46.] [The] Framers chose to rely on a federal system in which special restraints on federal power over the States inhered principally in the workings of the National Government itself, rather than in discrete limitations on the objects of federal authority. State sovereign interests [are] more properly protected by procedural safeguards inherent in the structure of the federal system than by judicially created limitations on federal power.

The effectiveness of the federal political process in preserving the States' interests is apparent even today in the course of federal legislation....

[At] the same time that the States have exercised their influence to obtain federal support, they have been able to exempt themselves from a wide variety of obligations imposed by Congress under the Commerce Clause. For example, [the] National Labor Relations Act, [the] Occupational Safety and Health Act, the Employee Retirement Insurance Security Act, and the Sherman Act all contain express or implied exemptions for States and their subdivisions. The fact that some federal statutes such as the FLSA [Fair Labor Standards Act] extend general obligations to the States cannot obscure the extent to which the political position of the States in the federal system has served to minimize the burdens that the States bear under the Commerce Clause.

We realize that changes in the structure of the Federal Government have taken place since 1789, not the least of which has been the substitution of popular election of Senators by the adoption of the Seventeenth Amendment in 1913, and that these changes may work to alter the influence of the States in the federal political process. Nonetheless, against this background, we are convinced that the fundamental limitation that the constitutional scheme imposes on the Commerce Clause to protect the “States as States” is one of process rather than one of result.

Justice Powell responded:

Members of Congress are elected from the various States, but once in office they are members of the federal government.⁸ Although the States participate in the Electoral College, this is hardly a reason to view the President as a representative of the States’ interest against federal encroachment. We noted recently “the hydraulic pressure inherent within each of the separate Branches to exceed the outer limits of its power....” Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 951 (1983). The Court offers no reason to think that this pressure will not operate when Congress seeks to invoke its powers under the Commerce Clause, notwithstanding the electoral role of the States.⁹ The Court apparently thinks that the States’ success at obtaining federal funds for various projects and exemptions from the obligations of some federal statutes is indicative of the “effectiveness of the federal political process in preserving the States’ interests.” But such political success is not relevant to the question whether the political processes are the proper means of enforcing constitutional limitations.¹¹ The fact that Congress generally does not transgress constitutional limits on its power to reach State activities does not make judicial review any less necessary to rectify the cases in which it does do so.¹² The States’ role in our system of government is a matter of constitutional law, not of legislative grace....

More troubling than the logical infirmities in the Court’s reasoning is the result of its holding, i.e., that federal political officials, invoking the Commerce Clause, are the sole judges of the limits of their own power. This result is inconsistent with the fundamental principles of our constitutional system. At least since Marbury v. Madison it has been the settled province of the federal judiciary “to say what the law is” with respect to the constitutionality of acts of Congress. In rejecting the role of the judiciary in protecting the States from federal overreaching, the Court’s opinion offers no explanation for ignoring the teaching of the most famous case in our history.¹³

Note that Justice Blackmun asserted that the political process had in fact protected state interests to a satisfactory degree. The state in Garcia contended that, whatever might be true about congressional protection of state interests in other contexts, here the congressional process had failed to do so. What response, if any, could Justice Blackmun offer to that argument? To Justice

Powell's reliance on Marbury? To Justice Powell's note about individual rights?

Consider this suggestion, from Regan, How to Think about the Federal Commerce Power and Incidentally Rewrite United States v. Lopez, 94 Mich. L. Rev. 554, 557, 560–561 (1995):

[In] thinking about whether the federal government has the power to do something or other, we should ask what special reason there is for the federal government to have that power. What reason is there to think the states are incapable or untrustworthy? [Is there] any reason why the regulation under consideration should come from the federal government[?]

Should this be supplemented by another question: “What reason is there to think that the courts are better able than Congress to determine whether the states are incapable or untrustworthy?”

5. The seventeenth amendment and other constitutional changes. The seventeenth amendment replaced election of senators by state legislators with direct election. Justice Souter, dissenting in United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000), argued that the seventeenth amendment, along with the Reconstruction amendments, fundamentally altered the assumptions about the division of power between states and nation. Consider the following argument: In 1789 the framers believed (a) that they were creating a government of limited powers and (b) that the grant of power to Congress to regulate commerce among the several states did not give Congress the power to regulate everything. These two beliefs were compatible in 1789. Belief (b) is no longer accurate, given transformations in the economy, but it is important to maintain the compatibility between the contemporary facts and the overall Constitution. The seventeenth amendment demonstrates that the underlying theory of the Constitution has changed in a way that makes it possible to reject belief (a) and make the Constitution compatible with contemporary reality. How does this argument differ from the “political safeguards” one?

6. The significance of unfunded mandates. The Unfunded Mandates Reform Act of 1995, 2 U.S.C. §1501ff (1995), establishes a procedure for consideration of bills that would impose unfunded mandates on state and local governments. Such mandates prescribe rules, compliance with which is costly, but do not authorize the expenditure of federal funds to offset those costs. The act applies to mandates of $50 million or more; it exempts mandates that enforce constitutional rights or antidiscrimination statutory rights. It structures the internal procedures of the House and Senate, with the effect that each House must take a separate and recorded vote on whether to impose an unfunded

7. A procedural perspective. Justice Breyer, dissenting in United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000), found it significant, and perhaps dispositive of a constitutional challenge, that Congress “followed procedures that help to protect the federalism values at stake. It provided adequate notice to the States of its intent to legislate. [In] response, attorneys general in [thirty-eight] States supported congressional legislation.” Further, Congress compiled “a ‘mountain of data’” supporting its legislation. The resulting statutes “focused [upon] documented deficiencies in state legal systems,” and Congress “tailored the law to prevent its use in certain areas. [The] law [seems] to represent an instance, not of state/federal conflict, but of state/federal efforts to [cooperate].” The majority responded that Congress’s data and findings were irrelevant because they were predicated on a theory of the commerce clause that the Court rejected. Is there a relation between Justice Breyer’s procedural emphasis and the idea of political enforcement?

8. Some objections. Does the Madisonian argument, as updated to take account of present political practices, meet the objection that modern conditions have altered the political forces on which the argument relies? Consider the impact of increasing mobility among the population (and among people with political ambitions). Note that, in the past, service in state and local government may have been the best method to gain exposure to congressional-district and statewide constituencies, and consider the extent to which candidates may today gain similar exposure by other methods. Is the party system so strong as to overcome localist biases? The power of special interest groups? The power of single-issue lobbies? What is the impact of decisions requiring that states district strictly according to population? Consider the objection that judicial review may sometimes eliminate legislation enacted by Congress that serves the interest of several regions at the expense of the interests of another region, and in this connection consider the implications of the Civil War and its outcome.

9. The Constitution as structure. Arguments like Madison’s rely on the incentives political actors have as the primary guarantee that legislation will respect constitutional norms. Proponents of term limits believe that altering the incentives legislators have will affect outcomes. The twenty-seventh amendment has a similar purpose. Consider (a) whether designing appropriate incentives for legislators is a more effective guarantee that the Constitution’s norms will be respected than is judicial review, and (b) the extent to which the Constitution relies on such incentives.

C. THE EVOLUTION OF COMMERCE CLAUSE DOCTRINE: THE

LESSONS(?) OF HISTORY

Until the late nineteenth century, Congress rarely exercised its power to regulate interstate commerce. It acted to promote economic growth by establishing, for part of the era, the Bank of the United States; by transferring public lands to private owners; and by securing the nation's borders and its trade against foreign attack. The slavery controversy limited the opportunities for a consensus to form in favor of extensive exercise of the commerce power.

The Civil War and its aftermath inaugurated an era in which Congress began to act more vigorously. The economy became obviously interconnected; problems were no longer localized, so it became difficult to imagine a purely internal commerce that affected no other states. During the Reconstruction era, supporters of the Union saw that the rights of freed slaves and their friends in the South were not adequately protected by state governments. They concluded that national intervention was appropriate and developed theories of federalism that justified broad exercises of national power. Finally, the mobilization of the northern economy to fight the Civil War showed that national power could be used efficiently, rather than wastefully, and the experience of the Civil War demonstrated that national power could indeed be used to promote liberty.

These factors combined to make Congress more willing to exercise its power to regulate interstate commerce. The Interstate Commerce Act of 1887 and the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890 illustrate the commencement of the new era. Congress's earlier interventions in the economy, such as its disposal of public lands, had not created constituencies that strongly objected to the interventions. But the new regulatory mode of action automatically generated such constituencies in the groups newly burdened by regulation. When these groups objected to national legislation on the ground that only the states could regulate their activities, they could provide relatively concrete examples of how in their view the national legislation threatened liberty and impaired the incentives needed to promote economic growth.

This section opens by examining a number of doctrinal devices that the Supreme Court developed to deal with federalism-based objections to national legislation, and then turns to the abandonment and revival of such doctrines. The legislation subject to review takes two forms. Sometimes Congress imposes regulation on the industry, and sometimes it prohibits the shipment across state lines of goods that failed to meet specified conditions. Do the doctrinal tests differ depending on the form of the legislation? Should they?

Note also that congressional legislation only sometimes was designed to promote commercial goals directly. (Did those goals always include the promotion of the free flow of goods?) At other times, Congress acted to promote social goals, which were viewed as valuable wholly apart from their relation to economic development. Are such uses of the power to regulate interstate commerce appropriate? Are they constitutional? Did the doctrinal tests differ depending on the goal of the legislation? Should they? Is it possible to sustain the distinction between commercial and social goals?

The cases invoked two general approaches. Under the formal approach, the Court examined the statute and the regulated activity to determine whether certain objective criteria are satisfied. For example, upholding regulation triggered by the fact that goods cross state lines is a formal approach that ignores actual economic effects and actual legislative motivation. In contrast, the realist approach attempted to determine the actual economic impact of the regulation or the actual motivation of Congress. Both formalism and realism were used to invalidate legislation and to uphold it. Can you discern any pattern to the results? Do the availability and use of competing approaches to yield varying results illuminate the question of whether courts should enforce limits on Congress's power in the name of federalism?

UNITED STATES v. E. C. KNIGHT CO., 156 U.S. 1 (1895). The United States invoked the Sherman Act to set aside the acquisition by the American Sugar Refining Company of four competing refineries. The acquisition left only one independent refinery in operation, which produced 2 percent of the sugar refined in the country. The Supreme Court, through Chief Justice Fuller, held that the Sherman Act did not reach this monopoly because the Constitution did not allow Congress to regulate "manufacturing." The government argued "that the power to control the manufacture of refined sugar is a monopoly over a necessary of life, to the enjoyment of which by a large part of the population of the United States interstate commerce is indispensable, and that, therefore, the general government may repress such monopoly directly and set aside the instruments which have created it." Chief Justice Fuller responded, "[This] argument cannot be confined to necessities of life merely, and must include all articles of general consumption. Doubtless the power to control the manufacture of a given thing involves in a certain sense the control of its disposition, but this is a secondary and not the primary sense; and although the exercise of that power may result in bringing the operation of commerce into play, it does not control it, and affects it only incidentally and indirectly. Commerce succeeds to manufacture, and is not a part of it. [The] fact that an article is manufactured for export to another State does not of itself make it an article of interstate commerce, and the intent of the manufacturer does not determine the time when the article or product passes from the control of the State and belongs to commerce.”

Justice Harlan dissented. Agreeing that it was important to preserve “the just authority of the States,” he insisted that it was equally important to preserve national authority, whose “destruction [would] be fatal to the peace and well-being of the American people.” To him, a monopoly that “obstructs freedom in buying and selling articles” to be sold out of state “affects, not incidentally, but directly, the people of all the States. [When] manufacture ends, that which has been manufactured becomes a subject of commerce; [buying] and selling succeed manufacture, come into existence after the process of manufacture is completed, precede transportation, and are as much commercial intercourse, where articles are bought to be carried from one State to another, as is the manual transportation of such articles after they have been so purchased. [Whatever] improperly obstructs the free course of interstate intercourse and trade, as involved in the buying and selling of articles to be carried from one State to another, may be reached by Congress....

“[In] my judgment, the general government is not placed by the Constitution in such a condition of helplessness that it must fold its arms and remain inactive while capital combines, under the name of a corporation, to destroy competition, not in one State only, but throughout the entire country, in the buying and selling of articles—especially the necessities of life—that go into commerce among the States. The doctrine of the autonomy of the States cannot properly be invoked to justify a denial of power in the national government to meet such an emergency.

“[To] the general government has been committed the control of commercial intercourse among the States, to the end that it may be free at all times from any restraints except such as Congress may impose or permit for the benefit of the whole country. The common government of all the people is the only one that can adequately deal with a matter which directly and injuriously affects the entire commerce of the country, which concerns equally all the people of the Union, and which, it must be confessed, cannot be adequately controlled by any one State. Its authority should not be so weakened by construction that it cannot reach and eradicate evils that, beyond all question, tend to defeat an object which that government is entitled, by the Constitution, to accomplish.”

HOUSTON, EAST & WEST TEXAS RAILWAY v. UNITED STATES (The Shreveport Rate Cases), 234 U.S. 342 (1914). The railway operated lines between Texas and Louisiana. Shipments from Dallas to Marshall, Texas, a distance of 150 miles, cost 37 cents; shipments from Shreveport, Louisiana, to Marshall (42 miles), cost 56 cents. The Interstate Commerce Commission set a maximum rate for shipments from Shreveport to Texas and ordered the railway to charge no higher rates per mile for shipments to Marshall from Shreveport or Dallas in order to eliminate the “discrimination” against Shreveport. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Hughes, held that the commission could set rates for the intrastate Dallas-to-Marshall route.

Congress’s “authority, extending to these interstate carriers as instruments of interstate commerce, necessarily embraces the right to control their operations in all matters having such a close and substantial relation to interstate traffic that the control is essential or appropriate to the security of that traffic, to the efficiency of the interstate service, and to the maintenance of conditions under which interstate commerce may be conducted upon fair terms and without molestation or hindrance. [Wherever] the interstate and intrastate transactions of carriers are so related that the government of the one involves the control of the other, it is Congress, and not the State, that is entitled to prescribe the final and dominant rule, for otherwise Congress would be denied the exercise of its constitutional authority and the State, and not the Nation, would be supreme within the national field....

“Congress in the exercise of its paramount power may prevent the common instrumentalities of interstate and intrastate commercial intercourse from being used in their intrastate operations to the injury of interstate commerce. This is not to say that Congress possesses the authority to regulate the internal commerce of a State, as such, but that it does possess the power to foster and protect interstate commerce, and to take all measures necessary or appropriate to that end, although intrastate transactions of interstate carriers may thereby be controlled.”

Justices Lurton and Pitney dissented.

Note: Direct, Indirect, and Stream of Commerce Tests

1. Intent and Congress’s power. Suppose the government proved that American Sugar intended by its near-monopoly to restrict interstate commerce and not merely production. On Chief Justice Fuller’s analysis, would Congress then have power to regulate? Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 268 U.S. 295 (1925), applied the Sherman Act to a strike against mine operators. Carter v. Carter Coal Co., infra, distinguished Coronado from E. C. Knight: “The acts of the persons involved were local in character, but the intent was to restrain interstate commerce, and the means employed were calculated to carry that intent into effect. Interstate commerce was the direct object of attack; and the restraint of such commerce was the necessary consequence of the acts and the immediate end in view.” Reducing the supply of a good is “ordinarily an indirect and remote obstruction” of interstate commerce, but “when the intent [is] to restrain or control the supply” in interstate commerce, the Sherman Act is violated.

2. The formalist approach. Chief Justice Fuller appears to have some temporal sequence in mind as the basis for his exclusion of categories of activities from the scope of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce: Certain activities, which are not commerce, precede it (manufacturing), and presumably other activities, which are also not commerce, succeed it (retail sales?). Does Chief Justice Fuller explain why the relevant temporal line is drawn to exclude manufacturing, rather than at an earlier point, such as acquisition of raw materials?

3. National power where states cannot effectively act. The monopolist in E. C. Knight conceded that New Jersey could prohibit locally chartered corporations from acquiring monopolies. Note that, so long as a single state is willing to allow its corporations to acquire monopolies—for example, in exchange for an annual tax that is less than the monopolistic profits—the practical consequence of American Sugar’s position is to make it impossible to have effective antimonopoly legislation for manufacturing. Does the inability of any single state or group of states to control manufacturing monopolies justify finding power in Congress to do so?

4. “Stream of commerce.” Stafford v. Wallace, 258 U.S. 495 (1922), involved the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921, which authorized the Secretary of Commerce to regulate rates and prescribe standards for the operation of stockyards where livestock was kept for sale or shipment in interstate commerce. Chief Justice Taft’s opinion for the Court upholding the act said that the “only question [is] whether the business done in the stockyards between the receipt of the live stock in the yards and the shipment of them therefrom is a part of interstate commerce. [The] stockyards are but a throat through which the current flows, and the transactions which occur therein are only incident to this current from the West to the East, and from one State to another. Such transactions can not be separated from the movement to which they contribute and necessarily take on its character.” Is the metaphor of a “current” or “stream of commerce” helpful? How do you know when a stream begins and ends? Why doesn’t Stafford involve two streams of commerce, one ending with the arrival of the cattle at the stockyards and the other beginning with their departure?

5. Consistent precedents? As Congress began to regulate the national economy more extensively, the Supreme Court generally focused on practical reality and found that Congress had exercised its power in accordance with the Constitution. In addition to the principal cases, see Southern Railway v. United States, 222 U.S. 20 (1911) (upholding Federal Safety Appliance Act as applied to railroad cars with defective couplers because, although the cars were used in intrastate traffic, the act applied to cars “used on any railroad engaged in interstate commerce”). Even E. C. Knight had limited effects. Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U.S. 375 (1905), sustained the application of the Sherman Act to meat dealers, invoking the “current of commerce” metaphor and calling interstate commerce “not a technical legal conception, but a practical one.” Cushman, Formalism and Realism in Commerce Clause Jurisprudence, 67 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1089 (2000), argues that the Court during this period applied the tests available to it in a principled way. According to Cushman, the Supreme Court confined state regulatory power to businesses affected with a public interest. With respect to the “stream of commerce” test, only those “local” enterprises “affected with a public interest” could be located in a stream of interstate commerce, and with respect to Shreveport, that case “recognized federal power to regulate the intrastate rates charged by an interstate business affected with a public interest. So long as the power of Congress to regulate interstate rates remained confined to businesses affected with a public interest, its derivative power to regulate intrastate rates would remain similarly confined.” Id. at 1129, 1131.

In Champion v. Ames, presented next, a version of formalism leads to upholding a statute, whereas in Hammer v. Dagenhart, supra, a version of realism led to invalidating a statute. Are these versions sufficiently similar to the ones you have already examined to justify treating “formalism” and “realism” as unifying themes?

CHAMPION v. AMES (The Lottery Case), 188 U.S. 321 (1903). The Federal Lottery Act of 1895 prohibited the interstate transportation of foreign lottery tickets. Champion was indicted for shipping a box of Paraguayan lottery tickets from Texas to California. In an opinion by Justice Harlan, the Supreme Court rejected his challenge to the constitutionality of the act. Justice Harlan’s opinion stated, “[Undoubtedly,] the carrying from one State to another by independent carriers of things or commodities that are ordinary subjects of traffic, and which have in themselves a recognized value in money, constitutes interstate commerce.” Harlan continued, “[It] is said that the statute in question does not regulate the carrying of lottery tickets from State to State, but by punishing those who cause them to be so carried Congress in effect prohibits such carrying. [If] lottery traffic, carried on through interstate commerce, is a matter of which Congress may take cognizance and over which its power may be exerted, [may] not Congress, for the protection of the people of all the States, [devise] such means, within the scope of the Constitution, and not prohibited by it, as will drive that traffic out of commerce among the States?...

“[It] must not be forgotten that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States is plenary, is complete in itself, and is subject to no limitations except such as may be found in the Constitution. [What] clause can be cited which, in any degree, countenances the suggestion that one may, of right, carry or cause to be carried from one State to another that which will harm the public morals? [Surely] it will not be said to be a part of any one’s liberty, as recognized by the supreme law of the land, that he shall be allowed to introduce into commerce among the States an element that will be confessedly injurious to the public morals.” According to Justice Harlan, “Congress [does] not assume to interfere with traffic or commerce in lottery tickets carried on exclusively within the limits of any State, but has in view only commerce of that kind among the several States. It has not assumed to interfere with the completely internal affairs of any State, and has only legislated in respect of a matter which concerns the people of the United States. As a State may, for the purpose of guarding the morals of its own people, forbid all sales of lottery tickets within its limits, so Congress, for the purpose of guarding the people of the United States against the ‘widespread pestilence of lotteries’ and to protect the commerce which concerns all the States, may prohibit the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another. In legislating upon the subject of the traffic in lottery tickets, as carried on through interstate commerce, Congress only supplemented the action of those States—perhaps all of them—which, for the protection of the public morals, prohibit the drawing of lotteries, as well as the sale or circulation of lottery tickets, within their respective limits. It said, in effect, that it would not permit the declared policy of the States, which sought to protect their people against the mischiefs of the lottery business, to be overthrown or disregarded by the agency of interstate commerce.”

The opinion concluded, “It is said, however, that if, in order to suppress lotteries carried on through interstate commerce, Congress may exclude lottery tickets from such commerce, that principle leads necessarily to the conclusion that Congress may arbitrarily exclude from commerce among the States any article, commodity or thing, of whatever kind or nature, or however useful or valuable, which it may choose, no matter with what motive, to declare shall not be carried from one State to another. [The] present case does not require the court to declare the full extent of the power that Congress may exercise in the regulation of commerce among the States. We may, however, repeat, in this connection, what the court has heretofore said, that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, although plenary, cannot be deemed arbitrary, since it is subject to such limitations or restrictions as are prescribed by the Constitution. This power, therefore, may not be exercised so as to infringe rights secured or protected by that instrument. It would not be difficult to imagine legislation that would be justly liable to such an objection as that stated, and be hostile to the objects for the accomplishment of which Congress was invested with the general power to regulate commerce among the several States. But, as often said, the possible abuse of a power is not an argument against its existence. There is probably no governmental power that may not be exerted to the injury of the public. If what is done by Congress is manifestly in excess of the powers granted to it, then upon the courts will rest the duty of adjudging that its action is neither legal nor binding upon the people. But if what Congress does is within the limits of its power, and is simply unwise or injurious, the remedy is that suggested by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden [quoting the ‘wisdom and discretion’ passage].”

Chief Justice Fuller, joined by Justices Brewer, Shiras, and Peckham, dissented, arguing that the Court’s analysis gave Congress a “general police power” because it amounted to saying “that everything is an article of commerce the moment it is taken to be transported from place to place, and of interstate commerce if from State to State.

“An invitation to dine, or to take a drive, or a note of introduction, all become articles of commerce under the ruling in this case, by being deposited with an express company for transportation. This in effect breaks down all the differences between that which is, and that which is not, an article of commerce, and the necessary consequence is to take from the States all jurisdiction over the subject so far as interstate communication is concerned. It is a long step in the direction of wiping out all traces of state lines, and the creation of a centralized Government.”

Note: Prohibiting Interstate Transportation—Proper Regulation or Improper Pretext?

1. Enforcement of limits again. Does Justice Harlan define any judicially enforceable limits on Congress’s power to regulate by means of prohibiting interstate shipment? Note the concluding citation to Gibbons v. Ogden. What reasons does he suggest for Congress’s action? Can its reason for prohibiting the shipment of lottery tickets be distinguished from the usual reasons for exercising a general police power?

2. Regulation or pretext? Under the majority's holding, is there anything left to the "pretext" limitation stated by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch? Should it make a difference that Champion involves a regulation whose apparent purpose is not obviously "commercial"? Is there a "commercial" argument for the statute in Champion?

If the statute's purpose were to promote moral or social goals, would the use of the commerce power be a pretext of the sort Chief Justice Marshall disapproved in McCulloch? Consider that applying a "pretext" test requires a definition of the proper purposes for which a power may be exercised. Did Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons say or assume that the commerce power was limited to commercial purposes? If it is not limited to commercial purposes, how might a "pretext" test be applied?

3. Concluding remarks. Does the Court's record from the 1880s to the 1920s on the issues considered here reflect (a) a principled effort to develop a coherent body of law in an area where determining appropriate doctrine is difficult; (b) an unprincipled effort to uphold laws that enough justices thought wise and to strike down those they thought unwise; (c) an effort to ensure that Congress attend to considerations of federalism by developing a doctrinal repertoire that allowed the Court occasionally to hold a statute unconstitutional?

Whatever the Court's intentions, by 1930 it had at hand a group of precedents that gave it substantial flexibility in assessing the constitutionality of Congress's efforts to regulate the economy. Over the following decade, those precedents were applied and then abandoned.

Note: The New Deal Crisis

As soon as Franklin D. Roosevelt took office in 1933, he proposed—and Congress quickly enacted—a series of statutes designed to ameliorate the consequences of the ongoing economic crisis and to stabilize the economy so that such a severe crisis could not recur. It was possible to find analogues in the past for each specific item of legislation, yet their sheer numbers, the swiftness with which they were enacted, and the sense of national crisis joined to make the New Deal legislation unprecedented in an important sense.

Much of the legislation interfered with what many had come to regard as the prerogatives of private property and, incidentally, the proper domain of the states. The New Deal statutes were sure to generate challenges to their constitutionality. Supporters of the statutes, and those who attacked them, could draw on a complex, well developed, and not entirely coherent body of law regarding the extent of Congress's power to regulate interstate commerce. (In addition, a similarly complex and not entirely coherent body of law existed regarding external limits—notably the due process clause—on Congress's power.) In 1934 and 1935, the first challenges reached the Supreme Court. A useful discussion of the overall litigation is P. Irons, The New Deal Lawyers (1982). The Court's first signals were mixed. By five-to-four votes, the Court rejected challenges to state legislation designed to alleviate the effects of the Depression in Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398 (1934) (obligation of contracts clause), and Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502 (1934) (due process clause). It also upheld the Roosevelt administration's repudiation of contractual duties to repay debts in gold, Norman v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, 294 U.S. 240 (1935). But the Court invalidated a portion of the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933, holding that the act excessively delegated power to the President, Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388 (1935).

Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton Railroad Co., 295 U.S. 330 (1935), foreshadowed what was to come. There, the Court invalidated the Railroad Retirement Act of 1934. Justice Roberts's opinion for a five-person majority held that, though Congress had power to regulate the safety of railroad operation, it lacked power to establish a compulsory retirement and pension plan. Such a plan was not "related to efficiency of transportation" and was too "remote from any regulation of commerce as such." Three weeks later the Court decided the Schechter case, invalidating the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933, in many ways the conceptual centerpiece of the New Deal recovery program.

A. L. A. SCHECHTER POULTRY CORP. v. UNITED STATES, 295 U.S. 495 (1935). The National Industrial Recovery Act authorized the President to approve "codes of fair competition" developed by boards from various industries. President Roosevelt approved a Live Poultry Code applicable in metropolitan New York, the largest live poultry market in the country. The code established a forty-hour work week and a minimum wage of 50 cents per hour; it prohibited child labor and established the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively. The code also regulated a variety of trade practices.

Virtually all of the live poultry sold in New York was shipped by railroad from other states. After arrival, the poultry was assigned to commission sales agents, who sold the poultry to slaughterhouse operators such as the Schechters. They bought poultry for slaughter and resale. The poultry was shipped by truck from the rail terminals to the Schechters' slaughterhouse in Brooklyn and from there, within twenty-four hours, to butchers who sold directly to consumers. The Schechters were convicted of violating the wage and hour provisions of the code, as well as a trade practice requirement that purchasers buy an entire “run” of a coop, including sick poultry. The Supreme Court struck down the statute.

Chief Justice Hughes’s opinion for the Court began by addressing the relation between the Constitution and “the grave national crisis with which Congress was confronted. Undoubtedly, the conditions to which power is addressed are always to be considered when the exercise of power is challenged. Extraordinary conditions may call for extraordinary remedies. But [extraordinary] conditions do not create or enlarge constitutional power. The Constitution established a national government with powers deemed to be adequate, [but] these powers of the national government are limited by the constitutional grants. Those who act under these grants are not at liberty to transcend the imposed limits because they believe that more or different power is necessary. Such assertions of extra-constitutional authority were anticipated and precluded by the explicit terms of the Tenth Amendment.” Turning to the application of the Live Poultry Code to intrastate transactions, Chief Justice Hughes first asked whether these transactions were “in” interstate commerce. “Much is made of the fact that almost all the poultry coming to New York is sent there from other States. But [when] defendants had made their purchases, [the] poultry was trucked to their slaughterhouses in Brooklyn for local disposition. The interstate transactions in relation to that poultry then ended. Defendants held the poultry at their slaughterhouse markets for slaughter and local sale to retail dealers and butchers who in turn sold directly to consumers. Neither the slaughtering nor the sales by defendants were transactions in interstate commerce.

“The undisputed facts thus afford no warrant for the argument that the poultry handled by defendants at their slaughterhouse markets was in a ‘current’ or ‘flow’ of interstate commerce and was thus subject to congressional regulation. The mere fact that there may be a constant flow of commodities into a State does not mean that the flow continues after the property has arrived and has become commingled with the mass of property within the State and is there held solely for local disposition and use. So far as the poultry here in question is concerned, the flow in interstate commerce had ceased. [Hence], decisions which deal with a stream of interstate commerce—where goods come to rest within a State temporarily and are later to go forward in interstate commerce—[are] not applicable here.”

Next Chief Justice Hughes asked whether the transactions “directly ‘affect’ interstate commerce. [In] determining how far the federal government may go in controlling intrastate transactions upon the ground that they ‘affect’ interstate commerce, there is a necessary and well-established distinction between direct and indirect effects. [Direct] effects are illustrated by [the] effect of failure to use prescribed safety appliances on railroads which are the highways of both interstate and intrastate commerce, [and] the fixing of rates for intrastate transportation which unjustly discriminate against interstate commerce. But where the effect of intrastate transactions upon interstate commerce is merely indirect, such transactions remain within the domain of state power. If the commerce clause were construed to reach all enterprises and transactions which could be said to have an indirect effect upon interstate commerce, the federal authority would embrace practically all the activities of the people and the authority of the State over its domestic concerns would exist only by sufferance of the federal government. Indeed, on such a theory, even the development of the State's commercial facilities would be subject to federal control." The wages and hours provisions "are imposed in order to govern the details of defendants' management of their local business. The persons employed in slaughtering and selling in local trade are not employed in interstate commerce. Their hours and wages have no direct relation to interstate commerce. [This] appears from an examination of the considerations urged by the Government with respect to conditions in the poultry trade. Thus, the Government argues that hours and wages affect prices; that slaughterhouse men sell at a small margin above operating costs; that labor represents 50 to 60 per cent of these costs; that a slaughterhouse operator paying lower wages or reducing his cost by exacting long hours of work, translates his saving into lower prices; that this results in demands for a cheaper grade of goods; and that the cutting of prices brings about a demoralization of the price structure. [The] argument of the Government proves too much. If the federal government may determine the wages and hours of employees in the internal commerce of a State, because of their relation to cost and prices and their indirect effect upon interstate commerce, it would seem that a similar control might be exerted over other elements of cost, also affecting prices...."

The opinion concluded, "It is not the province of the Court to consider the economic advantages or disadvantages of [a] centralized system. It is sufficient to say that the Federal Constitution does not provide for it. Our growth and development have called for wide use of the commerce power of the federal government in its control over the expanded activities of interstate commerce, and in protecting that commerce from burdens, interferences, and conspiracies to restrain and monopolize it. But the authority of the federal government may not be pushed to such an extreme as to destroy the distinction, which the commerce clause itself establishes, between commerce 'among the several States' and the internal concerns of a State. [Stress] is laid upon the great importance of maintaining wage distributions which would provide the necessary stimulus in starting ‘the cumulative forces making for expanding commercial activity.’ Without in any way disparaging this motive, it is enough to say that the recuperative efforts of the federal government must be made in a manner consistent with the authority granted by the Constitution.”

Justice Cardozo, joined by Justice Stone, concurred: “[There] is a view of causation that would obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local in the activities of commerce. Motion at the outer rim is communicated perceptibly, though minutely, to recording instruments at the center. A society such as ours ‘is an elastic medium which transmits all tremors throughout its territory; the only question is of their size.’ Per Learned Hand, J., in the court below. The law is not indifferent to considerations of degree. Activities local in their immediacy do not become interstate and national because of distant repercussions. What is near and what is distant may at times be uncertain. There is no penumbra of uncertainty obscuring judgment here. To find immediacy or directness here is to find it almost everywhere. If centripetal forces are to be isolated to the exclusion of the forces that oppose and counteract them, there will be an end to our federal system.”

CARTER v. CARTER COAL CO., 298 U.S. 238 (1936). The Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935 was intended to stabilize the industry during a period of sustained industrial crisis. The first section of the act contained a long recitation of the importance of coal to the national economy, the need for “just and rational relations” between labor and management, and the existence of inefficient practices that “directly affect[ed] interstate commerce.” The act established a system of local coal boards to set minimum prices, with variations for particular mines as each board thought appropriate. The boards were to administer a code that allowed employees to bargain collectively. Once a sufficient number of collective bargaining agreements had been negotiated, their wage and hour terms would bind all mine operators in the area. A stockholder in Carter Coal sued to enjoin the company from complying with the code. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Sutherland, invalidated the statute’s labor provisions. Holding that those provisions were not severable from the price-fixing provisions, the Court did not discuss the price-fixing provisions separately.

Justice Sutherland said that “the recitals contained in [the first section of] the act plainly suggest that its makers were of opinion that its constitutionality could be sustained under some general federal power, thought to exist, apart from the specific grants of the Constitution. [These] affirmations [do] not constitute an exertion of the will of Congress which is legislation, but a recital of considerations which in the opinion of that body existed and justified the expression of its will in the present act. Nevertheless, this preamble may not be disregarded. On the contrary it is important, because it makes clear, except for the pure assumption that the conditions described ‘directly’ affect interstate commerce, that the powers which Congress undertook to exercise are not specific but of the most general character—namely, to protect the general public interest and the health and comfort of the people, to conserve privately-owned coal, maintain just relations between producers and employees and others, and promote the general welfare, by controlling nation-wide production and distribution of coal. These, it may be conceded, are objects of great worth; but are they ends, the attainment of which has been committed by the Constitution to the federal government?” Justice Sutherland continued, “The ruling and firmly established principle is that the powers which the general government may exercise are only those specifically enumerated in the Constitution, and such implied powers as are necessary and proper to carry into effect the enumerated powers. Whether the end sought to be attained by an act of Congress is legitimate is wholly a matter of constitutional power and not at all of legislative discretion. [The] distinction between these two things—power and discretion—is not only very plain but very important. Thus, it may be said that to a constitutional end many ways are open; but to an end not within the terms of the Constitution, all ways are closed....

“[Every] journey to a forbidden end begins with the first step; and the danger of such a step by the federal government in the direction of taking over the powers of the states is that the end of the journey may find the states so despoiled of their powers, or—what may amount to the same thing—so relieved of the responsibilities which possession of the powers necessarily enjoins, as to reduce them to little more than geographical subdivisions of the national domain. ...”

For Justice Sutherland, “[the] word ‘commerce’ is the equivalent of the phrase ‘intercourse for the purposes of trade.’ Plainly, the incidents leading up to and culminating in the mining of coal do not constitute such intercourse. The employment of men, the fixing of their wages, hours of labor and working conditions, the bargaining in respect of these things—whether carried on separately or collectively—each and all constitute intercourse for the purposes of production, not of trade. [Extraction] of coal from the mine is the aim and the completed result of local activities. Commerce in the coal mined is not brought into being by force of these activities, but by negotiations, agreements, and circumstances entirely apart from production. Mining brings the subject matter of commerce into existence. Commerce disposes of it.” Citing Schechter, Justice Sutherland continued, “Everything which moves in interstate commerce has had a local origin. Without local production somewhere, interstate commerce, as now carried on, would practically disappear. Nevertheless, the local character of mining, of manufacturing and of crop growing is a fact, and remains a fact, whatever may be done with the products.” In discussing the “direct/indirect” test, Justice Sutherland wrote, “Whether the effect of a given activity or condition is direct or indirect is not always easy to determine. The word ‘direct’ implies that the activity or condition invoked or blamed shall operate proximately—not meditately, remotely, or collaterally—to produce the effect. [The] distinction between a direct and an indirect effect turns, not upon the magnitude of either the cause or the effect, but entirely upon the manner in which the effect has been brought about. If the production by one man of a single ton of coal intended for interstate sale and shipment, and actually so sold and shipped, affects interstate commerce indirectly, the effect does not become direct by multiplying the tonnage, or increasing the number of men employed, or adding to the expense or complexities of the business, or by all combined. It is quite true that rules of law are sometimes qualified by considerations of degree, as the government argues. But the matter of degree has no bearing upon the question here, since that question is not—What is the extent of the local activity or condition, or the extent of the effect produced upon interstate commerce? but —What is the relation between the activity or condition and the effect?

“Much stress is put upon the evils which come from the struggle between employers and employees over the matter of wages, working conditions, the right of collective bargaining, etc., and the resulting strikes, curtailment and irregularity of production and effect on prices; and it is insisted that interstate commerce is greatly affected thereby. But, [the] conclusive answer is that the evils are all local evils over which the federal government has no legislative control. [Working] conditions are obviously local conditions. The employees are not engaged in or about commerce, but exclusively in producing a commodity. And the controversies and evils, which it is the object of the act to regulate and minimize, are local controversies and evils affecting local work undertaken to accomplish that local result. Such effect as they may have upon commerce, however extensive it may be, is secondary and indirect. An increase in the greatness of the effect adds to its importance. It does not alter its character.” Justice Sutherland argued that “[the] only perceptible difference between [Schechter] and this [case] is that [there] the federal power was asserted with respect to commodities which had come to rest after their interstate transportation; while here, the case deals with commodities at rest before interstate commerce has begun. That difference is without significance. The federal regulatory power ceases when interstate commercial intercourse ends; and, correlative, the power does not attach until interstate commercial intercourse begins."

Justice Cardozo, joined by Justices Brandeis and Stone, would have upheld the price-fixing provisions, finding the labor provisions severable and the challenge to them premature. "Regulation of prices being an exercise of the commerce power in respect of interstate transactions, the question remains whether it comes within that power as applied to intrastate sales where interstate prices are directly or intimately affected. [Sometimes] it is said that the relation must be 'direct' to bring that power into play. In many circumstances such a description will be sufficiently precise to meet the needs of the occasion. But a great principle of constitutional law is not susceptible of comprehensive statement in an adjective. The underlying thought is merely this, that 'the law is not indifferent to considerations of degree.' [Schechter, concurring opinion.] It cannot be indifferent to them without an expansion of the commerce clause that would absorb or imperil the reserved powers of the states. At times, as in the case cited, the waves of causation will have radiated so far that their undulatory motion, if discernible at all, will be too faint or obscure, too broken by crosscurrents, to be heeded by the law. [Always] the setting of the facts is to be viewed if one would know the closeness of the tie. Perhaps, if one group of adjectives is to be chosen in preference to another, 'intimate' and 'remote' will be found to be as good as any. At all events, 'direct' and 'indirect,' even if accepted as sufficient, must not be read too narrowly. A survey of the cases shows that the words have been interpreted with suppleness of adaptation and flexibility of meaning. The power is as broad as the need that evokes it."

Justice Cardozo then discussed the distinction between direct and indirect effects on commerce, in light of the Shreveport Rate Cases. "What the cases really mean is that the causal relation in such circumstances is so close and intimate and obvious as to permit it to be called direct without subjecting the word to an unfair or excessive strain. There is a like immediacy here. Within rulings the most orthodox, the prices for intrastate sales of coal have so inescapable a relation to those for interstate sales that a system of regulation for transactions of the one class is necessary to give adequate protection to the system of regulation adopted for the other...." According to Justice Cardozo, "Congress was not condemned to inaction in the face of price wars and wage wars so pregnant with disaster. Commerce had been choked and burdened; its normal flow had been diverted from one state to another; there had been bankruptcy and waste and ruin alike for capital and for labor. [There] is testimony [even] by the assailants of the statute [that] only through a system of regulated prices can the industry be stabilized and set upon the road of orderly and peaceful progress. [After] making every allowance for difference of opinion as to the most efficient cure, the student of the subject is confronted with the indisputable truth that there were ills to be corrected, and ills that had a direct relation to the maintenance of commerce among the states without friction or diversion. An evil existing, and also the power to correct it, the lawmakers were at liberty to use their own discretion in the selection of the means." Chief Justice Hughes agreed that the labor provisions were unconstitutional but wrote separately to say that the price-fixing provisions were severable.

Note: New Deal Legislation and Commerce Clause Tests in the 1930s

1. Schechter's significance. At the start of the New Deal, the NIRA was a popular and apparently successful program, less because the codes of fair competition established a sensible regime for developing macroeconomic policy than because the evidence of concerted national action gave the public confidence that something was being done. Over the next two years, however, the regulatory apparatus became much less popular. The codes had done little to stabilize, much less restore, production, and opponents fearing congressional control of the economy obtained injunctions against some codes, which further weakened the program. The act was due to expire a few weeks after Schechter was decided, and there had been no effort to extend its life even before the decision. The decision in Schechter was thus less important for its precise holding than for the approaches it articulated toward Congress's powers.

What values of federalism are served by limiting Congress's power in Schechter?

2. "Current of commerce." Why were the chickens not still part of a flow of interstate commerce? Does the Court explain why the flow ended at the slaughterhouses and not, for example, at the butcher's final sale? Or even further at the disposition of the chickens' bones at the garbage dump?

3. "Direct effects." Justice Sutherland invokes the E. C. Knight approach to directness, treating it as a logical category defined in terms of a beginning and an end to interstate commerce. Justice Cardozo treats directness as he would the tort law concept of proximate cause, in which directness is determined with reference to the purposes sought to be achieved by the test. According to Justice Cardozo, what are those purposes? Could Justice Sutherland have used Justice Cardozo's test to hold the Bituminous Coal Act unconstitutional? Is Cardozo's effort to distinguish Schechter and Carter persuasive?

4. The New Deal response to the Court. Because Schechter dealt with an activity near the retailing end of the spectrum of economic activity, supporters of the New Deal thought that their program could survive in areas closer to the center of the economy. The Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935 was enacted after Schechter. It was invalidated in Carter v. Carter Coal Co. The National Labor Relations Act became effective after Schechter, and supporters of the New Deal believed that the Court might hold it unconstitutional. See also United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1 (1936), Chapter 3 infra (holding Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933 unconstitutional as beyond the scope of the spending power); Morehead v. New York ex rel. Tipaldo, 298 U.S. 587 (1936) (invalidating state minimum wage law for women as violating due process).

These decisions, coupled with Roosevelt's massive victory in the 1936 elections, led Roosevelt to propose changes in the structure of the Supreme Court. Seizing on the fact that six justices were over seventy years old in 1937, Roosevelt proposed that one additional justice, up to a total of fifteen, be appointed for each justice over seventy who did not resign or retire. His message to Congress argued that older justices were unable to fulfill their responsibilities, thus increasing the workload of the younger justices. Yet it was widely understood that the real point of the proposal was to increase the number of justices who would find New Deal legislation constitutional, and that the workload argument was essentially a makeweight.

The proposal encountered substantial opposition: It was attacked as disingenuous and contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. (Was it the latter?) During the debate over the proposal, Justice Van Devanter retired. In addition, the Court upheld a state minimum wage statute in West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379 (1937). Justice Roberts, who had voted with the five-person majority in Morehead, now voted to uphold a similar statute. The Court had taken a preliminary vote in West Coast Hotel before Roosevelt submitted his "Court-packing" plan. A later memorandum by Justice Roberts explained that he had joined the majority in Morehead only because those seeking to uphold the minimum wage statute sought to distinguish prior cases, instead of urging that they be overruled. When in West Coast Hotel the argument for overruling was made, Justice Roberts agreed with it. Note his position in National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., infra, decided while the Senate was debating the Court-packing plan. Roberts's position was widely characterized as "the switch in time that saved Nine." The Senate Judiciary Committee on June 14, after Jones & Laughlin and West Coast Hotel, emphatically rejected Roosevelt's proposal. The majority leader of the Senate, Joseph Robinson, exerted a great deal of personal pressure on other senators and appeared to have accumulated enough votes to secure passage of a slightly modified Court-packing bill by early July. However, Robinson died of a heart attack before the vote was taken, and the plan was rejected in the Senate in mid-July. See Leuchtenberg, The Origins of Franklin D. Roosevelt's "Court-Packing" Plan, 1966 Sup. Ct. Rev. 347.

Was the New Deal position on national powers completely vindicated by the cases that follow, and by Wickard v. Filburn, section B supra? Should Schechter and Carter be understood as aberrational deviations from well established prior law? Should the New Deal cases be so understood? For a vigorous challenge to the post-New Deal expansion of the commerce power, see Epstein, The Proper Scope of the Commerce Power, 73 Va. L. Rev. 1387 (1987).

NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp.

301 U.S. 1 (1937)

[The National Labor Relations Act established a comprehensive system for regulating labor/management relations. It established the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively and created a board to supervise elections and to enforce the act's prohibition of such unfair labor practices as discrimination against union members. The act contained the following "findings":

The denial by employers of the right of employees to organize and the refusal by employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining lead to strikes and other forms of industrial strife or unrest, which have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by (a) impairing the efficiency, safety, or operation of the instrumentalities of commerce; (b) occurring in the current of commerce; (c) materially affecting, restraining, or controlling the flow of raw materials or manufactured or processed goods from or into the channels of commerce, or the prices of such materials or goods in commerce; or (d) causing diminution of employment and wages in such volume as substantially to impair or disrupt the market for goods flowing from or into the channels of commerce.

The inequality of bargaining power between employees who do not possess full freedom of association or actual liberty of contract, and employers who are organized in the corporate or other forms of ownership association substantially burdens and affects the flow of commerce, and tends to aggravate recurrent business depressions, by depressing wage rates and the purchasing power of wage earners in industry and by preventing the stabilization of competitive wage rates and working conditions within and between industries.

Experience has proved that protection by law of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively safeguards commerce from injury, impairment, or interruption, and promotes the flow of commerce by removing certain recognized sources of industrial strife and unrest, by encouraging practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial disputes arising out of differences as to wages, hours, or other working conditions, and by restoring equality of bargaining power between employers and employees.

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to eliminate the causes of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of commerce and to mitigate and eliminate these obstructions when they have occurred by encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and by protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection.

[The National Labor Relations Board charged Jones & Laughlin with the unfair labor practice of firing employees because they sought to organize a union. The court of appeals held the act unconstitutional.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES delivered the opinion of the Court....

The facts as to the nature and scope of the business of the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation have been found by the Labor Board, and, so far as they are essential to the determination of this controversy, they are not in dispute. The Labor Board has found: the corporation is engaged in the business of manufacturing iron and steel in plants situated in Pittsburgh and nearby Aliquippa, Pennsylvania. It manufactures and distributes a widely diversified line of steel and pig iron, being the fourth largest producer of steel in the United States. With its subsidiaries—nineteen in number—it is a completely integrated enterprise, owning and operating ore, coal and limestone properties, lake and river transportation facilities and terminal railroads located at its manufacturing plants. It owns or controls mines in Michigan and Minnesota. It operates four ore steamships on the Great Lakes, used in the transportation of ore to its factories. It owns coal mines in Pennsylvania. It operates towboats and steam barges used in carrying coal to its factories. It owns limestone properties in various places in Pennsylvania and West Virginia. It owns the Monongahela connecting railroad which connects the plants of the Pittsburgh works and forms an interconnection with the Pennsylvania, New York Central and Baltimore and Ohio Railroad systems. It owns the Aliquippa and Southern Railroad Company which connects the Aliquippa works with the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie part of the New York Central system. Much of its product is shipped to its warehouses in Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati and Memphis,—to the last two places by means of its own barges and transportation equipment. In Long Island City, New York, and in New Orleans it operates structural steel fabricating shops in connection with the warehousing of semi-finished materials sent from its works. Through one of its wholly-owned subsidiaries it owns, leases and operates stores, warehouses and yards for the distribution of equipment and supplies for drilling and operating oil and gas wells and for pipe lines, refineries and pumping stations. It has sales offices in twenty cities in the United States and a wholly-owned subsidiary which is devoted exclusively to distributing its product in Canada. Approximately 75 percent of its product is shipped out of Pennsylvania.

Summarizing these operations, the Labor Board concluded that the works in Pittsburgh and Aliquippa "might be likened to the heart of a self-contained, highly integrated body. They draw in the raw materials from Michigan, Minnesota, West Virginia, Pennsylvania in part through arteries and by means controlled by the respondent; they transform the materials and then pump them out to all parts of the nation through the vast mechanism which the respondent has elaborated."...

Respondent points to evidence that the Aliquippa plant, in which the discharged men were employed, contains complete facilities for the production of finished and semi-finished iron and steel products from raw materials. [The] iron ore which is procured from mines in Minnesota and Michigan and transported to respondent's plant is stored in stock piles for future use, the amount of ore in storage varying with the season but usually being enough to maintain operations from nine to ten months....

FIRST. THE SCOPE OF THE ACT

[It] is a familiar principle that acts which directly burden or obstruct interstate or foreign commerce, or its free flow, are within the reach of the congressional power. Acts having that effect are not rendered immune because they grow out of labor disputes. It is the effect upon commerce, not the source of the injury, which is the criterion. Whether or not particular action does affect commerce in such a close and intimate fashion as to be subject to federal control [is] left by the statute to be determined as individual cases arise. We are thus to inquire whether in the instant case the constitutional boundary has been passed.

SECOND. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES IN QUESTION...

[In] its present application, the statute goes no further than to safeguard the right of employees to self-organization and to select representatives of their own choosing for collective bargaining or other mutual protection without restraint or coercion by their employer.

That is a fundamental right. Employees have as clear a right to organize and select their representatives for lawful purposes as the respondent has to organize its business and select its own officers and agents. Discrimination and coercion to prevent the free exercise of the right of employees to self-organization and representation is a proper subject for condemnation by competent legislative authority....

THIRD. THE APPLICATION OF THE ACT TO EMPLOYEES ENGAGED IN PRODUCTION. THE PRINCIPLE INVOLVED

Respondent says that whatever may be said of employees engaged in interstate commerce, the industrial relations and activities in the manufacturing department of respondent's enterprise are not subject to federal regulation. The argument rests upon the proposition that manufacturing in itself is not commerce. [Schechter; Carter v. Carter Coal Co.] The Government distinguishes these cases. The various parts of respondent's enterprise are described as interdependent. [It] is urged that these activities constitute a "stream" or "flow" of commerce, of which the Aliquippa manufacturing plant is the focal point, and that industrial strife at that point would cripple the entire movement. Reference is made to [Stafford v. Wallace]....

We do not find it necessary to determine whether these features of defendant's business dispose of the asserted analogy to the "stream of commerce" cases. The instances in which that metaphor has been used are but particular, and not exclusive, illustrations of the protective power which the Government invokes in support of the present Act. The congressional authority to protect interstate commerce from burdens and obstructions is not limited to transactions which can be deemed to be an essential part of a "flow" of interstate or foreign commerce. Burdens and obstructions may be due to injurious action springing from other sources. [Although] activities may be intrastate in character when separately considered, if they have such a close and substantial relation to interstate commerce that their control is essential or appropriate to protect that commerce from burdens and obstructions, Congress cannot be denied the power to exercise that control. [Schechter.] Undoubtedly the scope of this power must be considered in the light of our dual system of government and may not be extended so as to embrace effects upon interstate commerce so indirect and remote that to embrace them, in view of our complex society, would effectually obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local and create a completely centralized government. The question is necessarily one of degree....

It is thus apparent that the fact that the employees here concerned were engaged in production is not determinative. The question remains as to the effect upon interstate commerce of the labor practice involved. In the Schechter case, we found that the effect there was so remote as to be beyond the federal power. To find "immediacy or directness" there was to find it "almost everywhere," a result inconsistent with the maintenance of our federal system. In the Carter case, the Court was of the opinion that the provisions of the statute relating to production were invalid upon several grounds—that there was improper delegation of legislative power, and that the requirements not only went beyond any sustainable measure of protection of interstate commerce, but were also inconsistent with due process. These cases are not controlling here.

FOURTH. EFFECTS OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE IN RESPONDENT'S ENTERPRISE

Giving full weight to respondent's contention with respect to a break in the complete continuity of the "stream of commerce" by reason of respondent's manufacturing operations, the fact remains that the stoppage of those operations by industrial strife would have a most serious effect upon interstate commerce. In view of respondent's far-flung activities, it is idle to say that the effect would be indirect or remote. It is obvious that it would be immediate and might be catastrophic. We are asked to shut our eyes to the plainest facts of our national life and to deal with the question of direct and indirect effects in an intellectual vacuum. [When] industries organize themselves on a national scale, making their relation to interstate commerce the dominant factor in their activities, how can it be maintained that their industrial labor relations constitute a forbidden field into which Congress may not enter when it is necessary to protect interstate commerce from the paralyzing consequences of industrial war? We have often said that interstate commerce itself is a practical conception. It is equally true that interferences with that commerce must be appraised by a judgment that does not ignore actual experience.

Experience has abundantly demonstrated that the recognition of the right of employees to self-organization and to have representatives of their own choosing for the purpose of collective bargaining is often an essential condition of industrial peace. Refusal to confer and negotiate has been one of the most prolific causes of strife....

[Reversed.]

[Justices McReynolds, Van Devanter, Sutherland, and Butler dissented.]

UNITED STATES v. DARBY, 312 U.S. 100 (1941). Darby was charged with violating the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. The act prohibited the shipment in interstate commerce of goods manufactured by employees who were paid less than a prescribed minimum wage or who worked more than a prescribed maximum number of hours and prohibited the employment of workers in production “for interstate commerce” at other than the prescribed wages and hours. The district court sustained Darby’s objections to the constitutionality of the act. The Supreme Court reversed, in an opinion by Justice Stone.

The opinion said that the act’s purpose was “to exclude from interstate commerce goods produced for the commerce and to prevent their production for interstate commerce, under conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standards of living necessary for health and general well-being; and to prevent the use of interstate commerce as the means of competition in the distribution of goods so produced, and as the means of spreading and perpetuating such substandard labor conditions among the workers of the several states.”

Justice Stone’s analysis began with this statement: “While manufacture is not of itself interstate commerce, the shipment of manufactured goods interstate is such commerce and the prohibition of such shipment by Congress is indubitably a regulation of the commerce.” Responding to the argument that “while the prohibition is nominally a regulation of the commerce its motive or purpose is regulation of wages and hours of persons engaged in manufacture, the control of which has been reserved to the states and upon which Georgia and some of the states of destination have placed no restriction,” Justice Stone wrote, “[Congress,] following its own conception of public policy concerning the restrictions which may appropriately be imposed on interstate commerce, is free to exclude from the commerce articles whose use in the states for which they are destined it may conceive to be injurious to the public health, morals, or welfare, even though the state has not sought to regulate their use. [Lottery Case.]

“Such regulation is not a forbidden invasion of state power merely because either its motive or its consequence is to restrict the use of articles of commerce within the states of destination; and is not prohibited unless by other Constitutional provisions. It is no objection to the assertion of the power to regulate interstate commerce that its exercise is attended by the same incidents which attend the exercise of the police power of the states.”

Justice Stone continued, “The motive and purpose of the present regulation are plainly to make effective the Congressional conception of public policy that interstate commerce should not be made the instrument of competition in the distribution of goods produced under substandard labor conditions, which competition is injurious to the commerce and to the states from and to which the commerce flows. The motive and purpose of a regulation of interstate commerce are matters for the legislative judgment upon the exercise of which the Constitution places no restriction and over which the courts are given no control. [Whatever] their motive and purpose, regulations of commerce which do not infringe some constitutional prohibition are within the plenary power conferred on Congress by the Commerce Clause. Subject only to that limitation, [we] conclude that the prohibition of the shipment interstate of goods produced under the forbidden substandard labor conditions is within the constitutional authority of Congress.”

According to Justice Stone, only Hammer v. Dagenhart was inconsistent with this analysis, and that case “has not been followed. [The] conclusion is inescapable that Hammer v. Dagenhart was a departure from the principles which have prevailed in the interpretation of the Commerce Clause both before and since the decision and that such vitality, as a precedent, as it then had has long since been exhausted. It should be and now is overruled.”

The Court upheld the wage and hour requirements as applied to employees producing goods for interstate commerce, defining that category to include employees working on goods that the employer intends or expects to be sent to out-of-state customers. According to Justice Stone, Congress’s power “extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce [as] to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the exercise of the granted power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. [Congress], having by the present Act adopted the policy of excluding from interstate commerce all goods produced for the commerce which do not conform to the specified labor standards, it may choose the means reasonably adapted to the attainment of the permitted end, even though they involve control of intrastate activities.”

According to the Court, these provisions were also “sustainable independently” of the ban on interstate shipment. “[The] evils aimed at by the Act are the spread of substandard labor conditions through the use of the facilities of interstate commerce for competition by the goods so produced with those produced under the prescribed or better labor conditions; and the consequent dislocation of the commerce itself caused by the impairment or destruction of local businesses by competition made effective through interstate commerce. The Act is thus directed at the suppression of a method or kind of competition in interstate commerce which it has in effect condemned as ‘[unfair.]’”

The opinion also said, “Our conclusion is unaffected by the Tenth Amendment. [The] amendment states but a truism that all is retained which has not been surrendered. There is nothing in the history of its adoption to suggest that it was more than declaratory of the relationship between the national and state governments as it had been established by the Constitution before the amendment or that its purpose was other than to allay fears that the new national government might seek to exercise powers not granted, and that the states might not be able to exercise fully their reserved powers.”

Note: The New Deal Legacy

1. Two perspectives on Jones & Laughlin. Consider these interpretations of Jones & Laughlin. (a) Chief Justice Hughes’s description of Jones & Laughlin’s operations shows that the Court chose the “economic” or “pragmatic” approach, focusing on actual economic realities, to determining whether an activity affects interstate commerce. Recall that in Wickard v. Filburn, the Court focused on the national market in wheat, while in Jones & Laughlin, it focused on Jones & Laughlin’s own steel plants. (b) The NLRA regulated labor relations and strikes that interrupted the productions of goods and services, and thereby directly affected interstate commerce, whereas the NRA’s production codes regulated production practices, whose effects on interstate commerce were only indirect. Jones & Laughlin’s language supports both interpretations; the case has generally been taken to embody the first.

2. The “formalist” approach. Darby is divided into two parts. Are the analyses the same in both?

a. Prohibiting interstate shipment. Congress prohibited the shipment in interstate commerce of certain goods. Does this intrude on state policies in a way distinguishable from the statutes in the Lottery Case? Note that the Court refuses to use Congress’s “motive and purpose” as a basis for its constitutional analysis. Can that be reconciled with the “pretext” language of McCulloch? Can a “pretext” test ever be applied without the courts’ exercising “control” over motive and purpose?

Consider the suggestion in Friedman & Lakier, “To Regulate,” Not “To Prohibit”: Limiting the Commerce Power, 2012 Sup. Ct. Rev. 255, 261-262 (2013):

[In light of] Framing-era understandings of the proper division between the national and state government [and] modern economic analysis of the values of federalism, [the] only conceivable justification for allowing Congress to ban markets [is] to control the spillover costs of state diversity. [This] rationale standing alone is insufficient justification to allow Congress to prohibit commerce. [But Congress] would still be able to ban goods when doing so serves [interstate] markets. [Because “in-service” laws do] not work to shut interstate commerce down, but instead typically help enforce rules by which interstate commerce operates, they do not represent prohibition of commerce. [Congress] would also have the power to adopt “helper” statutes [that] lend federal enforcement authority to states that have chosen through their own democratic processes to ban certain goods.

b. Regulating directly. Congress directly regulated the wages and hours of employees producing goods for interstate commerce. The Court in Darby justifies the direct regulation as a necessary and proper means of enforcing the ban on interstate shipment. Are there any limitations to the use of this technique? Does this approach eliminate all distinctions between direct regulation and a prohibition on interstate shipment, on the theory that direct regulation will always be a necessary and proper method of ensuring that the prohibition will not be violated?

c. Unfair competition. The Court justifies the direct regulation on an “independent” ground, that of eliminating unfair competition. In what sense is the competition “unfair”? Note that, absent the federal statute, paying sub-“minimum” wages was lawful in some states. Paying such wages is “unfair” only in that some states choose to require employers located there to pay higher wages.

3. Later developments. Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146 (1971), upheld a federal criminal statute prohibiting “extortionate credit transactions”—loan-sharking enforced by threats of violence. Justice Douglas’s opinion for the Court recited the findings Congress had made after a series of hearings, although the statute itself resulted from a floor amendment. With regard to the findings, Justice Douglas wrote, “We have mentioned in detail the economic, financial, and social setting of the problem as revealed to Congress. We do so not to infer that Congress need make particularized findings in order to legislate. We relate the history of the Act in detail to answer the impassioned plea of petitioner that all that is involved in loan sharking is a traditionally local activity.” The Court relied on Darby to uphold the statute. There, Justice Douglas said, “a class of activities was held properly regulated by Congress without proof that the particular intrastate activity against which a sanction was laid had an effect on commerce. [Petitioner] is clearly a member of the class which engages in ‘extortionate credit transactions’ as defined by Congress and the description of that class has the required definiteness. [Where] the class of activities is regulated and that class is within the reach of federal power, the courts have no power ‘to excise, as trivial, individual instances’ of the class. Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 193.” Justice Stewart dissented, saying that he could not “discern any rational distinction between loan sharking and other local crime.” For him, it was “not enough to say that loan sharking is a national problem, for all crime is a national problem. It is not enough to say that some loan sharking has interstate characteristics, for any crime may have an interstate setting. And the circumstance that loan sharking has an adverse impact on interstate business is not a distinguishing attribute, for interstate business suffers from almost all criminal activity, be it shoplifting or violence in the streets.”

4. Federalism and statutory interpretation. In Wickard, Justice Jackson said that considerations of federalism might affect the courts’ construction of a statute: “That an activity is of local character may help in a doubtful case to determine whether Congress intended to reach it.” Why? What is a “doubtful case”? In United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336 (1971), the Court held that, under the following statute, a defendant could not be convicted for possessing a gun without proof that the gun had been possessed “in commerce or affecting commerce”: “Any person who—(1) has been convicted [of] a felony [and] who receives, possesses, or transports in commerce or affecting commerce [any] fire arm shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.” It found the statute ambiguous on the question of whether the “in commerce or affecting commerce” phrase modified “transports” only, or “receives [or] possesses” as well. Justice Blackmun disagreed: “The structure of the vital language and its punctuation make it refer to one who receives, to one who possesses, and to one who transports in commerce. If one wished to say that he would welcome a cat, would welcome a dog, or would welcome a cow that jumps over the moon, he would likely say ‘I would like to have a cat, a dog, or a cow that jumps over the moon.’ So it is here.”

HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL v. UNITED STATES, 379 U.S. 241 (1964). Title II of the 1964 Civil Rights Act provides that “all persons shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the goods, services,...and accommodations of any place of public accommodation...without discrimination or segregation on the ground of race, color, religion, or national origin.” The statute defines places of public accommodation as those whose “operations affect commerce.” It declares that hotels and motels that provide rooms for transient guests affect commerce per se. A restaurant is covered if it serves or offers to serve interstate travelers or if “a substantial portion of the food which it serves...has moved in commerce.” The Heart of Atlanta Motel sought a declaratory judgment that Title II was unconstitutional. The motel, located in downtown Atlanta, had 216 rooms. It advertised in national magazines and on billboards. About 75 percent of its registered guests were from out of state.

The Court upheld the statute as a valid exercise of the power to regulate interstate commerce. The Court relied on evidence elicited in congressional hearings “of the burdens that discrimination by race or color places upon interstate commerce. This testimony included the fact that our people have become increasingly mobile with millions of people of all races traveling from State to State; that Negroes in particular have been the subject of discrimination in transient accommodations, having to travel great distances to secure the same; that often they have been unable to obtain accommodations and have had to call upon friends to put them up overnight; and that these conditions had become so acute as to require the listing of available lodging for Negroes in a special guide book which was itself ‘dramatic testimony to the difficulties’ Negroes encounter in travel.” The evidence “indicated a qualitative as well as quantitative effect on interstate travel by Negroes. The former was the obvious impairment of the Negro traveler’s pleasure and convenience that resulted when he continually was uncertain of finding lodging. As for the latter, there was evidence that this uncertainty stemming from racial discrimination had the effect of discouraging travel on the part of a substantial portion of the Negro community.”

The Court acknowledged that “[in] framing Title II of this Act Congress was also dealing with what it considered a moral problem. But that fact does not detract from the overwhelming evidence of the disruptive effect that racial discrimination has had on commercial intercourse. It was this burden which empowered Congress to enact appropriate legislation, and, given this basis for the exercise of its power, Congress was not restricted by the fact that the particular obstruction to interstate commerce with which it was dealing was also deemed a moral and social wrong.” Further, it did not matter that the motel was “of a purely local character” because “the power of Congress to promote interstate commerce also includes the power to regulate the local incidents thereof, including local activities in both the States of origin and destination, which might have a substantial and harmful effect upon that commerce. One need only examine the evidence [to] see that Congress may [prohibit] racial discrimination by motels serving travelers, however ‘local’ their operations may appear.” Justice Clark’s opinion for the Court concluded, “How obstructions in commerce may be removed—what means are to be employed—is within the sound and exclusive discretion of the Congress. It is subject only to one caveat—that the means chosen by it must be reasonably adapted to the end permitted by the Constitution. We cannot say that its choice here was not so adapted. The Constitution requires no more.”

KATZENBACH v. McCLUNG, 379 U.S. 294 (1964). This was a companion case to Heart of Atlanta Motel. It involved Ollie’s Barbecue, a family-owned restaurant in Birmingham, Alabama, with a seating capacity of 220 customers. “It is located on a state highway 11 blocks from an interstate one and a somewhat greater distance from railroad and bus stations. The restaurant caters to a family and white-collar trade with a take-out service for Negroes. It employs 36 persons, two-thirds of whom are Negroes.” The restaurant bought about $150,000 worth of food, of which about $70,000 worth was meat bought from a local supplier who purchased it out of state. The restaurant challenged the constitutionality of applying Title II of the 1964 Civil Rights Act to it.

Justice Clark’s opinion for the Court relied on congressional testimony “that discrimination in restaurants had a direct and highly restrictive effect upon interstate travel by Negroes. This resulted, it was said, because discriminatory practices prevent Negroes from buying prepared food served on the premises while on a trip, except in isolated and unkempt restaurants and under most unsatisfactory and often unpleasant conditions. This obviously discourages travel and obstructs interstate commerce for one can hardly travel without eating. Likewise, it was said, that discrimination deterred professional, as well as skilled, people from moving into areas where such practices occurred and thereby caused industry to be reluctant to establish there.”

This was sufficient to support “the conclusion that established restaurants in such areas sold less interstate goods because of the discrimination, that interstate travel was obstructed directly by it, that business in general suffered and that many new businesses refrained from establishing there as a result of it.” The Court agreed that “viewed in isolation, the volume of food purchased by Ollie’s Barbecue from sources supplied from out of state was insignificant when compared with the total foodstuffs moving in commerce.” The restaurant argued that the Constitution required “a case-by-case determination—judicial or administrative—that racial discrimination in a particular restaurant affects commerce.” The Court disagreed. “Here, as [in Darby], Congress has determined for itself that refusals of service to Negroes have imposed burdens both upon the interstate flow of food and upon the movement of products generally. Of course, the mere fact that Congress has said when particular activity shall be deemed to affect commerce does not preclude further examination by this Court. But where we find that the legislators, in light of the facts and testimony before them, have a rational basis for finding a chosen regulatory scheme necessary to the protection of commerce, our investigation is at an end. The only remaining question—one answered in the affirmative by the court below—is whether the particular restaurant either serves or offers to serve interstate travelers or serves food a substantial portion of which has moved in interstate commerce.” Congress, the Court said, “had a rational basis for finding that racial discrimination in restaurants had a direct and adverse effect on the free flow of interstate commerce. Insofar as the sections of the Act here relevant are concerned, Congress prohibited discrimination only in those establishments having a close tie to interstate commerce, i.e., those, like the McClungs’, serving food that has come from out of the State. We think in so doing that Congress acted well within its power to protect and foster commerce in extending the coverage of Title II only to those restaurants offering to serve interstate travelers or serving food, a substantial portion of which has moved in interstate commerce.”

Justice Black’s concurring opinion applied to both Heart of Atlanta Motel and Katzenbach v. McClung. “[I] recognize that every remote, possible, speculative effect on commerce should not be accepted as an adequate constitutional ground to uproot and throw into the discard all our traditional distinctions between what is purely local, and therefore controlled by state laws, and what affects the national interest and is therefore subject to control by federal laws. I recognize too that some isolated and remote lunchroom which sells only to local people and buys almost all its supplies in the locality may possibly be beyond the reach of the power of Congress to regulate commerce, just as such an establishment is not covered by the present Act. But in deciding the constitutional power of Congress in cases like the two before us we do not consider the effect on interstate commerce of only one isolated, individual, local event, without regard to the fact that this single local event when added to many others of a similar nature may impose a burden on interstate commerce by reducing its volume or distorting its flow. There are approximately 20,000,000 Negroes in our country. Many of them are able to, and do, travel among the States in automobiles. Certainly it would seriously discourage such travel by them if, as evidence before the Congress indicated has been true in the past, they should in the future continue to be unable to find a decent place along their way in which to lodge or eat. And the flow of interstate commerce may be impeded or distorted substantially if local sellers of interstate food are permitted to exclude all Negro consumers. Measuring, as this Court has so often held is required, by the aggregate effect of a great number of such acts of discrimination, I am of the opinion that Congress has constitutional power under the Commerce and Necessary and Proper Clauses to protect interstate commerce from the injuries bound to befall it from these discriminatory practices."

Note: Federalism and Congressional Motivation

1. Commerce clause versus (?) fourteenth amendment motivations. The central issues arising from these cases involve the tension between the evident motivation behind the enactment of the statute—an antidiscrimination, moral motivation—and the use of the commerce power. Those issues arose because the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883), held unconstitutional the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which relied on section 5 of the fourteenth amendment to prohibit discrimination in "inns, public conveyances,...theaters, and other places of public amusement." In Heart of Atlanta Motel, the Court's opinion observed, "the fact that certain kinds of businesses may not in 1875 have been sufficiently involved in interstate commerce to warrant bringing them within the ambit of the commerce power is not necessarily dispositive of the same question today. Our populace had not reached its present mobility, nor were facilities, goods and services circulating as readily in interstate commerce as they are today. Although the principles which we apply today are those first formulated by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, the conditions of transportation and commerce have changed dramatically, and we must apply those principles to the present state of commerce. The sheer increase in volume of interstate traffic alone would give discriminatory practices which inhibit travel a far larger impact upon the Nation's commerce than such practices had on the economy of another day." Justice Douglas, concurring, wrote, "A decision based on the Fourteenth Amendment would have a more settling effect, making unnecessary litigation over whether a particular restaurant or inn is within the commerce definitions of the Act or whether a particular customer is an interstate traveler."

Should Congress have relied on the fourteenth amendment instead of the commerce clause? Suppose a member of Congress believed that the 1964 Civil Rights Act actually served the equality goals of the fourteenth amendment and (a) believed that the Civil Rights Cases had been wrongly decided or (b) believed that the Supreme Court in 1964 would have overruled the Civil Rights Cases or (c) was uncertain about the Court's position in 1964. How, if at all, would these views affect the design of the statute? Should they affect the member's vote on the statute in the form actually presented?

2. The scope of the rationale. Must there be a connection between the activities found to “affect” commerce and the regulations Congress imposes? Consider in this connection the role played in the analysis by the food Ollie’s Barbecue purchased. Do the food purchases demonstrate that the restaurant’s actions “affect” interstate commerce? Could Congress require that the restaurant comply with regulations for the disposal by its carry-out customers of their trash? Regulations regarding the maintenance of its lawn and parking lot? Alternatively, is the activity that affects commerce the discrimination? Is racial discrimination in the sale of services a commercial activity?

United States v. Lopez

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

In the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990, Congress made it a federal offense “for any individual knowingly to possess a firearm at a place that the individual knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, is a school zone.” 18 U.S.C. §922(q)(1)(A). The Act neither regulates a commercial activity nor contains a requirement that the possession be connected in any way to interstate commerce. We hold that the Act exceeds the authority of Congress “to regulate Commerce...among the several States....”....

Jones & Laughlin Steel, Darby, and Wickard ushered in an era of Commerce Clause jurisprudence that greatly expanded the previously defined authority of Congress under that Clause. In part, this was a recognition of the great changes that had occurred in the way business was carried on in this country. Enterprises that had once been local or at most regional in nature had become national in scope. But the doctrinal change also reflected a view that earlier Commerce Clause cases artificially had constrained the authority of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

But even these modern-era precedents which have expanded congressional power under the Commerce Clause confirm that this power is subject to outer limits....

[We] have identified three broad categories of activity that Congress may regulate under its commerce power. First, Congress may regulate the use of the channels of interstate commerce. Second, Congress is empowered to regulate and protect the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or persons or things in interstate commerce, even though the threat may come only from intrastate activities. Finally, Congress’ commerce authority includes the power to regulate those activities having a substantial relation to interstate commerce, [Jones &

Laughlin Steel], i.e., those activities that substantially affect interstate commerce.

Within this final category, [our] case law has not been clear whether an activity must “affect” or “substantially affect” interstate commerce in order to be within Congress’ power to regulate it under the Commerce Clause. We conclude, consistent with the great weight of our case law, that the proper test requires an analysis of whether the regulated activity “substantially affects” interstate commerce....

[If] §922(q) is to be sustained, it must be under the third category as a regulation of an activity that substantially affects interstate commerce.

First, we have upheld a wide variety of congressional Acts regulating intrastate economic activity where we have concluded that the activity substantially affected interstate commerce. [Where] economic activity substantially affects interstate commerce, legislation regulating that activity will be sustained....

Section 922(q) is a criminal statute that by its terms has nothing to do with “commerce” or any sort of economic enterprise, however broadly one might define those terms. Section 922(q) is not an essential part of a larger regulation of economic activity, in which the regulatory scheme could be undercut unless the intrastate activity were regulated....

Second, §922(q) contains no jurisdictional element which would ensure, through case-by-case inquiry, that the firearm possession in question affects interstate commerce....

The Government’s essential contention [is] that we may determine here that §922(q) is valid because possession of a firearm in a local school zone does indeed substantially affect interstate commerce. The Government argues that possession of a firearm in a school zone may result in violent crime and that violent crime can be expected to affect the functioning of the national economy in two ways. First, the costs of violent crime are substantial, and, through the mechanism of insurance, those costs are spread throughout the population. Second, violent crime reduces the willingness of individuals to travel to areas within the country that are perceived to be unsafe. Cf. [Heart of Atlanta Motel]. The Government also argues that the presence of guns in schools poses a substantial threat to the educational process by threatening the learning environment. A handicapped educational process, in turn, will result in a less productive citizenry. That, in turn, would have an adverse effect on the Nation’s economic well-being. As a result, the Government argues that Congress could rationally have concluded that §922(q) substantially affects interstate commerce.

We pause to consider the implications of the Government’s arguments. The Government admits, under its “costs of crime” reasoning, that Congress could regulate not only all violent crime, but all activities that might lead to violent crime, regardless of how tenuously they relate to interstate commerce. Similarly, under the Government’s “national productivity” reasoning, Congress could regulate any activity that it found was related to the economic productivity of individual citizens: family law (including marriage, divorce, and child custody), for example....

Justice Breyer [reasons] that (1) gun-related violence is a serious problem; (2) that problem, in turn, has an adverse effect on classroom learning; and (3) that adverse effect on classroom learning, in turn, represents a substantial threat to trade and commerce. This analysis would be equally applicable, if not more so, to subjects such as family law and direct regulation of education.

For instance, if Congress can, pursuant to its Commerce Clause power, regulate activities that adversely affect the learning environment, then, a fortiori, it also can regulate the educational process directly. Congress could determine that a school’s curriculum has a “significant” effect on the extent of classroom learning. As a result, Congress could mandate a federal curriculum for local elementary and secondary schools because what is taught in local schools has a significant “effect on classroom learning,” and that, in turn, has a substantial effect on interstate commerce. [Justice] Breyer’s rationale lacks any real limits because, depending on the level of generality, any activity can be looked upon as commercial. Under the dissent’s rationale, Congress could just as easily look at child rearing as “falling on the commercial side of the line” because it provides a “valuable service—namely, to equip [children] with the skills they need to survive in life and, more specifically, in the workplace.” We do not doubt that Congress has authority under the Commerce Clause to regulate numerous commercial activities that substantially affect interstate commerce and also affect the educational process. That authority, though broad, does not include the authority to regulate each and every aspect of local schools....

These are not precise formulations, and in the nature of things they cannot be. But we think they point the way to a correct decision of this case. The possession of a gun in a local school zone is in no sense an economic activity that might, through repetition elsewhere, substantially affect any sort of interstate commerce. Respondent was a local student at a local school; there is no indication that he had recently moved in interstate commerce, and there is no requirement that his possession of the firearm have any concrete tie to interstate commerce.

To uphold the Government’s contentions here, we would have to pile inference upon inference in a manner that would bid fair to convert congressional authority under the Commerce Clause to a general police power of the sort retained by the States. Admittedly, some of our prior cases have taken long steps down that road, giving great deference to congressional action. The broad language in these opinions has suggested the possibility of additional expansion, but we decline here to proceed any further. To do so would require us to conclude that the Constitution's enumeration of powers does not presuppose some thing not enumerated, cf. Gibbons v. Ogden, and that there never will be a distinction between what is truly national and what is truly local. This we are unwilling to do.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

JUSTICE KENNEDY, with whom JUSTICE O'CONNOR joins, concurring.

The history of the judicial struggle to interpret the Commerce Clause during the transition from the economic system the Founders knew to the single, national market still emergent in our own era counsels great restraint before the Court determines that the Clause is insufficient to support an exercise of the national power. That history gives me some pause about today's decision, but I join the Court's opinion with these observations on what I conceive to be its necessary though limited holding....

The theory that two governments accord more liberty than one requires for its realization two distinct and discernable lines of political accountability: one between the citizens and the Federal Government; the second between the citizens and the States. If, as Madison expected, the federal and state governments are to control each other, see The Federalist No. 51, and hold each other in check by competing for the affections of the people, see The Federalist No. 46, those citizens must have some means of knowing which of the two governments to hold accountable for the failure to perform a given function. [Were] the Federal Government to take over the regulation of entire areas of traditional state concern, areas having nothing to do with the regulation of commercial activities, the boundaries between the spheres of federal and state authority would blur and political responsibility would become illusory. The resultant inability to hold either branch of the government answerable to the citizens is more dangerous even than devolving too much authority to the remote central power....

The statute before us upsets the federal balance to a degree that renders it an unconstitutional assertion of the commerce power, and our intervention is required. [In] a sense any conduct in this interdependent world of ours has an ultimate commercial origin or consequence, but we have not yet said the commerce power may reach so far. If Congress attempts that extension, then at the least we must inquire whether the exercise of national power seeks to intrude upon an area of traditional state concern.

An interference of these dimensions occurs here, for it is well established that education is a traditional concern of the States. The proximity to schools, including of course schools owned and operated by the States or their subdivisions, is the very premise for making the conduct criminal. In these circumstances, we have a particular duty to insure that the federal-state balance is not destroyed....

If a State or municipality determines that harsh criminal sanctions are necessary and wise to deter students from carrying guns on school premises, the reserved powers of the States are sufficient to enact those measures. Indeed, over 40 States already have criminal laws outlawing the possession of firearms on or near school grounds.

Other, more practicable means to rid the schools of guns may be thought by the citizens of some States to be preferable for the safety and welfare of the schools those States are charged with maintaining. These might include inducements to inform on violators where the information leads to arrests or confiscation of the guns, programs to encourage the voluntary surrender of guns with some provision for amnesty, penalties imposed on parents or guardians for failure to supervise the child, laws providing for suspension or expulsion of gun-toting students, or programs for expulsion with assignment to special facilities.

The statute now before us forecloses the States from experimenting and exercising their own judgment in an area to which States lay claim by right of history and expertise, and it does so by regulating an activity beyond the realm of commerce in the ordinary and usual sense of that term....

This is not a case where the etiquette of federalism has been violated by a formal command from the National Government directing the State to enact a certain policy, cf. New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144 (1992), or to organize its governmental functions in a certain way. While the intrusion on state sovereignty may not be as severe in this instance as in some of our recent Tenth Amendment cases, the intrusion is nonetheless significant. Absent a stronger connection or identification with commercial concerns that are central to the Commerce Clause, that interference contradicts the federal balance the Framers designed and that this Court is obliged to enforce.

For these reasons, I join in the opinion and judgment of the Court.

JUSTICE THOMAS, concurring....

At the time the original Constitution was ratified, “commerce” consisted of selling, buying, and bartering, as well as transporting for these purposes....

As one would expect, the term “commerce” was used in contradistinction to productive activities such as manufacturing and agriculture. Alexander Hamilton, for example, repeatedly treated commerce, agriculture, and manufacturing as three separate endeavors. See, e.g., The Federalist No. 36, at 224 (referring to “agriculture, commerce, manufactures”)....

[Interjecting] a modern sense of commerce into the Constitution generates significant textual and structural problems. For example, one cannot replace “commerce” with a different type of enterprise, such as manufacturing. When a manufacturer produces a car, assembly cannot take place “with a foreign nation” or “with the Indian Tribes.” Parts may come from different States or other nations and hence may have been in the flow of commerce at one time, but manufacturing takes place at a discrete site. Agriculture and manufacturing involve the production of goods; commerce encompasses traffic in such articles.

Put simply, much if not all of Art. I, §8 (including portions of the Commerce Clause itself) would be surplusage if Congress had been given authority over matters that substantially affect interstate commerce. An interpretation of cl. 3 that makes the rest of §8 superfluous simply cannot be correct. Yet this Court’s Commerce Clause jurisprudence has endorsed just such an interpretation: the power we have accorded Congress has swallowed Art. I, §8....

[The] substantial effects test suffers from the further flaw that it appears to grant Congress a police power over the Nation [because] of its “aggregation principle.” Under so-called “class of activities” statutes, Congress can regulate whole categories of activities that are not themselves either “interstate” or “commerce.” In applying the effects test, we ask whether the class of activities as a whole substantially affects interstate commerce, not whether any specific activity within the class has such effects when considered in isolation.

The aggregation principle is clever, but has no stopping point. Suppose all would agree that gun possession within 1,000 feet of a school does not substantially affect commerce, but that possession of weapons generally [does]. Under our substantial effects doctrine, even though Congress cannot single out gun possession, it can prohibit weapon possession generally. But one always can draw the circle broadly enough to cover an activity that, when taken in isolation, would not have substantial effects on commerce....

JUSTICE STEVENS, dissenting....

Guns are both articles of commerce and articles that can be used to restrain commerce. [The] market for the possession of handguns by school-age children is, distressingly, substantial. Whether or not the national interest in eliminating that market would have justified federal legislation in 1789, it surely does today.

JUSTICE SOUTER, dissenting.

In reviewing congressional legislation under the Commerce Clause, we defer to what is often a merely implicit congressional judgment that its regulation addresses a subject substantially affecting interstate commerce “if there is any rational basis for such a finding.”

The practice of deferring to rationally based legislative judgments “is a paradigm of judicial restraint.” FCC v. Beach Communications, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 314 (1993). In judicial review under the Commerce Clause, it reflects our respect for the institutional competence of the Congress on a subject expressly assigned to it by the Constitution and our appreciation of the legitimacy that comes from Congress’s political accountability in dealing with matters open to a wide range of possible choices....

[Justice Souter reviewed the history of the Court’s commerce clause doctrine.]

There is today [a] backward glance at [the] old pitfalls, as the Court treats deference under the rationality rule as subject to gradation according to the commercial or noncommercial nature of the immediate subject of the challenged regulation. The distinction between what is patently commercial and what is not looks much like the old distinction between what directly affects commerce and what touches it only indirectly. And the act of calibrating the level of deference by drawing a line between what is patently commercial and what is less purely so will probably resemble the process of deciding how much interference with contractual freedom was fatal. Thus, it seems fair to ask whether the step taken by the Court today does anything but portend a return to the untenable jurisprudence from which the Court extricated itself almost 60 years ago. The answer is not reassuring....

Because Justice Breyer’s opinion demonstrates beyond any doubt that the Act in question passes the rationality review that the Court continues to espouse, today’s decision may be seen as only a misstep, its reasoning and its suggestions not quite in gear with the prevailing standard, but hardly an epochal case. I would not argue otherwise, but I would raise a caveat. Not every epochal case has come in epochal trappings. Jones & Laughlin did not reject the direct-indirect standard in so many words; it just said the relation of the regulated subject matter to commerce was direct enough. But we know what happened.

I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE BREYER, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS, JUSTICE SOUTER, and JUSTICE GINSBURG join, dissenting....

I...

[The] Constitution requires us to judge the connection between a regulated activity and interstate commerce, not directly, but at one remove. Courts must give Congress a degree of leeway in determining the existence of a significant factual connection between the regulated activity and interstate commerce—both because the Constitution delegates the commerce power directly to Congress and because the determination requires an empirical judgment of a kind that a legislature is more likely than a court to make with accuracy. The traditional words “rational basis” capture this leeway....

II...

[Could] Congress rationally have found that “violent crime in school zones,” through its effect on the “quality of education,” significantly (or substantially) affects “interstate” or “foreign commerce”? As long as one views the commerce connection, not as a “technical legal conception,” but as “a practical one,” Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U.S. 375, 398 (1905) (Holmes, J.), the answer to this question must be yes. Numerous reports and studies—generated both inside and outside government—make clear that Congress could reasonably have found the empirical connection that its law, implicitly or explicitly, asserts. (See Appendix for a sample of the documentation....)

For one thing, reports, hearings, and other readily available literature make clear that the problem of guns in and around schools is widespread and extremely serious. [Based] on reports such as these, Congress obviously could have thought that guns and learning are mutually exclusive....

Having found that guns in schools significantly undermine the quality of education in our Nation’s classrooms, Congress could also have found, given the effect of education upon interstate and foreign commerce, that gun-related violence in and around schools is a commercial, as well as a human, problem. Education, although far more than a matter of economics, has long been inextricably intertwined with the Nation’s economy....

Finally, there is evidence that, today more than ever, many firms base their location decisions upon the presence, or absence, of a work force with a basic education....

The economic links I have just sketched seem fairly obvious. Why then is it not equally obvious, in light of those links, that a widespread, serious, and substantial physical threat to teaching and learning also substantially threatens the commerce to which that teaching and learning is inextricably tied? That is to say, guns in the hands of six percent of inner-city high school students and gun-related violence throughout a city's schools must threaten the trade and commerce that those schools support. The only question, then, is whether the latter threat is (to use the majority's terminology) "substantial." And, the evidence of (1) the extent of the gun-related violence problem, (2) the extent of the resulting negative effect on classroom learning, and (3) the extent of the consequent negative commercial effects, when taken together, indicate a threat to trade and commerce that is "substantial." At the very least, Congress could rationally have concluded that the links are "substantial."...

To hold this statute constitutional is not to "obliterate" the "distinction of what is national and what is local"; nor is it to hold that the Commerce Clause permits the Federal Government to "regulate any activity that it found was related to the economic productivity of individual citizens," to regulate "marriage, divorce, and child custody," or to regulate any and all aspects of education. For one thing, this statute is aimed at curbing a particularly acute threat to the educational process—the possession (and use) of life-threatening firearms in, or near, the classroom. The empirical evidence that I have discussed above unmistakably documents the special way in which guns and education are incompatible. [For] another thing, the immediacy of the connection between education and the national economic well-being is documented by scholars and accepted by society at large in a way and to a degree that may not hold true for other social institutions. It must surely be the rare case, then, that a statute strikes at conduct that (when considered in the abstract) seems so removed from commerce, but which (practically speaking) has so significant an impact upon commerce....

IV

In sum, to find this legislation within the scope of the Commerce Clause would [interpret] the Clause as this Court has traditionally interpreted it, with the exception of one wrong turn subsequently corrected. Upholding this legislation would do no more than simply recognize that Congress had a "rational basis" for finding a significant connection between guns in or near schools and (through their effect on education) the interstate and foreign commerce they threaten. For these reasons, I would reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

Respectfully, I dissent.

[The Appendix, listing over 160 sources, is omitted.]

UNITED STATES v. MORRISON, 529 U.S. 598 (2000). The Court held the civil remedy provision of the Violence Against Women Act unconstitutional. The statute, enacted in 1994, provided a damage remedy for the victim against any person “who commits a crime of violence motivated by gender.” The statute contains detailed findings, backed up by a substantial legislative history, that “gender-motivated violence affects interstate commerce ‘by deterring potential victims from traveling interstate, from engaging in employment in interstate business, and from transacting with business, and in places involved in interstate commerce.’”

Chief Justice Rehnquist, writing for the same justices who formed the majority in Lopez, wrote that “[gender]-motivated crimes of violence are not [economic] activity. While we need not adopt a categorical rule against aggregating the effects of any noneconomic activity in order to decide these cases, thus far in our Nation’s history our cases have upheld Commerce Clause regulation of intrastate activity only where that activity is economic in nature.” Congress’s findings “are substantially weakened by the fact that they rely so heavily on a method of reasoning that we have already rejected as unworkable if we are to maintain the Constitution’s enumeration of powers. [Given] these findings, [the] concern we expressed in Lopez that Congress might use the Commerce Clause to completely obliterate the Constitution’s distinction between national and local authority seems well-founded. The reasoning [seeks] to follow the but-for causal chain from the initial occurrence of violent crime (the suppression of which has always been the prime object of the States’ police power) to every attenuated effect upon interstate commerce. If accepted, petitioners’ reasoning would allow Congress to regulate any crime as long as the nationwide, aggregated impact of that crime has substantial effects on employment, production, transit, or consumption.” He concluded, “The Constitution requires a distinction between what is truly national and what is truly local. In recognizing this fact we preserve one of the few principles that has been consistent since the Clause was adopted.”

Justice Souter, writing for the four dissenters, observed: “If we now ask why the formalistic economic/noneconomic distinction might matter today, after its rejection in Wickard, the answer is not that the majority fails to see causal connections in an integrated economic world. The answer is that in the minds of the majority there is a new animating theory that makes categorical formalism seem useful again. Just as the old formalism had value in the service of an economic conception, the new one is useful in serving a conception of federalism. It is the instrument by which assertions of national power are to be limited in favor of preserving a supposedly discernible, proper sphere of state autonomy to legislate or refrain from legislating as the individual States see fit.

The legitimacy of the Court's current emphasis on the noncommercial nature of regulated activity, then, does not turn on any logic serving the text of the Commerce Clause or on the realism of the majority's view of the national economy."

Justice Souter's opinion concluded, "[The] practice of such ad hoc review cannot preserve the distinction between the judicial and the legislative, and this Court, in any event, lacks the institutional capacity to maintain such a regime for very long. [The] facts that cannot be ignored today are the facts of integrated national commerce and a political relationship between States and Nation much affected by their respective treasuries and constitutional modifications adopted by the people. The federalism of some earlier time is no more adequate to account for those facts today than the theory of laissez-faire was able to govern the national economy 70 years ago."

Justice Breyer also wrote a dissent. He asked, "Does the local street corner mugger engage in 'economic' activity or 'noneconomic' activity when he mugs for money? Would evidence that desire for economic domination underlies many brutal crimes against women save the present statute? [The] Court itself would permit Congress to aggregate, hence regulate, 'noneconomic' activity taking place at economic establishments. [Can] Congress simply rewrite the present law and limit its application to restaurants, hotels, perhaps universities, and other places of public accommodation? [Can] Congress save the present law by including it, or much of it, in a broader 'Safe Transport' or 'Workplace Safety' act? More important, why should we give critical constitutional importance to the economic, or noneconomic, nature of an interstate-commerce-affecting cause? If chemical emanations through indirect environmental change cause identical, severe commercial harm outside a State, why should it matter whether local factories or home fireplaces release them?" He noted, "[In] a world where most everyday products or their component parts cross interstate boundaries, Congress will frequently find it possible to redraft a statute using language that ties the regulation to the interstate movement of some relevant object, thereby regulating local criminal activity or, for that matter, family affairs. Although this possibility does not give the Federal Government the power to regulate everything, it means that any substantive limitation will apply randomly in terms of the interests the majority seeks to protect. How much would be gained, for example, were Congress to reenact the present law in the form of 'An Act Forbidding Violence Against Women Perpetrated at Public Accommodations or by Those Who Have Moved in, or through the Use of Items that Have Moved in, Interstate Commerce'? Complex Commerce Clause rules creating fine distinctions that achieve only random results do little to further the important federalist interests that called them into being.”

Note: Federalism after the New Deal

1. The values of federalism. Which values of federalism, if any, does Lopez promote? Consider Justice Kennedy’s discussion of alternative modes of regulation. Are any of them incompatible with the federal statute? Does the fact that forty states prohibit guns in schools demonstrate the value of states as laboratories of social experimentation? Why could not Congress conclude on the basis of those experiments that such a criminal prohibition was sound enough policy to be imposed nationwide?

Congress reenacted the Gun Free School Zones Act, modifying the statute to make it a criminal offense to possess a weapon near a school if the weapon has been transported in interstate commerce. (The statute has the same designation, 18 U.S.C. §922(q).) Is the new statute constitutional under Lopez? If so, what values of federalism does Lopez serve? If not, are the criminal statutes Justice Breyer describes unconstitutional?

Consider Shane, Federalism’s “Old Deal”: What’s Right and Wrong with Conservative Judicial Activism, 45 Vill. L. Rev. 201, 221 (2000):

Compare [a] national anti-prostitution statute with a hypothetical federal law purporting to mandate compulsory education in some East Asian language as a prerequisite to high school graduation. The first regulates economic activity and the second not. Yet, the second law is obviously grounded in economic motivations that probably do not animate the first. There is no reason consistent with the Commerce Clause why Congress’ commerce-driven compulsion of Asian language education should be more suspect than its morally driven regulation of prostitution.

Consider these observations about why some matters ought to be left exclusively to state control:

[State] sovereignty over family law preserves the constitutional ideal of citizenship by promoting the development of civic virtue [in] maturing children. Federalism [destroys] the federal government’s power to mold the moral character of future citizens in its own uniform image. [The] communitarian nature of family law requires a level of political engagement and a sense of community identity that lie beyond the reach of national politics. [As] the bonds of community thin out, the danger that shared values will degenerate into governmentally dictated values increases. By situating communitarian politics at the state level, [localism] ensures that the civic participation, political dialogue, and shared values essential to family law will develop within the states' smaller, relatively more accessible political locales. Second, state sovereignty over family law serves to diffuse governmental power over the formation of individual values and moral aspirations. [Localism] promotes diversity [in] the name of preserving citizen choice in matters of family life.

Dailey, Federalism and Families, 143 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1787, 1820, 1871–1872 (1995). To what extent can a parallel argument be made as to education? Consumer protection laws?

2. The doctrine. Is the Court correct in saying that the dissent fails to indicate limits on congressional power? Under the dissent's theory, could Congress prescribe the curriculum to be followed in all public schools? Under the dissent's theory, could Congress require that no divorces be granted when the married couple has children under the age of ten, unless a state court finds that the divorce will have no adverse consequences for the psychological well-being of the children?

3. Wickard revisited. Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1 (2005), upheld the constitutionality of a comprehensive federal ban on the private cultivation and use of marijuana, as applied to marijuana grown at a person's home and intended solely for use by that person or a person for whom the grower was a caretaker, legal under state law, as a medical treatment. Justice Stevens, writing for the Court, cited Wickard for the proposition that "Congress can regulate purely intrastate activity that is not itself 'commercial,' in that it is not produced for sale, if it concludes that failure to regulate that class of activity would undercut the regulation of the interstate market in that commodity." Congress "had a rational basis for concluding [that] the high demand in the interstate market will draw such marijuana into that market."

The marijuana growers pointed to three factual differences between their case and Wickard: The statute in Wickard exempted small farming operations, Wickard "involved a 'quintessential economic activity'—a commercial farm—whereas respondents do not sell marijuana," and the record in Wickard "made it clear that the aggregate production of wheat for use on farms had a significant impact on market prices." The Court concluded that these distinctions were irrelevant. The statutory exemption was a matter of policy discretion that had not affected the substance of Wickard's analysis; the Court did not treat the activity on which Wickard premised his challenge, "the cultivation of wheat for home consumption," as "part of his commercial farming operation," and Congress had made findings that production of marijuana for local use had a significant impact on the national market.

Justice Scalia concurred in the judgment, with a separate opinion emphasizing that the congressional prohibition was constitutionally permissible as a necessary and proper means of executing the power to regulate interstate commerce in marijuana. “The regulation of an intrastate activity may be essential to a comprehensive regulation of interstate commerce even though the intrastate activity does not itself ‘substantially affect’ interstate commerce.”

Justice O’Connor wrote a dissent, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and in large part by Justice Thomas, who also wrote a separate dissent. Justice O’Connor concluded that “[there] is simply no evidence that homegrown medicinal marijuana users constitute, in the aggregate, a sizable enough class to have a discernable, let alone substantial, impact on the national illicit drug market—or otherwise to threaten the [overall regulatory] regime.” On the commerce clause issue, Justice Thomas’s dissent restated his position in Lopez.

After Raich, might the civil remedy provision of the Violence Against Women Act be upheld as an integral part of a larger scheme for regulating safety at educational institutions, places of public accommodations, and workplaces? Note that Justice Breyer in Morrison suggested an analysis along those lines, arguing that the Morrison decision simply counseled Congress to draft its statutes more carefully. How should the Court address a constitutional challenge to a provision enacted “on its own,” but which could be understood either as part of a larger scheme assembled statute-by-statute or as a free-standing statute?

4. The necessary and proper clause and congressional power. United States v. Comstock, 560 U.S. 126 (2010), upheld the constitutionality of a federal statute authorizing the civil commitment of mentally ill, sexually dangerous federal prisoners after the dates they would otherwise be released, finding the statute supported by the necessary and proper clause. Justice Breyer’s opinion for the Court “base[d] this conclusion on five considerations, taken together.” (1) “[In] determining whether the Necessary and Proper Clause grants Congress the legislative authority to enact a particular federal statute, we look to see whether the statute constitutes a means that is rationally related to the implementation of a constitutionally enumerated power.” (2) “[T]he civil-commitment statute before us constitutes a modest addition to a set of federal prison-related mental-health statutes that have existed for many decades. A history of involvement [can] be ‘helpful in reviewing the substance of a congressional statutory scheme,’” (3) “[The] Federal Government is the custodian of its prisoners. As federal custodian, it has the constitutional power to act in order to protect nearby (and other) communities from the danger federal prisoners may pose.” (4) “[The] statute properly accounts for state interests. [It] requires accommodation of state interests,” by requiring that relevant state authorities be informed of the civil commitment and requiring the release from federal custody of those for whom a state is willing to accept responsibility. (5) “[The] links between [the statute] and an enumerated Article I power are not too attenuated. Neither is the statutory provision too sweeping in its scope.”

Justice Kennedy concurred in the result, observing that “[t]he terms ‘rationally related’ and ‘rational basis’ must be employed with care, particularly if either is to be used as a stand-alone test.” Justice Alito also concurred in the result, finding that the statute “is a necessary and proper means of carrying into execution the enumerated powers that support the federal criminal statutes under which the affected prisoners were convicted.”

Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia, dissented. “Must each of the five considerations exist before the Court sustains future federal legislation as proper exercises of Congress’ Necessary and Proper Clause authority? What if the facts of a given case support a finding of only four considerations? Or three? And if three or four will suffice, which three or four are imperative?”

For additional discussion of the necessary and proper clause, see United States v. Kebodeaux, 133 S. Ct. 2496 (2013).

5. Statutory interpretation as an “alternative”? The Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act prohibits the use of “any chemical weapon.” The statute defines a chemical weapon as “[a] toxic chemical,” and defines a toxic chemical as “any chemical which through its chemical action on life processes can cause death, temporary incapacitation or permanent harm to humans or animals. The term includes all such chemicals[.]” In Bond v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 2077 (2014), a defendant was prosecuted under the Act for spreading two chemicals on the car handles and mailbox of a woman who had become pregnant after intercourse with the defendant’s husband. The chemicals “are toxic to humans and, in high enough doses, potentially lethal.” The defendant challenged the constitutionality of the Act. Chief Justice Roberts for a six-person majority did not address the constitutional claims, but held that the Act did not apply to the defendant’s actions. (For a discussion of the constitutional arguments, see page 359, infra.) The majority “doubt[ed] that a treaty about chemical weapons has anything to do with Bond’s conduct.” The statute “must be read consistent with principles of [federalism],” which make it “appropriate to refer to basic principles of federalism [to] resolve ambiguity in a federal statute. In this case, the ambiguity derives from the improbably broad reach of the key statutory definition given the term—‘chemical weapon’—being defined; the deeply serious consequences of adopting such a boundless reading; and the lack of any apparent need to do so in light of the context from which the statute arose—a treaty about chemical warfare and terrorism.” Justices Scalia, Thomas, and Alito each filed separate opinions concurring in the result. Each of them found that the statute covered the alleged conduct, but that it was unconstitutional.

6. “Cuing” Congress. Why did Congress enact the statute in Lopez? Consider the possibility that members of Congress were attempting primarily to claim credit for addressing a problem their constituents cared about, without concern for actually reducing crime. The existence of state statutes addressing the problem suggests little need for a national statute. Could Congress have thought that local enforcement efforts would be inadequate? Should a court be concerned about these issues?

