retardation. On which side of this line does the measure invalidated by Romer fall? And who should make the determination whether homosexuality is a mutable or immutable trait—courts, legislatures, the individual plaintiff? And aren't some traits relevant to legitimate governmental objectives even if a person is powerless to change them? Would denying drivers' licenses to blind people run afoul of the equal protection clause?

2. Naked self-dealing. Should rationality review be understood as a guarantor of a political process that is public-regarding and not merely the product of self-serving activity? On this view, differential treatment is illegitimate when its purpose is simply to advance the interests of politically powerful individuals. Consider Sunstein, Public Values, Private Interests, and the Equal Protection Clause, 1982 Sup. Ct. Rev. 127, 134:

When the government operates to benefit A and burden B, it can do so only if it is prepared to justify its decision by reference to a public value. [Legislation] may not be merely the adjustment of private interests, or the transfer of wealth or opportunity from one person to another; it must be in some sense public-serving. [Nor] is political strength a legitimate justification. [The] institution that made the discrimination must be attempting to remedy a perceived public evil, and must not be responding only to the interests or preferences of some of its constituents.

Can the distinction between public and private interests, on which this theory rests, be maintained? What is the public interest if not the aggregation of the private preferences of individual participants in the political process?

Does this “public interest” requirement adequately capture the equality principle? Does it provide adequate protection against the infliction of very severe deprivations on small groups when those deprivations serve the public interest?

Note: “Actual Purpose” Review

Even if some purposes are impermissible, there still remain a wide variety of permissible government purposes. In deciding whether a particular classification is sufficiently related to a legitimate government purpose, what inquiry does the court need to make with respect to the purpose being pursued? In McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420 (1961), the Court said that “[the] constitutional safeguard is offended only if the classification rests on grounds wholly irrelevant to the achievement of the State's objective. State legislatures are presumed to have acted within their constitutional power despite the fact that, in practice, their laws result in some inequality. A statutory discrimination will not be set aside if any state of facts reasonably may be conceived to justify it.” Similarly in U.S. Railroad Retirement Board v. Fritz, 449 U.S. 166 (1980), Justice Rehnquist’s opinion for the Court stated that “[where], as here, there are plausible reasons for Congress’ action, our inquiry is at an end. It is, of course, “constitutionally irrelevant whether this reasoning in fact underlay the legislative decision,” [quoting Flemming v. Nestor, 363 U.S. 603, 612 (1960)] because this Court has never insisted that a legislative body articulate its reasons for enacting a statute.

Does it make sense to invalidate a law that advances a legitimate state purpose simply because the legislators were not thinking of that purpose when they enacted it? On the other hand, why should deference to the legislature require upholding a statute that advances a policy that the legislature had no interest in pursuing?

1. Putting the best face on dubious statutes. To what extent does rationality review become an exercise in courts ignoring the real purpose behind self-dealing statutes and inventing more normatively attractive legislative goals? Consider the following examples:

MINNESOTA v. CLOVER LEAF CREAMERY CO., 449 U.S. 456 (1981). Minnesota law banned the retail sale of milk in plastic nonreturnable, nonrefillable containers but permitted such sale in nonreturnable paperboard milk cartons. A state trial court held the law violative of the equal protection clause in part because the “actual basis” for the law was to promote the economic interests of local dairy and pulpwood industries. On appeal, the Minnesota Supreme Court concluded that the law was actually designed to serve environmental objectives. Nonetheless, it affirmed the trial court on the ground that the ban on plastic containers was not rationally related to these purposes. The Supreme Court reversed. Justice Brennan wrote the Court’s opinion:

“The parties agree that the standard of review applicable to this case under the Equal Protection Clause is the familiar ‘rational basis’ test. Moreover, they agree that the purposes of the Act cited by the legislature—promoting resource conservation, easing solid waste disposal problems, and conserving energy—are legitimate state purposes.⁷

“[Respondents] apparently have not challenged the theoretical connection between a ban on plastic nonreturnables and the purposes articulated by the legislature; instead, they have argued that there is no empirical connection between the two. They produced impressive supporting evidence at trial to prove that the probable consequences of the ban on plastic nonreturnable milk containers will be to deplete natural resources, exacerbate solid waste disposal problems, and waste energy, because consumers unable to purchase milk in plastic containers will turn to paperboard milk cartons, allegedly a more environmentally harmful product.

“But States are not required to convince the courts of the correctness of their legislative judgments....

“Although parties challenging legislation under the Equal Protection Clause may introduce evidence supporting their claim that it is irrational, they cannot prevail so long as ‘it is evident from all the considerations presented to [the legislature], and those of which we may take judicial notice, that the question is at least debatable.’ [United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 154 (1938).] Where there was evidence before the legislature reasonably supporting the classification, litigants may not procure invalidation of the legislation merely by tendering evidence in court that the legislature was mistaken.”

Does this formulation treat as “constitutionally irrelevant” the reasons that “in fact underlay the legislative decision” as Fritz requires?

More recently, in Armour v. City of Indianapolis, 566 U.S. 673 (2012), the Supreme Court upheld Indianapolis’s decision to forgive the assessments for sewer improvement projects levied on property owners who had chosen to pay their assessment in periodic installments while refusing to refund the payments made by property owners who had chosen to pay in a lump sum. The assessment had been roughly $10,000. While the lump-sum payors had paid the entire amount, some of their neighbors had paid less than $500 at the time the forgiveness was announced.

Writing for the Court, Justice Breyer found that the city’s decision satisfied the rational basis test. “Where ‘ordinary commercial transactions’ are at issue, rational basis review requires deference to reasonable underlying legislative judgments.” Justice Breyer concluded that Indianapolis’s differential treatment of installment and lump-sum payors had a rational basis: reducing the administrative costs entailed in continuing to seek payment from the installment-plan payors.

The Chief Justice, joined by Justices Scalia and Alito, dissented. He thought that the city’s justifications for the differential treatment—“the desire to avoid administrative hassle and the ‘fiscal[] challeng[e]’ of giving back money it wanted to keep”—could not “pass constitutional muster, even under rational basis review”:

We have never before held that administrative burdens justify grossly disparate tax treatment of those the State has provided should be treated alike....The reason we have rejected this argument is obvious: The Equal Protection Clause does not provide that no State shall “deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, unless it’s too much of a bother.”...

The Court is willing to concede that “administrative considerations could not justify...an unfair system” in which “a city arbitrarily allocate[s] taxes among a few citizens while forgiving many others on the ground that it is cheaper and easier to collect taxes from a few people than from many.” Cold comfort, that. If the quoted language does not accurately describe this case, I am not sure what it would reach....

Our precedents do not ask for much from government in this area—only “rough equality in tax treatment.”...But every generation or so a case comes along when this Court needs to say enough is enough, if the Equal Protection Clause is to retain any force in this context....Indiana law promised neighboring homeowners that they would be treated equally when it came to paying for sewer hookups. The City then ended up charging some homeowners 30 times what it charged their neighbors for the same hookups. The equal protection violation is plain.

2. The epistemological problem. Does the difficulty in discovering the legislature’s “actual purpose” counsel against utilizing an actual purpose standard of review? See Shepsle, Congress Is a “They,” Not an “It”: Legislative Intent as Oxymoron, 12 Intl. Rev. L. & Econ. 239 (1992). Consider Kassel v. Consolidated Freightways Corp., 450 U.S. 662 (1981) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting):

[Actual purpose review] assumes that individual legislators are motivated by one discernible “actual” purpose, and ignores the fact that different legislators may vote for a single piece of legislation for widely different reasons. [How], for example, would a court adhering to [actual purpose review] approach a statute, the legislative history of which indicated that 10 votes were based on [permissible considerations], 10 votes were based on [impermissible considerations] and the statute passed by a vote of 40-20?

Justice Rehnquist also pointed out that under actual purpose review, “litigants who wish to succeed in invalidating a law [must] have a certain schizophrenia if they are to be successful in their advocacy: They must first convince this Court that the legislature had a particular purpose in mind in enacting the law, and then convince it that the law was not at all suited to the accomplishment of that purpose.” Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762, 783 (1977) (dissenting opinion).

Are these problems insurmountable? Need an advocate be “schizophrenic” in a case where the statute itself or its legislative history makes plain that the legislature intended to accomplish results that fail to validate the statute?

3. Requirement of statement of purpose. Do these epistemological difficulties suggest that the Court should require or encourage the legislature to state explicitly the purposes it wishes a statute to achieve? Lawyers for the state would then be limited to these purposes in defending the constitutionality of the statute. Consider, for example, Justice Powell’s dissenting opinion in Schweiker v. Wilson, 450 U.S. 221 (1981):

The deference to which legislative accommodation of conflicting interests is entitled rests in part upon the principle that the political process of our majoritarian democracy responds to the wishes of the people. Accordingly, an important touchstone for equal protection review of statutes is how readily a policy can be discerned which the legislature intended to serve. When a legitimate purpose for a statute appears in the legislative history or is implicit in the statutory scheme itself, a court has some assurance that the legislature made a conscious policy choice. Our democratic system requires that legislation intended to serve a discernible purpose receive the most respectful deference....

In my view, the Court should receive with some skepticism post hoc hypotheses about legislative purpose, unsupported by the legislative history. When no indication of legislative purpose appears other than the current position of [an executive officer,] the Court should require that the classification bear a “fair and substantial relation” to the asserted purpose....This marginally more demanding scrutiny indirectly would test the plausibility of the tendered purpose and preserve equal protection review as something more than “a mere tautological recognition of the fact that Congress did what it intended to do.” [Fritz (Stevens, J., concurring in the judgment).]

Presumably the heightened scrutiny Justice Powell would impose in the absence of a clearly discernible legislative purpose would provide incentives for the legislature to state its purpose explicitly. Might not the result of this requirement be no more than boilerplate statements of worthwhile purposes that fail to state the legislature’s true objectives? Doesn’t Justice Powell’s position turn actual purpose review on its head by according “the most respectful deference” in precisely those cases where the legislative purpose is clear, and where rigorous judicial review is therefore possible?

Compare Justice Powell's views in Schweiker with Justice Brennan's Fritz dissent. Justice Brennan argued that “[where] Congress has expressly stated the purpose of a piece of legislation, but where the challenged classification is either irrelevant to or counter to that purpose, we must view any post hoc justifications proffered by Government attorneys with skepticism.” Doesn't this suggest that legislative classifications may be subject to more rigorous review when the legislature articulates its purpose? Wouldn't such enhanced review discourage the legislators from candidly stating why they enacted the statute?

In any event, is there a legitimate constitutional basis for the Court skewing review in an effort to force legislative articulation of purpose? When it comes to federal statutes, does such an effort reflect disrespect for a coordinate branch of government?

Note: The Means-Ends Nexus

To survive equal protection review, a classification must bear some connection to a permissible government end. But when is a classification sufficiently related to justify conferring benefits or imposing burdens on the basis of the difference it tracks? Suppose that every member of the disadvantaged class has a trait that every member of the advantaged class lacks, and that the trait is related in some way to achievement of the state's goal. In Beazer, for example, suppose that every methadone user was an unsafe worker, while every nonuser was a safe one. Would this showing be sufficient to satisfy the equality requirement? Arguably the difference between users and nonusers would still not justify the difference in treatment unless the benefit derived, for example, from a safer transit system outweighed the cost imposed on users denied employment.

As complex as this analysis is, it vastly oversimplifies the problems encountered in the real world. For in almost all cases, the classification will not be perfectly efficient but will be either “overinclusive” or “underinclusive” or both. A classification is “overinclusive” if it disadvantages a larger class than is needed to achieve the state's purpose. A classification is “underinclusive” if some people are not disadvantaged even though the failure to include them undermines achievements of the state's interest.

1. Overinclusion. Consider, first, the problem of overinclusion in Beazer. If every methadone user were a safe and efficient worker, the exclusion of the class would not advance the state's purpose at all and hence would be unconstitutional. Both the majority and the dissent seem to agree, however, that at least some methadone users are unsuited for transit work. Is it sufficient to uphold the classification to show that it advances the state's purpose to some extent—if, for example, the transit system would be somewhat safer without methadone users than with them? Such a test would permit the state to impose severe deprivations in exchange for trivial benefits.