P. Bobbitt, Constitutional Fate 191, 195 (1982), describes a “cuing” function of constitutional decisions. Such decisions remind members of Congress that they must “[judge] their own actions to see if they conform to the limits and restraints placed on them by the Constitution.” Was Lopez an exercise of this cuing function? Was it an appropriate case for exercising it? Given Lopez, was Morrison? Can a decision justified as an exercise of the cuing function properly generate doctrine that the courts should enforce in subsequent cases?

7. The commerce clause after Reconstruction. Should the Court attempt to develop an interpretation of the commerce clause that takes account of subsequent constitutional developments? Consider the argument of Jackson, Holistic Interpretation: Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer and Our Bifurcated Constitution, 53 Stan. L. Rev. 1259 (2001), for a “holistic” interpretation of the Constitution, in which the adoption of the fourteenth amendment (and others) properly should affect the interpretation of the commerce clause. Jackson proposes that where the special concern or “central value” of the Fourteenth and subsequent equality-oriented Amendments is at stake—a concern [with] overcoming barriers to full participation in public life, both economic and political, by groups traditionally disadvantaged by a history of government-sponsored discrimination—the federal government’s powers across the Constitution should be interpreted in light of the now basic constitutional commitment to equality of treatment for all members of the polity.

Id. at 1301–1302. Jackson suggests that this may provide the “articulable limit” the Court seeks on theories that require long chains of causation between the regulated subject and a substantial effect on interstate commerce.

Should we treat the Constitution as an integrated document even though portions were adopted at different times, in the absence of evidence that those who inserted the later portions intended to affect the interpretation of what had been adopted before? Jackson argues that “a sensible reconciliation of constitutionalism (in the sense of precommitment) with democracy is to give greater weight to the constitutional views [of] more contemporary supermajorities as compared with ratifiers who lived many more generations removed.” Id. at 1290.

8. The New Deal legacy in light of Lopez. Consider the argument that the text and the original understanding conflict in Lopez:

There is little doubt that the scope of the powers now exercised by Congress far exceeds that imagined by the framers. They struggled over whether the commerce power included the power to build roads; they wouldn’t have struggled over its power to reach the possession of guns near schools. But [the] language of the Constitution [plainly] supports this expanse of federal power. [As] commerce today seems plainly to reach practically every activity of social life, it would seem to follow that Congress has the power to reach, through regulation, practically every activity of social life.

Lessig, Translating Federalism: United States v. Lopez, 1995 Sup. Ct. Rev. 125, 129–130. Can the original balance between state and nation be restored through interpreting the commerce power?

National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius

567 U.S. 519 (2012)

CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I [and] II.

[Although five justices—the Chief Justice and the joint dissenters—held in the portions of the opinion printed here that the individual mandate could not be justified as an exercise of Congress’s power to regulate interstate commerce, a different majority—the Chief Justice and the four justices who dissented on the commerce clause issue—held that the individual mandate was a constitutionally permissible exercise of Congress’s power to impose taxes. For the opinions discussing that issue, see Chapter 3, section A1, infra.]

Today we resolve constitutional challenges to two provisions of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act of 2010: the individual mandate, which requires individuals to purchase a health insurance policy providing a minimum level of coverage; and the Medicaid expansion, which gives funds to the States on the condition that they provide specified health care to all citizens whose income falls below a certain threshold. [The portions of the Chief Justice's opinion dealing with the Medicaid expansion are excerpted infra, page 319.] We do not consider whether the Act embodies sound policies. That judgment is entrusted to the Nation's elected leaders. We ask only whether Congress has the power under the Constitution to enact the challenged provisions.

In our federal system, the National Government possesses only limited powers; the States and the people retain the remainder. Nearly two centuries ago, Chief Justice Marshall observed that "the question respecting the extent of the powers actually granted" to the Federal Government "is perpetually arising, and will probably continue to arise, as long as our system shall exist." [McCulloch]. In this case we must again determine whether the Constitution grants Congress powers it now asserts, but which many States and individuals believe it does not possess. Resolving this controversy requires us to examine both the limits of the Government's power, and our own limited role in policing those boundaries....

...[Because] the police power is controlled by 50 different States instead of one national sovereign, the facets of governing that touch on citizens' daily lives are normally administered by smaller governments closer to the governed. The Framers thus ensured that powers which "in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people" were held by governments more local and more accountable than a distant federal bureaucracy. The Federalist No. 45. The independent power of the States also serves as a check on the power of the Federal Government: "By denying any one government complete jurisdiction over all the concerns of public life, federalism protects the liberty of the individual from arbitrary power." Bond v. United States, 564 U.S. 211 (2011).

This case concerns two powers that the Constitution does grant the Federal Government, but which must be read carefully to avoid creating a general federal authority akin to the police power. The Constitution authorizes Congress to "regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes."...

The reach of the Federal Government's enumerated powers is broader still because the Constitution authorizes Congress to "make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers." We have long read this provision to give Congress great latitude in exercising its powers: "Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional." [McCulloch].

Our permissive reading of these powers is explained in part by a general reticence to invalidate the acts of the Nation's elected leaders. "Proper respect for a coordinate branch of the government" requires that we strike down an Act of Congress only if "the lack of constitutional authority to pass [the] act in question is clearly demonstrated." United States v. Harris, 106 U.S. 629 (1883). Members of this Court are vested with the authority to interpret the law; we possess neither the expertise nor the prerogative to make policy judgments. Those decisions are entrusted to our Nation's elected leaders, who can be thrown out of office if the people disagree with them. It is not our job to protect the people from the consequences of their political choices.

Our deference in matters of policy cannot, however, become abdication in matters of law. "The powers of the legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken, or forgotten, the constitution is written." [Marbury]. Our respect for Congress's policy judgments thus can never extend so far as to disavow restraints on federal power that the Constitution carefully constructed....

I

In 2010, Congress enacted the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act. [This] case concerns constitutional challenges to two key provisions, commonly referred to as the individual mandate....

The individual mandate requires most Americans to maintain "minimum essential" health insurance coverage. [Editors' summary: Individuals who do not receive coverage through their employers or through government programs and do not purchase coverage from a private insurance company must make a "shared responsibility payment" to the federal government. The payment is based on household income subject to a statutory cap; the payment was estimated at around $700.]...

III...

A

The Government's first argument is that the individual mandate is a valid exercise of Congress's power under the Commerce Clause and the Necessary and Proper Clause. According to the Government, the health care market is characterized by a significant cost-shifting problem. Everyone will eventually need health care at a time and to an extent they cannot predict, but if they do not have insurance, they often will not be able to pay for it. Because state and federal laws nonetheless require hospitals to provide a certain degree of care to individuals without regard to their ability to pay, hospitals end up receiving compensation for only a portion of the services they provide. To recoup the losses, hospitals pass on the cost to insurers through higher rates, and insurers, in turn, pass on the cost to policy holders in the form of higher premiums. Congress estimated that the cost of uncompensated care raises family health insurance premiums, on average, by over $1,000 per year.

In the Affordable Care Act, Congress addressed the problem of those who cannot obtain insurance coverage because of preexisting conditions or other health issues. It did so through the Act's "guaranteed-issue" and "community-rating" provisions. These provisions together prohibit insurance companies from denying coverage to those with such conditions or charging unhealthy individuals higher premiums than healthy individuals.

The guaranteed-issue and community-rating reforms do not, however, address the issue of healthy individuals who choose not to purchase insurance to cover potential health care needs. In fact, the reforms sharply exacerbate that problem, by providing an incentive for individuals to delay purchasing health insurance until they become sick, relying on the promise of guaranteed and affordable coverage. The reforms also threaten to impose massive new costs on insurers, who are required to accept unhealthy individuals but prohibited from charging them rates necessary to pay for their coverage. This will lead insurers to significantly increase premiums on everyone.

The individual mandate was Congress's solution to these problems. By requiring that individuals purchase health insurance, the mandate prevents cost-shifting by those who would otherwise go without it. In addition, the mandate forces into the insurance risk pool more healthy individuals, whose premiums on average will be higher than their health care expenses. This allows insurers to subsidize the costs of covering the unhealthy individuals the reforms require them to accept....

The Government contends that the individual mandate is within Congress's power because the failure to purchase insurance "has a substantial and deleterious effect on interstate commerce" by creating the cost-shifting problem.

Given its expansive scope, it is no surprise that Congress has employed the commerce power in a wide variety of ways to address the pressing needs of the time. But Congress has never attempted to rely on that power to compel individuals not engaged in commerce to purchase an unwanted product.³ Legislative novelty is not necessarily fatal; there is a first time for everything. But sometimes “the most telling indication of [a] severe constitutional problem...is the lack of historical precedent” for Congress’s action. Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Bd., 130 S. Ct. 3138 (2010). At the very least, we should “pause to consider the implications of the Government’s arguments” when confronted with such new conceptions of federal power. [Lopez].

The Constitution grants Congress the power to “regulate Commerce” (emphasis added). The power to regulate commerce presupposes the existence of commercial activity to be regulated. If the power to “regulate” something included the power to create it, many of the provisions in the Constitution would be superfluous [citing Art. I, §8, cl. 5, the power to “coin Money” and to “regulate the Value thereof,” and the powers to “raise and support” armies and make rules for them]. [The] language of the Constitution reflects the natural understanding that the power to regulate assumes there is already something to be regulated.⁴

Our precedent also reflects this understanding. As expansive as our cases construing the scope of the commerce power have been, they all have one thing in common: They uniformly describe the power as reaching “activity.” It is nearly impossible to avoid the word when quoting them. See, e.g., [Lopez; Perez; Wickard; NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp.].

The individual mandate, however, does not regulate existing commercial activity. It instead compels individuals to become active in commerce by purchasing a product, on the ground that their failure to do so affects interstate commerce. Construing the Commerce Clause to permit Congress to regulate individuals precisely because they are doing nothing would open a new and potentially vast domain to congressional authority. Every day individuals do not do an infinite number of things. In some cases they decide not to do something; in others they simply fail to do it. Allowing Congress to justify federal regulation by pointing to the effect of inaction on commerce would bring countless decisions an individual could potentially make within the scope of federal regulation, and—under the Government’s theory—empower Congress to make those decisions for him....

Wickard has long been regarded as “perhaps the most far reaching example of Commerce Clause authority over intrastate activity,” [Lopez], but the Government’s theory in this case would go much further. Under Wickard it is within Congress’s power to regulate the market for wheat by supporting its price. But price can be supported by increasing demand as well as by decreasing supply. The aggregated decisions of some consumers not to purchase wheat have a substantial effect on the price of wheat, just as decisions not to purchase health insurance have on the price of insurance. Congress can therefore command that those not buying wheat do so, just as it argues here that it may command that those not buying health insurance do so. The farmer in Wickard was at least actively engaged in the production of wheat, and the Government could regulate that activity because of its effect on commerce. The Government's theory here would effectively override that limitation, by establishing that individuals may be regulated under the Commerce Clause whenever enough of them are not doing something the Government would have them do.

Indeed, the Government's logic would justify a mandatory purchase to solve almost any problem. To consider a different example in the health care market, many Americans do not eat a balanced diet. [The] failure of that group to have a healthy diet increases health care costs, to a greater extent than the failure of the uninsured to purchase insurance. Those increased costs are borne in part by other Americans who must pay more, just as the uninsured shift costs to the insured. Congress addressed the insurance problem by ordering everyone to buy insurance. Under the Government's theory, Congress could address the diet problem by ordering everyone to buy vegetables.

People, for reasons of their own, often fail to do things that would be good for them or good for society. Those failures—joined with the similar failures of others—can readily have a substantial effect on interstate commerce. Under the Government's logic, that authorizes Congress to use its commerce power to compel citizens to act as the Government would have them act.

That is not the country the Framers of our Constitution envisioned. James Madison explained that the Commerce Clause was “an addition which few oppose and from which no apprehensions are entertained.” The Federalist No. 45. While Congress's authority under the Commerce Clause has of course expanded with the growth of the national economy, our cases have “always recognized that the power to regulate commerce, though broad indeed, has limits.” Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183 (1968). The Government's theory would erode those limits, permitting Congress to reach beyond the natural extent of its authority, “everywhere extending the sphere of its activity and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex.” The Federalist No. 48. Congress already enjoys vast power to regulate much of what we do. Accepting the Government's theory would give Congress the same license to regulate what we do not do, fundamentally changing the relation between the citizen and the Federal Government.

To an economist, perhaps, there is no difference between activity and inactivity; both have measurable economic effects on commerce. But the distinction between doing something and doing nothing would not have been lost on the Framers, who were “practical statesmen,” not metaphysical philosophers. [The] Framers gave Congress the power to regulate commerce, not to compel it, and for over 200 years both our decisions and Congress’s actions have reflected this understanding. There is no reason to depart from that understanding now.

The Government sees things differently. It argues that because sickness and injury are unpredictable but unavoidable, “the uninsured as a class are active in the market for health care, which they regularly seek and obtain.” The individual mandate “merely regulates how individuals finance and pay for that active participation—requiring that they do so through insurance, rather than through attempted self-insurance with the back-stop of shifting costs to others.”

The Government repeats the phrase “active in the market for health care” throughout its brief, but that concept has no constitutional significance. An individual who bought a car two years ago and may buy another in the future is not “active in the car market” in any pertinent sense. The phrase “active in the market” cannot obscure the fact that most of those regulated by the individual mandate are not currently engaged in any commercial activity involving health care, and that fact is fatal to the Government’s effort to “regulate the uninsured as a class.” Our precedents recognize Congress’s power to regulate “class[es] of activities,” [Raich], (emphasis added), not classes of individuals, apart from any activity in which they are engaged.

The individual mandate’s regulation of the uninsured as a class is, in fact, particularly divorced from any link to existing commercial activity. The mandate primarily affects healthy, often young adults who are less likely to need significant health care and have other priorities for spending their money. It is precisely because these individuals, as an actuarial class, incur relatively low health care costs that the mandate helps counter the effect of forcing insurance companies to cover others who impose greater costs than their premiums are allowed to reflect. If the individual mandate is targeted at a class, it is a class whose commercial inactivity rather than activity is its defining feature.

The Government, however, claims that this does not matter. The Government regards it as sufficient to trigger Congress’s authority that almost all those who are uninsured will, at some unknown point in the future, engage in a health care transaction. Asserting that “[t]here is no temporal limitation in the Commerce Clause,” the Government argues that because “[e]veryone subject to this regulation is in or will be in the health care market,” they can be “regulated in advance.”...

Everyone will likely participate in the markets for food, clothing, transportation, shelter, or energy; that does not authorize Congress to direct them to purchase particular products in those or other markets today. The Commerce Clause is not a general license to regulate an individual from cradle to grave, simply because he will predictably engage in particular transactions. Any police power to regulate individuals as such, as opposed to their activities, remains vested in the States....

The Government next contends that Congress has the power under the Necessary and Proper Clause to enact the individual mandate because the mandate is an “integral part of a comprehensive scheme of economic regulation”—the guaranteed-issue and community-rating insurance reforms. Under this argument, it is not necessary to consider the effect that an individual’s inactivity may have on interstate commerce; it is enough that Congress regulate commercial activity in a way that requires regulation of inactivity to be effective.

The power to “make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution” the powers enumerated in the Constitution vests Congress with authority to enact provisions “incidental to the [enumerated] power, and conducive to its beneficial exercise” [McCulloch]. Although the Clause gives Congress authority to “legislate on that vast mass of incidental powers which must be involved in the constitution,” it does not license the exercise of any “great substantive and independent power[s]” beyond those specifically enumerated. Instead, the Clause is “merely a declaration, for the removal of all uncertainty, that the means of carrying into execution those [powers] otherwise granted are included in the grant” (VI Writings of James Madison 383 (G. Hunt ed. 1906)).

As our jurisprudence under the Necessary and Proper Clause has developed, we have been very deferential to Congress’s determination that a regulation is “necessary.” We have thus upheld laws that are “‘convenient, or useful’ or ‘conducive’ to the authority’s ‘beneficial exercise.’” [Comstock]. But we have also carried out our responsibility to declare unconstitutional those laws that undermine the structure of government established by the Constitution. Such laws, which are not “consist[ent] with the letter and spirit of the constitution,” McCulloch, are not “proper [means] for carrying into Execution” Congress’s enumerated powers. Rather, they are, “in the words of The Federalist, ‘merely acts of usurpation’ which ‘deserve to be treated as such.’” [Printz].

Applying these principles, the individual mandate cannot be sustained under the Necessary and Proper Clause as an essential component of the insurance reforms. Each of our prior cases upholding laws under that Clause involved exercises of authority derivative of, and in service to, a granted power. [The] individual mandate, by contrast, vests Congress with the extraordinary ability to create the necessary predicate to the exercise of an enumerated power.

This is in no way an authority that is “narrow in scope” [Comstock], or “incidental” to the exercise of the commerce power [McCulloch]. Rather, such a conception of the Necessary and Proper Clause would work a substantial expansion of federal authority. No longer would Congress be limited to regulating under the Commerce Clause those who by some preexisting activity bring themselves within the sphere of federal regulation. Instead, Congress could reach beyond the natural limit of its authority and draw within its regulatory scope those who otherwise would be outside of it. Even if the individual mandate is “necessary” to the Act’s insurance reforms, such an expansion of federal power is not a “proper” means for making those reforms effective....

The Framers created a Federal Government of limited powers, and assigned to this Court the duty of enforcing those limits. The Court does so today. But the Court does not express any opinion on the wisdom of the Affordable Care Act. Under the Constitution, that judgment is reserved to the people.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit is affirmed in part and reversed in part.

It is so ordered.

The provision of health care is today a concern of national dimension, just as the provision of old-age and survivors’ benefits was in the 1930’s. In the Social Security Act, Congress installed a federal system to provide monthly benefits to retired wage earners and, eventually, to their survivors. Beyond question, Congress could have adopted a similar scheme for health care. Congress chose, instead, to preserve a central role for private insurers and state governments. According to the Chief Justice, the Commerce Clause does not permit that preservation. This rigid reading of the Clause makes scant sense and is stunningly retrogressive.

Since 1937, our precedent has recognized Congress' large authority to set the Nation's course in the economic and social welfare realm. The Chief Justice's crabbed reading of the Commerce Clause harks back to the era in which the Court routinely thwarted Congress' efforts to regulate the national economy in the interest of those who labor to sustain it.

It is a reading that should not have staying power....

B

The large number of individuals without health insurance, Congress found, heavily burdens the national health-care market. [The] cost of emergency care or treatment for a serious illness generally exceeds what an individual can afford to pay on her own. Unlike markets for most products, however, the inability to pay for care does not mean that an uninsured individual will receive no care. Federal and state law, as well as professional obligations and embedded social norms, require hospitals and physicians to provide care when it is most needed, regardless of the patient's ability to pay.

As a consequence, medical-care providers deliver significant amounts of care to the uninsured for which the providers receive no payment....

Health-care providers do not absorb these bad debts. Instead, they raise their prices, passing along the cost of uncompensated care to those who do pay reliably: the government and private insurance companies. In response, private insurers increase their premiums, shifting the cost of the elevated bills from providers onto those who carry insurance. The net result: Those with health insurance subsidize the medical care of those without it. As economists would describe what happens, the uninsured "free ride" on those who pay for health insurance....

[Insurance] companies and health-care providers know that some percentage of healthy, uninsured people will suffer sickness or injury each year and will receive medical care despite their inability to pay. In anticipation of this uncompensated care, health-care companies raise their prices, and insurers their premiums. In other words, because any uninsured person may need medical care at any moment and because health-care companies must account for that risk, every uninsured person impacts the market price of medical care and medical insurance....

States cannot resolve the problem of the uninsured on their own. Like Social Security benefits, a universal health-care system, if adopted by an individual State, would be “bait to the needy and dependent elsewhere, encouraging them to migrate and seek a haven of repose.” Helvering v. Davis, 301 U.S. 619 (1937). An influx of unhealthy individuals into a State with universal health care would result in increased spending on medical services. To cover the increased costs, a State would have to raise taxes, and private health-insurance companies would have to increase premiums. Higher taxes and increased insurance costs would, in turn, encourage businesses and healthy individuals to leave the State.

States that undertake health-care reforms on their own thus risk “placing themselves in a position of economic disadvantage as compared with neighbors or competitors.” [Davis]. Facing that risk, individual States are unlikely to take the initiative in addressing the problem of the uninsured, even though solving that problem is in all States’ best interests. Congress’ intervention was needed to overcome this collective-action impasse.

D

Aware that a national solution was required, Congress could have taken over the health-insurance market by establishing a tax-and-spend federal program like Social Security. Such a program, commonly referred to as a single-payer system (where the sole payer is the Federal Government), would have left little, if any, room for private enterprise or the States. Instead of going this route, Congress enacted the ACA, a solution that retains a robust role for private insurers and state governments. To make its chosen approach work, however, Congress had to use some new tools, including a requirement that most individuals obtain private health insurance coverage. [By] employing these tools, Congress was able to achieve a practical, altogether reasonable, solution....

The minimum coverage provision serves a further purpose vital to Congress’ plan to reduce the number of uninsured. Congress knew that encouraging individuals to purchase insurance would not suffice to solve the problem, because most of the uninsured are not uninsured by choice. Of particular concern to Congress were people who, though desperately in need of insurance, often cannot acquire it: persons who suffer from preexisting medical conditions.

Before the ACA’s enactment, private insurance companies took an applicant’s medical history into account when setting insurance rates or deciding whether to insure an individual. Because individuals with preexisting medical conditions cost insurance companies significantly more than those without such conditions, insurers routinely refused to insure these individuals, charged them substantially higher premiums, or offered only limited coverage that did not include the preexisting illness.

To ensure that individuals with medical histories have access to affordable insurance, Congress devised a three-part solution. First, Congress imposed a “guaranteed issue” requirement, which bars insurers from denying coverage to any person on account of that person’s medical condition or history. Second, Congress required insurers to use “community rating” to price their insurance policies. Community rating, in effect, bars insurance companies from charging higher premiums to those with preexisting conditions.

But these two provisions, Congress comprehended, could not work effectively unless individuals were given a powerful incentive to obtain insurance....

Congress comprehended that guaranteed-issue and community-rating laws alone will not work. When insurance companies are required to insure the sick at affordable prices, individuals can wait until they become ill to buy insurance. Pretty soon, those in need of immediate medical care—i.e., those who cost insurers the most—become the insurance companies’ main customers. This “adverse selection” problem leaves insurers with two choices: They can either raise premiums dramatically to cover their ever-increasing costs or they can exit the market. In the seven States that tried guaranteed-issue and community-rating requirements without a minimum coverage provision, that is precisely what insurance companies did.

Massachusetts, Congress was told, cracked the adverse selection problem. By requiring most residents to obtain insurance, the Commonwealth ensured that insurers would not be left with only the sick as customers. As a result, federal lawmakers observed, Massachusetts succeeded where other States had failed. In coupling the minimum coverage provision with guaranteed-issue and community-rating prescriptions, Congress followed Massachusetts’ lead.

* * *

In sum, Congress passed the minimum coverage provision as a key component of the ACA to address an economic and social problem that has plagued the Nation for decades: the large number of U.S. residents who are unable or unwilling to obtain health insurance. Whatever one thinks of the policy decision Congress made, it was Congress’ prerogative to make it. Reviewed with appropriate deference, the minimum coverage provision, allied to the guaranteed-issue and community-rating prescriptions, should survive measurement under the Commerce and Necessary and Proper Clauses.

II...

Consistent with the Framers' intent, we have repeatedly emphasized that Congress' authority under the Commerce Clause is dependent upon "practical" considerations, including "actual experience." [Jones & Laughlin; Wickard]. We afford Congress the leeway "to undertake to solve national problems directly and realistically." American Power & Light Co. v. SEC, 329 U.S. 90 (1946).

Until today, this Court's pragmatic approach to judging whether Congress validly exercised its commerce power was guided by two familiar principles. First, Congress has the power to regulate economic activities "that substantially affect interstate commerce." [Raich]. This capacious power extends even to local activities that, viewed in the aggregate, have a substantial impact on interstate commerce.

Second, we owe a large measure of respect to Congress when it frames and enacts economic and social legislation. See [Raich]. When appraising such legislation, we ask only (1) whether Congress had a "rational basis" for concluding that the regulated activity substantially affects interstate commerce, and (2) whether there is a "reasonable connection between the regulatory means selected and the asserted ends." [Hodel]. In answering these questions, we presume the statute under review is constitutional and may strike it down only on a "plain showing" that Congress acted irrationally. [Morrison].

Straightforward application of these principles would require the Court to hold that the minimum coverage provision is proper Commerce Clause legislation. Beyond dispute, Congress had a rational basis for concluding that the uninsured, as a class, substantially affect interstate commerce. Those without insurance consume billions of dollars of health-care products and services each year....

The minimum coverage provision, furthermore, bears a "reasonable connection" to Congress' goal of protecting the health-care market from the disruption caused by individuals who fail to obtain insurance. By requiring those who do not carry insurance to pay a toll, the minimum coverage provision gives individuals a strong incentive to insure. This incentive, Congress had good reason to believe, would reduce the number of uninsured and, correspondingly, mitigate the adverse impact the uninsured have on the national health-care market.

Congress also acted reasonably in requiring uninsured individuals, whether sick or healthy, either to obtain insurance or to pay the specified penalty. As earlier observed, because every person is at risk of needing care at any moment, all those who lack insurance, regardless of their current health status, adversely affect the price of health care and health insurance. Moreover, an insurance-purchase requirement limited to those in need of immediate care simply could not work. Insurance companies would either charge these individuals prohibitively expensive premiums, or, if community-rating regulations were in place, close up shop....

[Everyone] will, at some point, consume health-care products and services. Thus, if the Chief Justice is correct that an insurance-purchase requirement can be applied only to those who “actively” consume health care, the minimum coverage provision fits the bill.

The Chief Justice does not dispute that all U.S. residents participate in the market for health services over the course of their lives. But, the Chief Justice insists, the uninsured cannot be considered active in the market for health care, because “[t]he proximity and degree of connection between the [uninsured today] and [their] subsequent commercial activity is too lacking.”

This argument has multiple flaws. First, more than 60% of those without insurance visit a hospital or doctor’s office each year. Nearly 90% will within five years. An uninsured’s consumption of health care is thus quite proximate: It is virtually certain to occur in the next five years and more likely than not to occur this year.

Equally evident, Congress has no way of separating those uninsured individuals who will need emergency medical care today (surely their consumption of medical care is sufficiently imminent) from those who will not need medical services for years to come. No one knows when an emergency will occur, yet emergencies involving the uninsured arise daily. To capture individuals who unexpectedly will obtain medical care in the very near future, then, Congress needed to include individuals who will not go to a doctor anytime soon. Congress, our decisions instruct, has authority to cast its net that wide.⁵

Second, it is Congress’ role, not the Court’s, to delineate the boundaries of the market the Legislature seeks to regulate. The Chief Justice defines the health-care market as including only those transactions that will occur either in the next instant or within some (unspecified) proximity to the next instant. But Congress could reasonably have viewed the market from a long-term perspective, encompassing all transactions virtually certain to occur over the next decade, not just those occurring here and now....

Our decisions [acknowledge] Congress' authority, under the Commerce Clause, to direct the conduct of an individual today (the farmer in Wickard, stopped from growing excess wheat; the plaintiff in Raich, ordered to cease cultivating marijuana) because of a prophesied future transaction (the eventual sale of that wheat or marijuana in the interstate market). Congress' actions are even more rational in this case, where the future activity (the consumption of medical care) is certain to occur, the sole uncertainty being the time the activity will take place.

Maintaining that the uninsured are not active in the health-care market, the Chief Justice draws an analogy to the car market. An individual "is not 'active in the car market,'" the Chief Justice observes, simply because he or she may someday buy a car. The analogy is inapt. The inevitable yet unpredictable need for medical care and the guarantee that emergency care will be provided when required are conditions nonexistent in other markets. That is so of the market for cars, and of the market for broccoli as well. Although an individual might buy a car or a crown of broccoli one day, there is no certainty she will ever do so. And if she eventually wants a car or has a craving for broccoli, she will be obliged to pay at the counter before receiving the vehicle or nourishment. She will get no free ride or food, at the expense of another consumer forced to pay an inflated price. Upholding the minimum coverage provision on the ground that all are participants or will be participants in the health-care market would therefore carry no implication that Congress may justify under the Commerce Clause a mandate to buy other products and services.

Nor is it accurate to say that the minimum coverage provision "compel[s] individuals...to purchase an unwanted product" or "suite of products." If unwanted today, medical service secured by insurance may be desperately needed tomorrow. Virtually everyone, I reiterate, consumes health care at some point in his or her life. Health insurance is a means of paying for this care, nothing more. In requiring individuals to obtain insurance, Congress is therefore not mandating the purchase of a discrete, unwanted product. Rather, Congress is merely defining the terms on which individuals pay for an interstate good they consume: Persons subject to the mandate must now pay for medical care in advance (instead of at the point of service) and through insurance (instead of out of pocket). Establishing payment terms for goods in or affecting interstate commerce is quintessential economic regulation well within Congress' domain.

The Chief Justice also calls the minimum coverage provision an illegitimate effort to make young, healthy individuals subsidize insurance premiums paid by the less hale and hardy. This complaint, too, is spurious. Under the current health-care system, healthy persons who lack insurance receive a benefit for which they do not pay: They are assured that, if they need it, emergency medical care will be available, although they cannot afford it. Those who have insurance bear the cost of this guarantee. By requiring the healthy uninsured to obtain insurance or pay a penalty structured as a tax, the minimum coverage provision ends the free ride these individuals currently enjoy.

In the fullness of time, moreover, today's young and healthy will become society's old and infirm. Viewed over a lifespan, the costs and benefits even out: The young who pay more than their fair share currently will pay less than their fair share when they become senior citizens. And even if, as undoubtedly will be the case, some individuals, over their lifespans, will pay more for health insurance than they receive in health services, they have little to complain about, for that is how insurance works. Every insured person receives protection against a catastrophic loss, even though only a subset of the covered class will ultimately need that protection.

In any event, the Chief Justice's limitation of the commerce power to the regulation of those actively engaged in commerce finds no home in the text of the Constitution or our decisions....

[In] separating the power to regulate from the power to bring the subject of the regulation into existence, the Chief Justice asserts, “[t]he language of the Constitution reflects the natural understanding that the power to regulate assumes there is already something to be regulated.”

This argument is difficult to fathom. Requiring individuals to obtain insurance unquestionably regulates the interstate health-insurance and health-care markets, both of them in existence well before the enactment of the ACA. Thus, the “something to be regulated” was surely there when Congress created the minimum coverage provision....

In concluding that the Commerce Clause does not permit Congress to regulate commercial “inactivity,” and therefore does not allow Congress to adopt the practical solution it devised for the health-care problem, the Chief Justice views the Clause as a “technical legal conception,” precisely what our case law tells us not to do. [Wickard]. This Court’s former endeavors to impose categorical limits on the commerce power have not fared well....

These line-drawing exercises were untenable, and the Court long ago abandoned them. “[Q]uestions of the power of Congress [under the Commerce Clause]," we held in Wickard, "are not to be decided by reference to any formula which would give controlling force to nomenclature such as 'production' and 'indirect' and foreclose consideration of the actual effects of the activity in question upon interstate commerce." Failing to learn from this history, the Chief Justice plows ahead with his formalistic distinction between those who are "active in commerce," and those who are not.

It is not hard to show the difficulty courts (and Congress) would encounter in distinguishing statutes that regulate "activity" from those that regulate "inactivity." [An] individual who opts not to purchase insurance from a private insurer can be seen as actively selecting another form of insurance: self-insurance. The minimum coverage provision could therefore be described as regulating activists in the self-insurance market.⁷ Wickard is another example. Did the statute there at issue target activity (the growing of too much wheat) or inactivity (the farmer's failure to purchase wheat in the marketplace)? If anything, the Court's analysis suggested the latter....

Underlying the Chief Justice's view that the Commerce Clause must be confined to the regulation of active participants in a commercial market is a fear that the commerce power would otherwise know no limits. The joint dissenters express a similar apprehension. This concern is unfounded.

First, the Chief Justice could certainly uphold the individual mandate without giving Congress carte blanche to enact any and all purchase mandates. As several times noted, the unique attributes of the health-care market render everyone active in that market and give rise to a significant free-riding problem that does not occur in other markets.

Nor would the commerce power be unbridled, absent the Chief Justice's "activity" limitation. Congress would remain unable to regulate noneconomic conduct that has only an attenuated effect on interstate commerce and is traditionally left to state law....

An individual's decision to self-insure, I have explained, is an economic act with the requisite connection to interstate commerce. Other choices individuals make are unlikely to fit the same or similar description. As an example of the type of regulation he fears, the Chief Justice cites a Government mandate to purchase green vegetables. One could call this concern "the broccoli horrible."...

Consider the chain of inferences the Court would have to accept to conclude that a vegetable-purchase mandate was likely to have a substantial effect on the health-care costs borne by lithe Americans. The Court would have to believe that individuals forced to buy vegetables would then eat them (instead of throwing or giving them away), would prepare the vegetables in a healthy way (steamed or raw, not deep-fried), would cut back on unhealthy foods, and would not allow other factors (such as lack of exercise or little sleep) to trump the improved diet.⁹ Such “pil[ing of] inference upon inference” is just what the Court refused to do in Lopez and Morrison....

Supplementing these legal restraints is a formidable check on congressional power: the democratic process. As the controversy surrounding the passage of the Affordable Care Act attests, purchase mandates are likely to engender political resistance. This prospect is borne out by the behavior of state legislators. Despite their possession of unquestioned authority to impose mandates, state governments have rarely done so.

When contemplated in its extreme, almost any power looks dangerous. The commerce power, hypothetically, would enable Congress to prohibit the purchase and home production of all meat, fish, and dairy goods, effectively compelling Americans to eat only vegetables. Yet no one would offer the “hypothetical and unreal possibil[y],” Pullman Co. v. Knott, 235 U.S. 23 (1914), of a vegetarian state as a credible reason to deny Congress the authority ever to ban the possession and sale of goods. The Chief Justice accepts just such specious logic when he cites the broccoli horrible as a reason to deny Congress the power to pass the individual mandate.

To bolster his argument that the minimum coverage provision is not valid Commerce Clause legislation, the Chief Justice emphasizes the provision’s novelty. While an insurance-purchase mandate may be novel, the Chief Justice’s argument certainly is not. “[I]n almost every instance of the exercise of the [commerce] power differences are asserted from previous exercises of it and made a ground of attack.” Hoke v. United States, 227 U.S. 308 (1913). For decades, the Court has declined to override legislation because of its novelty, and for good reason. As our national economy grows and changes, we have recognized, Congress must adapt to the changing “economic and financial realities.” Hindering Congress’ ability to do so is shortsighted; if history is any guide, today’s constriction of the Commerce Clause will not endure.

A...

The Necessary and Proper Clause “empowers Congress to enact laws in effectuation of its [commerce] powe[r] that are not within its authority to enact in isolation.” [Raich] (Scalia, J., concurring in judgment)....

Recall that one of Congress’ goals in enacting the Affordable Care Act was to eliminate the insurance industry’s practice of charging higher prices or denying coverage to individuals with preexisting medical conditions. The commerce power allows Congress to ban this practice, a point no one disputes.

Congress knew, however, that simply barring insurance companies from relying on an applicant’s medical history would not work in practice. Without the individual mandate, Congress learned, guaranteed-issue and community-rating requirements would trigger an adverse-selection death-spiral in the health-insurance market: Insurance premiums would skyrocket, the number of uninsured would increase, and insurance companies would exit the market. When complemented by an insurance mandate, on the other hand, guaranteed issue and community rating would work as intended, increasing access to insurance and reducing uncompensated care. The minimum coverage provision is thus an “essential par[t] of a larger regulation of economic activity”; without the provision, “the regulatory scheme [w]ould be undercut.” [Raich]. Put differently, the minimum coverage provision, together with the guaranteed-issue and community-rating requirements, is “‘reasonably adapted’ to the attainment of a legitimate end under the commerce power”: the elimination of pricing and sales practices that take an applicant’s medical history into account.

In failing to explain why the individual mandate threatens our constitutional order, the Chief Justice disserves future courts....

It is more than exaggeration to suggest that the minimum coverage provision improperly intrudes on “essential attributes of state sovereignty.” First, the Affordable Care Act does not operate “in [an] area such as criminal law enforcement or education where States historically have been sovereign.” [Lopez]. [The] Federal Government plays a lead role in the health-care sector, both as a direct payer and as a regulator.

Second, [the] minimum coverage provision, along with other provisions of the ACA, addresses the very sort of interstate problem that made the commerce power essential in our federal system. The crisis created by the large number of U.S. residents who lack health insurance is one of national dimension that States are “separately incompetent” to handle. Far from trampling on States’ sovereignty, the ACA attempts a federal solution for the very reason that the States, acting separately, cannot meet the need. Notably, the ACA serves the general welfare of the people of the United States while retaining a prominent role for the States.¹¹ ...

JUSTICE SCALIA, JUSTICE KENNEDY, JUSTICE THOMAS, and JUSTICE ALITO, dissenting....

[Whatever] may be the conceptual limits upon the Commerce Clause, [they] cannot be such as will enable the Federal Government to regulate all private conduct and to compel the States to function as administrators of federal programs.

That clear principle carries the day here. The striking case of Wickard v. Filburn [always] has been regarded as the ne plus ultra of expansive Commerce Clause jurisprudence. To go beyond that, and to say the failure to grow wheat (which is not an economic activity, or any activity at all) nonetheless affects commerce and therefore can be federally regulated, is to make mere breathing in and out the basis for federal prescription and to extend federal power to virtually all human activity....

I

THE INDIVIDUAL MANDATE

...If [the individual mandate] “regulates” anything, it is the failure to maintain minimum essential coverage. One might argue that it regulates that failure by requiring it to be accompanied by payment of a penalty. But that failure—that abstention from commerce—is not “Commerce.” To be sure, purchasing insurance is “Commerce”; but one does not regulate commerce that does not exist by compelling its existence.

In Gibbons v. Ogden, Chief Justice Marshall wrote that the power to regulate commerce is the power “to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed.” That understanding is consistent with the original meaning of “regulate” at the time of the Constitution’s ratification, when “to regulate” meant “[t]o adjust by rule, method or established mode,” 2 N. Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language (1828); “[t]o adjust by rule or method,” 2 S. Johnson, A Dictionary of the English Language (7th ed. 1785); “[t]o adjust, to direct according to rule,” 2 J. Ash, New and Complete Dictionary of the English Language (1775); “to put in order, set to rights, govern or keep in order,” T. Dyche & W. Pardon, A New General English Dictionary (16th ed. 1777). It can mean to direct the manner of something but not to direct that something come into being. There is no instance in which this Court or Congress (or anyone else, to our knowledge) has used “regulate” in that peculiar fashion....

We do not doubt that the buying and selling of health insurance contracts is commerce generally subject to federal regulation. But when Congress provides that (nearly) all citizens must buy an insurance contract, it goes beyond “adjust[ing] by rule or method,” or “direct[ing] according to rule”; it directs the creation of commerce....

A...

The Government presents the Individual Mandate as a unique feature of a complicated regulatory scheme governing many parties with countervailing incentives that must be carefully balanced. Congress has imposed an extensive set of regulations on the health insurance industry, and compliance with those regulations will likely cost the industry a great deal. If the industry does not respond by increasing premiums, it is not likely to survive. And if the industry does increase premiums, then there is a serious risk that its products—insurance plans—will become economically undesirable for many and prohibitively expensive for the rest.

This is not a dilemma unique to regulation of the health-insurance industry. Government regulation typically imposes costs on the regulated industry—especially regulation that prohibits economic behavior in which most market participants are already engaging, such as “piecing out” the market by selling the product to different classes of people at different prices (in the present context, providing much lower insurance rates to young and healthy buyers). And many industries so regulated face the reality that, without an artificial increase in demand, they cannot continue on. When Congress is regulating these industries directly, it enjoys the broad power to enact “all appropriate legislation” to “protec[t]” and “advanc[e]” commerce, [NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp.]. Thus, Congress might protect the imperiled industry by prohibiting low-cost competition, or by according it preferential tax treatment, or even by granting it a direct subsidy.

Here, however, Congress has impressed into service third parties, healthy individuals who could be but are not customers of the relevant industry, to offset the undesirable consequences of the regulation. Congress’ desire to force these individuals to purchase insurance is motivated by the fact that they are further removed from the market than unhealthy individuals with pre-existing conditions, because they are less likely to need extensive care in the near future. If Congress can reach out and command even those furthest removed from an interstate market to participate in the market, then the Commerce Clause becomes a font of unlimited power, or in Hamilton's words, "the hideous monster whose devouring jaws...spare neither sex nor age, nor high nor low, nor sacred nor profane." The Federalist No. 33.

At the outer edge of the commerce power, this Court has insisted on careful scrutiny of regulations that do not act directly on an interstate market or its participants....[The] lesson of these cases is that the Commerce Clause, even when supplemented by the Necessary and Proper Clause, is not carte blanche for doing whatever will help achieve the ends Congress seeks by the regulation of commerce....

With the present statute, [there] are many ways other than this unprecedented Individual Mandate by which the regulatory scheme's goals of reducing insurance premiums and ensuring the profitability of insurers could be achieved. For instance, those who did not purchase insurance could be subjected to a surcharge when they do enter the health insurance system. Or they could be denied a full income tax credit given to those who do purchase the insurance....

The Government's second theory in support of the Individual Mandate is that §5000A is valid because it is actually a "regulat[ion of] activities having a substantial relation to interstate commerce,...i.e.,...activities that substantially affect interstate commerce." This argument takes a few different forms, but the basic idea is that §5000A regulates "the way in which individuals finance their participation in the health-care market." That is, the provision directs the manner in which individuals purchase health care services and related goods (directing that they be purchased through insurance) and is therefore a straightforward exercise of the commerce power.

The primary problem with this argument is that §5000A does not apply only to persons who purchase all, or most, or even any, of the health care services or goods that the mandated insurance covers. Indeed, the main objection many have to the Mandate is that they have no intention of purchasing most or even any of such goods or services and thus no need to buy insurance for those purchases. The Government responds that the health-care market involves "essentially universal participation." The principal difficulty with this response is that it is, in the only relevant sense, not true. It is true enough that everyone consumes "health care," if the term is taken to include the purchase of a bottle of aspirin. But the health care "market" that is the object of the Individual Mandate not only includes but principally consists of goods and services that the young people primarily affected by the Mandate do not purchase. They are quite simply not participants in that market, and cannot be made so (and thereby subjected to regulation) by the simple device of defining participants to include all those who will, later in their lifetime, probably purchase the goods or services covered by the mandated insurance. Such a definition of market participants is unprecedented, and were it to be a premise for the exercise of national power, it would have no principled limits.

In a variation on this attempted exercise of federal power, the Government points out that Congress in this Act has purported to regulate “economic and financial decision[s] to forego [sic] health insurance coverage and [to] attempt to self-insure,” since those decisions have “a substantial and deleterious effect on interstate commerce.” But as the discussion above makes clear, the decision to forgo participation in an interstate market is not itself commercial activity (or indeed any activity at all) within Congress’ power to regulate. It is true that, at the end of the day, it is inevitable that each American will affect commerce and become a part of it, even if not by choice. But if every person comes within the Commerce Clause power of Congress to regulate by the simple reason that he will one day engage in commerce, the idea of a limited Government power is at an end.

Wickard v. Filburn has been regarded as the most expansive assertion of the commerce power in our history. A close second is Perez v. United States. [Both] of those cases, however, involved commercial activity. To go beyond that, and to say that the failure to grow wheat or the refusal to make loans affects commerce, so that growing and lending can be federally compelled, is to extend federal power to virtually everything. All of us consume food, and when we do so the Federal Government can prescribe what its quality must be and even how much we must pay. But the mere fact that we all consume food and are thus, sooner or later, participants in the “market” for food, does not empower the Government to say when and what we will buy. That is essentially what this Act seeks to do with respect to the purchase of health care. It exceeds federal power.

A few respectful responses to Justice Ginsburg’s dissent on the issue of the Mandate are in order. That dissent duly recites the test of Commerce Clause power that our opinions have applied, but disregards the premise the test contains. It is true enough that Congress needs only a “rational basis” for concluding that the regulated activity substantially affects interstate commerce” (emphasis added). But it must be activity affecting commerce that is regulated, and not merely the failure to engage in commerce. [Ultimately] the dissent is driven to saying that there is really no difference between action and inaction, a proposition that has never recommended itself, neither to the law nor to common sense. To say, for example, that the inaction here consists of activity in “the self-insurance market” seems to us wordplay. By parity of reasoning the failure to buy a car can be called participation in the non-private-car-transportation market. Commerce becomes everything....

The dissent’s exposition of the wonderful things the Federal Government has achieved through exercise of its assigned powers, such as “the provision of old-age and survivors’ benefits” in the Social Security Act, is quite beside the point. The issue here is whether the federal government can impose the Individual Mandate through the Commerce Clause. And the relevant history is not that Congress has achieved wide and wonderful results through the proper exercise of its assigned powers in the past, but that it has never before used the Commerce Clause to compel entry into commerce. The dissent treats the Constitution as though it is an enumeration of those problems that the Federal Government can address—among which, it finds, is “the Nation’s course in the economic and social welfare realm,” and more specifically “the problem of the uninsured.” The Constitution is not that. It enumerates not federally soluble problems, but federally available powers. The Federal Government can address whatever problems it wants but can bring to their solution only those powers that the Constitution confers, among which is the power to regulate commerce. None of our cases say anything else. Article I contains no whatever-it-takes-to-solve-a-national-problem power.

The dissent dismisses the conclusion that the power to compel entry into the health-insurance market would include the power to compel entry into the new-car or broccoli markets. [The] differences [identified in the dissent] make a very good argument by the dissent’s own lights, since they show that the failure to purchase health insurance, unlike the failure to purchase cars or broccoli, creates a national, social-welfare problem that is (in the dissent’s view) included among the unenumerated “problems” that the Constitution authorizes the Federal Government to solve. But those differences do not show that the failure to enter the health-insurance market, unlike the failure to buy cars and broccoli, is an activity that Congress can “regulate.” (Of course one day the failure of some of the public to purchase American cars may endanger the existence of domestic automobile manufacturers; or the failure of some to eat broccoli may be found to deprive them of a newly discovered cancer-fighting chemical which only that food contains, producing health-care costs that are a burden on the rest of us—in which case, under the theory of Justice Ginsburg’s dissent, moving against those inactivities will also come within the Federal Government's unenumerated problem-solving powers.)...

[Having concluded that the individual-mandate provision was unconstitutional, the dissenters considered whether the Act's other provisions were severable from the mandate (and the Medicaid expansion). They concluded that they were inseverable.]

For the reasons here stated, we would find the Act invalid in its entirety. We respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE THOMAS, dissenting.

[The] joint dissent and the Chief Justice correctly apply our precedents to conclude that the Individual Mandate is beyond the power granted to Congress under the Commerce Clause and the Necessary and Proper Clause. [I] adhere to my view that "the very notion of a 'substantial effects' test under the Commerce Clause is inconsistent with the original understanding of Congress' powers and with this Court's early Commerce Clause cases." [Morrison]. [The] Court's continued use of that test "has encouraged the Federal Government to persist in its view that the Commerce Clause has virtually no limits." [Morrison]. The Government's unprecedented claim in this suit that it may regulate not only economic activity but also inactivity that substantially affects interstate commerce is a case in point.

Note: Activity and Inactivity

1. Labeling the opinions. Note that the joint opinion of Justices Scalia, Kennedy, Thomas, and Alito is referred to by all the Justices as a "dissent," even though its authors' positions on the constitutionality of the individual mandate (and the Medicaid expansion, infra page 319) are needed to constitute a majority holding on those two issues.

2. The economics of health insurance. The government argued that the market for health insurance differed from the market for broccoli or automobiles because of the problems of moral hazard and adverse selection. Consider the case of a healthy young person who does not currently need health care. She then becomes ill or injured in an accident. With guaranteed issue and community rating, she can immediately purchase health insurance to cover the costs of her health care. Those costs will almost inevitably be larger than the regulated cost of health-care insurance. The adverse selection problem is that only those currently needing health care will purchase health insurance, thereby driving the cost of insurance up; the moral hazard problem is that the person who buys insurance only when health care is needed similarly drives the cost of insurance up. Most economists would assert that the markets for broccoli and automobiles do not have those characteristics. If they are right, should that affect the constitutional analysis?

3. The characterization issue. If Congress lacks the power to regulate “inactivity,” everything turns on the characterization of the regulatory target as “action” or “inaction.” The Chief Justice and the joint dissent reject the characterization of the regulatory target as “participating in the self-insurance market.” Are there other possible characterizations? Consider characterizing the target as “voluntarily participating in activities that expose a person to the risk of illness or injury.” Could “refusing to provide restaurant service to African Americans” be characterized as inaction rather than action? On what basis can the choice of characterizations be made?

4. Activity and inactivity. What rationales do the Chief Justice and the joint dissent offer for supplementing the distinction between commercial and noncommercial activity with the distinction between activity and inactivity? Recall as well the older distinction between direct and indirect regulations of commerce.

5. “Proximity” and the commerce clause. Justice Ginsburg quotes the Chief Justice’s discussion of the proximity between a failure to act and subsequent action. Is that discussion persuasive? Is “proximity” a temporal or a conceptual category? Consider Justice Ginsburg’s response to the “broccoli” hypothetical. Should her analysis be cast in terms of the commerce clause or as a general requirement that government action be reasonable? With respect to both proximity and reasonableness, are courts well positioned to make such determinations?

6. The “antinovelty” principle. Relying on NFIB and Printz (discussed in Section III-C below), Katyal & Schmidt, Active Avoidance: The Modern Supreme Court and Legal Change, 128 Harv. L. Rev. 2109, 2139-2149 (2015), discuss the emergence of an “antinovelty” doctrine, according to which “a law without historical precedent is constitutionally suspect.” What grounds might there be for such a doctrine? If the exercise of the asserted power is “attractive” in principle, perhaps the fact that Congress in the past refrained from seeking to justify statutes with reference to the power might be taken as evidence of a congressional understanding that the Constitution did not in fact confer the power on it. Yet, if the problem Congress addresses is itself novel, why should novelty in the exercise of an enumerated power count against constitutionality, in a Constitution designed to endure for ages to come, as McCulloch v. Maryland put it? Katyal and Schmidt argue that the antinovelty principle is inconsistent with the presumption of constitutionality because it places the burden on the government to justify the exercise of congressional power. Id. at 2139-2140. Note that whether an exercise of power counts as novel will depend on the specificity with which the exercise is described.

(In United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675 (2013), Justice Kennedy's opinion for the Court observed that the Defense of Marriage Act, held unconstitutional on equal protection grounds, was "an unusual deviation from the usual tradition of recognizing and accepting state definitions of marriage[, which] is strong evidence of a law having the purpose and effect of disapproval of that class." That "purpose and effect" were what rendered the statute unconstitutional as a violation of equality. Windsor is excerpted at greater length in Chapter 6.)

7. Why search for limits? Rosen & Schmidt, Why Broccoli?: Limiting Principles and Popular Constitutionalism in the Health Care Case, 61 UCLA L. Rev. 66, 70, 71 (2013), argue that "a survey of constitutional history shows that when confronted with novel constitutional questions, the Court almost always declines to provide limiting principles that define the metes and bounds of the constitutional power or right at issue. Instead, [it] typically answers the question in a narrow [fashion] that analyzes [the] constitutionality of only the governmental action that is before the Court. Indeed, the Court typically avoids any attempt at identifying a limiting principle until it has considered the constitutional question many times, and not infrequently it declines to ever identify a limiting principle." Rosen and Schmidt connect the case to ideas about popular constitutionalism, and argue that the NFIB Court sought a limiting principle even though the constitutional question was novel because "popular constitutional demands [structured] public expectations about the stakes of the ACA challenge to such a degree that it would have been notable had the Court chosen not to go beyond the facts of the case to engage with the limits of congressional power."

For a collection of essays on NFIB, see Persily, Metzger, & Morrison, eds., The Health Care Case: The Supreme Court's Decision and Its Implications (2013).

Note: Observations on Court-Imposed Limitations on Congress's Powers

Over its history, the Court has sporadically attempted to enforce federalism-

based limitations on Congress's power. It has repeatedly abandoned those efforts after a time, only to revive them a while later. What accounts for this pattern? Consider the proposition that the Court has from time to time forgotten what the Constitution means. But did it forget during the periods of enforcement or of nonenforcement of such limits?

D. STATE REGULATION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE

Since the early years of constitutional adjudication, the Supreme Court has asserted the authority to invalidate state and local laws that the Court finds to interfere improperly with interstate and foreign commerce. When it invalidates state laws for this reason, it says that the commerce clause has been violated (even though the commerce clause, by its terms, is only a grant of power to Congress, not a restriction on state power). This chapter deals with two major problems: (1) What is the source of the Court's authority in this area (the primary subject of section D1), and (2) what are the criteria for determining when a state or local law improperly interferes with interstate commerce (the primary subject of the remainder of the section)?

1. The Fundamental Framework

Note: The Classical View

1. The vices of “protectionism.” The framers were concerned that states would erect barriers to trade in order to protect the economic activities of local residents. Protectionism may impede economic development by making it more difficult for goods and capital to move to places where they are more valued. It also may impair the development of a sense of national unity. These two vices of protectionism may have different implications for the constitutional scheme. Regardless of the reasons for their creation, barriers to trade impede economic development. But they need not impair national unity if out-of-state residents understand that the barriers were created to further important local goals unrelated to the suppression of free trade.

The materials that follow address several aspects of the vices of protectionism: (a) Whatever free trade norms the Constitution embodies, which branch—Congress or the courts—should enforce them? (b) How can protectionist legislation be identified? Some statutes apply one rule to economic activity originating locally and another to activity originating elsewhere. Are all such statutes protectionist? Other statutes have a disparate impact on local and out-of-state trade. When should they be characterized as protectionist? Will the degree of the disparate impact matter? Still other statutes erect barriers to trade without regard to where the activity originates. Should such statutes ever be considered protectionist or otherwise constitutionally suspect?

2. Exclusive congressional power? In Gibbons v. Ogden, section B supra, Chief Justice Marshall found “great force” in an argument made in Justice Johnson’s concurrence, that Congress’s power to regulate interstate commerce was exclusive—that is, that the Constitution necessarily withdrew that power from the states. Under this view, the states lacked power to enact laws that regulated interstate commerce, and the courts could invalidate any such laws on the ground that they exceeded the states’ authority in our federal system.

The exclusive power argument was troublesome for practical reasons because if Congress’s power were exclusive, the states could not act, even if Congress has failed to act. (Note that the acceptability of the “exclusive power” argument may turn on the scope one gives to the affirmative grant of power to Congress.) If some regulation is thought appropriate, the “exclusive power” argument may go too far in insisting that the regulation always derive from Congress.

Difficulties with the breadth of the “exclusive power” argument led the Court to develop a number of doctrines designed to limit it.

a. Purpose. In Gibbons, Justice Johnson coupled his “exclusive power” argument with the contention that Congress was granted the power to regulate interstate commerce only to achieve commercial ends. It followed that the states lacked power only insofar as they sought to achieve similar ends, such as the protection of local enterprises from out-of-state competition, but not insofar as they exercised their general “police” powers, those designed to promote the health and safety of their citizens. This limitation requires the Court to distinguish between statutes designed to serve commercial goals and those designed to serve police power ones; determining the legislature’s purpose in light of the impact of its actions may be quite difficult.

b. Direct/indirect. DiSanto v. Pennsylvania, 273 U.S. 34 (1927), invalidated a licensing statute for those wishing to sell tickets for transportation to or from foreign countries. The state argued that the statute was designed to prevent exploitation of recent immigrants who wished to purchase tickets for relatives still in Europe; before the licensing scheme was adopted, some ticket agents had required the immigrants to make payments into an account with the agents, who would not purchase the tickets until full payment had been made. The majority, noting that “Congress has complete and paramount authority to regulate foreign commerce and [to] protect the public against [frauds,]” stated that a “statute which by its necessary operation directly interferes with or burdens foreign commerce is a prohibited regulation and invalid, regardless of the purpose with which it was passed. Such legislation cannot be sustained as an exertion of the police power of the State to prevent possible fraud.” Justice Stone’s dissent called the “direct/indirect” test “too mechanical, too uncertain in its application, and too remote from actualities to be of value.” For a modern application of the directness test, see Brown-Forman Distillers Corp. v. New York State Liquor Authority, 476 U.S. 573 (1986).

c. Inherently local/national. Cooley v. Board of Port Wardens, 53 U.S. (12 How.) 299 (1852), involved a Pennsylvania law, adopted in 1803, requiring all ships entering or leaving the port of Philadelphia to use a local pilot or pay a fine into a fund to support retired pilots and their dependents. The Court agreed that the regulation of pilots was a regulation of interstate commerce, even though pilots stayed with the ships for only brief periods. It upheld the statute:

[The] power to regulate commerce, embraces a vast field, containing not only many, but exceedingly various subjects, quite unlike in their nature; some imperatively demanding a single uniform rule, operating equally on the commerce of the United States in every port; and some, like the subject now in question, as imperatively demanding that diversity, which alone can meet the local necessities of navigation.

Either absolutely to affirm, or to deny that the nature of this power requires exclusive legislation by Congress, is to lose sight of the nature of the subjects of this power, and to assert concerning all of them, what is really applicable but to a part. Whatever subjects of this power are in their nature national, or admit only of one uniform system [may] justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. That this cannot be affirmed of laws for the regulation of [pilotage] is clear.

As you study the modern cases, note the extent to which intuitions or express judgments about (a) the “national versus local” nature of the problem, (b) the “commercial versus police powers” purposes of the regulation, and (c) the directness of the effect on interstate commerce appear to influence outcomes and doctrinal formulations. Eventually the Court abandoned the classical framework, although it retains some vestigial force.

Note: The Modern View

1. General theories. The modern law of the commerce clause, in its negative or dormant aspect considered in this section, rests on at least three theories, which sometimes conflict in particular cases.

a. A purely political theory. Some state statutes are incompatible with the ideal of a unified nation. In particular, “protectionist” statutes—those that aim at (or achieve?) the promotion of in-state interests at the expense of out-of-state interests—demonstrate that the enacting state does not take seriously the proposition that all the states are partners in a single national enterprise. If the statute says expressly that local interests will be treated differently from out-of-state interests, it signals clearly the state’s indifference to its national obligations. What if the statute does not draw such an express line, but the inference of indifference is strong in light of the differential impact of the statute on in-state and out-of-state interests?

b. A purely economic theory. Protectionist legislation, as well as some other laws, interferes with the efficient disposition of resources throughout the country. By excluding some commerce from a state, these statutes may lead to a lower level of economic performance than would be possible in the absence of the statutes.

c. A mixed political and economic theory. Protectionist legislation, and some other laws, result from the operation of a political process that can be understood as “distorted” in ways that lead to the enactment of economically inefficient statutes. In particular, consider this observation by Justice Stone in South Carolina State Highway Department v. Barnwell Brothers, 303 U.S. 177 (1938):

State regulations affecting interstate commerce, whose purpose or effect is to gain for those within the state an advantage at the expense of those without, or to burden those out of the state without any corresponding advantage to those within, have been thought to impinge upon the constitutional prohibition even though Congress has not acted.

Underlying the stated rule has been the thought, often expressed in judicial opinion, that when the regulation is of such a character that its burden falls principally upon those without the state, legislative action is not likely to be subjected to those political restraints which are normally exerted on legislation where it affects adversely some interests within the state. See [Cooley].

Under modern conditions, where interest groups often exercise political power through campaign contributions or advertising, how cogent is the distinction between “in-state” and “out-of-state” political interests? In what sense is a corporation with shareholders throughout the nation and the world a “local” interest in the state in which it operates or is incorporated?

d. Consider the possibility of a fourth approach, formalism. One could apply the preceding approaches directly and ask whether a statute is protectionist or results from a distorted political process. A formalist may argue against directly applying the approaches, and might conclude that statutes using geographical terms should be viewed with great suspicion, not because every such statute is protectionist or expresses a state's willingness to separate itself from the rest of the nation, but because most such statutes do so. Legislatures directed never to use geographical terms will adopt fewer protectionist or otherwise troublesome statutes than legislatures whose actions are tested against some more complicated standards.

2. The relevance of preemption and consent. In Exxon Corp. v. Governor of Maryland, 437 U.S. 117 (1978), discussed more fully in section D3 infra, the Court rejected a commerce clause challenge to a statute prohibiting gasoline producers and refiners from operating retail gas stations in the state. Suppose the major gasoline producers such as Exxon continue to object to the burdens the statute places on them. The major producers might seek congressional action to preempt Maryland's law. Once Congress acts, its statutes prevail over conflicting state laws by reason of the supremacy clause.

Suppose the Court had held that the Maryland statute violated the commerce clause. Could the local retailers who supported the statute have it reinstated by persuading Congress to act on their behalf?

a. Early formulations of congressional power to consent or preempt. In 1827, the Supreme Court held that states could not exercise their power to tax items of interstate commerce so long as the items remained in their original packages. Brown v. Maryland, 25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 419 (1827), limited in Michelin Tire Corp. v. Wages, 423 U.S. 276 (1976). In 1873, Iowa passed a statute prohibiting the sale of beer. In Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U.S. 100 (1890), the Leisys brewed beer in Illinois and shipped it to Iowa, where they sought to sell it in the original kegs. When Hardin, the town marshal, seized the kegs, the Leisys sued for their return. They argued that, although Iowa had the power to regulate liquor consumption, the original package doctrine barred it from regulating the sale of beer in its original kegs. A divided Supreme Court agreed.

Supporters of prohibition accepted the Court's suggestion that they seek congressional permission for state prohibition laws. In August 1890, a few months after Leisy, Congress enacted the Wilson Act, which stated that liquor imported into a state "shall upon arrival [be] subject to" local laws as if it had been locally produced, "and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being [in] original packages." In re Rahrer, 140 U.S. 545 (1891), held that the Wilson Act was a constitutional exercise of Congress's exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce and that Rahrer's conviction for selling liquor in its original package contrary to Kansas law did not violate the Constitution. According to the Court, Congress could [in] the exercise of the discretion reposed in it, concluding that the common interests did not require entire freedom in the traffic in ardent spirits enact the law in question. In so doing Congress [has] taken its own course and made its own regulation, applying to these subjects of interstate commerce one common rule, whose uniformity is not affected by variations in state laws in dealing with such property.

b. Congressional silence and inertia. Taken together, the doctrines of preemption and consent mean that a judicial decision on a commerce clause challenge need not be final. If the challenge is rejected, those who oppose state regulation may secure federal legislation preempting it. If the challenge is sustained, those who support state regulation may secure federal legislation permitting it. Under these circumstances, why should the courts intervene rather than letting the burdens of regulation lie where they fall and allowing the political process to adjust the balance between burdens and benefits?

Concurring in Duckworth v. Arkansas, 314 U.S. 390 (1941), Justice Jackson said:

[These] restraints are individually too petty, too diversified, and too local to get the attention of a Congress hard pressed with more urgent matters. [The] sluggishness of government, the multitude of matters that clamor for attention, and the relative ease with which men are persuaded to postpone troublesome decisions, all make inertia one of the most decisive powers in determining the course of our affairs and frequently gives [sic] to the established order of things a longevity and vitality much beyond its merits.

Thus, he concluded, the courts should intervene because of congressional inertia. If the restraints are indeed petty, in what sense could they unduly burden interstate commerce? Should the assumption be instead that restraints serious enough to violate the Constitution ought to be of such economic significance as to attract congressional attention? How can we distinguish congressional inaction due to inertia from inaction due to a considered judgment that on balance the state regulation does not unduly burden interstate commerce? Why should inaction with respect to statutes that regulate be treated differently from inaction that takes the form of failing to regulate? Note Powell, The Still Small Voice of the Commerce Clause, in 3 Selected Essays on Constitutional Law 932 (1938):

If congress keeps silent about the interstate commerce that is not national in character, [then] congress is silently silent, and the states may regulate. But if congress keeps silent about the kind of commerce that is national in character, [then] congress is silently vocal and says that the commerce must be free from state regulation.

For discussions of congressional silence, see Bikle, The Silence of Congress, 41 Harv. L. Rev. 200 (1927); Tribe, Toward a Syntax of the Unsaid: Construing the Sounds of Congressional and Constitutional Silence, 57 Ind. L.J. 515 (1982).

Note that securing congressional action is costly. If the costs of mobilizing Congress to act exceed the burdens a regulation places on interstate commerce, Congress's failure to act may reflect a rational calculation of the costs and benefits of political action. Judicial intervention might be justified if it is less expensive than the burdens on interstate commerce and the cost of mobilizing Congress.

c. Allocating the burden of inertia. Under the modern view, the fundamental issue in this area is who should bear the burden of overcoming congressional inertia. Note that Justice Jackson's justification for judicial intervention concludes with a reference to the "merits" of the status quo. What are the criteria for determining the "merits" in this setting?

(1) Substantive preference for free trade. H. P. Hood & Sons v. DuMond, 336 U.S. 525 (1949) (Jackson, J.):

While the Constitution vests in Congress the power to regulate commerce among the states, it does not say what the states may or may not do in the absence of congressional action. [This] Court has advanced the solidarity and prosperity of this Nation by the meaning it has given to these great silences of the Constitution....

[The] principle that our economic unit is the Nation, which alone has the gamut of powers necessary to control the economy, including the vital power of erecting customs barriers against foreign competition, has as its corollary that the states are not separable economic units....

Justice Jackson's description of the political and economic benefits of free trade reflects the preconstitutional history of interstate commercial rivalries and the modern economic theory of free trade.

(2) Minimizing costs. Obtaining congressional preemption or consent requires interest groups to invest time and effort in the political process. If the burden of overcoming inertia is placed on the group less likely to succeed in that effort, it may be discouraged from the investment. If that occurs, the courts will have arrived at the outcome that Congress would have, and at a lower cost. How accurately can the courts determine who is less likely to succeed? What if the loser in the courts is not discouraged?

Consider the extent to which the distinction in Cooley between national and local subject matters and that in Gibbons between commercial and police power regulations assist in determining who should bear the burden of overcoming congressional inertia.

3. A preliminary overview. It may help in understanding the material that follows to have a summary of the Court's overall doctrine in mind. Lawrence, Toward a More Coherent Dormant Commerce Clause: A Proposed Unitary Framework, 21 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y. 395, 416–417 (1998), proposes the following analysis: If the statute is facially discriminatory, it is “virtually per se invalid. The State has the heavy burden of proving that the measure is virtually certain to achieve its legitimate purpose and that the purpose cannot be served as well by available less discriminatory means.” Statutes with discriminatory purposes are analyzed similarly; challengers must establish the impermissible purpose. If the statutes are applied even-handedly to both in-state and out-of-state commerce, they are constitutional unless the challenger shows that the statute’s burden on interstate commerce “is clearly excessive in relation to state benefits.” Lawrence concludes the analysis of categories with the following:

Where a measure imposes a burden mostly, although not exclusively, on out-of-state interests, the State has the burden of justifying that the measure is likely to achieve its legitimate purpose; the challenger then has the burden of either rebutting the State’s justification or of showing that the purpose can be served as well by available nondiscriminatory [alternatives]. Where the measure imposes a burden exclusively on out-of-state interests, the State has the burden of proving that the measure is highly likely to achieve its legitimate purpose and that the purpose cannot be served as well by available nondiscriminatory alternatives.

2. Protection against Discrimination

Note: General Considerations

1. Cost-benefit analysis. The costs of economic regulation are not always paid by those who receive its benefits. The distribution of costs and benefits across different groups means that the mere adoption of a regulation need not establish that its benefits to the entire society exceed its costs. Further, the distribution of costs and benefits across different groups affects the political forces supporting and opposing adoption or repeal of regulations. Under what conditions might regulations be adopted when their total social costs exceed their total social benefits?

If benefits will be conferred on a relatively small group, each member can agree to finance lobbying efforts to secure the legislation (on the condition that every other member also contribute). (Why is the condition important?) Each will expect to recover his or her investment in political activity from the benefits to be gained by the legislation. If the regulation also imposes costs on a broad group, those who bear the costs will find it difficult to organize in opposition. The costs imposed on each member of the group are likely to be smaller than the amount each would have to invest in an effective lobbying effort. Further, there is a free-rider problem: Each member of the group may hang back, expecting that others will engage in lobbying that, if successful, would benefit the free rider at no cost to him- or herself. This theory is developed in detail in M. Olson, The Logic of Collective Action (1965). Consider the extent to which a theory like Olson's may underlie the discrimination cases that follow and the "undue burden" cases in section D3 infra.

2. "Exporting" costs. Regulations may be adopted when the beneficiaries within the jurisdiction adopting it outweigh in political power those within the jurisdiction who will bear (some of) its costs. They may do so because of numbers or because of the organizational factors discussed by Olson. Total social costs may still exceed total social benefits, but if the local beneficiaries can export enough costs so that the local benefits exceed the local costs, the regulation may be adopted. Is this the "thought" Stone described in Barnwell Brothers?

Note that in every case some local residents—those who prefer doing business with out-of-staters—will be worse off. In the simplest case, the benefits to local residents exceed the costs to local residents. Even though some local residents (and therefore voters) will bear some costs, the "gross state product" will be greater after the regulation is adopted than before. The local beneficiaries may then use some of their new profits to subsidize the local cost-bearers, reducing the political opposition to the adoption of the regulation. Consider in this connection Dean Milk Co. v. Madison, infra. Under what circumstances can a state export the costs of regulation? This is the subject of a branch of economics called incidence analysis. Should the courts rely on what economists have to say on this question?

City of Philadelphia v. New Jersey

437 U.S. 617 (1978)

MR. JUSTICE STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court.

A New Jersey law prohibits the importation of most “solid or liquid waste which originated or was collected outside the territorial limits of the State.” In this case we are required to decide whether this statutory prohibition violates the Commerce Clause of the United States Constitution....

[Private landfill operators challenged the statute on preemption and constitutional grounds. The state supreme court found that the statute “advanced vital health and environmental objectives with no economic discrimination against, and with little burden upon, interstate commerce.” It also found no preemption.]

We agree with the New Jersey court that the state law has not been preempted by federal legislation.⁴ The dispositive question, therefore, is whether the law is constitutionally permissible in light of the Commerce Clause of the Constitution.

II...

[All] objects of interstate trade merit Commerce Clause protection; none is excluded by definition at the outset. Hence, we reject the state court’s suggestion that the banning of “valueless” out-of-state wastes by [the statute] implicates no constitutional protection. Just as Congress has power to regulate the interstate movement of these wastes, States are not free from constitutional scrutiny when they restrict that movement.

III...

The opinions of the Court through the years have reflected an alertness to the evils of “economic isolation” and protectionism, while at the same time recognizing that incidental burdens on interstate commerce may be unavoidable when a State legislates to safeguard the health and safety of its people. Thus, where simple economic protectionism is effected by state legislation, a virtually per se rule of invalidity has been erected. See, e.g., [H. P. Hood & Sons]. The clearest example of such legislation is a law that overtly blocks the flow of interstate commerce at a State's borders. But where other legislative objectives are credibly advanced and there is no patent discrimination against interstate trade, the Court has adopted a much more flexible approach, the general contours of which were outlined in Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., 397 U.S. 137, 142:

Where the statute regulates evenhandedly to effectuate a legitimate local public interest, and its effects on interstate commerce are only incidental, it will be upheld unless the burden imposed on such commerce is clearly excessive in relation to the putative local benefits....If a legitimate local purpose is found, then the question becomes one of degree. And the extent of the burden that will be tolerated will of course depend on the nature of the local interest involved, and on whether it could be promoted as well with a lesser impact on interstate activities.

The crucial inquiry, therefore, must be directed to determining whether [the statute] is basically a protectionist measure, or whether it can fairly be viewed as a law directed to legitimate local concerns, with effects upon interstate commerce that are only incidental.

[The] evil of protectionism can reside in legislative means as well as legislative ends. Thus, it does not matter whether the ultimate aim of [the statute] is to reduce the waste disposal costs of New Jersey residents or to save remaining open lands from pollution, for we assume New Jersey has every right to protect its residents' pocketbooks as well as their environment. And it may be assumed as well that New Jersey may pursue those ends by slowing the flow of all waste into the State's remaining landfills, even though interstate commerce may incidentally be affected. But whatever New Jersey's ultimate purpose, it may not be accomplished by discriminating against articles of commerce from outside the State unless there is some reason, apart from their origin, to treat them differently. Both on its face and in its plain effect, [the statute] violates this principle of nondiscrimination....

The New Jersey law at issue in this case falls squarely within the area that the Commerce Clause puts off limits to state regulation. On its face, it imposes on out-of-state commercial interests the full burden of conserving the state's remaining landfill space. [What] is crucial is the attempt by one State to isolate itself from a problem common to many by erecting a barrier against the movement of interstate trade....

Today, cities in Pennsylvania and New York find it expedient or necessary to send their waste into New Jersey for disposal, and New Jersey claims the right to close its borders to such traffic. Tomorrow, cities in New Jersey may find it expedient or necessary to send their waste into Pennsylvania or New York for disposal, and those States might then claim the right to close their borders. The Commerce Clause will protect New Jersey in the future, just as it protects her neighbors now, from efforts by one State to isolate itself in the stream of interstate commerce from a problem shared by all. The judgment is reversed.

Note: Facial/Intentional Discrimination

1. Winners and losers. Who gains the benefits and who bears the costs of New Jersey's statute? There are four groups to consider: out-of-state waste producers, out-of-state landfill operators, in-state waste producers, and in-state landfill operators. (Into which category do in-state environmentalists fall?) (a) Costs: The statute reduces the supply of landfill available to out-of-state waste producers and may therefore increase the price they must pay for disposal. It reduces the demand for New Jersey landfills and may therefore decrease the profits of in-state landfill operators. (b) Benefits: The statute benefits in-state waste producers by reducing demand and decreasing prices and by improving their environment; it benefits out-of-state landfill operators by increasing demand and raising profits. Out-of-state waste producers might benefit from increased costs that encourage each of them to reduce the amount of waste each produces, which might benefit them in the aggregate. Note that from the point of view of cost exporting, New Jersey does not care whether the benefits to out-of-state landfill operators exceed the costs to out-of-state waste producers. Its sole concern is that the decreased prices paid by New Jersey waste producers exceed the profits New Jersey operators lose by being unable to accept out-of-state waste. Is it likely that the local benefits exceed the local costs? (What is the relevance, if any, of the fact that New Jersey landfill operators are among the plaintiffs in the case?)

Consider the proposition that this Note's focus on a detailed analysis of economic effects is misguided because the Court (a) properly uses facial discrimination as a rough indication that out-of-state burdens exceed local benefits and (b) refrains from looking at economic effects in more detail because it lacks the expertise to do so (in contrast to Congress, which may displace the Court's judgment if it chooses). If the courts cannot do a full cost-benefit analysis, should they refrain from invalidating state laws on commerce clause grounds? Consider also the proposition that the focus on economic effects and their relation to interest-group politics is misguided because interest-group politics are irrelevant to a proper interpretation of the Constitution.

2. Issues of distribution. The welfare of the Northeast might be increased by making New Jersey a little less polluted and Pennsylvania a little more. Pennsylvania's failure to regulate waste production can be considered its attempt to export costs to New Jersey. Should the Court take such issues into consideration?

3. Intent. Is it fair to say that the Court infers from a statute's use of distinctions between in-state and out-of-state economic actors an intent to benefit local interests and harm out-of-state ones? Does the use of a local/out-of-state distinction justify a presumption of intent to export costs?

4. The relevance of retaliation. City of Philadelphia v. New Jersey concludes by invoking fears of retaliatory responses by other states. Why should that be a matter of concern? Retaliation would increase the costs borne by local residents, thus eliminating the export of costs and reducing the incentive to adopt the regulation. Note, however, that retaliation may not be completely effective, so that it inflicts some pure economic losses on the states involved with neither an economic nor a distributive justification, and that retaliation, at least until the trade barriers are lowered, is likely to alter the patterns of investment as resources shift to take account of the costs imposed by retaliatory regulations in one sector of the economy but not in another.

Consider Sporhase v. Nebraska, 458 U.S. 941 (1982): A Nebraska statute prohibited the withdrawal of groundwater from any well within Nebraska intended for use in another state that fails to grant reciprocal rights to withdraw and transport groundwater to Nebraska. Colorado does not grant reciprocal rights. Owners of contiguous land on the Nebraska/Colorado border claimed that the statute unconstitutionally barred them from transferring groundwater from a Nebraska well to the Colorado land. The Supreme Court agreed. It found the reciprocity requirement not "narrowly tailored" to serve conservation goals. Citing A&P Tea Co. v. Cottrell, 424 U.S. 366 (1976), it noted that the reciprocity requirement could not be justified "as a response to another State's unreasonable burden on commerce." Why not?

Cottrell defended its position that retaliation was not permitted, even if it was intended to provide an incentive to eliminate trade barriers, on the ground that the state's proper remedy for trade barriers was a challenge in court, not retaliation. (Suppose a state desires to "retaliate" against another state's failure to regulate.) Retaliation is common in the international sphere. It is dealt with by the negotiation of bilateral and multilateral trade agreements. Have the states already negotiated such an agreement, calling it the commerce clause rather than a trade treaty?

5. Permissible discrimination. In Maine v. Taylor, 477 U.S. 131 (1986), the Court upheld the constitutionality of a Maine statute that prohibited the importation of live baitfish. Writing for eight justices, Justice Blackmun noted that the statute affirmatively discriminated against interstate transactions and therefore could be upheld only if it survived “the strictest scrutiny.” The burden was on the state to show that the statute served a legitimate local purpose, and that the purpose could not be served as well by an available nondiscriminatory means. In this case, however, the Court held that, in light of the trial court’s findings of fact, both branches of this test had been satisfied. Evidence before the trial court indicated that Maine’s population of wild fish might be placed at risk by parasites prevalent in out-of-state baitfish but not common in wild fish in Maine. Moreover, nonnative species inadvertently included in shipments of live baitfish could disturb Maine’s aquatic ecology to an unpredictable extent by competing with, or preying on, native species. Finally, there was no satisfactory way to inspect imported baitfish for parasites and commingled species.

The Supreme Court held that these findings were sufficient to sustain the statute. Although importation of the baitfish might not adversely affect the environment, “Maine has a legitimate interest in guarding against imperfectly understood environmental risks, despite the possibility that they may ultimately prove to be negligible.” Moreover, the mere “abstract possibility” of developing an acceptable testing procedure did not constitute an available nondiscriminatory alternative. Nor was there convincing evidence that the statute was the product of a protectionist intent. The state’s justification was not undermined “by the fact that other States may not have enacted similar bans” because “Maine’s fisheries are unique and unusually fragile.” Nor was it relevant “that fish can swim directly into Maine from New Hampshire” because “impediments to complete success [cannot] be [grounds] for preventing a state from using its best efforts to limit [an environmental] risk.”

C & A Carbone, Inc. v. Clarkstown
511 U.S. 383 (1994)

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court....

[Clarkstown, New York, subsidized a private “waste transfer station” to collect solid waste, separate recyclable from nonrecyclable items, and dispose of the waste, by guaranteeing a minimum flow of waste to the station, which would then collect a fee that exceeded the disposal cost of unsorted solid waste in the private market. To assure the guaranteed flow, Clarkstown enacted a “flow control ordinance,” requiring that all solid waste within the town be deposited at the station. Carbone was a private recycler with a sorting facility in Clarkstown. It collected waste from elsewhere in New York and New Jersey, carried it to its facility, and sorted it into recyclable and nonrecyclable items. The flow control ordinance required Carbone to take the nonrecyclable material to the transfer station and pay the fee. Without the ordinance, Carbone would have shipped the nonrecyclable materials to out-of-state destinations at a lower cost than the fee the transfer station charged. The Supreme Court upheld Carbone’s challenge to the constitutionality of the flow control ordinance.]

While the immediate effect of the ordinance is to direct local transport of solid waste to a designated site within the local jurisdiction, its economic effects are interstate in reach. The Carbone facility in Clarkstown receives and processes waste from places other than Clarkstown, including from out of State. By requiring Carbone to send the nonrecyclable portion of this waste to the [transfer] station at an additional cost, the flow control ordinance drives up the cost for out-of-state interests to dispose of their solid waste. Furthermore, even as to waste originant in Clarkstown, the ordinance prevents everyone except the favored local operator from performing the initial processing step. The ordinance thus deprives out-of-state businesses of access to a local market. These economic effects are more than enough to bring the Clarkstown ordinance within the purview of the Commerce Clause....

Clarkstown protests that its ordinance does not discriminate because it does not differentiate solid waste on the basis of its geographic origin. All solid waste, regardless of origin, must be processed at the designated transfer station before it leaves the town. Unlike the statute in Philadelphia, says the town, the ordinance erects no barrier to the import or export of any solid waste but requires only that the waste be channeled through the designated facility. [As] the town itself points out, what makes garbage a profitable business is not its own worth but the fact that its possessor must pay to get rid of it. In other words, the article of commerce is not so much the solid waste itself, but rather the service of processing and disposing of it.

With respect to this stream of commerce, the flow control ordinance discriminates, for it allows only the favored operator to process waste that is within the limits of the town. The ordinance is no less discriminatory because in-state or in-town processors are also covered by the prohibition. In Dean Milk Co. v. Madison, 340 U.S. 349 (1951), we struck down a city ordinance that required all milk sold in the city to be pasteurized within five miles of the city lines. We found it “immaterial that Wisconsin milk from outside the Madison area is subjected to the same proscription as that moving in interstate commerce.” Id., at 354, n.4.

In this light, the flow control ordinance is just one more instance of local processing requirements that we long have held invalid. The essential vice in laws of this sort is that they bar the import of the processing service....

Discrimination against interstate commerce in favor of local business or investment is per se invalid, save in a narrow class of cases in which the municipality can demonstrate, under rigorous scrutiny, that it has no other means to advance a legitimate local interest. A number of amici [suggest] that as landfill space diminishes and environmental cleanup costs escalate, measures like flow control become necessary to ensure the safe handling and proper treatment of solid waste.

The teaching of our cases is that these arguments must be rejected absent the clearest showing that the unobstructed flow of interstate commerce itself is unable to solve the local problem....

The flow control ordinance does serve a central purpose that a nonprotectionist regulation would not: It ensures that the town-sponsored facility will be profitable, so that the local contractor can build it and Clarkstown can buy it back at nominal cost in five years. In other words, [the] flow control ordinance is a financing measure. By itself, of course, revenue generation is not a local interest that can justify discrimination against interstate commerce. Otherwise States could impose discriminatory taxes against solid waste originating outside the State.

Clarkstown maintains that special financing is necessary to ensure the long-term survival of the designated facility. If so, the town may subsidize the facility through general taxes or municipal bonds. New Energy Co. of Indiana v. Limbach, 486 U.S. 269, 278 (1988). But having elected to use the open market to earn revenues for its project, the town may not employ discriminatory regulation to give that project an advantage over rival businesses from out of State....

State and local governments may not use their regulatory power to favor local enterprise by prohibiting patronage of out-of-state competitors or their facilities. We reverse the judgment and remand the case for proceedings not inconsistent with this decision.

JUSTICE O'CONNOR, concurring in the judgment.

Local Law 9 [lacks] an important feature common to the regulations at issue in [prior] cases—namely, discrimination on the basis of geographic origin. [In] Dean Milk, [the] city of Madison drew a line around its perimeter and required that all milk sold in the City be pasteurized only by dairies located inside the line. This type of geographic distinction, which confers an economic advantage on local interests in general, is common to all the local processing cases cited by the majority. And the Court has, I believe, correctly concluded that these arrangements are protectionist either in purpose or practical effect, and thus amount to virtually per se discrimination.

[The] garbage sorting monopoly is achieved at the expense of all competitors, be they local or nonlocal. That the ordinance does not discriminate on the basis of geographic origin is vividly illustrated by the identity of the plaintiff in this very action: petitioner is a local recycler, physically located in Clarkstown, that desires to process waste itself, and thus bypass the town's designated transfer facility. Because in-town processors—like petitioner—and out-of-town processors are treated equally, I cannot agree that Local Law 9 “discriminates” against interstate commerce. Rather, Local Law 9 “discriminates” evenhandedly against all potential participants in the waste processing business, while benefiting only the chosen operator of the transfer facility.

I believe this distinction has more doctrinal significance than the majority acknowledges. [The] existence of substantial in-state interests harmed by a regulation is “a powerful safeguard” against legislative discrimination. The Court generally defers to health and safety regulations because “their burden usually falls on local economic interests as well as other States’ economic interests, thus insuring that a State’s own political processes will serve as a check against unduly burdensome regulations.” Raymond Motor Transportation, Inc. v. Rice, 434 U.S. 429, 444, n.18 (1978). Thus, while there is no bright line separating those enactments which are virtually per se invalid and those which are not, the fact that in-town competitors of the transfer facility are equally burdened by Local Law 9 leads me to conclude that Local Law 9 does not discriminate against interstate commerce.

[Justice O’Connor concluded that the ordinance imposed “an excessive burden on interstate trade when considered in relation to the local benefits conferred.” See section D3 infra.]

JUSTICE SOUTER, with whom [CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST] and JUSTICE BLACKMUN join, dissenting.

[The] exclusion worked by Clarkstown’s Local Law 9 bestows no benefit on a class of local private actors, but instead directly aids the government in satisfying a traditional governmental responsibility. The law does not differentiate between all local and all out-of-town providers of a service, but instead between the one entity responsible for ensuring that the job gets done and all other enterprises, regardless of their location. The ordinance thus falls outside that class of tariff or protectionist measures that the Commerce Clause has traditionally been thought to bar States from enacting against each other....

II...

The outstanding feature of the statutes [in] the local processing cases is their distinction between two classes of private economic actors according to location, favoring [milk] pasteurizers within five miles of the center of Madison, and so on. Since nothing in these local processing laws prevented a proliferation of local businesses within the State or town, the out-of-town processors were not excluded as part and parcel of a general exclusion of private firms from the market, but as a result of discrimination among such firms according to geography alone. It was because of that discrimination in favor of local businesses, preferred at the expense of their out-of-town or out-of-state competitors, that the Court struck down those local processing laws as classic examples of [economic] protectionism....

[Local] Law 9's exclusion of outside capital is part of a broader exclusion of private capital, not a discrimination against out-of-state investors as such. Thus, while these differences may underscore the ordinance's anticompetitive effect, they substantially mitigate any protectionist effect, for subjecting out-of-town investors and facilities to the same constraints as local ones is not economic protectionism....

III

[The] monopolistic character of Local Law 9's effects is not itself suspicious for purposes of the Commerce Clause. [The] dormant Commerce Clause does not "protect the particular structure or methods of operation in any...market." Exxon Corp. v. Governor of Md., 437 U.S. 117, 127 (1978). The only right to compete that it protects is the right to compete on terms independent of one's location.

While the monopolistic nature of the burden may be disregarded, any geographically discriminatory elements must be assessed with care. We have already observed that there is no geographically based selection among private firms, and it is clear from the face of the ordinance that nothing hinges on the source of trash that enters Clarkstown or upon the destination of the processed waste that leaves the transfer station. There is, to be sure, an incidental local economic benefit, for the need to process Clarkstown's trash in Clarkstown will create local jobs. But this local boon is mitigated by another feature of the ordinance, in that it finances whatever benefits it confers on the town from the pockets of the very citizens who passed it into law. On the reasonable assumption that no one can avoid producing some trash, every resident of Clarkstown must bear a portion of the burden Local Law 9 imposes to support the municipal monopoly, an uncharacteristic feature of statutes claimed to violate the Commerce Clause....

This skepticism that protectionism is afoot here is confirmed again when we examine the governmental interests apparently served by the local law. [The] State and its municipalities need prompt, sanitary trash processing, which is imperative whether or not the private market sees fit to serve this need at an affordable price and to continue doing so dependably into the future. The state and local governments also have a substantial interest in the flow-control feature to minimize the risk of financing this service, for [a] "put or pay" contract of the type Clarkstown signed will be a significant inducement to accept municipal responsibility to guarantee efficiency and sanitation in trash processing. Waste disposal with minimal environmental damage requires serious capital investment, and there are limits on any municipality's ability to incur debt or to finance facilities out of tax revenues.

Moreover, flow control offers an additional benefit that could not be gained by financing through a subsidy derived from general tax revenues, in spreading the cost of the facility among all Clarkstown residents who generate trash. [It] is far from clear that the alternative to flow control (i.e., subsidies from general tax revenues or municipal bonds) would be less disruptive of interstate commerce than flow control, since a subsidized competitor can effectively squelch competition by underbidding it....

Note: Geographic Discrimination

1. Facial discrimination? In what sense do Carbone and Dean Milk involve facial discrimination against out-of-state interests, given that in-state interests of the same type are equally adversely affected? Consider this definition: Facial discrimination occurs when a statute regulating transactions between private parties uses some geographical terminology whose effect is to confer some advantage on at least one in-state enterprise and to impose some burden on at least one out-of-state enterprise. On what theory of the dormant commerce clause should the (mere) use of geographic terminology matter so much?

2. The Scope of Carbone. United Haulers Association v. Oneida-Herkimer Solid Waste Management Authority, 550 U.S. 330 (2007), involved “flow control” ordinances like that in Carbone, but in United Haulers the facility to which solid waste was required to be sent was owned by a public agency. This was sufficient to distinguish the case from Carbone.

Unlike private enterprise, government is vested with the responsibility of protecting the health, safety, and welfare of its citizens. These important responsibilities set state and local government apart from a typical private business.

Given these differences, it does not make sense to regard laws favoring local government and laws favoring private industry with equal skepticism. [Laws] favoring local government [may] be directed toward any number of legitimate goals unrelated to protectionism.

[The] contrary approach [would] lead to unprecedented and unbounded interference by the courts with state and local government. The dormant Commerce Clause is not a roving license for federal courts to decide what activities are appropriate for state and local government to undertake, and what activities must be the province of private market competition. [It] is not the province of the Commerce Clause to control the decision of the voters on whether government or the private sector should provide waste management services.

Chief Justice Roberts’s opinion observed that “the most palpable harm imposed by the ordinances—more expensive trash removal—is likely to fall upon the very people who voted for the laws. [There] is no reason to [hand] local businesses a victory they could not obtain through the political process.” (Writing for a plurality, Chief Justice Roberts also found that the ordinances did not impose an excessive burden that was disproportionate to its benefits. Justice Scalia did not join this portion of the opinion.)

Justice Thomas concurred in the judgment, stating that, although he had joined Carbone, he “no longer believe[d] it was correctly decided,” because the “negative Commerce Clause has no basis in the Constitution [and] has proved unworkable in practice.” Justice Alito, joined by Justices Stevens and Kennedy, dissented, arguing that the case was indistinguishable from Carbone.

3. Reasonable alternatives and the relevance of harms to in-state producers. Dean Milk Co. v. Madison, 340 U.S. 349 (1951), invalidated an ordinance adopted by the Madison City Council that prohibited the sale of milk in the city unless it had been bottled at an approved plant within five miles of the city. The “avowed purpose,” ensuring by inspection of bottling plants that milk was bottled under sanitary conditions, was acceptable. But the “practical effect” was to prevent the sale in Madison of wholesome milk produced in Illinois and in parts of Wisconsin. The Court held that

[in] thus erecting an economic barrier protecting a major local industry against competition from without the State, Madison plainly discriminates against interstate commerce. This it cannot do, even in the exercise of its unquestioned power to protect the health and safety of its people, if reasonable nondiscriminatory alternatives, adequate to serve legitimate local interests, are available.

The Court concluded that two alternatives existed: Madison could send its inspectors to Illinois and charge the reasonable costs of inspection to the importing producers, or it could rely on inspections by federal authorities complying with the regulatory standards in the Madison ordinance, which itself adopted the provisions of a model ordinance recommended by a federal agency. “To permit Madison to adopt a regulation not essential for the protection of local health interests and placing a discriminatory burden on interstate commerce would invite a multiplication of preferential trade areas destructive of the very purpose of the Commerce Clause.” Is the doctrinal formulation in Dean Milk the same as that in Carbone? Do the cases pose the same problem?

4. The relevance of conflict. In Bibb v. Navajo Freight Lines, 359 U.S. 520 (1959), Justice Douglas wrote the Court’s opinion invalidating an Illinois law requiring that trucks in the state use curved mudguards to prevent spatter and promote safety. Straight mudflaps were legal in forty-five other states; curved mudflaps were illegal in Arkansas and were required in no other state. The trial court found that curved mudflaps have “no” safety advantages over straight ones and introduce “hazards previously unknown to those using the highways” by increasing the heat around the tires and thereby reducing the effectiveness of the trucks’ brakes. However, the Court said, “If we had here only a question whether the cost of adjusting an interstate operation to these new local safety regulations [unduly] burdened interstate commerce, we would have to sustain the law. [The] same result would obtain if we had to resolve the much discussed issues of safety.” The case was different, though, because of the impossibility of using a single truck whose mudflaps complied with both Illinois and Arkansas law. Further, the Illinois law “seriously [interfered] with” interlining, the practice of having one carrier bring a trailer to a depot and another take it to its destination without unloading and reloading. The case was “one of those cases—few in number—where local safety measures that are nondiscriminatory place an unconstitutional burden on interstate commerce.” In what sense do the Arkansas and Illinois regulations conflict other than that complying with both would increase costs enormously by requiring unloading and reloading? Why is it a problem for Illinois, rather than for Arkansas, that a shipper could not use a single trailer that complied with both states’ regulations?

[The] practical effect of [Local Law 9] must be evaluated not only by considering the consequences of the statute itself, but also by considering how the challenged statute may interact with the legitimate regulatory regimes of the other States and what effect would arise if not one, but many or every, [jurisdiction] adopted similar legislation. [Wyoming v. Oklahoma.] This is not a hypothetical inquiry. Over 20 states have enacted statutes authorizing local governments to adopt flow control laws. If the localities in these States impose the type of restriction on the movement of waste that Clarkstown has adopted, the free movement of solid waste in the stream of commerce will be severely impaired. Indeed, pervasive flow control would result in the type of balkanization the Clause is primarily intended to prevent. See [H. P. Hood & Sons].

Given that many jurisdictions are contemplating or enacting flow control, the potential for conflicts is high. For example, in the State of New Jersey, just south of Clarkstown, local waste may be removed from the State for the sorting of recyclables “as long as the residual solid waste is returned to New Jersey.” Under Local Law 9, however, if petitioners bring waste from New Jersey for recycling at their Clarkstown operation, the residual waste may not be returned to New Jersey, but must be transported to Clarkstown’s transfer facility. As a consequence, operations like petitioners’ cannot comply with the requirements of both jurisdictions. Nondiscriminatory state or local laws which actually conflict with the enactments of other States are constitutionally infirm if they burden interstate commerce. The increasing number of flow control regimes virtually ensures some inconsistency between jurisdictions, with the effect of eliminating the movement of waste between jurisdictions.

5. Are the regulated subjects “the same”? General Motors Corp. v. Tracy, 519 U.S. 278 (1997), discussed a question the Court said often “remained dormant” in dormant commerce clause cases: whether the subjects treated differently were “substantially similar.” The question matters because the difference in products may mean that the different entities serve different markets and would continue to do so even if the supposedly discriminatory burden were removed. If in fact that should be the case, eliminating the tax or other regulatory differential would not serve the dormant Commerce Clause's fundamental objective of preserving a national market for competition undisturbed by preferential advantages conferred by a State upon its residents or resident competitors.

The Court then engaged in a detailed analysis of the market for natural gas products. Can an argument be developed in each of the cases in this section that the subjects were not substantially similar because they served different markets?

West Lynn Creamery, Inc. v. Healy

512 U.S. 186 (1994)

JUSTICE STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Massachusetts taxed all milk sales in the state. The taxes, collected on sales of milk produced both in the state and outside it, went to a subsidy fund whose proceeds were then distributed to Massachusetts milk producers. An out-of-state producer challenged the combined nondiscriminatory-tax-plus-local-subsidy program. The Court found the program unconstitutional.]

The paradigmatic example of a law discriminating against interstate commerce is the protective tariff or customs duty, which taxes goods imported from other States, but does not tax similar products produced in-state. A tariff is an attractive measure because it simultaneously raises revenue and benefits local producers by burdening their out-of-state competitors. Nevertheless, it violates the principle of the unitary national market by handicapping out-of-state competitors, thus artificially encouraging in-state production even when the same goods could be produced at lower cost in other States....

[Massachusetts'] pricing order is clearly unconstitutional. Its avowed purpose and its undisputed effect are to enable higher cost Massachusetts dairy farmers to compete with lower cost dairy farmers in other States. The "premium payments" are effectively a tax which makes milk produced out of State more expensive. Although the tax also applies to milk produced in Massachusetts, its effect on Massachusetts producers is entirely (indeed more than) offset by the subsidy provided exclusively to Massachusetts dairy farmers. Like an ordinary tariff, the tax is thus effectively imposed only on out-of-state products. The pricing order thus allows Massachusetts dairy farmers who produce at higher cost to sell at or below the price charged by lower cost out-of-state producers....

[Respondent] argues that the payments to Massachusetts dairy farmers from the Dairy Equalization Fund are valid, because subsidies are constitutional exercises of state power, and that the order premium which provides money for the Fund is valid, because it is a nondiscriminatory tax. Therefore the pricing order is constitutional, because it is merely the combination of two independently lawful regulations. In effect, respondent argues, if the State may impose a valid tax on dealers, it is free to use the proceeds of the tax as it chooses; and if it may independently subsidize its farmers, it is free to finance the subsidy by means of any legitimate tax....

[Respondent] errs in assuming that the constitutionality of the pricing order follows logically from the constitutionality of its component parts. By conjoining a tax and a subsidy, Massachusetts has created a program more dangerous to interstate commerce than either part alone. [When] a nondiscriminatory tax is coupled with a subsidy to one of the groups hurt by the tax, a state's political processes can no longer be relied upon to prevent legislative abuse, because one of the in-state interests which would otherwise lobby against the tax has been mollified by the subsidy. So, in this case, one would ordinarily have expected at least three groups to lobby against the order premium, which, as a tax, raises the price (and hence lowers demand) for milk: dairy farmers, milk dealers, and consumers. But because the tax was coupled with a subsidy, one of the most powerful of these groups, Massachusetts dairy farmers, instead of exerting their influence against the tax, were in fact its primary supporters....

[Respondent] ignores the fact that Massachusetts dairy farmers are part of an integrated interstate market. [The] purpose and effect of the pricing order are to divert market share to Massachusetts dairy farmers. This diversion necessarily injures the dairy farmers in neighboring States. [The] obvious impact of the order on out-of-state production demonstrates that it is simply wrong to assume that the pricing order burdens only Massachusetts consumers and dealers.

JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom JUSTICE THOMAS joins, concurring in the judgment....

There are at least four possible devices that would enable a State to produce the economic effect that Massachusetts has produced here: (1) a discriminatory tax upon the industry, imposing a higher liability on out-of-state members than on their in-state competitors; (2) a tax upon the industry that is nondiscriminatory in its assessment, but that has an "exemption" [for] in-state members; (3) a nondiscriminatory tax upon the industry, the revenues from which are placed into a segregated fund, which fund is disbursed as “rebates” [to] in-state members of the industry; [and] (4) [a] subsidy for the in-state members of the industry, funded from the State’s general revenues. It is long settled that the first of these methodologies is unconstitutional under the negative Commerce Clause. The second of them, “exemption” from [a] “neutral” tax, is no different in principle from the first, and has likewise been held invalid. The fourth methodology, application of a state subsidy from general revenues, is so far removed from what we have hitherto held to be unconstitutional, that prohibiting it must be regarded as an extension of our negative-Commerce-Clause jurisprudence and therefore, to me, unacceptable....

The issue before us in the present case is whether the third of these methodologies must fall. Although the question is close, I conclude it would not be a principled point at which to disembark from the negative-Commerce-Clause train. The only difference between methodology (2) [and] methodology (3) [is] that the money is taken and returned rather than simply left with the favored in state taxpayer in the first place. The difference between (3) and (4), on the other hand, is the difference between assisting in-state industry through discriminatory taxation, and assisting in-state industry by other means.

I would therefore allow a State to subsidize its domestic industry so long as it does so from nondiscriminatory taxes that go into the State’s general revenue fund. Perhaps [that] line comports with an important economic reality: a State is less likely to maintain a subsidy when its citizens perceive that the money (in the general fund) is available for any number of competing, non-protectionist, purposes. That is not, however, the basis for my position. [I] draw the line where I do because it is a clear, rational line at the limits of our extant negative-Commerce-Clause jurisprudence.

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST, with whom JUSTICE BLACKMUN joins, dissenting....

[There] are still at least two strong interest groups opposed to the milk order —consumers and milk dealers. More importantly, nothing in the dormant Commerce Clause suggests that the fate of state regulation should turn upon the particular lawful manner in which the state subsidy is enacted or promulgated. Analysis of interest group participation in the political process may serve many useful purposes, but serving as a basis for interpreting the dormant Commerce Clause is not one of them....

Note: The Alternative of Subsidies

1. Tax incentives as subsidies. Camps Newfound/Owatonna, Inc. v. Town of Harrison, 520 U.S. 564 (1997), held unconstitutional a tax statute that exempted property owned by local charitable organizations but denied the exemption to organizations operated principally for nonresidents. The Court first concluded that the statute would violate the commerce clause if it were targeted at profit-making organizations because it encouraged them “to limit their out-of-state clientele” in a way that would lead to economic balkanization. It was “functionally [an] export tariff that targets out-of-state customers by taxing the businesses that principally serve them.” Relying on New Energy Co. of Indiana v. Limbach, cited in Carbone, the Court then rejected the argument that the tax exemption amounted to a permissible “discriminatory subsidy.” Even if such subsidies were constitutional, discriminatory tax exemptions were not.

2. The politics of subsidies. Why are subsidies from general revenues permissible but ones from industry-specific taxes impermissible? Note that an annual appropriation in the form of a direct subsidy might be more visible politically than the indirect subsidy through regulation. Justice Stevens’s opinion suggests that the courts should carefully examine legislation that shifts one interest group from one side of an issue to another. Is there any economic regulation that does not have that effect? Coenen, Business Subsidies and the Dormant Commerce Clause, 107 Yale L.J. 965, 985–992 (1998), enumerates a number of functional distinctions between direct subsidies and tax breaks:

[A] state’s imposition of costs on its citizens is more visible when the state awards outright subsidies than when it doles out tax relief. [The] extent of cost [is] more readily perceptible when the state’s support of local industry takes the form of a monetary subsidy [because] the total amount of subsidy payments can be determined through the easy means of tallying total payments [whereas] tax expenditures are made [passively]. [Tax] credits, exemptions, and the like are resistant to repeal because legislatures typically enact them as presumptively permanent features of state tax codes. In contrast, because subsidies involve the direct expenditure of funds, they routinely show up—and are subject to recurring reevaluation—as expense items in perennially controversial state budget bills.

Are Justices Scalia and Rehnquist correct in asserting that consideration of the politics of subsidies is irrelevant to constitutional analysis?

Note: Other Doctrines Concerning Discrimination

1. The market-participant doctrine. The Supreme Court has held that states may discriminate when they act as participants in the market, but not when they act as regulators.

a. The contours of the doctrine. Hughes v. Alexandria Scrap Corp., 426 U.S. 794 (1976), upheld a Maryland program designed to reduce the number of abandoned cars in the state. It purchased junked cars, paying a “bounty” for those with Maryland license plates and imposing more stringent documentation requirements on out-of-state processors of junked cars than on in-state processors. The Court said that “nothing in the purposes animating the Commerce Clause prohibits a State [from] participating in the market and exercising the right to favor its own citizens over others.” See also Reeves, Inc. v. Stake, 447 U.S. 429 (1980) (upholding a state policy restricting the sale of cement produced in a state-owned plant to state residents).

What is the distinction between regulation and market participation? South-Central Timber Development v. Wunnicke, 467 U.S. 82 (1984), held unconstitutional Alaska’s inclusion of a requirement that purchasers of state-owned timber process it within the state before it was shipped out of state. According to a plurality opinion by Justice White, Alaska could not impose “downstream” conditions in the timber-processing market as a result of its ownership of the timber itself. The opinion summarized “[the] limit of the market-participant doctrine” as “[allowing] a State to impose burdens on commerce within the market in which it is a participant, but [to] go no further. The State may not impose conditions [that] have a substantial regulatory effect outside of that particular market.”

b. Is the economic effect of discriminatory market participation different from that of discriminatory regulation? According to Justice Blackmun’s opinion for the Court in Reeves v. Stake, when states act in the marketplace, they resemble private businesses and should be free to exercise a similar discretion to choose the parties with whom they deal. Note that private businesses are constrained to some extent by competition and the profit motive to purchase from the cheapest seller and sell to the buyer willing to pay most. States in contrast may buy and sell without that constraint, using their power to tax as the mechanism to force some taxpayers to subsidize “uneconomic” transactions. See generally Wells and Hellerstein, The Governmental-Proprietary Distinction in Constitutional Law, 66 Va. L. Rev. 1073 (1980).

c. Can the market-participant doctrine be defended as allowing states to capture the benefits of their tax expenditures? Consider L. Tribe, Constitutional Choices 145 (1985): The doctrine is justified by the sense of fairness in allowing a community to retain the public benefits created by its own public investment. [The] broader theme that underlies each case seems to be creation of commerce: whatever the state's ultimate goal, the state is approaching that goal by channeling its resources into commerce rather than by placing restrictions on commerce already in existence.

In Reeves, the public expenditure is the outlay for cement production. How does that differ from the state's expenditures for the general provision of social order in Philadelphia v. New Jersey? The expenditures differ in the specificity with which they affect particular transactions, but is that relevant to any constitutionally significant matters?

Consider that we have now seen four types of subsidy: via regulation, via targeted tax breaks, via participation in the market, and via direct appropriations from general revenues. Only the first two are subject to close commerce clause scrutiny. Recall the suggestion that direct appropriations have more political visibility than do regulatory subsidies. Which does a market-participation subsidy more closely resemble?

Do the same considerations that justify the market-participant doctrine justify United Haulers and Davis? (Why are those cases not market-participant cases?)

2. The privileges and immunities clause of article IV. Article IV provides, "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States."

a. The contours of the doctrine. United Building & Construction Trades Council v. Mayor of Camden, 465 U.S. 208 (1984), involved a New Jersey statute authorizing cities to adopt affirmative action plans. Camden passed an ordinance requiring that at least 40 percent of the employees of contractors and subcontractors on city projects be Camden residents. After holding that the privilege and immunities clause was applicable even though the ordinance excluded citizens of New Jersey (those living outside of Camden) as well as citizens from Pennsylvania and other states, Justice Rehnquist's opinion for the Court described the clause's primary purpose: "to help fuse into one Nation a collection of independent, sovereign States. It was designed to insure to a citizen of State A who ventures into State B the same privileges which the citizens of State B enjoy." The clause applied when a privilege or immunity was burdened. The Court held that an out-of-state resident's interest in employment on public works contracts was "'fundamental' to the promotion of interstate harmony" and therefore protected by the clause. The Court remanded the case for consideration of whether the infringement of a right protected by the clause was constitutionally permissible. The clause "does not preclude discrimination against citizens of other States where there is a 'substantial reason' for the difference in treatment. ‘[T]he inquiry in each case must be concerned with whether such reasons do exist and whether the degree of discrimination bears a close relation to them.’” As part of any justification offered for the discriminatory law, nonresidents must somehow be shown to “constitute a peculiar source of the evil at which the statute is aimed.” Preference for residents might be justified as a necessary means of counteracting “[spiralling] unemployment, a sharp decline in population, and a dramatic reduction in the number of businesses located in the city [which] have eroded property values and depleted the city’s tax base.”

See also Supreme Court of New Hampshire v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274 (1985) (holding that a rule limiting bar admission to local residents violated the privileges and immunities clause).

b. The doctrine’s history. In Corfield v. Coryell, 6 F. Cas. 546 (C.C.E.D. Pa. 1823) (No. 3230), Justice Bushrod Washington stated that the clause protected interests which are fundamental; which belong, of right, to the citizens of all free governments. [These] may [all be] comprehended under the following general heads: Protection by the government, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; subject nevertheless to such restraints as the government may prescribe for the general good of the whole.

Corfield held that a New Jersey statute forbidding nonresidents from gathering clams from state waters did not violate the clause because the clams were the property of the state. (What result under modern commerce clause doctrine?) See generally Varat, State “Citizenship” and Interstate Equality, 48 U. Chi. L. Rev. 487 (1981). (The fourteenth amendment also contains a privileges or immunities clause, which has been held to prohibit state infringements of the privileges of national citizenship. See Chapter 6, infra.)

c. What does article IV, section 2 add to the commerce clause? Suppose Camden had imposed the residency requirement on all businesses located in Camden or supplying goods to the city. What result under the commerce clause? In many ways, the modern function of article IV, section 2 appears to be that of carving out an exception to the market-participant exception to the commerce clause. Note, however, that corporations are not “citizens” within the meaning of the privileges and immunities clause. Paul v. Virginia, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 168 (1868). Is the test formulated by the Court in Camden different from the undue burden test under the commerce clause? Note, however, that Camden’s ordinance is discriminatory. What commerce clause test would apply to it?

d. Justice Blackmun's dissent in Camden argued that New Jersey residents excluded from jobs in Camden could adequately represent the interests of out-of-state citizens. Justice Rehnquist replied that the ordinance was enacted pursuant to a state law authorizing every city to adopt similar programs. This, he said, made it "hard to see how New Jersey residents living outside Camden will protect the interests of out-of-state citizens." Is this problem different from that in Dean Milk?

e. For a recent discussion of the privileges and immunities clause and the dormant commerce clause, see McBurney v. Young, 133 S. Ct. 1709 (2013), holding that a Virginia freedom of information statute limiting its use to state citizens is constitutional. According to the Court, statutory access to state-held information is not a "fundamental" right protected by the privileges and immunities clause, the distinction was not drawn to provide economic protection to citizens engaged in businesses using state-held information, and Virginia provided reasonable alternative methods by which out-of-state citizens could get access to information about judicial and other public proceedings. Questioning whether the statute triggered dormant commerce clause scrutiny (because the statute did not prohibit access to an interstate market or unduly burden such access), the Court held that the market-participant doctrine permitted the distinction because the state had created the market for information subject to the freedom of information act.

3. The equal protection clause. Consider Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. Ward, 470 U.S. 869 (1985). Paul v. Virginia, supra, held that insurance contracts were not in interstate commerce. As a result, states developed extensive and sometimes burdensome systems for regulating insurance. In 1944, the Court rejected Paul in United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association, 322 U.S. 533. Congress responded by passing the McCarran-Ferguson Act, which declared it to be national policy that "the continued regulation and taxation by the several States of the business of insurance is in the public interest, and that silence on the part of Congress shall not be construed to impose any barrier to the regulation or taxation of such business by the several States." Alabama placed a 1 percent tax on the gross receipts of local insurance companies, while requiring that out-of-state companies pay a tax of 3 to 4 percent, which could be lowered by 1 percent if the companies invested substantially in Alabama. The equal protection clause allows such discrimination if it is a rational means to accomplish a "legitimate state purpose." The Court, dividing five to four, held that the state's purpose of "encouraging the formation of new insurance companies in Alabama" was an impermissible one. It was "purely and completely discriminatory” for Alabama “to [erect] barriers to foreign companies [in] order to improve its domestic insurers’ ability to compete at home.” This is “the very sort of parochial discrimination that the Equal Protection Clause was intended to prevent.” The McCarran-Ferguson Act was irrelevant because it lifted commerce clause restrictions but not equal protection ones:

Under Commerce Clause analysis, the State’s interest, if legitimate, is weighed against the burden the state law would impose on interstate commerce. In the equal protection context, however, if the State’s purpose is found to be legitimate, the state law stands as long as the burden it imposes is found to be rationally related to that purpose, a relationship that is not difficult to establish. The two [provisions] perform different functions—[one] protects interstate commerce, and the other protects persons from unconstitutional discrimination.

The Court conceded that “the effect of the discrimination in this case is similar to the type of burden with which the Commerce Clause would also be concerned,” but said that “acceptance of [the] contention that promotion of domestic industry is always a legitimate state purpose under equal protection analysis would eviscerate the Equal Protection Clause in this context.”

Justice O’Connor’s long dissent was joined by Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Rehnquist. She said that “it is obviously legitimate for a State to seek to promote local business.”

Why is encouraging entry by exempting out-of-state companies from regulation different from doing so by differential taxation? Note that in Metropolitan Life, if the state’s policy succeeds, local insurers will face greater competition. What result in Metropolitan Life under the commerce clause? Is the Court’s distinction between the purposes of the two clauses persuasive where, as in Metropolitan Life, the commerce clause challenge rests on facial discrimination? Would the Court “weigh” the competing interests in a commerce clause challenge to Alabama’s statute? What is the effect of the McCarran-Ferguson Act after Metropolitan Life?

Note: Concluding Observations

The various doctrines concerning discrimination are not entirely consistent. The market-participant doctrine exempts states from judicial supervision pursuant to ordinary commerce clause analysis; the privileges and immunities clause reimposes that scrutiny in cases involving individuals (perhaps under a somewhat less rigorous standard); and the equal protection clause may reimpose it in cases involving corporations (again perhaps under a somewhat less rigorous standard). Why has the Court constructed the doctrine in this complex way?

Consider the possibility that the Court finds itself caught between the implications of two intuitions. The dormant commerce clause may imply that states may never favor their own citizens. Yet, basic ideas of federalism suggest that one of the points of having state governments is to allow state citizens control over their governors precisely in order to secure benefits to themselves that they do not have to distribute to outsiders. Does the fundamental difficulty stem from attempting to implement the “thought” that the Constitution endorses some vision of a governmental process in which the preferences of citizens are perfectly aggregated, in a federal system where, because people are simultaneously citizens of state and nation, it is always unclear whose preferences ought to be perfectly aggregated?

3. Facially Neutral Statutes with Significant Effects on Interstate Commerce

Two related issues arise in connection with statutes that are facially neutral but have significant effects on interstate commerce. First, is a particular statute facially neutral but adopted with the intent of discriminating against out-of-state commerce? How can the courts identify statutes adopted with such intent? Note in the materials that follow repeated suggestions that patterns of exemptions, and statements by sponsors, support the inference that the statute at issue was adopted with a discriminatory purpose. The cases also suggest that facially neutral statutes adopted with discriminatory purposes should be analyzed according to the principles used in analyzing facially discriminatory statutes.

Second, what standard is used to assess the constitutionality of facially neutral statutes, not adopted with a discriminatory intent, that have significant effects on interstate commerce? Some formulations suggest that the courts should balance the in-state benefits and the out-of-state effects; others suggest that facially neutral statutes with significant effects on interstate commerce are constitutional unless the in-state benefits are trivial or nonexistent. Which of the approaches are consistent with which of the general theories of the dormant commerce clause?

Two cases from the New Deal era set the stage for more recent developments. In South Carolina Highway Department v. Barnwell Brothers, 303 U.S. 177 (1938), the Court upheld a state law prohibiting the use of large trucks on the state’s highways. The trial court had found that trucks defined as large under the state statute could be used without damage to those highways.

According to then-Justice Stone, “few subjects of state regulation are so peculiarly of local concern as is the use of state highways.” In the absence of congressional action, the test was “whether the state legislature [has] acted within its province, and whether the means of regulation chosen are reasonably adapted to the end sought.” In “resolving the second [inquiry], the courts do not sit as Legislatures [to weigh] all the conflicting interests. [Fairly] debatable questions as to [a regulation’s] reasonableness, wisdom and propriety are not for the determination of courts, but for the legislative body.” The court must decide “upon the whole record whether it is possible to say that the legislative choice is without rational basis.”

In Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona, 325 U.S. 761 (1945), the Court, again through Chief Justice Stone, found unconstitutional a 1912 statute limiting train lengths to fourteen passenger or seventy freight cars. The “matters for ultimate determination” were “the nature and extent of the burden which the state regulation, [adopted] as a safety measure, imposes on interstate commerce, and whether the relative weights of the state and national interests are such as to make inapplicable the rule [that] the free flow of interstate commerce [in] matters requiring uniformity of regulation” is protected by the commerce clause. The Court reviewed “detailed findings of fact” made in a long trial below. Breaking up and remaking long trains at the state’s borders delayed traffic. The Court held that [enforcement] of the law in Arizona [must] inevitably result in an impairment of efficient railroad operation because the railroads are subjected to regulation which is not uniform in its application. [Either trains are broken up and reconstituted, or] the carrier [must] conform to the lowest train limit restriction of any of the states through which its trains pass, whose laws thus control the carriers’ operations both within and without the regulating state.

The Court then turned to the safety benefits of the law:

The decisive question is whether in the circumstances the total effect of the law as a safety measure in reducing accidents and casualties is so slight or problematical as not to outweigh the national interest in keeping interstate commerce free from interferences which seriously impede it and subject it to local regulation which does not have a uniform effect on the interstate train journey which it interrupts.

Longer trains cause accidents by “slack action,” the movement of one car before it transmits its momentum to the next one to which it is loosely coupled. But the evidence showed that, in states leaving train lengths unregulated, the accident rate on long trains was the same as that on Arizona's shorter trains. Further, because the regulation meant that more trains had to be used, there were more grade-crossing collisions and collisions between trains in the course of switching tracks. The Court found that the regulation, viewed as a safety measure, affords at most slight and dubious advantage, if any, over unregulated train lengths, because it results in an increase in the number of trains and train operations and the consequent increases in train accidents of a character generally more severe than those due to slack action.

Justice Black's dissenting opinion described the Arizona statute as the product of a long-standing political struggle between railroads and railroad workers, conducted in state legislatures and in Congress. He called the trial in Southern Pacific "extraordinary" in that the issue was "whether the law was unconstitutional [because] the legislature had been guilty of misjudging the facts concerning the degree of the danger of long trains." He continued, "the evil [the Court] finds in a lack of uniformity is that it (1) delays interstate commerce, (2) increases its cost and (3) impairs its efficiency. All three of these boil down to the same thing, and that is that running shorter trains would increase the cost of railroad operations. [The] conclusion that a requirement for long trains will 'burden interstate commerce' is a mere euphemism for the statement that a requirement for long trains will increase the cost of railroad operations." Justice Black criticized the Court for "requiring that money costs outweigh human values" in the name of "an 'economical national railroad system.'"

HUNT v. WASHINGTON STATE APPLE ADVERTISING COMMISSION, 432 U.S. 333 (1977). North Carolina enacted a statute requiring all closed containers of apples sold or shipped into the state to bear "no grade other than the applicable U.S. grade or standard." Washington, the country's largest producer of apples, requires that apples be tested and graded under a system of grades superior to the standards adopted by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. North Carolina agreed that the statute placed substantial financial burdens on Washington apple producers, who could comply with North Carolina law only by altering the containers used to pack apples, by repacking those that were shipped to North Carolina, or by discontinuing use of preprinted containers with the Washington grades entirely. North Carolina defended its regulation as a measure designed to protect against fraud in apple marketing. The Court held the regulation unconstitutional. Chief Justice Burger wrote:

The challenged statute has the practical effect of not only burdening interstate sales of Washington apples, but also discriminating against them. This discrimination takes various forms. The first [is] the statute's consequence of raising the costs of doing business in the North Carolina market for Washington apple growers and dealers, while leaving those of their North Carolina counterparts unaffected. [This] disparate effect results from the fact that North Carolina apple producers, unlike their Washington competitors, were not forced to alter their marketing practices in order to comply with the statute. They were still free to market their wares under the USDA grade or none at all as they had done prior to the statute's enactment. Obviously, the increased costs imposed by the statute would tend to shield the local apple industry from the competition of Washington apple growers and dealers who are already at a competitive disadvantage because of their great distance from the North Carolina market.

Second, the statute has the effect of stripping away from the Washington apple industry the competitive and economic advantages it has earned for itself through its expensive inspection and grading system. [The] Washington apple-grading system has gained nationwide acceptance in the apple trade. [Apple] brokers and dealers located both inside and outside of North Carolina [state] their preference [for] apples graded under the Washington [system] because of [its] greater consistency, its emphasis on color, and its supporting mandatory inspections. Once again, the statute had no similar impact on the North Carolina apple industry and thus operated to its benefit.

Third, by prohibiting Washington growers and dealers from marketing apples under their State's grades, the statute has a leveling effect which insidiously operates to the advantage of local apple producers. [The] Washington State grades are equal or superior to the USDA grades in all corresponding categories. Hence, with free market forces at work, Washington sellers would normally enjoy a distinct market advantage vis-à-vis local producers in those categories where the Washington grade is superior. However, because of the statute's operation, Washington apples which would otherwise qualify for and be sold under the superior Washington grades will now have to be marketed under their inferior USDA counterparts. Such "downgrading" offers the North Carolina apple industry the very sort of protection against competing out-of-state products that the Commerce Clause was designed to prohibit....

The several States unquestionably possess a substantial interest in protecting their citizens from confusion and deception in the marketing of foodstuffs, but the challenged statute does remarkably little to further that laudable goal at least with respect to Washington apples and grades. The statute [permits] the marketing of closed containers of apples under no grades at all. Such a result can hardly be thought to eliminate the problems of deception and confusion created by the multiplicity of differing state grades; indeed, it magnifies them by depriving purchasers of all information concerning the quality of the contents of closed apple containers. [In] addition, it appears that nondiscriminatory alternatives to the outright ban of Washington State grades are readily available. For example, North Carolina could effectuate its goal by permitting out-of-state growers to utilize state grades only if they also marked their shipments with the applicable USDA label....

Note: Inferring Intent from Effect

Should the courts infer a discriminatory or anticommercial purpose from neutral criteria that have the effect of distinguishing in-state and out-of-state producers? How precisely must the neutral criteria target out-of-state producers to justify that inference? Consider these comments in the Court's opinion in Hunt:

Despite the statute's facial neutrality, the Commission suggests that its discriminatory impact on interstate commerce was not an unintended byproduct and there are some indications in the record to that effect. The most glaring is the response of the North Carolina Agriculture Commissioner to the Commission's request for an exemption following the statute's passage in which he indicated that before he could support such an exemption, he would "want to have the sentiment from our apple producers since they were mainly responsible for this legislation being passed...." [However], we need not ascribe an economic protection motive to the North Carolina Legislature to resolve this case; we conclude that the challenged statute cannot stand insofar as it prohibits the display of Washington State grades even if enacted for the declared purpose of protecting consumers from deception and fraud in the marketplace.

How important should be the presence or absence of evidence like that taken from the state's Agriculture Commissioner?

Consider Minnesota v. Clover Leaf Creamery Co., 449 U.S. 456 (1981). Minnesota prohibited the sale of milk in plastic disposable containers but allowed its sale in paper nonreturnable cartons. The Supreme Court accepted the argument that the statute served its stated purposes of promoting conservation, easing waste disposal problems, and conserving energy. The state's trial court had found that the "actual basis" of the statute "was to promote the economic interests of certain segments of the local dairy and pulpwood industries at the expense of the economic interests of other segments of the dairy industry and the plastics industry." It also had found that banning the use of plastic bottles would not in fact promote conservation or save energy because paper containers are "a more environmentally harmful product." The Supreme Court responded:

Minnesota's statute does not effect "simple protectionism," but "regulates evenhandedly" by prohibiting all milk retailers from selling their products in plastic, nonreturnable milk containers, without regard to whether the milk, the containers, or the sellers are from outside the State. This statute is therefore unlike statutes discriminating against interstate commerce, which we have consistently struck down. E.g., [Hughes; Philadelphia v. New Jersey; Hunt]....

[Within] Minnesota, business will presumably shift from manufacturers of plastic nonreturnable containers to producers of paperboard cartons, refillable bottles, and plastic pouches, but there is no reason to suspect that the gainers will be Minnesota firms, or the losers out-of-state firms. Indeed, two of the three dairies, the sole milk retailer, and the sole milk container producer challenging the statute in this litigation are Minnesota firms.¹⁷

Pulpwood producers are the only Minnesota industry likely to benefit significantly from the Act at the expense of out-of-state firms. Respondents point out that plastic resin, the raw material used for making plastic nonreturnable milk jugs, is produced entirely by non-Minnesota firms, while pulpwood, used for making paperboard, is a major Minnesota product. Nevertheless, it is clear that respondents exaggerate the degree of burden on out-of-state interests, both because plastics will continue to be used in the production of plastic pouches, plastic returnable bottles, and paperboard itself, and because out-of-state pulpwood producers will presumably absorb some of the business generated by the Act....

Is this analysis of the issue of intent persuasive? Is the problem addressed here different from that in Hunt? In Philadelphia v. New Jersey?

Exxon Corp. v. Governor of Maryland
437 U.S. 117 (1978)

MR. JUSTICE STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

A Maryland statute provides that a producer or refiner of petroleum products [may] not operate any retail service station within the State....

[All] of the gasoline sold by Exxon in Maryland is transported into the State from refineries located elsewhere. Although Exxon sells the bulk of this gas to wholesalers and independent retailers, it also sells directly to the consuming public through 36 company-operated stations. Exxon uses these stations to test innovative marketing concepts or products....

[Approximately] 3,800 retail service stations in Maryland sell over 20 different brands of gasoline. However, no petroleum products are produced or refined in Maryland, and the number of stations actually operated by a refiner or an affiliate is relatively small, representing about 5% of the total number of Maryland retailers....

Plainly, the Maryland statute does not discriminate against interstate goods, nor does it favor local producers and refiners. Since Maryland's entire gasoline supply flows in interstate commerce and since there are no local producers or refiners, such claims of disparate treatment between interstate and local commerce would be meritless. Appellants, however, focus on the retail market, arguing that the effect of the statute is to protect in-state independent dealers from out-of-state competition. They contend that the divestiture provisions "create a protected enclave for Maryland independent dealers...." As support for this proposition, they rely on the fact that the burden of the divestiture requirements falls solely on interstate companies....

As the record shows, there are several major interstate marketers of petroleum that own and operate their own retail gasoline stations. These interstate dealers, who compete directly with the Maryland independent dealers, are not affected by the Act because they do not refine or produce gasoline. In fact, the Act creates no barriers whatsoever against interstate independent dealers; it does not prohibit the flow of interstate goods, place added costs upon them, or distinguish between in-state and out-of-state companies in the retail market. [While] the refiners will no longer enjoy their same status in the Maryland market, in-state independent dealers will have no competitive advantage over out-of-state dealers. The fact that the burden of a state regulation falls on some interstate companies does not, by itself, establish a claim of discrimination against interstate commerce.¹⁶

The crux of appellants' claim is that, regardless of whether the State has interfered with the movement of goods in interstate commerce, it has interfered "with the natural functioning of the interstate market either through prohibition or through burdensome regulation." Hughes v. Alexandria Scrap Corp., 426 U.S. 794, 806. Appellants then claim that the statute "will surely change the market structure by weakening the independent refiners...." We cannot, however, accept appellants' underlying notion that the Commerce Clause protects the particular structure or methods of operation in a retail market. As indicated by the Court in Hughes, the Clause protects the interstate market, not particular interstate firms, from prohibitive or burdensome regulations. It may be true that the consuming public will be injured by the loss of the high-volume, low-priced stations operated by the independent refiners, but again that argument relates to the wisdom of the statute, not to its burden on commerce.

[The Court also rejected a preemption argument made by Exxon.]

The judgment is affirmed.

So ordered.

MR. JUSTICE POWELL took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN, [dissenting as to the commerce clause issue].

[The] divestiture provisions preclude out-of-state competitors from retailing gasoline within Maryland. The effect is to protect in-state retail service station dealers from the competition of the out-of-state businesses. This protectionist discrimination is not justified by any legitimate state interest that cannot be vindicated by more evenhanded regulation....

I...

B...

No facial inequality exists. [But] given the structure of the retail gasoline market in Maryland, the effect [is] to exclude a class of predominantly out-of-state gasoline retailers while providing protection from competition to a class of nonintegrated retailers that is overwhelmingly composed of local businessman. [Of] the class of stations statutorily insulated from the competition of the out-of-state integrated firms [more] than 99% were operated by local business interests. Of the class of enterprises excluded entirely from participation in the retail gasoline market, 95% were out-of-state firms, operating 98% of the stations in the class....

[The] ban [will] preclude the majors from enhancing brand recognition and consumer acceptance through retail outlets with company-controlled standards. Their ability directly to monitor consumer preferences and reactions will be diminished. And their opportunity for experimentation with retail marketing techniques will be curtailed. In short, the divestiture provisions [will] inflict significant economic hardship on Maryland's major brand companies, all of which are out-of-state firms.

Similar hardship is not imposed upon the local service station dealers by the divestiture provisions. Indeed, rather than restricting their ability to compete, the Maryland Act effectively and perhaps intentionally improves their competitive position by insulating them from competition by out-of-state integrated producers and refiners. [The] foundation of the discrimination in this case is that the local dealers may continue to enter retail transactions and to compete for retail profits while the statute will deny similar opportunities to the class composed almost entirely of out-of-state businesses....

The State's showing may be so meager because any legitimate interest in competition can be vindicated with more evenhanded regulation. [To] the extent that the State's interest in competition is nothing more than a desire to protect particular competitors—less efficient local businessmen—from the legal competition of more efficient out-of-state firms, the interest is illegitimate under the Commerce Clause....⁸

II...

To accept the argument of the Court, that is, that discrimination must be universal to offend the Commerce Clause, naively will foster protectionist discrimination against interstate commerce.¹³ In the future, States will be able to insulate in-state interests from competition by identifying the most potent segments of out-of-state business, banning them, and permitting less effective out-of-state actors to remain. The record shows that the Court permits Maryland to effect just such discrimination in this case. The State bans the most powerful out-of-state firms from retailing gasoline within its boundaries. It then insulates the forced divestiture of 199 service stations from constitutional attack by permitting out-of-state firms [to] continue to operate 34 gasoline stations....

[Merely] demonstrating a burden on some out-of-state actors does not prove unconstitutional discrimination. But when the burden is significant, when it falls on the most numerous and effective group of out-of-state competitors, when a similar burden does not fall on the class of protected in-state businessmen, and when the State cannot justify the resulting disparity by showing that its legislative interests cannot be vindicated by more evenhanded regulation, unconstitutional discrimination exists....

[The state] Court of Appeals reasoned that [the statute] did not discriminate against the class of out-of-state refiners and producers because the wholesale flow of petroleum products into the State was not restricted. [The] Maryland statute has not effected discrimination with regard to the wholesaling or interstate transport of petroleum. The discrimination exists with regard to retailing. The fact that gasoline will continue to flow into the State does not permit the State to deny out-of-state firms the opportunity to retail it once it arrives....

Note: Facially Neutral Statutes with (Merely?) Disproportionate Effects for Commercial or Social Purposes

1. Gerrymandering or mere facial neutrality? Is the inference of anticommercial intent weaker in Exxon than in Hunt? Note footnote 8 in Justice Blackmun's opinion in Exxon. Does Exxon involve anticommercial intent but no significant anticommercial impact? Consider whether the cases make a statute's use of express or strongly implied discrimination conclusive. Is such formalism justified on the grounds that form is strongly, though not perfectly, correlated with cost exporting, and that the gains from allowing courts to look beyond form are outweighed by the costs in encouraging complex litigation?

2. Commerce—gasoline or retailing? The Court argues in Exxon that interstate commerce in gasoline will be unaffected by the statute because all it can do is force Maryland consumers to switch from cheaper brands of gasoline originating out of state to more expensive brands also originating out of state. Justice Blackmun argues that the courts should confine their attention to the subject regulated—here, retailing. Why? Consider the implications of the following argument: In a strongly interconnected economy, local regulations can do no more than alter the patterns of interstate trade; they cannot reduce it. Isn't this the lesson of Wickard v. Filburn and Katzenbach v. McClung, supra? States may succeed in protecting particular local industries, but they cannot protect their entire economies. Thus, local regulations serve only distributional goals, altering the relative wealth of in-state and out-of-state producers and of consumers. What, if anything, is there in the materials presented here that suggests that the Constitution is concerned with these goals?

3. Cost-benefit analysis. Who bears the costs and gains the benefits of Maryland's statutes? How substantial are the higher prices that Maryland consumers are likely to face? Consider L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 417 (2d ed. 1988):

Behind the Court's analysis in Exxon stands an important doctrinal theme: the negative implications of the commerce clause derive principally from a political theory of union, not from an economic theory of free trade. The function of the clause is to ensure national solidarity, not economic efficiency. Although the Court's commerce clause opinions have often employed the language of economics, the decisions have not interpreted the Constitution as establishing the inviolability of the free market. More particularly, the constitutional vice of economic protectionism is not implicated by a regulation which makes impossible the economies of scale that a fully open market permits.

How is national solidarity promoted other than by economic integration? By prohibiting states from enacting statutes designed to hurt other states' interests? By prohibiting states from adopting statutes whose terms indicate willingness to go it alone?

4. The problem of sales and compensating use taxes. Henneford v. Silas Mason Co., 300 U.S. 577 (1937), involved Washington's sales and use taxes. The state adopted a 2 percent tax. To avoid losing business to retailers in other states, it also adopted a 2 percent "compensating use tax," levied on the price of goods purchased elsewhere for the "privilege of using" them in Washington. Justice Cardozo's opinion for the Court, upholding the compensating use tax, described it as designed to promote equality.

A modern discussion of compensating use taxes is Oregon Waste Systems v. Department of Environmental Quality, 511 U.S. 93 (1994). Oregon charged a fee of $0.85 per ton on the disposal of waste generated in Oregon and a fee of $2.25 on the disposal in Oregon of waste generated outside the state. The Court held that the differential was discriminatory and triggered the "virtually per se rule of invalidity." Treating the differential as a compensatory use tax, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Thomas, clarified the doctrine by stressing that the fact that a tax or fee is "compensatory" is "merely a specific way of justifying a facially discriminatory tax." Compensating use taxes must be imposed on "substantially equivalent events." This implied that the state could not justify a specific tax like the one at issue here by pointing to "general taxation, such as income taxes," that in-state generators pay, but out-of-state generators do not.

Note that compensating use taxes are not facially neutral. The Court treated Henneford v. Silas Mason as still good law because sale and use are "substantially equivalent taxable events." Chief Justice Rehnquist's dissent in Oregon Waste Systems claimed that out-of-state commerce gained a competitive advantage from the Court's rule that it will not consider whether general taxes in Oregon offset the difference between the higher fees charged those who dispose of out-of-state waste and those who dispose of in-state waste: Only Oregon businesses "will have to pay the 'nondisposal' fees associated with solid waste:

landfill siting, landfill clean-up, insurance to cover environmental accidents, and transportation improvement costs associated with out-of-state waste being transported into the State.” Could the courts administer a rule examining general taxes to see if they offset the difference?

Kassel v. Consolidated Freightways Corp.

450 U.S. 662 (1981)

JUSTICE POWELL announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion, in which JUSTICE WHITE, JUSTICE BLACKMUN, and JUSTICE STEVENS joined.

The question is whether an Iowa statute that prohibits the use of certain large trucks within the State unconstitutionally burdens interstate commerce.

I...

[Consolidated, one of the nation’s largest common carriers, used two types of trucks: the “semi,” 55 feet long, and the “double,” a 65-foot-long combination of a tractor and two trailers. It operated on Interstate Routes 80 and 35, major transportation corridors through Iowa.] Unlike all other States in the West and Midwest, Iowa generally prohibits the use of 65-foot doubles within its borders. Instead, most truck combinations are restricted to 55 feet in length. Doubles, mobile homes, trucks carrying vehicles such as tractors and other farm equipment, and singles hauling livestock, are permitted to be as long as 60 feet. Not notwithstanding these restrictions, Iowa’s statute permits cities abutting the state line by local ordinance to adopt the length limitations of the adjoining State. Where a city has exercised this option, otherwise oversized trucks are permitted within the city limits and in nearby commercial zones.

Iowa also provides for two other relevant exemptions. An Iowa truck manufacturer may obtain a permit to ship trucks that are as large as 70 feet. Permits also are available to move oversized mobile homes, provided that the unit is to be moved from a point within Iowa or delivered for an Iowa resident.⁷

...

In a 14-day trial, both sides adduced evidence on safety, and on the burden on interstate commerce imposed by Iowa’s law. On the question of safety, the District Court found that the “evidence clearly establishes that the twin is as safe as the semi.” For that reason, there is no valid safety reason for barring twins from Iowa’s highways because of their configuration....

Twins and semis have different characteristics. Twins are more maneuverable, are less sensitive to wind, and create less splash and spray. However, they are more likely than semis to jackknife or upset. They can be backed only for a short distance. The negative characteristics are not such that they render the twin less safe than semis overall. Semis are more stable but are more likely to “rear end” another vehicle....

III

[We] conclude that the Iowa truck-length limitations unconstitutionally burden interstate commerce. [The] State failed to present any persuasive evidence that 65-foot doubles are less safe than 55-foot singles. Moreover, Iowa’s law is now out of step with the laws of all other Midwestern and Western States. Iowa thus substantially burdens the interstate flow of goods by truck. In the absence of congressional action to set uniform standards, some burdens associated with state safety regulations must be tolerated. But where, as here, the State’s safety interest has been found to be illusory, and its regulations impair significantly the federal interest in efficient and safe interstate transportation, the state law cannot be harmonized with the Commerce Clause.¹²

A...

B

Consolidated, meanwhile, demonstrated that Iowa’s law substantially burdens interstate commerce. Trucking companies that wish to continue to use 65-foot doubles must route them around Iowa or detach the trailers of the doubles and ship them through separately. Alternatively, trucking companies must use the smaller 55-foot singles or 60-foot doubles permitted under Iowa law. Each of these options engenders inefficiency and added expense. The record shows that Iowa’s law added about $12.6 million each year to the costs of trucking companies. Consolidated alone incurred about $2 million per year in increased costs.

In addition to increasing the costs of the trucking companies (and, indirectly, of the service to consumers), Iowa’s law may aggravate, rather than ameliorate, the problem of highway accidents. Fifty-five-foot singles carry less freight than 65-foot doubles. Either more small trucks must be used to carry the same quantity of goods through Iowa, or the same number of larger trucks must drive longer distances to bypass Iowa. In either case, [the] restriction requires more highway miles to be driven to transport the same quantity of goods. Other things being equal, accidents are proportional to distance traveled. Thus, if 65-foot doubles are as safe as 55-foot singles, Iowa's law tends to increase the number of accidents, and to shift the incidence of them from Iowa to other States.¹⁸

Perhaps recognizing the weakness of the evidence supporting its safety argument, and the substantial burden on commerce that its regulations create, Iowa urges the Court simply to "defer" to the safety judgment of the State. It argues that the length of trucks is generally, although perhaps imprecisely, related to safety. The task of drawing a line is one that Iowa contends should be left to its legislature.

The Court normally does accord "special deference" to state highway safety regulations. [Raymond Motor Transportation, Inc. v. Rice, 434 U.S. 429.] This traditional deference "derives in part from the assumption that where such regulations do not discriminate on their face against interstate commerce, their burden usually falls on local economic interests as well as other States' economic interests, thus insuring that a State's own political processes will serve as a check against unduly burdensome regulations." Less deference to the legislative judgment is due, however, where the local regulation bears disproportionately on out-of-state residents and businesses. Such a disproportionate burden is apparent here. Iowa's scheme, although generally banning large doubles from the State, nevertheless has several exemptions that secure to Iowans many of the benefits of large trucks while shunting to neighboring States many of the costs associated with their use.

At the time of trial there were two particularly significant exemptions. First, singles hauling livestock or farm vehicles were permitted to be as long as 60 feet. [This] provision undoubtedly was helpful to local interests. Second, cities abutting other States were permitted to enact local ordinances adopting the larger length limitation of the neighboring State. This exemption offered the benefits of longer trucks to individuals and businesses in important border cities without burdening Iowa's highways with interstate through traffic.

The origin of the "border cities exemption" also suggests that Iowa's statute may not have been designed to ban dangerous trucks, but rather to discourage interstate truck traffic. In 1974, the legislature passed a bill that would have permitted 65-foot doubles in the State. Governor Ray vetoed the bill. He said:

I find sympathy with those who are doing business in our state and whose enterprises could gain from increased cargo carrying ability by trucks. However, with this bill, the Legislature has pursued a course that would benefit only a few Iowa-based companies while providing a great advantage for out-of-state trucking firms and competitors at the expense of our Iowa citizens.

After the veto, the “border cities exemption” was immediately enacted and signed by the Governor.

It is thus far from clear that Iowa was motivated primarily by a judgment that 65-foot doubles are less safe than 55-foot singles. Rather, Iowa seems to have hoped to limit the use of its highways by deflecting some through traffic. [A] State cannot constitutionally promote its own parochial interests by requiring safe vehicles to detour around it.

V...

Because Iowa has imposed this burden without any significant countervailing safety interest, its statute violates the Commerce Clause. The judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom JUSTICE MARSHALL joins, concurring in the judgment....

Though my Brother Powell recognizes that the State’s actual purpose in maintaining the truck-length regulation was “to limit the use of its highways by deflecting some through traffic,” he fails to recognize that this purpose, being protectionist in nature, is impermissible under the Commerce Clause....

Iowa may not shunt off its fair share of the burden of maintaining interstate truck routes, nor may it create increased hazards on the highways of neighboring States in order to decrease the hazards on Iowa highways. Such an attempt has all the hallmarks of the “simple...protectionism” this Court has condemned in the economic area. [Philadelphia v. New Jersey.]...

I therefore concur in the judgment.

JUSTICE REHNQUIST, with whom [CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER] and JUSTICE STEWART join, dissenting....

I...

[Iowa's] action in limiting the length of trucks which may travel on its highway is in no sense unusual. Every State in the Union regulates the length of vehicles permitted to use the public roads. Nor is Iowa a renegade in having the length limits which operate to exclude the 65-foot doubles favored by Consolidated. These trucks are prohibited in other areas of the country as well, some 17 States and the District of Columbia, including all of New England and most of the Southeast....

II...

A determination that a state law is a rational safety measure does not end the Commerce Clause inquiry. A "sensitive consideration" of the safety purpose in relation to the burden on commerce is required. [Raymond.] When engaging in such a consideration the Court does not directly compare safety benefits to commerce costs and strike down the legislation if the latter can be said in some vague sense to "outweigh" the former....

The purpose of the "sensitive consideration" [is] rather to determine if the asserted safety justification, although rational, is merely a pretext for discrimination against interstate commerce. We will conclude that it is if the safety benefits from the regulation are demonstrably trivial while the burden on commerce is great....

Iowa defends its statute as a highway safety regulation. There can be no doubt that the challenged statute is a valid highway safety regulation and thus entitled to the strongest presumption of validity against Commerce Clause challenges. As noted, all 50 States regulate the length of trucks which may use their highways....

Iowa adduced evidence supporting the relation between vehicle length and highway safety. The evidence indicated that longer vehicles take greater time to pass, thereby increasing the risks of accidents, particularly during the inclement weather not uncommon in Iowa. The 65-foot vehicle exposes a passing driver to visibility-impairing splash and spray during bad weather for a longer period than do the shorter trucks permitted in Iowa....

The answering of the relevant question is not appreciably advanced by comparing trucks slightly over the length limit with those at the length limit. It is emphatically not our task to balance any incremental safety benefits from prohibiting 65-foot doubles as opposed to 60-foot doubles against the burden on interstate commerce. Lines drawn for safety purposes will rarely pass muster if the question is whether a slight increment can be permitted without sacrificing safety. [The] question is rather whether it can be said that the benefits flowing to Iowa from a rational truck-length limitation are “slight or problematical.” See [Bibb]. The particular line chosen by Iowa—60 feet—is relevant only to the question whether the limit is a rational one. Once a court determines that it is, it considers the overall safety benefits from the regulation against burdens on interstate commerce, and not any marginal benefits from the scheme the State established as opposed to that the plaintiffs desire.

The difficulties with the contrary approach are patent. While it may be clear that there are substantial safety benefits from a 55-foot truck as compared to a 105-foot truck, these benefits may not be discernible in 5-foot jumps. Appellee’s approach would permit what could not be accomplished in one lawsuit to be done in 10 separate suits, each challenging an additional five feet....

[Striking] down Iowa’s law because Consolidated has made a voluntary business decision to employ 65-foot doubles, a decision based on the actions of other state legislatures, would essentially be compelling Iowa to yield to the policy choices of neighboring States. Under our constitutional scheme, however, there is only one legislative body which can preempt the rational policy determination of the Iowa Legislature and that is Congress. Forcing Iowa to yield to the policy choices of neighboring States perverts the primary purpose of the Commerce Clause, that of vesting power to regulate interstate commerce in Congress, where all the States are represented....

Both the plurality and concurring opinions attach great significance to the Governor’s veto of a bill passed by the Iowa Legislature permitting 65-foot doubles. [The] law which the Court strikes down today was not passed to achieve the protectionist goals the plurality and the concurrence ascribe to the Governor. Iowa’s 60-foot length limit was established in 1963, at a time when very few States permitted 65-foot doubles. Striking down legislation on the basis of asserted legislative motives is dubious enough, but the plurality and concurrence strike down the legislation involved in this case because of asserted impermissible motives for not enacting other legislation, motives which could not possibly have been present when the legislation under challenge here was considered and passed. Such action is, so far as I am aware, unprecedented in this Court’s history.

Furthermore, the effort in both the plurality and concurring opinions to portray the legislation involved here as protectionist is in error. Whenever a State enacts more stringent safety measures than its neighbors, in an area which affects commerce, the safety law will have the incidental effect of deflecting interstate commerce to the neighboring States. Indeed, the safety and protectionist motives cannot be separated: The whole purpose of safety regulation of vehicles is to protect the State from unsafe vehicles. If a neighboring State chooses not to protect its citizens from the danger discerned by the enacting State, that is its business, but the enacting State should not be penalized when the vehicles it considers unsafe travel through the neighboring State....

Note: Facially Neutral Statutes with (Merely?) Disproportionate Effects for Police Power Purposes

1. Discrimination? Did Iowa discriminate against interstate commerce? Are any of the in-staters who benefit from the statute competitors of out-of-staters who bear its costs? Are there nondiscriminatory explanations for the exceptions in the statute? (Is the “farm vehicles” exemption relevant at all?) Justice Rehnquist argues that the existence of an undue burden triggers inquiry into whether the regulation is a pretext for discrimination but does not in itself establish a commerce clause violation. Is that an accurate characterization of the cases you have read?

Is the evidence of discriminatory intent more persuasive in Kassel than in Exxon? Is the social purpose of the statute in Exxon, to preserve corner gas stations from absorption into the major oil producers, more substantial than the social purpose of the statute in Kassel? Is the statute in Exxon more likely to accomplish its purposes than the statute in Kassel? Regan, The Supreme Court and State Protectionism: Making Sense of the Dormant Commerce Clause, 84 Mich. L. Rev. 1091, 1185 (1986), argues that the Supreme Court should protect the national transportation network from state legislation that places excessive burdens on it because in such cases “there is a national interest in the existence of an effective transportation network linking the states.” Should Kassel be treated as a transportation case in this sense? Should Exxon?

2. Economic isolationism? If Iowa’s statute is treated as nondiscriminatory, what benefits does it provide? Does it enhance safety in Iowa? In the region? Justice Brennan says that Iowa must bear its “fair share” of safety problems in the region. Suppose Iowa provides so little maintenance on its highways that shippers choose to send their trucks on routes through Missouri. Would Iowa’s policy violate the commerce clause? If not, how might Justice Brennan distinguish that policy from the prohibition on sixty-five-foot trucks?

3. “Obstructing” commerce. In Buck v. Kuykendall, 267 U.S. 307 (1925), Buck, a citizen of Washington, wished to operate an “auto stage” line between Portland, Oregon, and Seattle, Washington. After obtaining a license from Oregon, he applied to the Washington authorities for a certificate that would allow him to begin operations. The certificate was denied on the ground that the route was already adequately served by railroads and four other auto stage lines. The Court held that the denial violated the commerce clause. The purpose was “the prohibition of competition.” Its effect was “not merely to burden [interstate commerce], but to obstruct it.” The Court also noted that the prohibition “[defeated] the purpose of Congress” in legislation providing federal aid for highway construction.

Aside from preemption, why should Washington be barred from limiting competition in transportation? Who bears the burdens and gains the benefits of Washington’s statute? Assuming that the statute protects existing carriers from competition, is it protectionist in the sense of promoting local carriers at the expense of out-of-state ones? Does the case rest on the proposition that the Constitution embodies a substantive preference for free trade sufficient to place the burden of overcoming congressional inertia on those who support regulations that have significant, though nondiscriminatory, effects on interstate commerce?

4. Judicial capacity. Consider Justice Souter’s observation in Department of Revenue of Kentucky v. Davis, 553 U.S. 328 (2008), about the limited capacity of the courts to engage in “cost-benefit analysis”:

What is most significant about these cost-benefit questions is not even the difficulty of answering them or the inevitable uncertainty of the predictions that might be made in trying to come up with answers, but the unsuitability of the judicial process and judicial forums for making whatever predictions and reaching whatever answers are possible at all. While it is not our business to suggest that the current system be reconsidered, if it is to be placed in question a congressional forum has two advantages. Congress has some hope of acquiring more complete information than adversary trials may produce, and an elected legislature is the preferable institution for incurring the economic risks of any alteration in the way things have traditionally been done.

5. Congressional intervention. Do Southern Pacific and Kassel turn on implicit decisions that, under Cooley, the regulation of train and truck lengths is an inherently national subject? Who should bear the burden of persuading Congress that length regulation is desirable or undesirable?

In 1981, Congress enacted the Economic Recovery Tax Act, which substantially reduced individual income tax rates. In 1982, it enacted the Surface Transportation Act. One provision of the act recaptured some of the revenue lost in 1981 by increasing the excise tax on trucks and the tax on gasoline and diesel fuel. Trucking interests opposed these increased taxes but withdrew their opposition in exchange for another provision in the act eliminating the restrictions states placed on the use of doubles on interstate highways, to take effect in 1984. Although the increased tax on gasoline went into effect relatively quickly, collection of the excise tax on trucks was deferred until 1985 because of technical difficulties in defining truck weights. A 1984 amendment to the act allows the Secretary of Transportation, rather than the states, to invoke safety reasons for excluding doubles from some portions of the interstate system. Governors may petition the Secretary for such an exclusion and must demonstrate that the safety reasons are genuine. In addition, the Secretary may, with the permission of a state's governor, open primary noninterstate highways to doubles. Is this congressional action relevant to the constitutional issues discussed in the cases?

Note: Taxation of Interstate Commerce

Consider Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Montana, 453 U.S. 609 (1981). In 1975, Montana imposed a tax on the severance of coal. The rate of 30 percent of the contract sales price was substantially higher than the rate of similar severance taxes in most other states. The proceeds of the tax were to be put into a permanent trust fund from which appropriations of principal could be made only by a three-fourths vote of both houses of the state legislature. The tax produced almost 20 percent of the state's revenue. Montana has 25 percent of the nation's coal reserves and over 50 percent of its low-sulfur coal reserves. Low-sulfur coal can be burned to produce electricity while complying with environmental regulations in plants that do not require extensive modification. Approximately 90 percent of the coal is shipped out of state.

The Court rejected a commerce clause challenge to the tax. It applied a four-part test as stated in Complete Auto Transit v. Brady, 430 U.S. 274 (1977): The tax must be "applied to an activity with a substantial nexus with the taxing State, [must be] fairly apportioned, [must] not discriminate against interstate commerce, and [must be] fairly related to services provided by the State." On the discrimination issue, the Court said:

[The] Montana tax is computed at the same rate regardless of the final destination of the coal, and there is no suggestion here that tax is administered in a manner that departs from this evenhanded formula. We are not, therefore, confronted here with the type of differential tax treatment of interstate and intrastate commerce that the Court has found in other “discrimination” cases. [Philadelphia v. New Jersey.]

Instead, the gravamen of appellants’ claim is that a state tax must be considered discriminatory for purposes of the Commerce Clause if the tax burden is borne primarily by out-of-state consumers....

[There] is no real discrimination in this case; the tax burden is borne according to the amount of coal consumed and not according to any distinction between in-state and out-of-state consumers. Rather, appellants assume that the Commerce Clause gives residents of one State a right of access at reasonable prices to resources located in another State that is richly endowed with such resources, without regard to whether and on what terms residents of the resource-rich State have access to resources. We are not convinced that the Commerce Clause, of its own force, gives the residents of one State the right to control in this fashion the terms of resource development and depletion in a sister State.⁸ Cf. [Philadelphia v. New Jersey].¹⁸

The Court also rejected a preemption argument. Justice White began his concurring opinion by calling the case “very troublesome,” but concluded:

Congress has the power to protect interstate commerce from intolerable or even undesirable burdens. It is also very much aware of the Nation’s energy needs, of the Montana tax, and of the trend in the energy-rich States to aggrandize their position and perhaps lessen the tax burdens on their own citizens by imposing unusually high taxes on mineral extraction. But Congress is so far content to let the matter rest.

Complete Auto Transit shows that the stated tests in cases challenging taxes as undue burdens on interstate commerce differ from the stated tests in cases challenging regulations. Should they? The doctrines applying the commerce clause to state taxes are extremely complex, but Complete Auto Transit and Commonwealth Edison suggest that doctrines regarding taxes and regulations are in the process of converging. Did Justice White properly allocate the burden of securing congressional action?

Comptroller of the Treasury of Maryland v. Wynne, 135 S. Ct. 1787 (2015), held unconstitutional portions of Maryland’s income tax statute because it might lead to double taxation. Compare this with the Court’s concern for conflicts among state regulations in Bibb and similar cases.

In connection with inferences from Congress's failure to act, consider the implications of the following sequence of cases. National Bellas Hess, Inc. v. Department of Revenue, 386 U.S. 753 (1967), held unconstitutional attempts by states to collect use taxes not from purchasers but from out-of-state mail-order sellers who had neither outlets nor sales representatives in the state. The Court held that the states violated the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment in attempting to tax entities that had insufficient connections with them. It also held that requiring the sellers to collect the use taxes imposed an unconstitutional burden on interstate commerce. Note that the due process holding probably (why only probably?) barred Congress from enacting a statute allowing states to require mail-order sellers to collect use taxes.

In Quill Corp. v. North Dakota, 504 U.S. 298 (1992), the Supreme Court revisited this issue. It overruled the due process holding of National Bellas Hess but reaffirmed the commerce clause holding. Five justices joined an opinion by Justice Stevens that justified the result on the ground that it developed a "bright-line rule" to demarcat[e] a discrete realm of commercial activity that is free from interstate taxation. [Like] other bright-line tests, the Bellas Hess rule appears artificial at the edges. [This] artificiality, however, is more than offset by the benefits of a clear rule. Such a rule firmly establishes the boundaries of legitimate state authority to impose a duty to collect sales and use taxes and reduces litigation concerning those taxes.

Justice Scalia, joined by Justices Kennedy and Thomas, concurred in the result, relying entirely on stare decisis considerations regarding the commerce clause holding.

Justice Stevens's opinion concluded by pointing out that the issue was "not only one that Congress may be better qualified to resolve, but also one that Congress has the ultimate power to resolve." It also noted that congressional inaction might have been "dictated" by the due process holding in National Bellas Hess, "but today we have put that problem to rest. Accordingly, Congress is now free to decide whether, when, and to what extent the States may burden interstate mail-order concerns with a duty to collect use taxes."

E. PREEMPTION

Arizona v. United States

567 U.S. 387 (2012)

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Arizona's S.B. 1070 contained several provisions whose enforcement the United States sought to enjoin on the ground that they were preempted by federal immigration law. Section 3 made failure to comply with federal alien-registration requirements a state misdemeanor. Section 5 made it a misdemeanor for an unauthorized alien to seek or engage in work in Arizona. (The U.S. government sought to enjoin the enforcement of several other provisions of S.B. 1070; the Court's analysis of those provisions is omitted.)]...

The Government of the United States has broad, undoubted power over the subject of immigration and the status of aliens....

[Immigration] policy can affect trade, investment, tourism, and diplomatic relations for the entire Nation, as well as the perceptions and expectations of aliens in this country who seek the full protection of its laws. Perceived mistreatment of aliens in the United States may lead to harmful reciprocal treatment of American citizens abroad....

Federal governance of immigration and alien status is extensive and complex....

Discretion in the enforcement of immigration law embraces immediate human concerns. Unauthorized workers trying to support their families, for example, likely pose less danger than alien smugglers or aliens who commit a serious crime. The equities of an individual case may turn on many factors, including whether the alien has children born in the United States, long ties to the community, or a record of distinguished military service. Some discretionary decisions involve policy choices that bear on this Nation's international relations. Returning an alien to his own country may be deemed inappropriate even where he has committed a removable offense or fails to meet the criteria for admission. The foreign state may be mired in civil war, complicit in political persecution, or enduring conditions that create a real risk that the alien or his family will be harmed upon return. The dynamic nature of relations with other countries requires the Executive Branch to ensure that enforcement policies are consistent with this Nation's foreign policy with respect to these and other realities....

The pervasiveness of federal regulation does not diminish the importance of immigration policy to the States. Arizona bears many of the consequences of unlawful immigration. Hundreds of thousands of deportable aliens are apprehended in Arizona each year....

Statistics alone do not capture the full extent of Arizona's concerns. Accounts in the record suggest there is an "epidemic of crime, safety risks, serious property damage, and environmental problems" associated with the influx of illegal migration across private land near the Mexican border....

These concerns are the background for the formal legal analysis that follows. The issue is whether, under preemption principles, federal law permits Arizona to implement the state-law provisions in dispute.

III

Federalism, central to the constitutional design, adopts the principle that both the National and State Governments have elements of sovereignty the other is bound to respect. From the existence of two sovereigns follows the possibility that laws can be in conflict or at cross-purposes. The Supremacy Clause provides a clear rule that federal law "shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding." Art. VI, cl. 2. Under this principle, Congress has the power to preempt state law. There is no doubt that Congress may withdraw specified powers from the States by enacting a statute containing an express preemption provision.

State law must also give way to federal law in at least two other circumstances. First, the States are precluded from regulating conduct in a field that Congress, acting within its proper authority, has determined must be regulated by its exclusive governance. The intent to displace state law altogether can be inferred from a framework of regulation "so pervasive...that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it" or where there is a "federal interest...so dominant that the federal system will be assumed to preclude enforcement of state laws on the same subject." Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230 (1947).

Second, state laws are preempted when they conflict with federal law. This includes cases where "compliance with both federal and state regulations is a physical impossibility," Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 142–143 (1963), and those instances where the challenged state law "stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress," Hines [v. Davidowitz], 312 U.S. [52], 67 (1941). In preemption analysis, courts should assume that “the historic police powers of the States” are not superseded “unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress.” [Rice]....

Section 3

Section 3 [adds] a state-law penalty for conduct proscribed by federal law....

The framework enacted by Congress leads to the conclusion [that] the Federal Government has occupied the field of alien registration. [Where] Congress occupies an entire field, as it has in the field of alien registration, even complementary state regulation is impermissible. Field preemption reflects a congressional decision to foreclose any state regulation in the area, even if it is parallel to federal standards....

Section 5(C)

Unlike §3, which replicates federal statutory requirements, §5(C) enacts a state criminal prohibition where no federal counterpart exists. The provision makes it a state misdemeanor for “an unauthorized alien to knowingly apply for work, solicit work in a public place or perform work as an employee or independent contractor” in Arizona....

[Congress] enacted [the Immigration Reform and Control Act] as a comprehensive framework for “combating the employment of illegal aliens.” The law makes it illegal for employers to knowingly hire, recruit, refer, or continue to employ unauthorized workers. It also requires every employer to verify the employment authorization status of prospective employees. These requirements are enforced through criminal penalties and an escalating series of civil penalties tied to the number of times an employer has violated the provisions.

This comprehensive framework does not impose federal criminal sanctions on the employee side (i.e., penalties on aliens who seek or engage in unauthorized work). Under federal law some civil penalties are imposed instead. With certain exceptions, aliens who accept unlawful employment are not eligible to have their status adjusted to that of a lawful permanent resident. Aliens also may be removed from the country for having engaged in unauthorized work....

IRCA's express preemption provision, which in most instances bars States from imposing penalties on employers of unauthorized aliens, is silent about whether additional penalties may be imposed against the employees themselves. But the existence of an "express pre-emption provisio[n] does not bar the ordinary working of conflict pre-emption principles" or impose a "special burden" that would make it more difficult to establish the preemption of laws falling outside the clause. Geier v. American Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. 861, 869–872 (2000).

The ordinary principles of preemption include the well-settled proposition that a state law is preempted where it "stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress." [Hines]. Under §5(C) of S.B. 1070, Arizona law would interfere with the careful balance struck by Congress with respect to unauthorized employment of aliens. Although §5(C) attempts to achieve one of the same goals as federal law—the deterrence of unlawful employment—it involves a conflict in the method of enforcement. The Court has recognized that a "[c]onflict in technique can be fully as disruptive to the system Congress enacted as conflict in overt policy." Motor Coach Employees v. Lockridge, 403 U.S. 274, 287 (1971). The correct instruction to draw from the text, structure, and history of IRCA is that Congress decided it would be inappropriate to impose criminal penalties on aliens who seek or engage in unauthorized employment. It follows that a state law to the contrary is an obstacle to the regulatory system Congress chose....

[The Court's analysis of the other challenged sections of S.B. 1070 is omitted].

V...

The National Government has significant power to regulate immigration. With power comes responsibility, and the sound exercise of national power over immigration depends on the Nation's meeting its responsibility to base its laws on a political will informed by searching, thoughtful, rational civic discourse. Arizona may have understandable frustrations with the problems caused by illegal immigration while that process continues, but the State may not pursue policies that undermine federal law.

* * *

The judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit is affirmed in part and reversed in part....

JUSTICE KAGAN took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

JUSTICE SCALIA, dissenting in [relevant] part.

The United States is an indivisible “Union of sovereign States.” Hinderlader v. La Plata River & Cherry Creek Ditch Co., 304 U.S. 92, 104 (1938). Today’s opinion, approving virtually all of the Ninth Circuit’s injunction against enforcement of the four challenged provisions of Arizona’s law, deprives States of what most would consider the defining characteristic of sovereignty: the power to exclude from the sovereign’s territory people who have no right to be there. Neither the Constitution itself nor even any law passed by Congress supports this result. I dissent....

II...

[I] accept as a given that State regulation is excluded by the Constitution when (1) it has been prohibited by a valid federal law, or (2) it conflicts with federal regulation—when, for example, it admits those whom federal regulation would exclude, or excludes those whom federal regulation would admit.

Possibility (1) need not be considered here: there is no federal law prohibiting the States’ sovereign power to exclude (assuming federal authority to enact such a law). The mere existence of federal action in the immigration area—and the so-called field preemption arising from that action, upon which the Court’s opinion so heavily relies—cannot be regarded as such a prohibition. We are not talking here about a federal law prohibiting the States from regulating bubble-gum advertising, or even the construction of nuclear plants. We are talking about a federal law going to the core of state sovereignty: the power to exclude....

Nor can federal power over illegal immigration be deemed exclusive because of what the Court’s opinion solicitously calls “foreign countries[’] concern[s] about the status, safety, and security of their nationals in the United States.” [Even] in its international relations, the Federal Government must live with the inconvenient fact that it is a Union of independent States, who have their own sovereign powers. [Though] it may upset foreign powers—and even when the Federal Government desperately wants to avoid upsetting foreign powers—the States have the right to protect their borders against foreign nationals....

JUSTICE THOMAS, dissenting in [relevant] part....

[There] is no conflict between the “ordinary meanin[g]” of the relevant federal laws and that of the four provisions of Arizona law at issue here....

Despite the lack of any conflict between the ordinary meaning of the Arizona law and that of the federal laws at issue here, the Court holds that various provisions of the Arizona law are pre-empted because they “stan[d] as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress.” [Hines]. [The] “purposes and objectives” theory of implied pre-emption is inconsistent with the Constitution because it invites courts to engage in freewheeling speculation about congressional purpose that roams well beyond statutory text. Under the Supremacy Clause, pre-emptive effect is to be given to congressionally enacted laws, not to judicially divined legislative purposes. Thus, even assuming the existence of some tension between Arizona’s law and the supposed “purposes and objectives” of Congress, I would not hold that any of the provisions of the Arizona law at issue here are pre-empted on that basis.

JUSTICE ALITO, dissenting in [relevant] part....

Not only is there little evidence that Congress intended to pre-empt state laws like §5(C), there is some evidence that Congress intended the opposite result. In making it unlawful for employers to hire unauthorized aliens, Congress made it clear that “any State or local law imposing civil or criminal sanctions (other than through licensing and similar laws)” upon employers was pre-empted, [8 U.S.C.] §1324a(h)(2). Noticeably absent is any similar directive pre-empting state or local laws targeting aliens who seek or obtain unauthorized employment. Given that Congress expressly pre-empted certain state and local laws pertaining to employers but remained silent about laws pertaining to employees, one could infer that Congress intended to preserve state and local authority to regulate the employee side of the equation. At the very least, it raises serious doubts about whether Congress intended to pre-empt such authority.

The Court dismisses any inferences that might be drawn from the express pre-emption provision. But even though the existence of that provision “does not bar the ordinary working of conflict pre-emption principles” or impose a “special burden” against pre-emption, Geier v. American Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. 861, 869–870 (2000), it is still probative of congressional intent....

The Court infers from Congress’ decision not to impose federal criminal penalties that Congress intended to pre-empt state criminal penalties. But given that the express pre-emption provision covers only state and local laws regulating employers, one could just as well infer that Congress did not intend to pre-empt state or local laws aimed at alien employees who unlawfully seek or obtain work. Surely Congress’ decision not to extend its express pre-emption provision to state or local laws like §5(C) is more probative of its intent on the subject of pre-emption than its decision not to impose federal criminal penalties for unauthorized work. In any event, the point I wish to emphasize is that inferences can be drawn either way. There are no necessary inferences that point decisively for or against pre-emption. Therefore, if we take seriously that state employment regulation is a traditional state concern and can be pre-empted only on a showing of “clear and manifest” congressional intent as required by De Canas, then §5(C) must survive.

Notes: Preemption

Should Congress alone deal with state regulations that assertedly interfere with interstate commerce? According to the Court, “[The] question whether a certain state action is preempted by federal law is one of congressional intent. ‘The purpose of Congress is the ultimate touch stone.’” Gade v. National Solid Wastes Management Association, 505 U.S. 88 (1992), citing Allis-Chalmers Corp. v. Lueck, 471 U.S. 202, 206 (1985).

The Court has distinguished three types of preemption. (1) Express preemption: Here a statute contains a provision specifically referring to preemption and indicating which state laws the national statute supplants. Note, however, that the courts will often be called on to interpret the precise scope of the express preemption provision, and that in doing so they may invoke more general concerns. (2) Field preemption: Here the scheme of federal regulation is “so pervasive as to make reasonable the inference that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it,” Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230 (1947). (3) Conflict preemption: Here “compliance with both federal and state regulations is a physical impossibility,” Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 142–143 (1963), or state law “stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress,” Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 67 (1941). Arizona v. United States deals with the latter two forms of preemption, with Justice Alito’s opinion addressing some issues arising from express preemption provisions.

1. The statute-specificity of preemption. Preemption decisions are often tied closely to the language and purposes of particular statutes. Compare these pairs of cases: (a)(1) Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. 470 (1996), held that the preemption provision of the Medical Device Amendments of 1976—which provides, “no State...may establish...any requirement which is different from, or in addition to, any requirement applicable” under the MDA to devices intended for human use “which relates to the safety or effectiveness of the device”—did not preempt state tort law claims of negligent design, negligent manufacturing, and failure to warn, as applied to a device that had received a form of fast-track approval by the Food and Drug Administration. (2) Riegel v. Medtronic, Inc., 552 U.S. 312 (2008), held that the MDA's preemption provision did preempt similar claims with respect to a device that had received a full-scale premarket approval.

(b)(1) Geier v. American Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. 861 (2000), involved a preemption provision's savings clause, which stated that "compliance with" a federal safety standard did not preempt common law liability. The Court held that, though the savings clause applied only to state statutory regulations, ordinary conflict preemption principles barred the Geiers from pursuing their claim that Honda had negligently failed to equip their car with airbags. The applicable federal regulations, according to the Court, provided car makers with a range of choices for passive restraints during a phase-in period covering the Geiers' claims. (2) Williamson v. Mazda Motor, 562 U.S. 323 (2011), involved the same statute and held that ordinary conflict preemption principles did not require preemption of a claim that a car maker had negligently designed its minivan with lap belts rather than lap-and-shoulder belts for rear seats. The federal regulations, according to the Court, gave manufacturers a completely free choice among designs.

(c)(1) Wyeth v. Levine, 555 U.S. 555 (2009), held that federal law did not preempt claims for failure to warn about risks associated with a specific method of administering a federally regulated drug. (2) PLIVA v. Mensing, 564 U.S. 604 (2011), held that federal law preempted claims against the manufacturer of a generic drug for failure to warn about risks. The labels the generic-drug maker used copied those approved by the FDA for the patented drug, and the makers of generic drugs were prohibited from altering their labels on their own.

Understanding and evaluating these decisions requires close attention to details associated with each statute, its purposes, and its accompanying regulations.

2. Conflict and express preemption. Consider Gade, supra. Illinois enacted two laws dealing with the licensing of workers who handle solid waste, for the stated purpose of "promot[ing] job safety" and "protect[ing] life, limb, and property." The laws required workers to take forty hours of approved training in Illinois, pass a written examination, and complete an annual refresher course. Federal regulations under the Occupational Safety and Health Act required that the workers receive a minimum of forty hours of instruction off-site and a minimum of three days of field experience under the supervision of a trained supervisor. A sharply divided Court held that the federal regulations preempted the state laws. Justice O'Connor's opinion for the Court found the state laws impliedly preempted "as in conflict with the full purposes and objectives of the OSH Act,” which indicated that “Congress intended to subject employers and employees to only one set of regulations.” Justice Kennedy, in an opinion concurring in the judgment, would have found express preemption because Congress intended to displace state regulations even when, as he believed was true in Gade, there was no actual conflict between the state laws and the federal regulations. Justice Souter, joined by Justices Blackmun, Stevens, and Thomas, dissented. He relied on the “rule” that “traditional police powers of the State survive until Congress has made a purpose to preempt them clear.”

Is the purpose of the state regulation in Gade workplace safety or safety of state citizens, including but not limited to workers? On what basis might the Court select the former characterization over the latter? Would the choice affect the result of the preemption analysis? Consider the proposition that dormant commerce clause concerns strongly influence the choice: National uniformity in workplace safety regulation is extremely important, whereas the varying social policies states might choose to pursue justify refraining from the broader characterization of the field.

3. Federalism and preemption. Individual justices’ general attitudes about federalism may influence their decisions. Preemption decisions may be influenced by the same considerations that enter into dormant commerce clause decisions. For example, finding that federal statutes “occupy the field” in some area may not be significantly different from finding that the area is inherently national under Cooley. What result in Gade under the commerce clause?

4. A “presumption against preemption”? Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp. states that there is a “presumption against preemption.” If congressional intent is the touchstone, what is the source of that presumption? Should the presumption be invoked not only to determine field, conflict, or obstacle preemption, but also to interpret express preemption provisions? Justice Scalia has argued that it should not, and that express preemption provisions should be interpreted using “ordinary principles of statutory construction.” Cipollone v. Liggett Group, 505 U.S. 504, 545 (1992). What is the argument for invoking the presumption in construing an express preemption provision?

The Court sometimes invokes and sometimes ignores the supposed presumption against preemption. For a discussion, see Young, “The Ordinary Diet of the Law”: The Presumption against Preemption in the Roberts Court, 2012 Sup. Ct. Rev. 253.

5. Characterizing preemption. Each of the three types of preemption raises questions of characterization, in two directions: (1) What subjects did Congress expressly preempt, or what is the field that Congress has occupied? Geier involves a related question: What is the scope of a statutory savings clause? (2)

Is the state regulation in question one that falls within the domain that Congress expressly preempted or occupied? What concerns influence the Court's approach to the characterization questions? Frequently the concerns that underlie dormant commerce clause analysis—national uniformity, interference with interstate commerce, preservation of a proper sphere for local regulation—affect the Court's decisions. For an overview of contemporary issues in preemption law, see Nelson, Preemption, 86 Va. L. Rev. 225 (2000).

6. Field preemption. Note the consequences of finding field preemption when there is no federal regulation of the specific matter state law attempts to regulate, as with work by undocumented immigrants in Arizona v. United States: There is no federal regulation with which the state law conflicts (otherwise preemption by conflict would occur); finding preemption therefore means that the matter is left unregulated by both federal and state law. Does that justify a strong presumption against preemption of this sort? What if a system of nonregulation makes social or economic sense? See Farmers Educational & Cooperative Union v. WDAY, Inc., 360 U.S. 525 (1959), holding that the Federal Communications Act, which required broadcasters to carry some political speeches without censoring them, occupied the field and therefore immunized broadcasters from liability under state libel laws.

7. Preemption in the service of other interests. Note the Court's discussion of the foreign-affairs implications of Arizona's regulation. Crosby v. National Foreign Trade Council, 530 U.S. 363 (2000), relied on a statute delegating broad power to the President to devise a strategy for imposing economic sanctions on Burma to induce it to improve its human rights performance as the basis for finding preempted a Massachusetts statute barring the state government's departments from buying goods or services from companies doing business with Burma. The state statute, the Court held, stood as an obstacle to the accomplishment of the federal statute's purposes, and was inconsistent with Congress's purpose of ensuring that the President would have flexibility in devising strategies for inducing Burma to improve its performance. See also Pennsylvania v. Nelson, 350 U.S. 497 (1956), which held that the federal Smith Act, prohibiting the knowing advocacy of the overthrow of the national government by force and violence, preempted the Pennsylvania Sedition Act. In contemporaneous decisions, the Court was influenced by first amendment concerns to construe the Smith Act fairly narrowly.

For an argument that Arizona v. United States exemplifies a distinctive form of "plenary power preemption," see Abrams, Plenary Power Preemption, 99 Va. L. Rev. 601 (2013). What subjects might be covered by such a doctrine, in addition to immigration/alienage and foreign affairs? In what sense is national power over such subjects “plenary” while national power over interstate commerce is not? How might “plenary power preemption” differ from “field preemption”?

8. An overview. Consider the following argument: The courts will consider issues about the scope of preemption only when there are reasonable arguments supporting competing characterizations of what Congress sought to accomplish in expressly preempting, occupying the field, or enacting regulations with which the state laws are said to conflict. No matter how detailed the statutory scheme, it will be applied (or at least litigated) in situations that Congress did not anticipate. The courts will therefore be called on to fill gaps. In dormant commerce clause cases, the courts may say, “Leave the problem to Congress.” In preemption cases, however, Congress has acted, and saying “Leave it to Congress” amounts to imposing on Congress a requirement of explicitness, usually in cases where it is relatively easy to find that Congress had not acted explicitly enough to displace state regulation.

Note: Concluding Observations

Consider Justice Scalia’s assessment of the law in this area, as expressed in his opinion dissenting in relevant part in Tyler Pipe Industries, Inc. v. Washington State Department of Revenue, 483 U.S. 232 (1987), where the Court held unconstitutional some provisions of Washington’s system of taxing goods in interstate commerce. Justice Scalia argued that to the extent that we have gone beyond guarding against rank discrimination against citizens of other States—which is regulated not by the Commerce Clause but by the Privileges and Immunities Clause—the Court for over a century has engaged in an enterprise that it has been unable to justify by textual support or even coherent nontextual theory, that it was almost certainly not intended to undertake, and that it has not undertaken very well.

He noted that “preemption of state legislation would automatically follow [if] the grant of power to Congress to regulate interstate commerce were exclusive,” but added that the language of the Commerce Clause gives no indication of exclusivity. Nor can one assume generally that Congress’ Article I powers are exclusive. [Furthermore], there is no correlative denial of power over commerce to the States [as] there is [with] the power to coin money or make treaties. [The] exclusivity rationale is infinitely less attractive today than it was in 1847. Now that we know interstate commerce embraces such activities as growing wheat for home consumption [Wickard] and local loan sharking [Perez v. United States, section C supra], it is more difficult to imagine what state activity would survive an exclusive Commerce Clause than to imagine what would be precluded.

Justice Scalia argued that the Court could not distinguish, as Cooley attempted to, among the subjects of the commerce power because the Constitution treats commerce “as a unitary subject,” or between preempting state laws “intended to regulate commerce (as opposed to those intended, for example, to promote health),” because the distinction was “metaphysical, [not] useful as a practical technique for marking out the powers of separate sovereigns.” He called “least plausible” the theory that in enforcing the negative Commerce Clause the Court is not applying a constitutional command at all, but is merely interpreting the will of Congress, whose silence in certain fields of interstate commerce (but not in others) is to be taken as a prohibition of regulation. There is no conceivable reason why congressional inaction under the Commerce Clause should be deemed to have the same preemptive effect elsewhere accorded only to congressional action. There, as elsewhere, “Congress’ silence is just that—silence.”

Are there plausible answers to this criticism? Consider whether the law in this area might be justified as articulating a series of canons of construction to be applied to whatever federal legislation there is that regulates the subject matter of the state laws at issue.

* To show that there is a power in the Constitution by which the liberty of the press may be affected, recourse has been had to the power of taxation. It is said that duties may be laid upon the publications so high as to amount to a prohibition. I know not by what logic it could be maintained that the declarations in the State constitutions, in favor of the freedom of the press, would be a constitutional impediment to the imposition of duties upon publications by the State legislatures. [And] if duties of any kind may be laid without a violation of that liberty, it is evident that the extent must depend on legislative discretion, regulated by public opinion; so that, after all, general declarations respecting the liberty of the press will give it no greater security than it will have without them. [It] would be quite as significant to declare that government ought to be free, that taxes ought not to be excessive, etc., as that the liberty of the press ought not to be restrained.

11 See, e.g., [Choper; Wechsler, supra].

8 One can hardly imagine this Court saying that because Congress is composed of individuals, individual rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights are amply protected by the political process. Yet, the position adopted today is indistinguishable in principle. The Tenth Amendment also is an essential part of the Bill of Rights.

9 At one time in our history, the view that the structure of the federal government sufficed to protect the States might have had a somewhat more practical, although not a more logical, basis. Professor Wechsler, whose seminal article in 1954 proposed the view adopted by the Court today, predicated his argument on assumptions that simply do not accord with current reality. Professor Wechsler wrote: “National action has...always been regarded as exceptional in our polity....” Not only is the premise of this view clearly at odds with the proliferation of national legislation over the past 30 years, but “a variety of structural and political changes in this century have combined to make Congress particularly insensitive to state and local values.” Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations [ACIR], Regulatory Federalism: Policy, Process, Impact and Reform 50 (1984). The adoption of the Seventeenth Amendment (providing for direct election of senators), the weakening of political parties on the local level, and the rise of national media, among other things, have made Congress increasingly less representative of State and local interests, and more likely to be responsive to the demands of various national constituencies. [Thus,] even if one were to ignore the numerous problems with the Court’s position in terms of constitutional theory, there would remain serious questions as to its factual premises.

11 Apparently in an effort to reassure the States, the Court identifies several major statutes that thus far have not been made applicable to State governments. [The] Court does not suggest that this restraint will continue after its decision here. Indeed, it is unlikely that special interest groups will fail to accept the Court’s open invitation to urge Congress to extend these and other statutes to apply to the States and their local subdivisions.

12 This Court has never before abdicated responsibility for assessing the constitutionality of challenged action on the ground that affected parties theoretically are able to look out for their own interests through the electoral process. [A] much stronger argument as to inherent structural protections could have been made in either Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976), or Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1926), than can be made here. In these cases, the President signed legislation that limited his authority with respect to certain appointments and thus arguably “it was no concern of this Court that the law violated the Constitution.” 426 U.S., at 841–842 n.12. The Court nevertheless held the laws unconstitutional because they infringed on presidential authority, the President’s consent notwithstanding....

13 [The] Court does not explain how leaving the States virtually at the mercy of the federal government, without recourse to judicial review, will enhance their opportunities to experiment and serve as “laboratories.”

3 The examples of other congressional mandates cited by Justice Ginsburg are not to the contrary. Each of those mandates—to report for jury duty, to register for the draft, to purchase firearms in anticipation of militia service, to exchange gold currency for paper currency, and to file a tax return—are based on constitutional provisions other than the Commerce Clause.

4 Justice Ginsburg suggests that “at the time the Constitution was framed, to ‘regulate’ meant, among other things, to require action.” But to reach this conclusion, the case cited by Justice Ginsburg relied on a dictionary in which “[t]o order; to command” was the fifth-alternative definition of “to direct,” which was itself the second-alternative definition of “to regulate.” It is unlikely that the Framers had such an obscure meaning in mind when they used the word “regulate.” Far more commonly, “[t]o regulate” meant “[t]o adjust by rule or method,” which presupposes something to adjust.

5 Echoing the Chief Justice, the joint dissenters urge that the minimum coverage provision impermissibly regulates young people who “have no intention of purchasing [medical care]” and are too far “removed from the [health-care] market.” This criticism ignores the reality that a healthy young person may be a day away from needing health care. A victim of an accident or unforeseen illness will consume extensive medical care immediately, though scarcely expecting to do so.

7 The Chief Justice’s characterization of individuals who choose not to purchase private insurance as “doing nothing,” is similarly questionable. A person who self-insures opts against prepayment for a product the person will in time consume. When aggregated, exercise of that option has a substantial impact on the health-care market.

9 The failure to purchase vegetables in the Chief Justice’s hypothetical, then, is not what leads to higher health-care costs for others; rather, it is the failure of individuals to maintain a healthy diet, and the resulting obesity, that creates the cost-shifting problem. Requiring individuals to purchase vegetables is thus several steps removed from solving the problem. The failure to obtain health insurance, by contrast, is the immediate cause of the cost-shifting Congress sought to address through the ACA. Requiring individuals to obtain insurance attacks the source of the problem directly, in a single step.

11 In a separate argument, the joint dissenters contend that the minimum coverage provision is not necessary and proper because it was not the “only...way” Congress could have made the guaranteed-issue and community-rating reforms work....

Neither a surcharge on those who purchase insurance nor the denial of a tax credit to those who do not would solve the problem created by guaranteed-issue and community-rating requirements. Neither would prompt the purchase of insurance before sickness or injury occurred.

But even assuming there were “practicable” alternatives to the minimum coverage provision, “we long ago rejected the view that the Necessary and Proper Clause demands that an Act of Congress be ‘absolutely necessary’ to the exercise of an enumerated power.” Jinks v. Richland County, 538 U.S. 456 (2003). Rather, the statutory provision at issue need only be “conducive” and “[reasonably] adapted” to the goal Congress seeks to achieve. The minimum coverage provision meets this requirement.

4 [From] our review of this federal legislation, we find no “clear and manifest purpose of Congress,” Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230, to preempt the entire field of interstate waste management or transportation, either by express statutory command, or by implicit legislative design. To the contrary, Congress expressly has provided that “the collection and disposal of solid wastes should continue to be primarily the function of State, regional, and local agencies....” 42 U.S.C. §6901(a)(4) (1976 ed.). Similarly, [the statute] is not preempted because of a square conflict with particular provisions of federal law or because of general incompatibility with basic federal objectives....

17 The existence of major in-state interests adversely affected by the Act is a powerful safeguard against legislative abuse. [Barnwell Bros.]

16 If the effect of a state regulation is to cause local goods to constitute a larger share, and goods with an out-of-state source to constitute a smaller share, of the total sales in the market—as in [Dean Milk]—the regulation may have a discriminatory effect on interstate commerce. But the Maryland statute has no impact on the relative proportions of local and out-of-state goods sold in Maryland and, indeed, no demonstrable effect whatsoever on the interstate flow of goods. The sales by independent retailers are just as much a part of the flow of interstate commerce as the sales made by the refiner-operated stations.

8 There is support in the record for the inference that the Maryland Legislature passed the divestiture provisions in response to the pleas of local gasoline dealers for protection against the competition of both the price marketers and the major oil companies. [The] executive director of the Greater Washington/Maryland Service Station Association [testified] before the [Maryland] Senate:

...Now beset by the critical gasoline supply situation, the squeeze by his landlord-supplier and the shrinking service [market], the dealer is now faced with an even more serious threat.

That is the sinister threat of the major oil companies to complete their takeover to the retail-marketing of gasoline, not just to be in competition with their own branded dealers, but to squeeze them out and convert their stations to company operation....

Are the legislators of Maryland about to let this octopus loose and unrestricted in the state of Maryland, among our small businessmen to devour them? We sincerely hope not....

13 [Footnote] 16 of the Court's opinion suggests that unconstitutional discrimination does not exist unless there is an effect on the quantity of out-of-state goods entering a State. This is too narrow a view of the Commerce Clause. [Interstate] commerce consists of far more than mere production of goods. It also consists of transactions—of repeated buying and selling of both goods and services. By focusing exclusively on the quantity of goods, the Court limits the protection of the Clause to producers and handlers of goods before they enter a discriminating State. In our complex national economy, commercial transactions continue after the goods enter a State. The Court today permits a State to impose protectionist discrimination upon these latter transactions to the detriment of out-of-state participants. [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

7 The parochial restrictions in the mobile home provision were enacted after Governor Ray vetoed a bill that would have permitted the interstate shipment of all mobile homes through Iowa. Governor Ray commented, in his veto message: "This bill...would make Iowa a bridge state as these oversized units are moved into Iowa after being manufactured in another state and sold in a third. None of this activity would be of particular economic benefit to Iowa."

12 It is highly relevant that [the] state statute contains exemptions that weaken the deference traditionally accorded to a state safety regulation.

18 The District Court [noted] that Iowa's law causes "more accidents, more injuries, more fatalities and more fuel consumption." Appellant Kassel conceded as much at trial. Kassel explained, however, that most of these additional accidents occur in States other than Iowa because truck traffic is deflected around the State. He noted: "Our primary concern is the citizens of Iowa and our own highway system we operate in this state."

8 Nor do we share appellants' apparent view that the Commerce Clause injects principles of antitrust law into the relations between the States by reference to such imprecise standards as whether one State is "exploiting" its "monopoly" position with respect to a natural resource when the flow of commerce among them is not otherwise impeded. The threshold questions whether a State enjoys a "monopoly" position and whether the tax burden is shifted out of state, rather than borne by in-state producers and consumers, would require complex factual inquiries about such issues as elasticity of demand for the product and alternative sources of supply. Moreover, under this approach, the constitutionality of a state tax could well turn on whether the in-state producer is able, through sales contracts or otherwise, to shift the burden of the tax forward to its out-of-state customers....

18 The controversy over the Montana tax has not escaped the attention of the Congress. Several bills were introduced during the 96th Congress to limit the rate of state severance taxes. Similar bills have been introduced in the 97th Congress.

The Scope of Congress's Powers: Taxing and Spending, War Powers, Individual Rights, and State Autonomy

The previous chapter explored the scope of Congress's power under the commerce clause, the dimensions of judicially enforceable limits on that power in the name of federalism, and the justifications for those limits. As we saw, for many years the commerce clause functioned almost as a plenary grant of power, at least insofar as Congress was seeking to regulate behavior that had some connection to economic activity. In fact, as the discussion of the commerce clause decisions upholding the validity of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, in Chapter 2, section C, supra, suggested, sometimes the commerce clause served as a mechanism for addressing problems that might at first blush have seemed more appropriately addressed by other constitutional provisions.

This pattern of pragmatic reliance on a variety of enumerated powers to circumvent potential judicial limitations on the scope of national regulation plays out with respect to a number of other specific powers as well. This chapter considers some of the most significant and often litigated powers. Section A considers Congress's deployment of its taxing and spending powers to influence behavior that it lacks the power to regulate directly, as well as examining briefly Congress's use of its war power to regulate domestic parties. (The distribution of warmaking authority between Congress and the president is taken up in Chapter 4.) Section B then considers Congress's powers under the enforcement clauses of the Reconstruction amendments. Section C looks at Congress's use of the treaty power to regulate domestic conduct. Finally, section D considers the question of whether the tenth amendment places any independent limitations on congressional power. With respect to each of the powers, consider the following questions, versions of which will be raised throughout: Is the scope of this power broader than, narrower than, or simply equivalent to, the scope of the commerce power? Are the political constraints on Congress different with respect to this provision, so that judicial review is either more or less appropriate than it is in commerce clause–based cases?

A. REGULATION THROUGH TAXING, SPENDING, AND THE WAR POWER

The first clause of article I, section 8, gives Congress “Power to lay and collect Taxes”—the taxing power—and to “pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States”—referred to as the spending power. Can these powers be exercised only in the service of pursuing goals enumerated elsewhere in the Constitution—a view taken by James Madison—or can they serve as a more sweeping basis for national regulation?

1. The Taxing Power

In Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251 (1918), discussed in Chapter 2, section B, supra, the Supreme Court struck down the Child Labor Act, which prohibited the transportation in interstate commerce of goods produced in factories employing young children. The Court held that the Act was not at its core a regulation of interstate commerce but was instead an attempt to usurp the states’ police power over working conditions. Congress responded by enacting the Child Labor Tax Act. The statute required that anyone who employed child labor, defined as it had been in the statute invalidated in Hammer, pay an excise tax equivalent to 10 percent of the entire net profits of the mine or factory. The clear effect of the tax would be to make child labor so economically unattractive that employers would decline to hire child workers.

Congress’s strategy was seemingly based on the fact that in a series of then-recent cases, the Court had upheld various provisions of the Narcotic Drug Act of 1914 (often called the Harrison Act) that had also used the taxing power as a lever for attacking a moral issue. The Harrison Act required individuals connected with the production, importation, and distribution of opium- or coca leaf–based products to register with the Internal Revenue Service, pay a special tax, keep various records, and distribute such drugs only to persons who made orders on forms issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Section 2 of the Act made it a federal crime not to comply with the Act’s various requirements. In United States v. Doremus, 249 U.S. 86 (1919), the Court upheld the indictment of a doctor under the Act for selling heroin to “a person popularly known as a ‘dope fiend’...for the purpose of gratifying his appetite for the drug as an habitual user thereof.” Justice Day’s opinion for the Court rejected the argument that the Harrison Act exceeded Congress’s power:

The only limitation upon the power of Congress to levy excise taxes of the character now under consideration is geographical uniformity throughout the United States. [Subject] to such limitation Congress may select the subjects of taxation, and may exercise the power conferred at its discretion. Of course Congress may not in the exercise of federal power exert authority wholly reserved to the States. [And] from an early day the court has held that the fact that other motives may impel the exercise of federal taxing power does not authorize the courts to inquire into that subject. If the legislation enacted has some reasonable relation to the exercise of the taxing authority conferred by the Constitution, it cannot be invalidated because of the supposed motives which induced it....

The act may not be declared unconstitutional because its effect may be to accomplish another purpose as well as the raising of revenue. If the legislation is within the taxing authority of Congress—that is sufficient to sustain it.

[In an earlier decision construing the Harrison Act], we said: "It may be assumed that the statute has a moral end as well as revenue in view, but we are of opinion that the District Court, in treating those ends as to be reached only through a revenue measure and within the limits of a revenue measure, was right." United States v. Jin Fuey Moy, 241 U.S. 394, 402. Considering the full power of Congress over excise taxation the decisive question here is: Have the provisions in question any relation to the raising of revenue? That Congress might levy an excise tax upon such dealers, and others who are named in §1 of the act, cannot be successfully disputed. The provisions of §2, to which we have referred, aim to confine sales to registered dealers and to those dispensing the drugs as physicians, and to those who come to dealers with legitimate prescriptions of physicians. Congress, with full power over the subject, short of arbitrary and unreasonable action which is not to be assumed, inserted these provisions in an act specifically providing for the raising of revenue. Considered of themselves, we think they tend to keep the traffic above-board and subject to inspection by those authorized to collect the revenue. They tend to diminish the opportunity of unauthorized persons to obtain the drugs and sell them clandestinely without paying the tax imposed by the federal law....

But in Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co., 259 U.S. 20 (1922), the Supreme Court struck down the Child Labor Act. It posed the issue in this way: "Does this law impose a tax with only that incidental restraint and regulation which a tax must inevitably involve? Or does it regulate by the use of the so-called tax as a penalty?" The "detailed and specified course of conduct in business" set out in the act demonstrated its purpose, as did provisions authorizing inspection of factories and mines by the Department of Labor, “whose normal function is the advancement and protection of the welfare of workers. In the light of these features of the act, a court must be blind not to see that the so-called tax is imposed to stop the employment of children within the age limits prescribed. Its prohibitory and regulatory effect and purpose are palpable. All others can see and understand this. How can we properly shut our minds to it?”

Grant the validity of this law, and all that Congress would need to do, hereafter, in seeking to take over to its control any one of the great number of subjects of public interest, jurisdiction of which the States have never parted with, and which are reserved to them by the Tenth Amendment, would be to enact a detailed measure of complete regulation of the subject and enforce it by a so-called tax upon departures from it. To give such magic to the word “tax” would be to break down all constitutional limitation of the powers of Congress and completely wipe out the sovereignty of the States.

[Where] the sovereign enacting the law has power to impose both tax and penalty the difference between revenue production and mere regulation may be immaterial, but not so when one sovereign can impose a tax only, and the power of regulation rests in another....Although Congress does not invalidate the contract of employment or expressly declare that the employment within the mentioned ages is illegal, it does exhibit its intent practically to achieve the latter result by adopting the criteria of wrongdoing and imposing its principal consequence on those who transgress its standard.

The Bailey Court distinguished Doremus this way:

The court [in Doremus] said that the act could not be declared invalid just because another motive than taxation, not shown on the face of the act, might have contributed to its passage. This case does not militate against the conclusion we have reached in respect of the law now before us. The court, there, made manifest its view that the provisions of the so-called taxing act must be naturally and reasonably adapted to the collection of the tax and not solely to the achievement of some other purpose plainly within state power.

Are you persuaded that Doremus is distinguishable from Bailey?

Is the distinction between a penalty and a tax cogent? Does it turn on Congress's motive? Recall from the discussion of the commerce power in Chapter 2 that a “pretext” analysis requires a prior determination of the proper purposes for which a power may be exercised. Are the purposes of the power to tax more clearly defined than those of the power to regulate interstate commerce?

Many taxes serve both revenue-raising and regulatory purposes. Is it helpful to say that taxes must raise nontrivial amounts of revenue, even if they have a substantial regulatory effect? Rejecting a challenge to the federal occupational tax levied on people in the business of accepting bets in United States v. Kahriger, 345 U.S. 22 (1953), the Court listed cases in which it had upheld taxes on colored oleomargarine, McCray v. United States, 195 U.S. 27 (1904); on narcotics, United States v. Doremus, discussed supra; and on firearms, Sonzinsky v. United States, 300 U.S. 506 (1937). A footnote added:

One of the indicia which appellee offers to support his contention that the wagering tax is not a proper revenue measure is that the tax amount collected under it was $4,371,869, as compared with an expected amount of $400,000,000 a year. The figure of $4,371,869, however, is relatively large when it is compared with the $3,501 collected under the tax on adulterated and process or renovated butter and filled cheese, the $914,910 collected under the tax on narcotics, including marihuana and special taxes, and the $28,911 collected under the tax on firearms, transfer and occupational taxes.

(The Court later held that the occupational tax violated the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment. Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39 (1968).)

National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius
567 U.S. 519 (2012)

CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Par[t][III-C], [and] an opinion with respect to Par[t][III-B].

[A key provision of the Affordable Care Act of 2010 is the so-called individual mandate, which requires most Americans to maintain “minimum essential” health insurance coverage. Beginning in 2014, individuals who do not comply with the mandate must make a “[s]hared responsibility payment” to the Federal Government. The Act provides that this “penalty” will be paid to the Internal Revenue Service with an individual’s taxes, and “shall be assessed and collected in the same manner” as tax penalties.]

III...

B...

The Government's tax power argument asks us to [read] the mandate not as ordering individuals to buy insurance, but rather as imposing a tax on those who do not buy that product.

The text of a statute can sometimes have more than one possible meaning....

The most straightforward reading of the mandate is that it commands individuals to purchase insurance. After all, it states that individuals "shall" maintain health insurance. [Under] our precedent, it is therefore necessary to ask whether the Government's alternative reading of the statute—that it only imposes a tax on those without insurance—is a reasonable one.

Under the mandate, if an individual does not maintain health insurance, the only consequence is that he must make an additional payment to the IRS when he pays his taxes. That, according to the Government, means the mandate can be regarded as establishing a condition—not owning health insurance—that triggers a tax—the required payment to the IRS. Under that theory, the mandate is not a legal command to buy insurance. Rather, it makes going without insurance just another thing the Government taxes, like buying gasoline or earning income. And if the mandate is in effect just a tax hike on certain taxpayers who do not have health insurance, it may be within Congress's constitutional power to tax.

...[The] Government asks us to interpret the mandate as imposing a tax, if it would otherwise violate the Constitution. Granting the Act the full measure of deference owed to federal statutes, it can be so read, for the reasons set forth below.

The exaction the Affordable Care Act imposes on those without health insurance looks like a tax in many respects. The "[s]hared responsibility payment," as the statute entitles it, is paid into the Treasury by "taxpayer[s]" when they file their tax returns. It does not apply to individuals who do not pay federal income taxes because their household income is less than the filing threshold in the Internal Revenue Code. For taxpayers who do owe the payment, its amount is determined by such familiar factors as taxable income, number of dependents, and joint filing status. The requirement to pay is found in the Internal Revenue Code and enforced by the IRS, which—as we previously explained—must assess and collect it "in the same manner as taxes." This process yields the essential feature of any tax: it produces at least some revenue for the Government. [United States v. Kahriger.] Indeed, the payment is expected to raise about $4 billion per year by 2017....

Our cases confirm this functional approach. For example, in [Bailey v.] Drexel Furniture Co., we focused on three practical characteristics of the so-called tax on employing child laborers that convinced us the “tax” was actually a penalty. First, the tax imposed an exceedingly heavy burden—10 percent of a company’s net income—on those who employed children, no matter how small their infraction. Second, it imposed that exaction only on those who knowingly employed underage laborers. Such scienter requirements are typical of punitive statutes, because Congress often wishes to punish only those who intentionally break the law. Third, this “tax” was enforced in part by the Department of Labor, an agency responsible for punishing violations of labor laws, not collecting revenue. The same analysis here suggests that the shared responsibility payment may for constitutional purposes be considered a tax, not a penalty: First, for most Americans the amount due will be far less than the price of insurance, and, by statute, it can never be more. It may often be a reasonable financial decision to make the payment rather than purchase insurance, unlike the “prohibitory” financial punishment in Drexel Furniture. Second, the individual mandate contains no scienter requirement. Third, the payment is collected solely by the IRS through the normal means of taxation—except that the Service is not allowed to use those means most suggestive of a punitive sanction, such as criminal prosecution. The reasons the Court in Drexel Furniture held that what was called a “tax” there was a penalty support the conclusion that what is called a “penalty” here may be viewed as a tax.

None of this is to say that the payment is not intended to affect individual conduct. Although the payment will raise considerable revenue, it is plainly designed to expand health insurance coverage. But taxes that seek to influence conduct are nothing new. Some of our earliest federal taxes sought to deter the purchase of imported manufactured goods in order to foster the growth of domestic industry. Today, federal and state taxes can compose more than half the retail price of cigarettes, not just to raise more money, but to encourage people to quit smoking. And we have upheld such obviously regulatory measures as taxes on selling marijuana and sawed-off shotguns. Indeed, “[e]very tax is in some measure regulatory....That §5000A seeks to shape decisions about whether to buy health insurance does not mean that it cannot be a valid exercise of the taxing power....

...[It] is estimated that four million people each year will choose to pay the IRS rather than buy insurance. We would expect Congress to be troubled by that prospect if such conduct were unlawful. That Congress apparently regards such extensive failure to comply with the mandate as tolerable suggests that Congress did not think it was creating four million outlaws. It suggests instead that the shared responsibility payment merely imposes a tax citizens may lawfully choose to pay in lieu of buying health insurance.

The joint dissenters argue that we cannot uphold §5000A as a tax because Congress did not “frame” it as such. In effect, they contend that even if the Constitution permits Congress to do exactly what we interpret this statute to do, the law must be struck down because Congress used the wrong labels. An example may help illustrate why labels should not control here. Suppose Congress enacted a statute providing that every taxpayer who owns a house without energy efficient windows must pay $50 to the IRS. The amount due is adjusted based on factors such as taxable income and joint filing status, and is paid along with the taxpayer’s income tax return. Those whose income is below the filing threshold need not pay. The required payment is not called a “tax,” a “penalty,” or anything else. No one would doubt that this law imposed a tax, and was within Congress’s power to tax. That conclusion should not change simply because Congress used the word “penalty” to describe the payment. Interpreting such a law to be a tax would hardly “[i]mpos[e] a tax through judicial legislation.” Rather, it would give practical effect to the Legislature’s enactment.

There may, however, be a more fundamental objection to a tax on those who lack health insurance. Even if only a tax, the payment under §5000A(b) remains a burden that the Federal Government imposes for an omission, not an act. If it is troubling to interpret the Commerce Clause as authorizing Congress to regulate those who abstain from commerce, perhaps it should be similarly troubling to permit Congress to impose a tax for not doing something.

Three considerations allay this concern. First, and most importantly, it is abundantly clear the Constitution does not guarantee that individuals may avoid taxation through inactivity. A capitation, after all, is a tax that everyone must pay simply for existing, and capitulations are expressly contemplated by the Constitution. The Court today holds that our Constitution protects us from federal regulation under the Commerce Clause so long as we abstain from the regulated activity. But from its creation, the Constitution has made no such promise with respect to taxes....

Congress’s use of the Taxing Clause to encourage buying something is, by contrast [to its use of the commerce power], not new. Tax incentives already promote, for example, purchasing homes and professional educations. Sustaining the mandate as a tax depends only on whether Congress has properly exercised its taxing power to encourage purchasing health insurance, not whether it can. Upholding the individual mandate under the Taxing Clause thus does not recognize any new federal power. It determines that Congress has used an existing one.

Second, Congress's ability to use its taxing power to influence conduct is not without limits. A few of our cases policed these limits aggressively, invalidating punitive exactions obviously designed to regulate behavior otherwise regarded at the time as beyond federal authority....

We have already explained that the shared responsibility payment's practical characteristics pass muster as a tax under our narrowest interpretations of the taxing power. Because the tax at hand is within even those strict limits, we need not here decide the precise point at which an exaction becomes so punitive that the taxing power does not authorize it. It remains true, however, that the "power to tax is not the power to destroy while this Court sits" [Panhandle Oil Co. v. Mississippi ex rel. Knox, 277 U.S. 218 (1928) (Holmes, J., dissenting)].