A rule requiring the state to demonstrate that every member of the disadvantaged class possesses the trait relevant to the state's objective is no more satisfactory. This test would make legislation virtually impossible, for almost all laws group people together based on generalizations that do not universally hold. It may be that somewhere there is a ten-year-old who would make a perfectly safe transit worker. Yet the Transit Authority is surely justified in imposing a minimum age requirement on the individuals it employs.

It seems clear therefore that the permissibility of a legislative generalization must turn on the cost of the generalization as compared to the cost of a more individualized judgment. Making this comparison involves a complex process. In Beazer, for example, a no-methadone rule eliminates some unsafe workers but at the cost of eliminating some safe ones as well. A more individualized judgment would reduce the number of safe workers whom the selection criteria mistakenly exclude, but arguably at a higher administrative cost. And a less exclusionary categorical rule would reduce the number of safe workers whom the selection criteria mistakenly exclude, but arguably by increasing the costs that ensue from employing a greater number of unsafe workers who go undetected. To strike the balance, one must first weigh the importance of safety against the importance of employment and then discount each side of the equation by the risk of error. Moreover, even if one concludes that the cost imposed on safe methadone users who are wrongly denied employment under the no-methadone rule outweighs the cost imposed by unsafe methadone users who are wrongly employed under a more individualized approach, it does not follow that the no-methadone rule is invalid. The administrative costs associated with a more individualized assessment might still justify use of a prophylactic rule. For example, if the Transit Authority must conduct lengthy interviews with each methadone user to assure his or her safety, it might reasonably conclude that the cost of such interviews outweighs the cost of denying employment to those users who would be safe workers.

2. Underinclusion. A similarly complex weighing process is required when it is alleged that a classification is underinclusive. Is the Transit Authority's rule unconstitutional because it excludes methadone users on the grounds of safety, but does not exclude recovering alcoholics, mental patients, people with diabetes or epilepsy, and others who arguably pose an equal or greater safety risk? The Court has sometimes said that the equal protection clause permits the legislature to deal with one problem at a time or to proceed step by step. See, e.g., Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. 483, 489 (1955). One cannot, however, take these statements literally. If the legislature were completely free to select which part of a problem to attack, the equal protection clause would be meaningless. For example, such a rule would permit the state to deny drivers' licenses to all people with green eyes on the theory that such people cause traffic accidents (albeit not at a greater rate than the population as a whole), and that their exclusion therefore advances the state's goal of traffic safety by decreasing the number of drivers.

One might therefore conclude that the equal protection clause prohibits any law that denies a benefit to a group but grants the benefit to other groups whose inclusion imposes equal or greater costs. Such a rule once again oversimplifies the analysis, however. Suppose, for example, 25 percent of persons with epilepsy would make unsafe transit workers, while only 10 percent of methadone users pose an unacceptable risk. But suppose further that only a small number of persons with epilepsy apply for employment with the Transit Authority, while large numbers of methadone users seek transit jobs. May the Transit Authority disqualify methadone users, but not persons with epilepsy, on the theory that by doing so, it is dealing with a larger share of the total problem?

Closely associated with this problem is the difficulty of relative administrative costs. It may be, for example, that methadone users are easier to identify than persons with epilepsy, or that unsafe persons with epilepsy are easier to identify than unsafe methadone users. In either event, the state might be justified in excluding users of methadone, even though they cause less of the problem, because the cost of exclusion is less.

Moreover, the cost calculation must include the cost of not achieving ancillary goals that may qualify the purpose of achieving a safe transit system. Suppose, for example, persons with epilepsy impose greater safety costs than methadone users. The Transit Authority might nonetheless employ persons with epilepsy, but not methadone users, if it believes that drug addicts, but not victims of epilepsy, are responsible for their plight.

In thinking about how the mixture of concerns might affect equal protection analysis, consider Fitzgerald v. Racing Association of Central Iowa, 539 U.S. 103 (2003). Iowa law imposed a higher tax on revenues gained from slot machines at racetracks than from slot machines on excursion riverboats. The Iowa Supreme Court held that this differential violated the equal protection clause. It reasoned that the "differential tax completely defeats the [statute's] alleged purpose [of helping] racetracks recover from economic distress" and that there could therefore be "no rational reason for this differential tax." In an opinion written by Justice Breyer, the Supreme Court unanimously reversed:

[The] Iowa law, like most laws, might predominately serve one general objective, say, helping racetracks, while containing subsidiary provisions that seek to achieve other desirable (perhaps even contrary) ends as well, thereby producing a law that balances objectives but still serves the general objective when seen as a whole....

[The statute's] grant to the racetracks of authority to operate slot machines should help the racetracks economically to some degree—even if its simultaneous imposition of a tax on slot machine adjusted revenue means that the law provides less help than respondents might like....

[The] difference [in taxation rates], harmful to the racetracks, is helpful to the riverboats, which [were] also facing financial peril.

Finally, the underinclusion analysis is affected by the manner in which the advantaged class is characterized. In Beazer, for example, it may seem quite sensible to disadvantage methadone users, but not persons with epilepsy, if methadone users pose more of a problem. Still, methadone users might ask why the state is worried about the social cost of their unsafe conduct when it does nothing to control the arguably greater social cost imposed by automobile drivers who do not wear seat belts or cigarette smokers who pollute the air around them or parents who abuse their children.

3. The relationship between fit and the Court's view of a statute's underlying purpose. To what does the rationality requirement apply? Must proponents of the law demonstrate that a rational person would believe that the classification advances the legislative purpose to some extent? That a rational person would so believe if the facts were as the legislature supposed them to be? Or must the proponents demonstrate that the various trade-offs outlined between the costs of narrower and broader classifications are “rational”?

Regardless of the verbal distinctions, in practice the application of any of the standards has usually led to validation of the legislative scheme, particularly in cases involving what the Court sees as straightforward economic regulation. Two examples illustrate the Court’s approach.

RAILWAY EXPRESS AGENCY v. NEW YORK, 336 U.S. 106 (1949). A New York traffic regulation prohibited the operation of “advertising vehicles,” but permitted placing “business notices upon business delivery vehicles, so long as such vehicles are engaged in the usual business or regular work of the owner and not used merely or mainly for advertising.” Justice Douglas delivered the Court's opinion:

"[The] regulation draws the line between advertisements of products sold by the owner of the truck and general advertisements. It is argued that unequal treatment on the basis of such a distinction is not justified by the aim and purpose of the regulation. It is said, for example, that one of appellant's trucks carrying the advertisement of a commercial house would not cause any greater distraction of pedestrians and vehicle drivers than if the commercial house carried the same advertisement on its own truck....

"That, however, is a superficial way of analyzing the problem. [The] local authorities may well have concluded that those who advertise their own wares on their trucks do not present the same traffic problem in view of the nature or extent of the advertising which they use. [And] the fact that New York City sees fit to eliminate from traffic this kind of distraction but does not touch what may be even greater ones in a different category, such as the vivid displays on Times Square, is immaterial. It is no requirement of equal protection that all evils of the same genus be eradicated or none at all."

Justice Jackson wrote a concurring opinion: "There are two clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment which this Court may invoke to invalidate ordinances by which municipal governments seek to solve their local problems [—the due process clause and the equal protection clause]....

"The burden should rest heavily upon one who would persuade us to use the due process clause to strike down a substantive law or ordinance. [Invalidation] of a statute [on] due process grounds leaves ungoverned and ungovernable conduct which many people find objectionable.

"Invocation of the equal protection clause, on the other hand, does not disable any governmental body from dealing with the subject at hand. It merely means that the prohibition or regulation must have a broader impact. I regard it as a salutary doctrine that [governments] must exercise their powers so as not to discriminate between their inhabitants except upon some reasonable differentiation fairly related to the object of regulation. [There] is no more effective practical guaranty against arbitrary and unreasonable government than to require that the principles of law which officials would impose upon a minority must be imposed generally. Conversely, nothing opens the door to arbitrary action so effectively as to allow those officials to pick and choose only a few to whom they will apply legislation and thus to escape the political retribution that might be visited upon them if larger numbers were affected....

"This case affords an illustration. Even casual observations from the sidewalks of New York will show that an ordinance which would forbid all advertising on vehicles would run into conflict with many interests, including some, if not all, of the great metropolitan newspapers, which use that advertising extensively. [But] any regulation applicable to all such advertising would require much clearer justification in local conditions to enable its enactment than does some regulation applicable to a few....

“There is not even a pretense here that the traffic hazard created by the advertising which is forbidden is in any manner or degree more hazardous than that which is permitted. It is urged with considerable force that this local regulation does not comply with the equal protection clause because it applies unequally upon classes whose differentiation is in no way relevant to the objects of the regulation....

“The question in my mind comes to this. Where individuals contribute to an evil or danger in the same way and to the same degree, may those who do so for hire be prohibited, while those who do so for their own commercial ends but not for hire be allowed to continue? I think the answer has to be that the hireling may be put in a class by himself and may be dealt with differently than those who act on their own. But this is not merely because such a discrimination will enable the lawmaker to diminish the evil. That might be done by many classifications, which I should think wholly unsustainable. It is rather because there is a real difference between doing in self-interest and doing for hire, so that it is one thing to tolerate action from those who act on their own and it is another thing to permit the same action to be promoted for a price.”

WILLIAMSON v. LEE OPTICAL, 348 U.S. 483 (1955). An Oklahoma statute made it unlawful for any person not a licensed optometrist or ophthalmologist to fit lenses to a face or to duplicate or replace lenses into frames except on a written prescription of an ophthalmologist or optometrist. In practical effect the statute prevented opticians from fitting old glasses into new frames or supplying new or duplicate lenses without a prescription. However, the statute specifically exempted sellers of ready-to-wear glasses. The district court held that this discrimination against opticians violated the equal protection clause.

In a unanimous opinion written by Justice Douglas, the Supreme Court reversed:

“The problem of legislative classification is a perennial one, admitting of no doctrinaire definition. Evils in the same field may be of different dimensions and proportions, requiring different remedies. Or so the legislature may think. Or the reform may take one step at a time, addressing itself to the phase of the problem which seems most acute to the legislative mind. The legislature may select one phase of one field and apply a remedy there, neglecting the others. The prohibition of the Equal Protection Clause goes no further than the invidious discrimination. We cannot say that the point has been reached here. For all this record shows, the ready-to-wear branch of this business may not loom large in Oklahoma or may present problems of regulation distinct from the other branch."

Contrast the fit the Court found adequate in Railway Express and Lee Optical with its rejection of the fit between means and ends in Cleburne, pages 516-518 supra. In addition to rejecting the city's claim that it could treat group homes for persons who are mentally retarded differently from other zoning uses because of other residents' discomfort, the Court also faced the city's claim that denial of the zoning variance was permissible because the proposed home was located on "a five hundred year flood plain." Certainly, avoiding the problems connected with locating a group home in a potentially hazardous area is a legitimate government concern. Nonetheless, the Court held that "[this] concern with the possibility of a flood, however, can hardly be based on a distinction between the [home] and, for example, nursing homes, homes for convalescents or the aged, or sanitariums or hospitals, any of which could be located on the [site] without obtaining a special use permit." How can this holding be reconciled with Lee Optical? Is this really an evaluation of the means-ends nexus or is this simply a form of actual purpose review?

4. Evaluating the means-ends nexus: the problem of fact. Whether a particular means is "rationally related" to the legislature's ends frequently turns on the answers to antecedent questions of fact—for example, will the prohibition of plastic milk containers in fact make for a cleaner environment, or how much expertise is necessary to fit lenses into an eyeglass frame. How should these answers be ascertained? Has the Court gone too far in curtailing the right of litigants to prove that the facts are not as the legislature supposed them to be? A court faced with a factual dispute generally resolves it pursuant to detailed procedural rules designed to give both parties a fair opportunity to bring to the fact-finder's attention all relevant evidence. Although legislatures frequently hold hearings before enacting statutes, their procedures tend to be far less careful and structured. Indeed, there is no requirement that a legislator hear any of the evidence or know anything about the subject before voting on a bill. If the court, after a full trial, determines that the legislature is factually mistaken, why should the statute nonetheless be upheld?