Third, although the breadth of Congress's power to tax is greater than its power to regulate commerce, the taxing power does not give Congress the same degree of control over individual behavior. Once we recognize that Congress may regulate a particular decision under the Commerce Clause, the Federal Government can bring its full weight to bear. Congress may simply command individuals to do as it directs. An individual who disobeys may be subjected to criminal sanctions. Those sanctions can include not only fines and imprisonment, but all the attendant consequences of being branded a criminal: deprivation of otherwise protected civil rights, such as the right to bear arms or vote in elections; loss of employment opportunities; social stigma; and severe disabilities in other controversies, such as custody or immigration disputes.

By contrast, Congress's authority under the taxing power is limited to requiring an individual to pay money into the Federal Treasury, no more. If a tax is properly paid, the Government has no power to compel or punish individuals subject to it. We do not make light of the severe burden that taxation—especially taxation motivated by a regulatory purpose—can impose. But imposition of a tax nonetheless leaves an individual with a lawful choice to do or not do a certain act, so long as he is willing to pay a tax levied on that choice.

The Affordable Care Act's requirement that certain individuals pay a financial penalty for not obtaining health insurance may reasonably be characterized as a tax. Because the Constitution permits such a tax, it is not our role to forbid it, or to pass upon its wisdom or fairness....

Justices Scalia, Kennedy, Thomas, and Alito dissented. They argued that the statutory provision could not fairly be understood to impose a tax, and therefore they did not reach the question whether the statute was a constitutionally permissible exercise of the taxing power. They observed that the question of whether the sanction, if it were a tax, was a direct one (thereby running afoul of article I, section 3) had not been adequately briefed or argued.

2. The Spending Power

United States v. Butler

297 U.S. 1 (1936)

[The Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933 was designed to stabilize production in agriculture by assuring farmers that their products would be sold at a fair price. The act imposed a tax on processors of agricultural commodities such as cotton. The proceeds of the tax were to be used to subsidize farmers who agreed to restrict their production.]

MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court....

There should be no misunderstanding as to the function of this court in such a case. It is sometimes said that the court assumes a power to overrule or control the action of the people's representatives. This is a misconception. The Constitution is the supreme law of the land ordained and established by the people. All legislation must conform to the principles it lays down. When an act of Congress is appropriately challenged in the courts as not conforming to the constitutional mandate the judicial branch of the Government has only one duty, —to lay the article of the Constitution which is invoked beside the statute which is challenged and to decide whether the latter squares with the former. All the court does, or can do, is to announce its considered judgment upon the question. The only power it has, if such it may be called, is the power of judgment. This court neither approves nor condemns any legislative policy. Its delicate and difficult office is to ascertain and declare whether the legislation is in accordance with, or in contravention of, the provisions of the Constitution; and, having done that, its duty ends.

The question is not what power the Federal Government ought to have but what powers in fact have been given by the people. [The] federal union is a government of delegated powers. It has only such as are expressly conferred upon it and such as are reasonably to be implied from those granted....

The clause thought to authorize the legislation [confers] upon the Congress power "to lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States. ..." It is not contended that this provision grants power to regulate agricultural production upon the theory that such legislation would promote the general welfare....The view that the clause grants power to provide for the general welfare, independently of the taxing power, has never been authoritatively accepted....

Nevertheless the Government asserts that warrant is found in this clause for the adoption of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The argument is that Congress may appropriate and authorize the spending of moneys for the "general welfare"; that the phrase should be liberally construed to cover anything conducive to national welfare; that decision as to what will promote such welfare rests with Congress alone, and the courts may not review its determination; and finally that the appropriation under attack was in fact for the general welfare of the United States....

Since the foundation of the Nation sharp differences of opinion have persisted as to the true interpretation of the phrase. Madison asserted it amounted to no more than a reference to the other powers enumerated in the subsequent clauses of the same section; that, as the United States is a government of limited and enumerated powers, the grant of power to tax and spend for the general national welfare must be confined to the enumerated legislative fields committed to the Congress. In this view the phrase is mere tautology, for taxation and appropriation are or may be necessary incidents of the exercise of any of the enumerated legislative powers. Hamilton, on the other hand, maintained the clause confers a power separate and distinct from those later enumerated, is not restricted in meaning by the grant of them, and Congress consequently has a substantive power to tax and to appropriate, limited only by the requirement that it shall be exercised to provide for the general welfare of the United States. [We] conclude that the reading advocated by [Hamilton] is the correct one. While, therefore, the power to tax is not unlimited, its confines are set in the clause which confers it, and not in those of §8 which bestow and define the legislative powers of the Congress. It results that the power of Congress to authorize expenditure of public moneys for public purposes is not limited by the direct grants of legislative power found in the Constitution.

But the adoption of the broader construction leaves the power to spend subject to limitations....

We are not now required to ascertain the scope of the phrase "general welfare of the United States" or to determine whether an appropriation in aid of agriculture falls within it. Wholly apart from that question, another principle embedded in our Constitution prohibits the enforcement of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The act invades the reserved rights of the states. It is a statutory plan to regulate and control agricultural production, a matter beyond the powers delegated to the federal government. The tax, the appropriation of the funds raised, and the direction for their disbursement, are but parts of the plan. They are but means to an unconstitutional end....

At best [the act] is a scheme for purchasing with federal funds submission to federal regulation of a subject reserved to the states....

Congress has no power to enforce its commands on the farmer to the ends sought by the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It must follow that it may not indirectly accomplish those ends by taxing and spending to purchase compliance. The Constitution and the entire plan of our government negative any such use of the power to tax and to spend as the act undertakes to authorize. It does not help to declare that local conditions throughout the nation have created a situation of national concern; for this is but to say that whenever there is a widespread similarity of local conditions, Congress may ignore constitutional limitations upon its own powers and usurp those reserved to the states. If, in lieu of compulsory regulation of subjects within the states' reserved jurisdiction, which is prohibited, the Congress could invoke the taxing and spending power as a means to accomplish the same end, clause 1 of §8 of Article I would become the instrument for total subversion of the governmental powers reserved to the individual states.

If the act before us is a proper exercise of the federal taxing power, evidently the regulation of all industry throughout the United States may be accomplished by similar exercises of the same power. It would be possible to exact money from one branch of an industry and pay it to another branch in every field of activity which lies within the province of the states. The mere threat of such a procedure might well induce the surrender of rights and the compliance with federal regulation as the price of continuance in business. A few instances will illustrate the thought.

Let us suppose Congress should determine that the farmer, the miner or some other producer of raw materials is receiving too much for his products, with consequent depression of the processing industry and idleness of its employees. Though, by confession, there is no power vested in Congress to compel by statute a lowering of the prices of the raw material, the same result might be accomplished, if the questioned act be valid, by taxing the producer upon his output and appropriating the proceeds to the processors, either with or without conditions imposed as the consideration for payment of the subsidy....

Suppose that there are too many garment workers in the large cities; that this results in dislocation of the economic balance. Upon the principle contended for an excise might be laid on the manufacture of all garments manufactured and the proceeds paid to those manufacturers who agree to remove their plants to cities having not more than a hundred thousand population. Thus, through the asserted power of taxation, the federal government, against the will of individual states, might completely redistribute the industrial population....

These illustrations are given, not to suggest that any of the purposes mentioned are unworthy, but to demonstrate the scope of the principle for which the Government contends; to test the principle by its applications; to point out that, by the exercise of the asserted power, Congress would, in effect, under the pretext of exercising the taxing power, in reality accomplish prohibited ends. It cannot be said that they envisage improbable legislation. The supposed cases are no more improbable than would the present act have been deemed a few years ago....

[Affirmed.]

MR. JUSTICE STONE, dissenting....

The power of courts to declare a statute unconstitutional is subject to two guiding principles of decision which ought never to be absent from judicial consciousness. One is that courts are concerned only with the power to enact statutes, not with their wisdom. The other is that while unconstitutional exercise of power by the executive and legislative branches of the government is subject to judicial restraint, the only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint. For the removal of unwise laws from the statute books appeal lies not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government....

[The] suggestion of coercion finds no support in the record or in any data showing the actual operation of the Act. Threat of loss, not hope of gain, is the essence of economic coercion. Members of a long depressed industry have undoubtedly been tempted to curtail acreage by the hope of resulting better prices and by the proffered opportunity to obtain needed ready money....

It is upon the contention that state power is infringed by purchased regulation of agricultural production that chief reliance is placed. It is insisted that, while the Constitution gives to Congress, in specific and unambiguous terms, the power to tax and spend, the power is subject to limitations which do not find their origin in any express provision of the Constitution and to which other expressly delegated powers are not subject.

The Constitution requires that public funds shall be spent for a defined purpose, the promotion of the general welfare. Their expenditure usually involves payment on terms which will insure use by the selected recipients within the limits of the constitutional purpose. Expenditures would fail of their purpose and thus lose their constitutional sanction if the terms of payment were not such that by their influence on the action of the recipients the permitted end would be attained. The power of Congress to spend is inseparable from persuasion to action over which Congress has no legislative control. Congress may not command that the science of agriculture be taught in state universities. But if it would aid the teaching of that science by grants to state institutions, it is appropriate [that] the grant be on the condition [that] it be used for the intended purpose....

The limitation now sanctioned must lead to absurd consequences. The government may give seeds to farmers, but may not condition the gift upon their being planted in places where they are most needed or even planted at all. The government may give money to the unemployed, but may not ask that those who get it shall give labor in return, or even use it to support their families. It may give money to sufferers from earthquake, fire, tornado, pestilence or flood, but may not impose conditions—health precautions designed to prevent the spread of disease, or induce the movement of population to safer or more sanitary areas. All that, because it is purchased regulation infringing state powers, must be left for the states, who are unable or unwilling to supply the necessary relief. [If] the expenditure is for a national public purpose, that purpose will not be thwarted because payment is on condition which will advance that purpose. The action which Congress induces by payments of money to promote the general welfare, but which it does not command or coerce, is but an incident to a specifically granted power, but a permissible means to a legitimate end. If appropriation in aid of a program of curtailment of agricultural production is constitutional, and it is not denied that it is, payment to farmers on condition that they reduce their crop acreage is constitutional. It is not any the less so because the farmer at his own option promises to fulfill the condition.

That the governmental power of the purse is a great one is not now for the first time announced....

The suggestion that it must now be curtailed by judicial fiat because it may be abused by unwise use hardly rises to the dignity of argument. [The] power to tax and spend is not without constitutional restraints. One restriction is that the purpose must be truly national. Another is that it may not be used to coerce action left to state control. Another is the conscience and patriotism of Congress and the Executive. "It must be remembered that legislators are the ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts." Justice Holmes, in Missouri, Kansas & Texas Ry. Co. v. May, 194

U.S. 267, 270.

A tortured construction of the Constitution is not to be justified by recourse to extreme examples of reckless congressional spending which might occur if courts could not prevent—expenditures which, even if they could be thought to effect any national purpose, would be possible only by action of a legislature lost to all sense of public responsibility. Such suppositions are addressed to the mind accustomed to believe that it is the business of courts to sit in judgment on the wisdom of legislative action. Courts are not the only agency of government that must be assumed to have capacity to govern. Congress and the courts both unhappily may falter or be mistaken in the performance of their constitutional duty. But interpretation of our great charter of government which proceeds on any assumption that the responsibility for the preservation of our institutions is the exclusive concern of any one of the three branches of government, or that it alone can save them from destruction is far more likely, in the long run, “to obliterate the constituent members” of “an indestructible union of indestructible states” than the frank recognition that language, even of a constitution, may mean what it says: that the power to tax and spend includes the power to relieve a nationwide economic maladjustment by conditional gifts of money.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS and MR. JUSTICE CARDOZO join in this opinion.

Note: The Spending Power and the New Deal Court

1. Consistency within Butler. Having adopted the Hamiltonian position on the scope of the spending power, is the Court consistent in finding the act unconstitutional? Does Justice Roberts take the position that there are no judicially enforceable internal limitations on the spending power—the courts will not determine whether an expenditure promotes the “general welfare”—but that there are judicially enforceable federalism-based external limitations on that power? What are those limits? Note Justice Stone’s invocation of the legislature’s “sense of public responsibility.”

2. Consistency with later decisions. In Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U.S. 548 (1937), the Supreme Court upheld the validity of the federal unemployment compensation system. Under that system, employers paid a federal excise tax based on their employees’ wages. If the employer also paid into a state unemployment fund that had been certified by the Secretary of the Treasury as meeting certain “minimum criteria” designed to assure financial stability and accountability, the employer received a credit for that amount, reducing its federal excise tax liability by up to 90 percent.

This system, the Court concluded, did not “[involve] the coercion of the States in contravention of the Tenth Amendment or of restrictions implicit in our federal form of government.” In his opinion for the Court, Justice Cardozo emphasized the problems caused by the Great Depression: Despite unprecedented levels of unemployment, many states had held back from adopting unemployment insurance “through alarm lest in laying such a toll upon their industries, they would place themselves in a position of economic disadvantage as compared with neighbors or competitors.”

The Court emphasized that a “wide range of judgment is given to the several states as to the particular type of statute to be spread upon their books.” And it found that Congress had acted permissibly in deciding to offer the credit only to taxpayers in states that had adopted a form of unemployment insurance approved by the federal government. Giving the federal credit without regard to the contents of a state plan would be “manifestly futile in the absence of some assurance that the [state] law leading to the credit” actually addressed the problems that concerned Congress.

And the Court denied that anyone was coerced by the statute:

Who then is coerced through the operation of this statute? Not the taxpayer. He pays in fulfillment of the mandate of the local legislature. Not the state. Even now she does not offer a suggestion that in passing the unemployment law she was affected by duress. For all that appears, she is satisfied with her choice, and would be sorely disappointed if it were now to be annulled. The difficulty with the petitioner’s contention is that it confuses motive with coercion.

In particular, the Court refused to say that Alabama, where Steward Machine Co. was located, “was acting, not of her unfettered will, but under the strain of a persuasion equivalent to undue influence, when she chose to have relief administered under laws of her own making, by agents of her own selection, instead of under federal laws, administered by federal officers, with all the ensuing evils, at least to many minds, of federal patronage and power....We think the choice must stand....”

And the Court distinguished United States v. Butler, emphasizing that here, “[t]he proceeds of the tax in controversy are not earmarked for a special group” and “[t]he unemployment compensation law which is a condition of the credit has had the approval of the state and could not be a law without it.”

Justices McReynolds, Sutherland, Van Devanter, and Butler dissented. Is Steward Machine Co. consistent with Butler? Consider the proposition that the unemployment system is more objectionable than the Agricultural Adjustment

Act because the former “coerces” the states directly while the latter does so only indirectly by allowing contracts between the United States and private parties that have the effect of undermining local policy. Note that the states are “coerced” into participating by a provision that affects the taxes paid by private parties, who thus have an incentive to locate in participating states and to pressure states through the political process to participate.

3. Coercion and states' rights. Why is the state not coerced into participating in the unemployment system by fear that businesses will relocate to states that have qualifying unemployment systems? In Butler, Justice Stone said that “Threat of loss, not hope of gain, is the essence of economic coercion.” Which one is operating in Steward Machine Co.?

The difficulty of the questions turns on identifying a baseline set of “entitlements” held by states—here, the set of activities in which the states and not the national government can engage. For a comprehensive discussion, see Kreimer, Allocational Sanctions: The Problem of Negative Rights in a Positive State, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1293 (1984). For additional discussion, see Chapter 9 infra.

National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius

567 U.S. 519 (2012)

CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS announced the judgment of the Court and delivered [an] opinion with respect to Part IV, in which JUSTICE BREYER and JUSTICE KAGAN join.

I...

Enacted in 1965, Medicaid offers federal funding to States to assist pregnant women, children, needy families, the blind, the elderly, and the disabled in obtaining medical care. In order to receive that funding, States must comply with federal criteria governing matters such as who receives care and what services are provided at what cost. By 1982 every State had chosen to participate in Medicaid. Federal funds received through the Medicaid program have become a substantial part of state budgets, now constituting over 10 percent of most States’ total revenue.

The Affordable Care Act expands the scope of the Medicaid program and increases the number of individuals the States must cover. [If] a State does not comply with the Act’s new coverage requirements, it may lose not only the federal funding for those requirements, but all of its federal Medicaid funds....

The States...contend that the Medicaid expansion exceeds Congress's authority under the Spending Clause. They claim that Congress is coercing the States to adopt the changes it wants by threatening to withhold all of a State's Medicaid grants, unless the State accepts the new expanded funding and complies with the conditions that come with it. This, they argue, violates the basic principle that the "Federal Government may not compel the States to enact or administer a federal regulatory program."

There is no doubt that the Act dramatically increases state obligations under Medicaid. The current Medicaid program requires States to cover only certain discrete categories of needy individuals—pregnant women, children, needy families, the blind, the elderly, and the disabled. There is no mandatory coverage for most childless adults, and the States typically do not offer any such coverage. The States also enjoy considerable flexibility with respect to the coverage levels for parents of needy families. On average States cover only those unemployed parents who make less than 37 percent of the federal poverty level, and only those employed parents who make less than 63 percent of the poverty line.

The Medicaid provisions of the Affordable Care Act, in contrast, require States to expand their Medicaid programs by 2014 to cover all individuals under the age of 65 with incomes below 133 percent of the federal poverty line. The Act also establishes a new "[e]ssential health benefits" package, which States must provide to all new Medicaid recipients—a level sufficient to satisfy a recipient's obligations under the individual mandate. The Affordable Care Act provides that the Federal Government will pay 100 percent of the costs of covering these newly eligible individuals through 2016. In the following years, the federal payment level gradually decreases, to a minimum of 90 percent. In light of the expansion in coverage mandated by the Act, the Federal Government estimates that its Medicaid spending will increase by approximately $100 billion per year, nearly 40 percent above current levels....

[Our] cases have recognized limits on Congress's power under the Spending Clause to secure state compliance with federal objectives. [The] legitimacy of Congress's exercise of the spending power "thus rests on whether the State voluntarily and knowingly accepts the terms of the 'contract.'" Respecting this limitation is critical to ensuring that Spending Clause legislation does not undermine the status of the States as independent sovereigns in our federal system. That system "rests on what might at first seem a counterintuitive insight, that ‘freedom is enhanced by the creation of two governments, not one.’” For this reason, “the Constitution has never been understood to confer upon Congress the ability to require the States to govern according to Congress’ instructions.” Otherwise the two-government system established by the Framers would give way to a system that vests power in one central government, and individual liberty would suffer.

That insight has led [us] to scrutinize Spending Clause legislation to ensure that Congress is not using financial inducements to exert a “power akin to undue influence.” Congress may use its spending power to create incentives for States to act in accordance with federal policies. But when “pressure turns into compulsion,” the legislation runs contrary to our system of federalism. “[T]he Constitution simply does not give Congress the authority to require the States to regulate.” That is true whether Congress directly commands a State to regulate or indirectly coerces a State to adopt a federal regulatory system as its own.

Permitting the Federal Government to force the States to implement a federal program would threaten the political accountability key to our federal system. [Spending] Clause programs do not pose this danger when a State has a legitimate choice whether to accept the federal conditions in exchange for federal funds. In such a situation, state officials can fairly be held politically accountable for choosing to accept or refuse the federal offer. But when the State has no choice, the Federal Government can achieve its objectives without accountability....Indeed, this danger is heightened when Congress acts under the Spending Clause, because Congress can use that power to implement federal policy it could not impose directly under its enumerated powers.

We addressed such concerns in Steward Machine. [We] acknowledged the danger that the Federal Government might employ its taxing power to exert a “power akin to undue influence” upon the States. But we observed that Congress adopted the challenged tax and abatement program to channel money to the States that would otherwise have gone into the Federal Treasury for use in providing national unemployment services. Congress was willing to direct businesses to instead pay the money into state programs only on the condition that the money be used for the same purposes. Predicating tax abatement on a State’s adoption of a particular type of unemployment legislation was therefore a means to “safeguard [the Federal Government’s] own treasury.” We held that “[i]n such circumstances, if in no others, inducement or persuasion does not go beyond the bounds of power.”...

[In] the typical case we look to the States to defend their prerogatives by adopting “the simple expedient of not yielding” to federal blandishments when they do not want to embrace the federal policies as their own. The States are separate and independent sovereigns. Sometimes they have to act like it.

The States, however, argue that the Medicaid expansion is far from the typical case. They object that Congress has “crossed the line distinguishing encouragement from coercion” in the way it has structured the funding: Instead of simply refusing to grant the new funds to States that will not accept the new conditions, Congress has also threatened to withhold those States’ existing Medicaid funds. The States claim that this threat serves no purpose other than to force unwilling States to sign up for the dramatic expansion in health care coverage effected by the Act.

Given the nature of the threat and the programs at issue here, we must agree. [Conditions] that do not [govern] the use of the funds, however, cannot be justified on that basis. When, for example, such conditions take the form of threats to terminate other significant independent grants, the conditions are properly viewed as a means of pressuring the States to accept policy changes.

In South Dakota v. Dole, we considered a challenge to a federal law that threatened to withhold five percent of a State’s federal highway funds if the State did not raise its drinking age to 21. The Court found that the condition was “directly related to one of the main purposes for which highway funds are expended—safe interstate travel.” At the same time, the condition was not a restriction on how the highway funds—set aside for specific highway improvement and maintenance efforts—were to be used.

We accordingly asked whether “the financial inducement offered by Congress” was “so coercive as to pass the point at which ‘pressure turns into compulsion.’” By “financial inducement” the Court meant the threat of losing five percent of highway funds; no new money was offered to the States to raise their drinking ages. We found that the inducement was not impermissibly coercive, because Congress was offering only “relatively mild encouragement to the States.” We observed that “all South Dakota would lose if she adheres to her chosen course as to a suitable minimum drinking age is 5%” of her highway funds. [Whether] to accept the drinking age change “remain[ed] the prerogative of the States not merely in theory but in fact.”

In this case, the financial “inducement” Congress has chosen is much more than “relatively mild encouragement”—it is a gun to the head. [A] State that opts out of the Affordable Care Act’s expansion in health care coverage [stands] to lose not merely “a relatively small percentage” of its existing Medicaid funding, but all of it. [It] is easy to see how the Dole Court could conclude that the threatened loss of less than half of one percent of South Dakota’s budget left that State with a “prerogative” to reject Congress’s desired policy, “not merely in theory but in fact.” The threatened loss of over 10 percent of a State’s overall budget, in contrast, is economic dragooning that leaves the States with no real option but to acquiesce in the Medicaid expansion.¹²

Justice Ginsburg claims that Dole is distinguishable because here “Congress has not threatened to withhold funds earmarked for any other program.” But that begs the question: The States contend that the expansion is in reality a new program and that Congress is forcing them to accept it by threatening the funds for the existing Medicaid program. We cannot agree that existing Medicaid and the expansion dictated by the Affordable Care Act are all one program simply because “Congress styled” them as such. If the expansion is not properly viewed as a modification of the existing Medicaid program, Congress’s decision to so title it is irrelevant.

Here, the Government claims that the Medicaid expansion is properly viewed merely as a modification of the existing program because the States agreed that Congress could change the terms of Medicaid when they signed on in the first place. The Government observes that the Social Security Act, which includes the original Medicaid provisions, contains a clause expressly reserving “[t]he right to alter, amend, or repeal any provision” of that statute. So it does. But “if Congress intends to impose a condition on the grant of federal moneys, it must do so unambiguously.” A State confronted with statutory language reserving the right to “alter” or “amend” the pertinent provisions of the Social Security Act might reasonably assume that Congress was entitled to make adjustments to the Medicaid program as it developed. Congress has in fact done so, sometimes conditioning only the new funding, other times both old and new.

The Medicaid expansion [accomplishes] a shift in kind, not merely degree. The original program was designed to cover medical services for four particular categories of the needy: the disabled, the blind, the elderly, and needy families with dependent children. Previous amendments to Medicaid eligibility merely altered and expanded the boundaries of these categories. Under the Affordable Care Act, Medicaid is transformed into a program to meet the health care needs of the entire nonelderly population with income below 133 percent of the poverty level. It is no longer a program to care for the neediest among us, but rather an element of a comprehensive national plan to provide universal health insurance coverage.¹⁴ ...

As we have explained, “[t]hough Congress’ power to legislate under the spending power is broad, it does not include surprising participating States with postacceptance or ‘retroactive’ conditions.” A State could hardly anticipate that Congress’s reservation of the right to “alter” or “amend” the Medicaid program included the power to transform it so dramatically.

Justice Ginsburg claims that in fact this expansion is no different from the previous changes to Medicaid, such that “a State would be hard put to complain that it lacked fair notice.” But the prior change she discusses—presumably the most dramatic alteration she could find—does not come close to working the transformation the expansion accomplishes....

The Court in Steward Machine did not attempt to “fix the outermost line” where persuasion gives way to coercion. The Court found it “[e]nough for present purposes that wherever the line may be, this statute is within it.” We have no need to fix a line either. It is enough for today that wherever that line may be, this statute is surely beyond it. Congress may not simply “conscript state [agencies] into the national bureaucratic army,” and that is what it is attempting to do with the Medicaid expansion....

B...

[The] Court today limits the financial pressure the Secretary may apply to induce States to accept the terms of the Medicaid expansion. As a practical matter, that means States may now choose to reject the expansion; that is the whole point. But that does not mean all or even any will. Some States may indeed decline to participate, either because they are unsure they will be able to afford their share of the new funding obligations, or because they are unwilling to commit the administrative resources necessary to support the expansion. Other States, however, may voluntarily sign up, finding the idea of expanding Medicaid coverage attractive, particularly given the level of federal funding the Act offers at the outset.

We have no way of knowing how many States will accept the terms of the expansion, but we do not believe Congress would have wanted the whole Act to fall, simply because some may choose not to participate....[Confident] that Congress would not have intended anything different, we conclude that the rest of the Act need not fall in light of our constitutional holding....

The Federal Government's argument in this case at best pays lip service to the anticoercion principle. The Federal Government suggests that it is sufficient if States are "free, as a matter of law, to turn down" federal funds....

This argument ignores reality. When a heavy federal tax is levied to support a federal program that offers large grants to the States, States may, as a practical matter, be unable to refuse to participate in the federal program and to substitute a state alternative. Even if a State believes that the federal program is ineffective and inefficient, withdrawal would likely force the State to impose a huge tax increase on its residents, and this new state tax would come on top of the federal taxes already paid by residents to support subsidies to participating States.¹³

Acceptance of the Federal Government's interpretation of the anticoercion rule would permit Congress to dictate policy in areas traditionally governed primarily at the state or local level. Suppose, for example, that Congress enacted legislation offering each State a grant equal to the State's entire annual expenditures for primary and secondary education. Suppose also that this funding came with conditions governing such things as school curriculum, the hiring and tenure of teachers, the drawing of school districts, the length and hours of the school day, the school calendar, a dress code for students, and rules for student discipline. As a matter of law, a State could turn down that offer, but if it did so, its residents would not only be required to pay the federal taxes needed to support this expensive new program, but they would also be forced to pay an equivalent amount in state taxes. And if the State gave in to the federal law, the State and its subdivisions would surrender their traditional authority in the field of education....

[In] crafting the ACA, Congress clearly expressed its informed view that no State could possibly refuse the offer that the ACA extends....

If Congress had thought that States might actually refuse to go along with the expansion of Medicaid, Congress would surely have devised a backup scheme so that the most vulnerable groups in our society, those previously eligible for Medicaid, would not be left out in the cold. But nowhere in the over 900-page Act is such a scheme to be found....

These features of the ACA convey an unmistakable message: Congress never dreamed that any State would refuse to go along with the expansion of Medicaid. Congress well understood that refusal was not a practical option.

The Federal Government does not dispute the inference that Congress anticipated 100% state participation, but it argues that this assumption was based on the fact that ACA's offer was an "exceedingly generous" gift. As the Federal Government sees things, Congress is like the generous benefactor who offers $1 million with few strings attached to 50 randomly selected individuals. Just as this benefactor might assume that all of these 50 individuals would snap up his offer, so Congress assumed that every State would gratefully accept the federal funds (and conditions) to go with the expansion of Medicaid.

This characterization of the ACA's offer raises obvious questions. If that offer is "exceedingly generous," as the Federal Government maintains, why have more than half the States brought this lawsuit, contending that the offer is coercive? And why did Congress find it necessary to threaten that any State refusing to accept this "exceedingly generous" gift would risk losing all Medicaid funds? Congress could have made just the new funding provided under the ACA contingent on acceptance of the terms of the Medicaid Expansion....

[The joint dissent concluded that the penalty for not participating in the Medicaid expansion could not be severed from the entire scheme of Medicaid expansion, and therefore that the entire expansion, including the option for states to participate, had to fall.]

JUSTICE GINSBURG, with whom JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR joins, [dissenting] in part.

Medicaid, as amended by the ACA [is] not two spending programs; it is a single program with a constant aim—to enable poor persons to receive basic health care when they need it. Given past expansions, plus express statutory warning that Congress may change the requirements participating States must meet, there can be no tenable claim that the ACA fails for lack of notice. Moreover, States have no entitlement to receive any Medicaid funds; they enjoy only the opportunity to accept funds on Congress' terms. Future Congresses are not bound by their predecessors' dispositions; they have authority to spend federal revenue as they see fit. The Federal Government, therefore, is not, as The Chief Justice charges, threatening States with the loss of "existing" funds from one spending program in order to induce them to opt into another program. Congress is simply requiring States to do what States have long been required to do to receive Medicaid funding: comply with the conditions Congress prescribes for participation....¹⁷

B...

Yes, there are federalism-based limits on the use of Congress' conditional spending power....

This case does not present the concerns that led the Court in Dole even to consider the prospect of coercion. In Dole,....in view of the Twenty-First Amendment, it was an open question whether Congress could directly impose a national minimum drinking age.

The ACA, in contrast, relates solely to the federally funded Medicaid program; if States choose not to comply, Congress has not threatened to withhold funds earmarked for any other program. Nor does the ACA use Medicaid funding to induce States to take action Congress itself could not undertake. The Federal Government undoubtedly could operate its own health-care program for poor persons, just as it operates Medicare for seniors' health care.

That is what makes this such a simple case, and the Court's decision so unsettling....

The starting premise on which The Chief Justice's coercion analysis rests is that the ACA did not really "extend" Medicaid; instead, Congress created an entirely new program to co-exist with the old. The Chief Justice calls the ACA new, but in truth, it simply reaches more of America's poor than Congress originally covered....

Congress has broad authority to construct or adjust spending programs to meet its contemporary understanding of "the general Welfare." Courts owe a large measure of respect to Congress' characterization of the grant programs it establishes. Even if courts were inclined to second-guess Congress' conception of the character of its legislation, how would reviewing judges divine whether an Act of Congress, purporting to amend a law, is in reality not an amendment, but a new creation? At what point does an extension become so large that it "transforms" the basic law? Endeavoring to show that Congress created a new program, the Chief Justice....asserts that, in covering those earning no more than 133% of the federal poverty line, the Medicaid expansion, unlike pre-ACA Medicaid, does not "care for the neediest among us." What makes that so? Single adults earning no more than $14,856 per year—133% of the current federal poverty level—surely rank among the Nation's poor....

Consider also that Congress could have repealed Medicaid. Thereafter, Congress could have enacted Medicaid II, a new program combining the pre-2010 coverage with the expanded coverage required by the ACA. By what right does a court stop Congress from building up without first tearing down?

The Chief Justice finds the Medicaid expansion vulnerable because it took participating States by surprise. “A State could hardly anticipate that Congres[s]” would endeavor to “transform [the Medicaid program] so dramatically,” he states. For the notion that States must be able to foresee, when they sign up, alterations Congress might make later on, The Chief Justice cites only one case: [Pennhurst]....

[Pennhurst’s] rule demands that conditions on federal funds be unambiguously clear at the time a State receives and uses the money—not at the time, perhaps years earlier, when Congress passed the law establishing the program.

In any event, from the start, the Medicaid Act put States on notice that the program could be changed: “The right to alter, amend, or repeal any provision of [Medicaid],” the statute has read since 1965, “is hereby reserved to the Congress.” The “effect of these few simple words” has long been settled. By reserving the right to “alter, amend, [or] repeal” a spending program, Congress “has given special notice of its intention to retain...full and complete power to make such alterations and amendments...as come within the just scope of legislative power.”...

The Chief Justice nevertheless would rewrite §1304 to countenance only the “right to alter somewhat,” or “amend, but not too much.” Congress, however, did not so qualify §1304. Indeed, Congress retained discretion to “repeal” Medicaid, wiping it out entirely....

The Chief Justice ultimately asks whether “the financial inducement offered by Congress...pass[ed] the point at which pressure turns into compulsion.” The financial inducement Congress employed here, he concludes, crosses that threshold: The threatened withholding of “existing Medicaid funds” is “a gun to the head” that forces States to acquiesce.²⁴

The Chief Justice sees no need to “fix the outermost line” [Steward Machine] “where persuasion gives way to coercion.” Neither do the joint dissenters.²⁵ Notably, the decision on which they rely, Steward Machine, found the statute at issue inside the line, “wherever the line may be.”

When future Spending Clause challenges arrive, as they likely will in the wake of today’s decision, how will litigants and judges assess whether “a State has a legitimate choice whether to accept the federal conditions in exchange for federal funds”? Are courts to measure the number of dollars the Federal Government might withhold for noncompliance? The portion of the State’s budget at stake? And which State’s—or States’—budget is determinative: the lead plaintiff, all challenging States (26 in this case, many with quite different fiscal situations), or some national median? Does it matter that Florida, unlike most States, imposes no state income tax, and therefore might be able to replace foregone federal funds with new state revenue?²⁶ Or that the coercion state officials in fact fear is punishment at the ballot box for turning down a politically popular federal grant?

The coercion inquiry, therefore, appears to involve political judgments that defy judicial calculation....

At bottom, my colleagues’ position is that the States’ reliance on federal funds limits Congress’ authority to alter its spending programs. This gets things backwards: Congress, not the States, is tasked with spending federal money in service of the general welfare. And each successive Congress is empowered to appropriate funds as it sees fit. When the 110th Congress reached a conclusion about Medicaid funds that differed from its predecessors’ view, it abridged no State’s right to “existing,” or “pre-existing,” funds. For, in fact, there are no such funds. There is only money States anticipate receiving from future Congresses.

...

[I] would [hold] that the Medicaid expansion is within Congress’ spending power.

Note: Conditional Spending, Coercion, and the Political Process

1. The Dole framework. In South Dakota v. Dole, 483 U.S. 203 (1987), the Supreme Court faced a challenge to a federal statute that directed the Secretary of Transportation to withhold a portion of federal highway funds from states that did not prohibit the purchase of alcohol by people under the age of twenty-one. Congress used this technique because of uncertainty about its power to impose a national minimum drinking age directly, in light of the twenty-first amendment, which had been treated as giving the states especially broad control over regulations of alcoholic beverages. Although much of Chief Justice Rehnquist’s opinion for the Court discussed whether the twenty-first amendment provided an independent limitation on Congress’s power to spend, the opinion also contained some general observations about the scope of the conditional spending power:

The spending power is of course not unlimited, but is instead subject to several general restrictions. [First,] the exercise of the spending power must be in pursuit of “the general welfare.” [Butler.] In considering whether a particular expenditure is intended to serve general public purposes, courts should defer substantially to the judgment of Congress. Second, [if] Congress desires to condition the States’ receipt of federal funds, it “must do so [unambiguously.]” Third, our cases have suggested (without significant elaboration) that conditions on federal grants might be illegitimate if they are unrelated “to the federal interest in particular national projects or programs.” Finally, [other] constitutional provisions may provide an independent bar to the conditional grant of federal funds.

The twenty-one-year-old drinking age condition satisfied all of these requirements. It served the general welfare because different drinking ages in different states created incentives for young people “to combine their desire to drink with their ability to drive.”

The Court agreed with the suggestion in Steward Machine Co. that at some point “pressure turns into coercion.” But here, because all South Dakota would lose if she adheres to her chosen course as to a suitable minimum drinking age is 5% of the funds otherwise obtainable under specified highway grant programs, the argument as to coercion is shown to be more rhetoric than fact. [Here] Congress has offered relatively mild encouragement to the States to enact higher minimum drinking ages than they would otherwise choose. [But] the enactment of such laws remains the prerogative of the States not merely in theory but in fact.

Justice O’Connor’s dissenting opinion argued that the minimum drinking age “is not sufficiently related to interstate highway construction to justify” the condition placed on funds “appropriated for that purpose”:

When Congress appropriates money to build a highway, it is entitled to insist that the highway be a safe one. But it is not entitled to insist as a condition of the use of highway funds that the State impose or change regulations in other areas of the State’s social and economic life because of an attenuated or tangential relationship to highway use or safety. [If] the rule were otherwise, the Congress could effectively regulate almost any area of a State’s social, political, or economic life on the theory that use of the interstate transportation system is somehow enhanced.

Prior to NFIB, courts had generally used the Dole framework to analyze the constitutionality of conditional spending statutes. Consider the following observations about Chief Justice Roberts' opinion:

The Dole test provides the Court with multiple avenues through which it may invalidate a statute as exceeding the powers granted under the Spending Clause. Chief Justice Roberts did not recite the Dole test in his opinion, relying instead solely on an assessment of whether the federal law is coercive. In order to achieve consensus, this approach requires agreement on a single, vague, and highly normatively charged standard.

Greene, Maximimalism, 38 Cardozo L. Rev. 623, 643 (2016).

2. Distinguishing conditions from coercion. What are the criteria for determining when a conditional offer becomes coercion? For additional discussion, see Chapter 9, section E, infra. Does the application of those criteria, whatever they might be, “involve political [as distinct from legal] judgments,” as Justice Ginsburg asserts? Would it be constitutionally permissible for Congress to reduce existing Medicaid expenditures by 5 percent in states that did not expand the program fully? By 10 percent?

3. Repeal and reenact? Note the Chief Justice’s response to Justice Ginsburg’s “repeal and reenact” hypothetical. What precisely are the “practical considerations” that would stand in the way of that course? Note that the argument must refer to the time of the Act’s initial adoption, not to the time when Congress might be required to reconsider its initial decisions in light of a judicial holding of unconstitutionality. (Why might the practical considerations be different at those two times?)

Bagenstos, The Anti-Leveraging Principle and the Spending Clause After NFIB, 101 Geo. L.J. 861 (2013), suggests that the Chief Justice’s opinion rests on an “anti-leveraging principle”: that “[w]hen Congress takes an entrenched federal program that provides large sums to the states and tells states that they can continue to participate in that program only if they also agree to participate in a separate and independent program, the condition is unconstitutionally coercive.” When Congress does not repeal a prior program, it must, however, provide a “separate enticement” if it wishes for states to participate in a new program. “It may be harder for Congress to get states to agree to participate in both programs, but that is a far cry from a rule that would require Congress to continue spending in a way that [clashes] with its current understanding of the general welfare.”

4. States’ rights limitations on conditional spending. What limitations does the Court suggest? Is it helpful to say that the issues are ones of degree and fact? What sort of facts?

Note that over time, the Court’s interpretation of the spending power has seemed to dovetail with its treatment of the commerce power: In eras where the commerce power was relatively circumscribed, the Court seemed more willing to impose limits on the spending power as well, while in eras where the commerce power was treated as close to plenary, the Court also deferred to congressional use of the spending power.

Must the conditions imposed be related to the activity receiving the federal subsidy? Note that the Court’s precise formulation in Steward Machine Co. is “unrelated to the fiscal need [or] to any other end legitimately national.” Is the latter anything more than the Hamiltonian position on the scope of the spending power? Could Congress require that state universities whose students receive federally guaranteed loans (a) not discriminate on the basis of race and gender in their admissions policies; (b) not discriminate on the basis of race and gender in faculty employment; (c) conduct research for federal agencies on the development of nuclear power? Could Congress require that states accepting federal funds for elementary and secondary education ban the possession of guns near schools? That such states suspend students who bring guns to schools? Note that a number of federal statutes—for example, title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964—regulate recipients of federal funds.

5. Avoiding the race to the bottom. Consider the following argument in support of national legislation such as the statute at issue in Steward Machine: Every state desires to alleviate the burdens of unemployment by adopting some sort of unemployment system. But any state that does so runs the risk that a neighboring state will not, or will adopt a somewhat different system. If the neighboring state has no unemployment system, or has one financed more favorably to employers, the state that adopts the less favorable system runs the risk that employers will relocate. In order to assure that no risk of “unfair competition” of this sort—sometimes called a “race to the bottom”—can occur, coordinated action on the national level is necessary. For a development of this account, see Cooter and Siegel, Collective Action Federalism: A General Theory of Article I, Section 8, 63 Stan. L. Rev. 115 (2010).

Note the following points about this argument: (a) Mechanisms of voluntary coordination exist, as the Court discussed in Carter v. Carter Coal Co. (b) Can we distinguish between failure of a state legislature to act because it fears unfair competition from a neighboring state and failure to act because it believes that unemployment compensation systems are unsound as a matter of policy? Is it sufficient to answer that that is the kind of judgment we leave to Congress? (c) Note that five states, including New York and California, had adopted unemployment compensation systems before Congress acted. Does that cast doubt on the argument that states failed to act out of fear of unfair competition? Would those states have feared such competition any less than other states did? (d) Is there a race to the bottom problem in connection with the provision of health care insurance? Cooter and Siegel, supra, suggest that there is: States that attempt to implement a program like the Affordable Care Act will find themselves attracting people with preexisting conditions, making their programs unsustainable.

6. Statutory interpretation as a limiting technique. The questions just discussed can be avoided by construing ambiguous statutes so as not to impose the problematic obligations on the states. As Justice Rehnquist wrote in South Dakota v. Dole, Congress must state “unambiguously” the conditions it imposes on states that accept federal funds. See Arlington Central School District Board of Education v. Murphy, 548 U.S. 291 (2006) (noting that “[in] a Spending Clause case, the key is...what the States are clearly told regarding the conditions that go along with the acceptance of those funds”).

3. The “War” Power

Article I, section 8 articulates a range of congressional powers related to war: for example, the power to “declare War,” to “provide for the common Defence,” to “raise and support Armies” and to “provide and maintain a Navy,” to “make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces,” and the like. How do these express war powers interact with the necessary and proper clause in delineating the scope of congressional power during wartime?

(The general question whether during times of war constitutional constraints on civil rights or civil liberties are (or should be) relaxed is dealt with more extensively in Chapter 4, section D; Chapter 5, section C; and Chapter 7, section B, infra.)

The Supreme Court has observed that “[the] war power of the national government is ‘the power to wage war successfully.’ See Charles Evans Hughes, War Powers under the Constitution, 42 A.B.A. Rep. 232, 238. It extends to every matter and activity so related to war as substantially to affect its conduct and progress. The power is not restricted to the winning of victories in the field and the repulse of enemy forces. It embraces every phase of the national defense....”

Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 93 (1943). At the same time, the Court has also observed that “[the] phrase ‘war power’ cannot be invoked as a talismanic incantation to support any exercise of congressional power which can be brought within its ambit,” United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258, 263 (1968), and that “[even] the war power does not remove constitutional limitations safeguarding essential liberties,” Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 426 (1934).

In Woods v. Cloyd W. Miller Co., 333 U.S. 138 (1948), the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, which froze rents at their wartime levels. It concluded that “the war power sustains this legislation.” Even though the President had declared hostilities terminated on December 31, 1946, before the statute was enacted, “the war power does not necessarily end with the cessation of hostilities.” When Congress acted, there was a deficit in housing which in considerable measure was caused by the heavy demobilization of veterans and by the cessation or reduction in residential construction during the period of hostilities due to the allocation of building materials to military projects. Since the war effort contributed heavily to that deficit, Congress has the power even after the cessation of hostilities to act to control the forces that a short supply of the needed article created....

We recognize the force of the argument that the effects of war under modern conditions may be felt in the economy for years and years, and that if the war power can be used in days of peace to treat all the wounds which war inflicts on our society, it may not only swallow up all other powers of Congress but largely obliterate the Ninth and Tenth Amendments as well. There are no such implications in today’s decision. We deal here with the consequences of a housing deficit greatly intensified during the period of hostilities by the war effort. Any power, of course, can be abused. But we cannot assume that Congress is not alert to its constitutional responsibilities. And the question whether the war power has been properly employed in cases such as this is open to judicial inquiry.

The question of the constitutionality of action taken by Congress does not depend on recitals of the power which it undertakes to exercise. Here it is plain from the legislative history that Congress was invoking its war power to cope with a current condition of which the war was a direct and immediate cause.

Justice Jackson’s concurring opinion expressed “misgivings” about “this vague, undefined and indefinable ‘war power’”:

No one will question that this power is the most dangerous one to free government in the whole catalogue of powers. It is usually invoked in haste and excitement when calm legislative consideration of constitutional limitation is difficult. It is executed in a time of patriotic fervor that makes moderation unpopular. And, worst of all, it is interpreted by judges under the influence of the same passions and pressures. Always, [the] Government urges hasty decision to forestall some emergency or serve some purposes and pleads that paralysis will result if its claims to power are denied or their confirmation delayed.

Particularly when the war power is invoked to do things to the liberties of people, or to their property or economy that only indirectly affect conduct of the war and do not relate to the management of the war itself, the constitutional basis should be scrutinized with care.

Nonetheless, he concluded that “the present state of war [was not] merely technical,” and that the statute was constitutional.

What is “the war power” on which the Court relies? Justice Jackson suggests that the political constraints on congressional action are loosened in all areas when the war powers are invoked. Is he correct?

Note: Individual Rights and the War Power

A common view is that congressional legislation during wartime tends to constrict individual rights and liberties. But see Posner and Vermeule, Accommodating Emergencies, 56 Stan. L. Rev. 605 (2003) (suggesting this view is somewhat exaggerated). Does the consensus depend on how individual rights and liberties are defined? For example, did the statute at issue in Woods constrict or expand rights? From whose perspective ought this to be measured?

1. Voting rights. Consider the expansion of the franchise during World War II. From the end of Reconstruction through the mid-twentieth century, black citizens were disenfranchised throughout much of the South. Southern congressmen blocked virtually every attempt to enact legislation protecting or expanding the right to vote because of their fear that such legislation would enfranchise black voters.

One of the primary disenfranchising devices was the poll tax, particularly in states such as Virginia, Arkansas, and Texas. In 1942, President Roosevelt proposed, and Congress passed, “An act to provide for a method of voting, in time of war, by members of the land and naval forces absent from the place of their residence,” Pub. L. No. 77-712, 56 Stat. 753. Section 2 of the act provided that “[no] person in military service in time of war shall be required, as a condition of voting in any election for President, Vice President,...or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, to pay any poll tax....” A few years earlier, the Supreme Court had upheld Texas’s poll tax against a constitutional attack. See Breedlove v. Suttles, 302 U.S. 277 (1937). (Breedlove was subsequently overruled by Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966), discussed in Chapter 6, section E, infra.) The act also overrode state laws regarding absentee voting by providing a more uniform federal absentee voting process for members of the armed forces.

The act’s supporters sought to circumvent Breedlove by relying on the war power. According to an oral history that discussed the act:

We had to argue that the war power, which previously had been held, for example, to permit Congress to put a moratorium on the foreclosure of mortgages representing the obligations of service personnel, sustained the power of Congress to protect the rights of military personnel to vote—that the war power included a power to prevent or remedy dislocation produced by the legitimate exercise of national powers in the fighting of the war, and that the same principle operated to permit Congress in its wisdom to prevent service personnel from being required by state law to lose the benefit of the franchise conferred by state law.

Silber and Miller, Toward “Neutral Principles” in the Law: Selections from the Oral History of Herbert Wechsler, 93 Colum. L. Rev. 854, 880 (1993) (quoting Wechsler, who participated in drafting the act).

Although the 1942 act and its 1944 successor did not explicitly address racial discrimination, southern legislators correctly saw them as the “opening wedge for congressional intrusion in the electoral process, with its ultimate implications for breaking down the disenfranchisement of blacks.” Id. at 879. For a more general argument that the right to vote is a striking counterexample to the common argument that civil liberties are legislatively constricted during wartime, see Karlan, Ballots and Bullets: The Exceptional History of the Right to Vote, 71 U. Cin. L. Rev. 1345 (2003).

2. The first amendment. To what extent does the first amendment constrain Congress’s use of its spending and war powers? Rumsfeld v. FAIR, 547 U.S. 47 (2006), upheld the Solomon Amendment, 10 U.S.C. §983(b)(1), which withholds federal funds from institutions of higher education that deny military recruiters the same access to campuses and students that they provide to other employers. Before the Court reached the question whether the first amendment limited Congress's power, it addressed the antecedent question of Congress's general power to obtain access for military recruiters in the first place. In a unanimous opinion by Chief Justice Roberts, the Court identified two complementary sources of congressional power:

The Constitution grants Congress the power to "provide for the common Defence," "[t]o raise and support Armies," and "[t]o provide and maintain a Navy." Art. I, §8, cls. 1, 12–13. Congress' power in this area "is broad and sweeping," and there is no dispute in this case that it includes the authority to require campus access for military recruiters....

Although Congress has broad authority to legislate on matters of military recruiting, it nonetheless chose to secure campus access for military recruiters indirectly, through its Spending Clause power. The Solomon Amendment gives universities a choice: Either allow military recruiters the same access to students afforded any other recruiter or forgo certain federal funds. Congress' decision to proceed indirectly does not reduce the deference given to Congress in the area of military affairs. Congress' choice to promote its goal by creating a funding condition deserves at least as deferential treatment as if Congress had imposed a mandate on universities.

Congress' power to regulate military recruiting under the Solomon Amendment is arguably greater because universities are free to decline the federal funds....

Given contemporary realities in higher education, are institutions actually free to decline federal funds? What are NFIB's implications for the analysis of this question?

B. CONGRESS'S ENFORCEMENT POWER UNDER THE RECONSTRUCTION AMENDMENTS

The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, passed following the Civil War, introduced a distinctive structure into the Constitution. The first section of each amendment contains a prohibitory provision and each amendment also contains a separate section providing, in virtually identical language, that "Congress shall have power to enforce" the provision "by appropriate legislation."

What power do the enforcement clauses give to Congress? Does the textual reference to Congress imply that the relationship between judicial and congressional interpretations of the Reconstruction amendments should differ from the relationship that obtains with respect to other constitutional provisions, such as the commerce clause? Does the fact that the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments were at least in significant part a direct, congressionally generated repudiation of the Supreme Court's pre-Civil War decision in Dred Scott v. Sandford, and were intended to overrule the Court's interpretation, shed light on the express allocation of enforcement power to Congress?

In most of this section, we consider issues that have arisen with respect to Congress's enforcement power under section 5 of the fourteenth amendment, since that amendment has served as the basis for the most legislation and has generated the most judicial and scholarly attention. We return at the conclusion, however, to some questions regarding interpretation of the other enforcement clauses.

Note: Possible Interpretations of the Section 5 Power

Standing alone, section 1 of the fourteenth amendment, among other things, forbids states from denying persons within their jurisdiction due process of law or the equal protection of the laws. (The contours of these prohibitions are examined in depth in other parts of this book, particularly Chapters 5 through 8, infra.) Under the most modest interpretation, section 5 gives Congress the power to provide causes of action allowing those individuals whose rights to equal protection or due process are violated to bring a lawsuit, rather than simply to assert their fourteenth amendment rights as a defense. What more might section 5 authorize?

1. Complex remedies. Section 5 might authorize Congress to create remedies that courts would have difficulty developing on their own in the ordinary course of case-by-case adjudication. Consider in this connection South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301 (1966): After an extensive investigation into racial discrimination in voting practices, Congress enacted the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which gave the Attorney General and the Director of the Census unreviewable authority to make factual determinations about whether a jurisdiction had used a literacy test or other "device" and the level of voter registration or turnout. Once those findings were made, the use of "tests or devices" was suspended in jurisdictions with low levels of participation. In addition, the state or subdivision could not adopt any new standards or procedures with respect to voting without prior submission of the standards to federal authorities (the so-called preclearance process). The jurisdiction's changes would be approved only if either the Department of Justice or a special three-judge federal court concluded that the changes had neither a racially discriminatory purpose nor a racially discriminatory effect. Shortly after their passage, the Court upheld these provisions as permissible exercises of Congress's power under section 2 of the fifteenth amendment "to enforce...by appropriate legislation" the right guaranteed by section 1 of that amendment. (The cases have not distinguished between the enforcement powers granted Congress by the fourteenth amendment and those granted by the fifteenth.) Decades later, the Court struck down the formula for deciding which jurisdictions were required to preclear their voting changes. See Shelby County v. Holder, 133 S. Ct. 2612 (2013), discussed later in this section. (In the interim, the Court upheld a temporary nationwide ban on literacy tests and similar devices, see Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970), that was later made permanent, see 52 U.S.C. §10501.)

2. Preventive or "prophylactic" remedies. Congress might have the power to forestall the occurrence of acts that would violate rights that the courts have found or would find protected by the Constitution. Note that the "remedy" here occurs before the "violation" does. See City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156 (1980). The city challenged the application of the preclearance provisions on the ground, among others, that the fifteenth amendment prohibited only purposeful discrimination. The Voting Rights Act required rejecting proposed changes that had discriminatory effects, even if they had no discriminatory purpose. The Attorney General had found that the city's proposed changes had a discriminatory effect, but not that they were motivated by a discriminatory purpose. Under those circumstances, the city argued, Congress's power to enforce the fifteenth amendment did not extend to forbidding its proposed changes. The Court, through Justice Marshall, rejected the city's argument. It assumed that the fifteenth amendment prohibited only intentional discrimination. But "Congress could rationally have concluded that, because electoral changes by jurisdictions with a demonstrable history of intentional racial discrimination in voting create the risk of purposeful discrimination, it was proper to prohibit changes that have a discriminatory impact."

Is the "risk" that at some time in the future, the city will adopt purposefully discriminatory changes? If so, why won't addressing those changes when they occur be adequate to vindicate the fifteenth amendment? Or is the "risk" that neither the Attorney General nor the courts will be able accurately to determine in every instance whether a change had a discriminatory purpose? How substantial must either of these risks be? Is it enough that Congress found them substantial, or must the Court agree, based on its independent analysis of the situation? Justice Rehnquist's dissent, joined by Justice Stewart, argued that, having established that it had no discriminatory purpose, the city would not violate the Constitution in adopting its new rules, and that Congress therefore lacked power to "remedy" a nonexistent violation by requiring preclearance of the changes.

KATZENBACH v. MORGAN, 384 U.S. 641 (1966). Lassiter v. Northampton Election Board, 360 U.S. 45 (1959), held that a fairly administered English-language literacy requirement for prospective voters did not violate the substantive guarantees of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. In 1965, as part of the Voting Rights Act, Congress enacted section 4(e), which provided, in pertinent part:

(1) Congress hereby declares that to secure the rights under the fourteenth amendment of persons educated in American-flag schools in which the predominant classroom language was other than English, it is necessary to prohibit the States from conditioning the right to vote of such persons on ability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter in the English language....

(2) No person who demonstrates that he has successfully completed the sixth primary grade in a public school in, or a private school accredited by, any State or territory, the District of Columbia, or the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico in which the predominant classroom language was other than English, shall be denied the right to vote in any Federal, State, or local election because of his inability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter in the English language....

This provision was designed to enfranchise several hundred thousand people who had migrated to New York from Puerto Rico by overriding a New York statute requiring that voters be literate in English.

Justice Brennan, writing for the Court, rejected the argument that section 4(e) could be sustained only after a judicial decision that English-language literacy requirements violate the Equal Protection Clause itself. Such a construction of the enforcement power would "depreciate both congressional resourcefulness and congressional responsibility for implementing the Amendment. It would confine the legislative power in this context to the insignificant role of abrogating only those state laws that the judicial branch was prepared to adjudge unconstitutional, or of merely informing the judgment of the judiciary by particularizing the 'majestic generalities' of §1 of the Amendment."

The Court explained that Section 4(e) "may be viewed as a measure to secure for the Puerto Rican community residing in New York nondiscriminatory treatment by government—both in the imposition of voting qualifications and the provision or administration of governmental services, such as public schools, public housing and law enforcement. [The] practical effect of §4(e) is to prohibit New York from denying the right to vote to large segments of its Puerto Rican community. [This] enhanced political power will be helpful in gaining nondiscriminatory treatment in public services for the entire Puerto Rican community. [It] was well within congressional authority to say that this need of the Puerto Rican minority for the vote warranted federal intrusion upon any state interests served by the English literacy requirement. It was for Congress [to] assess and weigh the various conflicting considerations—the risk or pervasiveness of the discrimination in governmental services, the effectiveness of eliminating the state restriction on the right to vote as a means of dealing with the evil, the adequacy or availability of alternative remedies, and the nature and significance of the state interests that would be affected by the nullification of the English literacy requirement. [It] is not for us to review the congressional resolution of these factors. It is enough that we be able to perceive a basis upon which the Congress might resolve the conflict as it did.”

The Court then considered “whether §4(e) was merely legislation aimed at the elimination of an invidious discrimination in establishing voter qualifications. We are told that New York’s English literacy requirement originated in the desire to provide an incentive for non-English speaking immigrants to learn the English language and in order to assure the intelligent exercise of the franchise. Yet Congress might well have questioned, in light of the many exemptions provided and some evidence suggesting that prejudice played a prominent role in the enactment of the requirement whether these were actually the interests being served. Congress might have also questioned whether denial of a right deemed so precious and fundamental in our society was a necessary or appropriate means of encouraging persons to learn English, or of furthering the goal of an intelligent exercise of the franchise. Finally, Congress might well have concluded that as a means of furthering the intelligent exercise of the franchise, an ability to read or understand Spanish is as effective as ability to read English for those to whom Spanish-language newspapers and Spanish-language radio and television programs are available to inform them of election issues and governmental affairs. Since Congress undertook to legislate so as to preclude the enforcement of the state law, and did so in the context of a general appraisal of literacy requirements for voting, to which it brought a specially informed legislative competence, it was Congress’ prerogative to weigh these competing considerations. Here again, it is enough that we perceive a basis upon which Congress might predicate a judgment that the application of New York's English literacy requirement to deny the right to vote to a person with a sixth grade education in Puerto Rican schools in which the language of instruction was other than English constituted an invidious discrimination in violation of the Equal Protection Clause."

Justice Harlan, joined by Justice Stewart, dissented. He interpreted the decision as adopting a test of rationality: "[Was] Congress acting rationally in declaring that the New York statute is irrational?" For him, it was "a judicial question whether the condition with which Congress has thus sought to deal is in truth an infringement of the Constitution, something that is the necessary prerequisite to bringing the §5 power into play at all. [Were] the rule otherwise, Congress would be able to qualify this Court's constitutional decisions under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments [by] resorting to congressional power under the Necessary and Proper Clause. [In] effect the Court reads §5 of the Fourteenth Amendment as giving Congress the power to define the substantive scope of the Amendment. If that indeed be the true reach of §5, then I do not see why Congress should not be able as well to exercise its §5 'discretion' by enacting statutes so as in effect to dilute equal protection and due process decisions of this Court. In all such cases there is room for reasonable men to differ as to whether or not a denial of equal protection or due process has occurred, and the final decision is one of judgment. Until today this judgment has always been one for the judiciary to resolve." He acknowledged that "[decisions] on questions of equal protection and due process are based not on abstract logic, but on empirical foundations. To the extent 'legislative facts' are relevant to a judicial determination, Congress is well equipped to investigate them, and such determinations are of course entitled to due respect." But he found "no [factual] data" showing that "Spanish-speaking citizens are fully as capable of making informed decisions in a New York election as are English-speaking citizens. Nor was there any showing [to] support the Court's alternative argument that §4(e) should be viewed as but a remedial measure designed to cure or assure against unconstitutional discrimination of other varieties." He concluded, "To deny the effectiveness of this congressional enactment is not of course to disparage Congress' exertion of authority in the field of civil rights; it is simply to recognize that the Legislative Branch like the other branches of federal authority is subject to the governmental boundaries set by the Constitution. To hold, on this record, that §4(e) overrides the New York literacy requirement seems to me tantamount to allowing the Fourteenth Amendment to swallow the State's constitutionally ordained primary authority in this field. For if Congress by what, as here, amounts to mere ipse dixit can set that otherwise permissible requirement partially at naught I see no reason why it could not also substitute its judgment for that of the States in other fields of their exclusive primary competence as well.”

Note: The Scope of Section 5

What interpretation of section 5 does Morgan adopt? The Court mentions a preventive or prophylactic rationale, but some of its language suggests broader interpretations.

1. Remedies for arguable violations. The interpretations of section 5 authorizing complex or preventive remedies rest on the proposition that somewhere in the situation lurks a constitutional violation that the courts would themselves declare to be a violation. Karlan, Two Section Twos and Two Section Fives: Voting Rights and Remedies after Flores, 39 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 725, 728–729 (1998), suggests, after reviewing Morgan and several later cases upholding congressional expansion of the ban on literacy tests, that

[the] cases...offer three models of congressionally corrigible invidious discrimination: the internal, the external, and the prospective....

First, under the internal model, literacy tests themselves might be the source of invidious discrimination; that is, the unconstitutional discrimination might occur within the electoral system. Congress and the Court had substantial evidence that literacy tests were administered in deliberately discriminatory ways for the purpose of excluding black citizens who possessed the same abilities as white individuals who were permitted to register. Under this view, Congress could ban literacy tests because the available evidence gave it “reason to believe that many of the laws affected by the congressional enactment have a significant likelihood of being unconstitutional.” The congressional ban might—and in fact did—reach some literacy tests that could not be proven to be purposefully discriminatory. But [the] Constitution does not require a perfect fit.

Second, in the external model, purposeful governmental discrimination outside the electoral system might play out within the electoral system, where it would be observed in the disparate impact of otherwise acceptable policies. For example, the inability of minority voters to pass even a fairly administered literacy test might be “the direct consequence of previous governmental discrimination in education.” Under this view, Congress could ban literacy tests to reach and remedy the effects of that impermissible prior discrimination....

Third, under the prospective model, literacy tests might be seen as enabling future invidious action. For example, if literacy tests eliminate a disproportionate number of minority citizens from the electorate, then their diminished voting power might leave minorities vulnerable to discrimination in a wide range of government programs by officials who would be relieved of any practical need to be responsive to the minority's concerns. Under this expansive view, Congress might ban literacy tests "as a remedial measure to deal with... discrimination in the provision of public services."

2. Substantive interpretations. Is Congress better situated than the Court to determine whether a particular practice denies rights conferred by the fourteenth amendment? On what bases might we rest an independent power in Congress to interpret the Constitution in ways that the Court would (might?) not?

a. Fact-finding ability. Is Congress better situated than the courts to engage in fact-finding about equality on the ground? Consider Colker and Brudney, Dissing Congress, 100 Mich. L. Rev. 80, 117 (2001), who point to the distinctive "skill and sophistication that Congress brings to the information-gathering process. Congress educates itself not just through structured record evidence"—as courts do—"but through a range of informal contacts—including local meetings with constituents, ex parte contacts between members (or staff) and lobbyists, and exchanges with executive branch representatives. This institutional virtue, the capacity to gather and evaluate information in both structured and informal settings, contributes to a distinctive Section 5 role for Congress."

b. Reasonable alternative interpretations of "liberty." Consider the possibility that (1) with respect to some constitutional guarantees, there is a (broad or narrow) range of permissible interpretations; and (2) the courts are sometimes constrained by their institutional characteristics—for example, by limits on their ability to define rules with sufficient clarity—to adopt only one interpretation within that range. Congress, lacking the same kinds of institutional characteristics, might adopt another interpretation yet still remain within the range of permissible interpretations. Note that some "expansions" of one constitutional "right" might contract other constitutional "rights." In Morgan itself, the plaintiffs who challenged section 4(e) were registered voters in New York who claimed that the statute's expansion of the franchise diluted the weight of their votes. Is Section 4(e) an expansion or a dilution of constitutional rights?

Carter, The Morgan "Power" and the Forced Reconsideration of Constitutional Decisions, 53 U. Chi. L. Rev. 819, 824 (1986), argues that Morgan is "best understood as a tool that permits the Congress to use its power to enact ordinary legislation to engage the Court in a dialogue about our fundamental rights, thereby 'forcing' the Justices to take a fresh look at their own judgments.”

City of Boerne v. Flores

521 U.S. 507 (1997)

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

A decision by local zoning authorities to deny a church a building permit was challenged under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA). The case calls into question the authority of Congress to enact RFRA. We conclude the statute exceeds Congress’ power....

II

Congress enacted RFRA in direct response to the Court’s decision in Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990) [Chapter 8 infra]. There we considered a Free Exercise Clause claim brought by members of the Native American Church who were denied unemployment benefits when they lost their jobs because they had used peyote. Their practice was to ingest peyote for sacramental purposes, and they challenged an Oregon statute of general applicability which made use of the drug criminal. In evaluating the claim, we declined to apply the balancing test set forth in Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963). [We] stated:

Government’s ability to enforce generally applicable prohibitions of socially harmful conduct...cannot depend on measuring the effects of a governmental action on a religious objector’s spiritual development. To make an individual’s obligation to obey such a law contingent upon the law’s coincidence with his religious beliefs, except where the State’s interest is “compelling”...contradicts both constitutional tradition and common sense....

[These] points of constitutional interpretation were debated by Members of Congress in hearings and floor debates. Many criticized the Court’s reasoning, and this disagreement resulted in the passage of RFRA....

RFRA prohibits “government” from “substantially burdening” a person’s exercise of religion even if the burden results from a rule of general applicability unless the government can demonstrate the burden “(1) is in furtherance of a compelling governmental interest; and (2) is the least restrictive means of furthering that compelling governmental interest.” The Act’s mandate applies to any “branch, department, agency, instrumentality, and official (or other person acting under color of law) of the United States,” as well as to any “State, or... subdivision of a State.”...

A...

[In] defense of the Act respondent contends [that] RFRA is permissible enforcement legislation. Congress, it is said, is only protecting by legislation one of the liberties guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause, the free exercise of religion, beyond what is necessary under Smith. It is said the congressional decision to dispense with proof of deliberate or overt discrimination and instead concentrate on a law’s effects accords with the settled understanding that §5 includes the power to enact legislation designed to prevent as well as remedy constitutional violations. It is further contended that Congress’ §5 power is not limited to remedial or preventive legislation....

[Legislation] which deters or remedies constitutional violations can fall within the sweep of Congress’ enforcement power even if in the process it prohibits conduct which is not itself unconstitutional and intrudes into “legislative spheres of autonomy previously reserved to the States.” Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445, 455 (1976)....

[In] assessing the breadth of §5’s enforcement power, we begin with its text. Congress has been given the power “to enforce” the “provisions of this article.” [Congress’] power to enforce the Free Exercise Clause follows from our holding in Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303 (1940), that the “fundamental concept of liberty embodied in [the fourteenth amendment’s due process clause] embraces the liberties guaranteed by the First Amendment.”

Congress’ power under §5, however, extends only to “enforcing” the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court has described this power as “remedial” [South Carolina v. Katzenbach]. The design of the Amendment and the text of §5 are inconsistent with the suggestion that Congress has the power to decree the substance of the Fourteenth Amendment’s restrictions on the States. Legislation which alters the meaning of the Free Exercise Clause cannot be said to be enforcing the Clause. Congress does not enforce a constitutional right by changing what the right is. It has been given the power “to enforce,” not the power to determine what constitutes a constitutional violation. Were it not so, what Congress would be enforcing would no longer be, in any meaningful sense, the “provisions of [the Fourteenth Amendment].”

While the line between measures that remedy or prevent unconstitutional actions and measures that make a substantive change in the governing law is not easy to discern, and Congress must have wide latitude in determining where it lies, the distinction exists and must be observed. There must be a congruence and proportionality between the injury to be prevented or remedied and the means adopted to that end. Lacking such a connection, legislation may become substantive in operation and effect....

Any suggestion that Congress has a substantive, non-remedial power under the Fourteenth Amendment is not supported by our case law....

There is language in our opinion in Katzenbach v. Morgan which could be interpreted as acknowledging a power in Congress to enact legislation that expands the rights contained in §1 of the Fourteenth Amendment. This is not a necessary interpretation, however, or even the best one....

If Congress could define its own powers by altering the Fourteenth Amendment's meaning, no longer would the Constitution be "superior paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means." It would be "on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and, like other acts,...alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it." [Marbury.]...

Respondent contends that RFRA is a proper exercise of Congress' remedial or preventive power. The Act, it is said, is a reasonable means of protecting the free exercise of religion as defined by Smith. It prevents and remedies laws which are enacted with the unconstitutional object of targeting religious beliefs and practices. To avoid the difficulty of proving such violations, it is said, Congress can simply invalidate any law which imposes a substantial burden on a religious practice unless it is justified by a compelling interest and is the least restrictive means of accomplishing that interest. If Congress can prohibit laws with discriminatory effects in order to prevent racial discrimination in violation of the Equal Protection Clause, then it can do the same, respondent argues, to promote religious liberty.

While preventive rules are sometimes appropriate remedial measures, there must be a congruence between the means used and the ends to be achieved. The appropriateness of remedial measures must be considered in light of the evil presented. Strong measures appropriate to address one harm may be an unwarranted response to another, lesser one....

[RFRA] cannot be considered remedial, preventive legislation, if those terms are to have any meaning. RFRA is so out of proportion to a supposed remedial or preventive object that it cannot be understood as responsive to, or designed to prevent, unconstitutional behavior. It appears, instead, to attempt a substantive change in constitutional protections. Preventive measures prohibiting certain types of laws may be appropriate when there is reason to believe that many of the laws affected by the congressional enactment have a significant likelihood of being unconstitutional....

[Justice Stevens concurred in the Court's opinion, and noted as well that he believed that RFRA violated the establishment clause of the first amendment. Justice O'Connor dissented, saying that in her view Smith was wrongly decided and should be overruled, but she agreed with the Court's analysis of Congress's power under section 5. Justice Breyer joined her discussion of Smith but did not "find it necessary" to consider the question of congressional power under section 5. Justice Souter also dissented, saying that the Court should have dismissed the writ of certiorari as improperly granted.]

Note: The Roles of Court and Congress

1. "Changing" or "defining" constitutional rights. The Court argues that "Congress does not enforce a constitutional right by changing what the right is." Consider the theory of judicial supremacy implicit in that phrase:

Congress was not seeking to change the Free Exercise Clause. It was attempting to correct what it considered to be the Supreme Court's misinterpretation, which is not the same thing. The Court stated: "If Congress could define its own powers by altering the Fourteenth Amendment's meaning, no longer would the Constitution be 'superior paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means.'" But no one—not Congress, not the parties...—thought Congress could "alter[] the Fourteenth Amendment's meaning." The question is which body's good faith interpretation of the Amendment—Congress's or the Supreme Court's—is entitled to legal force in this context.

McConnell, Comment, Institutions and Interpretation: A Critique of City of Boerne v. Flores, 111 Harv. L. Rev. 153, 173–174 (1997).

Should Congress have the power to (conclusively) define a right in a reasonable manner inconsistent with a prior judicial determination of what the right is? Would that allow Congress to dilute constitutional protections? Can that question be answered without a broader theory of the relation between Court and Congress in defining constitutional rights? For an argument against judicial supremacy, see M. Tushnet, Taking the Constitution Away from the Courts (1999).

Is the problem in Boerne that Congress acted too swiftly and in direct contradiction of a recent Supreme Court decision? What would Congress have to do to establish that a more focused statute, imposing the statutory standard for zoning decisions, for example, was appropriately “congruent” and “proportional”?

Boerne involved Congress enforcing rights defined in the first amendment (but made applicable to the states through the fourteenth amendment’s due process clause. See Chapter 6, section C.) Should a different analysis apply when Congress is enforcing principles of equality? Consider the following view:

In interpretations and enforcements of the Fourteenth Amendment, there appears to be broad agreement between the Court, Congress, and agencies that the Equal Protection Clause advances an antidiscrimination principle broadly defined. But there is considerable disagreement on the standards and rules for implementing this principle....[T]he Court has determined that the poor, the elderly, and the disabled are entitled to neither heightened protection from laws that discriminate against them nor any special accommodation. But Congress through statutes such as the ESEA, Civil Rights Act, ADA, and ADEA and agencies through interpretations of these statutes have provided heightened protections and special accommodations to these groups.

Judicial supremacy would seem to demand judicial invalidation of these congressional and agency Constitution-based determinations because they deviate from those of the Court. But unlike the religious liberty rules, the difference between the equal protection determinations about which classes are entitled to protection and how much protection they are entitled to has not been based on a substantive disagreement between the political branches and the Court about what the Constitution substantively requires....Rather, judicial considerations about the appropriate role for itself as an unelected, unaccountable institution in a democracy demand judicial noninterference when groups are deemed capable of defending themselves in the political process. This institutional logic suggests that more democratic institutions—Congress and administrative agencies—should be given leeway to diverge from the Court’s doctrine by enforcing equal protection principles in ways that provide protections to groups left unprotected by the Court.

Ross, Administering Suspect Classes, 66 Duke L.J. 1807, 1844–45 (2017).

2. The “congruence and proportionality” test. Consider these observations by Justice Scalia in Tennessee v. Lane, 541 U.S. 509 (2004):

I joined the Court's opinion in Boerne with some misgiving....

I yield to the lessons of experience. The "congruence and proportionality" standard, like all such flabby tests, is a standing invitation to judicial arbitrariness and policy-driven decisionmaking. Worse still, it casts this Court in the role of Congress's taskmaster. Under it, the courts (and ultimately this Court) must regularly check Congress's homework to make sure that it has identified sufficient constitutional violations to make its remedy congruent and proportional. As a general matter, we are ill advised to adopt or adhere to constitutional rules that bring us into constant conflict with a coequal branch of Government. And when conflict is unavoidable, we should not come to do battle with the United States Congress armed only with a test ("congruence and proportionality") that has no demonstrable basis in the text of the Constitution and cannot objectively be shown to have been met or failed....

I would replace "congruence and proportionality" with another test. [One] does not, within any normal meaning of the term, "enforce" a prohibition by issuing a still broader prohibition directed to the same end. One does not, for example, "enforce" a 55-mile-per-hour speed limit by imposing a 45-mile-per-hour speed limit—even though that is indeed directed to the same end of automotive safety and will undoubtedly result in many fewer violations of the 55-mile-per-hour limit. And one does not "enforce" the right of access to the courts at issue in this case, by requiring that disabled persons be provided access to all of the "services, programs, or activities" furnished or conducted by the State. [So-called] "prophylactic legislation" is reinforcement rather than enforcement....

Justice Scalia would restrict congressional power under section 5 to creating causes of action for vindicating fourteenth amendment rights, where courts rather than Congress would define the contours of the rights, and to a few ancillary provisions designed to enable effective litigation of constitutional cases. Consider whether this conforms to the original understanding of the power granted Congress in section 5.

3. Changing times and prophylactic rules. Suppose that Congress has before it sufficient evidence to justify adoption of a remedy under section 5 that is proportional to and congruent with constitutional violations but goes beyond providing a remedy for such violations only. Citing cases upholding the Voting Rights Act of 1965, Boerne asserts that such prophylactic rules are constitutional. What if, after time passes, the number of direct constitutional violations drops, either because of widespread compliance with the congressional statute or because of changing social norms? Can a statute constitutionally valid when adopted later become disproportionate or incongruent and therefore unconstitutional?

The Supreme Court addressed this question in Shelby County v. Holder, 133 S. Ct. 2612 (2013). Section 4 of the Voting Rights Act provided a “coverage formula” that determined which states were subject to the act’s preclearance requirement, which forbid them from making changes in their voting laws without first proving (either to a federal court in Washington, D.C., or to the Department of Justice) that the change would have neither a discriminatory purpose nor a discriminatory effect. The original formula looked at whether the jurisdiction used literacy tests or similar devices as a prerequisite to voting and whether registration or turnout in the 1964 election was significantly below the national average. The formula was amended in 1970 and 1975 to cover jurisdictions with low participation in either or both the 1968 or 1972 election. In 1982 and 2006, Congress extended section 5’s preclearance requirement without changing the coverage formula.

Chief Justice Roberts’s opinion for the Court held that the coverage formula of section 4 was unconstitutional and could no longer be used to subject jurisdictions to the preclearance regime of section 5. The Court emphasized the burdens on covered jurisdictions, which were required to “beseech the Federal Government for permission to implement laws that they would otherwise have the right to enact and execute on their own.” It characterized that burden as particularly severe because of its departure from the normal situation in which states are free to implement their laws until those laws are successfully challenged and because, “despite the tradition of equal sovereignty, the Act applies to only nine States (and several additional counties).”

The Court then declared that “the Act imposes current burdens and must be justified by current needs.” While the VRA’s “departures from the basic features of our system of government” may have been justified by the pervasive discrimination that existed in 1965, they were no longer justified: “Nearly 50 years later, things have changed dramatically”:

When upholding the constitutionality of the coverage formula in 1966, we concluded that it was “rational in both practice and theory.” The formula looked to cause (discriminatory tests) and effect (low voter registration and turnout), and tailored the remedy (preclearance) to those jurisdictions exhibiting both....

Coverage today is based on decades-old data and eradicated practices. The formula captures States by reference to literacy tests and low voter registration and turnout in the 1960s and early 1970s. But such tests have been banned nationwide for over 40 years. And voter registration and turnout numbers in the covered States have risen dramatically in the years since. Racial disparity in those numbers was compelling evidence justifying the preclearance remedy and the coverage formula. There is no longer such a disparity.

In 1965, the States could be divided into two groups: those with a recent history of voting tests and low voter registration and turnout, and those without those characteristics. Congress based its coverage formula on that distinction. Today the Nation is no longer divided along those lines, yet the Voting Rights Act continues to treat it as if it were.

Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justices Breyer, Sotomayor, and Kagan, dissented. Their view was that Congress, rather than the Court, should decide whether the coverage formula remains appropriate:

It is well established that Congress' judgment regarding exercise of its power to enforce the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments warrants substantial deference. The VRA addresses the combination of race discrimination and the right to vote, which is "preservative of all rights." When confronting the most constitutionally invidious form of discrimination, and the most fundamental right in our democratic system, Congress' power to act is at its height.

The basis for this deference is firmly rooted in both constitutional text and precedent. The Fifteenth Amendment, which targets precisely and only racial discrimination in voting rights, states that, in this domain, "Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."...

It cannot tenably be maintained that the VRA, an Act of Congress adopted to shield the right to vote from racial discrimination, is inconsistent with the letter or spirit of the Fifteenth Amendment, or any provision of the Constitution read in light of the Civil War Amendments. Nowhere in today's opinion [is] there clear recognition of the transformative effect the Fifteenth Amendment aimed to achieve....

The stated purpose of the Civil War Amendments was to arm Congress with the power and authority to protect all persons within the Nation from violations of their rights by the States. In exercising that power, then, Congress may use "all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted" to the constitutional ends declared by these Amendments. [McCulloch.] So when Congress acts to enforce the right to vote free from racial discrimination, we ask not whether Congress has chosen the means most wise, but whether Congress has rationally selected means appropriate to a legitimate end....

For three reasons, legislation reauthorizing an existing statute is especially likely to satisfy the minimal requirements of the rational-basis test. First, when reauthorization is at issue, Congress has already assembled a legislative record justifying the initial legislation. Congress is entitled to consider that preexisting record as well as the record before it at the time of the vote on reauthorization....

Second, the very fact that reauthorization is necessary arises because Congress has built a temporal limitation into the Act....

Third, a reviewing court should expect the record supporting reauthorization to be less stark than the record originally made. Demand for a record of violations equivalent to the one earlier made would expose Congress to a catch-22. If the statute was working, there would be less evidence of discrimination, so opponents might argue that Congress should not be allowed to renew the statute. In contrast, if the statute was not working, there would be plenty of evidence of discrimination, but scant reason to renew a failed regulatory regime.

Note: The Interaction of Congressional Enforcement Power and the Eleventh Amendment

The Supreme Court has limited congressional power not only by its construction of the Constitution's grants of substantive power but also by limiting Congress's power to create judicial remedies for enforcing federal constitutional and statutory rights. It has relied principally on the eleventh amendment, which provides, "The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State." The amendment was adopted in response to the Supreme Court's ruling in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419 (1793), which involved a suit by a South Carolina citizen seeking to recover a debt owed for materials supplied to Georgia during the Revolutionary War. The Court upheld federal jurisdiction by a four-to-one vote. Congress submitted the proposed eleventh amendment to the states within three weeks of the decision in Chisholm, and the required three-quarters of the states ratified it within a year, although the official proclamation of ratification did not occur until 1797.

The amendment's text refers only to suits against states brought by citizens of other states or foreign nations. In Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U.S. 1 (1890), however, the Court held that the eleventh amendment also barred suits by citizens against their own state. As the Court later explained, Hans adopts the view that states' immunity from suit was a presupposition of the constitutional order, not displaced by the mere adoption of the Constitution.

Does Congress have the power to abrogate the states' immunity from suit?

For a period the Court held that the Constitution's grants of power to Congress, in article I, section 8 and elsewhere, gave Congress the power to displace state immunity. See, e.g., Pennsylvania v. Union Gas, 491 U.S. 1 (1989).

But in Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida, 517 U.S. 44 (1996), the Court rejected those decisions and held that state sovereign immunity could not be displaced by an exercise of the powers granted Congress in 1789. Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706 (1999), held that Congress also could not require state courts to entertain suits by individuals seeking damages for violation of a federal statute, where the state courts refused to do so on the basis of state sovereign immunity rules that did not themselves discriminate against national claims. The decision cannot be explained as relying on the text of the eleventh amendment, which refers only to the judicial power of the United States. The Court instead relied on a broader principle of sovereign immunity, of which the eleventh amendment is an illustration.

The Court has held, however, that section 5 of the fourteenth amendment does give Congress the power to displace state immunity when it develops remedies for violations of rights protected by section 1 of that amendment. In the Court's view, not only does the fourteenth amendment come later in time than the eleventh, but it also expresses a view of the relation between the states and the nation in which state sovereign immunity must yield to congressional judgments. Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445 (1976).

In general, as Chapter 2 showed, during the twentieth century, Congress used its article I powers, particularly its commerce clause powers, even when it was pursuing principles of equality more expressly reflected in the fourteenth amendment. But Seminole Tribe's holding that "[even] when the Constitution vests in Congress complete law-making authority over a particular area, the Eleventh Amendment prevents congressional authorization of suits by private parties against unconsenting States" creates a wedge between Congress's essentially plenary power to regulate state economic activity and its ability to enforce its regulations by making damages remedies available. [The] juxtaposition of Seminole Tribe and Alden on the one hand with Fitzpatrick on the other, inevitably places pressure on the question of which source of congressional authority undergirds a statute.

Karlan, Disarming the Private Attorney General, 2003 U. Ill. L. Rev. 183, 189. That issue has been confronted in a series of cases.

In Kimel v. Florida Board of Regents, 528 U.S. 62 (2000), the Court held that Congress lacked power under section 5 to authorize a damages remedy under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) for state employees. Although the Court had earlier held, in EEOC v. Wyoming, 460 U.S. 226 (1983), that extension of the ADEA to state employers constituted a valid exercise of Congress's commerce power, the Court concluded in Kimel that the ADEA did not also constitute "appropriate legislation" under section 5. Justice O'Connor's opinion for the Court held that the requirements the ADEA imposed on state governments were "disproportionate to any unconstitutional conduct that conceivably could be targeted by the Act," given that as a matter of constitutional law, states were entitled to treat workers differently based on their age as long as the difference in treatment was not irrational. The ADEA, through its "broad restriction on the use of age as a discriminating factor, prohibits substantially more state employment decisions and practices than would likely be held unconstitutional under the applicable equal protection, rational basis standard." The Court also pointed to the legislative history of the ADEA and found that "Congress had virtually no reason to believe that state and local governments were unconstitutionally discriminating against their employees on the basis of age. Congress' failure to uncover any significant pattern of unconstitutional discrimination here confirms that Congress had no reason to believe that broad prophylactic legislation was necessary in this field."

Similarly, in Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Education Expense Board v. College Savings Bank, 527 U.S. 627 (1999), the Supreme Court rejected congressional attempts to abrogate states' sovereign immunity under the Patent and Plant Variety Protection Remedy Clarification Act, because the Court held that the act did not constitute legislation enacted to enforce the guarantees of the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment. Although patents were a species of property, Congress lacked a legislative record showing that states engaged in pervasive unconstitutional patent infringement (the due process clause requiring proof not just of infringement but also that states refused to provide any remedy).

BOARD OF TRUSTEES v. GARRETT, 531 U.S. 356 (2001). Title I of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA) prohibits certain employers, including state governments, from discriminating against otherwise qualified individuals with disabilities. Among other things, the ADA requires employers to make "reasonable accommodations" for disabled workers, including making physical facilities accessible to and usable by individuals with disabilities and restructuring job requirements or schedules to enable individuals with disabilities to perform the job. Garrett, a registered nurse, was employed as a nursing director at the University of Alabama in Birmingham Hospital. While she was undergoing treatment for cancer, her supervisor required her to give up her high-level position and to transfer to another, lower-paying position. She filed suit seeking money damages.

Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote for a divided Court rejecting her claim. Relying on City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, 473 U.S. 432 (1985), the Chief Justice wrote that legislation that treats people with disabilities differently from people without disabilities must satisfy “only the minimum ‘rational-basis’ review applicable to general social and economic legislation. The legislative record of the ADA [fails] to show that Congress did in fact identify a pattern of irrational state discrimination in employment against the disabled.” Moreover, “the rights and remedies created by the ADA against the States would raise the same sort of concerns as to congruence and proportionality as were found in City of Boerne. [The] accommodation duty far exceeds what is constitutionally required.”

Justice Kennedy, joined by Justice O’Connor, concurred. Justice Breyer’s dissent was joined by Justices Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg. He described the Court as “[reviewing] the congressional record as if it were an administrative agency record.” For the dissenters, “[the] powerful evidence of discriminatory treatment throughout society in general, including discrimination by private persons and local governments, implicates state governments as well, for state agencies form part of that same larger society. There is no particular reason to believe that they are immune from the ‘stereotypic assumptions’ and pattern of ‘purposeful unequal treatment’ that Congress found prevalent.” The dissenters also emphasized differences between the judicial and legislative processes: There was “no reason to require Congress, seeking to determine facts relevant to the exercise of its §5 authority, to adopt rules or presumptions that reflect a court’s institutional limitations. Unlike courts, Congress can readily gather facts from across the Nation, assess the magnitude of a problem, and more easily find an appropriate remedy. Unlike courts, Congress directly reflects public attitudes and beliefs, enabling Congress better to understand where, and to what extent, refusals to accommodate a disability amount to behavior that is callous or unreasonable to the point of lacking constitutional justification. Unlike judges, Members of Congress can directly obtain information from constituents who have first-hand experience with discrimination and related issues. Moreover, unlike judges, Members of Congress are elected. To apply a rule designed to restrict courts as if it restricted Congress’ legislative power is to stand the underlying principle—a principle of judicial restraint—on its head.”

Note: Congressional Power to Abrogate States’ Sovereign Immunity

1. Introduction: Does the eleventh amendment matter? The eleventh amendment bars suits against nonconsenting states. On its face, therefore, it might seem to bar a huge amount of litigation and to preclude enforcement of federal law against the states. But as the Court notes repeatedly in cases such as Alden and Garrett, the eleventh amendment leaves open a variety of enforcement devices:

The constitutional privilege of a State to assert its sovereign immunity [does] not confer upon the State a concomitant right to disregard the Constitution or valid federal law. The States and their officers are bound by obligations imposed by the Constitution and by federal statutes that comport with the constitutional design. We are unwilling to assume the States will refuse to honor the Constitution or obey the binding laws of the United States....

Sovereign immunity, moreover, does not bar all judicial review of state compliance with the Constitution and valid federal law....

Sovereign immunity bars suits only in the absence of consent. Many States, on their own initiative, have enacted statutes consenting to a wide variety of suits....Nor, subject to constitutional limitations, does the Federal Government lack the authority or means to seek the States' voluntary consent to private suits. Cf. South Dakota v. Dole, 483 U.S. 203 (1987).

The States have consented, moreover, to some suits pursuant to the plan of the Convention or to subsequent constitutional amendments. In ratifying the Constitution, the States consented to suits brought by other States or by the Federal Government. [Suits] brought by the United States itself require the exercise of political responsibility for each suit prosecuted against a State, a control which is absent from a broad delegation to private persons to sue nonconsenting States....

Nor does sovereign immunity bar all suits against state officers [for] injunctive or declaratory relief.

Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706, 754–757 (1999). Does the Court's reference to Dole suggest that Congress could use its spending clause power to induce states to waive their sovereign immunity, for example by conditioning a grant of federal funds to any state agency on the agency's agreement to waive immunity for claims by employees under the ADEA?

Perhaps the most significant way around the eleventh amendment, at least with respect to constitutional claims and a significant number of federal statutory claims, involves suits against state officers under 42 U.S.C. §1983:

The Eleventh Amendment almost never matters. More precisely, it matters in ways more indirect and attenuated than is usually acknowledged. Most discussions proceed on the (often unstated) assumption that Eleventh Amendment immunity, when applicable, categorically forbids actions against states. That is formally true but substantively misleading. In almost every case where action against a state is barred by the Eleventh Amendment, suit against a state officer is permitted under [42 U.S.C. §1983.] Very generally, a suit against a state officer is functionally a suit against the state, for the state defends the action and pays any adverse judgment. So far as can be assessed, this is true not occasionally and haphazardly but pervasively and dependably. In most jurisdictions, the state's readiness to defend and indemnify constitutional tort claims is a policy rather than a statutory requirement, but it is nonetheless routine....

Jeffries, In Praise of the Eleventh Amendment and Section 1983, 84 Va. L. Rev. 47, 49–50 (1998).

Jeffries notes that liability under section 1983 normally requires a showing of some degree of fault—because of the doctrine of qualified immunity—but states that “[unlike] most others who have studied the matter, I believe that a constitutional tort regime based on fault is wise policy. To that extent, I find the law of the Eleventh Amendment and Section 1983 fundamentally sound, despite roccoco doctrine and occasional nuttiness....” Id. at 53–54. In particular, Jeffries argues that the limitation on damages remedies actually “facilitate[s] the creation of new rights by reducing the costs of innovation.” Id. at 79.

Is the major function of the eleventh amendment itself, then, largely formal? Consider the Court’s explanation in Alden:

Although the Constitution grants broad powers to Congress, our federalism requires that Congress treat the States in a manner consistent with their status as residuary sovereigns and joint participants in the governance of the Nation. [The] founding generation thought it “neither becoming nor convenient that the several States of the Union, invested with that large residuum of sovereignty which had not been delegated to the United States, should be summoned as defendants to answer the complaints of private persons.” The principle of sovereign immunity preserved by constitutional design “thus accords the States the respect owed them as members of the federation.”

527 U.S. at 748–749.

The alternatives to private damages remedies are not, however, a complete substitute. For example, they may provide less deterrence of violations in the first place, since there may be little incentive for the state government to comply unless it is sued. And some decisions may not be particularly susceptible to prospective relief. Finally, centralized enforcement, in which only the federal government can seek damages, is likely—perhaps more for budgetary and resource reasons than directly for the reasons of political accountability identified in Alden—to lead to underenforcement. See generally Karlan, Disarming the Private Attorney General, 2003 U. Ill. L. Rev. 183.

2. The interaction of rights and remedies. To what extent is the Court's deference to Congress on remedial issues a function of prior judicial decisions setting out the nature of the fourteenth amendment's restrictions on the state?

In Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721 (2003), the Court upheld the abrogation of state sovereign immunity under the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993 (FMLA), which gave eligible employees the right to take up to twelve work weeks of unpaid leave annually to take care of ailing spouses, children, or parents. The FMLA created a private damages remedy “against any employer (including a public agency)” that violated an employee’s rights.

Chief Justice Rehnquist’s opinion for the Court began by noting that FMLA was intended to combat gender-based discrimination in the workplace. In prior cases, the Court had subjected purposeful gender discrimination to heightened scrutiny (as opposed to the more deferential rationality review applicable to distinctions based on classifications such as disability). The fact that gender-based distinctions were more likely than other differences in treatment to violate the equal protection clause means that it should be “easier for Congress to show a pattern of state constitutional violations” that would justify a sweeping remedy.

The Chief Justice saw significant evidence in the record before Congress of gender-based distinctions in employee leave policies. In light of this danger of unconstitutional behavior, the Court concluded that the family-care leave provisions of the FMLA were congruent and proportional:

By creating an across-the-board, routine employment benefit for all eligible employees, Congress sought to ensure that family-care leave would no longer be stigmatized as an inordinate drain on the workplace caused by female employees, and that employers could not evade leave obligations simply by hiring men. By setting a minimum standard of family leave for all eligible employees, irrespective of gender, the FMLA attacks the formerly state-sanctioned stereotype that only women are responsible for family caregiving, thereby reducing employers’ incentives to engage in discrimination by basing hiring and promotion decisions on stereotypes....

[I]n light of the evidence before Congress, a statute [that] simply mandated gender equality in the administration of leave benefits, would not have achieved Congress' remedial object. Such a law would allow States to provide for no family leave at all. Where "two-thirds of the nonprofessional caregivers for older, chronically ill, or disabled persons are working women," and state practices continue to reinforce the stereotype of women as caregivers, such a policy would exclude far more women than men from the workplace.

Justices Kennedy, Scalia, and Thomas dissented.

The Court suggested reconciling Garrett and Hibbs on the ground that prior judicial opinions treated discrimination on the basis of disability and discrimination on the basis of sex quite differently.

In Coleman v. Maryland Court of Appeals, 566 U.S. 30 (2012), however, the Court held that Congress could not validly overcome state sovereign immunity with respect to the self-care provisions of the FMLA. (Hibbs had involved the family leave provision.) Writing for himself, the Chief Justice, and Justices Alito and Thomas, Justice Kennedy concluded that the self-care provision did not respond to unconstitutional sex discrimination by state employers. Justice Scalia concurred in the judgment, reiterating his view that "outside of the context of racial discrimination (which is different for stare decisis reasons), I would limit Congress's §5 power to the regulation of conduct that itself violates the Fourteenth Amendment."

Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justices Breyer, Sotomayor, and Kagan, dissented. Justices Ginsburg and Breyer repeated their view that Congress can abrogate state sovereign immunity pursuant to its article I powers (such as the commerce power). But Justice Ginsburg also argued that, taken in its historical context, the self-care provision of the FMLA should be understood as a response to substantial evidence of unconstitutional sex discrimination. She thus disagreed with the plurality's characterization of the legislative record. She wrote that the self-care provision had its genesis in a concern that women were being singled out for adverse employment consequences because of employers' views that they were likely to become pregnant and to leave the workforce. She located the FMLA within a broader debate between "equal-treatment" feminists, who did not want a pregnancy-leave-specific bill because it would undercut their broader arguments, and "equal-opportunity" feminists, who were concerned that women were being uniquely disadvantaged by the failure to provide pregnancy leave. "In view of this history, it is impossible to conclude that 'nothing in particular about self-care leave...connects it to gender discrimination.'"

Congress [had] good reason to conclude that the self-care provision—which men no doubt would use—would counter employers’ impressions that the FMLA would otherwise install female leave. Providing for self-care would thus reduce employers’ corresponding incentive to discriminate against women in hiring and promotion. In other words, “[t]he availability of self-care leave to men serves to blunt the force of stereotypes of women as primary caregivers by increasing the odds that men and women will invoke the FMLA’s leave provisions in near-equal numbers....

3. The enforcement power and the countermajoritarian difficulty. Consider McConnell, Institutions and Interpretation: A Critique of City of Boerne v. Flores, 111 Harv. L. Rev. 153, 156 (1997):

[W]hen Congress interprets the [Constitution] for purposes of carrying out its enforcement authority under Section Five, it is not bound by the institutional constraints that in many cases lead the courts to adopt a less intrusive interpretation from among the textually and historically plausible meanings of the clause in question. Because these institutional constraints are predicated on the need to protect the discretionary judgments of representative institutions from uncabined judicial interference, there is no reason for Congress—the representatives of the people—to abide by them. Congress need not be concerned that its interpretations [will] trench upon democratic prerogatives, because its actions are the expression of the democratic will of the people.

See also Colker and Brudney, Dissing Congress, 100 Mich. L. Rev. 80, 111 (2001). Colker and Brudney point out that much of the legislation the Court has struck down was enacted long before Boerne articulated a retreat from the generally deferential standard laid out in Morgan.

The Court’s approach represents a serious challenge to the way Congress legislates. The Court is in effect directing Congress to hold focused hearings and to gather comprehensive evidence that will provide ample support for the existence of a national problem addressable under Congress’s enumerated powers. The Court’s new heightened review of the legislative record has transformed Congress’s role from a coequal branch warranting judicial deference to an entity charged with extensive factfinding responsibilities.

4. The level at which rights are specified. In cases such as Kimel, Florida

Prepaid, Garrett, and Hibbs, the Court treated the statute before it as a whole. Tennessee v. Lane, 541 U.S. 509 (2004), took a different approach. Lane concerned congressional abrogation of state sovereign immunity under title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act, which prohibits discrimination and requires reasonable accommodation with respect to public services, programs, or activities. (Recall that Garrett concerned title I of the ADA, which dealt with employment, both public and private.) The respondent was a paraplegic, who used a wheelchair. He sued the state of Tennessee under title II, claiming that he had been denied access to the state court system by reason of his disability. He alleged that he was compelled to appear to answer a set of criminal charges on the second floor of a county courthouse that had no elevator. At his first appearance, he crawled up two flights of stairs to get to the courtroom. When he returned to the courthouse for a hearing, he refused to crawl again or to be carried by officers to the courtroom; he consequently was arrested and jailed for failure to appear. The state of Tennessee moved to dismiss the suit on the ground that it was barred by the eleventh amendment.

Justice Stevens's opinion for the Court noted that title II—unlike title I, which dealt only with employment, which is not itself an independently recognized constitutional right—“seeks to enforce a variety of other basic constitutional guarantees, infringements of which are subject to more searching judicial review.” He explained that “Congress enacted Title II against a backdrop of pervasive unequal treatment in the administration of state services and programs, including systematic deprivations of fundamental rights.” In light of this persistent pattern of discrimination against individuals with disabilities, the Court concluded that title II was appropriate, at least insofar as it was applied to cases alleging denial of access to state judicial proceedings:

Title II—unlike [the] other statutes we have reviewed for validity under §5—reaches a wide array of official conduct in an effort to enforce an equally wide array of constitutional guarantees. Petitioner urges us both to examine the broad range of Title II’s applications all at once, and to treat that breadth as a mark of the law’s invalidity. [But] nothing in our case law requires us to consider Title II, with its wide variety of applications, as an undifferentiated whole....

Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justices Kennedy and Thomas, dissented, emphasizing that Lane was not bringing suit for a denial of his constitutional rights.

Justice Scalia’s dissent is quoted above.

In United States v. Georgia, 546 U.S. 151 (2006), the Court refined its analysis of congressional power under section 5. Goodman, an inmate in a Georgia prison, sued various state defendants challenging the conditions of his confinement. He sought money damages under Title II of the ADA, claiming that the state's failure to accommodate his disabilities—he was a paraplegic and was often left for hours at a time in his wheelchair in a cell where he could neither turn around nor reach the toilet facilities—violated the ADA. In a unanimous opinion written by Justice Scalia, the Court noted that “insofar as Title II creates a private cause of action for damages against the States for conduct that actually violates the Fourteenth Amendment, Title II validly abrogates state sovereign immunity.” If sovereign immunity is designed to relieve states of the burdens of suit, as well as to protect them from liability, is this distinction coherent?

Note: Congressional Power to Regulate “Private” Action for Civil Rights Purposes

1. The thirteenth amendment. Section 1 of the thirteenth amendment provides that “[neither] slavery nor involuntary servitude...shall exist within the United States....” Like section 5 of the fourteenth amendment, section 2 of the thirteenth amendment authorizes Congress “to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.”

From its inception, the thirteenth amendment was understood to apply to private as well as governmental action. See The Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883). (The Civil Rights Cases are examined in greater detail in Chapter 9, section A, infra.) Thus, the Court repeatedly upheld federal prosecutions of private individuals under statutes that criminalized various forms of forced labor, see, e.g., Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U.S. 219 (1911), because, as The Civil Rights Cases explained, “[under] the Thirteenth Amendment, [federal] legislation, so far as necessary or proper to eradicate all forms and incidents of slavery and involuntary servitude, may be direct and primary, operating upon the acts of individuals, whether sanctioned by State legislation or not.” 109 U.S. at 23. For discussion of these issues, see generally G. Rutherford, Civil Rights in the Shadow of Slavery: The Constitution, Common Law, and the Civil Rights Act of 1866 (2012).

How far beyond targeting slavery and involuntary servitude does Congress’s enforcement power extend? The Civil Rights Cases had explained that the enforcement clause gave Congress “power to pass all laws necessary and proper for abolishing all badges and incidents of slavery in the United States.”

In Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., 392 U.S. 409 (1968), the Court relied on that principle in interpreting a Reconstruction era civil rights statute, 42 U.S.C. §1982, to apply to private conduct. The plaintiffs alleged that Mayer, the developer of a large suburban housing complex, had refused to sell them a house solely because one of them was black. They claimed that this violated section 1982, which provides: “All citizens [shall] have the same right, in every State and Territory, as is enjoyed by white citizens thereof, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property.” The Court, through Justice Stewart, held that the statute barred private racial discrimination in the sale of property—and not merely racially discriminatory laws relating to the ownership and use of property—and that, “thus construed, [it] is a valid exercise of the power of Congress to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment.” Quoting the “badges and incidents” language from The Civil Rights Cases, the Court declared that “[surely] Congress has the power rationally to determine what are the badges and the incidents of slavery.” It was not “irrational” for Congress to conclude that private restraints on the ability of blacks to engage in otherwise normal market transactions were one such badge.

Is the role that the Court gave Congress in Jones in interpreting the scope of the thirteenth amendment consistent with the Court’s more recent decisions in Boerne and its progeny?

In Memphis v. Greene, 451 U.S. 100 (1981), by contrast, the Court held that section 1982 could not support the plaintiffs’ challenge to a city’s decision to close a street that ran from a predominantly black neighborhood through a predominantly white neighborhood because the disparate impact of the street closure did not constitute a badge or incident of slavery.

2. The fourteenth amendment. The fourteenth amendment provides that “no state shall [deny] to any person [the] equal protection of the laws.” The reference to “states” has generated a large body of doctrine regarding the so-called state action doctrine, discussed in detail in Chapter 9 infra. For present purposes, the doctrine means that, for the fourteenth amendment to be implicated (and therefore for Congress to have power to enforce its protections), there must be either a sufficient degree of state involvement with the action or a failure by the state to act in circumstances where the Constitution affirmatively requires action.

United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000), held that the civil remedy provision of the Violence Against Women Act was not a constitutionally permissible exercise of Congress’s power under section 5. The statute provided a federal cause of action against a person “who commits a crime of violence motivated by gender and thus deprives another of the right” to be free from such crimes. The private plaintiff in Morrison, a student at a state university, sued, among other people, two other students at the university claiming that they had raped her.

The statute's defenders relied on evidence that states had failed to adequately investigate and prosecute gender-related crimes. The Court rejected this argument:

[The] remedy is simply not "corrective in its character, adapted to counteract and redress the operation of such prohibited state laws or proceedings of state officers." Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. at 18. [Section] 13981 is not aimed at proscribing discrimination by officials which the Fourteenth Amendment might not itself proscribe; it is directed not at any State or state actor, but at individuals who have committed criminal acts motivated by gender bias.

Justice Breyer's dissent asked, "[Given] the relation between remedy and violation—the creation of a federal remedy to substitute for constitutionally inadequate state remedies—where is the lack of 'congruence'?"

In this light, consider Rutherglen, Custom and Usage as Action under Color of State Law: An Essay on the Forgotten Terms of Section 1983, 89 Va. L. Rev. 925 (2003). Rutherglen argues for deference to Congress in determining what counts as state action:

According to the majority in Morrison, the Violence Against Women Act failed [the proportionality and congruence] test because it enacted prohibitions directed mainly against private individuals, not against state actors. The rights granted by Section 1 are good only against state action, and thus legislation under Section 5 must be similarly limited. An examination of custom as a source of state law, however, would have turned this conclusion on its head. The combination of official inaction in enforcing laws that prohibited violence against women, and the underlying pattern of such violence itself, gave rise to the customs necessary to support a congressional finding of state action. Congress has resources available to it that a court does not when trying to determine whether there has been state action in violation of Section 1. The hearings and extensive documentation of the intertwined patterns of official neglect and private violence, recounted in the dissenting opinions to show an effect on commerce, could not easily have been made by a court....

Id. at 972–973.

3. Problems of statutory interpretation. The statutes discussed here are the legacy of Reconstruction, a period when concepts of civil rights and federalism were different from our own. The Court has been criticized and praised for infusing these old statutes with contemporary content. See, e.g., Casper, Jones v. Mayer: Clio, Bemused and Confused Muse, 1968 Sup. Ct. Rev. 89; Kohl, The Civil Rights Act of 1866, Its Hour Come Round at Last, 55 Va. L. Rev. 272 (1969). For a somewhat less skeptical view, see Rutherglen, The Improbable History of Section 1981: Clio Still Bemused and Confused, 2003 Sup. Ct. Rev. 303. If the language of the statutes is fairly susceptible to the Court's interpretations, should it matter that its adopters had a narrower understanding of civil rights? What if their understanding was confused (on our terms or theirs)?

Modern civil rights statutes cover many of the acts also covered by the Reconstruction statutes under the Court's interpretations. The Civil Rights Act of 1968, for example, makes unlawful the activity at issue in Jones v. Mayer. The act is broader than the 1866 act in some ways, by covering other forms of discrimination and providing additional forms of remedial assistance to a complainant, and is narrower in others, by containing some exemptions. Is it appropriate to revive old statutes when Congress has recently addressed the general problem in a different way? Does the fact that the Court revives old statutes at roughly the same time that Congress is enacting new statutes suggest that the Court is more heavily influenced by contemporary understandings than by the intentions of the drafters of the older statute being interpreted?

C. THE TREATY POWER

Article II, section 2 gives the president "Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur." Treaties, like legislation enacted by Congress, can serve as "the supreme Law of the Land." Art. VI, section 2. Many treaty agreements are aimed at activities that take place within national borders. As with the taxing and spending powers discussed earlier in this chapter, the question has arisen to what extent the federal government can reach activities not otherwise within its enumerated powers by exercising the treaty power.

Missouri v. Holland

252 U.S. 416 (1920)

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a bill in equity brought by the State of Missouri to prevent a game warden of the United States from attempting to enforce the Migratory Bird Treaty Act of 1918 and the regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture in pursuance of the same. The ground of the bill is that the statute is an unconstitutional interference with the rights reserved to the States by the Tenth Amendment, and that the acts of the defendant done and threatened under that authority invade the sovereign right of the State and contravene its will manifested in statutes....

On December 8, 1916, a treaty between the United States and Great Britain was proclaimed by the President. It recited that many species of birds in their annual migrations traversed certain parts of the United States and of Canada, that they were of great value as a source of food and in destroying insects injurious to vegetation, but were in danger of extermination through lack of adequate protection. It therefore provided for specified close seasons [and] agreed that the two powers would take or propose to their law-making bodies the necessary measures for carrying the treaty out. [The act] prohibited the killing, capturing or selling any of the migratory birds included in the terms of the treaty except as permitted by regulations [to] be made by the Secretary of Agriculture....

[It] is not enough to refer to the Tenth Amendment, reserving the powers not delegated to the United States, because by Article II, §2, the power to make treaties is delegated expressly, and by Article VI treaties made under the authority of the United States [are] declared the supreme law of the land. If the treaty is valid there can be no dispute about the validity of the statute under Article I, §8, as a necessary and proper means to execute the powers of the Government....

It is said that a treaty cannot be valid if it infringes the Constitution, that there are limits, therefore, to the treaty-making power, and that one such limit is that what an act of Congress could not do unaided, in derogation of the powers reserved to the States, a treaty cannot do. An earlier act of Congress that attempted by itself and not in pursuance of a treaty to regulate the killing of migratory birds within the States had been held bad in the District Court....

Whether the [cases] were decided rightly or not they cannot be accepted as a test of the treaty power. Acts of Congress are the supreme law of the land only when made in pursuance of the Constitution, while treaties are declared to be so when made under the authority of the United States. It is open to question whether the authority of the United States means more than the formal acts prescribed to make the convention. We do not mean to imply that there are no qualifications to the treaty-making power; but they must be ascertained in a different way. It is obvious that there may be matters of the sharpest exigency for the national well being that an act of Congress could not deal with but that a treaty followed by such an act could, and it is not lightly to be assumed that, in matters requiring national action, "a power which must belong to and some where reside in every civilized government" is not to be found. [When] we are dealing with words that also are a constituent act, like the Constitution of the United States, we must realize that they have called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters. It was enough for them to realize or to hope that they had created an organism; it has taken a century and has cost their successors much sweat and blood to prove that they created a nation. The case before us must be considered in the light of our whole experience and not merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago. The treaty in question does not contravene any prohibitory words to be found in the Constitution. The only question is whether it is forbidden by some invisible radiation from the general terms of the Tenth Amendment. We must consider what this country has become in deciding what that Amendment has reserved....

Here a national interest of very nearly the first magnitude is involved. It can be protected only by national action in concert with that of another power. The subject matter is only transitorily within the State and has no permanent habitat therein. But for the treaty and the statute there soon might be no birds for any powers to deal with. We see nothing in the Constitution that compels the Government to sit by while a food supply is cut off and the protectors of our forests and our crops are destroyed. It is not sufficient to rely upon the States. The reliance is vain, and were it otherwise, the question is whether the United States is forbidden to act. We are of opinion that the treaty and statute must be upheld.

Decree affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER and MR. JUSTICE PITNEY dissent.

Note: Limits on the Treaty Power

1. The treaty power as a source of domestic regulatory power. Bradley, The Treaty Power and American Federalism, 97 Mich. L. Rev. 390 (1998), argues for “subject[ing] the treaty power to the same federalism restrictions that apply to Congress’s legislative powers. [The] treaty power would not confer any additional regulatory powers on the federal government, just the power to bind the United States on the international plane.” Justice Holmes’s formulation appears to imply that the treaty power authorizes the national government to bind the nation to take actions that it is otherwise not constitutionally authorized to take. Note that the domain covered by treaties has expanded beyond relations between nations as such to include economic relations (which might be covered by Congress’s power to regulate foreign commerce) and human rights. Does this development make it more necessary to devise judicial doctrines limiting the ability of the national government to enact laws under the treaty power?

Can courts determine what are “matters requiring national action” by treaty followed by legislation rather than by legislation alone? How likely is the President to negotiate and the Senate to ratify a treaty on a matter not requiring national action in Holmes’s sense?

2. Self-executing treaties. The 1916 Migratory Bird Treaty with Great Britain provided that each signatory “would take or propose to [its] law-making bodies the necessary measures for carrying the treaty out.” In contemporary terms, this means the treaty was not “self-executing”: It required domestic implementing legislation. The Migratory Bird Act at issue in Holland was thus entitled “An Act to give effect to the convention.” Would different issues arise had the treaty been “self-executing,” that is, not requiring additional legislation as a matter of U.S. law to create obligations on Americans that could be enforced in domestic courts? In thinking about this question and its relationship to questions of federalism, consider the Supreme Court’s decision in Medellin v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491 (2008).

Medellin, a Mexican national who had lived in the United States since his early childhood, was arrested, charged, and convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. A central piece of evidence in the state’s case was his detailed confession. Medellin gave the confession after being provided with his Miranda warnings, but without being informed of his rights under Article 36(1) (b) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (to which the United States is a signatory) to notify the Mexican consulate of his detention. The United States had also ratified an optional protocol to the Vienna Convention providing that any disputes under the Convention would “lie within the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice.” Finally, as a member of the United Nations, the United States had undertaken, pursuant to Article 94 of the United Nations Charter, “to comply with the decision of the [ICJ] in any case to which it is a party.”

The question before the Court in Medellin was whether Medellin could enforce, in Texas’s courts, a judgment by the ICJ in a case brought against the United States by the Government of Mexico, that the United States was obligated to provide reconsideration of the convictions and sentences of Mexican nationals who had been denied their Vienna Convention rights.

The Supreme Court held that he could not. It found that the United States had not entered into any “self-executing treaty” obligation, and that the judgment issued by the ICJ did “not automatically constitute federal law enforceable in U.S. courts”:

This Court has long recognized the distinction between treaties that automatically have effect as domestic law, and those that—while they constitute international law commitments—do not by themselves function as binding federal law. [While] treaties “may comprise international commitments...they are not domestic law unless Congress has either enacted implementing statutes or the treaty itself conveys an intention that it be ‘self executing and is ratified on these terms.’”...

Our conclusion [that the Vienna Convention is not self-executing] is further supported by general principles of interpretation. [Given] that ICJ judgments may interfere with state procedural rules, one would expect the ratifying parties to the relevant treaties to have clearly stated their intent to give those judgments domestic effect, if they had so intended....

That the judgment of an international tribunal might not automatically become domestic law hardly means the underlying treaty is “useless.” Such judgments would still constitute international obligations, the proper subject of political and diplomatic negotiations....

Justice Stevens concurred in the judgment. While he agreed with the majority that the relevant treaties were best read to “contemplat[e] future action by the political branches” and thus to leave “the choice of whether to comply with ICJ judgments, and in what manner, ‘to the political, not the judicial department,’” he urged Texas nonetheless to take the treaty obligations into account.

Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Souter and Ginsburg, dissented. They emphasized the wide range of self-executing treaties to which the U.S. was a signatory and would have found the relevant treaty provisions here to have been self-executing. They saw the ICJ’s judgment as particularly “well suited to direct judicial enforcement. [Courts] frequently work with criminal procedure and related prejudice. Legislatures do not. Judicial standards are readily available for working in this technical area. Legislative standards are not readily available. Judges typically determine such matters, deciding, for example, whether further hearings are necessary, after reviewing a record in an individual case. Congress does not normally legislate in respect to individual cases.” And they emphasized that the President favored enforcement of the judgment.

3. Constitutional limits on the power to implement treaties. Bond v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 2077 (2014), involved a federal statute implementing the International Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Storage, Stockpiling, and Use of Chemical Weapons, a treaty ratified in 1997. A majority of the Court held that the statute did not apply to the defendant's actions. (She had sought revenge against her husband's paramour by spreading two chemicals that met the statute's definition of "chemical weapons" on surfaces the paramour was likely to touch.)

Chief Justice Roberts's opinion for the Court resolved the case on statutory grounds. "Because our constitutional structure leaves local criminal activity primarily to the States, we have generally declined to read federal law as intruding on that responsibility, unless Congress has clearly indicated that the law should have such reach. The Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act contains no such clear indication, and we accordingly conclude that it does not cover the unremarkable local offense at issue here." To the contrary, the Court had "doubts that a treaty about chemical weapons has anything to do with Bond's conduct. The Convention, a product of years of worldwide study, analysis, and multinational negotiation, arose in response to war crimes and acts of terrorism. There is no reason to think the sovereign nations that ratified the Convention were interested in anything like Bond's common law assault."

By contrast, Justice Scalia, concurring in the judgment, would have held the statute unconstitutional because its only textual foundation was the necessary and proper clause. That clause gave Congress the power to make laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the "Power [to] make Treaties." It did not grant to Congress a "power to execute the treaties themselves." In his view, the combination of the treaty power with the necessary and proper clause gave Congress the power to "appropriate[] money for hiring treaty negotiators, [or to pay] for a bevy of spies to monitor the treaty-related deliberations of other potential signatories. [A] power to help the President make treaties is not a power to implement treaties already made. [To] legislate compliance with the United States' treaty obligations, Congress must rely upon its independent [Article] I, §8, powers." Justice Thomas joined this part of Justice Scalia's opinion.

Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia and in substantial part by Justice Alito, also concurred in the result, "suggest[ing] that the Treaty Power is [a] limited federal power," which "can be used to arrange intercourse with other nations, but not to regulate purely domestic affairs." He did not offer a definition of "intercourse with other nations," but used the term to refer to treaties "dealing with conditions of commerce, with mutual defense, with belligerent relations, with rights of passage [etc.]." He quoted Madison: "The Federal Government's powers [will] be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce—the traditional subjects of treaty-making."

He acknowledged that “the Federal Government needed the ability to respond to unforeseeable varieties of intercourse with other nations,” but, again quoting Madison, any exercise of the Treaty Power “must be consistent with the object of the delegation,’ which is ‘the regulation of intercourse with foreign nations.’”

4. The scope of Missouri v. Holland as applied to separation of powers and individual rights. Does Missouri v. Holland deal only with federalism-based limitations on national power?

a. In the early 1950s, a coalition of conservative Republicans and southern Democrats sponsored the Bricker Amendment, which would have added to the Constitution provisions stating that (1) “a provision of a treaty which conflicts with this Constitution shall not be of any force or effect” and (2) “a treaty shall become effective as internal law [only] through legislation which would be valid in the absence of treaty.” Was the first provision necessary in light of Missouri v. Holland? What effects would the second provision have had? The southern Democrats who supported the Bricker Amendment did so out of concern that provisions of the United Nations Charter and associated treaties would make unlawful aspects of the existing system of race discrimination. In light of Heart of Atlanta and McClung, would the Bricker Amendment have had any effects in this area? The Bricker Amendment fell short of adoption by the Senate in 1954 by a vote of sixty in favor, thirty-one opposed.

b. Consider Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957): Mrs. Covert, a civilian residing with her serviceman husband on a military base in England, was convicted by a military tribunal of killing him. The Supreme Court held that a civilian in her position could not be tried in the military courts. The plurality emphasized that all of Congress’s powers, including its power to regulate the armed forces, were limited by the bill of rights, including its requirement of trial by jury. The plurality also discussed the effects of treaties and executive agreements on congressional power:

[No] agreement with a foreign nation can confer power on the Congress, or on any other branch of Government, which is free from the restraints of the Constitution....

[The] reason treaties were not limited to those made in “pursuance” of the Constitution was so that agreements made by the United States under the Articles of Confederation, including the important peace treaties which concluded the Revolutionary War, would remain in effect. It would be manifestly contrary to the objectives of those who created the Constitution, as well as those who were responsible for the Bill of Rights—let alone alien to our entire constitutional history and tradition—to construe Article VI as permitting the United States to exercise power under an international agreement without observing constitutional prohibitions. In effect, such construction would permit amendment of that document in a manner not sanctioned by Article V. The prohibitions of the Constitution were designed to apply to all branches of the National Government and they cannot be nullified by the Executive or by the Executive and the Senate combined....

There is nothing in Missouri v. Holland which is contrary to the position taken here. There the Court carefully noted that the treaty involved was not inconsistent with any specific provision of the Constitution. The Court was concerned with the Tenth Amendment which reserves to the States or the people all power not delegated to the National Government. To the extent that the United States can validly make treaties, the people and the States have delegated their power to the National Government and the Tenth Amendment is no barrier.

D. THE TENTH AMENDMENT AS A FEDERALISM-BASED LIMITATION ON CONGRESSIONAL POWER

The tenth amendment provides that “[the] powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.” In New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144 (1992), discussed later in this section, Justice O’Connor’s opinion for the Court explained that the question “whether particular sovereign powers have been granted by the Constitution to the Federal Government or have been retained by the States...can be viewed in either of two ways”:

In some cases the Court has inquired whether an Act of Congress is authorized by one of the powers delegated to Congress in Article I of the Constitution. In other cases the Court has sought to determine whether an Act of Congress invades the province of state sovereignty reserved by the Tenth Amendment.... [T]he two inquiries [can be] mirror images of each other. If a power is delegated to Congress in the Constitution, the Tenth Amendment expressly disclaims any reservation of that power to the States; if a power is an attribute of state sovereignty reserved by the Tenth Amendment, it is necessarily a power the Constitution has not conferred on Congress.

It is in this sense that the Tenth Amendment “states but a truism that all is retained which has not been surrendered.” [United States v. Darby] As Justice Story put it, “[t]his amendment is a mere affirmation of what, upon any just reasoning, is a necessary rule of interpreting the constitution. Being an instrument of limited and enumerated powers, it follows irresistibly, that what is not conferred, is withheld, and belongs to the state authorities.” 3 J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 752 (1833).

Does the tenth amendment simply reiterate that the national government’s powers are limited—to those “delegated to the United States by the Constitution”—or does it articulate some independent constraint on Congress’s exercise of its enumerated powers?

Note: The Modern Revival of Tenth Amendment-Based Restraints on Federal Regulation of State and Local Governments

Given the modern expansive definition of “commerce,” much of the activity of state and local governments—particularly in areas such as employment and contracting for goods and services—constitutes “commerce.” Frequently, when Congress regulates interstate commerce, it includes, either expressly or implicitly, state and local governments as well as private parties within the scope of a particular statute. (In the cases discussed in the preceding section in which the Court held that Congress could not enforce various statutes such as title I of the ADA or the ADEA by authorizing private damages actions against states, the Court did not question whether Congress could regulate the state activities in question as long as it enforced its regulation in some other way.)

The Court struggled to define what limits, if any, the tenth amendment imposes on congressional regulation of state and local governments. The starting point in the Court’s effort was National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833 (1976). There, the Court held that the commerce clause did not empower Congress to enforce the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) against the states “in areas of traditional governmental functions.” The Court agreed that the wages and hours of state employees affected interstate commerce but found the application of the statute to state and local employees unconstitutional.

Over the next decade, the Court attempted to identify the contours of the protection afforded state and local governments by National League of Cities. It issued a series of decisions, some of them upholding the constitutionality of federal regulation of state activities and some of them striking down such regulation.

GARCIA v. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY, 469 U.S. 528 (1985). The Court overruled National League of Cities, concluding that the “traditional governmental functions” test was “unworkable.” According to Justice Blackmun’s majority opinion, “[the] problem is that [no] distinction [that] purports to separate out important governmental functions can be faithful to the role of federalism in a democratic society. The essence of our federal system is that within the realm of authority left open to them under the Constitution, the States must be equally free to engage in any activity that their citizens choose for the common weal, no matter how unorthodox or unnecessary anyone else—including the judiciary—deems state involvement to be. Any rule of state immunity that looks to the ‘traditional,’ ‘integral,’ or ‘necessary’ nature of governmental functions inevitably invites an unelected federal judiciary to make decisions about which state policies it favors and which ones it dislikes.” The Court therefore “reject[ed], as unsound in principle and unworkable in practice, a rule of state immunity from federal regulation that turns on a judicial appraisal of whether a particular governmental function is ‘integral’ or ‘traditional.’ Any such rule leads to inconsistent results at the same time that it diserves principles of democratic self-governance, and it breeds inconsistency precisely because it is divorced from those principles.”

Conceding that there are “limits on the Federal Government’s power to interfere with state functions,” the Court examined “the manner in which the Constitution insulates States from the reach of Congress’ power under the Commerce Clause.” It was unlikely “that courts ultimately can identify principled constitutional limitations on the scope of Congress’ Commerce Clause powers over the States merely by relying on a priori definitions of state sovereignty.” The states retained sovereign authority, but “only to the extent that the Constitution has not divested them of their original powers and transferred those powers to the Federal Government. [The] principal means chosen by the Framers to ensure the role of the States in the federal system lies in the structure of the Federal Government itself. [State] sovereign interests, then, are more properly protected by procedural safeguards inherent in the structure of the federal system than by judicially created limitations on federal power.”

Chief Justice Burger and Justices Powell, Rehnquist, and O’Connor dissented. Justice Powell’s dissent said, “The Framers recognized that the most effective democracy occurs at local levels of government, where people with first hand knowledge of local problems have more ready access to public officials responsible for dealing with them. This is as true today as it was when the Constitution was adopted. ‘Participation is likely to be more frequent, and exercised at more different stages of a governmental activity at the local level, or in regional organizations, than at the state and federal levels.’”

Justice Powell referred to the recent “rise of numerous special interest groups that engage in sophisticated lobbying, and make substantial campaign contributions to some members of Congress. These groups are thought to have significant influence in the shaping and enactment of certain types of legislation. Contrary to the Court’s view, a ‘political process’ that functions in this way is unlikely to safeguard the sovereign rights of States and localities.” In contrast to the Court’s observation that “the standard approved in National League of Cities ‘disserves principles of democratic self government,’” Justice Powell observed:

“[The] Court looks myopically only to persons elected to positions in the federal government. It disregards entirely the far more effective role of democratic self-government at the state and local levels. One must compare realistically the operation of the state and local governments with that of the federal government. Federal legislation is drafted primarily by the staffs of the congressional committees. In view of the hundreds of bills introduced at each session of Congress and the complexity of many of them, it is virtually impossible for even the most conscientious legislators to be truly familiar with many of the statutes enacted. Federal departments and agencies customarily are authorized to write regulations. Often these are more important than the text of the statutes. As is true of the original legislation, these are drafted largely by staff personnel. The administration and enforcement of federal laws and regulations necessarily are largely in the hands of staff and civil service employees. These employees may have little or no knowledge of the States and localities that will be affected by the statutes and regulations for which they are responsible. In any case, they hardly are as accessible and responsive as those who occupy analogous positions in State and local governments.”

Justice O’Connor’s dissent stated, “There is more to federalism than the nature of the constraints that can be imposed on the States in ‘the realm of authority left open to them by the Constitution.’ The central issue of federalism, of course, is whether any realm is left open to the States by the Constitution—whether any area remains in which a State may act free of federal interference. ‘The issue...is whether the federal system has any legal substance, any core of constitutional right that courts will enforce.’ C. Black, Perspectives in Constitutional Law 30 (1963). The true ‘essence’ of federalism is that the States as States have legitimate interests which the National Government is bound to respect even though its laws are supreme. If federalism so conceived and so carefully cultivated by the Framers of our Constitution is to remain meaningful, this Court cannot abdicate its constitutional responsibility to oversee the Federal Government’s compliance with its duty to respect the legitimate interests of the States.” She also said, “[With] the abandonment of National League of Cities, all that stands between the remaining essentials of state sovereignty and Congress is the latter's underdeveloped capacity for self-restraint."

Note: From Garcia to New York v. United States

1. The aftermath in Congress. Nine months after the Court's decision in Garcia, Congress enacted the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1985. Under the original Fair Labor Standards Act, private employers must pay overtime to employees who work more than a stated number of hours at a rate of one and one-half times their regular pay. The amendments allow public employers to substitute compensatory time off for the overtime pay, again at the rate of one and one-half hours compensatory time for each hour of overtime. Compensatory time off is limited to 480 hours for public safety employees and employees in seasonal work and to 240 hours for other public employees; after that, public employers must pay for overtime. Does the adoption of the amendments demonstrate that Garcia was correctly decided? Does it show that the Court unnecessarily forced Congress to act so as to maintain the proper system of federal regulation of state employment practices?

2. Garcia applied. A 1982 tax reform statute removed the exemption from federal taxes of income from certain state bonds. In South Carolina v. Baker, 485 U.S. 505 (1988), the Supreme Court upheld the statute. "Garcia holds that the limits [on Congress's power] are structural, not substantive—i.e., that States must find their protection from congressional regulation through the national political process, not through judicially defined spheres of unregulable state activity. [Although] Garcia left open the possibility that some extraordinary defects in the national political process might render congressional regulation of state activities invalid, [South] Carolina has not even alleged that it was deprived of any right to participate in the national political process or that it was singled out in a way that left it politically isolated and powerless."

Justice O'Connor dissented. Chief Justice Rehnquist concurred in the result.

3. The aftermath in the Court. In Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452 (1991), the Court held that the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) did not apply to a state's mandatory retirement provisions affecting appointed state judges. The ADEA bars employers, including state governments, from adopting mandatory retirement policies, but as to state employers, it exempts "appointees on a policymaking level." In interpreting this provision, the Court noted that the state's retirement provision "is a decision of the most fundamental sort for a sovereign entity" and required that Congress's intention to displace state decisions in this area be clearly stated.

NEW YORK v. UNITED STATES, 505 U.S. 144 (1992). The Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act of 1986 was Congress's effort to deal with the problem posed by the accumulation of low-level nuclear waste from such uses as smoke detectors and construction materials at nuclear power plants. A great deal of such waste is generated each year, and it must be isolated from humans. States were reluctant to develop facilities for locally generated waste, and much was shipped out of state. By 1979 only one facility in South Carolina was accepting the waste. The statute authorized South Carolina (and any other state that had a disposal facility) to impose a surcharge for accepting waste from out of state, until 1992, after which it could exclude outside waste. The statute gave states three "incentives" to develop local facilities: First, some of the surcharge was transferred to the United States, which would disburse these funds to states that reached various milestones with respect to the disposal of this waste. Second, the statute authorized South Carolina eventually to close its facility to outside waste. Finally, if a state did not provide for disposal of waste generated within its borders by 1996, the statute provided that the state had to "take title" to the waste. The state would then be subject to direct federal regulation, as an owner of nuclear waste.

Justice O'Connor wrote the Court's opinion. She began by observing, "Congress exercises its conferred powers subject to the limitations contained in the Constitution. Thus, for example, under the Commerce Clause Congress may regulate publishers engaged in interstate commerce, but Congress is constrained in the exercise of that power by the First Amendment. The Tenth Amendment likewise restrains the power of Congress, but this limit is not derived from the text of the Tenth Amendment itself, which [is] essentially a tautology. Instead, the Tenth Amendment confirms that the power of the Federal Government is subject to limits that may, in a given instance, reserve power to the States. The Tenth Amendment thus directs us to determine [whether] an incident of state sovereignty is protected by a limitation on an Article I power."

The Court upheld the first two incentives. With respect to the first, it held that Congress had the power to authorize states to impose a surcharge on out-of-state waste as part of its commerce power; Congress could then collect some of that surcharge using its taxing power, and disburse it to cooperative states as an exercise of its spending power. With respect to the second incentive, Congress's commerce power similarly allowed it to preempt the interstate movement of the regulated waste out of states that lacked compliant facilities.

But the Court struck down the "take title" provision. "Congress may not simply "commandeer the legislative processes of the States by directly compelling them to enact and enforce a federal regulatory program." The reasons for barring direct commandeering included these:

[Where] the Federal Government compels States to regulate, the accountability of both state and federal officials is diminished. If the citizens of New York, for example, do not consider that making provision for the disposal of radioactive waste is in their best interest, they may elect state officials who share their view. That view can always be pre-empted under the Supremacy Clause if it is contrary to the national view, but in such a case it is the Federal Government that makes the decision in full view of the public, and it will be federal officials that suffer the consequences if the decision turns out to be detrimental or unpopular. But where the Federal Government directs the States to regulate, it may be state officials who will bear the brunt of public disapproval, while the federal officials who devised the regulatory program may remain insulated from the electoral ramifications of their decision. Accountability is thus diminished when, due to federal coercion, elected state officials cannot regulate in accordance with the views of the local electorate in matters not pre-empted by federal regulation.

The “take title” provision “offers States, as an alternative to regulating pursuant to Congress’ direction, the option of taking title to and possession of the low level radioactive waste generated within their borders and becoming liable for all damages waste generators suffer as a result of the States’ failure to do so promptly. In this provision, Congress has crossed the line distinguishing encouragement from coercion.” According to Justice O’Connor, the provision “offers state governments a ‘choice’ of either accepting ownership of waste or regulating according to the instructions of Congress. [On] one hand, the Constitution would not permit Congress simply to transfer radioactive waste from generators to state governments. Such a forced transfer, standing alone, would in principle be no different than a congressionally compelled subsidy from state governments to radioactive waste producers. The same is true of the provision requiring the States to become liable for the generators’ damages. Standing alone, this provision would be indistinguishable from an Act of Congress directing the States to assume the liabilities of certain state residents. Either type of federal action would ‘commandeer’ state governments into the service of federal regulatory purposes, and would for this reason be inconsistent with the Constitution’s division of authority between federal and state governments. On the other hand, the second alternative held out to state governments—regulating pursuant to Congress direction—would, standing alone, present a simple command to state governments to implement legislation enacted by Congress. As we have seen, the Constitution does not empower Congress to subject state governments to this type of instruction.”

Responding to the argument that New York officials actively supported the enactment of the statute the state was now challenging as “a bargain among the sited and unsited States, a compromise to which New York was a willing participant and from which New York has reaped much benefit,” Justice O’Connor wrote, “The Constitution does not protect the sovereignty of States for the benefit of the States or state governments as abstract political entities, or even for the benefit of the public officials governing the States. To the contrary, the Constitution divides authority between federal and state governments for the protection of individuals. [Where] Congress exceeds its authority relative to the States, therefore, the departure from the constitutional plan cannot be ratified by the ‘consent’ of state officials.”

Justice White, joined by Justices Blackmun and Stevens, dissented, describing the statute as “very much the product of cooperative federalism, in which the States bargained among themselves to achieve compromises for Congress to sanction.” For the dissenters, “[the] ultimate irony of the decision today is that in its formalistically rigid obeisance to ‘federalism,’ the Court gives Congress fewer incentives to defer to the wishes of state officials in achieving local solutions to local problems. This legislation was a classic example of Congress acting as arbiter among the States in their attempts to accept responsibility for managing a problem of grave import.” Justice Stevens concurred in part and dissented in part.

PRINTZ v. UNITED STATES, 521 U.S. 898 (1997). The Brady Act required the Attorney General to establish a national instant background check system for weapons purchases by November 1998. Until then, gun dealers were required to send a form identifying a purchaser to the “chief law enforcement officer” (CLEO) of a prospective purchaser’s residence, unless the purchaser already had a permit or unless the state already had an instant background check system. The dealer then had to wait five days to complete the sale. When the CLEO received the form, the CLEO had to “make a reasonable effort to ascertain...whether receipt or possession would be in violation of the law,” as when the purchaser was a convicted felon. Two CLEOs from Montana and Arizona challenged the Brady Act, which the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Scalia, held to be unconstitutional.

The Court agreed with the sheriffs’ contention that “compelled enlistment of state executive officers for the administration of federal programs is, until very recent years at least, unprecedented.” Contrary examples, the Court found, involved state judges subject to the supremacy clause and accustomed to enforcing the law of other sovereigns, and statutes requesting states to allow their officials to enforce national law. Turning to “the structure of the Constitution,” the Court observed, “The power of the Federal Government would be augmented immeasurably if it were able to impress into its service—and at no cost to itself—the police officers of the 50 States.” In addition, in tension with article II’s requirement that the President “take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed,” the Brady Act “transfers this responsibility to thousands of CLEOs in the 50 States, who are left to implement the program without meaningful Presidential control.” Relying on New York, the Court concluded that the Brady Act was not a “proper” method of implementing a delegated power.

Finally, the Court held that the reasons given in New York for denying Congress the power to commandeer state legislatures were applicable as well to attempts to commandeer state executive officials:

[The] Government also maintains that requiring state officers to perform discrete, ministerial tasks specified by Congress does not violate the principle of New York because it does not diminish the accountability of state or federal officials. This argument fails even on its own terms. By forcing state governments to absorb the financial burden of implementing a federal regulatory program, Members of Congress can take credit for “solving” problems without having to ask their constituents to pay for the solutions with higher federal taxes. And even when the States are not forced to absorb the costs of implementing a federal program, they are still put in the position of taking the blame for its burdensomeness and for its defects. Under the present law, for example, it will be the CLEO and not some federal official who stands between the gun purchaser and immediate possession of his gun. And it will likely be the CLEO, not some federal official, who will be blamed for any error (even one in the designated federal database) that causes a purchaser to be mistakenly rejected.

The Court rejected the argument that the Brady Act’s constitutionality should be determined by balancing its purposes against the “minimal and only temporary burden” it placed on state officials: “[Where] it is the whole object of the law to direct the functioning of the state executive, [such] a ‘balancing’ analysis is inappropriate. It is the very principle of separate state sovereignty that such a law offends, and no comparative assessment of the various interests can overcome that fundamental defect.”

Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, dissented: “When Congress exercises the powers delegated to it by the Constitution, it may impose affirmative obligations on executive and judicial officers of state and local governments as well as ordinary citizens. This conclusion is firmly supported by the text of the Constitution, the early history of the Nation, decisions of this Court, and a correct understanding of the basic structure of the Federal Government.” He argued that “[under] the Articles of Confederation the National Government had the power to issue commands to the several sovereign states, but it had no authority to govern individuals directly,” but “[that] method of governing proved to be unacceptable [because] it was cumbersome and inefficient. [The] historical materials strongly suggest that the Founders intended to enhance the capacity of the federal government by empowering it—as a part of the new authority to make demands directly on individual citizens—to act through local officials. Hamilton made clear that the new Constitution, ‘by extending the authority of the federal head to the individual citizens of the several States, will enable the government to employ the ordinary magistracy of each, in the execution of its laws.’ The Federalist No. 27, at 180. Hamilton’s meaning was unambiguous; the federal government was to have the power to demand that local officials implement national policy programs.”

Justice Stevens disagreed with the Court’s assessment of early practice, finding that Congress sometimes had required state officials to enforce national law. Relying on Garcia, he argued: “Given the fact that the Members of Congress are elected by the people of the several States, with each State receiving an equivalent number of Senators in order to ensure that even the smallest States have a powerful voice in the legislature, it is quite unrealistic to assume that they will ignore the sovereignty concerns of their constituents. It is far more reasonable to presume that their decisions to impose modest burdens on state officials from time to time reflect a considered judgment that the people in each of the States will benefit therefrom.” And he pointed to Congress’s passage of the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act as evidence that the states’ concerns were being adequately addressed.

A footnote argued that the “concern” about Congress requiring state officials to “‘take the blame’ for failed programs” was “vastly overstated [because] to the extent that a particular action proves politically unpopular, we may be confident that elected officials charged with implementing it will be quite clear to their constituents where the source of the misfortune lies. [They] will inform disgruntled constituents who have been denied permission to purchase a handgun about the origins of the Brady Act requirements. The Court’s suggestion that voters will be confused over who is to ‘blame’ for the statute reflects a gross lack of confidence in the electorate that is at war with the basic assumptions underlying any democratic government.” In addition, Justice Stevens argued, “the majority’s rule seems more likely to damage than to preserve the safeguards against tyranny provided by the existence of vital state governments. By limiting the ability of the Federal Government to enlist state officials in the implementation of its programs, the Court creates incentives for the National Government to aggrandize itself. In the name of State's rights, the majority would have the Federal Government create vast national bureaucracies to implement its policies."

Justice Souter's separate dissent focused on his interpretation of several passages in The Federalist Papers.

Note: The “Anticommandeering” Principle

1. The scope of the decisions: Judicial, legislative, and executive officials. The Court does not repudiate decisions like Testa v. Katt, 330 U.S. 386 (1947), which require state courts to hear claims arising under federal law to the same extent that they hear state law-based claims. Why do courts fall outside the anticommandeering principle? Note that state executive and legislative officials are required to take an oath to support the Constitution. Does the supremacy clause bind state judges in a stronger way? Is political responsibility less diffused when state judges enforce national law? In this light, consider also Medellin v. Texas, 552 U.S. 491 (2008), discussed earlier in this chapter. There, the Court refused to require that Texas state courts hear a claim they had concluded was procedurally defaulted, despite the President's directive that they do so. Although the Supreme Court itself did not discuss the anticommandeering doctrine in reaching its conclusion, the presiding judge on the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals emphasized this rationale in his concurrence explaining why the Texas court declined to follow the President's request. See Ex parte Medellin, 206 S.W.2d 584 (Tex. Crim. App. 2006).

2. Preemption and conditional spending statutes. Preemption, discussed in Chapter 2, section D, supra, is a command from Congress that states forbear from regulating in some area where they otherwise would. Why is that less offensive than a command that they affirmatively regulate? Siegel, Commandeering and Its Alternatives: A Federalism Perspective, 59 Vand. L. Rev. 1629, 1634–1635 (2006), argues that the anticommandeering decisions “vindicate federalism values [by] requiring the federal government to internalize more of the costs of federal regulation [but undermine] federalism values when the (clearly constitutional) alternative of preemption is reasonably available.” He proposes that commandeering should be presumptively unconstitutional “when preemption is not a feasible alternative in the short run, the federal mandate is unfunded and expensive, and the federal government makes little effective effort to alleviate reasonable accountability concerns,” but should be constitutional “when preemption constitutes a feasible alternative in the short run and such preemption would reduce state regulatory [control], the federal mandate is fully funded or relatively [inexpensive], and the federal government takes effective measures to maintain lines of accountability.” Applying these principles, Siegel concludes that the statute in New York v. United States should have been upheld because preemption there “was reasonably available (and indeed had already been threatened),” and that Printz is a closer case. Does this approach provide standards that courts can in practice apply in a principled manner?

3. Commandeering and the war on terror. Consider the implications of these decisions for efforts by the national government to gain assistance from (sometimes reluctant) state and local governments in identifying and interrogating people in connection with investigations of alleged terrorist activities. Do the following observations justify the application of these decisions in that context?

[Federalism], in particular the autonomy protected by the anti-commandeering doctrine, can protect constitutional rights better than the direct assertion of claims based on those rights. State and local government officials exert pressure on the federal government that works differently from constitutional rights. Claims of autonomy [can] arise out of strong interpretations of constitutional rights. These interpretations may be drastically overstated or naively idealistic and, consequently, quite unlikely to move courts to rein in the federal government as it pursues national security. But state and local government autonomy can exert pressure on the federal government to moderate its efforts and take care not to offend constitutional rights, even rights that the courts would not now be willing to enforce. To carry out its programs, the national government will need to inspire the confidence of the vast numbers of police and other personnel employed at the state and, especially, local government level.

Because state and local government autonomy can work as a safeguard for the rights of the people, the anti-commandeering doctrine should remain in place, in full force, unmodified by any sort of emergency exception. [It] is true that this autonomy deprives the national government of a means to carry out programs that may be vitally important. But in cases of the “darest emergency and peril,” the great majority of persons employed at the state and local level of government can be expected to respond without objection. Where there are pockets of noncompliance, the federal government can send in its own personnel, including the military. The different levels of government will exert pressure on each other. State and local government will tend to resist only when the emergency is not dire and when the actions of the federal government offend local beliefs, often idealistic beliefs about constitutional rights. The federal government will want to win compliance and will take steps to inspire cooperation, such as offering ample funding and framing demands that take account of ideas about individual rights. Remove the anti-commandeering doctrine, or temper it with an emergency exception, and this beneficial interaction is lost.

Althouse, The Vigor of Anti-Commandeering Doctrine in Times of Terror, 69 Brook. L. Rev. 1231, 1274–1275 (2004).

Consider also the views expressed in Young, Welcome to the Dark Side: Liberals Rediscover Federalism in the Wake of the War on Terror, 69 Brook. L. Rev. 1277, 1311 (2004):

Federalism is about dividing power; nothing much depends on what the power in question is being used for. It is also about providing institutional space for a diversity of political views. As such, it should surprise no one that a commitment to state and local autonomy would take on the hue of political opposition to the prevailing orthodoxy at the center, whatever that orthodoxy happens to be. Relatively few people are likely to embrace federalism for its own [sake]. Rather, support for state autonomy vis-à-vis national power on both Left and Right has ebbed and flowed throughout our history, according to the dynamics of whatever political issue is most salient at any given time.

4. The tenth amendment and individual rights. Bond v. United States, 564 U.S. 211 (2011), held that an individual had standing to raise tenth amendment objections to a statute enacted to implement the Chemical Weapons Convention. The statute criminalizes knowing possession or use of any chemical that “can cause death, temporary incapacitation or permanent harm to humans or animals” where not intended for a “peaceful purpose.” Bond was indicted under this statute when she placed a caustic substance on various objects her husband’s paramour was likely to touch, causing burns to the other woman’s hand. Justice Kennedy’s opinion stated,

The Framers concluded that allocation of powers between the National Government and the States enhances freedom, first by protecting the integrity of the governments themselves, and second by protecting the people, from whom all governmental powers are derived.

Federalism has more than one dynamic. It is true that the federal structure serves to grant and delimit the prerogatives and responsibilities of the States and the National Government vis-à-vis one another. The allocation of powers in our federal system preserves the integrity, dignity, and residual sovereignty of the States. The federal balance is, in part, an end in itself, to ensure that States function as political entities in their own right.

But that is not its exclusive sphere of operation. Federalism is more than an exercise in setting the boundary between different institutions of government for their own integrity. “State sovereignty is not just an end in itself: ‘Rather, federalism secures to citizens the liberties that derive from the diffusion of sovereign power.’” New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 181 (1992)....

Federalism secures the freedom of the individual. It allows States to respond, through the enactment of positive law, to the initiative of those who seek a voice in shaping the destiny of their own times without having to rely solely upon the political processes that control a remote central power. True, of course, these objects cannot be vindicated by the Judiciary in the absence of a proper case or controversy; but the individual liberty secured by federalism is not simply derivative of the rights of the States.

Federalism also protects the liberty of all persons within a State by ensuring that laws enacted in excess of delegated governmental power cannot direct or control their actions....

The limitations that federalism entails are not therefore a matter of rights belonging only to the States. States are not the sole intended beneficiaries of federalism. An individual has a direct interest in objecting to laws that upset the constitutional balance between the National Government and the States when the enforcement of those laws causes injury that is concrete, particular, and redressable. Fidelity to principles of federalism is not for the States alone to vindicate.

Ultimately, in Bond v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 2077 (2014), the Court held that Bond’s actions were not covered by the statute. That decision is discussed at pages ♦♦-♦♦, supra.

5. The tenth amendment and statutory interpretation. In Gonzales v. Oregon, 546 U.S. 243 (2006), the Supreme Court was faced with a challenge to the Attorney General’s interpretation of the federal Controlled Substances Act (CSA), which regulates the distribution of various drugs. After Oregon passed a Death with Dignity Act that exempted physicians from civil or criminal liability for prescribing lethal doses of various drugs to terminally ill patients under defined circumstances, the Attorney General issued an Interpretive Rule declaring that using controlled substances to assist suicide is not a legitimate medical practice and that dispensing or prescribing them for this purpose would be unlawful under the CSA and would subject physicians to loss of their prescribing privileges.

By a six-to-three vote, the Court rejected the Attorney General's position. The Court did not question whether Congress would have the ability, using its commerce power, to forbid physician-assisted suicide. Rather, the question was whether the Attorney General's interpretation of the CSA to forbid physician-assisted suicide was a permissible interpretation of the Act. Much of Justice Kennedy's opinion for the Court was taken up with conventional administrative law analysis. But his opinion also relied on the traditional role of the states in regulating medical practice as an interpretive aid:

The structure and operation of the CSA presume and rely upon a functioning medical profession regulated under the States' police powers. The Attorney General can register a physician to dispense controlled substances "if the applicant is authorized to dispense...controlled substances under the laws of the State in which he practices." 21 U.S.C. §823(f). When considering whether to revoke a physician's registration, the Attorney General looks not just to violations of federal drug laws; but he "shall" also consider "the recommendation of the appropriate state licensing board or professional disciplinary authority" and the registrant's compliance with state and local drug laws. The very definition of a "practitioner" eligible to prescribe includes physicians "licensed, registered, or otherwise permitted, by the United States or the jurisdiction in which he practices" to dispense controlled substances. §802(21). Further cautioning against the conclusion that the CSA effectively displaces the States' general regulation of medical practice is the Act's pre-emption provision, which indicates that, absent a positive conflict, none of the Act's provisions should be "construed as indicating an intent on the part of the Congress to occupy the field in which that provision operates...to the exclusion of any State law on the same subject matter which would otherwise be within the authority of the State."...

Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Scalia and Thomas dissented. After explaining why he thought the Attorney General's interpretation of the CSA was justifiable, Justice Scalia, joined by the other two dissenters, remarked:

The Court's decision today is perhaps driven by a feeling that the subject of assisted suicide is none of the Federal Government's business. It is easy to sympathize with that position. The prohibition or deterrence of assisted suicide is certainly not among the enumerated powers conferred on the United States by the Constitution, and it is within the realm of public morality (bonos mores) traditionally addressed by the so-called police power of the States. But then, neither is prohibiting the recreational use of drugs or discouraging drug addiction among the enumerated powers. From an early time in our national history, the Federal Government has used its enumerated powers, such as its power to regulate interstate commerce, for the purpose of protecting public morality—for example, by banning the interstate shipment of lottery tickets, or the interstate transport of women for immoral purposes. Unless we are to repudiate a long and well-established principle of our jurisprudence, using the federal commerce power to prevent assisted suicide is unquestionably permissible. The question before us is not whether Congress can do this, or even whether Congress should do this; but simply whether Congress has done this in the CSA. I think there is no doubt that it has.

6. The tenth amendment and state power. Does the tenth amendment have any implications for the scope of state power? In U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779 (1995), Justice Stevens's opinion for the Court argued that the tenth amendment "could only 'reserve' that which existed before. As Justice Story recognized, 'the states can exercise no powers whatsoever, which exclusively spring out of the existence of the national government, which the constitution does not delegate to them....No state can say, that it has reserved, what it never possessed.'"

Justice Thomas's dissent, which was joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices O'Connor and Scalia, responded:

As far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, [the] States can exercise all powers that the Constitution does not withhold from them. The Federal Government and the States thus face different default rules: where the Constitution is silent about the exercise of a particular power—that is, where the Constitution does not speak either expressly or by necessary implication—the Federal Government lacks that power and the States enjoy it.

The majority's essential logic is that the state governments could not "reserve" any powers that they did not control at the time the Constitution was drafted. But it was not the state governments that were doing the reserving. The Constitution derives its authority instead from the consent of the people of the States. Given the fundamental principle that all governmental powers stem from the people of the States, it would simply be incoherent to assert that the people of the States could not reserve any powers that they had not previously controlled.

7. The tenth amendment and areas of traditional state control. In United States v. Comstock, 560 U.S. 126 (2010), the Court addressed the constitutionality of a federal statute that authorized the civil commitment of mentally ill, sexually dangerous federal prisoners beyond the release date for their criminal sentence. Writing for the Court, Justice Breyer rejected the argument that the federal statute impermissibly invades a traditional province of state sovereignty:

[T]he Tenth Amendment's text is clear: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." (Emphasis added.) The powers "delegated to the United States by the Constitution" include those specifically enumerated powers listed in Article I along with the implementation authority granted by the Necessary and Proper Clause. Virtually by definition, these powers are not powers that the Constitution "reserved to the States."

Justice Breyer rejected Justice Thomas's claim in dissent that the statute improperly limited states' powers to deal with potentially dangerous individuals:

To the contrary, it requires accommodation of state interests: The Attorney General must inform the State in which the federal prisoner "is domiciled or was tried" that he is detaining someone with respect to whom those States may wish to assert their authority, and he must encourage those States to assume custody of the individual. He must also immediately "release" that person "to the appropriate official of" either State "if such State will assume [such] responsibility." And either State has the right, at any time, to assert its authority over the individual, which will prompt the individual's immediate transfer to State custody. Once such a transfer occurs, the state can determine whether to continue detaining the individual.

In his concurrence in the judgment, Justice Kennedy expressed concern with the Court's tenth amendment analysis:

I had thought it a basic principle that the powers reserved to the States consist of the whole, undefined residuum of power remaining after taking account of powers granted to the National Government. The Constitution delegates limited powers to the National Government and then reserves the remainder for the States (or the people), not the other way around, as the Court's analysis suggests. And the powers reserved to the States are so broad that they remain undefined. Residual power, sometimes referred to (perhaps imperfectly) as the police power, belongs to the States and the States alone.

It is correct in one sense to say that if the National Government has the power to act under the Necessary and Proper Clause then that power is not one reserved to the States. But the precepts of federalism embodied in the Constitution inform which powers are properly exercised by the National Government in the first place. It is of fundamental importance to consider whether essential attributes of state sovereignty are compromised by the assertion of federal power under the Necessary and Proper Clause; if so, that is a factor suggesting that the power is not one properly within the reach of federal power.

The opinion of the Court should not be interpreted to hold that the only, or even the principal, constraints on the exercise of congressional power are the Constitution's express prohibitions. The Court's discussion of the Tenth Amendment invites the inference that restrictions flowing from the federal system are of no import when defining the limits of the National Government's power, as it proceeds by first asking whether the power is within the National Government's reach, and if so it discards federalism concerns entirely.

These remarks explain why the Court ignores important limitations stemming from federalism principles. Those principles are essential to an understanding of the function and province of the States in our constitutional structure.

In dissent, Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia, disagreed with the Court's conclusion that the statutory requirement that the Attorney General offer the states the right to take custody of soon-to-be-released federal inmates satisfied the tenth amendment:

This right of first refusal is mere window dressing. More importantly, it is an altogether hollow assurance that §4248 preserves the principle of dual sovereignty. [For] once it is determined that Congress has the authority to provide for the civil detention of sexually dangerous persons, Congress "is acting within the powers granted it under the Constitution," and "may impose its will on the States." Section 4248's right of first refusal is thus not a matter of constitutional necessity, but an act of legislative grace.

8. The role of comparative law. Justice Breyer's separate dissent in Printz noted:

At least some other countries, facing the same basic problem, have found that local control is better maintained through application of a principle that is the direct opposite of the principle the majority derives from the silence of our Constitution. The federal systems of Switzerland, Germany, and the European Union [all] provide that constituent states, not federal bureaucracies, will themselves implement many of the laws, rules, regulations, or decrees enacted by the central "federal" body. They do so in part because they believe that such a system interferes less, not more, with the independent authority of the "state," member nation, or other subsidiary government, and helps to safeguard individual liberty as well.

Justice Scalia's opinion for the Court responded, "We think such comparative analysis inappropriate to the task of interpreting a constitution, though it was of course quite relevant to the task of writing one." Justice Breyer replied:

[W]e are interpreting our own Constitution, not those of other nations, and there may be relevant political and structural differences between their systems and our own. But their experience may nonetheless cast an empirical light on the consequences of different solutions to a common legal problem—in this case the problem of reconciling central authority with the need to preserve the liberty-enhancing autonomy of a smaller constituent governmental entity. And that experience here offers empirical confirmation of the implied answer to a question Justice Stevens asks: Why, or how, would what the majority sees as a constitutional alternative—the creation of a new federal gun-law bureaucracy, or the expansion of an existing federal bureaucracy—better promote either state sovereignty or individual liberty?

Consider the following argument: In the absence of controlling constitutional text, courts appropriately make considerations of policy one factor in determining the Constitution's meaning. Examining constitutional experience elsewhere may illuminate the relevant policy considerations. Alternatively, in the absence of controlling constitutional text, courts should interpret the Constitution in a manner consistent with its basic structure. But structural considerations often fail to determine precisely which of many possible structures is most consistent with the U.S. Constitution. Examining constitutional experience elsewhere may illuminate the choice among alternative reasonable specifications of the U.S. Constitution's structure. Are the Court's and Justice Breyer's discussions of comparative constitutional law consistent with either of these arguments?

Note: Concluding Observations on Congress's Powers

Consider this summary:

[The] historic progression of the various models of federalism [reflects] a pendulum-like attempt to achieve the proper balance between underlying federalism values, each model perhaps overcompensating for the excesses of its predecessor. After the Great Depression crippled the capacity of state and local governments to cope with unprecedented levels of social and economic despair, the Supreme Court adopted a model of federalism that exalted the problem-solving value at the expense of the check-and-balance value to approve pragmatic New Deal legislative programs. [Cooperative] federalism [recovers] some of the balance through a partnership-based approach to regulation in areas of interjurisdictional overlap, allowing state and federal governments to take responsibility for interlocking components of a collaborative regulatory regime. [Cooperative] federalism has [been] criticized as an overly pragmatic model that insufficiently protects anti-tyranny values. [The] New Federalism reestablishes the supremacy of the check-and-balance value over all others in order to bolster the line between state and federal authority against pressures [that] would blur the boundary. [But] the New Federalism's focus on preserving bright-line boundaries [renders] it unable to effectively mediate the competition between federalism values, contributing to a governmental ethos that obstructs even desirable regulatory activity in the interjurisdictional gray area (such as federal initiative that might have been taken in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina). [In] this ironic respect, the New Federalism simply does what New Deal federalism did in the opposite direction—shortchanging the problem-solving value in the name of the check-and-balance value, which it mistakes for federalism generally.

Ryan, Federalism and the Tug of War Within: Seeking Checks and Balances in the Interjurisdictional Gray Area, 66 Md. L. Rev. 503, 511–512 (2007).

12 Justice Ginsburg observes that state Medicaid spending will increase by only 0.8 percent after the expansion. [The] size of the new financial burden imposed on a State is irrelevant in analyzing whether the State has been coerced into accepting that burden. “Your money or your life” is a coercive proposition, whether you have a single dollar in your pocket or $500.

14 Justice Ginsburg suggests that the States can have no objection to the Medicaid expansion, because “Congress could have repealed Medicaid [and,] [t]hereafter,...could have enacted Medicaid II, a new program combining the pre-2010 coverage with the expanded coverage required by the ACA.” But it would certainly not be that easy. Practical constraints would plainly inhibit, if not preclude, the Federal Government from repealing the existing program and putting every feature of Medicaid on the table for political reconsideration. Such a massive undertaking would hardly be “ritualistic.”...

13 Justice Ginsburg argues that “[a] State...has no claim on the money its residents pay in federal taxes.” This is true as a formal matter. [But] unless Justice Ginsburg thinks that there is no limit to the amount of money that can be squeezed out of taxpayers, heavy federal taxation diminishes the practical ability of States to collect their own taxes.

17 The Chief Justice and the joint dissenters perceive in cooperative federalism a “threa[t]” to “political accountability.” By that, they mean voter confusion: Citizens upset by unpopular government action, they posit, may ascribe to state officials blame more appropriately laid at Congress’ door. But no such confusion is apparent in this case: Medicaid’s status as a federally funded, state-administered program is hardly hidden from view. [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

24 The joint dissenters, for their part, would make this the entire inquiry. “[I]f States really have no choice other than to accept the package,” they assert, “the offer is coercive.” The Chief Justice recognizes Congress’ authority to construct a single federal program and “condition the receipt of funds on the States’ complying with restrictions on the use of those funds.” For the joint dissenters, however, all that matters, it appears, is whether States can resist the temptation of a given federal grant. On this logic, any federal spending program, sufficiently large and well-funded, would be unconstitutional....

Speculations of this genre are characteristic of the joint dissent. The joint dissenters are long on conjecture and short on real-world examples.

25 The joint dissenters also rely heavily on Congress’ perceived intent to coerce the States. We should not lightly ascribe to Congress an intent to violate the Constitution (at least as my colleagues read it). This is particularly true when the ACA could just as well be comprehended as demonstrating Congress’ mere expectation, in light of the uniformity of past participation and the generosity of the federal contribution, that States would not withdraw.

26 Federal taxation of a State’s citizens, according to the joint dissenters, may diminish a State’s ability to raise new revenue. This, in turn, could limit a State’s capacity to replace a federal program with an “equivalent” state-funded analog. But it cannot be true that “the amount of the federal taxes extracted from the taxpayers of a State to pay for the program in question is relevant in determining whether there is impermissible coercion.” When the United States Government taxes United States citizens, it taxes them “in their individual capacities” as “the people of America”—not as residents of a particular State....

A State therefore has no claim on the money its residents pay in federal taxes, and federal “spending programs need not help people in all states in the same measure.” In 2004, for example, New Jersey received 55 cents in federal spending for every dollar its residents paid to the Federal Government in taxes, while Mississippi received $1.77 per tax dollar paid. Thus no constitutional problem was created when Arizona declined for 16 years to participate in Medicaid, even though its residents' tax dollars financed Medicaid programs in every other State.

IV

The Distribution of National Powers

A. INTRODUCTION

The Constitution disperses authority not only between the national government and the states but also among the legislative, executive, and judicial branches. This chapter explores the purposes and effects of the distribution of national power.

The Federalist No. 47 (Madison)

(1787)

One of the principal objections inculcated by the more respectable adversaries to the Constitution is its supposed violation of the political maxim that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments ought to be separate and distinct....

The oracle who is always consulted and cited on this subject, is the celebrated Montesquieu....

[Montesquieu] did not mean that these departments ought to have no partial agency in, or no control over, the acts of each other. His meaning, [can] amount to no more than this, that where the whole power of one department is exercised by the same hands which possess the whole power of another department, the fundamental principles of a free constitution are subverted....

If we look into the constitutions of the several States we find that, [there] is not a single instance in which the several departments of power have been kept absolutely separate and distinct....

The Federalist No. 48 (Madison)

It was shown in the last paper that the political apothegm there examined does not require that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments should be wholly unconnected with each other. I shall undertake, in the next place, to show that unless these departments be so far connected and blended as to give to each a constitutional control over the others, the degree of separation which the maxim requires, as essential to a free government, can never in practice be duly maintained....

Will it be sufficient to mark, with precision, the boundaries of these departments in the constitution of the government, and to trust to these parchment barriers against the encroaching spirit of power? This is the security which appears to have been principally relied on by the compilers of most of the American constitutions. But experience assures us that the efficacy of the provision has been greatly overrated; and that some more adequate defense is indispensably necessary for the more feeble against the more powerful members of the government. The legislative department is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex....

In a government where numerous and extensive prerogatives are placed in the hands of an hereditary monarch, the executive department is very justly regarded as the source of danger, and watched with all the jealousy which a zeal for liberty ought to inspire. In a democracy, where a multitude of people exercise in person the legislative functions and are continually exposed, by their incapacity for regular deliberation and concerted measures, to the ambitious intrigues of their executive magistrates, tyranny may well be apprehended, on some favorable emergency, to start up in the same quarter. But in a representative republic where the executive magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and the duration of its power; and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly, which is inspired by a supposed influence over the people with an intrepid confidence in its own strength; which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude, yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions by means which reason prescribes; it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions.

Note: The Theory of Separation and Checks and Balances

1. The purposes of separation and checks. Throughout American history the distribution of national powers has been said to serve two distinct purposes. The first is efficiency. In this view, a division of labor among the various branches makes government more efficient, especially because of the concentration of executive power in the President, who can act with dispatch. The second purpose is the prevention of tyranny. The separation of powers diffuses governmental power, diminishing the likelihood that any one branch (or any one individual) will be able to use governmental power against the citizenry. Consider the extent to which these two purposes are in tension with each other.

2. The constitutional distribution of powers: contemporary criticism. The constitutional distribution of national powers has come under sharp attack. See, e.g., T. Lowi, The End of Liberalism (2d ed. 1980); Cutler and Johnson, Regulation and the Political Process, 84 Yale L.J. 1395 (1975). Consider, for example, the argument that preoccupation with the balance of power between institutions of government has distracted us from concern about the balance of power between interest groups like the poor and the rich or residents of urban and rural areas. See Levinson, Foreword, Looking for Power in Public Law, 130 Harv. L. Rev. 31 (2016). Other critics have argued that the powerful checks created by separation of powers have led to inefficiency and stalemate. A related attack is that the separation of powers scheme, instead of solving the problem of factions, aggravates it by allowing well-organized private groups to block necessary regulation. In these circumstances, it is sometimes urged that constitutional doctrine should be altered to recognize a greater role for the President. See W. Howell & T. Moe, Relic: How Our Constitution Undermines Effective Government and Why We Need a More Powerful Presidency (2016). But see Nzelibe and Stephenson, Complementary Constraints: Separation of Powers, Rational Voting, and Constitutional Design, 123 Harv. L. Rev. 617 (2010) (raising doubts that separation of powers causes “gridlock”).

Conversely, some critics argue that power is now concentrated in the executive branch and that it is thus necessary to restore Congress to its original status of preeminence. It is sometimes suggested that the growth of an enormous national bureaucracy, operating for the most part within the executive branch, has fundamentally altered the original constitutional framework and requires some sort of response if the original constitutional concerns are to be satisfied.

Compare E. Posner and A. Vermeule, The Executive Unbound: After the Madisonian Republic 3–4 (2011):

We live in a regime of executive-centered government, in an age after the separation of powers and the legally constrained executive is now a historical curiosity....

[The] major constraints on the executive, especially in crises, do not arise from law or from the separation-of-powers framework [but] from politics and public opinion. [De] facto political constraints [have] grown up and, to some degree, [substituted] for legal constraints on the executive. As the bonds of law have loosened, the bonds of politics have tightened their grip.

Consider the possibility that law-based and separation of powers rhetoric plays a role in the political struggle over executive power.

3. The Problem of Enforcement. Assuming that separation of powers should be preserved, how should the separation be enforced? Consider Seidman, The Secret History of American Constitutional Skepticism: A Recovery and Preliminary Evaluation, 16 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 1. 25–26 (2014):

[Madison] never successfully resolved the “parchment barriers” problem....

[He] started out by saying that the new government with its structure of overlapping powers will protect liberty and the public interest. He recognized that these good outcomes were dependent upon this structure remaining intact and asked how the structural rules could be enforced. But his answer leads to a circle: The structural provisions, he says, will be enforced by the structural provisions.

In contrast, Alexander Hamilton argued that an independent judiciary, with “no influence over either the sword or the purse” possessed of “neither FORCE nor WILL” and the “least dangerous branch” would enforce the separation. How can an institution with neither force nor will provide effective enforcement? Consider Seidman, supra:

[Hamilton’s] argument is the source of an enduring puzzle. The judiciary had to be independent, Hamilton argued, if it was to resist pressure from the other branches of government and from the public to trample on constitutional rights. But unless we assume that judges are angels, this very independence meant that the judges would be free to defy rather than enforce the Constitution.

Compare J. Choper, Judicial Review and the National Political Process 263, 269, 275 (1982):

The federal judiciary should not decide constitutional questions concerning the respective powers of Congress and the President vis-à-vis one another; rather, the ultimate constitutional issues [should] be held nonjusticiable, their final resolution to be remitted to the interplay of the national political process. [The] important message [to] be gleaned from [the] founders’ thinking is that the checks on legislative autocracy that they contemplated exist independently of judicial supervision of the constitutionally mandated separation of powers between the President and Congress.

Does this argument disregard the possibility that a judicial role is necessary to prevent a stalemate between the branches and to avert potential constitutional crises? Does it overemphasize the usefulness of nonjudicial techniques in reaching accommodation?

B. CASE STUDY: PRESIDENTIAL SEIZURE

Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer (The Steel Seizure Case)

343 U.S. 579 (1952)

MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

We are asked to decide whether President Truman was acting within his constitutional power when he issued an order directing the Secretary of Commerce to take possession of and operate most of the Nation's steel mills. The mill owners argue that the President's order amounts to lawmaking, a legislative function which the Constitution has expressly confided to the Congress and not to the President. The Government's position is that the order was made on findings of the President that his action was necessary to avert a national catastrophe which would inevitably result from a stoppage of steel production, and that in meeting this grave emergency the President was acting within the aggregate of his constitutional powers as the Nation's Chief Executive and the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States. The issue emerges here from the following series of events:

In the latter part of 1951, a dispute arose between the steel companies and their employees over terms and conditions that should be included in new collective bargaining agreements. [On] April 4, 1952, the Union gave notice of a nation-wide strike called to begin at 12:01 A.M. April 9. The indispensability of steel as a component of substantially all weapons and other war materials led the President to believe that the proposed work stoppage would immediately jeopardize our national defense and that governmental seizure of the steel mills was necessary in order to assure the continued availability of steel. Reciting these considerations for his action, the President, a few hours before the strike was to begin, issued Executive Order 10340. [The] order directed the Secretary of Commerce to take possession of most of the steel mills and keep them running. [The] next morning the President sent a message to Congress reporting his action.

[Twelve] days later he sent a second message. [Congress] has taken no

[The Court noted that the companies had obeyed the order under protest and brought suit against the Secretary of Commerce in district court. On April 30, that court issued a temporary restraining order prohibiting the Secretary from continuing the seizure and possession of the plants. On the same day, the district court's order was stayed by the court of appeals. The Supreme Court granted certiorari on May 3 and heard argument on May 12; the decision was announced on June 2.]

The President's power, if any, to issue the order must stem either from an act of Congress or from the Constitution itself. There is no statute that expressly authorizes the President to take possession of property as he did here. Nor is there any act of Congress to which our attention has been directed from which such a power can fairly be implied. [There] are two statutes which do authorize the President to take both personal and real property under certain conditions. However, the Government admits that these conditions were not met and that the President's order was not rooted in either of the statutes. The Government refers to the seizure provisions of one of these statutes as "much too cumbersome, involved, and time-consuming for the crisis which was at hand."

Moreover, the use of the seizure technique to solve labor disputes in order to prevent work stoppages was not only unauthorized by any congressional enactment; prior to this controversy, Congress had refused to adopt that method of settling labor disputes. When the Taft-Hartley Act was under consideration in 1947, Congress rejected an amendment which would have authorized such governmental seizures in cases of emergency....

It is clear that if the President had authority to issue the order he did, it must be found in some provision of the Constitution....

The order cannot properly be sustained as an exercise of the President's military power as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. [Even] though "theater of war" be an expanding concept, we cannot with faithfulness to our constitutional system hold that the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces has the ultimate power as such to take possession of private property in order to keep labor disputes from stopping production. This is a job for the Nation's lawmakers, not for its military authorities.

Nor can the seizure order be sustained because of the several constitutional provisions that grant executive power to the President. In the framework of our Constitution, the President's power to see that the laws are faithfully executed refutes the idea that he is to be a lawmaker. The Constitution limits his functions in the lawmaking process to the recommending of laws he thinks wise and the vetoing of laws he thinks bad. And the Constitution is neither silent nor equivocal about who shall make laws which the President is to execute. The first section of the first article says that "All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States...."....

The President's order does not direct that a congressional policy be executed in a manner prescribed by Congress—it directs that a presidential policy be executed in a manner prescribed by the President....

It is said that other Presidents without congressional authority have taken possession of private business enterprises in order to settle labor disputes. But even if this be true, Congress has not thereby lost its exclusive constitutional authority to make laws necessary and proper to carry out the powers vested by the Constitution "in the Government of the United States, or any Department or Officer thereof."

The Founders of this Nation entrusted the lawmaking power to the Congress alone in both good and bad times. It would do no good to recall the historical events, the fears of power and the hopes for freedom that lay behind their choice. Such a review would but confirm our holding that this seizure order cannot stand.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, concurring.

[We] must [put] to one side consideration of what powers the President would have had if there had been no legislation whatever bearing on the authority asserted by the seizure, or if the seizure had been only for a short, explicitly temporary period, to be terminated automatically unless Congressional approval were given....

The question before the Court comes in this setting. Congress has frequently—at least 16 times since 1916—specifically provided for executive seizure of production, transportation, communications, or storage facilities. In every case it has qualified this grant of power with limitations and safeguards. This body of enactments demonstrates that Congress deemed seizure so drastic a power as to require that it be carefully circumscribed whenever the President was vested with this extraordinary authority....

[Nothing] can be plainer than that Congress made a conscious choice of policy in a field full of perplexity and peculiarly within legislative responsibility for choice. In formulating legislation for dealing with industrial conflicts, Congress could not more clearly and emphatically have withheld authority than it did in [the Taft-Hartley Act of] 1947....

It cannot be contended that the President would have had power to issue this order had Congress explicitly negated such authority in formal legislation.

Congress has expressed its will to withhold this power from the President as though it had said so in so many words....

[Deeply] embedded traditional ways of conducting government cannot supplant the Constitution or legislation, but they give meaning to the words of a text or supply them. It is an inadmissibly narrow conception of American constitutional law to confine it to the words of the Constitution and to disregard the gloss which life has written upon them. In short, a systematic, unbroken, executive practice, long pursued to the knowledge of the Congress and never before questioned, engaged in by Presidents who have also sworn to uphold the Constitution, making as it were such exercise of power part of the structure of our government, may be treated as a gloss on "executive Power" vested in the President by §1 of Art. II....

[The] list of executive assertions of the power of seizure in circumstances comparable to the present reduces to three in the six-month period from June to December of 1941. [Without] passing on their validity, as we are not called upon to do, it suffices to say that these three isolated instances do not add up, either in number, scope, duration or contemporaneous legal justification, to the necessary kind of executive construction of the Constitution. [Nor] do they come to us sanctioned by long-continued acquiescence of Congress giving decisive weight to a construction by the Executive of its powers. [No] doubt a government with distributed authority, subject to be challenged in the courts of law, at least long enough to consider and adjudicate the challenge, labors under restrictions from which other governments are free. It has not been our tradition to envy such governments. In any event our government was designed to have such restrictions. The price was deemed not too high in view of the safeguards which these restrictions afford....

[Justice Frankfurter added a lengthy historical appendix to his opinion.]

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON, concurring in the judgment and opinion of the Court.

[A] judge, like an executive adviser, may be surprised at the poverty of really useful and unambiguous authority applicable to concrete problems of executive power as they actually present themselves. Just what our forefathers did envision, or would have envisioned had they foreseen modern conditions, must be divined from materials almost as enigmatic as the dreams Joseph was called upon to interpret for Pharaoh. A century and a half of partisan debate and scholarly speculation yields no net result but only supplies more or less apt quotations from respected sources on each side of any question. They largely cancel each other. And court decisions are indecisive because of the judicial practice of dealing with the largest questions in the most narrow way.

The actual art of governing under our Constitution does not and cannot conform to judicial definitions of the power of any of its branches based on isolated clauses or even single Articles torn from context. While the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government. It enjoins upon its branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity. Presidential powers are not fixed but fluctuate, depending upon their disjunction or conjunction with those of Congress. We may well begin by a somewhat oversimplified grouping of practical situations in which a President may doubt, or others may challenge, his powers, and by distinguishing roughly the legal consequences of this factor of relativity.

1. When the President acts pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress, his authority is at its maximum, for it includes all that he possesses in his own right plus all that Congress can delegate. In these circumstances, and in these only, may he be said (for what it may be worth) to personify the federal sovereignty. If his act is held unconstitutional under these circumstances, it usually means that the Federal Government as an undivided whole lacks power. A seizure executed by the President pursuant to an Act of Congress would be supported by the strongest of presumptions and the widest latitude of judicial interpretation, and the burden of persuasion would rest heavily upon any who might attack it.

2. When the President acts in absence of either a congressional grant or denial of authority, he can only rely upon his own independent powers, but there is a zone of twilight in which he and Congress may have concurrent authority, or in which its distribution is uncertain. Therefore, congressional inertia, indifference or quiescence may sometimes, at least as a practical matter, enable, if not invite, measures on independent presidential responsibility. In this area, any actual test of power is likely to depend on the imperatives of events and contemporary imponderables rather than on abstract theories of law.

3. When the President takes measures incompatible with the expressed or implied will of Congress, his power is at its lowest ebb, for then he can rely only upon his own constitutional powers minus any constitutional powers of Congress over the matter. Courts can sustain exclusive presidential control in such a case only by disabling the Congress from acting upon the subject. Presidential claim to a power at once so conclusive and preclusive must be scrutinized with caution, for what is at stake is the equilibrium established by our constitutional system.

Into which of these classifications does this executive seizure of the steel industry fit? It is eliminated from the first by admission, for it is conceded that no congressional authorization exists for this seizure....

Can it then be defended under flexible tests available to the second category? It seems clearly eliminated from that class because Congress has not left seizure of private property an open field but has covered it by three statutory policies inconsistent with this seizure....

This leaves the current seizure to be justified only by the severe tests under the third grouping, where it can be supported only by any remainder of executive power after subtraction of such powers as Congress may have over the subject. In short, we can sustain the President only by holding that seizure of such strike-bound industries is within his domain and beyond control by Congress....

The Solicitor General seeks the power of seizure in three clauses of the Executive Article, the first reading, "The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." [I] quote the interpretation which his brief puts upon it: "In our view, this clause constitutes a grant of all the executive powers of which the Government is capable." If that be true, it is difficult to see why the forefathers bothered to add several specific items, including some trifling ones.

The example of such unlimited executive power that must have most impressed the forefathers was the prerogative exercised by George III, and the description of its evils in the Declaration of Independence leads me to doubt that they were creating their new Executive in his image. [And] if we seek instruction from our own times, we can match it only from the executive powers in those governments we disparagingly describe as totalitarian....

The clause on which the Government next relies is that "The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States...." These cryptic words [undoubtedly put] the Nation's armed forces under presidential command. Hence, this loose appellation is sometimes advanced as support for any presidential action, internal or external, involving use of force, the idea being that it vests power to do anything, anywhere, that can be done with an army or navy....

I cannot foresee all that it might entail if the Court should indorse this argument. Nothing in our Constitution is plainer than that declaration of a war is entrusted only to Congress. Of course, a state of war may in fact exist without a formal declaration. But no doctrine that the Court could promulgate would seem to me more sinister and alarming than that a President whose conduct of foreign affairs is so largely uncontrolled, and often even is unknown, can vastly enlarge his mastery over the internal affairs of the country by his own commitment of the Nation's armed forces to some foreign venture. I do not, however, find it necessary or appropriate to consider the legal status of the Korean enterprise to discountenance argument based on it.

Assuming that we are in a war de facto, whether it is or is not a war de jure, does that empower the Commander in Chief to seize industries he thinks necessary to supply our army? The Constitution expressly places in Congress power “to raise and support Armies” and “to provide and Maintain a Navy.” (Emphasis supplied.) This certainly lays upon Congress primary responsibility for supplying the armed forces. Congress alone controls the raising of revenues and their appropriation and may determine in what manner and by what means they shall be spent for military and naval procurement....

There are indications that the Constitution did not contemplate that the title Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy will constitute him also Commander in Chief of the country, its industries and its inhabitants. He has no monopoly of “war powers,” whatever they are....

The third clause in which the Solicitor General finds seizure powers is that “he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed....” That authority must be matched against words of the Fifth Amendment that “No person shall be... deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law....” One gives a governmental authority that reaches so far as there is law, the other gives a private right that authority shall go no farther. These signify about all there is of the principle that ours is a government of laws, not of men, and that we submit ourselves to rulers only if under rules.

The Solicitor General lastly grounds support of the seizure upon nebulous, inherent powers never expressly granted but said to have accrued to the office from the customs and claims of preceding administrations. The plea is for a resulting power to deal with a crisis or an emergency according to the necessities of the case, the unarticulated assumption being that necessity knows no law....

The appeal [that] we declare the existence of inherent powers ex necessitate to meet an emergency asks us to do what many think would be wise, although it is something the forefathers omitted. They knew what emergencies were, knew the pressures they engender for authoritative action, knew, too, how they afford a ready pretext for usurpation. We may also suspect that they suspected that emergency powers would tend to kindle emergencies. Aside from suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in time of rebellion or invasion, when the public safety may require it, they made no express provision for exercise of extraordinary authority because of a crisis. I do not think we rightfully may so amend their work and, if we could, I am not convinced it would be wise to do so, although many modern nations have forthrightly recognized that war and economic crises may upset the normal balance between liberty and authority. Their experience with emergency powers may not be irrelevant to the argument here that we should say that the Executive, of his own volition, can invest himself with undefined emergency powers.

Germany, after the First World War, framed the Weimar Constitution, designed to secure her liberties in the Western tradition. However, the President of the Republic, without concurrence of the Reichstag, was empowered temporarily to suspend any or all individual rights if public safety and order were seriously disturbed or endangered. This proved a temptation to every government, whatever its shade of opinion, and in 13 years suspension of rights was invoked on more than 250 occasions. Finally, Hitler persuaded President Von Hindenberg to suspend all such rights, and they were never restored.

The French Republic provided for a very different kind of emergency government known as the “state of siege.” It differed from the German emergency dictatorship, particularly in that emergency powers could not be assumed at will by the Executive but could only be granted as a parliamentary measure. And it did not, as in Germany, result in a suspension or abrogation of law but was a legal institution governed by special legal rules and terminable by parliamentary authority.

Great Britain also has fought both World Wars under a sort of temporary dictatorship created by legislation. As Parliament is not bound by written constitutional limitations, it established a crisis government simply by delegation to its Ministers of a larger measure than usual of its own unlimited power, which is exercised under its supervision by Ministers whom it may dismiss. This has been called the “highwater mark in the voluntary surrender of liberty,” but, as Churchill put it, “Parliament stands custodian of these surrendered liberties, and its most sacred duty will be to restore them in their fullness when victory has crowned our exertions and our perseverance.” Thus, parliamentary control made emergency powers compatible with freedom.

This contemporary foreign experience may be inconclusive as to the wisdom of lodging emergency powers somewhere in a modern government. But it suggests that emergency powers are consistent with free government only when their control is lodged elsewhere than in the Executive who exercises them. That is the safeguard that would be nullified by our adoption of the “inherent powers” formula....

Such power either has no beginning or it has no end. If it exists, it need submit to no legal restraint. I am not alarmed that it would plunge us straightway into dictatorship, but it is at least a step in that wrong direction.

As to whether there is imperative necessity for such powers, it is relevant to note the gap that exists between the President’s paper powers and his real powers. The Constitution does not disclose the measure of the actual controls wielded by the modern presidential office. That instrument must be understood as an Eighteenth-Century sketch of a government hoped for, not as a blueprint of the Government that is. Vast accretions of federal power, eroded from that reserved by the States, have magnified the scope of presidential activity. Subtle shifts take place in the centers of real power that do not show in the face of the Constitution.

Executive power has the advantage of concentration in a single head in whose choice the whole Nation has a part, making him the focus of public hopes and expectations. In drama, magnitude and finality his decisions so far overshadow any others that almost alone he fills the public eye and ear. No other personality in public life can begin to compete with him in access to the public mind through modern methods of communications. By his prestige as head of state and his influence upon public opinion he exerts a leverage upon those who are supposed to check and balance his power which often cancels their effectiveness.

Moreover, rise of the party system has made a significant extraconstitutional supplement to real executive power. No appraisal of his necessities is realistic which overlooks that he heads a political system as well as a legal system. Party loyalties and interests, sometimes more binding than law, extend his effective control into branches of government other than his own and he often may win, as a political leader, what he cannot command under the Constitution....

But I have no illusion that any decision by this Court can keep power in the hands of Congress if it is not wise and timely in meeting its problems. A crisis that challenges the President equally, or perhaps primarily, challenges Congress. If not good law, there was worldly wisdom in the maxim attributed to Napoleon that "The tools belong to the man who can use them." We may say that power to legislate for emergencies belongs in the hands of Congress, but only Congress itself can prevent power from slipping through its fingers.

The essence of our free Government is "leave to live by no man's leave, underneath the law"—to be governed by those impersonal forces which we call law. Our Government is fashioned to fulfill this concept so far as humanly possible. [The] executive action we have here originates in the individual will of the President and represents an exercise of authority without law. No one, perhaps not even the President, knows the limits of the power he may seek to exert in this instance and the parties affected cannot learn the limit of their rights. We do not know today what powers over labor or property would be claimed to flow from Government possession if we should legalize it, what rights to compensation would be claimed or recognized, or on what contingency it would end. With all its defects, delays and inconveniences, men have discovered no technique for long preserving free government except that the Executive be under the law, and that the law be made by parliamentary deliberations.

Such institutions may be destined to pass away. But it is the duty of the Court to be last, not first, to give them up.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, concurring....

The branch of government that has the power to pay compensation for a seizure is the only one able to authorize a seizure or make lawful one that the President has effected. That seems to me to be the necessary result of the condemnation provision in the Fifth Amendment. It squares with the theory of checks and balances expounded by Mr. Justice Black in the opinion of the Court in which I join.

If we sanctioned the present exercise of power by the President, we would be expanding Article II of the Constitution and rewriting it to suit the political conveniences of the present emergency....

We pay a price for our system of checks and balances, for the distribution of power among the three branches of government. It is a price that today may seem exorbitant to many. Today a kindly President uses the seizure power to effect a wage increase and to keep the steel furnaces in production. Yet tomorrow another President might use the same power to prevent a wage increase, to curb trade-unionists, to regiment labor as oppressively as industry thinks it has been regimented by this seizure.

[The concurring opinions of Justices Burton and Clark are omitted.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE VINSON, with whom MR. JUSTICE REED and MR. JUSTICE MINTON join, dissenting.

One is not here called upon even to consider the possibility of executive seizure of a farm, a corner grocery store or even a single industrial plant. Such considerations arise only when one ignores the central fact of this case—that the Nation's entire basic steel production would have shut down completely if there had been no Government seizure. Even ignoring for the moment whatever confidential information the President may possess as "the Nation's organ for foreign affairs," the uncontested affidavits in this record amply support the finding that "a work stoppage would immediately jeopardize and imperil our national defense."

Plaintiffs do not remotely suggest any basis for rejecting the President's finding that any stoppage of steel production would immediately place the Nation in peril. [Under the plaintiffs'] view, the President is left powerless at the very moment when the need for action may be most pressing and when no one, other than he, is immediately capable of action. Under this view, he is left powerless because a power not expressly given to Congress is nevertheless found to rest exclusively with Congress. [But the] whole of the "executive Power" is vested in the President....

A review of executive action demonstrates that our Presidents have on many occasions exhibited the leadership contemplated by the Framers when they made the President Commander in Chief, and imposed upon him the trust to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed." With or without explicit statutory authorization, Presidents have at such times dealt with national emergencies by acting promptly and resolutely to enforce legislative programs, at least to save those programs until Congress could act. Congress and the courts have responded to such executive initiative with consistent approval....

Much of the argument in this case has been directed at straw men. We do not now have before us the case of a President acting solely on the basis of his own notions of the public welfare. Nor is there any question of unlimited executive power in this case. The President himself closed the door to any such claim when he sent his Message to Congress stating his purpose to abide by any action of Congress, whether approving or disapproving his seizure action. Here, the President immediately made sure that Congress was fully informed of the temporary action he had taken only to preserve the legislative programs from destruction until Congress could act.

The absence of a specific statute authorizing seizure of the steel mills as a mode of executing the laws—both the military procurement program and the anti-inflation program—has not until today been thought to prevent the President from executing the laws. Unlike an administrative commission confined to the enforcement of the statute under which it was created, or the head of a department when administering a particular statute, the President is a constitutional officer charged with taking care that a "mass of legislation" be executed. Flexibility as to mode of execution to meet critical situations is a matter of practical necessity....

The broad executive power granted by Article II to an officer on duty 365 days a year cannot, it is said, be invoked to avert disaster. Instead, the President must confine himself to sending a message to Congress recommending action. Under this messenger-boy concept of the Office, the President cannot even act to preserve legislative programs from destruction so that Congress will have something left to act upon. There is no judicial finding that the executive action was unwarranted because there was in fact no basis for the President's finding of the existence of an emergency for, under this view, the gravity of the emergency and the immediacy of the threatened disaster are considered irrelevant as a matter of law....

Note: Youngstown and the Power of the President

1. Background. The Steel Seizure Case was decided against a complex background. At the end of 1950, U.S. steel producers and the steelworkers' union had agreed on a wage increase. Shortly thereafter, however, the Economic Stabilization Agency effectively froze all price and wage increases, thus preventing implementation of the agreement. In these circumstances, the steel workers threatened a strike in December 1951. Because the President feared that a strike would endanger the Korean War effort, he prevailed on the union to postpone the strike while his Wage Stabilization Board—made up of representatives of steel producers, workers, and the general public—studied the problem. The board recommended certain staggered wage increases and union benefits, but the proposals were rejected by the industry. The steelworkers' union set a strike date of April 9, 1952.

By this time, President Truman's popularity, which had soared at the start of the Korean War, had fallen drastically. Despite the decline in his popularity, Truman refused to waver on his plans in Korea or—more particularly—in his refusal to impose any labor injunctions that might be available to him through the Taft-Hartley Act (a measure that had been enacted over his veto). Truman had had a long and close political alliance with organized labor. In order to preserve steel production, Truman issued an executive order transferring control over the industry to the government.

The Youngstown decision was reached only two months after Truman executed the seizure—a rapid timetable for which the Court has been criticized, especially in light of the importance of the issues. Consider the implications of the following events, as related by a historian of the dispute:

By midafternoon [shortly before public announcement that the Supreme Court had granted certiorari in the case, the parties] apparently arrived at a satisfactory settlement, and all that remained to be done was for [the negotiators] to check with other members of their respective groups. The bargaining session recessed to allow them time to do so. During the recess, however, word of the Supreme Court's [decision granting certiorari and prohibiting the government from changing wages or working conditions during the pendency of the suit] flashed across the White House news ticker, and when the bargaining session reconvened, the attitudes of the negotiators had changed dramatically....

Unquestionably, the Supreme Court's [order] radically affected the collective bargaining at the White House. [No] longer under pressure to resolve the dispute, for the threat of a government-imposed wage increase had been removed, the industry saw no reason to make concessions in order to arrive at a settlement when it had nothing to lose by waiting for the Supreme Court to decide the case.

M. Marcus, Truman and the Steel Seizure Case: The Limits of Presidential Power 147–148 (1977).

Although Supreme Court intervention may have caused a problem that would not otherwise have existed, it is also clear in hindsight that the Truman administration greatly exaggerated the seriousness of the problem. After the Court's ruling on June 2, the union struck for fifty-three days. In fact, no steel shortage materialized, and the strike had no discernible impact on the war effort. Industry owners eventually negotiated an agreement similar to the Wage Stabilization Board's recommendations. For discussion, see M. Marcus, supra; A. Westin, The Anatomy of a Constitutional Case (1958); Corwin, The Steel Seizure Case: A Judicial Brick without Straw, 53 Colum. L. Rev. 53 (1953); Kauper, The Steel Seizure Case: Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court, 51 Mich. L. Rev. 141 (1952).

2. Implied and emergency powers. Does the President have any implied or emergency powers after Youngstown? The existence of implied or emergency presidential powers has been sharply disputed throughout the nation's history. Note that article I refers to "legislative powers herein granted," whereas article II refers to "executive power" without a "herein granted" qualification. In Alexander Hamilton's view, the "different modes of expression in regard to the two powers confirm the inference that the authority vested in the President is not limited to the specific cases of executive power delineated in Article II." 7 Works of Alexander Hamilton 80 (1851).

This line of reasoning led to the conclusion, reached by Theodore Roosevelt and adhered to by many subsequent Presidents, that the President "was a steward of the people bound actively and affirmatively to do all he could for the people [unless] such action was forbidden by the Constitution or by the law." T. Roosevelt, Autobiography 372 (1914). Contrast with this the view of President Taft and others that the President may exercise only those powers traceable to a constitutional grant of authority. Does Youngstown resolve this dispute?

For a detailed historical analysis of implied presidential power, see Monaghan, The Protective Power of the Presidency, 93 Colum. L. Rev. 1 (1993).

Note: The Relevance of Foreign Law

Justice Jackson wrote that the experience of other countries with emergency power “may not be irrelevant” to the issue confronted by the Youngstown Court. How likely is it that the constitutional structures he cites caused the different political outcomes in Germany, France, and the United Kingdom? Why should foreign experience under different constitutional systems have any bearing on how the text of the American Constitution is interpreted? For a modern description of how various constitutions have dealt with the problem of emergency power, see F. Aolain and O. Gross, Law in Times of Crisis: Emergency Powers in Theory and Practice 35–66 (2006).

1. The controversy among the justices. In recent years, members of the Court have clashed over the relevance of non-U.S. law to domestic constitutional interpretation. Consider, for example, the views of Justices Kennedy and Scalia, expressed in Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005), a case concerning the constitutionality of the juvenile death penalty. Writing for the Court, Justice Kennedy stated that

[our] determination that the death penalty is disproportionate punishment for offenders under 18 finds confirmation in the stark reality that the United States is the only country in the world that continues to give official sanction to the juvenile death penalty. This reality does not become controlling, for the task of interpreting the Eighth Amendment remains our responsibility....

Not the least of the reasons we honor the Constitution, [is] because we know it to be our own. It does not lessen our fidelity to the Constitution or our pride in its origins to acknowledge that the express affirmation of certain fundamental rights by other nations and peoples simply underscores the centrality of those same rights within our own heritage of freedom.

In a dissenting opinion, Justice Scalia replied:

[The] basic premise of the Court’s argument—that American law should conform to the laws of the rest of the world—ought to be rejected out of hand. In fact the Court itself does not believe it. In many significant respects the laws of most other countries differ from our law—including not only such explicit provisions of our Constitution as the right to jury trial and grand jury indictment, but even many interpretations of the Constitution prescribed by this Court itself.

...

The Court should either profess its willingness to reconsider all these matters in light of the views of foreigners, or else it should cease putting forth foreigners' views as part of the reasoned basis of its decisions. To invoke alien law when it agrees with one's own thinking, and ignore it otherwise, is not reasoned decisionmaking, but sophistry.

Is the argument for or against the use of non-U.S. law in the context of the juvenile death penalty the same as it is in the context of emergency power?

2. The assumptions behind the argument. Does willingness to use non-U.S. law imply views about the nature of constitutional interpretation? About the abilities and trustworthiness of judges? About the underlying similarity of different cultures and political systems? Consider the following views.

a. "The legitimacy of constitutional comparativism should be determined by constitutional theory. [If] a judge interprets the Constitution based on a theory of original intent, then contemporary global practices will be of little service. If a judge espouses a theory that the Constitution embodies natural law principles, then evidence of universal norms may buttress that conception. If a judge grounds his or her decisionmaking on a theory of deference to the legislature, then comparative experiences that offer competing conceptions of 'the good' will be of little relevance. If a judge is a constitutional pragmatist, real-world consequences at home and abroad may be deemed appropriate to cast an empirical light on proposed solutions to common problems." Alford, In Search of a Theory for Constitutional Comparativism, 52 UCLA L. Rev. 639, 641 (2005).

b. "[To] the extent constitutional systems perform similar functions, similar concerns may arise about the consequences of interpretive choices. If more than one interpretation of the Constitution is plausible from domestic legal sources, approaches taken in other countries may provide helpful empirical information in deciding what interpretation will work best here." Jackson, Constitutional Comparisons: Convergence, Resistance, Engagement, 116 Harv. L. Rev. 109, 116 (2005).

c. "In foreign law you can find anything you want. If you don't find it in the decisions of France or Italy, it's in the decisions of Somalia or Japan or Indonesia or wherever. As somebody said in another context, looking at foreign law for support is like looking out over a crowd and picking out your friends. You can find them, they're there. And that actually expands the discretion of the judge. It allows the judge to incorporate his or her own personal preferences, cloak them with the authority of precedent because they're finding precedent in foreign law, and use that to determine the meaning of the Constitution. I think that's a misuse of precedent, not a correct use of precedent." Confirmation Hearing on the Nomination of John G. Roberts, Jr. to Be Chief Justice of the United States Before the S. Comm. on the Judiciary, 109th Cong. 200-01 (statement of Judge John Roberts) (2005).

d. “[Foreign] decisions emerge from complex social, political, cultural, and historical backgrounds of which Supreme Court Justices, like other American judges and lawyers, are largely ignorant....To cite foreign decisions as precedents is indeed to flirt with the idea of universal natural law, or, what amounts to almost the same thing, to suppose fantastically that the world’s judges constitute a single, elite community of wisdom and conscience.” Posner, Foreword: A Political Court, 119 Harv. L. Rev. 31, 86 (2005).

e. “There is, of course, a learning curve with respect to any form of knowledge, from microeconomics to history to non-U.S. law. In my opinion the curve is not that steep, but even if it is, the scholarly infrastructure is developing to enable judges to learn about non-U.S. law and its uses, just as they have learned microeconomics.” Tushnet, When Is Knowing Less Better than Knowing More? Unpacking the Controversy over Supreme Court Reference to Non-U.S. Law, 90 Minn. L. Rev. 1275, 1298 (2006). Compare Tushnet, The Inevitable Globalization of Constitutional Law, 49 Va. J. Int'l. L. 985, 988 (2009) (arguing that “because the globalization of domestic constitutional law is inevitable, notions of separation of powers—or of legislative supremacy qualified by the existence of judicial review—will need to accommodate themselves to that globalization”).

C. FOREIGN AFFAIRS

The Constitution vests in Congress the power to declare war, to “raise and support Armies” and to “provide and maintain a Navy,” to “regulate Commerce with foreign Nations,” and to “define and punish [Offenses] against the Law of Nations.” The Senate is empowered to advise and consent on the making of treaties. The President is given the “executive” power and made the “Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.” He is also empowered to “make Treaties,” to “appoint Ambassadors [and] other public Ministers” (although only “by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate”), and to “receive Ambassadors and other Public Ministers.” How useful are these textual provisions in resolving twenty-first century conflicts over the role of the Congress and the President in foreign affairs?

1. Executive Authority

United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp.

299 U.S. 304 (1936)

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court.

[An] indictment was returned in the court below, the first count of which charges that appellees [conspired] to sell in the United States certain arms of war, namely fifteen machine guns, to Bolivia, a country then engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco, in violation of the Joint Resolution of Congress approved May 28, 1934, and the provisions of a proclamation issued on the same day by the President [pursuant] to authority conferred by §1 of the resolution. [The joint resolution authorized the President to prohibit the sale of arms if he found that such a prohibition would contribute to establishment of peace in the region. The lower court held that the joint resolution was an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the President.]

Whether, if the Joint Resolution had related solely to internal affairs it would be open to the challenge that it constituted an unlawful delegation of legislative power to the Executive, we find it unnecessary to determine. [Curtiss-Wright was decided one year after the Court invalidated the National Industrial Recovery Act on the ground that it impermissibly delegated a legislative function to the President. See A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, Chapter 2, section C, supra, and section D2, infra.] The whole aim of the resolution is to affect a situation entirely external to the United States, and falling within the category of foreign affairs. [Assuming] (but not deciding) that the challenged delegation, if it were confined to internal affairs, would be invalid, may it nevertheless be sustained on the ground that its exclusive aim is to afford a remedy for a hurtful condition within foreign territory?

It will contribute to the elucidation of the question if we first consider the differences between the powers of the federal government in respect of foreign or external affairs and those in respect of domestic or internal affairs....

The two classes of powers are different, both in respect of their origin and their nature. The broad statement that the federal government can exercise no powers except those specifically enumerated in the Constitution, and such implied powers as are necessary and proper to carry into effect the enumerated powers, is categorically true only in respect of our internal affairs. In that field, the primary purpose of the Constitution was to carve from the general mass of legislative powers then possessed by the states such portions as it was thought desirable to vest in the federal government, leaving those not included in the enumeration still in the states. [That] this doctrine applies only to powers which the states had, is self evident. And since the states severally never possessed international powers, such powers could not have been carved from the mass of state powers but obviously were transmitted to the United States from some other source....

As a result of the separation from Great Britain by the colonies acting as a unit, the powers of external sovereignty passed from the Crown not to the colonies severally, but to the colonies in their collective and corporate capacity as the United States of America. [Rulers] come and go; governments end and forms of government change; but sovereignty survives. A political society cannot endure without a supreme will somewhere. Sovereignty is never held in suspense. When, therefore, the external sovereignty of Great Britain in respect of the colonies ceased, it immediately passed to the Union....

It results that the investment of the federal government with the powers of external sovereignty did not depend upon the affirmative grants of the Constitution. The powers to declare and wage war, to conclude peace, to make treaties, to maintain diplomatic relations with other sovereignties, if they had never been mentioned in the Constitution, would have vested in the federal government as necessary concomitants of nationality....

[In] this vast external realm, with its important, complicated, delicate and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the nation. He makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates. Into the field of negotiation the Senate cannot intrude; and Congress itself is powerless to invade it....

It is important to bear in mind that we are here dealing not alone with an authority vested in the President by an exertion of legislative power, but with such an authority plus the very delicate, plenary and exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the federal government in the field of international relations—a power which does not require as a basis for its exercise an act of Congress. [It] is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation [must] often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved. Moreover, he, not Congress, has the better opportunity of knowing the conditions which prevail in foreign countries, and especially is this true in time of war. He has his confidential sources of information. He has his agents in the form of diplomatic, consular and other officials. Secrecy in respect of information gathered by them may be highly necessary, and the premature disclosure of it productive of harmful results....

In the light of the foregoing observations, it is evident that this court should not be in haste to apply a general rule which will have the effect of condemning legislation like that under review as constituting an unlawful delegation of legislative power. The principles which justify such legislation find overwhelming support in the unbroken legislative practice which has prevailed almost from the inception of the national government to the present day....

[Reversed.]

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS dissented without opinion.

Dames & Moore v. Regan

453 U.S. 654 (1981)

JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

[In 1979, American embassy personnel were seized and held hostage in revolutionary Iran. In response to the resulting crisis, President Carter, acting pursuant to the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, declared a national emergency and blocked the removal or transfer of all property belonging to Iran. Shortly thereafter, the Treasury Department issued a regulation nullifying “any attachment, judgment, decree, lien, execution, garnishment, or other judicial process” with respect to Iranian property.

[After these orders had gone into effect, Dames & Moore filed a suit in United States District Court against the Government of Iran, alleging breach of contract. The district court issued orders of attachment directed against property of the defendant.

[On January 20, 1981, the Americans held hostage were released pursuant to an executive agreement that provided, inter alia, that all litigation “between the Government of each party and the nationals of the other” would be resolved through binding arbitration. The agreement called for the establishment of an Iran-United States Claims Tribunal, which would arbitrate any claims not settled within six months. Awards of the tribunal were to be “final and binding.” Moreover, the United States agreed to terminate all legal proceedings in American courts involving such claims and to “bring about the transfer” of all Iranian assets held in the United States by American banks to a security account in the Bank of England, to the account of the Algerian Central Bank, and to use these sums to satisfy awards rendered against Iran by the Claims Tribunal.

[After taking office, President Reagan issued an executive order ratifying the terms of the agreement, suspending all “claims which may be presented to the [Tribunal],” and providing that these claims “shall have no legal effect in any action now pending in any court of the United States.” The lower court upheld the executive actions at issue.]

The parties and the lower courts [have] all agreed that much relevant analysis is contained in [Youngstown]....

Although we have in the past found and do today find Justice Jackson's classification of executive actions into three general categories analytically useful, [Justice] Jackson himself recognized that his three categories represented "a somewhat over-simplified grouping," and it is doubtless the case that executive action in any particular instance falls, not neatly in one of three pigeonholes, but rather at some point along a spectrum running from explicit congressional authorization to explicit congressional prohibition. This is particularly true as respects cases such as the one before us, involving responses to international crises the nature of which Congress can hardly have been expected to anticipate in any detail....

Because the President's action in nullifying the attachments and ordering the transfer of the assets was taken pursuant to specific congressional authorization, [in §203 of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA)] it is "supported by the strongest of presumptions and the widest latitude of judicial interpretation, and the burden of persuasion would rest heavily upon any who might attack it." Youngstown, 343 U.S., at 637 (Jackson, J., concurring). Under the circumstances of this case, we cannot say that petitioner has sustained that heavy burden. A contrary ruling would mean that the Federal Government as a whole lacked the power exercised by the President, and that we are not prepared to say.

Although we have concluded that the IEEPA constitutes specific congressional authorization to the President to nullify the attachments and order the transfer of Iranian assets, there remains the question of the President's authority to suspend claims pending in American courts. Such claims have, of course, an existence apart from the attachments which accompanied them. In terminating these claims [the] President purported to act under authority of both the IEEPA and [the] so-called "Hostage Act." We conclude that neither the IEEPA nor the Hostage Act constitutes specific authorization of the President's action suspending claims. This is not to say, [however,] that these statutory provisions are entirely irrelevant to the question of the validity of the President's action. We think both statutes highly relevant in the looser sense of indicating congressional acceptance of a broad scope for executive action in circumstances such as those presented in this case. [The] IEEPA delegates broad authority to the President to act in times of national emergency with respect to property of a foreign country. The Hostage Act similarly indicates congressional willingness that the President have broad discretion when responding to the hostile acts of foreign sovereigns....