5. Evaluating the means-ends nexus: the problem of value. If we assume agreement about the underlying facts, should the Court be more aggressive in evaluating legislative means? Or are there sound institutional reasons for deference to the legislative judgment? Does aggressive rationality review depend on a court's making value judgments unconnected to the Constitution? For example, how is a court to balance the environmental benefits associated with the prohibition of plastic milk containers against the burden imposed on consumers?

Even if there is no problem with the judicial value judgments arguably inherent in rationality review, might there not still be a risk that the sporadic nature of judicial review will cause the Court to overlook the overall political context that makes a legislative judgment rational? For example, one might believe that requiring prescriptions from optometrists before opticians can replace lenses imposes costs that cannot be justified in terms of the marginal improvement in public safety. But suppose consumer groups agreed not to oppose the law in exchange for passage of measures that regulated the price that optometrists could charge their customers. Can a state defend an otherwise irrational classification on the ground that it is the product of compromise? Consider Bowen v. Owens, 476 U.S. 1137 (1986), where the Court defended deferential review of classifications contained in the Social Security law as follows:

Congress' adjustments of this complex system of entitlements necessarily create distinctions among categories of beneficiaries, a result that could be avoided only by making sweeping changes in the Act instead of incremental ones. A constitutional rule that would invalidate Congress' attempts to proceed cautiously in awarding increased benefits might deter Congress from making any increases at all.

Compare the views of Justice Marshall expressed in a dissenting opinion:

[I] suspect that the Court is right to characterize the distinction drawn by [the act in question] as the product of Congress' decision to "take one step at a time." However under [equal protection principles] even legislative classifications that result from compromise must bear at least a rational relationship to a legitimate state purpose. Had Congress accommodated the House's reform goals with the Senate's more conservative outlook in this area by passing a law giving benefits to only those [born] on odd-numbered days of the calendar, we would surely have to strike the provision down as irrational.

Is a court competent to make judgments concerning the kinds of trade-offs between groups that are permissible?

6. Means-ends scrutiny and the prohibition on sheer arbitrariness. Can individuals bring equal protection claims based not on their membership in a disadvantaged class, but on their being singled out for unfair treatment? Consider in this connection Village of Willowbrook v. Olech, 528 U.S. 562 (2000). The plaintiffs, a married couple, asked the village to connect their property to the municipal water supply, but the village refused to do so unless the Olechs gave the village a thirty-three-foot easement. The Olechs alleged that the village required only a fifteen-foot easement from other property owners, that the difference in treatment was “irrational and wholly arbitrary,” and that it was motivated by ill will resulting from a previous unrelated lawsuit, which plaintiffs had successfully brought against the village.

In a per curiam opinion, the Court held that the plaintiffs had stated a valid equal protection claim. According to the Court, a plaintiff can bring an equal protection claim even if she belongs to a “class of one” when she “alleges that she has been intentionally treated differently from others similarly situated and that there is no rational basis for the difference in treatment.” The majority held that these allegations were sufficient “quite apart from the Village’s subjective motivation” and that it was therefore unnecessary to reach the plaintiffs’ alternative theory of subjective ill will.

In a concurring opinion, Justice Breyer expressed sympathy for the view that this holding might “transform many ordinary violations of city or state law into violations of the Constitution. [Zoning] decisions, for example, will often, perhaps almost always treat one landowner differently from another, and one might claim that, when a city’s zoning authority takes an action that fails to conform to a city zoning regulation, it lacks a ‘rational basis’ for its [action].” Justice Breyer nonetheless concurred in the result on the ground that plaintiffs had also alleged “vindictive action.”

Why does the majority limit its holding to plaintiffs who allege that they are intentionally treated differently? What does “intentionally” mean in this context?

In Engquist v. Oregon Department of Agriculture, 553 U.S. 591 (2008), the Court refused to recognize “class of one” claims by public employees. The plaintiff there brought suit, claiming that she had been fired for “arbitrary, vindictive, and malicious reasons” in violation of the equal protection clause. Chief Justice Roberts delivered the opinion of the Court. The Court distinguished between the government’s exercise of its regulatory power with respect to individual citizens and its activities as an employer managing its internal operations. It pointed to a number of areas in which the government as employer is given more leeway with respect to constitutional constraints, such as under the first and fourth amendments. Employment, the Court declared, was a form of state action that by its nature “involve[s] discretionary decisionmaking based on a vast array of subjective, individualized assessments. In such cases the rule that people should be ‘treated alike, under like circumstances and conditions’ is not violated when one person is treated differently from others, because treating like individuals differently is an accepted consequence of the discretion granted. In such situations, allowing a challenge based on the arbitrary singling out of a particular person would undermine the very discretion that such state officials are entrusted to exercise.” Recognizing class-of-one claims alleging that a public employer had treated an employee differently from others for a bad reason unconnected to a particular constitutional provision (such as discrimination on the basis of race or religion or gender) would undermine the concept of at-will employment, and the Court found that the “Constitution does not require repudiating that familiar doctrine.” By contrast, the Court explained, in Olech and similar cases, there was “a clear standard against which departures, even for a single plaintiff, could be readily assessed.”

Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Souter and Ginsburg, dissented. He saw no reason to treat property owners differently from employees and drew a distinction between discretion and arbitrariness: “A discretionary decision represents a choice of one among two or more rational alternatives,” and while mistaken discretionary decisions do not violate the equal protection clause, the clause “proscribes arbitrary decisions—decisions unsupported by any rational basis.”

7. The underenforcement thesis. Even if problems inherent in judicial review preclude vigorous judicial enforcement of the rationality requirement, might not that requirement still retain significance for other actors in the system? Consider the following view: Pure interest-group deals, justified by nothing other than the political strength of the beneficiaries, are prohibited by the equal protection clause. This prohibition is not subject to principled judicial enforcement because inquiries into the legislative process would prove unmanageable and strain judicial competence and authority. But although this prohibition is “underenforced,” it nonetheless remains binding on legislators and administrators who have an obligation to obey the Constitution. See generally Sager, Fair Measure: The Status of Underenforced Constitutional Norms, 91 Harv. L. Rev. 1212 (1978).

C. EQUAL PROTECTION METHODOLOGY: HEIGHTENED SCRUTINY AND THE PROBLEM OF RACE

This section, and those that follow it, explore the circumstances under which the Court has subjected classifications to some form of review more rigorous than the “rational relationship” test. What triggers such heightened scrutiny? What showing can satisfy the more demanding standard?

The best-established case for heightened review is for classifications based on race. Although the application of “strict scrutiny” to racial classifications is now taken as one of the cornerstones of equal protection doctrine, it was not until ten years after Brown v. Board of Education that the Supreme Court “both articulated and applied a more rigorous review standard to racial classifications” in McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184 (1964). See Klarman, An Interpretive History of Modern Equal Protection, 90 Mich. L. Rev. 213, 255 (1991).

Thus, this section begins by considering the decisions that led the Court to articulate the requirement of strict scrutiny for racial classifications. It then turns to how strict scrutiny has operated. When do government decisions that do not explicitly rely on race nonetheless constitute racial classifications? Do all uses of race require strict scrutiny? When can the government take race into account?

1. The Origins and Rationale for Heightened Scrutiny in Race-Specific Classifications That Disadvantage Racial Minorities

Strauder v. West Virginia

100 U.S. (10 Otto) 303 (1880)

MR. JUSTICE STRONG delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Strauder, a black man, was convicted of murder before an all-white jury. A West Virginia statute limited jury service to “white male persons who are twenty-one years of age and who are citizens of this State.” Strauder claimed that his conviction by a jury chosen pursuant to this provision violated the fourteenth amendment.]

[The] controlling [question is] whether by the Constitution and laws of the United States, every citizen of the United States has a right to a trial of an indictment against him by a jury selected and impanelled without discrimination against his race or color....

It is to be observed that the [question] is not whether a colored man, when an indictment has been preferred against him, has a right to a grand or a petit jury composed in whole or in part of persons of his own race or color, but it is whether, in the composition or selection of jurors by whom he is to be indicted or tried, all persons of his race or color may be excluded by law, solely because of their race or color, so that by no possibility can any colored man sit upon the jury....

having a common purpose; namely, securing to a race recently emancipated, a race that through many generations had been held in slavery, all the civil rights that the superior race enjoy. [At] the time when they were incorporated into the Constitution, it required little knowledge of human nature to anticipate that those who had long been regarded as an inferior and subject race would, when suddenly raised to the rank of citizenship, be looked upon with jealousy and positive dislike, and that State laws might be enacted or enforced to perpetuate the distinctions that had before existed. [The] colored race, as a race, was abject and ignorant, and in that condition was unfitted to command the respect of those who had superior intelligence. Their training had left them mere children, and as such they needed the protection which a wise government extends to those who are unable to protect themselves. They especially needed protection against unfriendly action in the States where they were resident. It was in view of these considerations the Fourteenth Amendment was framed and adopted. It was designed to assure to the colored race the enjoyment of all the civil rights that under the law are enjoyed by white persons, and to give to that race the protection of the general government, in that enjoyment, whenever it should be denied by the States. It not only gave citizenship and the privileges of citizenship to persons of color, but it denied to any State the power to withhold from them the equal protection of the laws, and authorized Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation....

[What] is this but declaring that the law in the States shall be the same for the black as for the white; that all persons, whether colored or white, shall stand equal before the laws of the States, and, in regard to the colored race, for whose protection the amendment was primarily designed, that no discrimination shall be made against them by law because of their color? The words of the amendment, it is true, are prohibitory, but they contain a necessary implication of a positive immunity, or right, most valuable to the colored race,—the right to exemption from unfriendly legislation against them distinctively as colored,—exemption from legal discriminations, implying inferiority in civil society, lessening the security of their enjoyment of the rights which others enjoy, and discriminations which are steps towards reducing them to the condition of a subject race.

That the West Virginia statute respecting juries [is] such a discrimination ought not to be doubted. [The] very fact that colored people are singled out and expressly denied by a statute all right to participate in the administration of the law, as jurors, because of their color, though they are citizens, and may be in other respects fully qualified, is practically a brand upon them, affixed by the law, an assertion of their inferiority, and a stimulant to that race prejudice which is an impediment to securing to individuals of the race that equal justice which the law aims to secure to all others....

[It] is well known that prejudices often exist against particular classes in the community, which sway the judgment of jurors, and which, therefore, operate in some cases to deny to persons of those classes the full enjoyment of that protection which others enjoy....

In view of these considerations, it is hard to see why the statute of West Virginia should not be regarded as discriminating against a colored man when he is put upon trial for an alleged criminal offence against the State. It is not easy to comprehend how it can be said that while every white man is entitled to a trial by a jury selected from persons of his own race or color, or, rather, selected without discrimination against his color, and a Negro is not, the latter is equally protected by the law with the former....

We do not say that within the limits from which it is not excluded by the amendment a State may not prescribe the qualifications of its jurors, and in so doing make discriminations. It may confine the selection to males, to freeholders, to citizens, to persons within certain ages, or to persons having educational qualifications. We do not believe the Fourteenth Amendment was ever intended to prohibit this. Looking at its history, it is clear it had no such purpose. Its aim was against discrimination because of race or color....

Korematsu v. United States

323 U.S. 214 (1944)

MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

[On February 19, 1942, some two months after the United States declared war against Japan, President Roosevelt issued Executive Order No. 9066, which authorized military commanders to "prescribe military areas [from] which any or all persons may be excluded, and with respect to which, the right of any person to enter, remain in, or leave shall be subject to whatever restrictions [the Military] Commander may impose in his discretion." On March 21, 1942, Congress enacted legislation making it a crime to violate an order issued by a military commander pursuant to this authority. Three days later, the military commander of the western defense command ordered imposition of a curfew on all persons of Japanese ancestry living on the West Coast. The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of this order in Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81 (1943).]

On May 3, 1942, the same military commander issued one of a series of exclusion orders, requiring persons of Japanese descent, whether or not they were U.S. citizens, to leave their homes on the West Coast. Persons so ordered were required to report to "Assembly Centers." While some detainees were released from these centers on condition that they remain outside the prohibited zone, others were shipped to "Relocation Centers," which they were prohibited from leaving without permission of the military commander.

Korematsu, a U.S. citizen of unchallenged loyalty, but of Japanese descent, was tried and convicted for remaining in his home contrary to the exclusion order.]

It should be noted, to begin with, that all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect. That is not to say that all such restrictions are unconstitutional. It is to say that courts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny. Pressing public necessity may sometimes justify the existence of such restrictions; racial antagonism never can....

In the light of the principles we announced in the Hirabayashi case, we are unable to conclude that it was beyond the war power of Congress and the Executive to exclude those of Japanese ancestry from the West Coast war area at the time they did. True, exclusion from the area in which one's home is located is a far greater deprivation than constant confinement to the home from 8 p.m. to 6 a.m. Nothing short of apprehension by the proper military authorities of the gravest imminent danger to the public safety can constitutionally justify either. But exclusion from a threatened area, no less than curfew, has a definite and close relationship to the prevention of espionage and sabotage. The military authorities, charged with the primary responsibility of defending our shores, concluded that curfew provided inadequate protection and ordered exclusion....

Here, as in the Hirabayashi case,

...we cannot reject as unfounded the judgment of the military authorities and of Congress that there were disloyal members of that population, whose number and strength could not be precisely and quickly ascertained. We cannot say that the war-making branches of the Government did not have ground for believing that in a critical hour such persons could not readily be isolated and separately dealt with, and constituted a menace to the national defense and safety, which demanded that prompt and adequate measures be taken to guard against it.

Like curfew, exclusion of those of Japanese origin was deemed necessary because of the presence of an unascertained number of disloyal members of the group, most of whom we have no doubt were loyal to this country. It was because we could not reject the finding of the military authorities that it was impossible to bring about an immediate segregation of the disloyal from the loyal that we sustained the validity of the curfew order as applying to the whole group. In the instant case, temporary exclusion of the entire group was rested by the military on the same ground. The judgment that exclusion of the whole group was for the same reason a military imperative answers the contention that the exclusion was in the nature of group punishment based on antagonism to those of Japanese origin. That there were members of the group who retained loyalties to Japan has been confirmed by investigations made subsequent to the exclusion. Approximately five thousand American citizens of Japanese ancestry refused to swear unqualified allegiance to the United States and to renounce allegiance to the Japanese Emperor, and several thousand evacuees requested repatriation to Japan.

We uphold the exclusion order as of the time it was made and when the petitioner violated it. [In] doing so, we are not unmindful of the hardships imposed by it upon a large group of American citizens. But hardships are part of war, and war is an aggregation of hardships. All citizens alike, both in and out of uniform, feel the impact of war in greater or lesser measure. Citizenship has its responsibilities as well as its privileges, and in time of war the burden is always heavier. Compulsory exclusion of large groups of citizens from their homes, except under circumstances of direst emergency and peril, is inconsistent with our basic governmental institutions. But when under conditions of modern warfare our shores are threatened by hostile forces, the power to protect must be commensurate with the threatened danger....

It is said that we are dealing here with the case of imprisonment of a citizen in a concentration camp solely because of his ancestry, without evidence or inquiry concerning his loyalty and good disposition towards the United States. Our task would be simple, our duty clear, were this a case involving the imprisonment of a loyal citizen in a concentration camp because of racial prejudice. Regardless of the true nature of the assembly and relocation centers—we deem it unjustifiable to call them concentration camps with all the ugly connotations that term implies—we are dealing specifically with nothing but an exclusion order. To cast this case into outlines of racial prejudice, without reference to the real military dangers which were presented, merely confuses the issue. Korematsu was not excluded from the Military Area because of hostility to him or his race. He was excluded because we are at war with the Japanese Empire, because the properly constituted military authorities feared an invasion of our West Coast and felt constrained to take proper security measures, because they decided that the military urgency of the situation demanded that all citizens of Japanese ancestry be segregated from the West Coast temporarily, and finally, because Congress, reposing its confidence in this time of war in our military leaders—as inevitably it must—determined that they should have the power to do just this. There was evidence of disloyalty on the part of some, the military authorities considered that the need for action was great, and time was short. We cannot—by availing ourselves of the calm perspective of hindsight—now say that at that time these actions were unjustified.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY, dissenting.

This exclusion of “all persons of Japanese ancestry, both alien and non-alien,” from the Pacific Coast area on a plea of military necessity in the absence of martial law ought not to be approved. Such exclusion goes over “the very brink of constitutional power” and falls into the ugly abyss of racism.

In dealing with matters relating to the prosecution and progress of a war, we must accord great respect and consideration to the judgments of the military authorities who are on the scene and who have full knowledge of the military facts....

At the same time, however, it is essential that there be definite limits to military discretion, especially where martial law has not been declared. Individuals must not be left impoverished of their constitutional rights on a plea of military necessity that has neither substance nor support. Thus, like other claims conflicting with the asserted constitutional rights of the individual, the military claim must subject itself to the judicial process of having its reasonableness determined and its conflicts with other interests reconciled....

It must be conceded that the military and naval situation in the spring of 1942 was such as to generate a very real fear of invasion of the Pacific Coast, accompanied by fears of sabotage and espionage in that area. The military command was therefore justified in adopting all reasonable means necessary to combat these dangers. In adjudging the military action taken in light of the then apparent dangers, we must not erect too high or too meticulous standards; it is necessary only that the action have some reasonable relation to the removal of the dangers of invasion, sabotage and espionage. But the exclusion, either temporarily or permanently, of all persons with Japanese blood in their veins has no such reasonable relation. And that relation is lacking because the exclusion order necessarily must rely for its reasonableness upon the assumption that all persons of Japanese ancestry may have a dangerous tendency to commit sabotage and espionage and to aid our Japanese enemy in other ways. It is difficult to believe that reason, logic or experience could be marshalled in support of such an assumption....

The main reasons relied upon by those responsible for the forced evacuation, therefore, do not prove a reasonable relation between the group characteristics of Japanese Americans and the dangers of invasion, sabotage and espionage. The reasons appear, instead, to be largely an accumulation of much of the misinformation, half-truths and insinuations that for years have been directed against Japanese Americans by people with racial and economic prejudices—the same people who have been among the foremost advocates of the evacuation. A military judgment based upon such racial and sociological considerations is not entitled to the great weight ordinarily given the judgments based upon strictly military considerations. Especially is this so when every charge relative to race, religion, culture, geographical location, and legal and economic status has been substantially discredited by independent studies made by experts in these matters....

[No] one denies, of course, that there were some disloyal persons of Japanese descent on the Pacific Coast who did all in their power to aid their ancestral land. Similar disloyal activities have been engaged in by many persons of German, Italian and even more pioneer stock in our country. But to infer that examples of individual disloyalty prove group disloyalty and justify discriminatory action against the entire group is to deny that under our system of law individual guilt is the sole basis for deprivation of rights....

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON, dissenting....

It would be impracticable and dangerous idealism to expect or insist that each specific military command in an area of probable operations will conform to conventional tests of constitutionality. When an area is so beset that it must be put under military control at all, the paramount consideration is that its measures be successful, rather than legal....

But if we cannot confine military expedients by the Constitution, neither would I distort the Constitution to approve all that the military may deem expedient. That is what the Court appears to be doing, whether consciously or not....

The [limitations] under which courts always will labor in examining the necessity for a military order are illustrated by this case. How does the Court know that these orders have a reasonable basis in necessity? No evidence whatever on that subject has been taken by this or any other court....

Much is said of the danger to liberty from the Army program for deporting and detaining these citizens of Japanese extraction. But a judicial construction of the due process clause that will sustain this order is a far more subtle blow to liberty than the promulgation of the order itself. A military order, however unconstitutional, is not apt to last longer than the military emergency. Even during that period a succeeding commander may revoke it all. But once a judicial opinion rationalizes such an order to show that it conforms to the Constitution, or rather rationalizes the Constitution to show that the Constitution sanctions such an order, the Court for all time has validated the principle of racial discrimination in criminal procedure and of transplanting American citizens. The principle then lies about like a loaded weapon ready for the hand of any authority that can bring forward a plausible claim of an urgent need. Every repetition imbeds that principle more deeply in our law and thinking and expands it to new purposes....

I should hold that a civil court cannot be made to enforce an order which violates constitutional limitations even if it is a reasonable exercise of military authority. The courts can exercise only the judicial power, can apply only law, and must abide by the Constitution, or they cease to be civil courts and become instruments of military policy.

Of course the existence of a military power resting on force, so vagrant, so centralized, so necessarily heedless of the individual, is an inherent threat to liberty. But I would not lead people to rely on this Court for a review that seems to me wholly delusive. The military reasonableness of these orders can only be determined by military superiors. If the people ever let command of the war power fall into irresponsible and unscrupulous hands, the courts wield no power equal to its restraint. The chief restraint upon those who command the physical forces of the country, in the future as in the past, must be their responsibility to the political judgments of their contemporaries and to the moral judgments of history.

My duties as a justice as I see them do not require me to make a military judgment as to whether General DeWitt's evacuation and detention program was a reasonable military necessity. I do not suggest that the courts should have attempted to interfere with the Army in carrying out its task. But I do not think they may be asked to execute a military expedient that has no place in law under the Constitution. I would reverse the judgment and discharge the prisoner.

Loving v. Virginia

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case presents a constitutional question never addressed by this Court: whether a statutory scheme adopted by the State of Virginia to prevent marriages between persons solely on the basis of racial classifications violates the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment.

For reasons which seem to us to reflect the central meaning of those constitutional commands, we conclude that these statutes cannot stand consistently with the Fourteenth Amendment....

[The Lovings challenged their conviction under a Virginia statute making it a felony for “any white person [to] intermarry with a colored person, or any colored person [to] intermarry with a white person.” The Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia upheld the statute’s constitutionality. The state court relied on its own earlier decision holding that the statute served the legitimate state purposes of preserving the “racial integrity” of its citizens and preventing “corruption of blood,” the creation of “a mongrel breed of citizens,” and “the obliteration of racial pride.”]

[The] State argues that the meaning of the Equal Protection Clause, as illuminated by the statements of the Framers, is only that state penal laws containing an interracial element as part of the definition of the offense must apply equally to whites and Negroes in the sense that members of each race are punished to the same degree. Thus, the State contends that, because its miscegenation statutes punish equally both the white and the Negro participants in an interracial marriage, these statutes, despite their reliance on racial classifications, do not constitute an invidious discrimination based upon race....

Because we reject the notion that the mere “equal application” of a statute containing racial classifications is enough to remove the classifications from the Fourteenth Amendment’s proscription of all invidious racial discriminations, we do not accept the State’s contention that these statutes should be upheld if there is any possible basis for concluding that they serve a rational purpose. The mere fact of equal application does not mean that our analysis of these statutes should follow the approach we have taken in cases involving no racial discrimination....

[The] Equal Protection Clause requires the consideration of whether the classifications drawn by any statute constitute an arbitrary and invidious discrimination. The clear and central purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to eliminate all official state sources of invidious racial discrimination in the States.

There can be no question but that Virginia’s miscegenation statutes rest solely upon distinctions drawn according to race. The statutes proscribe generally accepted conduct if engaged in by members of different races. [At] the very least, the Equal Protection Clause demands that racial classifications, especially suspect in criminal statutes, be subjected to the “most rigid scrutiny,” [Korematsu], and, if they are ever to be upheld, they must be shown to be necessary to the accomplishment of some permissible state objective, independent of the racial discrimination which it was the object of the Fourteenth Amendment to eliminate....