[We] cannot ignore the general tenor of Congress' legislation in this area in trying to determine whether the President is acting alone or at least with the acceptance of Congress. [Congress] cannot anticipate and legislate with regard to every possible action the President may find it necessary to take or every possible situation in which he might act. Such failure of Congress specifically to delegate authority does not, "especially...in the areas of foreign policy and national security," imply "congressional disapproval" of action taken by the Executive. On the contrary, the enactment of legislation closely related to the question of the President's authority in a particular case which evinces legislative intent to accord the President broad discretion may be considered to "invite" "measures on independent presidential responsibility." Youngstown (Jackson, J., concurring). At least this is so where there is no contrary indication of legislative intent and when, as here, there is a history of congressional acquiescence in conduct of the sort engaged in by the President. It is to that history which we now turn.

Not infrequently in affairs between nations, outstanding claims by Nationals of one country against the government of another country are "sources of friction" between the two sovereigns. To resolve these difficulties, nations have often entered into agreements settling the claims of their respective nations. [Under] such agreements, the President has agreed to renounce or extinguish claims of United States nationals against foreign governments in return for lump-sum payments or the establishment of arbitration procedures....

Crucial to our decision today is the conclusion that Congress has implicitly approved the practice of claim settlement by executive agreement. This is best demonstrated by Congress' enactment of the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949....

Over the years Congress has frequently amended the International Claims Settlement Act to provide for particular problems arising out of settlement agreements, thus demonstrating Congress' continuing acceptance of the President's claim settlement authority....

In light of all of the foregoing—the inferences to be drawn from the character of the legislation Congress has enacted in the area such as the IEEPA and the Hostage Act, and from the history of acquiescence in executive claims settlement—we conclude that the President was authorized to suspend pending claims. [As] Justice Frankfurter pointed out in Youngstown, "a systematic, unbroken, executive practice, long pursued to the knowledge of the Congress and never before questioned...may be treated as a gloss on 'Executive Power' vested in the President by §1 of Art. II." Past practice does not, by itself, create power, but “long-continued practice, known to and acquiesced in by Congress, would raise a presumption that the [action] had been [taken] in pursuance of its consent....” United States v. Midwest Oil Co., 236 U.S. 459, 474 (1915)....

Just as importantly, Congress has not disapproved of the action taken here. Though Congress has held hearings on the Iranian Agreement itself, Congress has not enacted legislation, or even passed a resolution, indicating its displeasure with the Agreement. Quite the contrary, the relevant Senate Committee has stated that the establishment of the Tribunal is “of vital importance to the United States.” We are thus clearly not confronted with a situation in which Congress has in some way resisted the exercise of Presidential authority.

Finally, we re-emphasize the narrowness of our decision. We do not decide that the President possesses plenary power to settle claims, even as against foreign governmental entities. [But] where, as here, the settlement of claims has been determined to be a necessary incident to the resolution of a major foreign policy dispute between our country and another, and where, as here, we can conclude that Congress acquiesced in the President’s action, we are not prepared to say that the President lacks the power to settle such claims.

[Affirmed.]

[A concurring opinion by Justice Powell is omitted.]

MEDELLIN v. TEXAS, 552 U.S. 491 1346 (2008). The United States is a signatory of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations. The Convention obligates signatories to inform detained foreign nationals of the right to request assistance from the consul of their states. At the time that this case arose, the United States was also a signatory of an Optional Protocol providing that the International Court of Justice (ICJ) would have jurisdiction to resolve disputes arising out of the interpretation or application of the Convention.

Medellin, a citizen of Mexico, was convicted of murder in state court and sentenced to death. In his application for state postconviction relief, he claimed that he had not been informed of his consular rights in violation of the Convention. Both the state and federal courts rejected his request for relief on the ground that he had failed to raise the claim earlier.

Meanwhile, the ICJ rendered a decision involving Medellin and fifty other foreign nationals held in the United States, all of whom claimed that they had not been informed of their consular rights. The ICJ held that the United States was obligated to provide, “by means of its own choosing, review and reconsideration of the convictions and sentences” of the affected parties without regard to state procedural default rules.

The Supreme Court granted certiorari to review the lower court decision denying Medellin's claim. While the case was pending, President Bush issued a Memorandum to the United States Attorney General, which provided that he had "determined pursuant to the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, that the United States will discharge its international obligations under the decision of the [ICJ] by having State courts give effect to the decision." Medellin then filed a second application for postconviction relief in state court, and the U.S. Supreme Court dismissed the petition for certiorari as improvidently granted in order to allow the state proceedings to go forward. When the state again denied relief, the Supreme Court granted certiorari for a second time.

Chief Justice Roberts delivered the opinion of the Court. In the first part of his opinion, excerpted in Chapter 3, the Court held that the Convention was not "self-executing" and, therefore was not binding on state and federal courts as a matter of domestic law. In the second portion of the opinion, the Court turned to the legal effect of the President's memorandum.

"The United States maintains that the President's constitutional role 'uniquely qualifies' him to resolve the sensitive foreign policy decisions that bear on compliance with an ICJ decision and 'to do so expeditiously.' [We] do not question these propositions. [In] this case, the President seeks to vindicate United States interests in ensuring the reciprocal observance of the Vienna Convention, protecting relations with foreign governments and demonstrating commitment to the role of international law. These interests are plainly compelling.

"Such considerations, however, do not allow us to set aside first principles. The President's authority to act, as with the exercise of any governmental power, 'must stem either from an act of Congress or from the Constitution itself.' [Youngstown; Dames & Moore]....

"The President has an array of political and diplomatic means available to enforce international obligations, but unilaterally converting a non-self-executing treaty into a self-executing one is not among them. The responsibility for transforming an international obligation arising from a non-self-executing treaty into domestic law falls to Congress....

"Once a treaty is ratified without provisions clearly according it domestic effect, [whether] the treaty will ever have such effect is governed by the fundamental constitutional principle that "[t]he power to make the necessary laws is in Congress; the power to execute in the President" [Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, excerpted at page 411, infra, quoting Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 139 (1866).]...

"A non-self-executing treaty, by definition, is one that was ratified with the understanding that it is not to have domestic effect of its own force. That understanding precludes the assertion that Congress has implicitly authorized the President ‘acting on his own’ to achieve precisely the same result....

“When the President asserts the power to ‘enforce’ a non-self-executing treaty by unilaterally creating domestic law, he acts in conflict with the implicit understanding of the ratifying Senate. His assertion of authority, insofar as it is based on the pertinent non-self-executing treaties, is therefore within Justice Jackson’s third category, not the first or even the second....

“The United States nonetheless maintains that the President’s Memorandum should be given effect as domestic law because ‘this case involves a valid Presidential action in the context of Congressional “acquiescence.”’ Under the Youngstown tripartite framework, congressional acquiescence is pertinent when the President’s action falls within the second [category]. Here, however, as we have explained, the President’s effort to accord domestic effect to the [ICJ] judgment does not meet that prerequisite.

“In any event, even if we were persuaded that congressional acquiescence could support the President’s asserted authority to create domestic law pursuant to a non-self-executing treaty, such acquiescence does not exist here....

“We [turn] to the United States’ claim that ‘independent of the United States’ treaty obligations’ the Memorandum is a valid exercise of the President’s foreign affairs authority to resolve claims disputes with foreign nations. [The Court cites Dames & Moore among other cases.]

“The claims-settlement cases involve a narrow set of circumstances: the making of executive agreements to settle civil claims between American citizens and foreign governments or foreign nationals. They are based on the view that ‘a systematic, unbroken, executive practice, long pursued to the knowledge of the Congress and never before questioned,’ can ‘raise a presumption that the [action] had been [taken] pursuant to its consent.’ [Dames & Moore]....

“The President’s Memorandum is not supported by a ‘particularly longstanding practice’ of congressional acquiescence, but rather is what the United States itself has described as ‘unprecedented action.’ Indeed, the Government has not identified a single instance in which the President has attempted (or Congress has acquiesced in) a Presidential directive issued to state courts, much less one that reaches deep into the heart of the State’s police powers and compels state courts to reopen final criminal judgments and set aside neutrally applicable state laws....

“Medellin argues that the President’s Memorandum is a valid exercise of his ‘Take Care’ power. [This] authority allows the President to execute the laws, not make them. For the reasons we have stated, the [ICJ] judgment is not domestic law; accordingly, the President cannot rely on his Take Care powers here.”

Justice Stevens concurred in the judgment. Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Souter and Ginsburg, dissented.

ZIVOTOFSKY EX REL. ZIVOTOFSKY v. KERRY, 135 S. Ct. 2076 (2015). For many years, Presidents of both parties have refused to recognize Israeli sovereignty over Jerusalem and have instead insisted that the status of Jerusalem should be determined by negotiations between the Israelis and Palestinians. The Foreign Relations Authorization Act for the 2003 fiscal year provided that “[for] purposes of the registration of birth, certification of nationality, or issuance of a passport of a United States citizen, born in the city of Jerusalem, the Secretary shall, upon the request of the citizen or the citizen’s legal guardian, record the place of birth as Israel.” Although President George W. Bush signed the Act into law, he issued a signing statement stating that if the measure was construed as mandatory, it impermissibly interfered with the President’s constitutional authority in the field of international affairs.

Petitioner was born to United States citizens living in Jerusalem, and his mother requested that his passport and the consular report of his birth list his place of birth as Jerusalem, Israel. The State Department refused to comply with the request, and petitioner brought this action. The trial court dismissed the case on the ground that it constituted a nonjusticiable political question, but the Supreme Court reversed. (This aspect of the litigation is discussed at page 148). On remand, the Court of Appeals held that the statute was unconstitutional, and the Supreme Court affirmed.

Justice Kennedy wrote the opinion for the Court. He began his analysis by asserting that petitioner had waived his argument that the consular report of birth abroad should be treated differently from the passport. Accordingly, the opinion addressed only the passport issue. With regard to that issue, the Court noted that under Justice Jackson’s tripartite analysis in Youngstown, the President was acting in contravention of the views of Congress and that his power was therefore “at its lowest ebb” and his claim must be “scrutinized with caution.”

Nonetheless, the Court held that the passport requirement implicated the power to recognize a foreign government and that this power belonged to the President. Although the power was not expressly mentioned in the Constitution, it was a “logical and proper inference” from the power to “receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers” which is granted in article II. This inference was reinforced by the article II powers to make treaties and appoint ambassadors with the advice and consent of the Senate.

“Beyond that, the President himself has the power to open diplomatic channels simply by engaging in direct diplomacy with foreign heads of state and their ministers. The Constitution thus assigns the President means to effect recognition on his own initiative. Congress, by contrast, has no constitutional power that would enable it to initiate diplomatic relations with a foreign nation. Because these specific Clauses confer the recognition power on the President, the Court need not consider whether or to what extent the Vesting Clause, which provides that the ‘executive Power’ shall be vested in the President, provides further support for the President’s action here.”

Having found that the President had the recognition power, the Court then proceeded to determine whether the power was exclusive. It held that it was. “The various ways in which the President may unilaterally effect recognition—and the lack of any similar power vested in Congress—suggest that [the power is exclusive]. So, too, do functional considerations. Put simply, the Nation must have a single policy regarding which governments are legitimate in the eyes of the United States and which are not.”

The Court then discussed the historical practice, finding that Presidents since the founding had exercised unilateral power to recognize new states and that the Court had endorsed the practice.

In the Court’s view, it remained “true [that] many decisions affecting foreign relations—including decisions that may determine the course of our relations with recognized countries—require congressional action....

“If Congress disagrees with the President’s recognition policy, there may be consequences. Formal recognition may seem a hollow act if it is not accompanied by the dispatch of an ambassador, the easing of trade restrictions, and the conclusion of treaties. And those decisions require action by the Senate or the whole Congress.

“In practice, then, the President’s recognition determination is just one part of a political process that may require Congress to make laws. The President’s exclusive recognition power encompasses the authority to acknowledge, in a formal sense, the legitimacy of other states and governments, including their territorial bounds. Albeit limited, the exclusive recognition power is essential to the conduct of Presidential duties.”

Finally, the Court held that the passport requirement contained in the Act infringed on the President’s recognition power. “If Congress may not pass a law, speaking in its own voice, that effects formal recognition, then it follows that it may not force the President himself to contradict his earlier statement. That congressional command would not only prevent the Nation from speaking with one voice but also prevent the Executive itself from doing so in conducting foreign relations.

“Although the statement required by [the Act] would not itself constitute a formal act of recognition, it is a mandate that the Executive contradict his prior recognition determination in an official document issued by the Secretary of State. As a result, it is unconstitutional.”

Justice Breyer wrote a concurring opinion. Justice Thomas wrote an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part. Justice Scalia, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito, dissented.

Note: The President and Foreign Affairs

1. Curtiss-Wright. The Curtiss-Wright case involved a delegation from Congress to the President. The case therefore falls within Justice Jackson’s first category, where the President acts with congressional approval. However, in language that was arguably unnecessary to the decision, the Court asserts that the President is “the sole organ of the federal government in the field of international relations.” Does this mean that the President’s order would have been upheld even if the case had fallen within Jackson’s third category, where the President acts in violation of a statute?

The Court makes reference to both text and history, but it relies as well on arguments from function. Only the President, the Court asserts, can “[know] the conditions which prevail in foreign countries,” has “confidential sources of information,” and can maintain secrecy. Exclusive presidential authority is essential if “embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved.” Is this argument independent from controversial political judgments about the appropriate role of the United States in the world?

2. Dames & Moore. Can the result in Dames & Moore be reconciled with that in Youngstown? Is the Court’s reliance on congressional silence consistent with the constitutional requirement that statutes be enacted by both Houses of Congress and subject to a presidential veto? Consider the implications of INS v. Chadha, page 438, infra, striking down the one-House “legislative veto” on the ground that it violated the presentment and bicameralism clauses of the Constitution.

3. Medellin. Is the Court’s decision in Medellin consistent with the Court’s statement in Curtiss-Wright that the President is “the sole organ of the federal government in the field of international relations”? Note the Court’s statement that the President’s effort to give domestic effect to the Treaty was in Justice Jackson’s third category, where he acts in the teeth of a congressional prohibition. If Congress had done nothing at all and never ratified the treaty, he would presumably be within the second category. Why should presidential action be more vulnerable to constitutional attack when the President acts to enforce a treaty than when he acts without any congressional authority at all? According to the Court, was the President attempting to enforce the treaty?

4. Zivotofsky. This is a rare case where the Court upholds the President's authority when his actions conflict with a federal statute. According to Justice Jackson's Youngstown concurrence, “[presidential] claim to a power at once so conclusive and preclusive must be scrutinized with caution, for what is at stake is the equilibrium established by our constitutional system.” Did the Zivotofsky court scrutinize the President's claim with appropriate caution? Was the President's “conclusive and preclusive” claim in Zivotofsky more convincing than in Medellin and in Youngstown itself?

Note: The Allocation of Warmaking Authority

The Constitution is notoriously ambiguous on the allocation of warmaking power as between the President and the Congress. The President is made commander in chief of the armed forces, and there is no doubt that the framers intended the President to play the principal role as the representative of the United States in relations with other nations. On the other hand, Congress is expressly empowered to “declare war.” How should these provisions be reconciled?

1. The original understanding. Some guidance was provided during the Constitutional Convention:

“To make war.”

Mr. Pinkney opposed the vesting this power in the Legislature. Its proceedings were too slow. It wd. meet but once a year. The Hs. of Reps. would be too numerous for such deliberations. The Senate would be the best depositary, being more acquainted with foreign affairs, and most capable of proper resolutions. If the States are equally represented in Senate, so as to give no advantage to large States, the power will notwithstanding be safe, as the small have their all at stake in such cases as well as the large States. It would be singular for one authority to make war, and another peace.

Mr. Butler. The Objections agst the Legislature lie in a great degree against the Senate. He was for vesting the power in the President, who will have all the requisite qualities, and will not make war but when the Nation will support it.

Mr. M[adison] and Mr. Gerry moved to insert “declare,” striking out “make” war; leaving to the Executive the power to repel sudden attacks.

Mr. Sharman thought it stood very well. The Executive shd. be able to repel and not to commence war. “Make” better than “declare” the latter narrowing the power too much.

Mr. Gerry never expected to hear in a republic a motion to empower the Executive alone to declare war.

Mr. Ellsworth. There is a material difference between the cases of making war, and making peace. It shd. be more easy to get out of war, than into it. War also is a simple and overt declaration, peace attended with intricate & secret negotiations.

Mr. Mason was agst giving the power of war to the Executive, because not [safely] to be trusted with it; or to the Senate, because not so constructed as to be entitled to it. He was for clogging rather than facilitating war; but for facilitating peace. He preferred “declare” to “make.”

On the Motion to insert declare—in place of Make, [it was agreed to].

2. The meaning of “war” and of “sudden attack.” This colloquy seems to indicate a constitutional judgment that the President should be able to act to “repel sudden attacks.” But in other contexts, he could not initiate “war” without a congressional declaration. How much weight should such a colloquy have?

3. Judicial construction. Although the existence and scope of the President’s power to use the armed forces have been controversial throughout our history, the courts have rarely addressed the issue. The Supreme Court’s most extensive discussion appears in The Prize Cases, 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635 (1863). At issue was the lawfulness of President Lincoln’s proclamation establishing a blockade of southern ports after the secession of the southern states. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Grier, upheld the blockade. Justice Grier began his analysis by arguing that a state of war existed between the northern and southern states: “As a civil war is never publicly proclaimed, [its] actual existence is a fact in our domestic history which the Court is bound to notice and to know.” Although Congress had the exclusive power to declare a national or foreign war, it could not declare war against a State, or any number of States, by virtue of any clause in the Constitution. The Constitution confers on the President the whole Executive power. [He] has no power to initiate or declare a war either against a foreign nation or a domestic State. But by [Acts] of Congress, [he] is authorized to [call] out the militia and use the military and naval forces of the United States in case of invasion by foreign nations, and to suppress insurrection against the government of a State or of the United States.

If a war be made by invasion of a foreign nation, the President is not only authorized but bound to resist force by force. He does not initiate the war, but is bound to accept the challenge without waiting for any special legislative authority. And whether the hostile party be a foreign invader, or States organized in rebellion, it is none the less a war, although the declaration of it be “unilateral.”

Note: The “War on Terror” and the Second Gulf War

1. The “war on terror.” On September 18, 2001, Congress enacted a joint resolution granting the President authority to use all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001, or harbored such organizations or persons, in order to prevent any future acts of international terrorism against the United States by such nations, organizations or persons.

Joint Resolution of Congress Authorizing the Use of Force, Pub. L. No. 107-40, 115 Stat. 224 (2001).

Is the Resolution the constitutional equivalent of a declaration of war? If so, why did Congress fail to adopt an official declaration of war? Compare Turner, The War on Terrorism and the Modern Relevance of the Congressional Power to “Declare War,” 25 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y. 519, 521 (2002) (quoting Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden as stating that the resolution was “the constitutional equivalent of a declaration of war”), with Katyal and Tribe, Waging War, Deciding Guilt: Trying the Military Tribunals, 111 Yale L.J. 1259, 1285 (2002) (quoting Representative Conyers as stating that “[by] not declaring war the resolution preserves our precious civil liberties” and that “[this] is important because declarations of war trigger broad statutes that not only criminalize interference with troops and recruitment but also authorize the President to apprehend ‘alien enemies’”).

If the Resolution is equivalent to a declaration of war, against whom is the war being waged? Traditionally, wars are ended by treaties, subject to ratification by the Senate. Is there some comparable event that will demarcate the end of the war against terrorism?

Notice that the Resolution authorizes military action only with respect to those involved in the September 11 attacks. Does the President have constitutional authority to conduct a broader “war” against alleged terrorists not associated with those attacks? Are military actions against ISIS, which broke from Al Qaeda and considers itself a rival to Al Qaeda, justified under the Resolution?

2. The Second Gulf War. On October 16, 2002, Congress enacted the following resolution:

(a) AUTHORIZATION. The President is authorized to use the Armed Forces of the United States as he determines to be necessary and appropriate in order to—

(1) defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq; and

(2) enforce all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions regarding Iraq.

(b) PRESIDENTIAL DETERMINATION. In connection with the exercise of the authority granted in subsection (a) to use force the President shall, prior to such exercise or as soon thereafter as may be feasible, but no later than 48 hours after exercising such authority, make available to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate his determination that—

(1) reliance by the United States on further diplomatic or other peaceful means alone either (A) will not adequately protect the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq or (B) is not likely to lead to enforcement of all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions regarding Iraq; and

(2) acting pursuant to this joint resolution is consistent with the United States and other countries continuing to take the necessary actions against international terrorist and terrorist organizations, including those nations, organizations, or persons who planned, authorized, committed or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001....

Authorization for Use of Military Force against Iraq Resolution of 2002, Pub. L. No. 107-243, 116 Stat. 1498 (2002).

Months later, acting pursuant to this authority, the President committed American military forces to Iraq. Does a congressional authorization for military action at some point in the indefinite future constitute a declaration of war within the meaning of article I, section 8? Consider in this regard the material on the nondelegation doctrine, section D2, infra, and the implications of United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., supra.

The decision in Hamdi presented next marks the Court’s first response to assertions of presidential authority to wage war in the new environment created by the attacks of September 11.

Hamdi v. Rumsfeld

542 U.S. 507 (2004)

JUSTICE O'CONNOR announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion, in which [CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST], JUSTICE KENNEDY, and JUSTICE BREYER join.

At this difficult time in our Nation's history, we are called upon to consider the legality of the Government's detention of a United States citizen on United States soil as an "enemy combatant" and to address the process that is constitutionally owed to one who seeks to challenge his classification as such. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit held that petitioner's detention was legally authorized and that he was entitled to no further opportunity to challenge his enemy-combatant label. We now vacate and remand. We hold that although Congress authorized the detention of combatants in the narrow circumstances alleged here, due process demands that a citizen held in the United States as an enemy combatant be given a meaningful opportunity to contest the factual basis for that detention before a neutral decisionmaker.

I...

This case arises out of the detention of [Yaser Esam Hamdi, an American citizen] whom the Government alleges took up arms with the [Taliban]. [In 2001, he was seized in Afghanistan by the Northern Alliance and turned over to the U.S. military. In April 2002, he was transferred to a military brig in Charleston, South Carolina.] The Government contends that Hamdi is an "enemy combatant," and that this status justifies holding him in the United States indefinitely—without formal charges or proceedings—unless and until it makes the determination that access to counsel or further process is warranted....

[This action was a habeas corpus petition brought by Hamdi's father, who asserted that Hamdi went to Afghanistan to do relief work, that he had been in the country for less than two months before September 11, 2001, that he had not received military training, and that he was trapped in Afghanistan when the military campaign began.] In response to the petition, the Government filed a declaration written by Michael Mobbs, a Special Advisor to the Undersecretary of Defense....

Mobbs [set] forth what remains the sole evidentiary support that the Government has provided to the courts for Hamdi's detention. The declaration states that Hamdi "traveled to Afghanistan" in July or August 2001, and that he thereafter "affiliated with a Taliban military unit and received weapons training." It asserts that Hamdi "remained with his Taliban unit following the attacks of September 11" and that, during the time when Northern Alliance forces were "engaged in battle with the Taliban," "Hamdi's Taliban unit surrendered" to those forces, after which he "surrendered his Kalishnikov assault rifle" to them. The Mobbs Declaration also states that, because al Qaeda and the Taliban "were and are hostile forces engaged in armed conflict with the armed forces of the United States," "individuals associated with" those groups "were and continue to be enemy combatants." Mobbs states that Hamdi was labeled an enemy combatant "[b]ased upon his interviews and in light of his association with the Taliban." According to the declaration, a series of "U.S. military screening team[s]" determined that Hamdi met "the criteria for enemy combatants," and "a subsequent interview of Hamdi has confirmed that he surrendered and gave his firearm to Northern Alliance forces, which supports his classification as an enemy combatant."...

II

The threshold question before us is whether the Executive has the authority to detain citizens who qualify as "enemy combatants." [For] purposes of this case, ["enemy] combatant" [is defined as] an individual who, [the government] alleges, was "part of or supporting forces hostile to the United States or coalition partners" in Afghanistan and who "engaged in an armed conflict against the United States" there. We therefore answer only the narrow question before us: whether the detention of citizens falling within that definition is authorized.

The Government maintains that no explicit congressional authorization is required, because the Executive possesses plenary authority to detain pursuant to Article II of the Constitution. We do not reach the question whether Article II provides such authority, however, because we agree with the Government's alternative position, that Congress has in fact authorized Hamdi's detention, through the [Authorization of Use of Military Force Resolution (AUMF)]. [The Resolution is reproduced above.]

Our analysis on that point, set forth below, substantially overlaps with our analysis of Hamdi's principal argument for the illegality of his detention. He posits that his detention is forbidden by 18 U.S.C. §4001(a). Section 4001(a) states that "[n]o citizen shall be imprisoned or otherwise detained by the United States except pursuant to an Act of Congress.” [For] the reasons that follow, we conclude that the AUMF is explicit congressional authorization for the detention of individuals in the narrow category we describe (assuming, without deciding, that such authorization is required), and that the AUMF satisfied §4001(a)’s requirement that a detention be “pursuant to an Act of Congress” (assuming, without deciding, that §4001(a) applies to military detentions).

The AUMF authorizes the President to use “all necessary and appropriate force” against “nations, organizations, or persons” associated with the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. There can be no doubt that individuals who fought against the United States in Afghanistan as part of the Taliban, an organization known to have supported the al Qaeda terrorist network responsible for those attacks, are individuals Congress sought to target in passing the AUMF. We conclude that detention of individuals falling into the limited category we are considering, for the duration of the particular conflict in which they were captured, is so fundamental and accepted an incident to war as to be an exercise of the “necessary and appropriate force” Congress has authorized the President to use.

The capture and detention of lawful combatants and the capture, detention, and trial of unlawful combatants, by “universal agreement and practice,” are “important [incidents] of war.” Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S., at 28. The purpose of detention is to prevent captured individuals from returning to the field of battle and taking up arms once again....

Hamdi objects, nevertheless, that Congress has not authorized the indefinite detention to which he is now subject. [We] take Hamdi’s objection to be not to the lack of certainty regarding the date on which the conflict will end, but to the substantial prospect of perpetual detention. [As] the Government concedes, “given its unconventional nature, the current conflict is unlikely to end with a formal cease-fire agreement.” The prospect Hamdi raises is therefore not far-fetched. If the Government does not consider this unconventional war won for two generations, and if it maintains during that time that Hamdi might, if released, rejoin forces fighting against the United States, then the position it has taken throughout the litigation of this case suggests that Hamdi’s detention could last for the rest of his life....

Hamdi contends that the AUMF does not authorize indefinite or perpetual detention. Certainly, we agree that indefinite detention for the purpose of interrogation is not authorized. Further, we understand Congress’ grant of authority for the use of “necessary and appropriate force” to include the authority to detain for the duration of the relevant conflict, and our understanding is based on longstanding law-of-war principles. If the practical circumstances of a given conflict are entirely unlike those of the conflicts that informed the development of the law of war, that understanding may unravel. But that is not the situation we face as of this date. Active combat operations against Taliban fighters apparently are ongoing in Afghanistan. If the record establishes that United States troops are still involved in active combat in Afghanistan, those detentions are part of the exercise of “necessary and appropriate force,” and therefore are authorized by the AUMF....

III

Even in cases in which the detention of enemy combatants is legally authorized, there remains the question of what process is constitutionally due to a citizen who disputes his enemy-combatant status....

C

[The Government argues that] further factual exploration is unwarranted and inappropriate in light of the extraordinary constitutional interests at stake. Under the Government’s most extreme rendition of this argument, “[r]espect for separation of powers and the limited institutional capabilities of courts in matters of military decision-making in connection with an ongoing conflict” ought to eliminate entirely any individual process, restricting the courts to investigating only whether legal authorization exists for the broader detention scheme. At most, the Government argues, courts should review its determination that a citizen is an enemy combatant under a very deferential “some evidence” standard. Under this review, a court would assume the accuracy of the Government’s articulated basis for Hamdi’s detention, as set forth in the Mobbs Declaration, and assess only whether that articulated basis was a legitimate one.

...

Striking the proper constitutional balance here is of great importance to the Nation during this period of ongoing combat. But it is equally vital that our calculus not give short shrift to the values that this country holds dear or to the privilege that is American citizenship. It is during our most challenging and uncertain moments that our Nation’s commitment to due process is most severely tested; and it is in those times that we must preserve our commitment at home to the principles for which we fight abroad....

We [hold] that a citizen-detainee seeking to challenge his classification as an enemy combatant must receive notice of the factual basis for his classification, and a fair opportunity to rebut the Government’s factual assertions before a neutral decisionmaker.

At the same time, the exigencies of the circumstances may demand that, aside from these core elements, enemy combatant proceedings may be tailored to alleviate their uncommon potential to burden the Executive at a time of ongoing military conflict. Hearsay, for example, may need to be accepted as the most reliable available evidence from the Government in such a proceeding. Likewise, the Constitution would not be offended by a presumption in favor of the Government's evidence, so long as that presumption remained a rebuttable one and fair opportunity for rebuttal were provided. Thus, once the Government puts forth credible evidence that the habeas petitioner meets the enemy-combatant criteria, the onus could shift to the petitioner to rebut that evidence with more persuasive evidence that he falls outside the criteria. A burden-shifting scheme of this sort would meet the goal of ensuring that the errant tourist, embedded journalist, or local aid worker has a chance to prove military error while giving due regard to the Executive once it has put forth meaningful support for its conclusion that the detainee is in fact an enemy combatant....

We think it unlikely that this basic process will have the dire impact on the central functions of warmaking that the Government forecasts. The parties agree that initial captures on the battlefield need not receive the process we have discussed here; that process is due only when the determination is made to continue to hold those who have been seized. [While] we accord the greatest respect and consideration to the judgments of military authorities in matters relating to the actual prosecution of a war, and recognize that the scope of that discretion necessarily is wide, it does not infringe on the core role of the military for the courts to exercise their own time-honored and constitutionally mandated roles of reviewing and resolving claims like those presented here....

D

In so holding, we necessarily reject the Government's assertion that separation of powers principles mandate a heavily circumscribed role for the courts in such circumstances. Indeed, the position that the courts must forgo any examination of the individual case and focus exclusively on the legality of the broader detention scheme cannot be mandated by any reasonable view of separation of powers, as this approach serves only to condense power into a single branch of government. We have long since made clear that a state of war is not a blank check for the President when it comes to the rights of the Nation's citizens. Youngstown Sheet & Tube. Whatever power the United States Constitution envisions for the Executive in its exchanges with other nations or with enemy organizations in times of conflict, it most assuredly envisions a role for all three branches when individual liberties are at stake....

There remains the possibility that the standards we have articulated could be met by an appropriately authorized and properly constituted military tribunal. [In] the absence of such process, however, a court that receives a petition for a writ of habeas corpus from an alleged enemy combatant must itself ensure that the minimum requirements of due process are achieved. [We] anticipate that a District Court would proceed with the caution that we have indicated is necessary in this setting, engaging in a factfinding process that is both prudent and incremental....

IV

Hamdi asks us to hold that the Fourth Circuit also erred by denying him immediate access to counsel upon his detention and by disposing of the case without permitting him to meet with an attorney. Since our grant of certiorari in this case, Hamdi has been appointed counsel, with whom he has met for consultation purposes on several occasions, and with whom he is now being granted unmonitored meetings. He unquestionably has the right to access to counsel in connection with the proceedings on remand. No further consideration of this issue is necessary at this stage of the case....

The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.

JUSTICE SOUTER, with whom JUSTICE GINSBURG joins, concurring in part, dissenting in part, and concurring in the judgment....

The plurality rejects [the Government's position] on the exercise of habeas jurisdiction and so far I agree with its opinion. The plurality does, however, accept the Government's position that if Hamdi's designation as an enemy combatant is correct, his detention (at least as to some period) is authorized by an Act of Congress as required by §4001(a), that is, by the [AUMF]. Here, I disagree and respectfully dissent. The Government has failed to demonstrate that the Force Resolution authorizes the detention complained of here even on the facts the Government claims. If the Government raises nothing further than the record now shows, the Non-Detention Act entitles Hamdi to be released....

III

Under [the] principle of reading §4001(a) robustly to require a clear statement of authorization to detain, none of the Government's arguments suffices to justify Hamdi's detention....

D

Since the Government has given no reason either to deflect the application of §4001(a) or to hold it to be satisfied, I need to go no further; the Government hints of a constitutional challenge to the statute, but it presents none here. I will, however, stray across the line between statutory and constitutional territory just far enough to note the weakness of the Government's mixed claim of inherent, extrastatutory authority under a combination of Article II of the Constitution and the usages of war. [It] is instructive to recall Justice Jackson's observation that the President is not Commander in Chief of the country, only of the military. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, (concurring opinion); see also id., (Presidential authority is "at its lowest ebb" where the President acts contrary to congressional will).

There may be room for one qualification to Justice Jackson's statement, however: in a moment of genuine emergency, when the Government must act with no time for deliberation, the Executive may be able to detain a citizen if there is reason to fear he is an imminent threat to the safety of the Nation and its people (though I doubt there is any want of statutory authority). This case, however, does not present that question, because an emergency power of necessity must at least be limited by the emergency; Hamdi has been locked up for over two years.

Whether insisting on the careful scrutiny of emergency claims or on a vigorous reading of §4001(a), we are heirs to a tradition given voice 800 years ago by Magna Carta, which, on the barons' insistence, confined executive power by "the law of the land."...

JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS joins, dissenting....

Where the Government accuses a citizen of waging war against it, our constitutional tradition has been to prosecute him in federal court for treason or some other crime. Where the exigencies of war prevent that, the Constitution's Suspension Clause, Art. I, §9, cl. 2, allows Congress to relax the usual protections temporarily [by suspending the writ of habeas corpus]. Absent suspension, however, the Executive's assertion of military exigency has not been thought sufficient to permit detention without charge. No one contends that the congressional Authorization for Use of Military Force, on which the Government relies to justify its actions here, is an implementation of the Suspension Clause. Accordingly, I would reverse the decision below....

Several limitations give my views in this matter a relatively narrow compass. They apply only to citizens, accused of being enemy combatants, who are detained within the territorial jurisdiction of a federal court. This is not likely to be a numerous group; currently we know of only two, Hamdi and Jose Padilla. Where the citizen is captured outside and held outside the United States, the constitutional requirements may be different. Moreover, even within the United States, the accused citizen-enemy combatant may lawfully be detained once prosecution is in progress or in contemplation. The Government has been notably successful in securing conviction, and hence long-term custody or execution, of those who have waged war against the state.

I frankly do not know whether these tools are sufficient to meet the Government's security needs, including the need to obtain intelligence through interrogation. It is far beyond my competence, or the Court's competence, to determine that. But it is not beyond Congress's. If the situation demands it, the Executive can ask Congress to authorize suspension of the writ—which can be made subject to whatever conditions Congress deems appropriate, including even the procedural novelties invented by the plurality today....

Many think it not only inevitable but entirely proper that liberty give way to security in times of national crisis—that, at the extremes of military exigency, inter arma silent leges. Whatever the general merits of the view that war silences law or modulates its voice, that view has no place in the interpretation and application of a Constitution designed precisely to confront war and, in a manner that accords with democratic principles, to accommodate it. Because the Court has proceeded to meet the current emergency in a manner the Constitution does not envision, I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE THOMAS, dissenting.

The Executive Branch, acting pursuant to the powers vested in the President by the Constitution and with explicit congressional approval, has determined that Yaser Hamdi is an enemy combatant and should be detained. This detention falls squarely within the Federal Government's war powers, and we lack the expertise and capacity to second-guess that decision. [The] plurality utterly fails to account for the Government's compelling interests and for our own institutional inability to weigh competing concerns correctly. I respectfully dissent....

Justice Scalia apparently does not disagree that the Federal Government has all power necessary to protect the Nation. [I] do not see how suspension would make constitutional otherwise unconstitutional detentions ordered by the President. It simply removes a remedy. Justice Scalia's position might therefore require one or both of the political branches to act unconstitutionally in order to protect the Nation. But the power to protect the Nation must be the power to do so lawfully....

IV...

[The] plurality's dismissive treatment of the Government's asserted interests arises from its apparent belief that enemy-combatant determinations are not part of "the actual prosecution of a war," or one of the "central functions of warmaking." This seems wrong: Taking and holding enemy combatants is a quintessential aspect of the prosecution of war. Moreover, this highlights serious difficulties in applying the plurality's balancing approach here. First, in the war context, we know neither the strength of the Government's interests nor the costs of imposing additional process.

Second, it is at least difficult to explain why the result should be different for other military operations that the plurality would ostensibly recognize as "central functions of warmaking." [Because] a decision to bomb a particular target might extinguish life interests, the plurality's analysis seems to require notice to potential targets....

For these reasons, I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

Note: The Interplay between the President, Congress, and the Court with Regard to the "War on Terror"

As you read the material below, consider the extent to which the interplay between the President, Congress, and the Court with respect to policies for dealing with the "war on terror" has served constitutional values. Has the interchange made policy more transparent and responsive to public opinion? Has it adequately protected individual rights? Are the various branches performing the functions imagined for them by the framers? Are they sufficiently respectful of the expertise and constitutional responsibilities of the other branches?

1. The President acts. In 2001, President Bush signed an executive order establishing military tribunals with jurisdiction to try anyone who is not an American citizen and who the President determined there was reason to believe was a member of al Qaeda, or had "engaged in, aided or abetted, or conspired to commit, acts of international terrorism, or acts in preparation therefor," or who had knowingly harbored such individuals. The order provided for conviction and sentencing upon concurrence of two-thirds of the members of the tribunal with review of the final decision vested solely in the President or the Secretary of Defense. The order further provided that defendants before the tribunal "shall not be privileged to seek any remedy or maintain any proceeding [in any] court of the United States or any State thereof.”

2. The Court responds. In Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 548 U.S. 557 (2006), the Supreme Court held that the military commission system was illegal because it violated both the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) and the Geneva Conventions. Writing for the Court, Justice Stevens concluded that it was unnecessary to decide whether without the sanction of Congress, the President could constitutionally convene military commissions because Congress had in fact authorized such commissions in Article 21 of the UCMJ. The Court rejected the President’s argument that the Authorization for Military Force, reproduced at page 402, supra, in any way expanded this authority. Moreover, the authority was expressly conditioned on the requirement that the system comply with the laws of war. The military commission convened to adjudicate Hamdan’s case was therefore illegal for numerous, separate reasons.

a. The commissions authorized by the President suffered from various procedural deficiencies. The presiding officer could exclude the accused and his civilian counsel from some portions of the proceedings and did not have to allow the defendant to examine all of the evidence introduced against him. The admission of testimonial hearsay and evidence obtained from coercion was permitted. A defendant could be convicted by a two-thirds vote (except in the case of a death penalty), with review by a three-member panel of military officers appointed by the Secretary of Defense, only one of member of which need have experience as a judge. Final review was by the Secretary of Defense and the President. These proceedings differed sharply from procedures required by the UCMJ for ordinary courts martial and therefore, in the Court’s view, violated Article 36 of the UCMJ, which required that “[all] rules and regulations made under this article shall be uniform insofar as practicable.”

b. The procedures violated Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, as incorporated in the UCMJ’s provision requiring that military commissions comply with the laws of war. Common Article 3 requires that trials be before “a regularly constituted court affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples.” In the majority’s view, the “regularly constituted [courts] to which this provision refers are the ordinary courts-martial established by statute.”

c. Writing only for a plurality of the Court consisting of himself and Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, Justice Stevens concluded that conspiracy, the offense with which Hamdan was charged, was not an offense punishable under the laws of war, and none of the overt acts he performed in furtherance of the alleged conspiracy violated the laws of war.

d. Writing for the same plurality, Justice Stevens concluded that the exclusion of the defendant from portions of his own trial and the refusal to allow him to see some evidence against him meant that he had not been provided “judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized people” as required by Common Article 3.

Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Kennedy, Souter, and Ginsburg, wrote a concurring opinion. Justice Kennedy, joined in part by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, also concurred. Justice Alito, joined by Justice Scalia and by Justice Thomas in part, dissented. Chief Justice Roberts, who had participated on the appellate panel that decided the case below, did not participate.

A footnote in the opinion of the Court stated the following:

Whether or not the President has independent power, absent congressional authorization, to convene military commissions, he may not disregard limitations that Congress has, in proper exercise of its own war powers, placed on his powers. See [Youngstown, Jackson, J., concurring)]. The Government does not argue otherwise.

In light of the Government’s failure to “argue otherwise,” were there any constitutional issues before the Court in Hamdan?

3. Congress acts. Congress responded to Hamdi and Hamdan by enacting the Detainee Treatment Act, 119 Stat. 2739 and the Military Commissions Act, 120 Stat. 2600. The Detainee Treatment Act granted exclusive jurisdiction to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to review decisions made by the Combatant Status Review Tribunal, which the President established to provide the review to alleged enemy combatants in the wake of Hamdi. The act limited the court’s review to whether the status determination was consistent with procedures established by the Secretary of Defense and “to the extent that the Constitution and laws of the United States are applicable, whether the use of such standards and procedures to make the determination are consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.” The Military Commissions Act gave congressional imprimatur to military commissions to try enemy combatants for war crimes in the wake of Hamdan. It also vested the same United States Court of Appeals with exclusive jurisdiction to review judgments of the military tribunals. Review was restricted to “matters of law,” and gave the court limited jurisdiction to consider “whether the final decision was consistent with the standards and procedures specified in this chapter” and “to the extent applicable, the Constitution and the laws of the United States.”

4. The Court responds. In Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723 (2008), a five-to-four decision written by Justice Kennedy, the Supreme Court held that the Detainee Treatment Act unconstitutionally restricted the writ of habeas corpus and that the limited review in the United States Court of Appeals provided for in the Act was not an adequate substitute for habeas. Some of the Court's language suggested that the due process rights for detainees outlined in Hamdi might not provide sufficient protection.

[The] privilege of habeas corpus entitles the prisoner to a meaningful opportunity to demonstrate that he is being held pursuant to "the erroneous application or interpretation" of relevant law. And the habeas court must have the power to order the conditional release of an [individual]. But, depending on the circumstances, more may be required....

Petitioners identify what they see as myriad deficiencies in the [Combatant Status Review Tribunals (CSRTs)]. The most relevant for our purposes are the constraints upon the detainee's ability to rebut the factual basis for the Government's assertion that he is an enemy combatant. [The] detainee has limited means to find or present evidence to challenge the Government's case against him. He does not have the assistance of counsel and may not be aware of the most critical allegations that the Government relied upon to order his detention. [The] detainee can confront witnesses that testify during the CSRT proceeding. But given that there are in effect no limits on the admission of hearsay evidence [the] detainee's opportunity to question witnesses is likely to be more theoretical than real....

The Government defends the CSRT process, arguing that it was designed to conform to the procedures suggested by the plurality in Hamdi. Setting aside the fact that the relevant language in Hamdi did not garner a majority of the Court, it does not control the matter at hand. None of the parties in Hamdi argued that there had been a suspension of the writ....

Even if we were to assume that the CSRTs satisfy due process standards, it would not end our inquiry....

For the writ of habeas corpus, or its substitute, to function as an effective and proper remedy in this context, the court that conducts the habeas proceeding must have the means to correct errors that occurred during the CSRT proceedings. This includes some authority to assess the sufficiency of the Government's evidence against the detainee. It also must have the authority to admit and consider relevant exculpatory evidence that was not introduced during the earlier proceedings.

Chief Justice Roberts wrote a dissenting opinion, which was joined by Justices Scalia, Thomas, and Alito. Justice Scalia also wrote a dissenting opinion, which was joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Thomas and Alito.

In the wake of Boumediene, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has repeatedly reversed district court decisions granting detainees habeas corpus. See Latif v. Obama, 677 F.3d 1175 (D.C. Cir. 2012); Almerfide v. Obama, 654 F.3d 1 (D.C. Cir. 2011); Uthman v. Obama, 637 F.3d 400 (D.C. Cir. 2011); Al-Adahir v. Obama, 613 F.3d 1102 (D.C. Cir. 2010); Hatim v. Gates, 632 F.3d 720 (D.C. Cir. 2011). The Court of Appeals held that government reports were entitled to a presumption that they were accurate, Latif, supra; that detention could be based upon hearsay evidence, Al-Bihani v. Obama, 590 F.3d 866 (D.C. Cir. 2010); and that, at most, the government need establish its case by only a preponderance of the evidence, Al-Bihani, supra. The Supreme Court has declined to review any of these decisions.

Note: Some Unanswered Questions

1. Torture. Does the President's commander in chief power allow him to override statutes or treaty obligations prohibiting torture if he determines that doing so is necessary to win the war on terror? In a memorandum prepared for the Counsel to the President, the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel reached the following conclusions:

Even if an interrogation method arguably were to violate [the federal statute implementing the United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment], the statute would be unconstitutional if it impermissibly encroached on the President's constitutional power to conduct a military campaign. As Commander-in-Chief, the President has the constitutional authority to order interrogations of enemy combatants to gain intelligence information concerning the military plans of the enemy. The demands of the Commander-in-Chief power are especially pronounced in the middle of a war in which the nation has already suffered a direct attack. In such a case, the information gained from interrogations may prevent future attacks by foreign enemies. Any effort to apply [the statute] in a manner that interferes with the President's direction of such core war matters as the detention and interrogation of enemy combatants thus would be unconstitutional.

In a memorandum signed on February 7, 2002, President Bush stated that he accept[ed] the legal conclusion of the Attorney General and the Department of Justice that I have the authority under the Constitution to suspend [Geneva Convention provisions dealing with the treatment of prisoners] as between the United States and Afghanistan, but I decline to exercise that authority at this time. [I] reserve the right to exercise this authority in this or future conflicts. [Our] values as a Nation [call] for us to treat detainees humanely, including those who are not legally entitled to such treatment. [As] a matter of policy, the United States Armed Forces shall continue to treat detainees humanely and, to the extent appropriate and consistent with military necessity, in a manner consistent with the principles of Geneva.

After the Office of Legal Counsel memorandum became public in spring 2004, the President disavowed its conclusions.

In 2006, Congress enacted 42 U.S.C. §2000dd (the “McCain amendment”), which, in relevant part, provides as follows:

(a) No individual in the custody or under the physical control of the United States Government, regardless of nationality or physical location, shall be subject to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment....

(d) In this section, the term “cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment” means the cruel, unusual, and inhumane treatment or punishment prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, as defined in the United States Reservations, Declarations and Understandings to the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Forms of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment done at New York, December 10, 1984.

President Bush signed the measure into law, but made the following statement:

The executive branch shall construe Title X in Division A of the Act, relating to detainees, in a manner consistent with the constitutional authority of the President to supervise the unitary executive branch and as Commander in Chief and consistent with the constitutional limitations on the judicial power, which will assist in achieving the shared objective of the Congress and the President, evidenced in Title X, of protecting the American people from further terrorist attacks.

President’s Statement on Signing of H.R. 2863, the Department of Defense, Emergency Supplemental Appropriations to Address Hurricanes in the Gulf of Mexico, and Pandemic Influenza Act, 2006.

Is the President constitutionally obligated to obey the McCain amendment? In addition to the provisions discussed in Hamdan, Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions prohibits cruel treatment, torture, and “outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment.” What effect, if any, does Hamdan’s treatment of Common Article 3 have on the President’s power with respect to the interrogation of “enemy combatants”?

On his second day in office, President Obama issued Executive Order 13,491, which provided that [consistent] with the requirements of the Federal torture statute, [the McCain amendment], the Convention Against Torture, Common Article 3, and other laws regulating the treatment and interrogation of individuals detained in any armed conflict, [individuals in custody or control of the United States in armed conflicts] shall in all circumstances be treated humanely and shall not be subjected to violence to life and person (including murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment, and torture), nor to outrages upon personal dignity (including humiliating and degrading treatment), whenever such individuals are in the custody or under the effective control of an officer, employee, or other agent of the United States Government or detained within a facility owned, operated, or controlled by a department or agency of the United States.

2. Wiretapping. In 2006, press reports revealed that the National Security Agency engaged in warrantless intercepts of telephone communications between individuals in the United States and individuals located outside the United States in circumstances where at least one participant in the conversation was suspected of terrorist activity. These intercepts appeared to violate the provisions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, 50 U.S.C. §§1801 et seq. (FISA), which set out detailed procedures for obtaining warrants for such searches. The President nonetheless insisted that they were legally permissible because they came within his powers as commander in chief. Relying upon Hamdi, he also insisted that the general terms of the AUMF authorized the intercepts, just as the AUMF authorized the detention of “enemy combatants.” Do these arguments survive Hamdan?

In 2008, Congress passed legislation that amended FISA in ways that expanded the authority of the President to order wiretapping where one portion of the conversation occurred outside the United States and provided statutory authorization for the program. President Bush continued to insist, however, that he had inherent authority to engage in wiretapping not provided for in the legislation.

3. The relevance of constitutional law. Suppose that the President determined that Hamdi's continued detention was essential to national security. Is it plausible that he would obey a judicial order to release him? Should he obey such an order? Consider Justice Thomas's argument in Hamdi that, even if Congress were to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, the President would nonetheless be under a (not judicially enforceable) obligation to obey constitutional commands. If this argument is correct, does it follow that when Justice Scalia claims that national security can be protected by suspension of the writ, he is counseling constitutional disobedience?

In Korematsu v. United States (excerpted in Chapter 5, section C1, infra), Justice Jackson dissented from the Court's judgment upholding the conviction of a defendant who had disobeyed the order excluding Japanese Americans from the West Coast during World War II. Unlike the other dissenters, however, Justice Jackson did not argue that the exclusion should not have taken place. Jackson wrote that it would be impracticable and dangerous idealism to expect or insist that each specific military command in an area of probable operations will conform to conventional tests of constitutionality. When an area is so beset that it must be put under military control at all, the paramount consideration is that its measures be successful rather than legal.

For Justice Jackson, the crucial question was not whether the exclusion should have taken place, but whether the courts should endorse the exclusion:

I should hold that a civil court cannot be made to enforce an order which violates constitutional limitations even if it is a reasonable exercise of military authority. The courts can exercise only the judicial power, can apply only law, and must abide by the Constitution, or they cease to be civil courts and become instruments of military policy.

Note also Justice Jackson's distinction in Youngstown between the President's "paper powers" and "real powers." How would Justice Jackson have voted in Hamdi?

2. Legislative Authority

To what extent does the Constitution permit Congress to control presidential conduct of foreign affairs?

Note: The War Powers Resolution

In the waning days of the Vietnam War, Congress enacted the War Powers Resolution, 50 U.S.C. §§1541–1548, which was designed to halt the perceived atrophying of Congress’s power to declare war.

1. The resolution. In an opening statement of “Purpose and Policy,” the resolution declares that the President’s power to introduce the armed forces into hostilities or into situations where immediate involvement in hostilities is likely is limited to situations where there has been a declaration of war, a specific statutory authorization, or a national emergency created by an attack on the United States.

The resolution then requires the President “in every possible instance” to consult with Congress before introducing U.S. troops into hostilities and, after introduction, to consult regularly with Congress until the troops have been removed. If there is no declaration of war, the President is required to submit to Congress a report within forty-eight hours whenever troops are introduced into hostilities.

Within sixty days after the report is submitted, the President must terminate use of armed forces unless Congress has declared war or enacted a specific authorization for the use of force, extended the sixty-day period, or is physically unable to meet. The President is permitted to extend the initial sixty-day period for an additional thirty days if he certifies that unavoidable military necessity requires the continued use of the armed forces in the course of bringing about a prompt removal of the forces.

Moreover, at any time that the armed forces are engaged in hostilities outside the territory of the United States without a declaration of war or specific statutory authorization, the President is obligated to remove the forces if so directed by a concurrent resolution. (Consider whether this provision is constitutional in light of INS v. Chadha, page 438, infra.)

Finally, the resolution provides that it is not “intended to alter the constitutional authority of the Congress or of the President or the provisions of existing treaties” and that it “shall [not] be construed as granting any authority to the President [which] [he] would not have had in the absence of [the Resolution].”

2. The constitutional issue. Consider, in the light of the preceding materials, the constitutionality of the War Powers Resolution. Which provisions are most troublesome? Consider also the following views:

a. The War Powers Resolution is an unconstitutional infringement on the powers of the President. The Constitution gives the President the authority to introduce armed forces into hostilities without a congressional declaration of war. Moreover, at least in cases of an effort to “repel sudden attacks” on the United States and its allies, the resolution is far too broad. It allows a congressional role in areas in which such a role is constitutionally proscribed.

b. The War Powers Resolution is constitutional. It merely restores the constitutional balance that had been upset by a long period of congressional inactivity before its passage. In essence, the resolution allows Congress to ensure that there is no undeclared war. Indeed, to the extent that it suffers from any constitutional defect, it is in yielding undue power to the President—for the resolution seems to allow the President to wage war without a declaration in far too many circumstances.

c. The final part of the resolution makes the preceding provisions effectively meaningless. It restores the constitutional status quo and remits individuals deciding on the distribution of the war powers—in the executive, legislative, and judicial branches—to the Constitution itself. Why was this section included?

For a comprehensive historical study of the power of Congress to control presidential warmaking, see Barron and Lederman, The Commander in Chief at the Lowest Ebb—Framing the Problem, Doctrine, and Original Understanding, 121 Harv. L. Rev. 689 (2008), and Barron and Lederman, The Commander in Chief at the Lowest Ebb—A Constitutional History, 121 Harv. L. Rev. 941 (2008). The authors conclude that throughout our history Congress has regularly “interfered with the command of the forces and the conduct of campaigns” and that “[several] of our most esteemed Presidents—Washington, Lincoln, and both Roosevelts, among others—never invoked the sort of preclusive claims of authority that some modern Presidents appear to [embrace].”

See also Prakash, Unleashing the Dogs of War: What the Constitution Means by “Declare War,” 93 Cornell L. Rev. 45, 50, 120–121 (2007).

3. Libya. After conflict broke out between the rebels and the Libyan regime, the United Nations Security Council adopted a resolution authorizing “member States...to take all necessary measures...to protect civilians and civilian populated areas under threat of attack” and to establish a “no-fly zone” in Libya.

Two days later, on March 19, 2011, the United States, in conjunction with its NATO allies, began air strikes in Libya. Within 48 hours of the beginning of the air strikes, President Obama sent a letter to the Speaker of the House and President pro tempore of the Senate “as part of my efforts to keep Congress fully informed, consistent with the War Powers Resolution.” The letter stated that U.S. military forces had begun air strikes for purpose of preparing a no-fly zone and that “[United] States forces are conducting a limited and well-defined mission in support of international efforts to protect civilians and prevent a humanitarian disaster.”

On April 1, 2011, the Justice Department’s Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) released a memorandum determining that the President had constitutional authority to use military force in Libya without prior congressional approval. Relying on prior OLC opinions in the Clinton administration, particularly those opinions on the unilateral presidential deployments to Haiti (1994) and Bosnia (1995), the memorandum asserted that the President’s legal authority to direct military force in Libya turned on two questions: first, whether the United States operations in Libya would serve sufficiently important national interests to permit the President’s action as Commander in Chief and Chief Executive and pursuant to his authority to conduct U.S. foreign relations; and second, whether the military operations that the President anticipated ordering would be sufficiently extensive in “nature, scope, and duration” to constitute a “war requiring prior, specific congressional approval under the Declaration of War Clause.”

According to the memorandum, this understanding of presidential power “reflects not only the express assignment of powers and responsibilities to the President and Congress in the Constitution, but also [the] ‘historical gloss’ placed on the Constitution by two centuries of practice.”

As to the first question OLC concluded that “the combination of at least two national interests that the President reasonably determined were at stake here”—preserving stability in the Middle East and “supporting the [United Nations Security Council’s] credibility and effectiveness”—provided a sufficient basis for the President’s exercise of his constitutional authority to order the use of military force.

Turning to the second question, the memorandum acknowledged that presidential authority to deploy military force even in the service of such national security interests might be limited if the engagement constituted a “war” within the meaning of the Declaration of War clause—such as in Vietnam, the first and second Gulf Wars, and, presumably, Korea. (In this way, the opinion differed from the view OLC had articulated in the George W. Bush administration, which was that the President is authorized to initiate actions of this sort without congressional approval.) The memorandum nonetheless concluded that covers every military [engagement]. This standard generally will be satisfied only by prolonged and substantial military engagements, typically involving exposure of U.S. military personnel to significant risk over a substantial period.

On April 4, 2011, the United States transferred responsibility for the military operations to NATO, and U.S. involvement assumed a supporting role that included logistical and search and rescue assistance, suppression and destruction of Libyan air defenses, and strikes by unmanned aerial vehicles against particular targets. Although the 60-day period specified in the War Powers Resolution appeared to expire on May 20, 2011, and although Congress failed to pass a measure authorizing U.S. involvement, the involvement continued. At first, the Obama administration offered no defense of its refusal to end the operation in compliance with the Resolution, but on June 15, 2011, the administration sent a letter to congressional leaders. The letter asserted that

[the] current U.S. military operations [are] consistent with the War Powers Resolution and do not under that law require further congressional authorization, because U.S. military operations are distinct from the kind of “hostilities” contemplated by the Resolution’s 60-day termination provision. U.S. forces are playing a constrained and supporting role in a multination coalition, whose operations are both legitimated by and limited to the terms of a United Nations Security Council resolution that authorizes the use of force solely to protect civilians and civilian populated areas under attack or threat of attack and to enforce a no-fly zone and an arms embargo. U.S. operations do not involve sustained fighting or active exchanges of fire with hostile forces, nor do they involve the presence of U.S. ground troops, U.S. casualties or a serious threat thereof, or any significant chance of escalation into a conflict characterized by those factors.

Was the Libyan operation constitutional in the absence of congressional authorization? Was it in compliance with the War Powers Resolution? Why is the fact that the United States is playing a “supporting role” and that the operations are pursuant to a Security Council resolution relevant to the question whether there are “hostilities”? Does the memorandum mean that “hostilities” do not exist so long as the United States does not use ground troops and attacks a foe that is unable to respond?

4. Alternative approaches. Most commentators have agreed that the War Powers Resolution has been ineffective in constraining executive discretion. See, e.g., H. Koh, The National Security Constitution 39–40 (1990).

Could a revised, more carefully drafted War Powers Resolution more effectively ensure a congressional role in warmaking?

Note: Congressional Control over Agreements with Foreign States—Treaties, Executive Agreements, and Congressional-Executive Agreements

What role should Congress play when the question is the making of peace rather than war?

1. Treaties. Article II, section 2 of the Constitution grants to the President the power “by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur,” and article VI, section 6 makes “all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States” the supreme law of the land. Do these provisions authorize the President, acting with the acquiescence of two-thirds of the Senate and the agreement of a foreign country, to countermand otherwise applicable statutes? See, e.g., Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U.S. 190 (1888):

By the Constitution, a treaty is placed on the same footing, and made of like obligation, with an act of legislation. Both are declared by that instrument to be the supreme law of the land, and no supreme efficacy is given to either over the other. [If] the two are inconsistent, the one last in date will control the other, provided always the stipulation of the treaty on the subject is self-executing.

Notice that, at least with regard to domestic law, a later act of Congress can also repeal a treaty, although the repeal may violate international law. See, e.g., The Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 599 (1884). Does it follow that the President can also countermand a treaty if he is exercising executive power under article II? For a discussion of the Bush administration’s position on its legal obligation to obey treaties on torture and treatments of war prisoners, see page 411, supra. For a discussion of the limits of a President’s power to enforce a treaty through executive order without congressional authorization, see pages 356–361, supra. For a discussion of the impact of treaties on state law, see Chapter 3C, supra.

2. Executive agreements. If a President lacks the support of two-thirds of the Senate, may he make domestic law without the acquiescence of either House by entering into an executive agreement with another country? Since the beginning of the country, Presidents have entered into thousands of such agreements. Although there is no express constitutional authority for this practice, the Constitution seems indirectly to recognize the possibility of nontreaty international agreements in article I, section 10, which prohibits states from entering into treaties but authorizes them to enter into an “Agreement or Compact with [a] foreign Power” with the consent of Congress.

Are there constitutional limits on the scope of such agreements when entered into by the President? Consider American Insurance Association v. Garamendi, 539 U.S. 396 (2003). In a five-to-four decision the Court, per Justice Souter, invalidated a California statute that required insurers doing business in the state to disclose details of insurance policies issued to persons in Europe that were in effect between 1920 and 1945. The statute was enacted to assist Holocaust victims and their descendants in their efforts to collect the proceeds of insurance policies that were either unpaid by the companies or seized by the Nazi government. The Court held that the state law was preempted by an executive agreement between the United States and Germany. Although the executive agreement did not expressly deal with California’s disclosure requirement, the Court held that the agreement’s approach, which emphasized voluntary cooperation and settlement of claims through a special fund established by the German government, conflicted with the statute.

With regard to the constitutional power of the President to reach binding executive agreements with foreign states, the Court said the following:

[Our] cases have recognized that the President has authority to make “executive agreements” with other countries, requiring no ratification by the Senate or approval by Congress. [This] power [has] been exercised since the early years of the Republic. See [Dames & Moore]. [Making] executive agreements to settle claims of American nationals against foreign governments is a particularly longstanding [practice]. Given the fact that the practice goes back over 200 years to the first Presidential administration, and has received congressional acquiescence throughout its history, the conclusion “[t]hat the President’s control of foreign relations includes the settlement of claims is indisputable.”

Into which of Justice Jackson’s three categories does the German-American executive agreement fall? Is the result in Garamendi consistent with the Court’s holding in Medellin, page 400, supra, that the President may not enforce the terms of a treaty without congressional approval? Recall that in Dames & Moore, the Court stated that it was “crucial” to its decision that “Congress [had] implicitly approved the practice of claim settlement by executive agreement” through the International Claims Settlement Act. Given Garamendi, is this fact still “crucial”?

Would a federal statute that specifically disapproved of the executive agreement relied upon in Garamendi be constitutional? The Garamendi petitioner argued that Congress had authorized state laws of the sort California had enacted, but the Court held that it “need [not] consider the possible significance for preemption doctrine of tension between an Act of Congress and Presidential foreign policy, cf. generally [Youngstown (Jackson, J., concurring)]” because the federal statute did not grant such authorization, and given the President’s independent authority in the areas of foreign policy and national security, congressional silence should not be equated with congressional disapproval.

D. DOMESTIC AFFAIRS

1. Executive Authority

Article II, section 1 of the Constitution vests “the executive power” in the President of the United States, and article II, section 3 provides that the President “shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed.” To what extent do these powers free the President from legislative and judicial control when he purports to be executing the laws?

United States v. Nixon

418 U.S. 683 (1974)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

[On June 17, 1972, employees of the reelection committee for President Nixon broke into the Democratic National Committee headquarters at the Watergate Hotel in Washington, D.C. In February of the next year, a Senate Select Committee on the Watergate affair was set up by a unanimous vote of the Senate. The committee was charged with investigating the alleged illegal break-in and the question of White House involvement. In late May, under considerable public pressure, President Nixon appointed Archibald Cox as special prosecutor to investigate, among other things, any participation by the White House in the Watergate affair. The President himself was implicated by former White House counsel John Dean in testimony before the Senate in June, and in July one member of the House introduced an impeachment resolution. On February 6, 1974, the House formally authorized the Judiciary Committee to begin impeachment hearings. The hearings were ongoing at the time that the following decision was rendered.]

This litigation presents for review the denial of a motion, filed in the District Court on behalf of [President Nixon] in the case of United States v. Mitchell, to quash a third-party subpoena duces tecum issued by the [District Court] pursuant to Fed. Rule Crim. Proc. 17(c). The subpoena directed the President to produce certain tape recordings and documents relating to his conversations with aides and advisers.

On March 1, 1974, a grand jury of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia returned an indictment charging seven named individuals with various offenses, including conspiracy to defraud the United States and to obstruct justice. Although he was not designated as such in the indictment, the grand jury named the President, among others, as an unindicted coconspirator. On April 18, 1974, upon motion of the Special Prosecutor, [a] subpoena duces tecum was issued [to] the President by the United States District Court [requiring] the production, in advance of the September 9 trial date, of certain tapes, memoranda, papers, transcripts, or other writings relating to certain precisely identified meetings between the President and others. [On] April 30, the President publicly released edited transcripts of 43 conversations; portions of 20 conversations subject to subpoena in the present case were included. On May 1, 1974, the President's counsel filed a "special appearance" and a motion to quash the subpoena [on grounds] of privilege.

On May 20, 1974, the District Court denied the motion to [quash]. [The President sought review in the court of appeals, but the Supreme Court granted review before judgment.]

In the District Court, the President's counsel argued that the Court lacked jurisdiction to issue the subpoena because the matter was an intra-branch dispute between a subordinate and superior officer of the Executive Branch and hence not subject to judicial resolution. [Since] the Executive Branch has exclusive authority and absolute discretion to decide whether to prosecute a case, [it] is contended that a President's decision is final in determining what evidence is to be used in a given criminal case....

[The] Attorney General has delegated the authority to represent the United States in these particular matters to a Special Prosecutor with unique authority and tenure. The regulation gives the Special Prosecutor explicit power to contest the invocation of executive privilege in the process of seeking evidence deemed relevant to the performance of these specially delegated duties....

[It] is theoretically possible for the Attorney General to amend or revoke the regulation defining the Special Prosecutor's authority. But he has not done so. So long as this regulation remains in force the Executive Branch is bound by it, and indeed the United States as the sovereign composed of the three branches is bound to respect and to enforce it....

[The Court held that the subpoena met the requirements of Fed. R. Crim. Proc. 17(c), including relevance, specificity, and admissibility.]

[We] turn to the claim that the subpoena should be quashed because it demands “confidential conversations between a President and his close advisors that it would be inconsistent with the public interest to produce.” [The] first contention is a broad claim that the separation of powers doctrine precludes judicial review of a President’s claim of privilege. The second contention is that if he does not prevail on the claim of absolute privilege, the court should hold as a matter of constitutional law that the privilege prevails over the subpoena duces tecum.

In the performance of assigned constitutional duties each branch of the Government must initially interpret the Constitution, and the interpretation of its powers by any branch is due great respect from the others. The President’s counsel [reads] the Constitution as providing an absolute privilege of confidentiality for all Presidential communications. Many decisions of this Court, however, have unequivocally reaffirmed the holding of [Marbury] that “[i]t is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is.”...

No holding of the Court has defined the scope of judicial power specifically relating to the enforcement of a subpoena for confidential Presidential communications for use in a criminal prosecution, but other exercises of power by the Executive Branch and the Legislative Branch have been found invalid as in conflict with the Constitution. Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969); [Youngstown].

[Notwithstanding] the deference each branch must accord the others, the “judicial Power of the United States” vested in the federal courts [can] no more be shared with the Executive Branch than the Chief Executive, for example, can share with the Judiciary the veto power. [Any] other conclusion would be contrary to the basic concept of separation of powers and the checks and balances that flow from the scheme of a tripartite government. [We] therefore reaffirm that it is the province and duty of this Court “to say what the law is” with respect to the claim of privilege presented in this case.

[In support of his claim of privilege, President Nixon argued that there was a valid need to protect the confidentiality of communications between high government officials, and that the privilege was implicit in the doctrine of separation of powers. The Court recognized the legitimacy of the President’s interest in confidentiality.]

However, neither the doctrine of separation of powers, nor the need for confidentiality of high-level communications, without more, can sustain an absolute, unqualified Presidential privilege of immunity from judicial process under all circumstances. The President's need for complete candor and objectivity from advisers calls for great deference from the courts. However, when the privilege depends solely on the broad, undifferentiated claim of public interest in the confidentiality of such conversations, a confrontation with other values arises. Absent a claim of need to protect military, diplomatic, or sensitive national security secrets, we find it difficult to accept the argument that even the very important interest in confidentiality of Presidential communications is significantly diminished by production of such material for in camera inspection with all the protection that a district court will be obliged to provide....

The expectation of a President to the confidentiality of his conversations and correspondence, like the claim of confidentiality of judicial deliberations, for example, has all the values to which we accord deference for the privacy of all citizens and, added to those values, is the necessity for protection of the public interest in candid, objective, and even blunt or harsh opinions in Presidential decisionmaking. [The] privilege is fundamental to the operation of Government and inextricably rooted in the separation of powers under the Constitution....

But this presumptive privilege must be considered in light of our historic commitment to the rule of law. This is nowhere more profoundly manifest than in our view that "the twofold aim [of criminal justice] is that guilt shall not escape or innocence suffer." We have elected to employ an adversary system of criminal justice in which the parties contest all issues before a court of law. The need to develop all relevant facts in the adversary system is both fundamental and comprehensive....

[Evidentiary privileges] are designed to protect weighty and legitimate competing interests. Thus, the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution provides that no man "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." And, generally, an attorney or a priest may not be required to disclose what has been revealed in professional confidence. These and other interests are recognized in law by privileges against forced disclosure. [Whatever] their origins, these exceptions to the demand for every man's evidence are not lightly created nor expansively construed, for they are in derogation of the search for truth.

In this case the President challenges a subpoena served on him as a third party requiring the production of materials for use in a criminal prosecution; he does so on the claim that he has a privilege against disclosure of confidential communications. He does not place his claim of privilege on the ground they are military or diplomatic secrets. As to these areas of Art. II duties the courts have traditionally shown the utmost deference to Presidential responsibilities.

[No] case of the Court, however, has extended this high degree of deference to a President's generalized interest in confidentiality. Nowhere in the Constitution [is] there any explicit reference to a privilege of confidentiality, yet to the extent this interest relates to the effective discharge of a President's powers, it is constitutionally based.

The right to the production of all evidence at a criminal trial similarly has constitutional dimensions. The Sixth Amendment explicitly confers upon every defendant in a criminal trial the right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him" and "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." Moreover, the Fifth Amendment also guarantees that no person shall be deprived of liberty without due process of law....

In this case we must weigh the importance of the general privilege of confidentiality of Presidential communications in performance of the President's responsibilities against the inroads of such a privilege on the fair administration of criminal justice.¹⁹ The interest in preserving confidentiality is weighty indeed and entitled to great respect. However, we cannot conclude that advisers will be moved to temper the candor of their remarks by the infrequent occasions of disclosure because of the possibility that such conversations will be called for in the context of a criminal prosecution.

On the other hand, the allowance of the privilege to withhold evidence that is demonstrably relevant in a criminal trial would cut deeply into the guarantee of due process of law and gravely impair the basic function of the courts....

[If] a President concludes that compliance with a subpoena would be injurious to the public interest he may properly, as was done here, invoke a claim of privilege on the return of the subpoena. Upon receiving a claim of privilege from the Chief Executive, it became the further duty of the District Court to treat the subpoenaed material as presumptively privileged and to require the Special Prosecutor to demonstrate that the Presidential material was "essential to the justice of the [pending criminal] case." [We] are unable to conclude that the District Court erred in ordering the inspection. Accordingly we affirm the order of the District Court that subpoenaed materials be transmitted to that court. We now turn to the important question of the District Court's responsibilities in conducting the in camera examination of Presidential materials or communications delivered under the compulsion of the subpoena duces tecum.

[Statements] that meet the test of admissibility and relevance must be isolated; all other material must be excised. At this stage the District Court is not limited to representations of the Special Prosecutor as to the evidence sought by the subpoena; the material will be available to the District Court. It is elementary that in camera inspection of evidence is always a procedure calling for scrupulous protection against any release or publication of material not found by the court, at that stage, probably admissible in evidence and relevant to the issues of the trial for which it is sought. That being true of an ordinary situation, it is obvious that the District Court has a very heavy responsibility to see to it that Presidential conversations, which are either not relevant or not admissible, are accorded that high degree of respect due the President of the United States....

[Affirmed.]

MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

Note: Executive Privilege and Presidential Immunity

The Court rejected three analytically separate claims made by President Nixon: that the President was immune from judicial process while in office; that he, alone, should determine the scope of executive privilege; and that, even if the scope of the privilege should be decided by the court, his invocation of the privilege was appropriate.

1. Immunity from judicial process. The Court held that nothing in the Constitution precludes a subpoena directed against the President. Consider whether the immunity argument has more force in the following alternative settings:

a. Immunity from injunctive relief. In Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475 (1867), the Court refused to hear a suit attempting to enjoin the President's enforcement of the Reconstruction laws. The Court concluded that courts did not have power to issue an injunction against the President. The Court referred in particular to the difficulties of enforcement and to the alternative route of impeachment. Does Johnson survive United States v. Nixon? Note also that, although President Truman was not the named defendant in Youngstown, his order was in fact the subject of the Court's injunction.

b. Damages for misconduct while in office. In Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731 (1982), Fitzgerald brought an action against President Nixon on the ground that he had been discharged from a government position because he had exercised his right to freedom of speech. The Court held, by a five-to-four vote, that the President was immune from an action for damages. The opinion was written by Justice Powell. According to the Court, “[The] President occupies a unique position in the constitutional scheme. [Because] of the singular importance of the President's duties, diversion of his energies by concern with private lawsuits would raise unique risks to the effective functioning of government." The Court referred to "the sheer prominence of the President's office," which would make him "an easily identifiable target for suits for civil damages. Cognizance of this personal vulnerability frequently could distract a President from his public duties, to the detriment not only of the President and his office but also the Nation that the Presidency was designed to serve."

The Court also responded to the suggestion that absolute immunity would "leave the Nation without sufficient protection against misconduct on the part of the Chief Executive." A number of safeguards were already in place: The remedy of impeachment, "constant scrutiny by the press," "vigilant oversight by Congress," "a desire to earn re-election, the need to maintain prestige as an element of Presidential influence, and a President's traditional concern for his historical stature" would all play a role. The Court left open, however, the question whether Congress might constitutionally subject the President to liability for damages.

Notice that Nixon v. Fitzgerald was not brought until after President Nixon had left office. Given its timing, how could such a suit have "[risked] the effective function of government" or "[distracted] a President from his public duties"?

In Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982), the Court declined to extend presidential immunity to presidential aides. Lower-level officials do, however, enjoy "qualified immunity." These officials can be held liable for damages only if they violate law that was "clearly established" at the time of the violation. Id. at 818.

For an interesting application of the qualified immunity doctrine, see Ashcroft v. Al-Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074 (2011). In his complaint, al-Kidd alleged that in the aftermath of the World Trade Center attack, then-Attorney General Ashcroft authorized the pretextual use of the material witness statute. The statute authorizes the detention of individuals when their testimony is required for a criminal prosecution and when detention is necessary to ensure their availability at trial. Al-Kidd alleged that the statute was used to detain him because the government suspected him of involvement in terrorist activities but lacked probable cause justifying arrest for any offense. A native-born American citizen, he was detained as he checked in for a flight to Saudi Arabia based upon a material witness warrant. The affidavit filed in support of the warrant asserted that his testimony was "crucial" to the prosecution of another individual and that without his detention, the testimony would be lost. The affidavit did not mention that al-Kidd's parents, wife, and children were all citizens and residents of the United States and stated that he had purchased a one-way ticket, when in fact the ticket was round-trip. Al-Kidd remained in federal custody for sixteen days and on supervised release for fourteen months. He was never called as a witness and never charged with any offense.

In a six-to-three decision, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Scalia, held that on the merits, al-Kidd had failed to allege a fourth amendment violation because the subjective motive of government officials was irrelevant to the lawfulness of arrests and detentions. The Court then went on to hold that, assuming arguendo that the fourth amendment had been violated, Ashcroft was nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity. The Court pointed out that “[at] the time of al-Kidd’s arrest, not a single judicial opinion had held pretext could render an objectively reasonable arrest pursuant to a material-witness warrant unconstitutional.” While a district court opinion had suggested that such warrants were illegitimate in “footnoted dictum devoid of supporting citation [a] district judge’s ipse dixit [falls] far short of what is necessary absent controlling authority.” Nor was it sufficient to find clearly established law “lurking in the broad ‘history and purposes of the Fourth Amendment.’ We have repeatedly told courts [not] to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.” In short, “[when] properly applied, [qualified immunity] protects ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ Ashcroft deserves neither [label].”

In a concurring opinion, Justice Kennedy argued that “[the] fact that the Attorney General holds a high office in the Government must inform what law is clearly established for the purposes of this case.” He pointed out that an “official with responsibilities in many jurisdictions may face ambiguous and sometimes inconsistent sources of decisional law.” National office holders should therefore “be given some deference for qualified immunity purposes, at least if they implement policies consistent with the governing law of the jurisdiction where the action is taken.”

Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justices Breyer and Sotomayor, and Justice Sotomayor, joined by Justices Ginsburg and Breyer, filed opinions concurring in the judgment. See also Ziglar v. Abbasi, 582 U.S. ____ (2017) (upholding qualified immunity for officials who allegedly conspired to mistreat undocumented individuals held after the World Trade Center bombings).

c. Damages for claims unrelated to service in office. Compare Nixon v. Fitzgerald with Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681 (1997). Jones differed from Fitzgerald in two respects. First, it arose out of alleged misconduct occurring before the President’s term began and unrelated to his conduct while in office. Second, the suit was brought during the President’s term of office.

Jones alleged that in 1991, while Clinton was governor of Arkansas, he enticed her to a hotel room where he made “abhorrent” sexual advances toward her. She claimed that this conduct violated federal and state law and sought monetary damages. In response, President Clinton did not claim immunity from suit but did argue that the litigation should be delayed until the conclusion of his presidential term. In a unanimous decision, the Supreme Court, per Justice Stevens, rejected this claim. The Court held that Fitzgerald was distinguishable because it had involved official conduct. Such immunity serves the public interest in enabling [officials] to perform their designated functions effectively without fear that a particular decision may give rise to personal liability....But we have never suggested that the President, or any other official, has an immunity that extends beyond the scope of any action taken in an official capacity.

The Court also rejected Clinton’s contention that permitting the suit would risk violation of separation of powers principles:

Respondent is merely asking the courts to exercise their core Article III jurisdiction to decide cases and controversies. Whatever the outcome of this case, there is no possibility that the decision will curtail the scope of the official powers of the Executive Branch. The litigation of questions that relate entirely to the unofficial conduct of the individual who happens to be the President poses no perceptible risk of misallocation of either judicial power or executive power.

President Clinton claimed that defense of civil litigation would impose an unacceptable burden on his time and energy, thereby impairing his effective performance in office. In the Court’s view, however, “if properly managed by the District Court, [it is highly unlikely that defense of the suit would] occupy any substantial amount of petitioner’s time.” Moreover, “[the] fact that a federal court’s exercise of its traditional Article III jurisdiction may significantly burden the time and attention of the Chief Executive is not sufficient to establish a violation of the Constitution.” The Court relied on Youngstown and United States v. Nixon in support of this proposition, pointing out that in both cases sitting presidents were required to respond to judicial process despite the “serious impact” of the litigation on the President’s ability to perform his functions.

The Court also rejected the argument that permitting such litigation would generate a large volume of “politically motivated harassing and frivolous litigation”:

Most frivolous and vexatious litigation is terminated at the pleading stage or on summary judgment, with little if any personal involvement by the defendant. Moreover, the availability of sanctions provides a significant deterrent to litigation directed at the President in his unofficial capacity for purposes of political gain or harassment. History indicates that the likelihood that a significant number of such cases will be filed is remote. Although scheduling problems may arise, there is no reason to assume that the District Courts will be either unable to accommodate the President's needs or unfaithful to the tradition—especially in matters involving national security—of giving “the utmost deference to Presidential responsibilities.”

2. Exclusive presidential authority to determine the scope of the privilege. President Nixon argued that even if the Court could entertain an action against him, the President alone should determine the scope of executive privilege. Does allowing the President to determine the scope of his own power entail an inherent contraction? Wasn't the Court determining the scope of its own power when it upheld the subpoena?

3. The scope of the privilege. Even if the Court should have the final word concerning the scope of the privilege, it might have decided that its scope included the conversations that President Nixon wanted to protect. Did the Court strike the right balance?

Compare United States v. Nixon to Cheney v. United States District Court, 542 U.S. 367 (2004). The case arose out of an effort by two public interest organizations to gain disclosure of the activities of the National Energy Policy Development Group, commonly known as the Energy Policy Task Force. Shortly after assuming office, President George W. Bush established the Task Force and made Vice President Cheney its chair. Plaintiffs relied upon the Federal Advisory Committee Act (FACA), which imposes disclosure requirements on committees and boards established by the President unless the committee is composed wholly of government employees. The President appointed only federal employees to the Task Force, but the plaintiffs alleged that private lobbyists regularly attended meetings and were de facto members.

The trial court permitted plaintiffs to engage in discovery in order to support their theory. Vice President Cheney sought a writ of mandamus in the court of appeals to prevent the discovery, but that court refused to issue the writ. Relying on Nixon, the appellate court held that the executive branch must make particularized claims of executive privilege if it wished to resist disclosure.

In an opinion written by Justice Kennedy, the Supreme Court disapproved this decision and remanded the case to the court of appeals. Justice Kennedy distinguished Nixon on several grounds. In his view,

[the] need for information for use in civil cases, while far from negligible, does not share the urgency or significance of the criminal subpoena requests in Nixon. [Moreover, the] observation in Nixon that production of confidential information would not disrupt the functioning of the Executive Branch cannot be applied in a mechanistic fashion to civil litigation. In the criminal justice system, there are various constraints, albeit imperfect, to filter out insubstantial legal claims. [In] contrast, there are no analogous checks in the civil discovery process here.

Finally, the Court noted that “the narrow subpoena orders in United States v. Nixon stand on an altogether different footing from the overly broad discovery requests approved by the District Court in this case.”

The Court went on to hold that specific invocation of executive privilege was not required in this context:

Executive privilege is an extraordinary assertion of [power]. Once [it] is asserted, coequal branches of the Government are set on a collision course. The Judiciary is forced into the difficult task of balancing the need for information in a judicial proceeding and the Executive’s Article II prerogatives. This inquiry places courts in the awkward position of evaluating the Executive’s claims of confidentiality and autonomy, and pushes to the fore difficult questions of separation of powers and checks and balances.

The Court held that, instead of requiring invocation of the privilege, the lower court should have asked whether permitting the discovery “constituted an unwarranted impairment of another branch in the performance of its constitutional duties.” The Court remanded the case so that the court of appeals could make this determination. Justice Stevens filed a concurring opinion, and Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia, filed an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part. Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justice Souter, dissented.

Note: The Politics of Impeachment

The cases involving Nixon and Clinton each generated a political response that threatened the President’s ability to remain in office. In reviewing the material set out below, consider whether the Court played a constructive role in framing the political issues, or whether the issues might better have been left entirely to the political process.

1. The Nixon resignation. On July 27, 1974, two days after the Supreme Court handed down its decision in Nixon, the House Judiciary Committee adopted an article of impeachment, charging the President with obstruction of justice with respect to the Watergate break-in and other activities. On July 29, it adopted a second article involving abuse of power by misusing executive agencies and violating constitutional rights of the citizenry. On July 30, it adopted a third article, charging the President with willful disobedience of subpoenas issued by the Judiciary Committee. On August 6, twelve days after the Supreme Court decision, President Nixon decided to make the transcript of the tapes available to the public. Three days thereafter, on August 9, he resigned. On August 20, the Judiciary Committee filed its impeachment report with the House, which took no further action.

In light of the ongoing impeachment investigation, did the Nixon decision improperly substitute a legal for a political judgment?

Note in this regard the implications of the Court's observations concerning the justiciability of the suit. If President Nixon had ordered the Attorney General to rescind the regulations governing the special prosecutor and then ordered the prosecutor not to seek production of the tapes, what result would have followed? What reasons might President Nixon have had for not pursuing this course?

2. The Clinton impeachment. After the Supreme Court rejected President Clinton's argument that the Jones suit should be postponed until he left office, the plaintiff commenced pretrial discovery. In deposition testimony, on January 17, 1998, President Clinton denied having a "sexual affair," a "sexual relationship," or "sexual relations" with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky. At the time of his testimony, Clinton was unaware that a day earlier, the Special Division of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit had expanded the jurisdiction of Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr to investigate "whether Monica Lewinsky or others suborned perjury, obstructed justice, intimidated witnesses, or otherwise violated federal law" in conjunction with an affidavit prepared for the Jones litigation. On January 27, 1998, the Office of Independent Counsel opened a grand jury inquiry into the Lewinsky affair. Six months later, Lewinsky entered an immunity agreement with the Independent Counsel. On the next day, President Clinton testified before the grand jury via closed circuit television. Although insisting that his testimony at the Jones deposition was accurate, he acknowledged "inappropriate contact" with Lewinsky.

On September 9, 1998, Independent Counsel Starr, acting pursuant to the Independent Counsel Act, notified the House of Representatives that he had “substantial and credible information [that] may constitute grounds for impeachment.” After hearings marked by rancorous argument and partisan division, the House Judiciary Committee approved four articles of impeachment, alleging that Clinton had perjured himself before the grand jury, that he had obstructed justice by inducing others to lie in order to conceal his affair with Lewinsky, that he had perjured himself in his Jones deposition, and that he had abused his power by providing legalistic answers to questions put to him by the House Judiciary Committee. Three months later, the House approved two of the articles, those alleging perjury before the grand jury and obstruction of justice. On February 12, 1999, the Senate voted by margins of fifty-five to forty-five and fifty to fifty to acquit Clinton of both charges. All of the relevant votes were highly partisan, with Democrats overwhelmingly voting against impeachment and conviction, and Republicans voting overwhelmingly in favor.

In light of these events, reconsider the Court’s conclusion in Jones that “if properly managed by the District Court, it appears to us highly unlikely [that the suit would] occupy any substantial amount of petitioner’s time.” Do subsequent events demonstrate that the burden of defending civil lawsuits inevitably hampers the President in the performance of his duties and that such lawsuits are bound to be politicized, or instead that President Clinton’s response to this lawsuit led to an appropriate inquiry into his fitness for office and that the inquiry did no serious harm to the country?

Note: The “Law” of Impeachment

Article II, section 4 of the Constitution provides that “[the] President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.” Article I, section 2 provides that “The House of Representatives shall [have] the sole Power of Impeachment.” Article I, section 3 provides as follows:

The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to remove from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law.

In light of these provisions, consider the following legal issues raised by Nixon and Jones.

1. “High Crimes and Misdemeanors.” What kinds of offenses are encompassed by the phrase “high Crimes and Misdemeanors”? For example, was President Clinton’s allegedly false testimony in a civil lawsuit unrelated to his official duties covered? Was President Nixon’s alleged malfeasance an impeachable offense even if it did not violate the criminal law?

Early proposals at the Constitutional Convention limited the grounds for impeachment to neglect of duty or misuse of official power. At a later point, it was proposed that the grounds for impeachment of the President be limited to “treason or bribery.” George Mason opposed this limitation and moved to add “maladministration” to the list. James Madison responded that “[so] vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate.” Mason thereupon withdrew his motion, and substituted “bribery and other high crimes or misdemeanors against the State.” This motion carried. At a later point, the Convention agreed to replace the word “State” with the words “United States.” The Committee of Style and Arrangement thereupon eliminated the words “against the United States,” apparently because it thought the phrase redundant. In light of this history consider the following views:

a. Dwight, Trial by Impeachment, 6 Am. L. Reg. (N.S.) 257, 264 (1867):

“The decided weight of authority is, that no impeachment will lie except for a true crime [or] a breach of the common or statute law, which [would] be the subject of indictment.”

b. R. Berger, Impeachment 62–63, 67, 90 (1973):

“[High] crimes and misdemeanors” appear to be words of art confined to impeachments, without roots in the ordinary criminal law and which, so far as I could discover, had no relation to whether an indictment would lie in the particular circumstances....[But the framers intended] to preclude resort to impeachment of the President for petty misconduct.

c. Testimony of Professor Laurence Tribe before the Subcommittee on the Constitution of the House Judiciary Committee investigating the impeachment of President Clinton:

What distinguishes certain offenses as “high Crimes and Misdemeanors” must be not the fact that serious crimes are involved but the fact that those offenses are similar [to] treason and bribery. But that in turn means that [high] crimes and misdemeanors [must] refer to major offenses against our very system of government, or serious abuses of the governmental power with which a public official has been entrusted [or] grave wrongs in pursuit of governmental [power].

...

[It] apparently did not occur to the framers or ratifiers that some sufficiently monstrous but purely private crimes against individuals might require impeachment and removal from office in order to safeguard the government and the people it serves.

d. Testimony of Professor Richard Parker before the same body:

[It] is not clear why substantial presidential misconduct should be presumed non-impeachable just because it “arose from” a realm of “private” life....

[In] terms of constitutional principle, [this claim makes] no sense. The reason is that the phrase, “other high Crimes and Misdemeanors,” must be understood in light of “Bribery,” one of its referents. Acts of bribery—as is well known—tend to arise from the “private” lives of actors. The fact that bribery may arise from private greed (or need) does not presumptively immunize it from impeachment. Why, then, should public acts be presumptively immunized solely on the ground that they arose from private lust?

e. Remarks of then-Congressman Gerald Ford, proposing the impeachment of Justice William O. Douglas in a speech on the House floor in 1970:

What, then, is an impeachable offense? The only honest answer is that an impeachable offense is whatever a majority of the House of Representatives considers it to be at a given moment in history; conviction results from whatever offense or offenses two-thirds of the other body considers to be sufficiently serious to require removal of the accused from office.

2. Punishment other than impeachment. Can a sitting President be indicted for criminal offenses? Although article II makes clear that criminal penalties do not attach to a judgment of impeachment and that such a judgment does not bar subsequent prosecution, the Constitution is silent as to whether such a prosecution can be undertaken while the President is in office. Consider what, if any, bearing Jones has on this question. Independent Counsel serving during the Nixon and Clinton administrations actively considered indicting the President, but in both cases they rejected this course (although President Nixon was named as an unindicted coconspirator by the Watergate grand jury).

3. Law versus politics. During the latter stages of the Watergate episode, President Nixon's popularity approached historic lows. In contrast, throughout the impeachment proceedings against President Clinton, his personal popularity was extraordinarily high, and large majorities of those polled opposed impeachment. Should a conscientious member of Congress take these facts into account? Should it matter to such a member whether the impeachment resolutions achieved bipartisan support? Whether the President is, or is perceived to be, doing a good job? Are questions about presidential impeachment appropriately resolved as a matter of constitutional principle, as a matter of ordinary politics, or as some mixture of the two?

Consider in this regard Klarman, Constitutional Fetishism and the Clinton Impeachment Debate, 85 Va. L. Rev. 631, 631, 656–657 (1999):

One striking feature of the impeachment debate was the certitude with which politicians and academics espoused a wide variety of constitutional interpretations, notwithstanding the thinness of the constitutional law governing impeachment. Extraordinary claims were made on both sides of the aisle about what the United States Constitution requires and prohibits regarding various impeachment issues about which the traditional sources of constitutional law—text, original intent, and precedent—rather plainly have little to say....

In the face of legal indeterminacy, it seems natural that political factors will determine constitutional interpretations....

For comprehensive discussions of the law of impeachment, see M. Gerhardt, The Federal Impeachment Process: A Constitutional and Historic Analysis (1996); R. Berger, Impeachment: The Constitutional Problems (1973). For general discussions of the legal issues raised by the Clinton impeachment, compare Sunstein, Impeaching the President, 147 U. Pa. L. Rev. 279 (1998) (concluding that impeachment was unconstitutional), with R. Posner, The Trial and Impeachment of William Jefferson Clinton (1999) (concluding that impeachment was constitutionally permissible).

2. Legislative Authority

Much of the debate about legislative authority centers around disagreement concerning “formal,” as opposed to “functional,” theories of constitutional interpretation. See generally Strauss, Formal and Functional Approaches to Separation-of-Powers Questions: A Foolish Inconsistency?, 72 Cornell L. Rev.

488 (1972). Formalists believe that separation of powers doctrine is governed by relatively clear rules that demarcate separate spheres of governmental authority. In contrast, functionalists believe in a more fluid approach that prohibits “aggrandizement of power” or “undue mingling of functions,” but that allows some overlap and is more receptive to changing the boundaries so as to deal with changing situations.

The underlying dispute has both a historical and an interpretive dimension. Some formalists defend their position on originalist grounds; see, e.g., Calabresi and Prakash, The President’s Power to Execute the Law, 104 Yale L.J. 541 (1994). Some functionalists have used originalism to criticize formalism; see, e.g., Casper, An Essay on Separation of Powers: Some Early Versions and Practices, 30 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 211 (1989). Other functionalists concede that formalism may be defensible on originalist grounds but defend functionalist decisions as the best way to make sense of the constitutional structure under modern circumstances, in which the President’s power threatens to undermine the constitutional structure. See, e.g., Justice White’s dissenting opinions in INS v. Chadha and Bowsher v. Synar, page 438 and page 448, infra, respectively; Greene, Checks and Balances in an Era of Presidential Lawmaking, 61 U. Chi. L. Rev. 123 (1994). Further, some defenders of formalism have argued that the Court has a good reason to proceed in a formalist way so as to ensure against various problems presented by modern legislative initiatives, even if formalism is not defensible historically. See Lessig and Sunstein, The President and the Administration, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 1 (1994). See also Manning, Separation of Powers as Ordinary Interpretation, 124 Harv. L. Rev. 1939 (2011) (arguing that “the Constitution adopts no freestanding principle of separation of powers” but instead contains “many particular decisions about how to allocate and condition the exercise of federal power”).

As you read the material that follows, consider whether a formalist approach or a functionalist approach makes the best sense of the cases. For an argument that a combination of the two approaches best protects constitutional values, see Huq & Michaels, The Cycles of Separation of Powers Jurisprudence, 126 Yale L.J. 346, 353 (2016).

Note: The Nondelegation Doctrine and “Quasi-Constitutional” Statutes

1. Introduction. Conventionally, Congress affects public policy by passing statutes that the executive is bound to administer. Justice Black’s opinion for the Court in Youngstown, for example, reflects the view that only Congress can pass laws.

But the conventional understanding—that the legislature is the exclusive lawmaker—no longer reflects reality. In every industrialized nation, administrative agencies, which are generally part of the executive branch, have been granted considerable lawmaking power. Congress has given such agencies regulatory authority, but often it offers them little guidance for the task. It has, for example, told agencies to regulate “unreasonable risks” to consumers and to promote “the public interest” in broadcasting regulation. The process of giving content to these vague standards—a process undertaken by the executive—can only be understood as one of lawmaking.

Under current doctrine, there are very few, if any, constitutional restraints on Congress’s power to delegate. But this was not always the case. Early on the Court made clear that article I, by vesting legislative power in Congress, imposed constraints on the national legislature’s authority to delegate that power to others. For example, the Court stated that the applicable test was whether Congress has laid “down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to take action is directed to conform.” J. W. Hampton, Jr. & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394, 409 (1928).

2. Panama Refining and Schechter. The issues raised by the nondelegation doctrine came to a head in two cases involving legislation designed to ease the Depression during President Roosevelt’s famous first “one hundred days.” The National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933 (NIRA) attempted to permit representatives of labor and management in each industry to meet and to design codes of “fair competition.” The goal was to help stabilize wages and prices in order to stop the precipitous decline of both, thus restoring the confidence of industry and stabilizing the economy.

The act’s declaration of policy referred to Congress’s desire to promote cooperative action among trade groups, to maintain united action on the part of management and labor, to eliminate unfair competitive practices, to increase purchasing power and thus consumption of industrial and agricultural products, and to avoid undue restriction of production (except as may be temporarily required). The President was supposed to approve such codes if he made several findings, including (a) that there were “no inequitable restrictions on admission to membership” and (b) that the codes were not designed to promote monopoly or to oppress small enterprises.

In the first case decided under the NIRA, Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388 (1935), the Court invalidated a provision of the NIRA authorizing the President to prohibit, as part of a petroleum code, the transportation in interstate commerce of oil produced in violation of state-imposed production quotas. The Court emphasized that the statute did not supply standards that would tell the President when to exercise that power. In the Court's view, the NIRA authorized the President to prohibit transportation of "hot oil" whenever he chose.

The second case, A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495 (1935), involved the "live poultry code," which contained maximum hour and minimum wage provisions and prohibited various practices said to be "unfair methods of competition." The code identified such practices in provisions that, among other things, (a) barred the sale of unfit chickens and (b) stated that buyers could not be allowed to select particular chickens, but instead must "accept the run of any half coop, coop, or coops." Schechter Poultry was prosecuted for violating both of these provisions. It sought to invalidate the statute authorizing creation of the code on the ground that it was an impermissible delegation of legislative authority. The Court, unanimous on the point, said:

What is meant by "fair competition" as the term is used in the Act?...

The Government urges that the codes will "consist of rules of competition deemed fair for each industry by representative members of that industry—by the persons most vitally concerned and most familiar with its problems." [But] would it be seriously contended that Congress could delegate its legislative authority to trade or industrial associations or groups so as to empower them to enact the laws they deem to be wise and beneficent for the rehabilitation and expansion of their trade or industries? Could trade or industrial associations or groups be constituted legislative bodies for that purpose because such associations or groups are familiar with the problem of their enterprises? [Such] a delegation of legislative power is unknown to our law and is utterly inconsistent with the constitutional prerogatives and duties of Congress.

The Court also held that the NIRA was unconstitutional because it exceeded Congress's power under the commerce clause. This portion of the Court's opinion is discussed in Chapter 2 supra.

3. The purported demise of the nondelegation doctrine. The nondelegation doctrine has all but disappeared as a constraint on the delegation of authority to administrative agencies. Indeed, Panama Refining and Schechter are the only two decisions in the nation's history that have invalidated federal statutes on nondelegation grounds. Statutes authorizing regulation of "unreasonable risks" or administrative action "in the public interest" appear immune from attack. See, for an example of the modern approach, Amalgamated Meat Cutters v. Connally, 337 F. Supp. 737 (D.D.C. 1971). In that case, the court upheld a statute authorizing the President to impose wage and price controls on the ground that implicit standards of “broad fairness and avoidance of gross inequity” were sufficient. The court referred in particular to the temporary character of the delegation, to the fact that the President could not discriminate unreasonably among industries, and to an implicit requirement that the President come up with standards to limit his own discretion. See also Whitman v. American Truckers Association, Inc., 531 U.S. 457 (2001) (rejecting a nondelegation attack on Clean Air Act); Loving v. United States, 517 U.S. 748 (1996) (rejecting a nondelegation challenge to presidential regulations defining the aggravating and mitigating circumstances determining whether a court martial can impose the death penalty); Touby v. United States, 500 U.S. 160 (1991) (rejecting a nondelegation challenge to certain aspects of the Controlled Substances Act).

4. Nondelegation redux? Note, however, that Schechter itself has never been formally overruled. In recent years, some academic commentary, with some support from the Court, has suggested that a revival of the nondelegation doctrine may be desirable. Consider, for example, the following:

a. Department of Transportation v. Association of American Railroads, 135 S. Ct. 1225 (2015) (Thomas, J., concurring):

We have held that the Constitution categorically forbids Congress to delegate its legislative power to any other body, but it has become increasingly clear to me that the test we have applied to distinguish legislative from executive power largely abdicates our duty to enforce that prohibition. Implicitly recognizing that the power to fashion legally binding rules is legislative, we have nevertheless classified rulemaking as executive (or judicial) power when the authorizing statute sets out “an intelligible principle” to guide the rulemaker’s discretion. Although the Court may never have intended the boundless standard the “intelligible principle” test has become, it is evident that it does not adequately reinforce the Constitution’s allocation of legislative power. I would return to the original understanding of the federal legislative power and require that the Federal Government create generally applicable rules of private conduct only through the constitutionally prescribed legislative process.

b. D. Schoenbrod, Power without Responsibility 10, 21 (1993):

[Delegation] allows legislators to claim credit for benefits which a regulatory statute promises yet escape the blame for the burdens it will impose, because they do not issue the laws needed to achieve those benefits. The public inevitably must suffer regulatory burdens to realize regulatory benefits, but the laws will come from an agency that legislators can then criticize for imposing excessive burdens on their constituents....

[The Supreme Court] has left the decision of whether to delegate largely up to Congress and the president, in part out of a belief that legislators' concern for their own power will keep Congress from delegating too much. This belief is simplistic. Legislators enhance their power by delegating: they retain the ability to influence events by pressuring agencies, while they shed responsibility for the exercise of power by avoiding public votes on hard choices.

See also Lawson, Delegation and Original Meaning, 88 Va. L. Rev. 327 (2002). Compare Posner and Vermeule, Interring the Nondelegation Doctrine, 69 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1721, 1722–1723 (2002) (arguing that the nondelegation rule “lacks any foundation in constitutional text and structure, in standard originalist sources, or in sound economic and political theory”).

c. On rare occasions, the doctrine has been invoked as an aid to statutory construction: The fear of a broad delegation may provide a reason to construe administrative authority narrowly. See Industrial Union Department v. American Petroleum Institute, 448 U.S. 607 (1980) (plurality opinion) (narrowing authority of OSHA to regulate toxic substances in the workplace); National Cable Television Association v. United States, 415 U.S. 336 (1974) (narrowly construing fee-setting authority of federal agencies). See also Reynolds v. United States, 565 U.S. 432 (2012) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (arguing that a statute should be read so as to avoid an interpretation that “[left] it to the Attorney General to decide—with no statutory standard whatever governing his discretion—whether a criminal statute will or will not apply to certain individuals. That seems to me sailing close to the wind with regard to the principle that legislative powers are nondelegable.”)