There is patently no legitimate overriding purpose independent of invidious racial discrimination which justifies this classification. The fact that Virginia prohibits only interracial marriages involving white persons demonstrates that the racial classifications must stand on their own justification, as measures designed to maintain White Supremacy.¹¹ We have consistently denied the constitutionality of measures which restrict the rights of citizens on account of race. There can be no doubt that restricting the freedom to marry solely because of racial classifications violates the central meaning of the Equal Protection Clause....

These convictions must be reversed.

It is so ordered.

MR. JUSTICE STEWART, concurring.

I have previously expressed the belief that “it is simply not possible for a state law to be valid under our Constitution which makes the criminality of an act depend upon the race of the actor.” McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 198 (concurring opinion). Because I adhere to that belief, I concur in the judgment of the Court.

Note: Doctrinal Evolution in the Scrutiny Applied to Racial Classifications

1. The move from rationality review to strict scrutiny. Loving is one of the very first cases in which the Supreme Court articulated a different standard of review for racial classifications. Indeed, only two years earlier, in Anderson v. Martin, 375 U.S. 399 (1964), the Court unanimously struck down a Louisiana law requiring that a candidate’s race be indicated on the ballot on the grounds that there was no way in which the provision was “reasonably designed to meet legitimate governmental interests in informing the electorate as to candidates” or any other permissible state purpose—the standard language of rationality review. This raises the question whether strict scrutiny in fact enabled the Court to strike down laws that would have passed rationality review.

Conversely, Korematsu is frequently said to mark the last occasion on which the Supreme Court has upheld a race-specific statute disadvantaging a racial minority. It has been widely and severely criticized. See, e.g., E. Muller, Free to Die for Their Country: The Story of the Japanese American Draft Resisters in World War II (2001); P. Irons, Justice at War (1983); R. Daniels, Concentration Camps: North America—Japanese in the United States and Canada during World War II (rev. ed. 1981); J. TenBroek, E. Barnhart, and F. Matson, Prejudice, War and the Constitution (1954). Note that in a companion case to Korematsu, the Court held on statutory grounds that the “relocation camps” for Japanese Americans were illegal. See Ex parte Endo, 323 U.S. 283 (1944). For a discussion, see Gudridge, Remembering Endo, 116 Harv. L. Rev. 1933 (2003).

In 1984, a federal district court overturned Korematsu’s conviction on the ground that the government had “knowingly withheld information from the courts when they were considering the critical question of military necessity.” See Korematsu v. United States, 584 F. Supp. 1406 (N.D. Cal. 1984). Four years later, Congress enacted legislation acknowledging “the fundamental injustice” of the evacuation and providing restitution to individuals forced to leave their homes. See Pub. L. No. 100-338, 102 Stat. 903 (1988).

2. The pragmatic consequences of heightened scrutiny. If heightened scrutiny makes it more likely that the Court will strike down the challenged action, does this create pressures not to enunciate a broad principle of strict scrutiny for all racial classifications? In this light, consider the somewhat complex move from Korematsu—which articulated a requirement of heightened scrutiny but upheld the challenged practice—through Brown—which articulated no categorical requirement but struck down the challenged statutes—to Loving—which both articulated a requirement of heightened scrutiny, perhaps unnecessarily, and applied the standard to strike down the challenged law.

The issue resolved in Loving was first presented to the Court over a decade earlier in Naim v. Naim. In Naim, a white husband sued under Virginia law to annul his marriage on the grounds that, his wife being of Chinese ancestry, their marriage ran afoul of the commonwealth’s prohibition of interracial marriage. The Virginia state courts affirmed the annulment of the marriage in an opinion which rejected an equal protection challenge to the statute on the ground that “preserv[ing] the racial integrity of its citizens” was a permissible state interest. Naim v. Naim, 197 Va. 80 (1955). Although the Supreme Court had mandatory appellate jurisdiction over the case, it first remanded the case to the Virginia courts, ostensibly on the ground that the record on appeal was not entirely clear regarding some details related to the marriage, see Naim v. Naim, 350 U.S. 891 (1955), and, after the Virginia Supreme Court refused to take the hint and reconsider the question, see Naim v. Naim, 197 Va. 734 (1956), simply dismissed the succeeding appeal on the ground that the Virginia court’s decision “in response to our order...leaves the case devoid of a properly presented federal question.” At the time and since, the Court’s actions in Naim were understood as a simple decision to dodge the underlying question. See, e.g., W. Eskridge and P. Frickey, An Historical and Critical Introduction to The Legal Process, in H. Hart and A. Sacks, The Legal Process: Basic Problems in the Making and Application of Law at cix–cx (W. Eskridge and P. Frickey eds., 1994); Hutchinson, Unanimity and Desegregation: Decisionmaking in the Supreme Court, 1948–1958, 68 Geo. L.J. 1, 62–67 (1979); Shapiro, Jurisdiction and Discretion, 60 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 543, 578 (1985).

In thinking about the Court’s behavior, consider the view advanced by Bickel, who implicitly praises the Court for not deciding the case:

[A] judgment legitimating such statutes would have been unthinkable, given the principle of the School Segregation Cases....But would it have been wise, at a time when the Court had just pronounced its new integration principle, when it was subject to scurrilous attack by men who predicted that integration of the schools would lead directly to “mongrelization of the race,” would it have been wise, just then, in the first case of its sort, on an issue that the Negro community as a whole can hardly be said to be pressing hard at the moment, to declare that the states may not prohibit racial intermarriage?

A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics 174 (1962). Thus, Bickel defended the Court’s decision as an appropriate exercise of what he called the “passive virtues.”

In thinking about whether the Court’s actions in Naim were “virtuous,” consider Seidman, The Secret Life of the Political Question Doctrine, 37 J. Marshall L. Rev. 441, 462–463 (2004):

To many contemporary observers, the result in Naim seemed completely lawless and impossible to justify on the basis of principle....

[If] the passive virtues are to serve their intended function, they can do so only by misleading the country. Bickel must have assumed that the Court could maintain its reputation for apolitical, principled adjudication while still acting politically because the country paid more attention to what the Court decided than to what it chose not to decide. But not doing is, after all, also a kind of doing; for the parties involved in Naim, the Court’s disingenuous avoidance of the merits had precisely the same impact as a decision upholding the statute. If the two results differed at all, the difference lay in how the alternative dispositions were (or would have been) perceived. A decision upholding the Virginia antimiscegenation statute would “legitimate” naked racism, whereas a “nondecision,” somehow getting rid of the case on unprincipled grounds, would not. But this difference, if indeed it exists at all, crucially depends upon the public's failure to understand the actual consequences of what the Court has done or failed to do. The Court was, in effect, betting on Brown creating banner headlines, while Naim slipped unreported through the news sieve....

Note: Justifications for Strict Scrutiny of Racial Classifications

What specifically makes racial classifications especially problematic? Consider the following possibilities.

1. The original intent of the fourteenth amendment was to protect African Americans from discrimination on the basis of race. Note that the words of the fourteenth amendment do not provide for special treatment of racial classifications. (In this sense, contrast the fourteenth amendment to the fifteenth, which specifically forbids discrimination on the basis of race with respect to voting.) But even if a concern with discrimination against newly freed African American slaves was clearly the central concern of the fourteenth amendment's framers, it is far from clear that the Reconstruction Congress meant to invalidate all government uses of race that disadvantaged African Americans. Consider R. Berger, Government by Judiciary 10, 15 (1977):

The key to an understanding of the Fourteenth Amendment is that the North was shot through with Negrophobia, that the Republicans, except for a minority of extremists, were swayed by the racism that gripped their constituents rather than by abolitionist ideology. [While] most men were united in a desire to protect the freedmen from outrage and oppression in the South by prohibiting discrimination with respect to "fundamental rights," without which freedom was illusory, to go beyond this with a campaign for political and social equality was, as Senator James R. Doolittle of Wisconsin confessed, "frightening" to the Republicans who "represented States containing the despised and feared negroes."

Note also that the argument from the framers' intent fails to explain the special scrutiny accorded statutes directed against racial groups other than African Americans, such as the Japanese and Japanese Americans whose rights were at issue in Korematsu. (And if the framers' intent was to protect African Americans from discrimination, how does this bear on the constitutionality of affirmative action? We return to this issue on pages 562–598, infra.)

2. Race is rarely, if ever, relevant to any legitimate governmental purpose.

This argument is subject to two objections. First, it may not be empirically correct. For example, suppose that law enforcement officials are trying to describe a suspect, or are trying to decide whether a particular individual should be stopped and questioned with respect to a reported crime. Is an individual's race irrelevant to those decisions? See Banks, Race-Based Suspect Selection and Color Blind Equal Protection Doctrine and Discourse, 48 UCLA L. Rev. 1075 (2001) (discussing the ubiquitous use of race-based suspect descriptions and contrasting it to the more generalized use of race in decisions whether to stop and investigate particular individuals); Banks, Racial Profiling and Antiterrorism Efforts, 89 Cornell L. Rev. 1201 (2004) (describing the controversy over racial profiling in light of the post-9/11 concern with preventing terrorism). Moreover, for a variety of reasons, race may be correlated with traits or characteristics that are relevant to government decisionmaking. Certain racial and ethnic groups are far more susceptible to particular health problems with which the government may be concerned: For example, sickle-cell anemia is more prevalent among African Americans, while Tay-Sachs disease is more likely to strike individuals of Eastern European Jewish ancestry. Strauder itself seems to acknowledge that race may be correlated with differences that we might care about. If race were really irrelevant to the way jurors voted, it is hard to see how Strauder would be harmed by standing trial before an all-white jury. In this respect, consider whether Strauder's injury stems from the formal exclusion of black jurors: Would he face the same problems if as a matter of chance he were tried by a jury that happened to be all white?

Second, even if it were true that race is rarely relevant to legitimate government objectives, why does this factor militate in favor of a different standard of review? Doesn't it simply mean that most race classifications would fail rational basis review? Note that cases like Brown v. Board of Education and its progeny striking down de jure segregation, see pages 476–497, supra, did not invoke strict scrutiny, but simply held that racial separation was an impermissible government purpose. Similarly, given cases like United States Department of Agriculture v. Moreno, Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, and Romer v. Evans, discussed in the previous section, why couldn't the Court simply strike down laws that discriminate against racial minorities on the ground that the desire to stigmatize or injure an unpopular group is never an acceptable government purpose? Isn't that the approach taken by the Court in Strauder and Justice Murphy in dissent in Korematsu?

3. Racial classifications violate a fundamental moral norm. Perhaps strict scrutiny is simply a shorthand expression of a conclusion, reached after long experience with racial classifications, that such classifications generally express impermissible animus. Consider Brest, Foreword: In Defense of the Antidiscrimination Principle, 90 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 5–6 (1976):

The antidiscrimination principle rests on fundamental moral values that are widely shared in our society. [The] text and history of the [equal protection] clause are vague and ambiguous and cannot, in any event, infuse the antidiscrimination principle with moral force or justify its extension to novel circumstances and new beneficiaries. Therefore, the argument [against racial classifications] does not ultimately turn on authority, but on whether it comports with the reader's reflective understanding of the antidiscrimination principle.

If the antidiscrimination principle really rests on widely shared views, does this suggest that when racial classifications are used, there is a very good reason for doing so? Does this argument lead to the conclusion that courts properly invalidate race-specific statutes adopted in only a few states, but not laws more widely adopted? See generally M. Klarman, From Jim Crow to Civil Rights: The Supreme Court and the Struggle for Racial Equality (2004) (suggesting that the Supreme Court acted to dismantle racial discrimination only after a national norm had emerged leaving the Deep South as an outlier). On the other hand, if the principle is not widely shared, and if it is not required by the text or history of the Constitution, what justification is there for judicial enforcement of it?

4. Defects in the political process make it especially likely that racial classifications will be based on “hostility” or inaccurate stereotypes. In United States v. Carolene Products, 304 U.S. 144 (1938), the Court used rational basis review to uphold a federal statute prohibiting interstate shipment of filled milk, which the statute defined as a milk product to which “any fat or oil other than milk fat” had been added. Today the case is less significant for its holding than for its famous footnote 4, in which Justice Stone, writing for the Court, intimated that a more stringent standard of review might apply to statutes “directed at particular religious or national or racial minorities.” Justice Stone argued that stricter review might be appropriate in such cases because “prejudice against discrete and insular minorities may be a special condition, which tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities.” It followed that “correspondingly more searching judicial inquiry” was appropriate.

The Carolene Products footnote has been called “the most celebrated footnote in constitutional law.” Powell, Carolene Products Revisited, 82 Colum. L. Rev. 1087, 1087 (1982). See also Fiss, Foreword: The Forms of Justice, 93

Harv. L. Rev. 1, 6 (1979) (describing the Carolene Products footnote as “[the] great and modern charter for ordering the relations between judges and other agencies of government”). It has been the subject of extensive scholarly commentary. See, e.g., Ackerman, Beyond Carolene Products, 98 Harv. L. Rev. 713 (1985); Ball, Judicial Protection of Powerless Minorities, 59 Iowa L. Rev. 1059 (1974); Cover, The Origins of Judicial Activism in the Protection of Minorities, 91 Yale L.J. 1287 (1982). For an interesting exposition of the history of the footnote, see Lusky, Footnote 4 Redux: A Carolene Products Reminiscence, 82 Colum. L. Rev. 1093 (1982).

Does the Carolene Products footnote provide a principled basis for judicial intervention to protect minorities? Why does the “discreteness” and “insularity” of these minorities interfere with their ability to protect themselves in the political process? Consider Ackerman, supra, at 728:

In fact, for all our Carolene talk about the powerlessness of insular groups, we are perfectly aware of the enormous power such voting blocs have in American politics. The story of the protective tariff is [the] classic illustration of insularity’s power in American history. Over the past half-century, we have been treated to an enormous number of welfare-state variations on the theme of insularity by the farm bloc, the steel lobby, the auto lobby, and others too numerous to mention. In this standard scenario of pluralistic politics, it is precisely the diffuse character of the majority forced to pay the bill for tariffs, agricultural subsidies, and the like, that allows strategically located Congressmen to deliver the goods to their well-organized constituents. Given these familiar stories, it is really quite remarkable to hear lawyers profess concern that insular interests have too little influence in Congress.

Is the problem, then, really one of “prejudice” rather than discreteness or insularity? The concept of prejudice lies at the heart of the most comprehensive, careful, and influential modern elaboration of the theory behind footnote 4: J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust (1980). Ely begins with the premise that “the Constitution [cannot] coherently be interpreted as outlining some ‘appropriate’ distributional pattern against which actual allocations of hurts and benefits can be traced to see if they are constitutional. The constitutionality of most distributions thus cannot be determined simply by looking to see who ended up with what, but rather can be approached intelligibly only by attending to the process that brought about the distribution in question.” Generally, the Constitution prescribes a process of representative democracy to allocate costs and benefits. This process includes “the sort of pluralist wheeling and dealing by which the various minorities that make up our society typically interact to protect their interests.”

This process sometimes breaks down. Prejudice directed at certain minorities may so obstruct their ability to form coalitions that “a system of ‘mutual defense pacts’ will prove recurrently unavailing.” Under these circumstances, Ely argues, legislatures will systematically fail to take appropriate account of the allocation and magnitude of costs and benefits and courts must intervene to respond to this process failure.

Does Ely’s analysis adequately distinguish between groups that are unfairly treated in the political process and groups that are simply outvoted? Consider the views of Justice Powell in Carolene Products Revisited, supra, at 1090:

[In] one sense, any group that loses a legislative battle can be regarded as both “discrete” and “insular.” It is discrete because it supported or opposed legislation not supported or opposed by the majority. It is insular because it was unable to form coalitions with other groups that would have enabled it to achieve its desired ends through the political process. On this view the drug culture—or for that matter public utilities—could be considered discrete and insular.

Ely would limit judicial intervention to cases where a group suffers political losses because of generalizations about its members that are more inaccurate than the legislature realizes. Is judicial review of racial classifications justified because racial prejudice is likely to be unconscious? Consider Lawrence, The Id, the Ego, and Equal Protection: Reckoning with Unconscious Racism, 39 Stan. L. Rev. 317, 349 (1987):

[Unconscious] prejudice presents [a problem] in that it is not subject to self-correction within the political process. When racism operates at a conscious level, opposing forces can attempt to prevail upon the rationality and moral sensibility of racism’s proponents. [But] when the discriminator is not aware of his prejudice and is convinced that he already walks in the path of righteousness, neither reason nor moral persuasion is likely to succeed. The process defect is all the more intractable, and judicial scrutiny becomes imperative.

But why should we assume that courts are more sensitive than legislatures to unconscious racism and inaccurate generalizations?

5. The central concern of the equal protection clause involves preventing the subordination of groups, rather than simply the mistreatment of individuals. Many of the arguments already presented are premised on the assumption that the equal protection clause protects individuals from being unfairly pigeonholed and treated as members of disfavored groups: “At the heart of the Constitution’s guarantee of equal protection lies the simple command that the Government must treat citizens as individuals, not as simply components of a racial, religious, sexual or national class.” Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 911 (1995) (internal quotation marks omitted).

Might heightened review be defended on the alternative theory that the equal protection clause protects the rights of particular social groups as such? Consider Fiss’s view that the equal protection clause expresses an “ethical view against caste, one that would make it undesirable for any social group to occupy a position of subordination for any extended period of time.” Fiss, Groups and the Equal Protection Clause, 5 J. Phil. & Pub. Aff. 107, 151 (1976). Under this view, strict scrutiny for racial classifications reflects the history of African Americans. Is Fiss’s view of the equal protection clause too narrow because “it is unjust for society to attach negative significance to a morally irrelevant factor even when doing so does not eventuate in a specially disadvantaged group, but only in harm to, and suffering on the part of, the particular individual affected”? Perry, The Principle of Equal Protection, 32 Hastings L. Rev. 1133, 1146 (1981). Or is Fiss’s view too broad because it protects members of a subjugated group, even if an individual member enjoying these rights is not himself subjugated?

6. A synthesis. For a detailed and insightful “unified framework” for strict scrutiny, see Rubin, Reconnecting Doctrine and Purpose: A Comprehensive Approach to Strict Scrutiny after Adarand and Shaw, 149 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1, 20–23 (2000). Rubin provides a taxonomy of the risks and harms that may accompany the use of race as a classificatory principle:

1. The risk that race is being used “to harm an unpopular group [or] to indicate that the members of that group are unfit to partake of something given to others [and] to convey in this way the community’s judgment about the inherent worth of people of different kinds.”
2. The risk that the classification “reflects nothing more than racial politics, a desire to reward the members of [one’s] own racial group.”
3. The risk that a racial classification “[reflects] nothing more than erroneous stereotypes.”
4. The risk that racial classifications, even if related to a legitimate purpose, may perpetuate a negative racial stereotype.
5. The risk that decision-making based on race may “[deny] a person treatment as an individual in a way that other sorting mechanisms do not.”
6. The risk that “the very use of race to identify people [will] [have] some divisive effect on the races by reinforcing the belief in inherent racial differences, regardless of [correlation] with traditional stereotypes.”

7. The risk that the use of race will “cause a dignitary harm to individuals [regardless] of whether anyone is disadvantaged on the basis of their racial identity.”

Rubin goes on to argue in considerable detail that “strict scrutiny must be flexible enough to recognize that different uses of race pose different risks and impose different harms. To determine what risks and harms are present requires a careful examination of the factual circumstances and social contexts in which the use of race by government has taken place.” Id. at 25–26. Consider the extent to which this flexibility undermines the advantages of having formally distinct levels of review in the first place.

Note: The Structure of Strict Scrutiny

Korematsu held that racial classifications should be subject to “rigid scrutiny.” How should this be accomplished? Can the scrutiny be structured to avoid the problem of judicial value judgments encountered in connection with rational relationship review? Consider the following possibilities:

1. Limitation of what constitutes a sufficient government purpose. Korematsu held that a racial classification must be supported by a “pressing public necessity.” The contemporary formulation of this requirement is that the government’s interest be “compelling.” Presumably this language means that the interests must be unusually weighty: Not every otherwise legitimate government consideration will suffice. But how should a court rank the importance of various constitutionally permissible ends?

Moreover, even once a court answers that question, it may not be clear that the government is pursuing only the “compelling goal.” For example, winning World War II would clearly qualify as a “pressing public necessity.” But was that the sole reason the government chose to use a racial classification to intern Japanese and Japanese-American individuals? Suppose racial prejudice also played a role in the government’s decision. Is the decision then illegitimate, even if the compelling government interest was in fact a, or even the primary, reason for the government’s decision?

What if the government’s goal is actually compelling, but it accommodates illegitimate preferences? In this light, consider Palmore v. Sidoti, 466 U.S. 429 (1984). The case arose from a custody battle between Palmore and Sidoti (who were both white) following their divorce. Originally the trial court awarded custody of the couple's three-year-old daughter to the mother. When the mother married an African American, however, the court determined that the best interests of the child required that the father be awarded custody. The trial court ruled that, "despite the strides that have been made in bettering relations between the races in this country, it is inevitable that [the child] will, if allowed to remain in her present situation, [suffer] from the social stigmatization that is sure to come."

A unanimous Supreme Court reversed. Chief Justice Burger's opinion for the Court acknowledged that the state had "a duty of the highest order to protect the interests of minor children," and that "[there] is a risk that a child living with a step-parent of a different race may be subject to a variety of pressures and stresses not present if the child were living with parents of the same racial or ethnic origin." But the Court nonetheless held that the "reality of private biases and the possible injury they might inflict" were not "permissible considerations. [Private] biases may be outside the reach of the law, but the law cannot, directly or indirectly, give them effect."

Would the result in Sidoti have been the same if detailed empirical study demonstrated that children in mixed-race homes suffered psychological damage? Would the same analysis apply if the state were making adoption decisions, rather than child custody determinations? See Bartholet, Where Do Black Children Belong? The Politics of Race Matching in Adoption, 139 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1163 (1991); see also Banks, The Color of Desire: Fulfilling Adoptive Parents' Racial Preferences through Discriminatory State Action, 107 Yale L.J. 875 (1998); Bartholet, Private Race Preferences in Family Formation, 107 Yale L.J. 2351 (1998).

2. Means scrutiny. It is possible to read the Korematsu test as focusing not only on ends but also on means. Thus, even if winning World War II was a "pressing public necessity," it is hard to see how that necessity justified a racial classification that contributed only marginally to achieving the end. In other cases, the Court has been more explicit in requiring a tight fit between means and ends when reviewing racial classifications. In McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 196 (1964), for example, the Court said that racial classifications "[bear] a heavy burden of justification [and] will be upheld only if [necessary] and not merely rationally related, to the accomplishment of a permissible state policy." See also In re Griffiths, 413 U.S. 717, 721–722 (1973).

Does means-oriented strict scrutiny escape the problem of judicial value judgments? If the scrutiny is so strict that the existence of any alternative means, regardless of cost, is sufficient to invalidate a racial classification, then presumably the Court would be freed from the necessity of balancing. But could any racial classification survive this test? If, alternatively, a balance must be struck between the cost of the classification and the cost of forgoing it, must not the Court somehow attach values to these factors so that they can be weighed against each other?

Note how fact dependent means-oriented scrutiny is. In Korematsu, for example, the necessity of a racial classification turned on questions such as how serious the threat of sabotage was, how many Japanese Americans were disloyal, and how hard it would have been to separate the loyal from the disloyal. Did the Korematsu Court “rigidly scrutinize” the military commander’s judgment? Would it be tolerable for nine justices in Washington to substitute their judgment for that of the military on questions such as these? Does “rigid scrutiny” amount to anything more than a rubber stamp if the Court is unwilling to look behind the factual judgments made by other branches?