For an argument in favor of “nondelegation canons” pursuant to which courts interpret statutes so as to bar delegations in certain, specified areas in the absence of a clear statement from Congress, see Sunstein, Nondelegation Canons, 67 U. Chi. L. Rev. 315 (2000). But compare Whitman v. American Trucking Association, Inc., supra:

We have never suggested that an agency can cure an unlawful delegation of legislative power by adopting in its discretion a limiting construction of the statute. [The] idea that an agency can cure an unconstitutionally standardless delegation of power by declining to exercise some of that power seems to us internally contradictory. The very choice of which portion of the power to exercise [would] itself be an exercise of the forbidden legislative authority.

d. Consider the implications of Clinton v. City of New York, 524 U.S. 417 (1998). In a six-to-three decision, the Court, per Justice Stevens, invalidated the “Line Item Veto Act,” which authorized the President to “cancel in whole” any items of new spending or any “limited tax benefit.” A so-called lock-box provision required that savings resulting from cancelled items be used to reduce the budget deficit. In identifying items for cancellation, the President was directed to consider the legislative history, purposes, and other relevant information about the cancelled items. In addition, before cancelling an item, the statute required the President to find that the cancellation will reduce the budget deficit, not impair essential government functions, and not harm the national interest.

Writing for the Court, Justice Stevens reasoned that the statute authorized the President to amend previously enacted legislation by repealing a portion of it, and that there was “no provision in the Constitution that authorizes the President to enact, to amend, or to repeal statutes.” Toward the end of its opinion, the Court noted the following:

We have been favored with extensive debate about the scope of Congress’ power to delegate law-making authority, or its functional equivalent, to the President. The excellent briefs filed by the parties and their amici curiae have provided us with valuable historical information that illuminates the delegation issue but does not really bear on the narrow issue that is dispositive of these cases. Thus, because we conclude that the Act’s cancellation provisions violate Article I, §7, of the Constitution [specifying how a bill becomes a law], we find it unnecessary to consider the District Court’s alternative holding that the Act “impermissibly disrupts the balance of powers among the three branches of government.”

Was the line item veto functionally distinguishable from a delegation of law-making authority to the President? Despite the Court’s disclaimer, how can the result in the case be understood absent a prohibition on such delegations? Consider in this connection Justice Scalia’s dissenting opinion:

[Had] the Line Item Veto Act authorized the President to “decline to spend” any item of spending contained in the Balanced Budget Act of 1997, there is not the slightest doubt that authorization would have been constitutional. What the Line Item Veto Act does instead—authorizing the President to “cancel” an item of spending—is technically different. But the technical difference does not relate to the technicalities of the Presentment Clause, which have been fully complied with; and the doctrine of unconstitutional delegation, which is at issue here, is preeminently not a doctrine of technicalities. The title of the Line Item Veto Act [has] succeeded in faking out the Supreme Court.

5. Structural statutes. If the nondelegation doctrine is not revived, and if it proves impossible for Congress to set forth clear standards to govern decisions by administrative agencies, are there alternative means by which Congress might establish its original position as lawmaker?

Congress has sporadically attempted to reassert its authority by enacting structural or “quasi-constitutional” statutes. Although consisting of ordinary legislation, these measures attempt to structure future legislative and executive decisions in much the way that a constitution would. For example, Congress has attempted to control administrative agencies by creating a legislative veto, which would allow one or both Houses of Congress to invalidate decisions made by administrative agencies. It has structured prosecutorial decisions when wrongdoing is alleged against high executive officials by mandating the appointment of an Independent Counsel. It has attempted to control future spending decisions by enacting various balanced budget provisions, by structuring executive decisions regarding spending of appropriated funds, and by limiting its own ability to foist unfunded mandates on the states. And it has attempted to control the President’s use of the armed forces by enacting a War Powers Resolution.

How should the Supreme Court respond to these experiments in governance? On one view, structural statutes unconstitutionally expand Congress’s powers. Advocates of this view insist that the framers bound us to a particular structure of government, and that Congress cannot bind us to a new structure without amending the Constitution. On the opposing view, structural statutes do no more than reestablish Congress’s original powers in a modern environment that the framers could not have imagined. Advocates of this view maintain that structural statutes preserve the original balance between Congress and the President in a regulatory context where broad delegations to the executive are a fact of life. As you read the cases that follow, consider which view is more persuasive.

INS v. Chadha

462 U.S. 919 (1983)

CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

Chadha is an East Indian who was born in Kenya and holds a British passport. He was lawfully admitted to the United States in 1966 on a nonimmigrant student visa. His visa expired on June 30, 1972. On October 11, 1973, the District Director of the Immigration and Naturalization Service ordered Chadha to show cause why he should not be deported for having “remained in the United States for a longer time than permitted.” [After a hearing, an immigration judge ordered] that Chadha’s deportation be suspended. The immigration judge found that Chadha met the requirements of [the statute]: he had resided continuously in the United States for over seven years, was of good moral character, and would suffer “extreme hardship” if deported.

Pursuant to [the statute the] immigration judge suspended Chadha’s deportation and a report of the suspension was transmitted to Congress.

Once the Attorney General’s recommendation for suspension of Chadha’s deportation was conveyed to Congress, Congress had the power under [the statute to] veto the Attorney General’s determination that Chadha should not be deported....

On December 12, 1975, Representative Eilberg, Chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, introduced a resolution opposing “the granting of permanent residence in the United States to [six] aliens,” including Chadha. [The] resolution was passed without debate or recorded vote. Since the House action was pursuant to [the statute] the resolution was not treated as an Article I legislative act; it was not submitted to the Senate or presented to the President for his action.

After the House veto of the Attorney General’s decision to allow Chadha to remain in the United States, the immigration judge reopened the deportation proceedings and [Chadha] was ordered deported pursuant to the House action....

We turn now to the question whether action of one House of Congress under [the statute] violates strictures of the Constitution. [The] fact that a given law or procedure is efficient, convenient, and useful in facilitating functions of the government, standing alone, will not save it if it is contrary to the Constitution. Convenience and efficiency are not the primary objectives—or the hallmarks—of democratic government and our inquiry is sharpened rather than blunted by the fact that Congressional veto provisions are appearing with increasing frequency in statutes which delegate authority to executive and independent agencies:

Since 1932, when the first veto provision was enacted into law, 295 congressional veto-type procedures have been inserted in 196 different [statutes]. Abourezk, The Congressional Veto: A contemporary Response to Executive Encroachment on Legislative Prerogatives, 52 Ind. L. Rev. 323,324 (1977)....

Explicit and unambiguous provisions of the Constitution prescribe and define the respective functions of the Congress and of the Executive in the legislative process. [Article] I provides:

All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives.

Art. I, §1. (Emphasis added).

Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it becomes a Law, be presented to the President of the United States;...

Art. I, §7, cl. 2. (Emphasis added).

Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.

Art. I, §7, cl. 3. (Emphasis added).

These provisions of Art. I are integral parts of the constitutional design for the separation of powers....

[When] the Executive acts, it presumptively acts in an executive or administrative capacity as defined in Art. II. And when, as here, one House of Congress purports to act, it is presumptively acting within its assigned sphere. Beginning with this presumption, we must nevertheless establish that the challenged action under [the statute] is of the kind to which the procedural requirements of Art. I, §7 apply. Not every action taken by either House is subject to the bicameralism and presentment requirements of Art. I. [Whether] actions taken by either House are, in law and fact, an exercise of legislative power depends not on their form but upon “whether they contain matter which is properly to be regarded as legislative in its character and effect.”...

Examination of the action taken here by one House [reveals] that it was essentially legislative in purpose and effect. In purporting to exercise power defined in Art. I, §8, cl. 4 to “establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization,” the House took action that had the purpose and effect of altering the legal rights, duties and relations of persons, including the Attorney General, Executive Branch officials and Chadha, all outside the legislative branch. [The] one-House veto operated in this case to overrule the Attorney General and mandate Chadha's deportation; absent the House action, Chadha would remain in the United States. Congress has acted and its action has altered Chadha's status.

The legislative character of the one-House veto in this case is confirmed by the character of the Congressional action it supplants. Neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate contends that, absent the veto provision, [either] of them, or both of them acting together, could effectively require the Attorney General to deport an alien once the Attorney General, in the exercise of legislatively delegated authority, had determined the alien should remain in the United States. Without the challenged provision, [this] could have been achieved, if at all, only by legislation requiring deportation....

The nature of the decision implemented by the one-House veto in this case further manifests its legislative character. After long experience with the clumsy, time consuming private bill procedure, Congress made a deliberate choice to delegate to the Executive Branch, [the] authority to allow deportable aliens to remain in this country in certain specified circumstances. It is not disputed that this choice to delegate authority is precisely the kind of decision that can be implemented only in accordance with the procedures set out in Art. I. Disagreement with the Attorney General's decision on Chadha's deportation—that is, Congress' decision to deport Chadha—no less than Congress' original choice to delegate to the Attorney General the authority to make that decision, involves determinations of policy that Congress can implement in only one way, bicameral passage followed by presentment to the President. Congress must abide by its delegation of authority until that delegation is legislatively altered or revoked.

Finally, we see that when the Framers intended to authorize either House of Congress to act alone and outside of its prescribed bicameral legislative role, they narrowly and precisely defined the procedure for such action. There are but four provisions in the Constitution, explicit and unambiguous, by which one House may act alone with the unreviewable force of law, not subject to the President's veto.

[The Court referred to the House's power to initiate impeachments, the Senate's power to conduct trials following impeachment, the Senate's power over presidential appointments, and the Senate's power to ratify treaties.]

[These provisions give] further support for the conclusion that Congressional authority is not to be implied....

The choices we discern as having been made in the Constitutional Convention impose burdens on governmental processes that often seem clumsy, inefficient, even unworkable, but those hard choices were consciously made by men who had lived under a form of government that permitted arbitrary governmental acts to go unchecked. There is no support in the Constitution or decisions of this Court for the proposition that the cumbersomeness and delays often encountered in complying with explicit Constitutional standards may be avoided, either by the Congress or by the President. See [Youngstown]. With all the obvious flaws of delay, untidiness, and potential for abuse, we have not yet found a better way to preserve freedom than by making the exercise of power subject to the carefully crafted restraints spelled out in the Constitution.

We hold that the Congressional veto provision [is unconstitutional]. Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

JUSTICE POWELL, concurring in the judgment....

On its face, the House's action appears clearly adjudicatory. The House did not enact a general rule; rather it made its own determination that six specific persons did not comply with certain statutory criteria. It thus undertook the type of decision that traditionally has been left to other branches.

The impropriety of the House's assumption of this function is confirmed by the fact that its action raises the very danger the Framers sought to avoid—the exercise of unchecked power. In deciding whether Chadha deserves to be deported, Congress is not subject to any internal constraints that prevent it from arbitrarily depriving him of the right to remain in this country. Unlike the judiciary or an administrative agency, Congress is not bound by established substantive rules. Nor is it subject to the procedural safeguards, such as the right to counsel and a hearing before an impartial tribunal, that are present when a court or an agency adjudicates individual rights. The only effective constraint on Congress' power is political, but Congress is most accountable politically when it prescribes rules of general applicability. When it decides rights of specific persons, those rights are subject to "the tyranny of a shifting majority."

[In] my view, when Congress undertook to apply its rules to Chadha, it exceeded the scope of its constitutionally prescribed authority. I would not reach the broader question whether legislative vetoes are invalid under the Presentment Clauses.

JUSTICE WHITE, dissenting....

Today the Court not only invalidates §244(c)(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, but also sounds the death knell for nearly 200 other statutory provisions in which Congress has reserved a "legislative veto." For this reason, the Court's decision is of surpassing importance. And it is for this reason that the Court would have been well-advised to decide the case, if possible, on the narrower grounds of separation of powers, leaving for full consideration the constitutionality of other congressional review statutes operating on such varied matters as war powers and agency rulemaking, some of which concern the independent regulatory agencies.

The prominence of the legislative veto mechanism in our contemporary political system and its importance to Congress can hardly be overstated. It has become a central means by which Congress secures the accountability of executive and independent agencies. Without the legislative veto, Congress is faced with a Hobson's choice: either to refrain from delegating the necessary authority, leaving itself with a hopeless task of writing laws with the requisite specificity to cover endless special circumstances across the entire policy landscape, or in the alternative, to abdicate its lawmaking function to the executive branch and independent agencies. To choose the former leaves major national problems unresolved; to opt for the latter risks unaccountable policymaking by those not elected to fill that role....

[Justice White summarized the history of the legislative veto, noting that it was a response to "the sprawling government structure" created after the Depression; that it "balanced delegations of statutory authority in new areas"; and that it played an important role in disputes in the 1970s over impoundment, war, and national emergency powers.]

Even this brief review suffices to demonstrate that the legislative veto [is an] important if not indispensable political invention that allows the President and Congress to resolve major constitutional and policy differences, assures the accountability of independent regulatory agencies, and preserves Congress' control over lawmaking....

The history of the legislative veto also makes clear that it has not been a sword with which Congress has struck out to aggrandize itself at the expense of the other branches—the concerns of Madison and Hamilton. Rather, the veto has been a means of defense, a reservation of ultimate authority necessary if Congress is to fulfill its designated role under Article I as the nation's lawmaker. While the President has often objected to particular legislative vetoes, generally those left in the hands of congressional committees, the Executive has more often agreed to legislative review as the price for a broad delegation of authority. To be sure, the President may have preferred unrestricted power, but that could be precisely why Congress thought it essential to retain a check on the exercise of delegated authority....

[The] Constitution does not directly authorize or prohibit the legislative veto.

Thus, our task should be to determine whether the legislative veto is consistent with the purposes of Art. I and the principles of Separation of Powers. [We] should not find the lack of a specific constitutional authorization for the legislative veto surprising, and I would not infer disapproval of the mechanism from its absence. From the summer of 1787 to the present the government of the United States has become an endeavor far beyond the contemplation of the Framers. Only within the last half century has the complexity and size of the Federal Government's responsibilities grown so greatly that the Congress must rely on the legislative veto as the most effective if not the only means to insure their role as the nation's lawmakers. But the wisdom of the Framers was to anticipate that the nation would grow and new problems of governance would require different solutions. Accordingly, our Federal Government was intentionally chartered with the flexibility to respond to contemporary needs without losing sight of fundamental democratic principles....

[The presentment and bicameralism requirements do] not [answer] the constitutional question before us. The power to exercise a legislative veto is not the power to write new law without bicameral approval or presidential consideration. The veto must be authorized by statute and may only negative what an Executive department or independent agency has proposed. On its face, the legislative veto no more allows one House of Congress to make law than does the presidential veto confer such power upon the President. Accordingly, the Court properly recognizes that it "must establish that the challenged action [is] of the kind to which the procedural requirements of Art. I, §7 apply."...

The terms of the Presentment Clauses suggest only that bills and their equivalent are subject to the requirements of bicameral passage and presentment to the President.

Although the Clause does not specify the actions for which the concurrence of both Houses is "necessary," the proceedings at the Philadelphia Convention suggest its purpose was to prevent Congress from circumventing the presentation requirement in the making of new legislation....

When the Convention did turn its attention to the scope of Congress' law-making power, the Framers were expansive. The Necessary and Proper Clause, Art. I, §18, cl. 18, vests Congress with the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers [the enumerated powers of §8], and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof." It is long-settled that Congress may "exercise its best judgment in the selection of measures, to carry into execution the constitutional powers of the government," and "avail itself of experience, to exercise its reason, and to accommodate its legislation to circumstances.” [McCulloch.]

The Court heeded this counsel in approving the modern administrative state. The Court’s holding today that all legislative type action must be enacted through the lawmaking process ignores that legislative authority is routinely delegated to the Executive Branch, to the independent regulatory agencies, and to private individuals and groups....

This Court’s decisions sanctioning such delegations make clear that Article I does not require all action with the effect of legislation to be passed as a law....

If Congress may delegate lawmaking power to independent and executive agencies, it is most difficult to understand Article I as forbidding Congress from also reserving a check on Legislative power for itself....

The Court also takes no account of perhaps the most relevant consideration: However resolutions of disapproval under [the statute] are formally characterized, in reality, a departure from the status quo occurs only upon the concurrence of opinion among the House, Senate, and President. Reservations of legislative authority to be exercised by Congress should be upheld if the exercise of such reserved authority is consistent with the distribution of and limits upon legislative power that Article I provides....

[Justice White argued that the veto “did not alter the division of actual authority between Congress and the executive,” since a change in the alien’s legal status could occur only with the concurrence of the President and both Houses. Thus, the purposes of the presentment and bicameralism requirements were satisfied.]...

[The Court’s decision] reflects a profoundly different conception of the Constitution than that held by the Courts which sanctioned the modern administrative state. Today’s decision strikes down in one fell swoop provisions in more laws enacted by Congress than the Court has cumulatively invalidated in its history. I fear it will now be more difficult “to insure that the fundamental policy decisions in our society will be made not by an appointed official but by the body immediately responsible to the people,” Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 625 (1963) (Harlan, J., dissenting). I must dissent.

[Justice Rehnquist dissented on the ground that the legislative veto provision was not severable.]

Note: The Legislative Veto

1. Chadha in context: legislative control of the bureaucracy. The legislative veto is one of a number of means by which Congress has attempted to control administrative agencies to which Congress has delegated substantial discretionary authority. For example, congressional committees or subcommittees might hold oversight hearings, in which they call executive officials before them and question the officials about past and future conduct. Such hearings may produce considerable publicity and lead to pressure for changes in executive policy. A more formal mechanism is the appropriations rider—an attachment to an authorization of expenditure of federal funds that prohibits the agency from engaging in certain courses of conduct. Similarly, Congress may decrease or increase an agency’s budget, in the annual appropriations process, in order to express its views on the mission of the agency and on whether more or less enforcement is desirable. Alternatively, Congress may enact “sunset” legislation, providing that agency authority will terminate after a certain period unless Congress reenacts the substantive statute. Of course, Congress may also enact a measure repealing the agency’s authority or rewrite the statute so as to limit authority. In light of all these clearly constitutional alternatives to the legislative veto mechanism, does the Court’s decision accomplish anything of significance? Consider the view that easy circumvention is a necessary cost of respect for formal rules. The very rigidity that formalism prizes means that the rules lack the suppleness necessary to respond to evasive maneuvers. Yet without this rigidity, constitutional commands are reduced to nothing more than shifting and controversial policy judgments that cannot be separated from appropriately contestable views about the merits of political disputes.

Consider the Congressional Review Act (CRA), enacted as section 251 of the Contract with America Advancement Act, P.L. 104-121 (1996). The CRA requires agencies to notify Congress upon promulgation of new rules. Congress is then empowered to use expedited procedures to pass a joint resolution overruling the regulation if it does so within sixty legislative days. If it does so, the agency may not reissue the rule unless specifically authorized by statute enacted after the date of the joint resolution. Prior to 2017, the CRA was successfully invoked only once, but after President Trump assumed office, Congress used the procedure fourteen times to invalidate Obama-era rules.

Compare the Regulations from the Executive in Need of Scrutiny Act (the REINS Act), passed by the House of Representatives in 2017, which provides that a regulation with an annual effect on the economy of $100 million or more could not take effect without congressional approval. The Senate has not passed the Act. If it were enacted how would it differ from the CRA? Would it be constitutional? Compare Statement of Rep. John Conyers, Jr., Ranking Member, H. Comm. on the Judiciary, REINS Act—Promoting Jobs and Expanding Freedom by Reducing Needless Regulations: Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Courts, Commercial & Admin. Law of the H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 112th Cong. 8 (2011) (arguing that the Act would violate Chadha because if an agency promulgated a rule, either House of Congress acting alone could block it by not passing a resolution of approval), with Siegel, The REINS Act and the Struggle to Control Agency Rulemaking, 16 N.Y.U. J. Legis. & Pub. Pol'y 131, 185 (2013) (arguing that the Act is “a bad idea” because Congress lacks the time and expertise to decide these questions but that it is “perfectly constitutional” because it “merely reclaim[s] the power that Congress has ceded over time”).

2. The reach of Chadha. Should the Chadha decision apply to all legislative vetoes? The case itself involved, as Justice Powell emphasized, an “adjudicatory” proceeding involving a single person. But in Process Gas Consumers Group v. Consumers Energy Council of America, 463 U.S. 1216 (1983), the Court summarily affirmed, on the authority of Chadha, a decision invalidating a legislative veto as applied to certain Federal Energy Regulatory Commission regulations of natural gas pricing. See also United States Senate v. FTC, 463 U.S. 1216 (1983) (summarily affirming decision invalidating legislative veto as applied to rulemaking by the FTC). But see Fisher, CRS Report for Congress, Legislative Vetoes after Chadha (2005) (concluding that “more than 400 new legislative vetoes (usually of the committee variety) have been enacted since Chadha. In addition, legislative vetoes of an informal and nonstatutory nature continue to affect executive-legislative relations. Practice in this area has been determined more by pragmatic agreements hammered out between the elected branches than by doctrines fashioned and announced by the Supreme Court.”).

Note: Where Do Administrative Agencies “Fit” in the Separation of Powers Scheme?

1. Introduction. Article II vests the executive power in the President, not in subordinate officials. This decision was based on a rejection of the notion of a “plural executive.” See The Federalist No. 70; E. Corwin, The President—Office and Powers 3–30 (1957).

But the Constitution does not explicitly resolve the question whether Congress may immunize subordinate officials from presidential control. Suppose, for example, Congress provides that the Environmental Protection Agency, or the Civil Rights Commission, should do its work free from interference by the President. Would such a statute be constitutional under the necessary and proper clause? Would such a statute be inconsistent with the framers’ decision to create a unitary executive and to vest all of the executive power in one person—the President? Compare Calabresi and Rhodes, The Structural Constitution: Unitary Executive, Plural Judiciary, 105 Harv. L. Rev. 1153 (1992), and Calabresi and Prakash, The President's Power to Execute the Law, 104 Yale L.J. 541 (1994), with Lessig and Sunstein, The President and the Administration, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 1 (1994), and Froomkin, The Imperial Presidency's New Vestments, 88 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1346 (1994). See generally Strauss, The Place of Agencies in Government: Separation of Powers and the Fourth Branch, 84 Colum. L. Rev. 452 (1984). The question is important, especially in an era in which lawmaking authority has been concentrated in executive officials.

2. Myers and presidential supremacy. Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1926), involved a statute that provided that postmasters “shall be appointed and may be removed by the President and with the advice and consent of the Senate.” President Wilson attempted to remove Myers, a postmaster appointed for a four-year term in Portland, Oregon, before the expiration of his term. The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice (and former President) Taft, held that the removal was lawful because the attempted limitation on the President’s removal power was unconstitutional under article II. The Court relied on several conclusions: (a) The act of removal is itself executive in nature and must therefore be performed by the President; (b) under the “take Care” clause, it is the President, not his subordinates, who must take care that the laws be faithfully executed; and (c) article II vests executive power in the President, not subordinate officials.

Justice Holmes, joined by Justices Brandeis and McReynolds, dissented:

We have to deal with an office that owes its existence to Congress and that Congress may abolish tomorrow. [With] such power over its own creation, I have no more trouble in believing that Congress has power to prescribe a term of life for it free from any interference than I have in accepting the undoubted power of Congress to decree its end.

Under Myers, are the civil services statutes—immunizing lower-level federal officials from power to discharge “at will”—constitutionally acceptable? If so, is it because such officials are not “Officers of the United States,” see Buckley v. Valeo, infra? Consider the view that Myers is satisfied so long as the official in charge of the basic chain of command is subject to presidential control.

Myers derives considerable support from the vesting of executive power in the President and from the basic decision to have a unitary, rather than plural, executive branch. But the historical support for the decision is ambiguous. There is evidence that at least some of the founders distinguished between “executive” and “administrative” authority, and that they believed that Congress should share in the power to remove some of those we now treat as executive officials. See Lessig and Sunstein, supra; Casper, The American Constitutional Tradition of Shared and Separated Powers: An Essay in Separation of Powers, 30 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 211 (1989); Grundstein, Presidential Power, Administration and Administrative Law, 18 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 285 (1950).

3. Humphrey’s Executor, Wiener, and the rise of “independent” agencies. Humphrey’s Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602 (1935), involved a statute providing that members of the Federal Trade Commission could be “removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office.” The history of the statute indicated that the legislative goal was to entrust regulatory decisions to a body of nonpartisan “experts,” insulated from political pressures. President Roosevelt removed Humphrey from office, contending not that removal was justified by one of the statutory conditions, but that the limitation of the removal power was unconstitutional under Myers. In short, President Roosevelt urged that any subordinate official served, by virtue of article II as interpreted in Myers, at the pleasure of the President. A unanimous Court disagreed, distinguishing and confining the reach of Myers:

The office of a postmaster is so essentially unlike the office now involved that the decision in the Myers case cannot be accepted as controlling our decision here. A postmaster is an executive officer restricted to the performance of executive functions....

The Federal Trade Commission is an administrative body created by Congress to carry into effect legislative policies embodied in the statute in accordance with the legislative standard therein prescribed, and to perform other specified duties as a legislative or as a judicial aid. Such a body cannot in any proper sense be characterized as an arm or an eye of the executive. Its duties are performed without executive leave and, in the contemplation of the statute, must be free from executive control. [The] Commission acts in part quasi-legislatively and in part quasi-judicially....

See also Wiener v. United States, 357 U.S. 349 (1958) (concluding that, even though the statute creating the War Claims Commission was silent on the question of removal, the commission’s adjudicatory nature implied a limitation on the President’s power to remove).

Humphrey’s Executor and Wiener recognize a congressional power to create “independent” agencies—governmental entities that are free from presidential removal power and, to some uncertain degree, presidential power to supervise and control the decisions of their officers. The Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and the Federal Communications Commission are examples of independent agencies.

4. Buckley v. Valeo. The Federal Election Campaign Act created an eight-member Federal Election Commission to oversee federal elections. Two members of the commission were appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate, two by the Speaker of the House, and two by the President. The Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House also served as ex officio, nonvoting members. The commission was authorized to investigate, to maintain records, to make rules governing federal elections, and to impose sanctions on those who violated the Act and the commission's own regulations. In Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976), the Court unanimously held that vesting a commission whose members were appointed in this manner with some of these functions violated the appointments clause of article II of the Constitution. The clause provides:

[The President] shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The Court began its analysis by holding that "any appointee exercising significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States is an 'Officer of the United States' and must, therefore, be appointed in the manner prescribed by [the appointments clause]." Four of the six members of the commission were not appointed by the President, and, although the Constitution permitted appointments by "Heads of Departments," this phrase, "used as it is in conjunction with the phrase 'Courts or Law,' suggests that the Departments referred to are themselves in the Executive Branch or at least have some connection with that branch."

It did not follow from this conclusion that the commission was entirely powerless, according to the Court. "Insofar as the powers confided in the Commission are essentially of an investigative and informative nature, falling in the same general category as those powers which Congress might delegate to one of its own committees, there can be no question that the Commission as presently constituted may exercise them.”

However, with regard to the more substantial powers exercised by the Commission, the Court reached a different conclusion:

The Commission’s enforcement power, exemplified by its discretionary power to seek judicial relief, is authority that cannot possibly be regarded as merely in aid of the legislative function of Congress. [It] is to the President, and not to the Congress, that the Constitution entrusts the responsibility to “take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed.”

Similarly, it was unconstitutional to vest in a commission so appointed rulemaking power and power to render advisory opinions or to determine the eligibility for funds:

These functions, exercised free from day-to-day supervision of either Congress or the Executive Branch [are] of kinds usually performed by independent regulatory agencies or by some department in the Executive Branch under the direction of an Act of Congress. [While] the President may not insist that such functions be delegated to an appointee of his removable at will [(Humphrey’s Executor)], none of them operates merely in aid of congressional authority to legislate or is sufficiently removed from the administration and enforcement of public law to allow it to be performed by the present Commission.

5. Limiting executive discretion. What implications do Chadha, Myers, Humphrey’s Executor, and Buckley hold for other techniques designed to limit executive discretion? Should it matter whether Congress attempts to arrogate to itself control of executive agencies or whether it merely attempts to make the agencies independent of presidential control? Consider the following.

Bowsher v. Synar

478 U.S. 714 (1986)

[This case concerned constitutional questions raised by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act, which mandated “automatic” across-the-board spending reductions in the federal budget under certain circumstances. Opponents of the act challenged the role of the Comptroller General in effecting these cuts. The Comptroller General is the head of the General Accounting Office. The Budget and Accounting Act of 1921 vests him with the authority to investigate all matters relating to the receipt and disbursement of public funds. He is nominated by the President from a list of three individuals recommended by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate. He can be removed only by impeachment or by a joint resolution of Congress (subject to presidential veto) on the basis of permanent disability, inefficiency, neglect of duty, malfeasance, commission of a felony, or conduct involving moral turpitude.

[The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act provided that each year the directors of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) and the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) would estimate the amount of the federal deficit for the next fiscal year. If the deficit exceeded statutory targets, the directors were required to calculate independently, on a program-by-program basis, the budget reductions necessary to meet the target, and to report the results to the Comptroller General. The Comptroller General was thereupon directed to prepare a report to the President. The act required him to exercise independent judgment in evaluating the estimates. Upon receipt of the Comptroller General's report, the President was required to issue a sequestration order, mandating any spending reductions specified by the Comptroller General, which, after a specified period, became final unless Congress legislated other spending reductions to obviate the need for the order. A "fallback" provision of the act provided that, if these procedures were declared unconstitutional, Congress would consider a joint resolution (subject to presidential veto) embodying the reports of the OMB and CBO. Upon its enactment, the joint resolution would then be treated as the equivalent of the Comptroller General's report.

[The Supreme Court, in a seven-to-two decision, held that the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act was unconstitutional.]

CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court....

The Constitution does not contemplate an active role for Congress in the supervision of officers charged with the execution of the laws it enacts. [The] Constitution explicitly provides for removal of Officers of the United States by Congress only upon impeachment by the House of Representatives and conviction by the Senate....

To permit an officer controlled by Congress to execute the laws would be, in essence, to permit a congressional veto. Congress could simply remove, or threaten to remove, an officer for executing the laws in any fashion found to be unsatisfactory by Congress....

Appellants urge that the Comptroller General performs his duties independently and is not subservient to Congress. [This] contention does not bear close scrutiny....

The [Budget and Accounting Act of 1921] permits removal for “inefficiency,” “neglect of duty” or “malfeasance.” These terms are very broad and, as interpreted by Congress, could sustain removal of a Comptroller General for any number of actual or perceived transgressions of the legislative will....

Against this background, we see no escape from the conclusion that, because Congress had retained removal authority over the Comptroller General, he may not be entrusted with executive powers. The remaining question is whether the Comptroller General has been assigned such powers in the [Gramm-Rudman-Hollings] Act....

[We] view these functions as plainly entailing execution of the law in constitutional terms. Interpreting a law enacted by Congress to implement the legislative mandate is the very essence of “execution” of the law. Under [the statute], the Comptroller General must exercise judgment concerning facts that affect the application of the Act. He must also interpret the provisions of the Act to determine precisely what budgetary calculations are required. Decisions of that kind are typically made by officers charged with executing a statute....

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE MARSHALL joins, concurring in the judgment....

I agree with the Court that the [act] contains a constitutional infirmity so severe that the flawed provision may not stand. I disagree with the Court, however, on the reasons why the Constitution prohibits the Comptroller General from exercising the powers assigned to him by [the] Act. It is not the dormant, carefully circumscribed congressional removal power that represents the primary constitutional evil. Nor do I agree with the conclusion of both the majority and the dissent that the analysis depends on labeling of the functions assigned to the Comptroller General as “executive powers.” Rather, I am convinced that the Comptroller General must be characterized as an agent of Congress because of his longstanding statutory responsibilities; that the powers assigned to him under the [act] require him to make policy that will bind the Nation; and that, when Congress or a component or agent of Congress, seeks to make policy that will bind the Nation, it must follow the procedures mandated by Article I of the Constitution—through passage by both Houses and presentment to the President.

...

In short, even though it is well settled that Congress may delegate legislative power to independent agencies or to the Executive, and thereby divest itself of a portion of its lawmaking power, when it elects to exercise such power itself, it may not authorize a lesser representative of the Legislative Branch to act on its behalf. It is for this reason that I believe [the reporting provisions] of the Act are unconstitutional....

JUSTICE WHITE, dissenting....

I have no quarrel with the proposition that the powers exercised by the Comptroller under the Act may be characterized as “executive” in that they involve the interpretation and carrying out of the Act’s mandate. I can also accept the general proposition that although Congress has considerable authority in designating the officers who are to execute legislation, the constitutional scheme of separated powers does prevent Congress from reserving an executive role for itself or for its “agents.” I cannot accept, however, that the exercise of authority by an officer removable for cause by a joint resolution of Congress is analogous to the impermissible execution of the law by Congress itself, nor would I hold that the congressional role in the removal process renders the Comptroller an “agent” of the Congress....

The Court overlooks or deliberately ignores the decisive difference between the congressional removal provision and the legislative veto struck down in Chadha: [Congress] may remove the Comptroller only through a joint resolution, which by definition must be passed by both Houses and signed by the President. In other words, a removal of the Comptroller under the statute satisfies the requirements of bicameralism and presentment laid down in Chadha....

That such action may represent a more or less successful attempt by Congress to “control” the actions of an officer of the United States surely does not in itself indicate that it is unconstitutional, for no one would dispute that Congress has the power to “control” administration through legislation imposing duties or substantive restraints on executive officers, through legislation increasing or decreasing the funds made available to such officers or through legislation actually abolishing a particular office.

[Justice Blackmun also wrote a dissenting opinion.]

Morrison v. Olson

487 U.S. 654 (1988)

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court....

This case presents us with a challenge to the independent counsel provisions of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978. We hold today that these provisions of the Act do not violate the Appointments Clause of the Constitution, Art. II, §2, cl. 2, or the limitations of Article III, nor do they impermissibly interfere with the President’s authority under Article II in violation of the constitutional principle of separation of powers.

I

Briefly stated, Title VI of the Ethics of Government Act allows for the appointment of an “independent counsel” to investigate and, if appropriate, prosecute certain high ranking government officials for violations of federal criminal laws. The Act requires the Attorney General, upon receipt of information that he determines is “sufficient to constitute grounds to investigate whether any person [covered by the act] may have violated any Federal criminal law,” to conduct a preliminary investigation of the matter. When the Attorney General has completed this investigation, or 90 days has elapsed, he is required to report to a special court (the Special Division) created by the Act “for the purpose of appointing independent counsels.” If the Attorney General determines that “there are no reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation is warranted,” then he must notify the Special Division of this result. In such a case, “the division of the court shall have no power to appoint an independent counsel.” If, however, the Attorney General has determined that there are “reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted,” then he “shall apply to the division of the court for the appointment of an independent counsel.” The Attorney General’s application to the court “shall contain sufficient information to assist the [court] in selecting an independent counsel and in defining that independent counsel’s prosecutorial jurisdiction.” Upon receiving this application, the Special Division “shall appoint an appropriate independent counsel and shall define that independent counsel’s prosecutorial jurisdiction.”...

[The act provided that the independent counsel can be removed from office only by impeachment or by personal action of the Attorney General for good cause, physical disability, mental incapacity, “or any other condition that substantially impairs the performance of such independent counsel’s duties.” It also provided that the counsel can be “terminated” if the Special Division finds that “the investigation of all matters within the prosecutorial jurisdiction of such independent counsel [has] been completed or so substantially completed that it would be appropriate for the Department of Justice to complete such investigations and prosecutions.”]

A divided Court of Appeals [invalidated the act]. We now reverse....

III

[The Court quotes the appointments clause of article II, reproduced on page 447 supra.]

Several factors lead to [the] conclusion [that appellant is an “inferior officer.”]

[The Court relies on the fact that the special prosecutor could be removed by the Attorney General, that she was authorized to perform only certain limited duties, and that her office was limited in jurisdiction and tenure.]

This does not, however, end our inquiry under the Appointments Clause. Appellees argue that even if appellant is an “inferior” officer, the Clause does not empower Congress to place the power to appoint such an officer outside the Executive Branch. [The Court rejects the argument that there was an “incongruity” between the functions normally performed by courts and the duty of the Special Division to appoint a prosecutor and that other powers vested in the Special Division violated Article III of the Constitution.]¹² ...

V

We now turn to consider whether the Act is invalid under the constitutional principle of separation of powers. Two related issues must be addressed: The first is whether the provision of the Act restricting the Attorney General’s power to remove the independent counsel to only those instances in which he can show “good cause,” taken by itself, impermissibly interferes with the President’s exercise of his constitutionally appointed functions. The second is whether, taken as a whole, the Act violates the separation of powers by reducing the President’s ability to control the prosecutorial powers wielded by the independent counsel.

We held in Bowsher that “Congress cannot reserve for itself the power of removal of an officer charged with the execution of the laws except by impeachment.” A primary antecedent for this ruling was our 1925 decision in [Myers]....

Unlike both Bowsher and Myers, this case does not involve an attempt by Congress itself to gain a role in the removal of executive officials other than its established powers of impeachment and conviction. The Act instead puts the removal power squarely in the hands of the Executive Branch; an independent counsel may be removed from office, “only by the personal action of the Attorney General, and only for good cause.” There is no requirement of congressional approval of the Attorney General’s removal decision, though the decision is subject to judicial review. In our view, the removal provisions of the Act make this case more analogous to Humphrey's Executor v. United States, and Wiener v. United States, than to Myers or Bowsher....

Appellees contend that Humphrey's Executor and Wiener are distinguishable from this case because they did not involve officials who performed a “core executive function.” They argue that our decision in Humphrey's Executor rests on a distinction between “purely executive” officials and officials who exercise “quasi-legislative” and “quasi-judicial” powers....

We undoubtedly did rely on the terms “quasi-legislative” and “quasi-judicial” to distinguish the officials involved in Humphrey's Executor and Wiener from those in Myers, but our present considered view is that the determination of whether the Constitution allows Congress to impose a “good cause”–type restriction on the President’s power to remove an official cannot be made to turn on whether or not that official is classified as “purely executive.” The analysis contained in our removal cases is designed not to define rigid categories of those officials who may or may not be removed at will by the President, but to ensure that Congress does not interfere with the President’s exercise of the “executive power” and his constitutionally appointed duty to “take care that the laws be faithfully executed” under Article II....

We do not mean to suggest that an analysis of the functions served by the officials at issue is irrelevant. But the real question is whether the removal restrictions are of such a nature that they impede the President’s ability to perform his constitutional duty, and the functions of the officials in question must be analyzed in that light.

Considering for the moment the “good cause” removal provision in isolation from the other parts of the Act at issue in this case, we cannot say that the imposition of a “good cause” standard for removal by itself unduly trammels on executive authority....

Although the counsel exercises no small amount of discretion and judgment in deciding how to carry out her duties under the Act, we simply do not see how the President’s need to control the exercise of that discretion is so central to the functioning of the Executive Branch as to require as a matter of constitutional law that the counsel be terminable at will by the President.

Nor do we think that the “good cause” removal provision at issue here impermissibly burdens the President’s power to control or supervise the independent counsel, as an executive official, in the execution of her duties under the Act. [Because] the independent counsel may be terminated for “good cause,” the Executive, through the Attorney General, retains ample authority to assure that the counsel is competently performing her statutory responsibilities in a manner that comports with the provisions of the Act. Although we need not decide in this case exactly what is encompassed with the term “good cause” under the Act, the legislative history of the removal provision also makes clear that the Attorney General may remove an independent counsel for “misconduct.”...

We do not think that this limitation as it presently stands sufficiently deprives the President of control over the independent counsel to interfere impermissibly with his constitutional obligation to ensure the faithful execution of the laws.

The final question to be addressed is whether the Act, taken as a whole, violates the principle of separation of powers by unduly interfering with the role of the Executive Branch....

[We] have never held that the Constitution requires that the three Branches of Government “operate with absolute independence.”...

We observe first that this case does not involve an attempt by Congress to increase its own powers at the expense of the Executive Branch. Unlike some of our previous cases, most recently Bowsher v. Synar, this case simply does not pose a “dange[r] of congressional usurpation of Executive Branch functions,” [see] also [Chadha]....

Similarly, we do not think that the Act works any judicial usurpation of properly executive functions....

Finally, we do not think that the Act “impermissibly undermine[s]” the powers of the Executive Branch, or “disrupts the proper balance between the coordinate branches [by] prevent[ing] the Executive Branch from accomplishing its constitutionally assigned functions.” It is undeniable that the Act reduces the amount of control or supervision that the Attorney General and, through him, the President exercises over the investigation and prosecution of a certain class of alleged criminal activity....

Nonetheless, the Act does give the Attorney General several means of supervising or controlling the prosecutorial powers that may be wielded by an independent counsel....

The decision of the Court of Appeals is therefore reversed....

JUSTICE SCALIA, dissenting....

II

If to describe this case is not to decide it, the concept of a government of separate and coordinate powers no longer has meaning....

Art. II, §1, cl. 1 of the Constitution provides: “The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States.” [This] does not mean some of the executive power, but all of the executive power. It seems to me, therefore, that the decision of the Court of Appeals invalidating the present statute must be upheld on fundamental separation-of-powers principles if the following two questions are answered affirmatively: (1) Is the conduct of a criminal prosecution (and of an investigation to decide whether to prosecute) the exercise of purely executive power? (2) Does the statute deprive the President of the United States of exclusive control over the exercise of that power? Surprising to say, the Court appears to concede an affirmative answer to both questions, but seeks to avoid the inevitable conclusion that since the statute vests some purely executive power in a person who is not the President of the United States it is void.

The Court concedes that “[t]here is no real dispute that the functions performed by the independent counsel are ‘executive,’” though it qualifies that concession by adding “in the sense that they are ‘law enforcement’ functions that typically have been undertaken by officials within the Executive Branch.” The qualifier adds nothing but atmosphere. In what other sense can one identify “the executive Power” that is supposed to be vested in the President (unless it includes everything the Executive Branch is given to do) except by reference to what has always and everywhere—if conducted by Government at all—been conducted never by the legislature, never by the courts, and always by the executive. There is no possible doubt that the independent counsel’s functions fit this description....

As for the second question, whether the statute before us deprives the President of exclusive control over that quintessentially executive activity, the Court does not, and could not possibly, assert that it does not. That is indeed the whole object of the statute. Instead, the Court points out that the President, through his Attorney General, has at least some control. That concession is alone enough to invalidate the statute, but I cannot refrain from pointing out that the Court greatly exaggerates the extent of that “some” presidential control....

The utter incompatibility of the Court’s approach with our constitutional traditions can be made more clear, perhaps, by applying it to the powers of the other two Branches. Is it conceivable that if Congress passed a statute depriving itself of less than full and entire control over some insignificant area of legislation, we would inquire whether the matter was “so central to the functioning of the Legislative Branch” as really to require complete control, or whether the statute gives Congress “sufficient control over the surrogate legislator to ensure that Congress is able to perform its constitutionally assigned duties”? Of course we would have none of that. Once we determined that a purely legislative power was at issue we would require it to be exercised, wholly and entirely, by Congress. Or to bring the point closer to home, consider a statute giving to non-Article III judges just a tiny bit of purely judicial power in a relatively insignificant field, with substantial control, though not total control, in the courts—perhaps “clear error” review, which would be a fair judicial equivalent of the Attorney General’s “for cause” removal power here. Is there any doubt that we would not pause to inquire whether the matter was “so central to the functioning of the Judicial Branch” as really to require complete control, or whether we retained “sufficient control over the matters to be decided that we are able to perform our constitutionally assigned duties”? We would say that our “constitutionally assigned duties” include complete control over all exercises of the judicial power—or, as the plurality opinion said in Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co. [458 U.S. 50, 58–59 (1982)], that “[t]he inexorable command of [article III] is clear and definite: The judicial power of the United States must be exercised by courts having the attributes prescribed in Art. III.” We should say here that the President’s constitutionally assigned duties include complete control over investigation and prosecution of violations of the law, and that the inexorable command of Article II is clear and definite: the executive power must be vested in the President of the United States.

Is it unthinkable that the President should have such exclusive power, even when alleged crimes by him or his close associates are at issue? No more so than that Congress should have the exclusive power of legislation, even when what is at issue is its own exemption from the burdens of certain laws. No more so than that this Court should have the exclusive power to pronounce the final decision on justiciable cases and controversies, even those pertaining to the constitutionality of a statute reducing the salaries of the Justices. A system of separate and coordinate powers necessarily involves an acceptance of exclusive power that can theoretically be abused....

The Court has, nonetheless, replaced the clear constitutional prescription that the executive power belongs to the President with a “balancing test.” What are the standards to determine how the balance is to be struck, that is, how much removal of presidential power is too much? Many countries of the world get along with an Executive that is much weaker than ours—in fact, entirely dependent upon the continued support of the legislature. Once we depart from the text of the Constitution, just where short of that do we stop? The most amazing feature of the Court's opinion is that it does not even purport to give an answer. It simply announces, with no analysis, that the ability to control the decision whether to investigate and prosecute the President's closest advisors, and indeed the President himself, is not "so central to the functioning of the Executive Branch" as to be constitutionally required to be within the President's control....

Besides weakening the Presidency by reducing the zeal of his staff, it must also be obvious that the institution of the independent counsel enfeebles him more directly in his constant confrontations with Congress, by eroding his public support. Nothing is so politically effective as the ability to charge that one's opponent and his associates are not merely wrong-headed, naive, ineffective, but, in all probability, "crooks." And nothing so effectively gives an appearance of validity to such charges as a Justice Department investigation and, even better, prosecution. The present statute provides ample means for that sort of attack, assuring that massive and lengthy investigations will occur, not merely when the Justice Department in the application of its usual standards believes they are called for, but whenever it cannot be said that there are "no reasonable grounds to believe" they are called for....

IV

Since our 1935 decision in [Humphrey's Executor]—which was considered by many at the time the product of an activist, anti-New Deal court bent on reducing the power of President Franklin Roosevelt—it has been established that the line of permissible restriction upon removal of principal officers lies at the point at which the powers exercised by those officers are no longer purely executive....

By contrast, "our present considered view" is simply that any Executive officer's removal can be restricted, so long as the President remains "able to accomplish his constitutional role." There are now no lines. If the removal of a prosecutor, the virtual embodiment of the power to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," can be restricted, what officer's removal cannot? This is an open invitation for Congress to experiment. What about a special Assistant Secretary of State, with responsibility for one very narrow area of foreign policy, who would not only have to be confirmed by the Senate but could also be removed only pursuant to certain carefully designed restrictions? Could this possibly render the President "[un]able to accomplish his constitutional role"? Or a special Assistant Secretary of Defense for Procurement? The possibilities are endless, and the Court does not understand what the separation of powers, what “[a]mbition...counteracting ambition,” Federalist No. 51, p. 322 (Madison), is all about, if it does not expect Congress to try them. As far as I can discern from the Court’s opinion, it is now open season upon the President’s removal power for all executive officers, with not even the superficially principled restriction of Humphrey’s Executor as cover. The Court essentially says to the President “Trust us. We will make sure that you are able to accomplish your constitutional role.” I think the Constitution gives the President—and the people—more protection than that.

The purpose of the separation and equilibration of powers in general, and of the unitary Executive in particular, was not merely to assure effective government but to preserve individual freedom. Those who hold or have held offices covered by the Ethics in Government Act are entitled to that protection as much as the rest of us, and I conclude my discussion by considering the effect of the Act upon the fairness of the process they receive.

Only someone who has worked in the field of law enforcement can fully appreciate the vast power and the immense discretion that are placed in the hands of a prosecutor with respect to the objects of his investigation....

Under our system of government, the primary check against prosecutorial abuse is a political one. The prosecutors who exercise this awesome discretion are selected and can be removed by a President, whom the people have trusted enough to elect. Moreover, when crimes are not investigated and prosecuted fairly, nonselectively, with a reasonable sense of proportion, the President pays the cost in political damage to his administration....

That is the system of justice the rest of us are entitled to, but what of that select class consisting of present or former high-level executive-branch officials? If an allegation is made against them of any violation of any federal criminal law (except Class B or C misdemeanors or infractions) the Attorney General must give it his attention. That in itself is not objectionable. But if, after a 90-day investigation without the benefit of normal investigatory tools, the Attorney General is unable to say that there are “no reasonable grounds to believe” that further investigation is warranted, a process is set in motion that is not in the full control of persons “dependent on the people,” and whose flaws cannot be blamed on the President. An independent counsel is selected, and the scope of her authority prescribed, by a panel of judges. What if they are politically partisan, as judges have been known to be, and select a prosecutor antagonistic to the administration, or even to the particular individual who has been selected for this special treatment? There is no remedy for that, not even a political one.

It is, in other words, an additional advantage of the unitary Executive that it can achieve a more uniform application of the law. Perhaps that is not always achieved, but the mechanism to achieve it is there. The mini-Executive that is the independent counsel, however, operating in an area where so little is law and so much is discretion, is intentionally cut off from the unifying influence of the Justice Department, and from the perspective that multiple responsibilities provide. What would normally be regarded as a technical violation (there are no rules defining such things), may in her small world assume the proportions of an indictable offense....

The ad hoc approach to constitutional adjudication has real attraction, even apart from its work-saving potential. It is guaranteed to produce a result, in every case, that will make a majority of the Court happy with the law. The law is, by definition, precisely what the majority thinks, taking all things into account, it ought to be. I prefer to rely upon the judgment of the wise men who constructed our system, and of the people who approved it, and of two centuries of history that have shown it to be sound. Like it or not, that judgment says, quite plainly, that “[t]he executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States.”

Note: Congressional Control over Administrative Officials

1. Chadha and Bowsher. Although both Chadha and Bowsher invalidated innovative schemes designed to preserve congressional control of delegated authority, the two decisions utilize different approaches. In Chadha, the Court treats Congress's decision regarding Chadha's immigration status as an exercise of legislative authority and finds it invalid because it failed to comport with the presentment and bicameral requirements for the enactment of statutes. A difficulty with this approach is that in the absence of the legislative veto, Chadha's immigration status would be determined by the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Yet the Service's decision also fails to comport with the bicameralism requirement.

Bowsher avoids this difficulty by reversing the analysis. The constitutional defect in the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act was not that Congress was legislating, but that it was not legislating. The Court treats the Comptroller General's budget-cutting authority as an exercise of executive power and holds that Congress had unconstitutionally trespassed on executive authority by vesting this authority in an officer under legislative control. Is this approach more satisfactory? If the Comptroller General's budget-cutting authority is executive, why is the “fallback” provision, under which Congress itself would enact the budget cuts, constitutional?

2. Morrison and Bowsher. Can Bowsher and Morrison be reconciled? The Court appears to distinguish between statutory schemes designed to assert congressional control over administrative officials (prohibited in Myers, Chadha, and Bowsher) and statutory schemes designed to protect administrative officials from executive control (permitted in Humphrey’s Executor and Morrison). According to this view, Congress may make some executive officers independent, but it may not itself control them. Notice that this distinction privileges arrangements that shield administrative officers from accountability to either of the popularly elected branches of government. Doesn’t this turn the traditional concern about delegated power on its head?

3. Mistretta and the “twilight” area. Consider in this connection the implications of Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361 (1989). The United States Sentencing Commission has seven members appointed by the President, of whom three must be federal judges; the statute creating the commission states that it is “an independent commission located in the judicial branch.” The commission was created in response to concern that sentences for similar offenses and of similar offenders in the federal system varied too substantially to promote the goals of equitable sentencing. Its role is to create mandatory sentencing guidelines specifying rather narrow ranges of permissible sentences for different offenses, taking some account of the different circumstances under which different people commit crimes.

The Court, in an opinion by Justice Blackmun, rejected a variety of separation of powers challenges to the commission. Relying on the “intelligible principle” test derived from prior nondelegation cases, the Court found that the Congress had given the commission sufficiently detailed guidance as to the purposes its guidelines were to serve and the considerations the commission was to take into account. Addressing more general separation of powers concerns, the Court cited Justice Jackson’s opinion in Youngstown for “the pragmatic, flexible view of differentiated governmental power to which we are heir.” In particular, the Court acknowledged a “twilight” area in which the functions of the various branches merge. Thus, although courts may not generally exercise executive and administrative duties of a nonjudicial nature, some forms of judicial rulemaking are permissible: “[Consistent] with separation of powers, Congress may delegate nonadjudicatory functions that do not trench upon the prerogatives of another branch and that are appropriate to the central mission of the Judiciary.” For example, Congress had appropriately delegated to the courts the power to develop rules of procedure. In the Court’s view, the development of sentencing guidelines also fell within this category.

In a dissenting opinion, Justice Scalia argued that “[the] decisions made by the Commission are far from technical, but are heavily laden [with] value judgments and policy assessments.” He therefore expressed some sympathy for the position that the commission’s mandate violated the nondelegation doctrine, but acknowledged that the doctrine “is not [readily] enforceable by the courts.” However, [precisely] because the scope of delegation is largely uncontrollable by the courts, we must be particularly rigorous in preserving the Constitution’s structural restrictions that deter excessive delegation. The major one [is] that the power to make law cannot be exercised by anyone other than Congress, except in conjunction with the lawful exercise of executive or judicial power. [Until Morrison v. Olson,] it could have been said that Congress could delegate lawmaking authority only at the expense of increasing the power of either the President or the courts. [Thus,] the need for delegation would have to be important enough to induce Congress to aggrandize its primary competitor for political power, and the recipient of the policymaking authority, while not Congress itself, would at least be politically accountable....

[I] anticipate that Congress will find delegation of its lawmaking powers much more attractive in the future. If rulemaking can be entirely unrelated to the exercise of judicial or executive powers, I foresee all manner of “expert” bodies, insulated from the political process, to which Congress will delegate various portions of its lawmaking responsibility....

I think the Court errs [not] so much because it mistakes the degree of commingling [of the branches of government], but because it fails to recognize that this case is not about commingling, but about the creation of a new branch altogether, a sort of junior-varsity Congress.

4. Double insulation. In Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, 561 U.S. 477 (2010), the Court distinguished Morrison and Humphrey’s Executor and held that it was unconstitutional to insulate an inferior officer from removal by a principal officer when the principal officer was also protected from removal by the President. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, 116 Stat. 745, created the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, composed of five members appointed by the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Board was granted broad authority to oversee the accounting industry, and the Commission could remove Board members only for “good cause shown.” The Court assumed for purposes of the case that members of the Commission could be removed by the President only for “inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office.”

The Court, in a five-to-four decision written by Chief Justice Roberts, noted that it had previously upheld restrictions on a President’s removal power. “In those cases, however, only one level of protected tenure separated the President from an officer exercising executive power. It was the President—or a subordinate he could remove at will—who decided whether the officer’s conduct merited removal under the good-cause standard.” Here in contrast, decisions about whether good cause existed to remove Board members were vested “in other tenured officers—the Commissioners—none of whom is subject to the President’s direct control. The result is a Board that is not accountable to the President, and a President who is not responsible for the Board.” In the Court’s view,

[the] added layer of tenure protection makes a difference. Without a layer of insulation between the Commission and the Board, the Commission could remove a Board member at any time, and therefore would be fully responsible for what the Board does. The President could then hold the Commission to account for its supervision of the Board, to the same extent that he may hold the Commission to account for everything else that it does.

Does subjecting Board members to at-will removal by the Commission solve the problem that the Court identifies? Compare Justice Breyer’s dissenting opinion, joined by Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, and Sotomayor:

[So] long as the President is legitimately foreclosed from removing the Commissioners except for cause (as the majority assumes), nullifying the Commission’s power to remove Board members only for cause will not resolve the problem the Court has identified: The President will still be “powerless to intervene” by removing the Board members if the Commission reasonably decides not to do so.

Many statutes establish “partisan balance requirements” for administrative agencies. These provisions require the President to appoint some members of the other party to important positions within the agency. Suppose that you were a lawyer tasked with attacking the constitutionality of these requirements. How might you use Free Enterprise Fund to mount such an attack? See generally Krotoszynski, Hodge, & Wintermyer, Partisan Balance Requirements in the Age of New Formalism, 90 Notre Dame L. Rev. 941 (2015).

5. Recess appointments. Article II, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution requires the advice and consent of the Senate for most presidential appointments, but article II, section 2, clause 3 provides that “[the] President shall have the Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of [Congress’s] next session.” In National Labor Relations Board v. Noel Canning, 34 S. Ct. 2550 (2014), the Supreme Court for the first time adjudicated a case concerning the scope of this power.

The case arose amidst intense political controversy over the use of the Senate filibuster to block presidential appointments (sometimes because of opposition to the existence of the agency in question rather than because of opposition to the particular nominee) and over the President’s attempt to circumvent filibusters by making recess appointments. When the Senate delayed the confirmation of three members of the National Labor Relations Board, President Obama used his putative recess appointments power to place them on the Board. He made the appointments after the Senate adopted a resolution providing that it would take a series of brief recesses beginning on December 17, 2011. The resolution provided that the Senate would hold “pro forma” sessions every Tuesday and Friday until it returned to ordinary business on January 23, 2012. President Obama made the appointments on January 4, between the January 3 and January 6 pro forma sessions.

Noel Canning, which had been found by the Board to have violated the labor laws, claimed that the Board lacked a quorum to act because three of the Board’s five members had been illegally appointed.

The Court of Appeals agreed with Noel Canning that the appointments were illegal because, in its view, the words “the recess of the Senate” referred only to Congress’s annual inter-session recess, not to its more frequent intra-session recesses, and because the words “vacancies that may happen during the recess” referred only to vacancies that come into existence during the recess, not to vacancies that occur earlier but that remain unfilled during a recess.

By a vote of five-to-four, the Court, per Justice Breyer, rejected both of these arguments. It nonetheless held that the appointments were illegal. The Court reasoned that the pro forma sessions brought to a close the recesses between them. This meant that the appointments occurred during a three-day recess, and the Court held that a “recess of [less] than 10 days is presumptively too short to fall within the Clause. We add the word ‘presumptively’ to leave open the possibility that some very unusual circumstance—a national catastrophe, for instance, that renders the Senate unavailable but calls for an urgent response—could demand the exercise of the recess-appointment power during a shorter break.”

In reaching these conclusions, the Court emphasized its view that the recess appointments power was not meant to “[offer] the President the authority routinely to avoid the need for Senate confirmation.” It also emphasized the role of historical practice in interpreting the scope of the power. “We recognize, of course, that the separation of powers can serve to safeguard individual liberty and that it is the ‘duty of the judicial department’—in a separation-of-power case as in any other—to say what the law is” [quoting Marbury v. Madison]. But it is equally true that the longstanding ‘practice of government’ [quoting McCulloch v. Maryland] can inform our determination of ‘what the law is.’” With regard to the second point, the Court noted that Presidents have made recess appointments since the beginning of the Republic. Their frequency suggests that the Senate and President have recognized that recess appointments can be both necessary and appropriate in certain circumstances. We have not previously interpreted the Clause, and, when doing so for the first time in more than 200 years, we must hesitate to upset the compromises and working arrangements that the elected branches of Government themselves have reached.

The Court then turned its attention to whether the clause permitted intra-session as well as inter-session recesses. Finding the term “the recess” ambiguous, the Court relied on its purpose, which, it held, “[demands] the broader interpretation” because “[the] Senate is equally away during both an inter-session and an intra-session recess, and its capacity to participate in the appointments process has nothing to do with the words it uses to signal its departure.” In addition, the Court cited a record of frequent intra-session appointments from the post–Civil War period to the present and opinions by the President’s legal advisors supporting these appointments.

The upshot is that restricting the Clause to inter-session recesses would frustrate its purpose. It would make the President’s recess-appointment power dependent on a formalistic distinction of Senate procedure. Moreover, the President has consistently and frequently interpreted the word “recess” to apply to intra-session recesses, and has acted on that interpretation. The Senate as a body has done nothing to deny the validity of this practice for at least three-quarters of a century. And three-quarters of a century of settled practice is long enough to entitle a practice to “great weight in a proper interpretation of the constitutional provision.”

The Court then considered the second ground on which the lower court had invalidated the appointment—that the vacancy had not “happened” during the recess because it did not initially occur while the Senate was in recess. Once again, the Court found that the language itself was ambiguous, but that its purpose suggested a broader interpretation. The Court reasoned that the President might not have time to fill a vacancy before the Senate went into recess and that, if the office was an important one, the inability to fill the post while the Senate was not in session could have serious adverse consequences. The Court again found that historical practice for more than 200 years supported this interpretation. While recognizing that the interpretation might be thought to allow the President to routinely avoid the confirmation process by making all appointments during recesses, the Court pointed out that this course of conduct had disadvantages, including the fact that the appointee can only serve for a limited term and her provisional status might make her less effective. “Moreover, the Senate, like the President, has institutional ‘resources,’ including political resources ‘available to protect and assert its interests.’”

Finally, the Court turned to the issue of how to treat the “pro forma” sessions. The government argued that these sessions were periods of recess because the Senate did virtually no business during them and was therefore in recess as a functional matter. The Court disagreed:

[The] Senate is in session when it says it is, provided that, under its own rules, it retains the capacity to transact Senate business. The Senate met that standard here.

The standard we apply is consistent with the Constitution’s broad delegation of authority to the Senate to determine how and when to conduct its business. The Constitution explicitly empowers the Senate to “determine the Rules of its Proceedings.” Art. I, §5, cl. 2....

In addition the Constitution provides the Senate with extensive control over its schedule....

We generally take at face value the Senate’s own report of its actions.

Since pro forma sessions interrupted the recess, the Court was forced to decide whether the period between these sessions was long enough to trigger the recess appointments power. It concluded that it was not:

The Recess Appointments Clause seeks to permit the Executive Branch to function smoothly when Congress is unavailable. And though Congress has taken short breaks for almost 200 years, and there have been many thousands of recess appointments in that time, we have not found a single example of a recess appointment made during an intra-session recess that was shorter than 10 days. ...The lack of examples suggests that the recess appointment power is not needed in that context.

Justice Scalia, in an opinion joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Thomas and Alito, concurred in the judgment. He would have held that the recess appointments power arises only during the annual intermission between two formal legislative sessions and that the recess must first occur during that period. He accused the majority of justifying its “atextual results on an adverse-possession theory of executive authority.”

Justice Scalia emphasized that because “separation of power exists for the protection of individual liberty,” it was irrelevant that the Senate had approved of or not objected to the encroachment. “Plainly [a] self-aggrandizing practice adopted by one branch well after the founding, often challenged, and never before blessed by this Court [does] not relieve us of our duty to interpret the Constitution in light of its text, structure, and original understanding.”

Moreover, Justice Scalia’s review of the historical record convinced him that prior practice was “at best ambiguous.”

The real tragedy of today’s decision is not simply the abolition of the Constitution’s limits on the recess-appointment power and the substitution of a novel framework invented by this Court. It is the damage done to our separation-of-powers jurisprudence more generally. [We] should [take] every opportunity to affirm the primacy of the Constitution’s enduring principles over the politics of the moment. Our failure to do so today will resonate well beyond the particular dispute at hand. Sad, but true: The Court’s embrace of the adverse-possession theory of executive power [will] be cited in diverse contexts, including those presently unimagined, and will have the effect of aggrandizing the Presidency beyond its constitutional bounds and undermining respect for the separation of powers.

6. Congressional control over administrative agencies after Chadha and Bowsher. Recall that in Buckley v. Valeo, page 447, supra, the Court upheld the Federal Campaign Act insofar as the powers that it delegated to the Federal Election Commission were “essentially of an investigative and informative nature, falling in the same general category as those which Congress might delegate to one of its own committees.” Does this holding survive Chadha?

Would it survive the approach outlined in Justice Stevens's concurring opinion in Bowsher?

Consider in this connection Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for Abatement of Aircraft Noise, 501 U.S. 252 (1991). When Congress transferred operation of Washington, D.C., airports from the federal government to a new airport authority, it conditioned the transfer on the creation of a board of review with power to veto major decisions made by the authority. The board of review consisted of nine members of Congress, to be chosen by the authority's board of directors from lists provided by the Speaker of the House and the President pro tempore of the Senate. In a six-to-three decision, the Court, per Justice Stevens, held that the statute was unconstitutional. The Court observed that it need not decide whether the power exercised by the board of review was legislative or executive in nature: "If the power is executive, the Constitution does not permit an agent of Congress to exercise it. If the power is legislative, Congress must exercise it in conformity with the bicameralism and presentment requirements of Art. I, §7. [See Chadha.]"

Note: Distribution of National Powers—Final Thoughts

Do the preceding materials suggest that the distribution of national powers has served its intended function? Has it limited factional control over governmental processes? Has it served as an important safeguard of liberty? Or has it created so many "checks" that (1) democratic processes are unable to bring about substantial reform or (2) the government is prevented from taking necessary action?

The preceding materials raise institutional issues as well. To what extent has judicial review contributed to the development of the present distribution of national powers? What has been the effect of structural legislation such as the War Powers Resolution? Consider the possibility that the written Constitution has played only a small role. Do the materials support the suggestion that the process of bargaining between Congress and the executive branch is a sufficient safeguard against abuse? What constitutes abuse in this context?

19 We are not here concerned with the balance between the President's generalized interest in confidentiality and the need for relevant evidence in civil litigation, nor with that between the confidentiality interest and congressional demands for information, nor with the President's interest in preserving state secrets. We address only the conflict between the President's assertion of a generalized privilege of confidentiality and the constitutional need for relevant evidence in criminal trials.

12 Indeed, in light of judicial experience with prosecutors in criminal cases, it could be said that courts are especially well qualified to appoint prosecutors. This is not a case in which judges are given power to appoint an officer in an area in which they have no special knowledge or expertise, as in, for example, a statute authorizing the courts to appoint officials in the Department of Agriculture or the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

V

Equality and the Constitution

This chapter explores the Supreme Court’s struggle to define and apply the Constitution’s requirements of equal treatment. Section A explores the origins of the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment in the national experience with race, slavery, and its aftermath. The remaining sections focus more directly on constitutional doctrine. The modern Supreme Court’s treatment of equal protection claims has used a means-ends methodology in which judges ask whether the classification the government is using is sufficiently related to the goals it is pursuing. Section B explores the meaning of “equality” in the default context: “rational basis” review of “ordinary” social or economic classifications. Section C focuses on the paradigmatic example of “heightened scrutiny”: searching judicial review of classifications based on race. Section D turns to a different form of heightened scrutiny used in cases involving classifications based on gender. Section E considers the question of heightened scrutiny for classifications based on sexual orientation. Finally, Section F explores the claims for heightened scrutiny of other “disadvantaged” groups, such as aliens and the poor.

A. SLAVERY, JIM CROW, AND THE EQUAL PROTECTION PRINCIPLE

Although the Declaration of Independence contained the ringing phrase that “We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal,” there was no straightforward general guarantee of equality in the original Constitution.* The equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment has become the primary source of constitutional requirements of equal treatment. Although the equal protection clause is quite general in its language—“nor shall any State...deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws”—its genesis reflects a particular concern: the desire, after the Civil War, to protect newly freed African-American slaves from continued discrimination by southern state governments.

In one form or another, controversy about the legal status of African Americans has been central to U.S. law and politics since the founding of the Republic. As you read through this material, consider the extent to which judicial decisions have shaped that controversy and the extent to which they have been shaped by it. At each stage, could the Court have acted differently? Was its power meaningfully constrained by the language and history of the Constitution? By the constellation of social and political forces at the time? By the strategy of individual litigants? By the other branches of government? Does the Supreme Court ultimately have the power to impose its own version of racial justice? Or are its decisions largely the product of broad historical forces over which it exercises little control?

1. Slavery and the Constitution

Although the word “slavery” nowhere appears in the original Constitution, three provisions recognized and arguably legitimated the practice. Article I, section 2, clause 3 required apportionment of seats in the House of Representatives on the basis of the “whole number of free Persons” in each state, minus the number of “Indians not taxed,” plus “three fifths of all other Persons.” Article I, section 9, clause 1 prohibited Congress from outlawing the “Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper” until 1808. Article IV, section 2, clause 3 required states to “[deliver] up” any “Person held to Service or Labour in one State” who had escaped into their territory.

Do these provisions make the Constitution a pro-slavery document? Consider D. Robinson, Slavery in the Structure of American Politics 1765–1820, at 209, 210, 244–246 (1971):

In the drama that produced the Constitution, Southern delegates were unmistakably prominent players. James Madison, the man whose leadership during the Convention earned him the title “Father of the Constitution,” was a Southerner, a slave-owning Virginian. [John] Rutledge, certainly a leading nationalist and chairman of the important Committee of Detail, which provided the first definition of legislative powers under the Constitution, was one of the wealthiest and best-established planters at the Convention, and deliberately represented the most candid slave owners. [George] Washington [was] an exceedingly rich man, whose fortune arose largely from the labor of slaves in and around Mount Vernon, Virginia. In fact, of the fifteen delegates whom Clinton Rossiter has termed either “principals” or “influentials,” seven were planters....

The South's enthusiastic participation in the nationalizing thrust of 1787 carried one portentous qualification: the national government could be as powerful as the vision of a great national empire demanded, provided that it keep its hands off slavery....

The framers [dealt] with slavery by seeking, so far as possible, to take it out of the national political arena. They were unable in 1787 to settle the issue, one way or the other. They could not establish straightforward Constitutional guarantees against emancipation, as the South Carolinians desired, because many Northerners, and perhaps some Southerners, would not permit it. Nor could they give Congress power to regulate slavery in any way, much less abolish it, because Southerners refused to yield control over the institution. Realizing that it was utterly beyond their power to fashion a national consensus on slavery, or to "govern" the issue in the absence of one, they had contented themselves with measures aimed at preventing friction over slavery between the states and sections....

There is no evidence that any framer thought the Constitution contained power to abolish slavery. They all knew how the Deep Southerners felt, and however much some of them may have regretted the hold that slavery had on the South, they were all fully sympathetic with the determination of the Deep Southerners to resist abolition in the present circumstances....

But there was no guarantee that powers of emancipation were forever denied to the federal government.

The evidence there permits the conclusion that the future, with respect to possible public action against slavery, was left open on purpose. [The] framers, as of 1787, agreed unanimously to place the institution of slavery, as it existed within the South, not "on the course of ultimate extinction," as Lincoln argued, but beyond national regulation.

In light of the provisions in the Constitution protecting slavery, should it have been ratified? Consider the views of Justice Thurgood Marshall:

I [do not] find the wisdom, foresight, and sense of justice exhibited by the framers particularly profound. To the contrary, the government they devised was defective from the start, requiring several amendments, a civil war, and momentous social transformation to attain the system of constitutional government, and its respect for the individual freedoms and human rights we hold as fundamental today.

Marshall, Commentary: Reflections on the Bicentennial of the United States Constitution, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 2 (1987). Abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison went further, terming the original Constitution “an agreement with Death and a covenant with Hell.” Witness to America 132 (S. Ambrose and D. Brinkley eds., 1999).

Compare Levinson, 1787: The Constitution in Perspective—Pledging Faith in the Civil Religion; Or, Would You Sign the Constitution?, 29 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 113, 133 (1987):

[The] central problem with “disunionist” thinking [is] that it focuses more on the immorality of collaboration with slavery [than] on the question of how one most quickly can bring slavery to an end. We know that with ratification chattel slavery ended by 1865. Is there good reason to believe that it would have ended earlier had the Constitution not been ratified and balkanization followed? I suspect not. But the important point is surely this: Can one who believes that the ratification of the Constitution did enhance the prospects (and actuality) of chattel slavery sign the Constitution? What precisely is the value of the Constitution and of the concomitant nation that would justify even an extra week’s slavery? What precisely is the omelet that justified breaking those particular eggs?

State v. Post

20 N.J.L. 368 (Supreme Court of New Jersey 1845)

NEVIUS, J.

This proceeding is designed to present for our adjudication the question, whether slavery can exist within the limits of this state under its present constitution and laws; and it derives signal and solemn importance from its bearing upon a class of human beings, still claimed to be lawfully held in slavery, and upon the interest of those communities where most of that class are still found....

In 1804, the legislature adopted a plan for the gradual abolition of slavery, and passed an act declaring, “That every child born of a slave, after the 4th of July of that year, should be free, but remain the servant of the owner of the mother [until] he or she should arrive at a specified age.” [Under] the operation of [the statute] and the benign spirit of the age, which inclined men to manumit their slaves, slavery has become nearly extinct in this state and must soon pass entirely away. [According] to the last census [the number of slaves] was reduced to 674; of whom [349 were] over the age of fifty-five years. Those who yet survive and have not been manumitted, remain still the slaves of their masters; but have a legal claim upon the latter for maintenance, in the case of their inability to support themselves, unless by the provisions of the new constitution, framed and adopted in 1844, slavery is abolished. If such be the case, it will follow as a legal consequence, that masters too, are absolved from the obligation of maintenance. [These] consequences, while they can have no legitimate influence upon the decision of the question, nevertheless give it more than ordinary importance, and call for our most serious and anxious consideration.

[Abolitionists argued that slavery was made illegal in New Jersey by a provision in the state's 1844 constitution declaring that "all men are by nature free and independent, and have certain natural and unalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing and protecting property, and of pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness."]

If the [New Jersey constitutional] convention intended to say that all men, in a state of civil or political society, were free and independent and entitled to the exercise and enjoyment of the rights mentioned, the expression must be understood in a modified sense according to the nature, the condition and laws of the society to which they belong....

[Had] the convention intended to abolish slavery and domestic relations, well known to exist in this state and to be established by law, and to divest the master of his right of property in his slave and the slave of his right to protection and support from the master, no one can doubt but that it would have adopted some clear and definite provision to effect it, and not have left so important and grave a question, involving such extensive consequences, to depend upon the doubtful construction of an indefinite abstract political proposition....

The declaration of independence, the basis of our free government, declares that all men are created free and equal, and the constitution of the United States proclaims that the people have formed it to secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity; yet by the express language of the latter instrument, the relation of master and slave is recognized; showing that the framers of that constitution did not deem their general declaration in favor of liberty, incompatible with its other provisions; and it has never been judicially determined that slavery, in the United States, was thereby abrogated. On the contrary it has been often adjudged, both by the State and Federal courts, that slavery still exists; that the master's right of property in the slave has not been affected either by the declaration of independence, or the constitution of the United States. [It] was argued before us, that, under the declaration of rights in the constitution of Massachusetts, which contains the same language, it has been judicially held, that slavery was no more. And we are referred to [Commonwealth v. Aves], 18 Pick. R. 193. [In Aves], Chief Justice Shaw declares “that slavery is contrary to natural right, to the principles of justice and humanity, and repugnant to the constitution.” I am unwilling to yield to any one, in high respect for the supreme judicial tribunal of that enlightened state; but [I] do not find the reason or argument, which satisfies my mind of the soundness of its conclusion. [How] far the humane spirit of abolitionism, which prevailed in that state, the fewness or worthlessness of that species of property, the feebleness of the defence made by masters, or the collateral mode in which the question was presented, or the fact that slavery had only been tolerated, but never actually established by law, may have influenced the opinion of the court, [I] will not undertake to determine. By this remark I mean to cast no imputation upon the judicial intelligence or integrity of that court; but judges must be more than men, if they can always escape the influence of a strong popular opinion of society upon great questions of state policy and human benevolence, which have been long agitated and much discussed; and it is no matter of surprise that Chief Justice Shaw, entertaining the opinions he did upon this question of slavery, should have found it repugnant to the spirit of their constitution....

Note: The Constitutionality of Slavery

1. The context of Post. Post was a test case brought in the form of a habeas corpus action demanding the release of three individuals. Two of them were a husband and wife who had been born before enactment of the 1804 statute and purchased as slaves by Post in 1836; the other person was a minor, born to a slave, who was being held in servitude until he reached the age of 25. Abolitionists argued that the 1844 New Jersey constitutional provision quoted by Justice Nevius freed them immediately.

2. Post and the problem of judicial power. For the nation’s entire history, courts have oscillated between attempts to impose a judicial solution to the problem of racial justice and attempts to leave the matter to the political process. In Post, the Court chose the latter course. Is the decision an example of moral cowardice or of fidelity to law?

Was the Court bound to reach the result it did by the words of the provision in question? By the intent of the framers? Where else might it have looked for guidance? See Chapter 1, section C, supra.

Justice Nevius says judges must be “more than men” to ignore “strong popular opinion.” How likely is it that a court would construe the Constitution in a manner most people violently opposed? That it would succeed in enforcing such a construction in the long run?

Of course, in a southern state in 1845, a judicial decision abolishing slavery would have been revolutionary. If a southern judge had written such a decision, what do you suppose the result would have been? In this light, consider the frequently harsh treatment of southern judges over a century later who enforced the requirement that schools be desegregated.

3. Constitutional attacks on slavery. Post typifies judicial analysis of slavery prior to the Civil War. Although abolitionist lawyers won isolated victories, even judges strongly opposed to slavery usually ruled against them. See generally R. Cover, Justice Accused (1975); L. Levy, The Law of the Commonwealth and Chief Justice Shaw (1957).

Although Post dealt exclusively with state constitutional issues, Alvan Stewart, the abolitionist lawyer who argued Post, relied on the federal Constitution as well. See J. TenBroek, The Antislavery Origins of the Fourteenth Amendment 43–45 (1951). See also E. Foner, Free Soil, Free Labor, Free Men: The Ideology of the Republican Party before the Civil War 76–77 (1970). Stewart claimed that slavery deprived slaves of life, liberty, and property in violation of the due process clause of the fifth amendment, that it deprived New Jersey of a republican form of government in violation of article IV, that it violated the preamble of the Constitution, and that it violated the Treaty of Ghent, which outlawed the slave trade. See Ernst, Legal Positivism, Abolitionist Litigation, and the New Jersey Slave Case of 1845, 4 Law & Hist. Rev. 337, 350–351 (1986). The Court apparently thought these arguments too flimsy to merit a response. Are the arguments tenable?

4. Judicial support for slavery. Far from combating the evils of slavery, judicial review in the pre–Civil War period quite frequently overturned political decisions intended to limit slavery.

Most of the federal litigation centered on the fugitive slave clause, article IV, section 2, which required the return of escaped slaves. In Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 539 (1842), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Story, struck down a Pennsylvania statute that made it a crime to forcibly remove blacks from the state for the purpose of causing them to be enslaved. The Court explained that article IV, section 2 “contemplates the existence of a positive, unqualified right on the part of the owner of the slave, which no state law or regulation can in any way qualify, regulate, control, or restrain.” The Court therefore held the statute invalid as applied to an escaped slave because “any state law or state regulation, which interrupts, limits, delays, or postpones the right of the owner to the immediate possession of the slave, and the immediate command of his service and labor, operates, pro tanto, a discharge of the slave therefrom.” The Court further held that article IV, section 2 vested Congress with the power to assist owners in securing the return of escaped slaves, that Congress had exercised that power by enacting the Fugitive Slave Act of 1793, that this national power was exclusive, and that any state laws regulating the means by which slaves were to be delivered up were unconstitutional.

Prigg's immediate effect was pro-slavery, but its legacy was ambiguous. The decision left intact the power of both free states and the national government to limit the growth of slavery by freeing slaves brought into free areas. Moreover, by nationalizing the rendition question the Court relieved free states of this distasteful obligation and intensified the political struggle over the future of slavery on a national level. See 5 C. Swisher, History of the Supreme Court of the United States: The Taney Period 1836–64, at 546 (1974).

During the 1830s, 1840s, and 1850s, controversies over slavery erupted repeatedly, both in the streets as pro-slavery and anti-slavery forces fought pitched battles in the territories and within the political process. For a particularly gripping account of congressional attempts to avoid discussion altogether, see W. Miller, Arguing About Slavery: The Great Battle in the United States Congress (1996). Under these circumstances, could the Court actually resolve the controversy?

Dred Scott v. Sandford

60 U.S. (19 How.) 393 (1857)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE TANEY delivered the opinion of the Court....

[Dred Scott, admittedly once a slave but claiming now to be a citizen of Missouri, brought an action for trespass in federal court against John F. A. Sanford—whose name was apparently misspelled in the official case reports—a citizen of New York. Federal jurisdiction was premised on diversity of citizenship. In 1834, Scott's former owner had taken him from Missouri to Illinois, where they resided for two years before moving to Minnesota, then part of the Louisiana Territory. In 1838, they returned to Missouri, and Scott was sold as a slave to Sanford. Although slavery was legal in Missouri, it was prohibited in Illinois by the state constitution and in the Louisiana Territory by the federal statute embodying the Missouri Compromise—the Act of March 6, 1820, 3 Stat. 545. Scott argued that these provisions made him a free man. In response, Sanford contended that the court lacked diversity jurisdiction over Scott's claim because, as a black man, Scott could not be a citizen of Missouri; moreover, he argued that Scott's time in Illinois and Minnesota could not deprive his owner of his property interest in Scott when he returned to Missouri.]

I

[The Court first addressed the question whether Scott was a citizen of Missouri for diversity purposes.]

The words “people of the United States” and “citizens” are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing. They both describe the political body who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the Government through their representatives. They are what we familiarly call the “sovereign people,” and every citizen is one of this people, and a constituent member of this sovereignty. The question before us is, whether the class of persons described in the plea in abatement compose a portion of this people, and are constituent members of this sovereignty? We think they are not, and that they are not included, and were not intended to be included, under the word “citizens” in the Constitution, and can therefore claim none of the rights and privileges which that instrument provides for and secures to citizens of the United States. On the contrary, they were at that time considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings, who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and, whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority, and had no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the Government might choose to grant them.

It is not the province of the court to decide upon the justice or injustice, the policy or impolicy, of these laws. The decision of that question belonged to the political or law-making power; to those who formed the sovereignty and framed the Constitution. The duty of the court is, to interpret the instrument they have framed, with the best lights we can obtain on the subject, and to administer it as we find it, according to its true intent and meaning when it was adopted....

In the opinion of the court, the legislation and histories of the times, and the language used in the Declaration of Independence, show, that neither the class of persons who had been imported as slaves, nor their descendants, whether they had become free or not, were then acknowledged as a part of the people, nor intended to be included in the general words used in that memorable instrument.

It is difficult at this day to realize the state of public opinion in relation to that unfortunate race, which prevailed in the civilized and enlightened portions of the world at the time of the Declaration of Independence, and when the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted. But the public history of every European nation displays it in a manner too plain to be mistaken.

They had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; and so far inferior, that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect; and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit. He was bought and sold, and treated as an ordinary article of merchandise and traffic, whenever a profit could be made by it. This opinion was at that time fixed and universal in the civilized portion of the white race. It was regarded as an axiom in morals as well as in politics, which no one thought of disputing, or supposed to be open to dispute; and men in every grade and position in society daily and habitually acted upon it in their private pursuits, as well as in matters of public concern, without doubting for a moment the correctness of this opinion....

[Upon] a full and careful consideration of the subject, the court is of opinion, that, upon the facts stated in the plea in abatement, Dred Scott was not a citizen of Missouri within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and not entitled as such to sue in its courts; and, consequently, that the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction of the case, and that the judgment on the plea in abatement is erroneous....

II...

[The Court then discussed whether Scott remained a slave after his sojourn in the Louisiana Territory and Illinois.]

The act of Congress, upon which the plaintiff relies, declares that slavery and involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, shall be forever prohibited in all that part of the [Louisiana Purchase that includes what is now Minnesota.] And the difficulty which meets us at the threshold of this part of the inquiry is, whether Congress was authorized to pass this law under any of the powers granted to it by the Constitution; for if the authority is not given by that instrument, it is the duty of this court to declare it void and inoperative, and incapable of conferring freedom upon any one who is held as a slave under the laws of any one of the States....

[The] power of Congress over the person or property of a citizen can never be a mere discretionary power under our Constitution and form of Government. The powers of the Government and the rights and privileges of the citizen are regulated and plainly defined by the Constitution itself. [An] act of Congress which deprives a citizen of the United States of his liberty or property, merely because he came himself or brought his property into a particular Territory of the United States, and who had committed no offence against the laws, could hardly be dignified with the name of due process of law....

[The] right of property in a slave is distinctly and expressly affirmed in the Constitution. The right to traffic in it, like an ordinary article of merchandise and property, was guarantied to the citizens of the United States, in every State that might desire it, for twenty years. And the Government in express terms is pledged to protect it in all future time, if the slave escapes from his owner. This is done in plain words—too plain to be misunderstood. And no word can be found in the Constitution which gives Congress a greater power over slave property, or which entitles property of that kind to less protection than property of any other description. The only power conferred is the power coupled with the duty of guarding and protecting the owner in his rights.

Upon these considerations, it is the opinion of the court that the act of Congress which prohibited a citizen from holding and owning property of this kind in the territory of the United States [described in the 1820 Act], is not warranted by the Constitution, and is therefore void; and that neither Dred Scott himself, nor any of his family, were made free by being carried into this territory; even if they had been carried there by the owner, with the intention of becoming a permanent resident.

[Finally, the Court addressed Scott's contention that he had been made free by his visit to Illinois, a free state. The Court held that his status on his return to Missouri was to be determined by Missouri law, rather than Illinois law, and that under that law he remained a slave.]

[Justices Wayne, Daniel, Campbell, Crier, Nelson, and Catron each wrote separate concurring opinions. Justices McLean and Curtis dissented.]

Note: Dred Scott and the Power of Judicial Review

1. The meaning of Dred Scott. After Dred Scott, were free blacks in northern states citizens of those states for federal constitutional purposes? Short of amending the Constitution, was there anything that either those states or the federal government could do to make them citizens? If Scott and his owner had remained in the Louisiana Territory, could Congress have prohibited the owner from holding Scott as a slave?

2. Chief Justice Taney's opinion and the problem of judicial review. It is frequently noted that the Supreme Court first asserted the power to invalidate acts of Congress in Marbury v. Madison. Less often mentioned is the fact that the Court's second assertion of this power came fifty-four years later in Scott v. Sandford. What lessons does Dred Scott teach about judicial review? For an argument that Dred Scott was actually not so major a departure from prior practice, see Gruber, The New Fiction: Dred Scott and the Language of Judicial Authority, 82 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 177 (2007).

It is generally acknowledged that Dred Scott is one of the great disasters in the history of the Supreme Court. But what precisely is wrong with Chief Justice Taney's opinion? Consider the following possibilities:

a. The Court unnecessarily and unwisely reached out to decide an issue not properly presented. The first part of Chief Justice Taney's opinion held that Scott was not a citizen of Missouri, and that the court below therefore lacked jurisdiction. Given that holding, was it proper for the Court then to decide the questions addressed in the second part of the opinion? Why was it necessary to address the constitutionality of congressional power to enact the Missouri Compromise?

Did Chief Justice Taney have to read the diversity clause as establishing federal standards for state citizenship? Why wasn't it sufficient to hold that Scott, even if free, was not a citizen of Missouri under Missouri law?

b. The Court's decision is racist in its premises and morally obtuse in its result. Whatever else may be true, can it be doubted that the framers viewed slaves as a form of property? Is the problem with Dred Scott that the Court was too "active" in reading the contemporary moral attitudes of the justices into the constitutional text or that it was too "passive" in rigidly saddling the country with outdated moral attitudes?

c. The Court unwisely assumed that it could finally resolve a divisive political issue by taking it "out of politics." Consider R. Burt, The Constitution in Conflict 193 (1992):

[Dred Scott inflamed] northern fears and [emboldened] southern leaders to escalate their demands for national legitimization of slavery. The Court had already set this course in Prigg; by shutting off all possible meliorist interventions in the fugitive slave rendition process, [the] Court drove the abolitionist lawyers out of public institutions [and] into the streets....

Modern constitutional doctrines are sometimes justified on the ground that they remove highly divisive questions from the political process. For example, the abortion decisions and expansive readings of the first amendment religion clauses are sometimes defended on the ground that the underlying questions are inappropriate for political resolution. What are the characteristics of such questions? Was the future and spread of slavery such a question?

d. The problem was not that the Court attempted to impose a solution to the slavery problem, but that it attempted to impose the wrong solution. The decision failed to solve the problem and exacerbated sectional tensions. Should Supreme Court decisions be judged by whether they "work" in this sense? Should justices consider whether their decisions will be "accepted"? Whether they will produce “wise” social policy?

e. The revisionist view. Is the condemnation of Dred Scott largely a problem of hindsight? To be sure, the decision was widely criticized at the time. But some scholars have recently suggested that while the result in Dred Scott is certainly unpalatable in light of modern views of slavery and race, the decision was “well within the mainstream of antebellum constitutional thought.” M. Graber, Dred Scott and the Problem of Constitutional Evil 28 (2006). Graber continues:

[All] forms of constitutional logic are capable of yielding evil results. Institutional arguments yield evil results whenever elected officials and popular majorities support evil laws. Historical arguments yield evil results whenever constitutional framers and ratifiers constitutionalize evil practices. Aspirational arguments yield evil results whenever constitutional framers have evil constitutional values.

2. Reconstruction and Retreat

The Civil War and its aftermath saw a major realignment in the constitutional understanding of the relationship between the federal and state governments and in the role of the federal government with respect to individual rights. Prior to the Civil War, “the United States” was treated as a plural noun. In Dred Scott, for example, the Court referred to a federal statute passed during the War of 1812 that referred to “the war in which the United States are engaged.” After the Civil War, by contrast, “the United States” became a singular noun. See James M. McPherson, Battle Cry of Freedom: The Civil War Era 859 (1988). Similarly, the original Constitution rested on the view that the most serious threat to individual liberty came from the federal government, and that the states could be relied on to “afford complete security against invasions of the public liberty by the national authorities.” The Federalist No. 28 (Hamilton). But by the close of the Civil War, it was clear that the southern states could not be depended on to protect the rights of the newly freed slaves, and it could hardly be maintained that the main threat to those rights came from the federal government. Under the pressure of this reality, a shift occurred: Instead of viewing the Constitution as a protection from federal power, at least some people came to see constitutional rights as a basis for the assertion of federal power to protect individuals against state interference.

Note: The Work of the Reconstruction Congress

The Reconstruction Congress laid the groundwork for the expansion of federal authority by enacting three constitutional amendments, each of which conferred additional substantive power on Congress. On December 31, 1865, the thirteenth amendment became part of the Constitution. The amendment ratified and extended President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation by prohibiting slavery and involuntary servitude throughout the United States. In addition, section 2 of the amendment granted Congress the power "to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

The formal eradication of slavery was insufficient to change the real status of southern blacks. The bonds of slavery were quickly replaced by "Black Codes" in many southern states, which prohibited African Americans from exercising basic civil rights like owning property, pursuing ordinary occupations, or giving testimony in court and which created punishments for ill-defined crimes such as vagrancy or breaking an employment contract that threatened to return large numbers of freedmen to conditions virtually identical to slavery.

Congress attempted to make the thirteenth amendment effective against the challenge posed by the Black Codes through enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1866. Passed over President Johnson's veto, the act declared that "all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed," were citizens of the United States. Such citizens were granted the same right to make and enforce contracts, sue, give evidence, acquire property, and "to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens." Moreover, all citizens were to be "subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." For discussion of the 1866 act, see G. Rutherglen, Civil Rights in the Shadow of Slavery: The Constitution, Common Law, and the Civil Rights Act of 1866 (2012).

Even before the civil rights bill was passed, however, doubt arose about Congress's power to enact such a law. Thus, in February 1866, Congressman Bingham introduced the first version of what was to become the fourteenth amendment. It stated that "[the] Congress shall have the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, and to all persons in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property.” Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 813, 1034 (1866).

On April 30, 1866, after extensive debate, the Joint Committee on Reconstruction reported a new proposal that provided that “[no] state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.” These substantive prohibitions were coupled with another grant of power to Congress to enforce them “by appropriate legislation.” The amendment was adopted by the House in this form. When the amendment reached the Senate, the first sentence of section 1—making all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside, and overruling the Supreme Court’s interpretation in Dred Scott—was added. (The amendment also contained several other provisions—for example, one superseding the notorious “three fifths clause” for apportioning congressional seats among the states.) For a comprehensive treatment of the drafting history of the fourteenth amendment, see W. Nelson, The Fourteenth Amendment: From Political Principle to Judicial Doctrine (1988). The amendment was ratified on July 28, 1868.

Two years later, on March 30, 1870, Congress added the last of the Reconstruction amendments. It prohibited both the United States and any state from denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude and also contained an enforcement clause.

In thinking about the meaning of the amendments generally, and their effect on constitutional interpretation more generally, note the Reconstruction Congress’s reaction to Dred Scott. Did the amendments alter the balance of power between the judiciary and the political branches? As previously noted, the primary impetus for passage of the fourteenth amendment was the need to provide a basis for federal legislative action against the states. But was the amendment intended as well to be a basis for federal judicial power? Consider the following view:

In the political context of the day, Democratic opponents of the expansion of civil rights were the champions of the judiciary. It is doubtful that the Republicans who drafted and adopted the Amendment would be greatly impressed with the “primary authority” of the institution that had so recently produced Dred Scott v. Sandford[.] Indeed, John Bingham, principal author of the Fourteenth Amendment, advocated taming the Court's power of judicial review by requiring a two-thirds majority of the Court to strike down congressional legislation, and goaded his fellow members of Congress to vote for the proposal by reminding them of the "horrid blasphemy" of Dred Scott.

McConnell, Comment, Institutions and Interpretation: A Critique of City of Boerne v. Flores, 111 Harv. L. Rev. 153, 182 (1997).

Note: The Judicial Reaction

1. The Slaughter-House Cases and the reassertion of federalism constraints. The Supreme Court's first opportunity to assess the impact of the Reconstruction amendments came in The Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873), in which the Court rejected a thirteenth and fourteenth amendment attack on a Louisiana statute granting to a single company a monopoly over operating a slaughterhouse within an area including the city of New Orleans. (These cases are dealt with at greater length in Chapter 6, section B, infra.) Justice Miller's opinion for the Court begins with a ringing declaration that "the one pervading purpose" of the amendments was "[the] freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him." The Court emphasized that it did not follow from this purpose that the framers of the amendments intended to transfer general responsibility for protection of civil rights from the states to the federal government. Such a broad reading of the amendments would "degrade the State governments" and "radically [change] the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other and both of these governments to the people." Thus, the privileges and immunities clause of the fourteenth amendment did not provide general federal protection for citizens against state regulation. Rather, it protected only a few rights, "which owe their existence to the Federal government, its National character, its Constitution, or its laws." Nor was the due process clause implicated by the Louisiana statute. As for petitioners' equal protection clause arguments, the Court "[doubted] very much whether any action of a State not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision."

2. Federalism and protection of the newly freed slaves. The Slaughter-House Cases suggest a two-tiered approach to the fourteenth amendment: When the rights of newly freed slaves are at stake, the amendment must be read expansively to provide comprehensive federal protection. But when racial discrimination is not at issue, the protections are narrower, and a state resident's primary recourse for protection of his rights remains to his own state government.

This approach is consistent with the history of the fourteenth amendment, which was unquestionably written primarily to protect the newly freed slaves. Note, however, that the language of the amendment provides no basis for the distinction. Was the Court correct in emphasizing the history rather than the language?

In some measure, the Court's treatment of the fourteenth amendment in the wake of Slaughter-House conformed to the two-tiered approach and, indeed, remnants of it remain today. Thus, on the one hand, the Court has continued to be quite deferential to political outcomes when "ordinary social and economic legislation" is challenged under the fourteenth amendment. On the other hand, the Court quickly established that federal protection was available when the states singled out blacks for discriminatory treatment. See, e.g., Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303 (1879) (reversing the murder conviction of a black man tried before a jury from which members of his race were excluded by law); see also Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339 (1880).

3. Judicial invalidation of civil rights legislation. Within a few years, the Court's narrow interpretation of the Reconstruction amendments started to undermine federal efforts to protect newly freed slaves.

The first intimations of difficulty came in United States v. Reese, 92 U.S. 214 (1875), which involved a federal criminal prosecution against two Kentucky elections inspectors who were charged with violating the 1870 Enforcement Act when they denied a black man the right to vote. Because the relevant sections were not expressly limited to actions that were racially motivated, the Court held that they exceeded Congress's power under the fifteenth amendment, and that the prosecution could not proceed. See also Virginia v. Rives, 100 U.S. 313 (1879).

The Court further restricted the scope of Reconstruction legislation in United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1875). The case grew out of the Grant Parish massacre, which has been called "perhaps the bloodiest racial conflict in Louisiana history." R. Kaczorowski, The Politics of Judicial Interpretation: The Federal Courts, Department of Justice and Civil Rights, 1866–1876, at 175 (1985). Following the state election of 1872 both conservatives and Republicans claimed victory. The Republicans gained control of the parish courthouse and were attacked by a "veritable army" of "old time Ku Klux Klan." According to federal investigators sent to the scene, "[at] least 60 freedmen were killed after they had surrendered, and their bodies were mutilated and left to rot in the parching sun.” Although ninety-seven defendants were indicted under the Enforcement Act of 1870, only nine defendants were brought to trial, and only three of those were convicted. The Supreme Court reversed the convictions. It rejected the government’s argument that the criminal conspiracy section of the 1870 Act was applicable to the lynching of two black men because the lynching interfered with their right of peaceable assembly. Since there was no claim that the victims had assembled to petition the federal government, the prosecution had not alleged that the rights of national citizenship were violated, and punishment therefore exceeded Congress’s power under the fourteenth amendment. Nor could the prosecution proceed on the theory that the due process rights of blacks were violated, since “the fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; but this adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another.” See generally C. Lane, The Day Freedom Died: The Colfax Massacre, The Supreme Court, and the Betrayal of Reconstruction (2008).

In United States v. Harris, 106 U.S. 629 (1883), the Court reached a similar result with respect to the criminal conspiracy sections of the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871. The Court held that, because the fourteenth amendment did not reach purely private conduct, Congress lacked the power to punish members of a lynch mob who had seized prisoners held by a state deputy sheriff.

But the most damaging judicial attack on Reconstruction legislation came in The Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883), where the Court invalidated the public accommodation sections of the 1875 Civil Rights Act. (The Civil Rights Cases are excerpted more fully in Chapter 9, section A, infra.) The Court, in an opinion by Justice Bradley, denied that either the thirteenth or the fourteenth amendment conferred on Congress the power to prohibit private discrimination in public accommodations. The Court’s discussion of the fourteenth amendment is usually treated as establishing the requirement of “state action” for a fourteenth amendment violation—a requirement examined in greater detail in Chapter 9. The Court held that “[the] first section of the Fourteenth Amendment [is] prohibitory...upon the States. [It] is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment.” For additional discussion of the Civil Rights Cases, see Rutherglen, State Action, Private Action, and the Thirteenth Amendment, 94 Va. L. Rev. 1367, 1386–1389 (2008).

The Court acknowledged that laws enacted under the thirteenth amendment “may be primary and direct in [character]; for the thirteenth amendment is not a mere prohibition of State laws establishing or upholding slavery, but an absolute declaration that slavery or involuntary servitude shall not exist in any part of the United States.” The Court also agreed that Congress was empowered under the amendment “to pass all laws necessary and proper for abolishing all badges and incidents of slavery in the United States.” But the crucial question was whether the discriminatory refusal to serve a black person in a public accommodation was such a badge or incident. The Court thought that accepting this position “would be running the slavery argument into the ground.” A refusal of service “has nothing to do with slavery or involuntary servitude. [If] it is violative of any right of the party, his redress is to be sought under the laws of the State; or if those laws are adverse to his rights and do not protect him, his remedy will be found in the corrective legislation which Congress has adopted, or may adopt, for counteracting the effect of State laws, or State action, prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment.”

Was the Reconstruction Court concerned primarily with what the rights of blacks should be, with the source of interference with those rights, or with which organ of government should have the power to vindicate them? In cases where racial discrimination affected federal rights, the Court upheld Reconstruction legislation. Thus, in Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U.S. 651 (1884), the Court sustained a conviction of a private individual under the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871 for using violence against blacks voting in a congressional election. Similarly, in Logan v. United States, 144 U.S. 263 (1892), the Court held that Congress had the power to punish conspiracies to injure persons in custody of a U.S. marshal. It is at least possible to argue from these cases that the justices were authentically concerned about the expansion of federal power. But what about the expansion of federal judicial power that The Civil Rights Cases represented? Was that expansion consistent with the approach of The Slaughter-House Cases? With the intent of the framers of the Reconstruction amendments? Consider McConnell, supra, who suggests that the Reconstruction amendments contained congressional enforcement clauses precisely because the framers thought Congress better positioned than the judiciary to protect the substantive rights the amendments conveyed. In the context of the 1880s, was it meaningful to speak of the rights of blacks without an expansion of federal power? To the extent that it was, because black men remained active politically within those states, did Court decisions that undermined blacks’ ability to participate in the political process undermine equality? See J. Kousser, The Shaping of Southern Politics: Suffrage Restrictions and the Establishment of the One-Party South, 1880–1910 (1974); R. Vallely, The Two Reconstructions: The Struggle for Black Enfranchisement (2004).

At the same time that the Court was dismantling much of the Reconstruction legislation, the political coalition behind Reconstruction was also collapsing. The first turning point is usually said to have come with the disputed election of 1876. In return for accepting Hayes's election, Democratic leaders were promised the withdrawal of federal troops from the South and the inclusion of southern Democrats in the cabinet. The post-Reconstruction status of blacks was not, however, a foregone conclusion. As C. Vann Woodward writes in his classic study, Southern white people themselves [were not] so united on that subject at first as has been generally assumed. The determination of the Negro's "place" took shape gradually under the influence of economic and political conflicts among divided white people—conflicts that were eventually resolved in part at the expense of the Negro.

Plessy v. Ferguson

163 U.S. 537 (1896)

MR. JUSTICE BROWN [delivered] the opinion of the court.

[A Louisiana statute enacted in 1890 required railroad companies to provide "equal but separate accommodations for the white and colored races," with the provision that "nothing in this act shall be construed as applying to nurses attending children of the other race." A passenger using facilities intended for a different race was made criminally liable. Plessy, who claimed to be seven-eighths Caucasian, was prosecuted under the statute when he failed to leave the coach reserved for whites. The state supreme court upheld the constitutionality of the statute.]