3. The interaction of means and ends. Since announcing the requirement of strict scrutiny for racial classifications, the Supreme Court has applied the standard in a case involving a challenge by a black plaintiff to an explicit racial classification only once. In Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499 (2005), the Court addressed an unwritten policy of the California Department of Corrections (CDC) that assigned inmates to cells on the basis of race for up to sixty days each time a prisoner entered a new correctional facility, based on its view that such segregation prevented violence caused by racial gangs.

The court of appeals held that the policy’s constitutionality should be reviewed under the deferential standard articulated in Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987), which asks whether a regulation that burdens a prisoner’s fundamental rights is “reasonably related” to “legitimate penological interests.” Using that standard, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld California’s policy.

Justice O’Connor’s opinion for the Court rejected that argument, reaffirming that “all racial classifications [imposed by government]...must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny.”

The need for strict scrutiny is no less important here, where prison officials cite racial violence as the reason for their policy. As we have recognized in the past, racial classifications “threaten to stigmatize individuals by reason of their membership in a racial group and to incite racial hostility.” Indeed, by insisting that inmates be housed only with other inmates of the same race, it is possible that prison officials will breed further hostility among prisoners and reinforce racial and ethnic divisions. By perpetuating the notion that race matters most, racial segregation of inmates “may exacerbate the very patterns of [violence that it is] said to counteract.” See also Trulson & Marquart, The Caged Melting Pot: Toward an Understanding of the Consequences of Desegregation in Prisons, 36 Law & Soc. Rev. 743, 774 (2002) (in a study of prison desegregation, finding that “over [10 years] the rate of violence between inmates segregated by race in double cells surpassed the rate among those racially integrated”)....

Even assuming that prevention of prison violence was a compelling government interest, the Court was not convinced that racial segregation was a necessary means of achieving that goal:

[Virtually] all other States and the Federal Government manage their prison systems without reliance on racial segregation. [Indeed,] the United States argues, based on its experience with the [Federal Bureau of Prisons], that it is possible to address “concerns of prison security through individualized consideration without the use of racial segregation, unless warranted as a necessary and temporary response to a race riot or other serious threat of race-related violence.” As to transferees, in particular, whom the CDC has already evaluated at least once, it is not clear why more individualized determinations are not possible....

Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia, dissented. He saw the case as lying at the intersection of “two conflicting lines of precedent”: one requiring strict scrutiny of all racial classifications and the other holding that a “relaxed” standard of review should apply “to all circumstances in which the needs of prison administration implicate constitutional rights.” He would have followed the latter line. He ended his dissent by noting that given the level of violence in California prisons, if the plaintiff ultimately won his challenge to racial cell assignment, he “may well have won a Pyrrhic victory.” A year later, in his concurrence in the judgment in Beard v. Banks, 548 U.S. 521 (2006), a prisoners’ rights case involving the first amendment, Justice Thomas noted:

Just last Term, this Court invalidated California’s policy of racially segregating prisoners in its reception centers, notwithstanding that State’s warning that its policy was necessary to prevent prison violence. California subsequently experienced several instances of severe race-based prison violence, including a riot that resulted in 2 fatalities and more than 100 injuries, and significant fighting along racial lines between newly arrived inmates, the very inmates that were subject to the policy invalidated by the Court in Johnson.

4. What counts as a “facial” racial classification? Must a law classify individuals on the basis of their race to count as a racial classification? Or is the fact that race is the explicit subject matter of a law sufficient to trigger strict scrutiny? In this light, consider Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385 (1969). In response to the city council’s passage of a fair housing ordinance that prohibited racial discrimination in real estate transactions, the citizens of Akron, Ohio, passed a referendum amending the city charter. The amendment (referred to as §137) provided that ordinances regulating real estate transactions “on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry” had to be approved by the voters before taking effect. Other ordinances regulating real estate transactions could go into effect without first receiving popular approval. The Supreme Court held that the charter amendment violated the equal protection clause:

It is true that the section draws no distinctions among racial and religious groups. Negroes and whites, Jews and Catholics are all subject to the same requirements if there is housing discrimination against them which they wish to end. But §137 nevertheless disadvantages those who would benefit from laws barring racial, religious, or ancestral discriminations as against those who would bar other discriminations or who would otherwise regulate the real estate market in their favor. The automatic referendum system does not reach housing discrimination on sexual or political grounds, or against those with children or dogs, nor does it affect tenants seeking more heat or better maintenance from landlords, nor those seeking rent control, urban renewal, public housing, or new building codes.

Moreover, although the law on its face treats Negro and white, Jew and gentile in an identical manner, the reality is that the law’s impact falls on the minority. The majority needs no protection against discrimination and if it did, a referendum might be bothersome but no more than that....[Section] 137 places special burdens on racial minorities within the governmental process....

The Court went on to hold that the Akron charter amendment served no compelling government purpose. Does Hunter mean that all laws that refer to race involve racial classifications? Consider whether strict scrutiny should apply to the federal government’s policy of asking citizens to identify their race on census forms or the government’s ensuing publication of data that contains racial classifications. Does Hunter mean that all laws prohibiting discrimination on the basis of race would also trigger strict scrutiny? For example, suppose Akron had adopted a law that forbade housing discrimination on the basis of race, but left landlords free to discriminate “on sexual or political grounds, or against those with children or dogs.” Would the city be subjected to more searching scrutiny of this choice than it would face if it made the opposite choice?

Compare Schuette v. Coalition to Defend Affirmative Action, 134 S. Ct. 1623 (2014), where the Court upheld a provision of the Michigan constitution that prohibited state and local governmental entities from “discriminat[ing] against, or grant[ing] preferential treatment to, any individual or group on the basis of race, sex, color, ethnicity, or national origin.” The amendment was adopted in the wake of the Court’s decision upholding a race-conscious affirmative action plan at the University of Michigan Law School. The justices in the 6-2 majority did not coalesce behind a single opinion. But none of them applied strict scrutiny to the Michigan provision.

5. The meaning of “race.” History and constitutional context show quite clearly that discrimination against African Americans is “racial” discrimination. In Korematsu, the Court similarly treated discrimination against persons of Japanese origin as “racial.” In Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81 (1943), on which Korematsu relied, the Court described the suspect classification more broadly, stating that “[distinctions] between citizens solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality.”

Two weeks before the Supreme Court decided Brown, it addressed the question in Hernandez v. Texas, 347 U.S. 475 (1954). Hernandez, who was Mexican American and had been indicted for murder, alleged that persons of Mexican descent were being systematically excluded from juries in the county where he was to be tried in violation of the equal protection clause.

The State of Texas would have us hold that there are only two classes—white and Negro—within the contemplation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The decisions of this Court do not support that view....

Throughout our history differences in race and color have defined easily identifiable groups which have at times required the aid of the courts in securing equal treatment under the laws. But community prejudices are not static, and from time to time other differences from the community norm may define other groups which need the same protection. Whether such a group exists within a community is a question of fact. When the existence of a distinct class is demonstrated, and it is further shown that the laws, as written or as applied, single out that class for different treatment not based on some reasonable classification, the guarantees of the Constitution have been violated. The Fourteenth Amendment is not directed solely against discrimination due to a “two-class theory”—that is, based upon differences between “white” and Negro.

The petitioner’s initial burden in substantiating his charge of group discrimination was to prove that persons of Mexican descent constitute a separate class in Jackson County, distinct from “whites.” One method by which this may be demonstrated is by showing the attitude of the community. Here the testimony of responsible officials and citizens contained the admission that residents of the community distinguished between “white” and “Mexican.” The participation of persons of Mexican descent in business and community groups was shown to be slight. Until very recent times, children of Mexican descent were required to attend a segregated school for the first four grades....On the courthouse grounds at the time of the hearing, there were two men’s toilets, one unmarked, and the other marked “Colored Men” and “Hombres Aqui” (“Men Here”). No substantial evidence was offered to rebut the logical inference to be drawn from these facts, and it must be concluded that petitioner succeeded in his proof.

Does Hernandez hold that discrimination against Mexican Americans is racial discrimination or that it is somehow equivalent to racial discrimination because the position of Mexican Americans in Texas resembles, in important ways, the position of African Americans? In thinking about what counts as a “race,” consider the Court’s resolution of this question as a statutory matter in St. Francis College v. Al-Khzraji, 481 U.S. 604 (1987). That case concerned a claim of discrimination in employment brought under 42 U.S.C. §1981, a Reconstruction-era statute (indeed, part of the Civil Rights Act that prompted Congress to propose the fourteenth amendment, see pages 475-476, supra) that gave to all persons in the United States the same right “as is enjoyed by white citizens” to make and enforce contracts. Recognizing that §1981 had long been interpreted “to forbid all ‘racial’ discrimination” in the making of contracts, the Court held that Al-Khzraji had alleged racial discrimination when he claimed he had been denied tenure because of his status as an Arab American: “[W]e have little trouble in concluding that Congress intended to protect from discrimination identifiable classes of persons who are subjected to intentional discrimination solely because of their ancestry or ethnic characteristics. Such discrimination is racial discrimination that Congress intended §1981 to forbid, whether or not it would be classified as racial in terms of modern scientific theory.” In a footnote, the Court described the contemporary debate over the nature of race, observing that “some, but not all, scientists” have concluded that “racial classifications are for the most part sociopolitical, rather than biological, in nature.” As we will see in subsequent sections of this chapter, debates over what characteristics sufficiently resemble race to justify triggering strict scrutiny has been a recurring question in modern equal protection law.

2. Facially Nonracial Classifications That Disadvantage Racial Minorities: When Does Heightened Scrutiny Apply?

Washington v. Davis

MR. JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Respondents, unsuccessful black applicants for positions on the police force, claimed that a test measuring verbal ability, vocabulary, and reading comprehension unconstitutionally discriminated against them. According to the district court, respondents’ evidence supported the conclusion that a higher percentage of blacks than whites failed the test, and that the test had not been empirically shown to reliably measure measuring subsequent job performance.]

The central purpose of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment is the prevention of official conduct discriminating on the basis of race. [But] our cases have not embraced the proposition that a law or other official act, without regard to whether it reflects a racially discriminatory purpose, is unconstitutional solely because it has a racially disproportionate impact.

Almost 100 years ago, Strauder v. West Virginia established that the exclusion of Negroes from grand and petit juries in criminal proceedings violated the Equal Protection Clause, but the fact that a particular jury or a series of juries does not statistically reflect the racial composition of the community does not in itself make out an invidious discrimination forbidden by the Clause.

The school desegregation cases have also adhered to the basic equal protection principle that the invidious quality of a law claimed to be racially discriminatory must ultimately be traced to a racially discriminatory purpose. That there are both predominantly black and predominantly white schools in a community is not alone violative of the Equal Protection Clause. The essential element of de jure segregation is “a current condition of segregation resulting from intentional state action.” Keyes v. School Dist. No. 1.

[The] Court has also recently rejected allegations of racial discrimination based solely on the statistically disproportionate racial impact of various provisions of the Social Security Act because “[t]he acceptance of appellants’ constitutional theory would render suspect each difference in treatment among the grant classes, however lacking in racial motivation and however otherwise rational the treatment might be.” Jefferson v. Hackney, 406 U.S. 535, 548 (1972).

This is not to say that the necessary discriminatory racial purpose must be express or appear on the face of the statute, or that a law’s disproportionate impact is irrelevant in cases involving Constitution-based claims of racial discrimination. A statute, otherwise neutral on its face, must not be applied so as invidiously to discriminate on the basis of race....

Necessarily, an invidious discriminatory purpose may often be inferred from the totality of the relevant facts, including the fact, if it is true, that the law bears more heavily on one race than another. It is also not infrequently true that the discriminatory impact—in the jury cases for example, the total or seriously disproportionate exclusion of Negroes from jury venires—may for all practical purposes demonstrate unconstitutionality because in various circumstances the discrimination is very difficult to explain on nonracial grounds. Nevertheless, we have not held that a law, neutral on its face and serving ends otherwise within the power of government to pursue, is invalid under the Equal Protection Clause simply because it may affect a greater proportion of one race than of another. Disproportionate impact is not irrelevant, but it is not the sole touchstone of an invidious racial discrimination forbidden by the Constitution. Standing alone, it does not trigger the rule, that racial classifications are to be subjected to the strictest scrutiny and are justifiable only by the weightiest of considerations....