The object of the [fourteenth] amendment was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law, but, in the nature of things, it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political, equality, or a commingling of the two races upon terms unsatisfactory to either. Laws permitting, and even requiring, their separation, in places where they are liable to be brought into contact, do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other, and have been generally, if not universally, recognized as within the competency of the state legislatures in the exercise of their police power. The most common instance of this is connected with the establishment of separate schools for white and colored children, which have been held to be a valid exercise of the legislative power even by courts of states where the political rights of the colored race have been longest and most earnestly enforced....

[Counsel for Plessy suggests] that the same argument that will justify the state legislature in requiring railways to provide separate accommodations for the two races will also authorize them to require separate cars to be provided for people whose hair is of a certain color, or who are aliens, or who belong to certain nationalities, or to enact laws requiring colored people to walk upon one side of the street, and white people upon the other, or requiring white men's houses to be painted white, and colored men's black, or their vehicles or business signs to be of different colors, upon the theory that one side of the street is as good as the other, or that a house or vehicle of one color is as good as one of another color. The reply to all this is that every exercise of the police power must be reasonable, and extend only to such laws as are enacted in good faith for the promotion of the public good, and not for the annoyance or oppression of a particular class....

So far, then, as a conflict with the fourteenth amendment is concerned, the case reduces itself to the question whether the statute of Louisiana is a reasonable regulation, and with respect to this there must necessarily be a large discretion on the part of the legislature. In determining the question of reasonableness, it is at liberty to act with reference to the established usages, customs, and traditions of the people, and with a view to the promotion of their comfort, and the preservation of the public peace and good order. Gauged by this standard, we cannot say that a law which authorizes or even requires the separation of the two races in public conveyances is unreasonable, or more obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment than the acts of congress requiring separate schools for colored children in the District of Columbia, the constitutionality of which does not seem to have been questioned, or the corresponding acts of state legislatures.

We consider the underlying fallacy of the plaintiff's argument to consist in the assumption that the enforced separation of the two races stamps the colored race with a badge of inferiority. If this be so, it is not by reason of anything found in the act, but solely because the colored race chooses to put that construction upon it. The argument necessarily assumes that if, as has been more than once the case, and is not unlikely to be so again, the colored race should become the dominant power in the state legislature, and should enact a law in precisely similar terms, it would thereby relegate the white race to an inferior position. We imagine that the white race, at least, would not acquiesce in this assumption. The argument also assumes that social prejudices may be overcome by legislation, and that equal rights cannot be secured to the negro except by an enforced commingling of the two races. We cannot accept this proposition. If the two races are to meet upon terms of social equality, it must be the result of natural affinities, a mutual appreciation of each other's merits, and a voluntary consent of individuals. [Legislation] is powerless to eradicate racial instincts, or to abolish distinctions based upon physical differences, and the attempt to do so can only result in accentuating the difficulties of the present situation. If the civil and political rights of both races be equal, one cannot be inferior to the other civilly or politically. If one race be inferior to the other socially, the constitution of the United States cannot put them upon the same plane....

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, dissenting....

In respect of civil rights, common to all citizens, the constitution of the United States does not, I think, permit any public authority to know the race of those entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of such rights. Every true man has pride of race, and under appropriate circumstances, when the rights of others, his equals before the law, are not to be affected, it is his privilege to express such pride and to take such action based upon it as to him seems proper. But I deny that any legislative body or judicial tribunal may have regard to the race of citizens when the civil rights of those citizens are involved. Indeed, such legislation as that here in question is inconsistent not only with that equality of rights which pertains to citizenship, national and state, but with the personal liberty enjoyed by every one within the United States....

It was said in argument that the statute of Louisiana does not discriminate against either race, but prescribes a rule applicable alike to white and colored citizens. But this argument does not meet the difficulty. Every one knows that the statute in question had its origin in the purpose, not so much to exclude white persons from railroad cars occupied by blacks, as to exclude colored people from coaches occupied by or assigned to white persons....

[If] a state can prescribe, as a rule of civil conduct, that whites and blacks shall not travel as passengers in the same railroad coach, why may it not so regulate the use of the streets of its cities and towns as to compel white citizens to keep on one side of a street and black citizens to keep on the other? Why may it not, upon like grounds, punish whites and blacks who ride together in street cars or in open vehicles on a public road or street?...

The answer given at the argument to these questions was that regulations of the kind they suggest would be unreasonable, and could not, therefore, stand before the law. Is it meant that the determination of questions of legislative power depends upon the inquiry whether the statute whose validity is questioned is, in the judgment of the courts, a reasonable one, taking all the circumstances into consideration? A statute may be unreasonable merely because a sound public policy forbade its enactment. But I do not understand that the courts have anything to do with the policy or expediency of legislation....

The white race deems itself to be the dominant race in this country. And so it is, in prestige, in achievements, in education, in wealth, and in power. So, I doubt not, it will continue to be for all time, if it remains true to its great heritage, and holds fast to the principles of constitutional liberty. But in view of the constitution, in the eye of the law, there is in this country no superior, dominant, ruling class of citizens. There is no caste here. Our constitution is colorblind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens. In respect of civil rights, all citizens are equal before the law. The humblest is the peer of the most powerful. The law regards man as man, and takes no account of his surroundings or of his color when his civil rights as guaranteed by the supreme law of the land are involved....

In my opinion, the judgment this day rendered will, in time, prove to be quite as pernicious as the decision made by this tribunal in the Dred Scott case. [The] present decision, it may well be apprehended, will not only stimulate aggressions, more or less brutal and irritating, upon the admitted rights of colored citizens, but will encourage the belief that it is possible, by means of state enactments, to defeat the beneficent purposes which the people of the United States had in view when they adopted the recent amendments of the constitution. [Sixty] millions of whites are in no danger from the presence here of eight millions of blacks. The destinies of the two races, in this country, are indissolubly linked together, and the interests of both require that the common government of all shall not permit the seeds of race hate to be planted under the sanction of law. What can more certainly arouse race hate, what more certainly create and perpetuate a feeling of distrust between these races, than state enactments which, in fact, proceed on the ground that colored citizens are so inferior and degraded that they cannot be allowed to sit in public coaches occupied by white citizens? That, as all will admit, is the real meaning of such legislation as was enacted in Louisiana.

There is a race so different from our own that we do not permit those belonging to it to become citizens of the United States. [I] allude to the Chinese race. But by the statute in question, a Chinaman can ride in the same passenger coach with white citizens of the United States, while citizens of the black race in Louisiana, many of whom, perhaps, risked their lives for the preservation of the Union, who are entitled by law, to participate in the political control of the State and nation, who are not excluded, by law or by reason of their race, from public stations of any kind, and who have all the legal rights that belong to white citizens, are yet declared to be criminals, liable to imprisonment, if they ride in a public coach occupied by citizens of the white race. It is scarcely just to say that a colored citizen should not object to occupying a public coach assigned to his own race. [He] ought never to cease objecting to the proposition, that citizens of the white and black races can be adjudged criminals because they sit [in] the same public coach on a public highway.

Note: Separate but Equal

1. Equality of separate facilities. Although Plessy v. Ferguson is often said to have inaugurated the “separate but equal” doctrine, notice that Plessy itself does not require the equality of separate facilities.

Three years after Plessy the Court squarely addressed that issue in Cumming v. Board of Education, 175 U.S. 528 (1899). Petitioners, black taxpayers and parents, challenged their tax assessment on the ground that the money was utilized to support a high school open only to white students. The school board had initially operated a separate black high school, but the facility had been closed to free funds for the education of black primary school students. In an opinion by Justice Harlan, who had dissented in Plessy and The Civil Rights Cases, the Court rejected the challenge. The basis for and scope of the Court’s holding are not altogether clear. The Court thought it significant that the substantial relief asked is an injunction that would either impair the efficiency of the high school provided for white children or compel the Board to close it. But if that were done, the result would only be to take from white children educational privileges enjoyed by them, without giving to colored children additional opportunities for the education furnished in high schools. [If,] in some appropriate proceeding instituted directly for that purpose, the plaintiffs had sought to compel the Board of Education, out of funds in its hands or under its control, to establish and maintain a high school for colored children, and if it appeared that the Board’s refusal to maintain such a school was in fact an abuse of its discretion and in hostility to the colored population because of their race, different questions might have arisen in the state court.

The Court made clear, however, that local authorities were to be accorded substantial discretion in allocating funds between white and black facilities, and that “any interference on the part of Federal authority with the management of such schools cannot be justified except in the case of a clear and unmistakable disregard of rights secured by the supreme law of the land.”

Compare Plessy and Cumming with McCabe v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway, 235 U.S. 151 (1914). An Oklahoma statute required railroads to provide separate but equal coach facilities. The statute also authorized railroads to haul sleeping cars, dining cars, and chair cars to be used exclusively by one race but not the other. It did not require the railroad to provide these facilities for both white and black passengers. Five black individuals sued a number of railroads seeking an injunction restraining the railroads from denying them service on the basis of race. The state justified the provision governing sleeping, dining, and chair cars on the ground that the minimal black demand for these facilities made it impractical to haul separate cars for this purpose. The Court found this argument “without merit” because [it] makes the constitutional right depend upon the number of persons who may be discriminated against, whereas the essence of the constitutional right is that it is a personal one. Whether or not particular facilities shall be provided may doubtless be conditioned upon there being a reasonable demand therefor, but if facilities are provided, substantial equality of treatment of persons traveling under like conditions cannot be refused. It is the individual who is entitled to the equal protection of the laws, and if he is denied by a common carrier, acting in the matter under the authority of a state law, a facility of convenience in the course of his journey which under substantially the same circumstances is furnished to another traveler, he may properly complain that his constitutional privilege has been invaded.

Can McCabe be reconciled with Cumming? With Plessy?

2. The state interest in separate facilities. Note that Plessy does not approve all statutes mandating separate treatment. Only those that are “reasonable” are permissible. What state interest made racial separation “reasonable” in Plessy? Is respect for majority preferences alone a sufficient justification for separation?

Compare Plessy with Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U.S. 45 (1908). The college, a private institution, was convicted under a statute making it a crime to operate a school “where persons of the white and negro races are both received as pupils for instruction.” The Court affirmed the conviction, but on the ground that the college was a corporation that did not have all the rights of individuals. In light of Plessy, why did the Court think it necessary to qualify its holding in this way? If an individual had been prosecuted under the same statute, what result?

In Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60 (1917), the Court held that a statute prohibiting whites from occupying a residence in a block where the majority of houses were occupied by blacks, and vice versa, violated the fourteenth amendment. The challenge to the statute arose in the context of a suit by a white seller to enforce specifically a contract with a black purchaser, who claimed that the law barred him from occupying the residence. The Court acknowledged that “there exists a serious and difficult problem arising from a feeling of race hostility which the law is powerless to control, and to which it must give a measure of consideration.” But the Court believed that “such legislation must have its limitations,” and that these legitimate objectives could not “be accomplished by laws or ordinances which deny rights created or protected by the Federal Constitution.” The Court distinguished Plessy and Berea College: “In each instance the complaining person was afforded the opportunity to ride, or to attend institutions of learning, or afforded the thing of whatever nature to which in the particular case he was entitled. The most that was done was to require him as a member of a class to conform with reasonable rules in regard to separation of races. In none of them was he denied the right to use, control, or dispose of his property, as in this case.”

Does this distinction make sense? Is there a general principle that explains the results in Plessy, Cumming, McCabe, Berea College, and Buchanan?

3. The Attack on Jim Crow

As the previous section indicates, the framers of the Reconstruction amendments almost certainly intended that the rights of newly freed slaves would be protected by federal legislative action authorized by the new sources of congressional power contained in those amendments. This intent was frustrated by the Court’s adherence to an older version of federalism and by the collapse of the political consensus supporting civil rights legislation.

One ironic consequence of the Court’s invalidation of Reconstruction legislation was that, when meaningful reform finally came, it was the courts, rather than Congress, that provided the impetus for change. From 1938, when the NAACP won its first Supreme Court victory in a school desegregation case, until the 1960s, when a political consensus favoring civil rights again emerged, the courts stood largely alone in articulating and enforcing the law of race discrimination. What difference might it have made that the protection of blacks was left to judicial interpretations of the Constitution rather than to legislative action?

Note: The Road to Brown

1. The NAACP's decision to attack school segregation. In 1922, Charles Garland used his inheritance to create the American Fund for Public Service and a committee formed to administer the Fund recommended that the fund finance a campaign for black equality. The Fund gave a grant of $100,000 to the NAACP, along with a memorandum setting out a legal strategy for attacking unequal, segregated schools in the South. See R. Kluger, Simple Justice 132–133 (1976). Using those funds, the NAACP launched a multi-pronged litigation campaign, “attack[ing] what might be called targets of opportunity. [If] the military metaphor referring to a litigation campaign is helpful, the campaign was conducted on a terrain that repeatedly required changes in maneuvers.” M. Tushnet, Segregated Schools and Legal Strategy: The NAACP’s Campaign against Segregated Education, 1925–1950, at 145–146 (1987). For more on the NAACP’s litigation strategy leading up to Brown, including a discussion of litigation as a means of social reform, see M. Tushnet, Some Legacies of Brown v. Board of Education, 90 Va. L. Rev. 1693 (2004). Although the NAACP’s campaign was neither systematic nor invariably successful, it slowly remade the law.

2. The higher education cases. Between 1938 and 1950, the Supreme Court decided a series of cases involving black plaintiffs who challenged their exclusion from state institutions of higher education. In Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U.S. 337 (1938), the Court held that Missouri’s practice of maintaining an all-white state law school, while agreeing to pay black residents’ tuition at institutions in neighboring states, violated the equal protection clause. Writing for the Court, Chief Justice Hughes stated that

[the] basic consideration is not as to what sort of opportunities other States provide, or whether they are as good as those in Missouri, but as to what opportunities Missouri itself furnishes to white students and denies to negroes solely upon the ground of color. [The] white resident is afforded legal education within the State; the negro resident having the same qualification is refused it there and must go outside the State to obtain it. That is a denial of the equality of legal right to the enjoyment of the privilege which the state has set up, and the provision for the payment of tuition fees in another State does not remove the discrimination.

In Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U.S. 631 (1948), the Court unanimously reaffirmed Gaines and held that Oklahoma was required to provide the plaintiff with a legal education and to “provide it as soon as it does for applicants of any other group.” On remand, the trial court gave the state the option of either admitting Sipuel or immediately establishing a separate black law school. Sipuel sought mandamus in the Supreme Court, claiming that this disposition was inconsistent with the Court's mandate, since the hastily established black school could not possibly provide an equal education. In Fisher v. Hurst, 333 U.S. 147 (1948), the Court, over two dissents, denied relief. The Court noted that "the petition for certiorari in [Sipuel] did not present the issue whether a state might not satisfy the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by establishing a separate school for Negroes." For an account of the Court's deliberations over Sipuel and Fisher, see Hutchinson, Unanimity and Desegregation: Decisionmaking in the Supreme Court, 1948–1958, 68 Geo. L.J. 1, 6–9 (1979).

In Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629 (1950), the Court did what it had declined to do in Fisher—order the admission of a black student to a white school. Sweatt was denied admission to the University of Texas Law School on the ground that a parallel black school, opened after the litigation commenced, was a substantially equal facility. The Court held that the facility was not in fact equal, and that Sweatt therefore could not be denied admission to the white school. In reaching this conclusion, the Court was aided by the obvious inequality between the two schools in objectively measurable factors like size of library and number of full-time faculty. But the Court did not limit its examination to these factors:

What is more important, the University of Texas Law School possesses to a far greater degree those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness in a law school. Such qualities, to name but a few, include reputation of the faculty, experience of the administration, position and influence of the alumni, standing in the community, traditions and prestige. It is difficult to believe that one who had a free choice between these law schools would consider the question close.

Moreover, although the law is a highly learned profession, we are well aware that it is an intensely practical one. The law school, the proving ground for legal learning and practice, cannot be effective in isolation from the individuals and institutions with which the law interacts. Few students and no one who has practiced law would choose to study in an academic vacuum, removed from the interplay of ideas and the exchange of views with which the law is concerned. The law school to which Texas is willing to admit petitioner excludes from its student body members of the racial groups which number 85% of the population of the State and include most of the lawyers, witnesses, jurors, judges and other officials with whom petitioner will inevitably be dealing when he becomes a member of the Texas Bar. With such a substantial and significant segment of society excluded, we cannot conclude that the education offered petitioner is substantially equal to that which he would receive if admitted to the University of Texas Law School.

The Court further elaborated on this theme in McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U.S. 637 (1950), decided the same day as Sweatt. In McLaurin, the state, under the pressure of litigation, admitted petitioner to the previously all-white University of Oklahoma Department of Education. However, McLaurin was made to sit in a special classroom seat reserved for blacks, could not eat with other students in the cafeteria, and was given a special table in the library. Although McLaurin could not claim that the physical facilities provided him were unequal, the Court held the restrictions unconstitutional because they “[impaired] and [inhibited] his ability to study, to engage in discussions and exchange views with other students, and, in general, to learn his profession.”

What notion of equality do the higher education cases embody? Do they represent an implicit repudiation of Cumming and Plessy?

3. The broader context. Consider the extent to which external events, rather than the internal logic of legal doctrine, explain these legal developments. Between 1938 and 1954, the United States fought and won a world war against an overtly racist regime in Germany; African Americans moved into northern cities in increasing numbers, where they became a much more potent political interest group; America became embroiled in a “cold war” in which racist policies in the South were used to discredit the United States in the underdeveloped world; and the first African-American baseball player joined the Brooklyn Dodgers. For extensive discussions of the relationship between these social, economic, and political changes and the development of legal doctrine see M. Dudziak, Cold War Civil Rights: Race and the Image of American Democracy (2000); M. Klarmann, From Jim Crow to Civil Rights: The Supreme Court and the Struggle for Racial Equality (2004).

4. Challenges to segregation within public schools. Consider why the NAACP chose to launch its attack by challenging racial exclusion at the graduate school level. Was this primarily because it was easier to show inequality from a state’s complete failure to provide black students with any opportunities at all? Or did it reflect a less legally oriented strategic calculation that courts, or the public, would be less resistant to desegregation at the graduate school level?

By 1950, the NAACP had resolved to launch a frontal attack against racial segregation in public schools. A short time earlier, a group of Mexican-American parents had challenged several California school districts’ long-standing policy of assigning Mexican-American students to different schools than Anglo students. In Mendez v. Westminster School District, 64 F. Supp. 544 (S.D. Cal. 1946), a district court struck down the school systems' assignment policy as a violation of the fourteenth amendment. Although the court did not view the segregation as "racial" per se, it referred to a series of Supreme Court decisions involving race discrimination in public schools, including Cumming, Gaines, and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U.S. 78 (1927) (where the Supreme Court had upheld a Mississippi school district's decision to send a Chinese-American student to the "colored" rather than the "white" high school). It concluded:

"The equal protection of the laws" pertaining to the public school system in California is not provided by furnishing in separate schools the same technical facilities, text books and courses of instruction to children of Mexican ancestry that are available to the other public school children regardless of their ancestry. A paramount requisite in the American system of public education is social equality. It must be open to all children by unified school association regardless of lineage....

The evidence clearly shows that Spanish-speaking children are retarded in learning English by lack of exposure to its use because of segregation, and that commingling of the entire student body instills and develops a common cultural attitude among the school children which is imperative for the perpetuation of American institutions and ideals. It is also established by the record that the methods of segregation prevalent in the defendant school districts foster antagonisms in the children and suggest inferiority among them where none exists.

The court of appeals affirmed. 161 F.2d 774 (9th Cir. 1947). Although the school districts had argued that Gong Lum and Plessy justified their policies, and several amici (including the NAACP), had suggested, in the court's words, that "we should strike out independently on the whole question of segregation, on the ground that recent world stirring events have set men to the reexamination of concepts considered fixed," the court resolved the case in the plaintiffs' favor on the grounds that California law did not affirmatively authorize the segregation of Mexican-American students. (At the time the Mendez plaintiffs had brought suit, state law did authorize the creation of separate schools for students of Native American, Chinese, Japanese, and Mongolian ancestry.)

While Mendez was pending, the California legislature enacted legislation repealing the state's existing school segregation statute. Shortly after the decision was affirmed, the bill was signed into law by then-Governor Earl Warren, who seven years later wrote the U.S. Supreme Court's opinion in Brown.

Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka (Brown I)

347 U.S. 483 (1954)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court....

In each of [these] cases, minors of the Negro race, through their legal representatives, seek the aid of the courts in obtaining admission to the public schools of their community on a nonsegregated basis. In each instance, they had been denied admission to schools attended by white children under laws requiring or permitting segregation according to race. This segregation was alleged to deprive the plaintiffs of the equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment....

Reargument was largely devoted to the circumstances surrounding the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868. It covered exhaustively consideration of the Amendment in Congress, ratification by the states, then existing practices in racial segregation, and the views of proponents and opponents of the Amendment. This discussion and our own investigation convince us that, although these sources cast some light, it is not enough to resolve the problem with which we are faced. At best, they are inconclusive. The most avid proponents of the post-War Amendments undoubtedly intended them to remove all legal distinctions among "all persons born or naturalized in the United States." Their opponents, just as certainly, were antagonistic to both the letter and the spirit of the Amendments and wished them to have the most limited effect. What others in Congress and the state legislatures had in mind cannot be determined with any degree of certainty.

An additional reason for the inconclusive nature of the Amendment's history, with respect to segregated schools, is the status of public education at that time. In the South, the movement toward free common schools, supported by general taxation, had not yet taken hold. Education of white children was largely in the hands of private groups. Education of Negroes was almost nonexistent, and practically all of the race were illiterate. In fact, any education of Negroes was forbidden by law in some states. Today, in contrast, many Negroes have achieved outstanding success in the arts and sciences as well as in the business and professional world. It is true that public school education at the time of the Amendment had advanced further in the North, but the effect of the Amendment on Northern States was generally ignored in the congressional debates. Even in the North, the conditions of public education did not approximate those existing today. The curriculum was usually rudimentary; ungraded schools were common in rural areas; the school term was but three months a year in many states; and compulsory school attendance was virtually unknown. As a consequence, it is not surprising that there should be so little in the history of the Fourteenth Amendment relating to its intended effect on public education....

In approaching this problem, we cannot turn the clock back to 1868 when the Amendment was adopted, or even to 1896 when [Plessy] was written. We must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life throughout the Nation. Only in this way can it be determined if segregation in public schools deprives these plaintiffs of the equal protection of the laws.

Today, education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments. Compulsory school attendance laws and the great expenditures for education both demonstrate our recognition of the importance of education to our democratic society. It is required in the performance of our most basic public responsibilities, even service in the armed forces. It is the very foundation of good citizenship. Today it is a principal instrument in awakening the child to cultural values, in preparing him for later professional training, and in helping him to adjust normally to his environment. In these days, it is doubtful that any child may reasonably be expected to succeed in life if he is denied the opportunity of an education. Such an opportunity, where the state has undertaken to provide it, is a right which must be made available to all on equal terms.

We come then to the question presented: Does segregation of children in public schools solely on the basis of race, even though the physical facilities and other "tangible" factors may be equal, deprive the children of the minority group of equal educational opportunities? We believe that it does.

In [Sweatt], in finding that a segregated law school for Negroes could not provide them equal educational opportunities, this Court relied in large part on "those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness in a law school." In [McLaurin], the Court, in requiring that a Negro admitted to a white graduate school be treated like all other students, again resorted to intangible considerations: "...his ability to study, to engage in discussions and exchange views with other students, and, in general, to learn his profession." Such considerations apply with added force to children in grade and high schools. To separate them from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone. The effect of this separation on their educational opportunities was well stated by a finding in the Kansas case by a court which nevertheless felt compelled to rule against the Negro plaintiffs:

Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the Negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to [retard] the educational and mental development of Negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial[ly] integrated school system.

Whatever may have been the extent of psychological knowledge at the time of [Plessy], this finding is amply supported by modern authority.¹¹ Any language in [Plessy] contrary to this finding is rejected.

We conclude that in the field of public education the doctrine of “separate but equal” has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal. Therefore, we hold that the plaintiffs and others similarly situated for whom the actions have been brought are, by reason of the segregation complained of, deprived of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

Note: Justifications and Explanations for Brown

1. The Court’s justifications. Did Brown adequately explain why segregation denied minority students equal educational opportunity even when “tangible” factors were equalized? Consider the following arguments that the Court advanced:

a. The legislative history of the equal protection clause is consistent with outlawing segregated education. Note that the Court does not assert that the framers of the fourteenth amendment specifically intended to outlaw segregated education. Is such an assertion plausible? In 1868, eight northern states permitted segregated schools, and five additional northern states excluded black children entirely from public education. See R. Kluger, Simple Justice 633–634 (1976). The Reconstruction Congress itself permitted the District of Columbia schools to remain segregated, see Frank and Munro, The Original Understanding of “Equal Protection of the Laws,” 1972 Wash. U. L.Q. 421, 460–462, and even the spectators in the gallery listening to the senators debate the fourteenth amendment were segregated by race. See R. Berger, Government by Judiciary: The Transformation of the Fourteenth Amendment 123–125 (1977). Moreover, the sponsors of the Civil Rights Act of 1866, which the fourteenth amendment was intended to constitutionalize, specifically disclaimed any intent to interfere with segregated education. See Statement of James Wilson, Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 1117–1118 (1866). See generally Bickel, The Original Understanding and the Segregation Decision, 69 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 11–40 (1955).

For an unusual dissenting view of the original understanding, see McConnell, Originalism and the Desegregation Decisions, 81 Va. L. Rev. 947 (1995). McConnell relies heavily on the ultimately unsuccessful efforts of Republicans in the Reconstruction Congress to include schools within the scope of the 1875 Civil Rights Act, which broadly prohibited segregation in public accommodations, to argue that the framers intended to prohibit school segregation.

Even if McConnell is wrong about the framers' specific intent, might it nonetheless be argued that the equal protection clause represented "a compromise permitting [Moderates and Radicals] to go to the country with language which they could, where necessary, defend against damaging alarms raised by the opposition, but which at the same time was sufficiently elastic to permit reasonable future advances"? Bickel, supra, at 61. If, as Bickel maintains, the legislative history "left the way open to, in fact invited, a decision based on the moral and material state of the nation in 1954, not 1866," id. at 65, does not the burden remain on the defenders of Brown to explain why segregation in 1954 denied equality?

In Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954), decided on the same day as Brown, the Court unanimously held school segregation in the District of Columbia unconstitutional. Since the fourteenth amendment applies only to the states, the Court could not rely on the equal protection clause. But although equal protection and due process are not "interchangeable phrases," the Court held that "discrimination may be so unjustifiable as to be violative of [the due process clause of the fifth amendment]." Moreover, "[in] view of our decision that the Constitution prohibits the States from maintaining racially segregated public schools, it would be unthinkable that the same Constitution would impose a lesser duty on the Federal Government."

Does the legislative history of the fifth and fourteenth amendments really make this result "unthinkable"? When the fifth amendment was adopted, most blacks in the United States were slaves, and the Constitution itself implicitly acknowledged that fact. Does Bolling suggest that the fourteenth amendment somehow modified the fifth amendment? The framers of the fourteenth amendment chose to make the equal protection guarantee applicable solely to the states. This decision presumably reflected the view that institutional safeguards on the federal level made a constitutional guarantee of equality unnecessary. Does the Court care what those who wrote the fifth and fourteenth amendments meant by them? Should it?

See also the discussion of original intent in constitutional interpretation in Chapter 1, section B, supra, and in Chapter 6, section A, infra.

b. “Today, education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments.” Does this observation, even if correct, in any way advance the argument that segregated education is per se unconstitutional? Is Brown supported by the deep-seated view of U.S. public schools as a “secular, nationalizing, assimilationist agent [charged] with the task of Americanization, of melding backgrounds, and creating one nation”? A. Bickel, The Supreme Court and the Idea of Progress 121–122 (1970).

In a series of terse per curiam opinions handed down in the years immediately after Brown, the Court held segregation to be unconstitutional in a wide variety of other public facilities. See, e.g., Gayle v. Browder, 352 U.S. 903 (1956) (buses); Holmes v. City of Atlanta, 350 U.S. 879 (1955) (municipal golf courses); Mayor of Baltimore v. Dawson, 350 U.S. 877 (1955) (public beaches and bathhouses). In light of these decisions, is it possible to maintain that Brown rested on the special status of public education?

c. “To separate [minority children] from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone.” Is stigma alone a sufficient injury to constitute a denial of equal protection? In Bolling, the Court observed that “[segregation] in public education is not reasonably related to any proper governmental objective, and thus it imposes on Negro children [a] burden that constitutes an arbitrary deprivation of their liberty.”

Consider Black, The Lawfulness of the Segregation Decisions, 69 Yale L.J. 421, 424–426 (1960): “[Segregation was] set up and continued for the very purpose of keeping [blacks] in an inferior station. [This purpose was a] matter of common notoriety [not] so much for judicial notice as for background knowledge of educated men who live in the world.” What accounts for the change from the Court’s view in Plessy that any stigma was solely a subjective perception beyond the law’s concern?

d. “Segregation with the sanction of law [has] a tendency to [retard] the educational and mental development of Negro children.” Brown’s reliance on empirical social science data to support this conclusion has been the subject of continuing controversy. See, e.g., Cahn, Jurisprudence, 30 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 150 (1955); Van den Haag, Social Science Testimony in the Desegregation Cases—A Reply to Professor Kenneth Clark, 6 Vill. L. Rev. 69 (1960). See generally Symposium, The Courts, Social Science and School Desegregation, 39 Law & Contemp. Probs. 1 (Winter/Spring 1975). Indeed, it appears that “[virtually] everyone who has examined the question now agrees that the Court erred [in relying upon the social science data]. The proffered evidence was methodologically unsound.” Yudof, School Desegregation: Legal Realism, Reasoned Elaboration, and Social Science Research in the Supreme Court, 42 Law & Contemp. Probs. 57, 70 (1978).

The conflict over the reliability of the data has tended to obscure more fundamental questions. Even if it could be demonstrated unambiguously that blacks perform better in an integrated than a segregated environment, why should that fact be constitutionally determinative? Does the Constitution require the arrangement that maximizes the achievement of black students?

Consider Justice Thomas’s comments on the social science arguments for Brown in his concurring opinion in Missouri v. Jenkins, 515 U.S. 70 (1995):

Segregation was not unconstitutional because it might have caused psychological feelings of inferiority. Public school systems that separated blacks and provided them with superior education resources—making blacks “feel” superior to whites sent to lesser schools—would violate the Fourteenth Amendment, whether or not the white students felt stigmatized, just as do school systems in which the positions of the races are reversed. Psychological injury or benefit is irrelevant to the question whether state actors have engaged in intentional discrimination—the critical inquiry for ascertaining violations of the Equal Protection Clause. The judiciary is fully competent to make independent determinations concerning the existence of state action without the unnecessary and misleading assistance of the social sciences.

Regardless of the relative quality of the schools, segregation violated the Constitution because the State classified students based on their race....

“Racial isolation” itself is not a harm; only state-enforced segregation is. After all, if separation itself is a harm, and if integration therefore is the only way that blacks can receive a proper education, then there must be something inferior about blacks. Under this theory, segregation injures blacks because blacks, when left on their own, cannot achieve. To my way of thinking, that conclusion is the result of a jurisprudence based on a theory of black inferiority.

2. Alternative perspectives. One of the most widely cited pieces of constitutional law scholarship is Wechsler, Toward Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law, 73 Harv. L. Rev. 1 (1959). Wechsler's starting point is that courts function solely as an illegitimate "naked power organ" when they decide cases based solely on the identity of the parties before them. Judicial decisionmaking must rest on "neutral principles." Wechsler criticized the Supreme Court's decision in Brown for treating the problem as one of "discrimination":

For me, assuming equal facilities, the problem is not one of discrimination at all. Its human and its constitutional dimensions lie entirely elsewhere, in the denial by the state of freedom to associate, a denial that impinges in the same way on any groups or races that may be involved. I think, and I hope not without foundation, that the Southern white also pays heavily for segregation, not only in the sense of guilt he must carry but also in the benefits he is denied. In the days when I was joined with Charles H. Houston in a litigation in the Supreme Court, before the present building was constructed, he did not suffer more than I in knowing that we had to go to Union Station to lunch together during the recess.

Id. at 34. Wechsler saw the "challenge" of Brown as discerning a neutral principle that required preferring the claim of black children who wished to associate with white children over the preference of segregationists who wished not to associate with blacks. For responses to Wechsler, see, e.g., Pollak, Racial Discrimination and Judicial Integrity: A Reply to Professor Wechsler, 108 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1 (1959); Black, The Lawfulness of the Segregation Decisions, supra. Consider the response in J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust 55 (1980): "[T]here are neutral principles of every hue. (How about 'No racial segregation, ever?')."

Consider how Wechsler's position relates to another influential critique of Brown. Bell, Brown v. Board of Education and the Interest-Convergence Dilemma, 93 Harv. L. Rev. 518, 524–525 (1980):

[The] decision in Brown...cannot be understood without some consideration of the decision's value to whites [able] to see the economic and political advantages at home and abroad that would follow the abandonment of segregation. [Brown provided] immediate credibility to America's struggle with Communist countries to win the hearts and minds of emerging third world people [and] offered much needed reassurance to American blacks. [Moreover,] there were whites who realized that the South could make the transition from a rural, plantation society to the sunbelt with all its potential and profit only when it ended its struggle to remain divided by state-sponsored segregation.

If desegregation was really in the interest of the white majority, why did it have to be judicially imposed? To what extent does Brown reflect the views of a national elite, as opposed to a regional majority? See M. Dudziak, Cold War Civil Rights: Race and the Image of American Democracy (2000) (suggesting that the Cold War imperative played a major role in changing judicial attitudes); M. Klarman, supra; M. Tushnet, supra.

Finally, consider the following argument: Most critics of Brown have treated the decision as an unjustified assertion of judicial power. But Brown can be viewed instead as a product of the institutional weakness of the judiciary. Prior to Brown, the Court had committed itself to the position that separate educational facilities had to be equalized, and that the courts were duty bound to decide whether such equality actually existed. Might such a doctrine, by requiring the courts to evaluate the level of “equality” in thousands of segregated school systems throughout the country, have produced an even more serious judicial intrusion on the political branches than Brown? Compare J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review 124 (1980) (suggesting that considerations of administrability and fear of becoming embroiled in complex factual determinations about equality may underlie other seemingly expansive Warren Court decisions). Note that, even if you believe that segregated schools as they existed in the southern states in 1954 violated the equal protection clause, it does not follow that Brown was correctly decided. The hard question is why desegregation was the constitutionally required alternative to a judicially mandated regime of real equality.

Would black students have been better off had the Brown Court strongly enforced material equality, rather than mandating the end of de jure segregation? See D. Bell, Silent Covenants: Brown v. Board of Education and the Unfulfilled Hopes for Racial Reform (2004).

Consider the view that the decision to push for desegregation reflected the conclusion that a requirement of material equality in separate schools would never be enforced:

The NAACP pushed for integration because it sought to force white-controlled state and local governments to provide a quality education and equal educational opportunity to black schoolchildren. The NAACP had tried for many years to push for educational rights through equalization suits. Equalization suits tried to enforce Plessy v. Ferguson’s formula of “separate but equal” by requiring school districts to provide black schoolchildren with educational opportunities and resources as good as those enjoyed by students in all-white schools. [Many] years of frustrating efforts demonstrated that the mandate of equal educational resources was too easy for state governments to evade. Thus, the NAACP sought to integrate the public schools in part on the theory that “green follows white.” It believed that the white establishment would expend monetary resources and ensure quality education for black schoolchildren only if blacks were attending the same schools as the children of white parents. Integration would force whites to take into account the social costs that black children suffered from inferior educational opportunities by linking the fates of white and black schoolchildren together.

Balkin, What Brown Teaches Us about Constitutional Theory, 90 Va. L. Rev. 1537, 1570–1571 (2004).

3. The meaning of Brown. What precisely did Brown require southern school systems to do? Could that question be answered before the ambiguity as to Brown's reasoning was resolved? For example, if Brown was premised on the stigma associated with state-enforced segregation, then presumably a simple declaration that race would no longer be considered in school assignments would be sufficient. But if Brown meant that educational equality could be achieved only if blacks and whites attended school together, something more might be required. Finally, if Brown required that black and white children receive equal educations or that educational systems had to be structured to produce equal educational outcomes, the remedy might be more complex still.

The initial Brown opinion did not answer the remedy question. Instead, the Court restored the case to the docket for reargument. As you read the opinion that follows, think about whether the Court answered or avoided the substantive questions that remained after Brown I.

Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka (Brown II)

349 U.S. 294 (1955)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases were decided on May 17, 1954. The opinions of that date, declaring the fundamental principle that racial discrimination in public education is unconstitutional, are incorporated herein by reference. All provisions of federal, state, or local law requiring or permitting such discrimination must yield to this principle. There remains for consideration the manner in which relief is to be accorded.

Because these cases arose under different local conditions and their disposition will involve a variety of local problems, we requested further argument on the question of relief. In view of the nationwide importance of the decision, we invited the Attorney General of the United States, and the Attorneys General of all states requiring or permitting racial discrimination in public education to present their views on that question....

Full implementation of these constitutional principles may require solution of varied local school problems. School authorities have the primary responsibility for elucidating, assessing, and solving these problems; courts will have to consider whether the action of school authorities constitutes good faith implementation of the governing constitutional principles. Because of their proximity to local conditions and the possible need for further hearings, the courts which originally heard these cases can best perform this judicial appraisal. Accordingly, we believe it appropriate to remand the cases to those courts.

In fashioning and effectuating the decrees, the courts will be guided by equitable principles. Traditionally equity has been characterized by a practical flexibility in shaping its remedies and by a facility for adjusting and reconciling public and private needs. These cases call for the exercise of these traditional attributes of equity power. At stake is the personal interest of the plaintiffs in admission to public schools as soon as practicable on a nondiscriminatory basis. To effectuate this interest may call for elimination of a variety of obstacles in making the transition to school systems operated in accordance with the constitutional principles set forth in our May 17, 1954, decision. Courts of equity may properly take into account the public interest in the elimination of such obstacles in a systematic and effective manner. But it should go without saying that the vitality of these constitutional principles cannot be allowed to yield simply because of disagreement with them.

While giving weight to these public and private considerations, the courts will require that the defendants make a prompt and reasonable start toward full compliance with our May 17, 1954, ruling. Once such a start has been made, the courts may find that additional time is necessary to carry out the ruling in an effective manner. The burden rests upon the defendants to establish that such time is necessary in the public interest and is consistent with good faith compliance at the earliest practicable date. To that end, the courts may consider problems related to administration, arising from the physical condition of the school plant, the school transportation system, personnel, revision of school districts and attendance areas into compact units to achieve a system of determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis, and revision of local laws and regulations which may be necessary in solving the foregoing problems. They will also consider the adequacy of any plans the defendants may propose to meet these problems and to effectuate a transition to a racially nondiscriminatory school system. During this period of transition, the courts will retain jurisdiction of these cases.

The judgments below, except that in the Delaware case, are accordingly reversed and the cases are remanded to the District Courts to take such proceedings and enter such orders and decrees consistent with this opinion as are necessary and proper to admit to public schools on a racially non-discriminatory basis with all deliberate speed the parties to these cases. The judgment in the Delaware case—ordering the immediate admission of the plaintiffs to schools previously attended only by white children—is affirmed on the basis of the principles stated in our May 17, 1954, opinion, but the case is remanded to the Supreme Court of Delaware for such further proceedings as that Court may deem necessary in light of this opinion.

Note: “All Deliberate Speed”

Brown II’s “all deliberate speed” formulation has been widely criticized. Consider the following arguments against the approach:

1. If segregation is unconstitutional, the Court cannot legitimately tolerate continued segregation. Given the fact that there were individual plaintiffs in the five consolidated cases before the Court, should the Court have simply ordered their admission to schools on a race-blind basis? Note that delay in ordering a remedy would irreparably deprive the actual plaintiffs of the ability to attend a nonsegregated school.

2. Brown II needlessly encouraged white resistance to desegregation by failing to demand an immediate remedy. See, e.g., Black, The Unfinished Business of the Warren Court, 46 Wash. L. Rev. 3, 22 (1970). Brown II was followed by an extended period of “massive resistance” during which there was virtually no actual desegregation in the South. But the causal link between Brown II and the slow pace of desegregation is uncertain, and some have defended the decision on the ground that “any head-on challenge to the segregated South in 1955 would have produced civil strife sufficient to make Little Rock and Birmingham seem gatherings of good will.” J. Wilkinson, From Brown to Bakke 68 (1979). What could the Court have done if an order for immediate desegregation had simply been defied? Note that in 1955 it was uncertain whether either the President or the Congress would support the Court if such an order were disobeyed.

Does Brown II prove that the Court “was a white court which would protect the interests of White America in the maintenance of stable institutions”? Steel, Nine Men in Black Who Think White, N.Y. Times Magazine, Oct. 13, 1968, at 112, col. 4. Or does the decision merely reflect the inherent limits of judicial power—limits that arguably influenced the formulation of the Brown I standard in the first place? See Gewirtz, Remedies and Resistance, 92 Yale L.J. 585 (1983).

3. Brown II overstated the administrative difficulties of desegregation. What precisely were the “varied local school problems” that might justify delay? Does the answer to that question depend in part on what Brown I required? If Brown I required no more than the repeal of laws prohibiting blacks from attending white schools, it is hard to see why this could not be accomplished instantly, or at least by the beginning of the next school year. Virtually every school system with more than one school, however, assigns individual pupils to particular schools. What administrative difficulties, if any, would reassigning students without taking race into account produce? If, however, Brown I required school boards to take affirmative steps to dismantle dual school systems and to produce actual integration, the process might be more complex. Did the Court act responsibly in authorizing a period of delay without specifying what was to be accomplished during that period?

4. The Court acted unwisely in remitting the task of enforcement and elucidation of Brown I to the lower federal courts. To the extent that difficulties were solely remedial and technical, it was perhaps appropriate to remand the cases to local federal judges familiar with local conditions. But could these courts be expected to devise appropriate remedies when the content of the right to be vindicated remained so vague? As the next Note indicates, Brown II was followed by an extended period during which the lower courts wrestled with the question of remedy in the face of intransigence and subterfuge. When, some fifteen years after Brown II, the Court finally returned to the question of rights, its views were crucially influenced by this remedial struggle.

4. The Meaning of Brown

Note: The Initial Response to Brown

1. Tokenism and massive resistance. Suppose you were a southern governor in 1955 determined to minimize the impact of Brown. What policies would you pursue? In retrospect, it seems at least possible that the immediate, good faith dismantling of the formal structure of segregation might have satisfied the courts while producing only minor disruption. Instead, Brown was greeted throughout the South with defiance and evasion. In the short term, this approach stymied judicial enforcement efforts. But in the longer term, the strategy had two unanticipated consequences. First, it helped to mobilize national political support for desegregation. Second, the long struggle to impose meaningful remedies in the face of “massive resistance” subtly influenced the way in which the fourteenth amendment was interpreted. See generally M. Klarmann, From Jim Crow to Civil Rights: The Supreme Court and the Struggle for Racial Equality (2004).

Southern resistance took several different forms. In part, it was rhetorical. For example, most southern members of Congress signed the “Southern Manifesto” asserting the illegitimacy of Brown and the right of the states to ignore the decision. See 102 Cong. Rec. H3948, 4004 (daily ed. Mar. 12, 1956). Other southern politicians advanced their careers by vowing never to permit integration. In a number of communities, this verbal resistance was supplemented by intimidation and violence. And throughout the South, school districts devised a bewildering variety of legal strategies designed to slow or stop desegregation. A few communities, including one of the jurisdictions in a companion case to Brown, took the extreme measure of closing their public schools altogether to avoid desegregation. Others adopted complex pupil placement laws giving local officials discretion to place students in different schools on the basis of supposedly nonracial criteria. Still others adopted “freedom of choice” plans that assigned students to their old schools unless they applied for transfer, often subject to an intricate procedure. The common feature of all these plans was that they produced virtually no actual integration. For accounts of early efforts to circumvent Brown, see McKay, “With All Deliberate Speed,” 31 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 991 (1956); Powe, The Road to Swann: Mobile County Crawls to the Bus, 51 Tex. L. Rev. 505 (1973). Some of the rhetoric from the period is collected in J. Wilkinson, From Brown to Bakke 69–74 (1979).

2. The early judicial response. The judicial response to these stratagems varied. Some courts upheld pupil placement, freedom of choice, and grade-per-year plans while others struck them down. In the face of massive community opposition, a few district court judges insisted on far-reaching and effective desegregation plans. See generally J. Peltason, Fifty-Eight Lonely Men (1971). But the more common judicial attitude toward Brown ranged from caution to outright hostility. In one widely quoted opinion written shortly after Brown, a district court held that Brown did not require “the states [to] mix persons of different races in the schools. [What] it has decided [is] that a state may not deny any person on account of race the right to attend any school that it maintains. [The] Constitution, in other words, does not require integration. [It] merely forbids the use of governmental power to enforce segregation.” Briggs v. Elliott, 132 F. Supp. 776, 777 (E.D.S.C. 1955). Other judges read Brown even more narrowly. For example, one judge announced at the conclusion of a suit to desegregate the Dallas schools that “the white man has a right to maintain his racial integrity and it can’t be done so easily in integrated schools. [We] will not name any date or issue any order.” J. Peltason, supra, at 118–119. Overall, the pace of desegregation was painfully slow. By 1964, ten years after Brown I, only 2.3 percent of the black children in the South were attending desegregated schools. See Dunn, Title VI, the Guidelines, and School Desegregation in the South, 53 Va. L. Rev. 42, 44 n.9 (1967).

Despite the lack of uniformity and absence of progress, the Supreme Court remained almost entirely silent during this early period. It intervened only once—and then only in the face of outright defiance. Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1 (1958), grew out of efforts to desegregate the Little Rock public school system. Pursuant to a plan developed by the Little Rock School Board, nine black children were scheduled to enroll in all-white Central High School at the start of the 1957 term. These plans were stymied by Arkansas Governor Orval Faubus, who ordered the Arkansas National Guard to block the entry of the children. The students were admitted only after President Eisenhower dispatched troops to enforce federal law. Under the protection of these troops and the federalized National Guard, the black students remained in Central High School through February 1958. The school board then sought permission from the federal district court to terminate the desegregation program because of the extreme public hostility. The district court granted the board’s request, but the court of appeals reversed. In an extraordinary opinion, signed by all nine justices, the Supreme Court affirmed the court of appeals and ordered desegregation to proceed. The Court held that “the constitutional rights of respondents are not to be sacrificed or yielded to the violence and disorder which have followed upon the actions of the Governor and Legislature. [Law] and order are not here to be preserved by depriving the Negro children of their constitutional rights.” In response to the Governor’s assertion that he was not bound by Brown, the Court declared that “the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution,” and that “the interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment enunciated by this Court in the Brown case is the supreme law of the land.”

3. The end of deliberate speed. Cooper v. Aaron was a powerful statement of judicial supremacy and an attack on outright defiance of Brown. It did little, however, to clarify the confusion concerning what Brown required. It was not until the early 1960s that the Court began to intervene more effectively and systematically to oversee the desegregation process. See Watson v. Memphis, 373 U.S. 526 (1963) (holding the “all deliberate speed” formulation inapplicable to segregated municipal recreation facilities and ordering immediate desegregation); Goss v. Board of Education, 373 U.S. 683 (1963) (invalidating “one-way transfer” plans permitting students to transfer from schools where they were in the racial minority to schools where they were in the majority); Griffin v. County School Board, 377 U.S. 218 (1964) (holding unconstitutional the closing of county schools to avoid desegregation).

The Court’s renewed interest in the pace of school desegregation coincided with the reemergence for the first time since Reconstruction of an effective national political coalition supporting black equality. The changed political atmosphere resulted in part from extralegal events—in particular, “direct action” campaigns against southern segregation led by Martin Luther King and other civil rights activists. These campaigns, and the sometimes violent and brutal response that they engendered, helped to mobilize northern public opinion against segregation. See M. Klarmann, supra, at 385–442.

An important turning point was passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. §§2000a et seq. Although the most widely debated sections of the act prohibited racial discrimination in places of public accommodation, the act also had important provisions dealing with school desegregation. Title IV authorized the Attorney General to institute desegregation suits in the name of the United States, thereby ending the need to rely on individual lawsuits by private plaintiffs. More significantly, title VI established a parallel desegregation mechanism that avoided the necessity of lawsuits altogether. Racial discrimination was prohibited in any program receiving federal financial assistance—as most school systems throughout the nation did—and federal agencies were authorized to issue regulations enforcing this prohibition and to terminate funding upon non-compliance. Pursuant to this authority, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare promulgated desegregation guidelines in 1966 that were considerably stiffer than the existing case law.

The guidelines were important not only because the threatened fund cutoff provided an impetus for desegregation but also because they allowed courts to escape from the morass of case-by-case litigation over individual desegregation plans. In a series of landmark decisions, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals used the guidelines to formulate model decrees, applicable throughout the circuit, which regulated every detail of the desegregation process. The percentage of southern black children attending desegregated schools jumped dramatically. For a discussion of the effect of the guidelines, see Note, The Courts, HEW, and Southern School Desegregation, 77 Yale L.J. 321 (1967).

What does this history suggest about the relative importance of legal and political forces in effecting social change? Consider Klarmann, The Puzzling

Resistance to Political Process Theory, 77 Va. L. Rev. 747, 813 (1991):

[To] the extent that post-Brown Supreme Court decisions deserve even partial credit for the demise of southern school segregation, it is crucial to note that those decisions post-dated the emergence of a national political coalition committed to eliminating racial segregation and discrimination. [A] great deal of the school desegregation that ultimately flowed from Brown appears to have been more directly attributable to the intervention of a racially-enlightened national political process than to the Supreme Court.

Compare J. Greenberg, Crusaders in the Courts: How a Dedicated Band of Lawyers Fought for the Civil Rights Revolution 12 (1994) (arguing that Brown triggered the civil rights movement, which in turn produced civil rights legislation).

Four years after passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Court began dismantling the last barriers to desegregation in the rural South by questioning the “freedom of choice” plans widely used throughout the region. In Green v. County School Board, 391 U.S. 430 (1968), the Court invalidated a “freedom of choice” plan that the district had adopted to avoid loss of federal funds. The district had only two schools, one of which had been all-black and the other all-white prior to Brown. Since there was little residential segregation, a plan simply dividing the county in two would have created integrated schools. Instead, each pupil was required to choose between the two schools on entering first and eighth grades. Children in other grades were permitted to choose but were assigned to the school last attended if they made no choice. After the plan had been in effect for three years, 85 percent of the black children and none of the white children were attending the previously all-black school.

A unanimous Court held that this “freedom of choice” plan could not “be accepted as a sufficient step to ‘effectuate a transition’ to a unitary school system.” Justice Brennan’s opinion emphasized the Court’s impatience at the pace of desegregation: “In determining whether [the board satisfied Brown] by adopting its ‘freedom-of-choice’ plan, it is relevant that this first step did not come until some 11 years after Brown I was decided and 10 years after Brown II directed the making of a ‘prompt and reasonable start.’ [The] burden on a school board today is to come forward with a plan that promises realistically to work, and promises realistically to work now.”

The school board had an “affirmative duty to take whatever steps might be necessary to convert to a unitary system in which racial discrimination would be eliminated root and branch.” The Court rejected the argument that adopting “freedom of choice” itself satisfied the board’s constitutional obligation. Rather, “freedom of choice” had to be judged by its effectiveness as a means to achieve a unitary school system. The ultimate test was whether “the plan [promises] realistically to convert promptly to a system without a ‘white’ school and a ‘Negro’ school, but just schools.”

Like most of the Court’s pronouncements on school desegregation since Brown II, Green focused on the adequacy of remedy. Did the Court explain what substantive deprivation the board had failed to remedy? What made the Green school system nonunitary? As a practical matter, a network of formal and informal sanctions made black freedom wholly illusory under many “freedom of choice” plans. See, e.g., C. Curry, Silver Rights (1995) (describing how only one black family in Drew, Mississippi, was willing to send its children to the previously all-white schools and the difficulties the children faced). But Green did not rely on the illusory nature of the choice in invalidating the plan. Rather, it seems to have rested on some combination of prior, formal segregation and current results. The Green Court hinted that on the facts of the case, a plan for neighborhood schools would have made the system “unitary.” In Green, and in much of the rural South, neighborhood schools would have produced substantial integration. But would a neighborhood school system be “unitary” in urban areas, where residential segregation patterns would be mirrored in school populations?

4. Busing and the problem of race-conscious remedies. The Court provided some answers to these questions in Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education, 402 U.S. 1 (1971). The case arose in a school district that had been segregated by law prior to 1954. Although geographic zoning and free transfers were introduced in 1965, in 1968 over half of the black students were still attending schools that were at least 99 percent black. In order to deal with this problem, the district court adopted a new plan that took race into account in drawing school zones and bused students between inner-city and suburban schools. In a unanimous opinion by Chief Justice Burger, the Supreme Court affirmed this order. Emphasizing the scope and flexibility of equitable remedies, the Court held that mathematical ratios and race-conscious assignments could be a useful starting point in fashioning relief. It also endorsed the busing of students outside their neighborhoods as “one tool of school desegregation.” On the other hand, the Court emphasized that “[the] constitutional command to desegregate schools does not mean that every school in every community must always reflect the racial composition of the school system as a whole.” And it warned that

[absent] a constitutional violation there would be no basis for judicially ordering assignment of students on a racial basis....

At some point, these school authorities and others like them should have achieved full compliance with the Court's decision in Brown I. The systems will then be "unitary" in the sense required by our decisions....

Neither school authorities nor district courts are constitutionally required to make year-by-year adjustments of the racial composition of student bodies once the affirmative duty to desegregate has been [accomplished].

Swann thus articulated three principles that were to guide later school desegregation cases: first, that the constitutional violation stemmed from purposeful state manipulation of schools' racial composition; second, that the scope of judicial power was limited by the scope of the constitutional violation; and third, that once a school district achieved "unitary" status, judicial intervention should cease.

Note: The De Jure/De Facto Distinction and Limits on Courts' Remedial Powers

Swann was the last major desegregation decision that was entirely "southern" in its orientation. It thus ended an era begun with Brown II. In one sense, the Court's efforts to desegregate the South were stunningly successful. The Court's studied ambiguity concerning the scope of Brown I provided it with the flexibility to respond to each of the subterfuges advanced to defeat desegregation. Moreover, the "all deliberate speed" formulation allowed the Court to avoid defeat when significant progress was not politically feasible and then to push ahead when a coalition for change finally emerged. The results of this strategy speak for themselves: By 1971, 44 percent of the black students in the South attended majority white schools, compared to only 28 percent in the North and West. See 18 Cong. Rec. S564 (daily ed. Jan. 20, 1972) (remarks of Sen. Stennis). Much of this success was a product of demography: In rural areas, desegregation was easier to accomplish because, although residential segregation existed, the pattern did not involve large population concentrations; thus, any non-race-conscious geographic assignment of pupils was likely to produce desegregated schools. Some of it was an accident of history: The school system in Swann, for example, had consolidated inner-city urban and suburban school districts before Brown and thus it was relatively difficult for white families to leave the school system as it desegregated.

But although schools in the North were rarely segregated by statute—at least by the time Brown was decided—substantial numbers of black and Latino schoolchildren nonetheless attended monoracial schools. Starting in the 1970s, the Court confronted the question whether this situation violated the equal protection clause and, if it did, what remedial options were available.

1. Keyes and the nature of the violation. In Keyes v. School District No. 1, 413 U.S. 189 (1973), the Court considered the lawfulness of school segregation in Denver, Colorado, a northern city that had never mandated segregated education by statute. The district court found that the school board had deliberately segregated schools in the Park Hill section of the city through use of gerrymandered attendance zones and similar devices. Although the district court ordered desegregation of the Park Hill schools, it held that the finding of purposeful segregation in this area did not require the board to remedy racial imbalances in other areas of the city. The court of appeals affirmed this portion of the district court's order, but the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Brennan, reversed and held that systemwide relief might be appropriate.

The Court assumed that plaintiffs bore the burden of establishing that segregated schools had been brought about or maintained by intentional state action. However, once such a showing had been made with regard to a substantial portion of the system, plaintiffs were not required to show deliberate segregation as to each school within the school system.

“[Common] sense dictates the conclusion that racially inspired school board actions have an impact beyond the particular schools that are subject to those actions.” Although there might be “rare” cases where the effect of discriminatory conduct was isolated, in the more usual case proof of unlawful segregation in a substantial portion of a district was sufficient to support a finding of the existence of a dual school system, with a corresponding affirmative duty to dismantle segregated schools.

Justice Powell, the only white southerner then on the Court—and the former chairman of the Richmond, Virginia, school board from 1952 to 1961—concurred in part and dissented in part:

The situation in Denver is generally comparable to that in other large cities across the country in which there is a substantial minority population and where desegregation has not been ordered by the federal courts. There is segregation in the schools of many of these cities fully as pervasive as that in southern cities prior to the desegregation decrees of the past decade and a half. The focus of the school desegregation problem has now shifted from the South to the country as a whole. Unwilling and footdragging as the process was in most places, substantial progress toward achieving integration has been made in Southern States. No comparable progress has been made in many nonsouthern cities with large minority populations primarily because of the de facto/de jure distinction nurtured by the courts and accepted complacently by many of the same voices which denounced the evils of segregated schools in the South. But if our national concern is for those who attend such schools, rather than for perpetuating a legalism rooted in history rather than present reality, we must recognize that the evil of operating separate schools is no less in Denver than in Atlanta....

In my view we should abandon a distinction which long since has outlived its time, and formulate constitutional principles of national rather than merely regional application....

Whereas Brown I rightly decreed the elimination of state-imposed segregation in that particular section of the country where it did exist, Swann imposed obligations on southern school districts to eliminate conditions which are not regionally unique but are similar both in origin and effect to conditions in the rest of the country. [I] would hold, quite simply, that where segregated public schools exist within a school district to a substantial degree, there is a prima facie case that the duly constituted public authorities [are] sufficiently responsible to warrant imposing upon them a nationally applicable burden to demonstrate they nevertheless are operating a genuinely integrated school system. [This] means that school authorities, consistent with the generally accepted educational goal of attaining quality education for all pupils, must make and implement their customary decisions with a view toward enhancing integrated school opportunities....

Public schools are creatures of the State, and whether the segregation is state-created or state-assisted or merely state-perpetuated should be irrelevant to constitutional principle. The school board exercises pervasive and continuing responsibility over the long-range planning as well as the daily operations of the public school system. [School] board decisions obviously are not the sole cause of segregated school conditions. But if, after such detailed and complete public supervision, substantial school segregation still persists, the presumption is strong that the school board, by its acts or omissions, is in some part responsible.

Although Justice Powell would thus have expanded the predicates for liability, he was more restrictive than the majority with respect to the courts' remedial powers. "Where desegregative steps are possible within the framework of a system of 'neighborhood education,' school authorities must pursue them," but he disapproved of "extensive student transportation solely to achieve integration" because it "infringes on what may fairly be regarded as other important community aspirations and personal rights."

Justice Rehnquist dissented on the ground that courts should not assume that a finding of manipulation with respect to a few attendance zones transformed all segregation within a school system into a constitutional violation justifying judicial intervention.

2. Political and demographic factors. The late 1960s and early 1970s were a time of tremendous political unrest. As the civil rights movement turned its attention to racial discrimination in the North and desegregation litigation occurred nationwide, the national consensus in support of desegregation began to wane. In 1968, for example, Richard Nixon, while seeking the presidential nomination, told southern Republican leaders that he thought “all deliberate speed” required reinterpretation, and that he opposed compulsory busing of students. See T. White, The Making of the President: 1968, at 137–138 (1969). When President Nixon assumed office, the Justice Department for the first time since 1954 intervened on behalf of a southern school board to seek additional time for desegregation. After Swann, Congress enacted legislation purporting to limit the use of busing as a remedy for desegregation.

This upsurge in political opposition to desegregation coincided with renewed doubts about the ability of courts to bring about integrated schools. Effective desegregation requires as a starting point the presence of both white and minority students within the pool of students being assigned to schools. While in 1954 many urban school districts, in both the South and the North, were majority-white, by the time real attempts at desegregation began in the 1970s, many of these districts were overwhelmingly black. Thus, it might be impossible to create integrated schools by simply reassigning students within a single district. Moreover, a phenomenon referred to as the “tipping point” made it even more difficult to achieve stable integration: as the proportion of black students within a particular school increased, white students might abandon the school with increasing velocity.

The extent to which court-ordered desegregation or the anticipation of court-ordered desegregation in fact caused whites to abandon urban public schools has been hotly debated in the social science literature. Compare, e.g., J. Coleman, S. Kelly, and J. Moore, Trends in School Segregation 1968–73 (1975), with Pettigrew and Green, School Desegregation in Large Cities: A Critique of the Coleman “White Flight” Thesis, 46 Harv. Educ. Rev. 1 (1976). See also G. Orfield, The Growth of Segregation in American Schools: Changing Patterns of Separation and Poverty since 1968, at 6 (1994) (concluding that “[the] great increase in the proportion of non-white students has not been a consequence of ‘white flight’ [but] the product of huge changes in birth rates and immigration patterns,” and that “there has been no significant redistribution between the sectors of American education"). It is beyond dispute, however, that for whatever reason, the percentage of whites in many urban public schools declined.

3. The Court's response. How should the Court have responded to these new challenges to desegregation? In the 1960s, the Court had bravely announced that political opposition and "white flight" were no excuse for avoiding constitutional requirements. For example, in Monroe v. Board of Commissioners, 391 U.S. 450 (1968), a companion case to Green, the school board defended its "free transfer" plan on the ground that it was necessary to prevent whites from leaving the system altogether. A unanimous Court rejected the argument, citing Brown II for the proposition that "[the] vitality of these constitutional principles cannot be allowed to yield simply because of disagreement with them." See also United States v. Scotland Neck City Board of Education, 407 U.S. 484, 490–491 (1972).

Some critics argued that this approach was simply unrealistic. Consider L. Graglia, Disaster by Decree 82 (1976): "Insistence on principle and legality in the face of threatened lawlessness can be justified even where great immediate costs are involved, but to ignore the existence of perfectly legal means of avoiding a requirement is to bury one's head in the sand." Compare Gewirtz, Remedies and Resistance, 92 Yale L.J. 585, 661 (1983): "[Realism] can be a dangerous aspiration for people, such as judges or law professors, who are often accused of not being realistic enough. Newly initiated into the jurisprudence of limitation, judges may become too realistic, taking reality to be more resistant than it is."

Whether justified or not, the Court (newly reconstituted with ten appointments by Republican Presidents, and none by Democratic Presidents, between 1969 and 1992) began to restrict the scope of constitutionally mandated desegregation.

a. Interdistrict relief. In Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717 (1974) (Milliken I), the Court held that federal courts lack the power to impose interdistrict remedies for school segregation absent an interdistrict violation or interdistrict effects. After a lengthy trial, the district court found that the by-then overwhelmingly black Detroit school system had been deliberately segregated by school board decisions, and that any Detroit-only remedy "would make the Detroit school system more identifiably black [thereby] increasing the flight of whites from the city and the system." Consequently, the court ordered a desegregation plan encompassing fifty-three suburban school districts surrounding Detroit. The court of appeals affirmed after noting that "any less comprehensive [solution would] result in an all black school system immediately surrounded by practically all white suburban school systems, with an overwhelmingly white majority population in the local metropolitan area.”

The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Burger, reversed. The Court rejected the “notion that school district lines may be casually ignored or treated as a mere administrative convenience. [No] single tradition in public education is more deeply rooted than local control over the operation of schools.” To be sure, in cases where boundaries between school districts were deliberately drawn to create segregated school systems, a federal court could order a remedy that included reassigning pupils across district boundaries or redrawing school district boundaries. But the fact that a single school district had engaged in purposeful racial segregation did not authorize the federal courts to reach into adjacent districts.

The Court’s conclusions in Milliken I were unaffected by the fact that the state of Michigan had exercised substantial control over the activity of local school districts, and that state agencies had participated in the deliberate segregation of the Detroit schools. Despite this state activity, “[disparate] treatment of white and Negro students occurred within the Detroit school system, and not elsewhere, and on this record the remedy must be limited to that system.”

In a dissenting opinion that was joined by Justices Douglas, Brennan, and White, Justice Marshall complained that the Court had rendered the district judge powerless to require the State to remedy its constitutional violation in any meaningful fashion. Ironically purporting to base its result on the principle that the scope of the remedy in a desegregation case should be determined by the nature and extent of the constitutional violation, the Court’s answer is to provide no remedy at all for the violation proved in this case, thereby guaranteeing that Negro children in Detroit will receive the same separate and inherently unequal education in the future as they have been unconstitutionally afforded in the past.

b. Intradistrict remediation. On remand in Milliken I, the district court confronted the task of attempting to desegregate a school system that was approximately 70 percent black. The court rejected a plan that would have created a racial composition within each school that reflected the overall racial balance within the Detroit system—a plan that, inter alia, would have required busing large numbers of minority students from one majority-black school to another. Instead, the court ordered a plan providing each black student with at least some number of years in a racially integrated school and that also required extensive educational reform, including remedial education, counseling, and career guidance. In Milliken v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267 (1977) (Milliken II), the Supreme Court affirmed. The Court rejected the notion that desegregation remedies were limited to pupil assignment and held that a district judge could order the expenditure of state funds for remedial education as part of an effort to place victims of unconstitutional conduct in the position they would have enjoyed but for the violation. Taken together, do Milliken I and II represent a turning away from Brown and a return to the “separate but equal” philosophy? Has the Court resolved the difficulties with that philosophy that caused its abandonment in the first place? What does it mean to say that but for unconstitutional school segregation, the plaintiffs would have attended schools with greater resources? In short, what is the connection between the remedy offered and the violation found?

The Court confronted this question repeatedly in the long-running Kansas City, Missouri, school desegregation case. After finding that the Kansas City public schools were unconstitutionally segregated, a district judge ordered a sweeping remedy designed to create “magnet schools” that would attract white children into the district as well as enhance the educational opportunities of black students already in the system. Ultimately, in Missouri v. Jenkins, 515 U.S. 70 (1995), the Court substantially restricted the power of district courts to order Milliken II-type remedies. At issue was a district court order mandating salary increases for instructional and non-instructional staff within the school district. The state argued that this order exceeded the district court’s remedial authority because it was designed to serve the interdistrict goal of attracting white students from surrounding school districts. In a five-to-four decision, the Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, agreed. Moreover, the Court expressed strong disagreement with the district court’s position that a variety of educational enhancements were appropriate because achievement scores within the Kansas City district continued to lag behind those of adjacent suburban districts. The Court rejected the idea that those achievement differentials could be causally connected to the constitutional violation the district had committed in engaging in de jure segregation many years earlier.

c. Resegregation and “unitary” status. In a series of cases decided since the mid-1970s, the Court disapproved efforts by the lower courts to prevent resegregation and suggested guidelines for districts attempting to achieve unitary status. See Pasadena Board of Education v. Spangler, 427 U.S. 424 (1976) (disapproving lower court order requiring annual readjustment of school boundaries); Board of Education of Oklahoma City Public Schools v. Dowell, 498 U.S. 237 (1991) (holding that a district would achieve unitary status upon a showing that it was “[operating] in compliance with the commands of the Equal Protection Clause [and] that it was unlikely that [it] would return to its former ways"); Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467 (1992) (holding that "federal courts have the authority to relinquish supervision and control of school districts in incremental stages, before full compliance has been achieved in every area of school operations"). In the Charlotte-Mecklenburg schools that were the focus of the Swann litigation, this resulted in the lower federal courts ultimately holding not only that the school system had reached unitary status, but that the achievement of unitary status precluded even voluntary attempts by the school board to continue using race-conscious assignment practices to preserve racial integration. See Mickelson, The Academic Consequences of Desegregation and Segregation: Evidence from the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Schools, 81 N.C. L. Rev. 1513, 1521–1525 (2003).

Just as a decade elapsed between the Supreme Court's decision in Brown and its next significant intervention into public schools' pupil assignment policies, another decade elapsed between Jenkins and the court's next foray into school desegregation. This time, however, the Court addressed not the question of whether courts could compel school districts to use race-conscious student assignment to cure a constitutional violation, but whether local school boards could voluntarily use race-conscious student assignment policies to produce racially integrated schools in the absence of a constitutional violation. The Court's response in Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1, 551 U.S. 701 (2007), rested not only on the line of cases decided following Brown but also on parallel developments in equal protection jurisprudence that occurred outside the context of public education. Accordingly, that opinion appears at pages 616-632, infra.

4. The efficacy of judicial intervention. What does the Court's long struggle to define and implement the principle of racial equality reveal about the efficacy of judicial review? Has the Court been able to achieve the objectives it established in Brown?

These questions raise difficult issues about the extent to which the Court can control social, historical, and political forces and the extent to which it is controlled by them. Many scholars have concluded that Brown was instrumental in sparking the civil rights movement. See, e.g., Gill, The Shaping of Race Relations by the Federal Judiciary in Court Decisions, 11 Negro Educ. Rev. 15, 15–16 (1960) ("It is clear that official action to improve the condition of the Negro minority probably would never have been taken in many instances had it not been for the Federal Courts."). See generally sources collected in Klarman, Civil Rights Law: Who Made It and How Much Did It Matter?, 83 Geo. L.J. 433, 452 n.91 (1994).

Much recent literature has been more skeptical, however. For example, in The Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring about Social Change? 157 (1991), Gerald Rosenberg concludes that there is “little evidence that the judicial system [produced] much of the massive change in civil rights that swept the United States in the 1960s. [While] we can never know what would have happened if the Court had not acted as it did [the] existence and strength of pro-civil rights forces at least suggest that change would have occurred [without judicial intervention], albeit at a pace unknown.” M. Klarman, From Jim Crow to Civil Rights: The Supreme Court and the Struggle for Racial Equality (2004) (elaborating on the relationship between Brown, southern resistance, and national support for civil rights).

Is there a plausible argument that Brown actually weakened the civil rights movement? Rosenberg suggests that civil rights litigation “siphon[ed] off crucial resources and talent [thereby] weakening political efforts”:

A further danger of litigation as a strategy for significant social reform is that symbolic victories may be mistaken for substantive ones, covering a reality that is distasteful. Rather than working to change that reality, reformers relying on a litigation strategy for reform may be misled (or content?) to celebrate the illusion of change.

Rosenberg, supra, at 340. See also Seidman, Brown and Miranda, 80 Cal. L. Rev. 673, 717 (1992):

It came to be seen that the Brown Court offered the country a kind of deal, and, from the perspective of defenders of the status quo, not a bad one at that. Prior to Brown [contradictions] in the ideology of the separate-but-equal doctrine were permanently destabilizing and threatened any equilibrium.

By purporting to resolve those contradictions, Brown also served to end their destabilizing potential. The Court resolved the contradictions by definitional fiat: separate facilities were now simply proclaimed to be inherently unequal. But the flip side of this aphorism was that once white society was willing to make facilities legally nonseparate, the demand for equality had been satisfied and blacks no longer had just cause for complaint. The mere existence of Brown thus served [to] legitimate current arrangements. True, many blacks remained poor and disempowered. But their status was now no longer a result of the denial of equality. Instead, it marked a personal failure to take advantage of one’s definitionally equal status.

There is similar controversy about how much change was actually achieved, whatever its cause. The Court has been overwhelmingly successful in removing legally mandated segregation. The results in terms of actual integration are more mixed, however. Progress was substantial in the South during the 1960s and 1970s, but in 1988 the trend reversed itself, and since then segregation has risen substantially. While only 23 percent of black students in the South attended hypersegregated schools in 1980 (that is, schools that were more than 90 percent minority), by 2014, nearly 36 percent of black students were in such schools. See Frankenberg, Hawley, Ee, and Orfield, Southern Schools: More Than a Half Century After the Civil Rights Revolution 8 (May 2017).

Finally, even in schools that are formally integrated, the interracial contact envisioned by Brown has frequently not materialized. Thus, a significant percentage of blacks attending integrated schools are assigned to segregated, or substantially segregated, classrooms. See Fulfilling the Letter and Spirit of the Law: Desegregation of the Nation's Public Schools 233–234 (U.S. Commission on Civil Rights 1976). Indeed, “tracking” schemes and assignment of black children to special education programs in disproportionate numbers may have aggravated the sense of inferiority Brown was designed to combat. See G. Orfield, How to Make Desegregation Work: The Adaptation of Schools to Their Newly Integrated Bodies 327–328 (1976); see also J. Oakes, Keeping Track: How Schools Structure Inequality (2d ed. 2005).

If one asks whether integration, where it has occurred, has produced equal educational opportunity, the evidence is even more mixed. While there is no proof that integration has reduced white achievement levels, neither is there conclusive proof that it has aided blacks in any demonstrable fashion. See, e.g., St. John, The Effects of Desegregation on Children, in Yarmolinsky, Liebman, and Schelling, Race and Schooling in the City 85–102 (1981); Armor, The Evidence on Busing, Pub. Interest 90 (Summer 1972). But see Mickelson, The Academic Consequences of Desegregation and Segregation: Evidence from the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Schools, 81 N.C. L. Rev. 1513, 1546 (2003) (concluding on the bases of regression analyses conducted within the Charlotte-Mecklenburg school system that the more time both black and white students spend in desegregated elementary schools, the higher their standardized test scores in middle and high school, and the higher their track placements in secondary school); Schofield and Hausmann, The Conundrum of School Desegregation: Positive Student Outcomes and Waning Support, 66 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 83 (2004) (summarizing twenty years of social science research that suggests early integration is beneficial to black and white students, particularly by long-range social and academic measures and criticizing the reasons for abandoning it).

What if one asks, more broadly still, whether the Court has succeeded in implementing the great aims of the Reconstruction amendments—healing the wounds of slavery and integrating blacks into the mainstream of U.S. life?

Consider the following argument: Brown was a great success. Before Brown, it was constitutionally legitimate in our society for government to legislate the separation of the races. Brown put an end to the most degrading and most humiliating form of discrimination—state-sponsored, legally enforced racial separation. Moreover, Brown opened the door to the civil rights movement. In so doing, the Court took a critical first step toward forming the political coalition that produced the civil rights legislation of the 1960s. Whether or not Brown succeeded in transforming the education system, it triggered the desegregation of public facilities generally.

Compare with this optimistic view the following summary, which Derrick Bell puts into the mouth of his fictional heroine Geneva Crenshaw:

[Because] the Supreme Court is unable or unwilling to recognize and remedy the real losses resulting from long-held, race-based, subordinated status, the relief the Court has been willing to grant, while welcome, proves of less value than expected and exacts the exorbitant price of dividing the black community along economic lines....

[There] seems little doubt that abandonment of overtly discriminatory policies has lowered racial barriers for some talented and skilled blacks seeking access to opportunity and advancement. Even their upward movement is, however, pointed to by much of the society as the final proof that racism is dead—a too hasty pronouncement which dilutes the achievement of those who have moved ahead and denies even society's sympathy to those less fortunate blacks whose opportunities and life fortunes are less promising today than they were twenty-five years ago.

D. Bell, And We Are Not Saved 48–49 (1987). See also D. Bell, Silent Covenants: Brown v. Board of Education and the Unfulfilled Hopes for Racial Reform (2004) (suggesting that blacks in America would be better off if the Supreme Court had retained, but had vigorously enforced, requirements of separate but equal).

Which of these views is most consistent with statistics concerning the current status of blacks in U.S. society? Blacks have made great strides in educational achievement since Brown. See H. Levin, Education and Earnings of Blacks and the “Brown” Decision 12 (1981). As recently as 1970, only 31 percent of African-American adults had completed four years of high school, as compared to 54 percent of white adults. By 2015, 87 percent of blacks and 93.3 percent of non-Hispanic whites had completed high school. See U.S. Bureau of the Census Educational Attainment in the United States: 2015, table 1.

Still, educational gains have not been uniformly translated into economic progress. In the second quarter of 2017, the total U.S. unemployment rate was 4.2 percent, while the black unemployment rate was 7.3 percent. U.S. Dep’t of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, Labor Force Statistics from the Current Population Survey (2017). Black median household income remains less than sixty percent of white household income. See U.S. Bureau of the Census, Income and Poverty in the United States: 2015, table 1. And the poverty rate for blacks is still more than double the rate for non-Hispanic whites. Id., table 3.

Do these statistics provide appropriate criteria by which to judge the Court’s work? If not, what criteria would you suggest? In reviewing the Court’s performance from before the Civil War through the modern desegregation controversies, think about the extent to which the Court has been able to function as an effective alternative power center for dealing with the race question. Has the Court’s effectiveness been hampered (augmented?) by the necessity of formulating public policy through the litigation process? By the obligation to write opinions tying its conclusions to the constitutional text?

B. EQUAL PROTECTION METHODOLOGY: RATIONAL BASIS REVIEW

Despite the Supreme Court’s prediction in The Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873), that it “[doubted] very much whether any action of a State not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of [the equal protection clause],” see pages 476-477, supra, the equal protection clause has become a major doctrinal tool for analyzing controversies unrelated to race. (Indeed, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes once referred to it as the “last resort of constitutional arguments.” Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200, 208 (1927).)

This section and the following sections examine the general methodology courts use to resolve equal protection disputes. Broadly speaking, equal protection claims involve a challenge to laws that allocate benefits or impose burdens on a defined class of individuals. (While it is possible to have a “class of one,” see Village of Willowbrook v. Olech, 528 U.S. 562 (2000), discussed at page 529, infra, laws generally define classes more broadly.) The plaintiff in an equal protection case claims that the government has drawn the line between the favored and disfavored groups in an impermissible place. But the fact of treating individuals differently cannot invariably give rise to an equal protection violation: Such an approach would make government impossible, since nearly all government actions classify individuals. For example, a law that sets the driving age at sixteen treats fifteen-year-olds and seventeen-year olds differently, classifying on the basis of age, while a decision to set the passing score for the bar examination at 75 treats applicants who scored 74 differently from those who scored 76, classifying on the basis of test performance. Thus, the real question in equal protection cases involves deciding whether, under particular circumstances, a challenged classification is permissible. In addressing that issue, the Court's approach has focused on three basic questions: First, how has the government defined the group being benefited or burdened (the question of "means")? Second, what is the goal the government is pursuing (the question of "ends")? Third, is there a sufficient connection between the means the government is using and the ends it is pursuing (the question of "fit" or "nexus")?

The modern Supreme Court has largely analyzed these questions within a framework of "tiers." Normally, a reviewing court asks whether the line the government has drawn is related in a discernible way to the achievement of a permissible government purpose. This form of scrutiny, called rationality review, is generally quite deferential. But when the line the government has drawn is constitutionally troublesome—for reasons we shall examine later in this chapter—the level of judicial review is ratcheted up: The government may use constitutionally suspect classifications only when their use is more tightly tied to achieving a really significant government objective. To some extent, the tier of scrutiny a court applies can be outcome determinative: Policies that satisfy the default standard of rationality review might run afoul of the more demanding standards applied in cases involving suspect classifications. Thus, in reading the following materials, you should consider two major questions: How does the Court decide which form of scrutiny to apply and, having made that decision, how does the Court apply the form of scrutiny it has chosen?

New York City Transit Authority v. Beazer

440 U.S. 568 (1979)

MR. JUSTICE STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The New York City Transit Authority refuses to employ persons who use methadone. The District Court found that this policy violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. [The] Court of Appeals affirmed. [We] now reverse.

[A New York City Transit Authority (TA) rule prohibited employment of persons who use narcotic drugs. TA applied the rule to persons receiving methadone—a synthetic narcotic that, when taken orally, blocks the effect of heroin. The drug is widely used in the treatment of heroin addiction.]

The trial record contains extensive evidence concerning the success of methadone maintenance programs, the employability of persons taking methadone, and the ability of prospective employers to detect drug abuse or other undesirable characteristics of methadone users. In general, the District Court concluded that there are substantial numbers of methadone users who are just as employable as other members of the general population and that normal personnel-screening procedures—at least if augmented by some method of obtaining information from the staffs of methadone programs—would enable TA to identify the unqualified applicants on an individual basis. On the other hand, the District Court recognized that at least one-third of the persons receiving methadone treatment—and probably a good many more—would unquestionably be classified as unemployable.

[The District Court concluded that because] it is clear that substantial numbers of methadone users are capable of performing many of the jobs at TA, [the] Constitution will not tolerate a blanket exclusion of all users from all jobs.

The District Court enjoined TA from denying employment to any person solely because of participation in a methadone maintenance program. Recognizing, however, the special responsibility for public safety borne by certain TA employees and the correlation between longevity in a methadone maintenance program and performance capability, the injunction authorized TA to exclude methadone users from specific categories of safety-sensitive positions and also to condition eligibility on satisfactory performance in a methadone program for at least a year. In other words, the court held that TA could lawfully adopt general rules excluding all methadone users from some jobs and a large number of methadone users from all jobs....

At its simplest, the District Court's conclusion was that TA's rule is broader than necessary to exclude those methadone users who are not actually qualified to work for TA. We may assume not only that this conclusion is correct but also that it is probably unwise for a large employer like TA to rely on a general rule instead of individualized consideration of every job applicant. But these assumptions concern matters of personnel policy that do not implicate the principle safeguarded by the Equal Protection Clause. As the District Court recognized, the special classification created by TA's rule serves the general objectives of safety and efficiency.⁹

[Because] the exclusionary line challenged by respondents...does not circumscribe a class of persons characterized by some unpopular trait or affiliation, it does not create or reflect any special likelihood of bias on the part of the ruling majority. Under these circumstances, it is of no constitutional significance that the degree of rationality is not as great with respect to certain ill-defined subparts of the classification as it is with respect to the classification as a whole.

No matter how unwise it may be for TA to refuse employment to individual car cleaners, track repairmen, or bus drivers simply because they are receiving methadone treatment, the Constitution does not authorize a federal court to interfere in that policy decision.

[Justice Powell's opinion, concurring in part and dissenting in part, and Justice Brennan's dissenting statement are omitted.]

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, with whom MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL joins, dissenting....

The question before us is the rationality of placing successfully maintained or recently cured persons in the same category as those just attempting to escape heroin addiction or who have failed to escape it, rather than in with the general population. The asserted justification for the challenged classification is the objective of a capable and reliable work force, and thus the characteristic in question is employability....Employability, as the District Court used it in reference to successfully maintained methadone users, means only that the employer is no more likely to find a member of that group to be an unsatisfactory employee than he would an employee chosen from the general population.

[TA] had every opportunity, but presented nothing to negative the employability of successfully maintained methadone users....

The District Court found that the fact of successful participation for one year could be discovered through petitioners' normal screening process without additional effort and, I repeat, that those who meet that criterion are no more likely than the average applicant to turn out to be poor employees. Accordingly, the rule's classification of successfully maintained persons as dispositively different from the general population is left without any justification and, with its irrationality and invidiousness thus uncovered, must fall before the Equal Protection Clause.¹⁵

Finally, even were the District Court wrong, and even were successfully maintained persons marginally less employable than the average applicant, the blanket exclusion of only these people, when but a few are actually unemployable and when many other groups have varying numbers of unemployable members, is arbitrary and unconstitutional. Many persons now suffer from or may again suffer from some handicap related to employability. But petitioners have singled out respondents—unlike ex-offenders, former alcoholics and mental patients, diabetics, epileptics, and those currently using tranquilizers, for example—for sacrifice to this at best ethereal and likely nonexistent risk of increased unemployability. Such an arbitrary assignment of burdens among classes that are similarly situated with respect to the proffered objectives is the type of invidious choice forbidden by the Equal Protection Clause.

Note: Equal Treatment and Relevant Differences

1. The nature of equality. What does it mean to treat two people, or two groups of people, “equally” for purposes of the equal protection clause? Consider, for example, whether each of the following hypothetical employment rules for the New York City Transit Authority provides for equal treatment:

- a. No position shall be filled by a woman.
- b. No position shall be filled by a person weighing less than 175 pounds.
- c. No position shall be filled by a person without a high school diploma.
- d. All positions shall be filled by lot.
- e. All persons applying for any position shall be hired.

In a trivial sense, each of these rules provides for equal treatment. Under each of them, every applicant is equally subject to the same criteria. Thus, under rule c, all applicants are equally subject to the requirement of a high school diploma, and under rule a, all applicants are equally subject to the requirement that they be male. Indeed, all rules, if they are applied as written, provide for equality in this sense. Thus, under rule b, it would violate equality of treatment for the Transit Authority to hire one individual who weighs 150 pounds, while refusing to hire another individual on the grounds that she weighs less than 175 pounds.

In a similarly trivial sense, each of the hypothetical employment rules denies equal treatment. Under each of them, some people are denied a benefit that is granted to others. Inequality in this sense is also inescapable. Even rule e, which requires hiring all people who apply for the position, discriminates against the class of people who did not apply for the position.

These examples illustrate another difficulty with the concept of equality: Providing similar treatment to two groups will not result in equal treatment if the groups are not similarly situated. Rule b, for example, provides similar treatment to all applicants: They cannot weigh less than 175 pounds. But in one obvious sense, the rule does not provide equal treatment because applicants are not similarly situated with respect to the rule. Similarly, rule d gives everyone an equal chance to win a job in a lottery. But even if the lottery is fairly conducted, the decision to use a lottery might generate complaints if the winner is less qualified for the job or less in need of it or less “deserving” of it than the loser.

This last point raises an important question about the perspective from which equality is to be measured. Equality might be measured with respect to formal treatment: As long as each individual is subjected to the same selection regime, the requirement of equality is satisfied. Or equality might be measured with respect to outcomes: As long as each individual obtains the same level of benefits, equality has been achieved. Suppose that all subway mechanics need protective helmets. Suppose, further, that some workers can use stock helmets that cost $100, but that other workers, either because of the size of their heads or because they wish to wear religious head coverings under their helmets, must obtain custom-made helmets that cost $200. Does equality require, prohibit, or permit the Transit Authority to provide each worker with the same helmet allowance?

2. The normative appeal of equality. Even if we could give substantive content to the equality requirement, it is not clear why it has any normative appeal. Although the demands of the equal protection clause can be satisfied by extending the contested benefit to a broader group, the government need not respond in this fashion. It may also fully satisfy the demand of equality by denying both groups the contested benefit. Suppose both A and B deserve a benefit, but B does not receive it. If A is also denied the benefit, does this make the outcome more or less just? How is A made better off by B’s misfortune? Consider in this regard the problem posed by Heckler v. Mathews, 465 U.S. 728 (1984). Congress amended the Social Security Act to extend certain benefits to women but not to men. Concerned that the courts might invalidate the law on equal protection grounds, Congress also included a provision stating that, if the law were invalidated, neither men nor women would get the benefit. The Court upheld the right of a man to challenge the provision. Should it have? Consider also Sessions v. Morales-Santana, 137 S. Ct. 1678 (2017). Federal law regarding transmission of citizenship to children born abroad treats children born to unmarried U.S. citizen mothers more favorably than children born to unmarried U.S. citizen fathers. The Court held that this differential treatment violated the equal protection clause. However, the Court went on to hold that it was “not equipped to grant the relief Morales-Santana seeks, i.e., extending to his father (and, derivatively, to him) the benefit” of the more easily-met requirement

“reserve[d] for unwed mothers.” The Court left it to Congress to “address the issue and settle on a uniform prescription that neither favors nor disadvantages any person on the basis of gender.” In the interim, the Court announced that the less favorable rule should also apply “prospectively, to children born to unwed U.S.-citizen mothers.”

In thinking about the kinds of equal protection claims that get litigated and the kinds of remedies plaintiffs seek, consider Karlan, Race, Rights, and Remedies in Criminal Adjudication, 96 Mich. L. Rev. 2001, 2027 (1998):

With few exceptions, the plaintiffs in the typical equal protection case seek to acquire, rather than to avoid, something: the vote, a job, admission to particular schools. The government distributes benefits and plaintiffs seek to receive the same benefits that [other] individuals...receive.

The general assumption in contemporary equal protection law, which seems to play out most of the time, is that faced with a finding of unconstitutionality, the state will remedy the inequality by providing the benefit to the previously excluded group (that is, by “levelling up”) rather than by depriving the previously included group (“levelling down”). The few examples in ordinary equal protection of levelling down...stand out precisely because of their rarity.

How much of the work being done in equality claims rests on the assumption that the benefit will be extended, rather than contracted, either because it is functionally impossible to deny the benefit to everyone—faced with the choice, it seems unlikely that New York would cease running a subway system rather than develop a different way of selecting Transit Authority employees—or because individuals already receiving the benefit will exert political pressure to retain their benefits even if the pool of beneficiaries must be expanded? Is leveling down incompatible with the norms of equality, even if it results in uniform treatment? See Brake, When Equality Leaves Everyone Worse Off: The Problem of Leveling Down in Equality Law, 46 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 513 (2004).

3. The “relevant difference” requirement. One might say that the principle of equal treatment requires that individuals be treated similarly to the extent that they are the same and treated differently to the extent that they are different. But individuals are both the same and different in an infinite variety of respects. For example, although competing applicants under rule a are different in that some are men and some are women, they are the same in the sense that all are persons wishing to work for the Transit Authority.

Thus, the equality principle must be modified to provide that differences in treatment can be justified only by relevant differences between individuals. A difference is relevant if, but only if, it bears an empirical relationship to the purpose of the rule. This is presumably what the Court means in Beazer when it says that “legislative classifications are valid unless they bear no rational relationship to the State’s objectives.” Even though the Transit Authority’s no-methadone rule treated methadone users and nonusers differently, the Court thought that the rule did not violate the equality principle because there was a difference between the two classes relevant to the state’s objective of a safe and efficient transit system.

4. Relevant differences and efficiency. Is there a sound reason why we should insist that legislative classifications be based on relevant distinctions in this sense? This rule seems to turn the equality requirement into no more than a mandate for efficiency. Note, for example, that the requirement of a relevant distinction provides no guidance as to how the social costs of achieving the state’s objective are to be distributed when different distributions are equally efficacious in achieving the state’s goal. Nor does it provide any protection against the concentration of extreme costs on a small group when a “fairer” distribution of the costs over a larger group might be slightly less “efficient.”

A more fundamental problem with this version of the “relevant difference” requirement is that it becomes meaningless unless some restriction is placed on the kinds of purposes the legislature may pursue. For example, imagine a Transit Authority whose director has decided that the public welfare would be best enhanced by promoting traditional family structures and that providing high-paying jobs to men while deterring women from entering the workforce will serve this goal. In this scenario, sex is a relevant difference among job candidates and rule a furthers the government’s purpose.

Note: Limitations on Permissible Government Purposes

What makes a legislative purpose invalid under the equal protection clause? There are some purposes that are forbidden by other constitutional provisions; presumably a classification designed to accomplish one of those independently forbidden goals would be unconstitutional as well. For example, the first amendment protects the free exercise of religion. Thus, if a state denied a generally available government benefit—for example, drivers’ licenses—to a class of people because of those individuals’ religious beliefs, that law would be unconstitutional. But in such a case, reference to the equal protection clause would seem superfluous: A reviewing court could simply rely on the substantive constitutional provision to invalidate the law. Does the equal protection clause of its own force prohibit the government from pursuing certain ends? If so, what ends does it prohibit? Consider the following possibilities:

1. Expressions of animus or disapproval. To what extent is the government permitted to deny a benefit or impose a burden on a class of people because it disapproves of their conduct or beliefs or status? Many laws express moral judgments. For example, a state agency policy that provides health insurance to the spouses, but not to the unmarried partners, companions, or friends of state employees may in part rest on a judgment that marriage is a special relationship particularly deserving of state support. Similarly, a law criminalizing the mistreatment of animals—and thus treating individuals who treat animals in specified ways differently from other persons—may rest on the judgment that society thinks cruelty to animals is immoral.

But a principle that moral disapproval is always a permissible government purpose would swallow up the equal protection clause, since withholding a benefit or imposing a burden on a defined class can always be said to serve either the governmental purpose of expressing disapproval or the purpose of creating an incentive for individuals to forswear conduct of which the government disapproves. For example, a law that denies government-subsidized student loans to individuals who use illegal drugs both expresses disapproval of such drug use and may deter people who want such loans from using drugs.

What separates permissible from impermissible expressions of disapproval? Consider the following cases in which the Supreme Court has found violations of the equal protection clause. What accounts for the Court's holding that the government's purpose was impermissible?

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE v. MORENO, 413 U.S. 528 (1973). Section 3(e) of the Food Stamp Act of 1964 (as amended in 1971) excluded from participation in the food stamp program any low-income household containing an individual who was unrelated to any other member of the household. Individuals who satisfied the income eligibility requirements for the program brought suit to challenge this provision. For example, one plaintiff had a daughter with an acute hearing deficiency who required special instruction in a school for the deaf. Because the school was located in an area in which she could not otherwise afford to live, she agreed to share an apartment near the school with another woman on public assistance. Since she was not related to the woman, she was threatened with termination of food stamp assistance. The plaintiffs claimed that the "unrelated persons" provision created an irrational classification in violation of the equal protection component of the due process clause of the fifth amendment. Justice Brennan delivered the Court's opinion:

“Under traditional equal protection analysis, a legislative classification must be sustained if the classification itself is rationally related to a legitimate governmental interest. [The act stated that it was the policy of Congress to ‘raise levels of nutrition among low-income households’ and increase utilization of food so as to ‘strengthen our agricultural economy.’] The challenged statutory classification [is] clearly irrelevant to [these purposes]....

“Thus, if it is to be sustained, the challenged classification must rationally further some legitimate governmental interest other than those specifically stated in [the act]. Regrettably, there is little legislative history to illuminate the purposes of the [act]. The legislative history that does exist, however, indicates that that amendment was intended to prevent so-called ‘hippies’ and ‘hippie communes’ from participating in the food stamp program. The challenged classification clearly cannot be sustained by reference to this congressional purpose. For if the constitutional conception of ‘equal protection of the laws’ means anything, it must at the very least mean that a bare congressional desire to harm a politically unpopular group cannot constitute a legitimate governmental interest.”

Justice Douglas wrote a separate concurring opinion.

Justice Rehnquist, with whom Chief Justice Burger joined, dissented: “I do not think it is unreasonable for Congress to conclude that the basic unit which it was willing to support with federal funding [is] some variation on the family as we know it—a household consisting of related individuals. This unit provides a guarantee which is not provided by households containing unrelated individuals that the household exists for some purpose other than to collect federal food stamps.”

CITY OF CLEBURNE v. CLEBURNE LIVING CENTER, 473 U.S. 432 (1985). The City of Cleburne, Texas, had a municipal zoning ordinance that permitted a wide variety of structures to be built on a particular site, including “[hospitals], sanitariums, nursing homes or homes for convalescents or aged.” However, the ordinance specifically excluded “homes for [the] insane or feeble-minded or alcoholics or drug addicts.” Pursuant to that ordinance, the city denied a special use permit for the operation of a group home for persons who were mentally retarded.

The Supreme Court held that the ordinance violated the equal protection clause. Justice White delivered the Court’s opinion:

“To withstand equal protection review, legislation that distinguishes between the mentally retarded and others must be rationally related to a legitimate governmental purpose....

"[The] mentally retarded as a group are indeed different from others not sharing their misfortune, and in this respect they may be different from those who would occupy other facilities that would be [permitted]. But this difference is largely irrelevant unless the [home] and those who would occupy it would threaten legitimate interests of the city in a way that other permitted uses such as boarding houses and hospitals would not....

"[The city council] was concerned with the negative attitude of the majority of property owners located within 200 feet of the [facility], as well as with the fears of elderly residents of the neighborhood. But mere negative attitudes, or fear, unsubstantiated by factors which are properly cognizable in a zoning proceeding, are not permissible bases for treating a home for the mentally retarded differently from apartment houses, multiple dwellings, and the like. It is plain that the electorate as a whole [could] not order city action violative of the Equal Protection Clause, and the City may not avoid the strictures of that Clause by deferring to the wishes or objections of some fraction of the body politic....

"[The] Council had two objections to the location of the facility. It was concerned that the facility was across the street from a junior high school, and it feared that the students might harass the occupants of the [home]. But the school itself is attended by about 30 mentally retarded students, and denying a permit based on such vague, undifferentiated fears is again permitting some portion of the community to validate what would otherwise be an equal protection violation. The other objection to the home's location was that it was located on 'a five hundred year flood plain.' This concern with the possibility of a flood, however, can hardly be based on a distinction between the [home] and, for example, nursing homes, homes for convalescents or the aged, or sanitariums or hospitals, any of which could be located on the [site] without obtaining a special use permit....

"The short of it is that requiring the permit in this case appears to us to rest on an irrational prejudice against the mentally retarded, including those who would occupy the [facility] and who would live under the closely supervised and highly regulated conditions expressly provided for by state and federal law...."

Justice Stevens concurred:

"[Our] cases reflect a continuum of judgmental responses to differing classifications which have been explained in opinions by terms ranging from 'strict scrutiny' at one extreme to 'rational basis' at the other. I have never been persuaded that these so called 'standards' adequately explain the decisional process. [In] my own approach to these cases, I have always asked myself whether I could find a 'rational basis' for the classification at issue. The term 'rational,' of course, includes a requirement that an impartial lawmaker could logically believe that the classification would serve a legitimate public purpose that transcends the harm to the members of the disadvantaged class. Thus, the word ‘rational’—for me at least—includes elements of legitimacy and neutrality that must always characterize the performance of the sovereign’s duty to govern impartially....

“[The] Court of Appeals correctly observed that through ignorance and prejudice the mentally retarded ‘have been subjected to a history of unfair and often grotesque mistreatment.’ The discrimination against the mentally retarded that is at issue in this case is the city’s decision to require an annual special use permit before property in an apartment house district may be used as a group home for persons who are mildly retarded. The record convinces me that this permit was required because of the irrational fears of neighboring property owners, rather than for the protection of the mentally retarded persons who would reside in [the] home.”

Justice Marshall concurred in the judgment. He pointed out that the Court’s rejection of “legitimate concerns for fire hazards or the serenity of the neighborhood” was atypical of the conventional form of rationality review.

ROMER v. EVANS, 517 U.S. 620 (1996). By statewide initiative, Colorado enacted a constitutional amendment prohibiting local governments from enacting antidiscrimination measures protecting “homosexual, lesbian, or bisexual orientation, conduct, practices or relationships.” In a six-to-three decision, the Court, per Justice Kennedy, invalidated the amendment:

“Amendment 2 fails, indeed defies, [conventional rational basis] inquiry. First, the amendment has the peculiar property of imposing a broad and undifferentiated disability on a single named group, an exceptional and [invalid] form of legislation. Second, its sheer breadth is so discontinuous with the reasons offered for it that the amendment seems inexplicable by anything but animus toward the class that it affects; it lacks a rational relationship to legitimate state interests....

“[Laws] of the kind now before us raise the inevitable inference that the disadvantage imposed is born of animosity toward the class of persons affected. ‘If the constitutional conception of “equal protection of the laws” means anything, it must at the very least mean that a bare...desire to harm a politically unpopular group cannot constitute a legitimate governmental interest.’ [Moreno.] Even laws enacted for broad and ambitious purposes often can be explained by reference to legitimate public policies which justify the incidental disadvantages they impose on certain persons. Amendment 2, however, in making a general announcement that gays and lesbians shall not have any particular protections from the law, inflicts on them immediate, continuing, and real injuries that outrun and belie any legitimate justifications that may be claimed for it.”

Compare Justice Scalia’s dissenting opinion, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Thomas:

“The Court’s opinion contains grim, disapproving hints that Coloradans have been guilty of ‘animus’ or ‘animosity’ toward homosexuality, as though that has been established as Unamerican. Of course it is our moral heritage that one should not hate any human being or class of human beings. But I had thought that one could consider certain conduct reprehensible—murder, for example, or polygamy, or cruelty to animals—and could exhibit even ‘animus’ toward such conduct. Surely that is the only sort of ‘animus’ at issue here: moral disapproval of homosexual conduct, the same sort of moral disapproval that produced the centuries-old criminal laws [prohibiting sodomy] that we held constitutional in [Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)].”

Several Justices revisited this issue in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), which overruled Bowers v. Hardwick. (Lawrence is treated in more depth at pages 678-679 and 693-694, infra, and in Chapter 6.) The Court struck down a Texas criminal statute that prohibited homosexual, but not heterosexual sodomy, on due process grounds. Justice O’Connor concurred in the result on the ground that the distinction between heterosexual and homosexual sodomy violated equal protection because it reflected nothing beyond “a bare desire to harm the group,...an interest that is insufficient to satisfy rational basis review under the Equal Protection Clause....”

Do you agree that the “desire to harm a politically unpopular group cannot constitute a legitimate governmental interest”? Does it matter why the group is politically unpopular? Is it really unconstitutional for the legislature to determine that one way of life is preferable to another and therefore more worthy of support? Would it be unconstitutional, for example, for the legislature to subsidize small family farms, but not large-scale industry, on the theory that farm life is “wholesome”? Is it a violation of the equal protection clause for a state agency to provide health insurance to the spouses of its employees, but not to unmarried companions of its workers, on the theory that marriage is an important stabilizing institution?

Does Cleburne suggest that laws should be subject to special scrutiny when they disadvantage groups based on immutable traits, since the immutability eliminates the possibility that the legislature is attempting to change behavior? See section C, infra. For example, although the Moreno statute could be justified as an attempt to discourage certain lifestyles, the zoning ordinance in Cleburne could not sensibly be defended as a measure designed to deter mental