[We] have difficulty understanding how a law establishing a racially neutral qualification for employment is nevertheless racially discriminatory and denies “any person...equal protection of the laws” simply because a greater proportion of Negroes fail to qualify than members of other racial or ethnic groups. Had respondents, along with all others who had failed [the test], whether white or black, brought an action claiming that [it] denied each of them equal protection of the laws as compared with those who had passed with high enough scores to qualify them as police recruits, it is most unlikely that their challenge would have been sustained. [The test], which is administered generally to prospective Government employees, concededly seeks to ascertain whether those who take it have acquired a particular level of verbal skill; and it is untenable that the Constitution prevents the Government from seeking modestly to upgrade the communicative abilities of its employees rather than to be satisfied with some lower level of competence, particularly where the job requires special ability to communicate orally and in writing. Respondents, as Negroes, could no more successfully claim that the test denied them equal protection than could white applicants who also failed. The conclusion would not be different in the face of proof that more Negroes than whites had been disqualified by [the test]. That other Negroes also failed to score well would, alone, not demonstrate that respondents individually were being denied equal protection of the laws by the application of an otherwise valid qualifying test being administered to prospective police recruits.

Nor on the facts of the case before us would the disproportionate impact of [the test] warrant the conclusion that it is a purposeful device to discriminate against Negroes and hence an infringement of the constitutional rights of respondents as well as other black applicants. As we have said, the test is neutral on its face and rationally may be said to serve a purpose the Government is constitutionally empowered to pursue. Even agreeing with the District Court that the differential racial effect of [the test] called for further inquiry, we think the District Court correctly held that the affirmative efforts of the Metropolitan Police Department to recruit black officers, the changing racial composition of the recruit classes and of the force in general, and the relationship of the test to the training program negated any inference that the Department discriminated on the basis of race or that "a police officer qualifies on the color of his skin rather than ability."...

A rule that a statute designed to serve neutral ends is nevertheless invalid, absent compelling justification, if in practice it benefits or burdens one race more than another would be far reaching and would raise serious questions about, and perhaps invalidate, a whole range of tax, welfare, public service, regulatory, and licensing statutes that may be more burdensome to the poor and to the average black than to the more affluent white....

MR. JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring....

Frequently the most probative evidence of intent will be objective evidence of what actually happened rather than evidence describing the subjective state of mind of the actor. For normally the actor is presumed to have intended the natural consequences of his deeds. This is particularly true in the case of governmental action which is frequently the product of compromise, of collective decisionmaking, and of mixed motivation. It is unrealistic, on the one hand, to require the victim of alleged discrimination to uncover the actual subjective intent of the decisionmaker or, conversely, to invalidate otherwise legitimate action simply because an improper motive affected the deliberation of a participant in the decisional process. A law conscripting clerics should not be invalidated because an atheist voted for it.

My point in making this observation is to suggest that the line between discriminatory purpose and discriminatory impact is not nearly as bright, and perhaps not quite as critical, as the reader of the Court's opinion might assume. I agree, of course, that a constitutional issue does not arise every time some disproportionate impact is shown. On the other hand, when the disproportion is dramatic, [it] really does not matter whether the standard is phrased in terms of purpose or effect. Therefore, although I accept the statement of the general rule in the Court's opinion, I am not yet prepared to indicate how that standard should be applied in the many cases which have formulated the governing standard in different language....

Note: Rational Basis Review of Non-Race-Specific Classifications

1. Some preliminary questions. After Washington v. Davis, a court confronted with a classification that disadvantages a racial minority must first determine whether it constitutes a “racial classification.” If it does—either because the classification explicitly draws racial lines or because it is motivated by a racial purpose—the court will use strict scrutiny and probably invalidate it. If the classification is non-race-specific, the court will use rational basis review despite the classification’s disproportionate impact on the minority group and probably uphold it. Has the Supreme Court given an adequate account of why facially neutral classifications that harm racial minorities should not be strictly scrutinized in the absence of a discriminatory purpose? Is it because such classifications are less likely to stigmatize? Because they are less likely to perpetuate stereotypes? Because it would be impractical to invalidate all the “tax, welfare, public service, regulatory, and licensing statutes that may be more burdensome to [the] average black than to the [average] white”? Even if strict scrutiny and virtual per se invalidation are inappropriate for non-race-specific classifications, should the fact that a challenged classification disproportionately affects racial minorities trigger some form of more rigorous review?

2. The problem of remedy. Many of the arguments against an effects test assume that, so long as a disproportionate impact is unintended, it is merely a matter of chance. Is this assumption warranted? Does it matter whether, and to what extent, blacks and whites are differently situated with respect to the challenged law because of prior unequal treatment by government? Consider Perry, The Disproportionate Impact Theory of Racial Discrimination, 125 U. Pa. L. Rev. 540, 558 (1977):

Laws having a disproportionate racial impact burden blacks because of their especially disadvantaged position in American society. A failure to require government to take account of that especially disadvantaged social position by selecting and fine-tuning laws to avoid the unnecessary or thoughtless aggravation of the situation would effectively ignore American society's responsibility for that social position. Furthermore, the failure would compound the responsibility.

Compare Alexander, What Makes Wrongful Discrimination Wrong? Biases, Preferences, Stereotypes, and Proxies, 141 U. Pa. L. Rev. 149, 213 (1992):

If one lacks a preferred trait that one would have possessed were one not the victim of wrongful discrimination, may one demand in addition to compensation from one's victimizers that others overlook the absence of the trait? Surely not. If I was a promising neurosurgeon before my hands were mangled by a drunk driver, I cannot ask others to ignore my lack of dexterity in their choice of neurosurgeons. [Preferences] for scarce traits do not become immoral merely because the scarcity is in part due to the immoralities of others, even when just reparations have not been fully paid.

In Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970), the Supreme Court unanimously upheld Congress's nationwide ban of literacy tests as a prerequisite to voting, holding that the challenged statute reflected an appropriate use of congressional enforcement power under the Reconstruction amendments. Although there was no opinion for the Court, several of the justices pointed to the fact that official racial discrimination in education both before and after Brown was in part responsible for the racially disparate impact of such tests. Justice Black's opinion made the point most clearly:

The children who were denied an equivalent education by the "separate but equal" rule of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), overruled in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), are now old enough to vote. There is substantial, if not overwhelming, evidence from which Congress could have concluded that it is a denial of equal protection to condition the political participation of children educated in a dual school system upon their educational achievement. Moreover, the history of this legislation suggests that concern with educational inequality was perhaps uppermost in the minds of the congressmen who sponsored the Act. The hearings are filled with references to educational inequality. Faced with this and other evidence that literacy tests reduce voter participation in a discriminatory manner not only in the South but throughout the Nation, Congress was supported by substantial evidence in concluding that a nationwide ban on literacy tests was appropriate to enforce the Civil War amendments.

3. Disproportionate impact and the theory of passive government. Even if the government is not responsible for the fact that blacks are differently situated with respect to a non-race-specific classification, why should that fact matter? Doesn't treating people the same when they are relevantly different deny equality just as effectively as treating them differently when they are relevantly the same? Compare, for example, the following two hypothetical admissions policies followed by a state university:

- a. No blind applicants will be admitted.
- b. All applicants, whether sighted or blind, must take a written examination without assistance, and those receiving the highest scores will be admitted.

The first treats blind and sighted applicants differently, although they are (arguably) relevantly the same. The second treats blind and sighted applicants the same, although they are (arguably) relevantly different. Does either satisfy the equality principle?

Recall the suggestion that race-specific classifications are strictly scrutinized in order to deal with problems of legislative purpose. When the classification is race-specific, the purpose question is not whether the legislature intended to treat blacks and whites differently. The classification itself establishes that purpose. Rather, the question is whether the legislature intended to treat them differently simply for the sake of harming a racial minority rather than for the sake of achieving some permissible goal. The strict scrutiny doctrine holds that only a showing of a close fit and an overriding government interest can overcome the inference that the classification was motivated by a desire to harm the minority. See section C1 supra. See also Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 272 (1979). But why shouldn't the same inference be drawn, and the same strict scrutiny required, when a non-race-specific classification disproportionately disadvantages a racial minority? Isn't treating blacks and whites the same despite the fact that they are differently situated just as effective a strategy for disadvantaging blacks as treating them differently despite the fact that they are similarly situated?

Note: What Constitutes a Racially Motivated Classification?: Questions of Discriminatory Purpose

1. What constitutes a discriminatory purpose? Washington v. Davis provides that a court should apply strict scrutiny to a facially nonracial government action only if the plaintiff can show that the action was taken for a “discriminatory purpose.” In Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256 (1979), a gender discrimination case, the Court elaborated on what “purpose” means. Under Massachusetts law, all veterans who qualified for state civil service positions had to be considered for appointment ahead of any qualifying nonveterans. The preference operated overwhelmingly to the advantage of males. In an opinion by Justice Stewart, the Court upheld the preference against equal protection attack. It conceded that it would be “disingenuous” to say that the legislation’s effect on women was unintended “in the sense that [it] was not volitional or in the sense that [it] was not foreseeable.” But “discriminatory purpose” [implies] more than intent as volition or intent as awareness of consequences. It implies that the decisionmaker [selected] or reaffirmed a particular course of action at least in part “because of,” not merely “in spite of” its adverse effects upon an identifiable group. Yet nothing in the record demonstrates that this preference for veterans was originally devised or subsequently re-enacted because it would accomplish the collateral goal of keeping women in a stereotypic or predefined place in the Massachusetts Civil Service.

Should the Feeney Court have focused on whether the Massachusetts legislature would have enacted the same preference if most veterans had been women? For a discussion of some problems with this approach, see Seidman, Public Principle and Private Choice: The Uneasy Case for a Boundary Maintenance Theory of Constitutional Law, 96 Yale L.J. 1006, 1038–1039 (1987).

2. Mixed motives. Does it make sense even to talk about “a purpose” when it comes to the decisions of collective bodies, often reaffirmed over long periods of time? Perhaps the Court tried to finesse this problem with its decision in Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252 (1977). There, the Court held that

Davis does not require a plaintiff to prove that the challenged action rested solely on racially discriminatory purposes. Rarely can it be said that a legislature or administrative body operating under a broad mandate made a decision motivated solely by a single concern, or even that a particular purpose was the “dominant” or “primary” one. In fact, it is because legislators and administrators are properly concerned with balancing numerous competing considerations that courts refrain from reviewing the merits of their decisions, absent a showing of arbitrariness or irrationality. But racial discrimination is not just another competing consideration. When there is a proof that a discriminatory purpose has been a motivating factor in the decision, this judicial deference is no longer justified.

The Court went on to explain that proof that a decision “was motivated in part by a racially discriminatory purpose would not necessarily [require] invalidation of the challenged decision.” Instead, such proof would shift to the government the burden of establishing that the same decision would have resulted even had the impermissible purpose not been considered. If this were established, the complaining party in a case of this kind no longer fairly could attribute the injury complained of to improper consideration of a discriminatory purpose. In such circumstances, there would be no justification for judicial interference with the challenged decision.

More broadly, consider also Justice Stevens’s observation in his dissent in Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S. 613 (1982). There, the Court struck down the use of at-large elections in a county in Georgia on the grounds that the system “was being maintained for the invidious purpose of diluting the voting strength of the black population.”

The costs and the doubts associated with litigating questions of motive, which are often significant in routine trials, will be especially so in cases involving the “motives” of legislative bodies. Often there will be no evidence that the governmental system was adopted for a discriminatory reason....In such a case the question becomes whether the system was maintained for a discriminatory purpose. Whose intentions control? Obviously not the voters, although they may be most responsible for the attitudes and actions of local government. Assuming that it is the intentions of the “state actors” that is critical, how will their mental processes be discovered? Must a specific proposal for change be defeated? What if different motives are held by different legislators or, indeed, by a single official? Is a selfish desire to stay in office sufficient to justify a failure to change a governmental system?

3. Discriminatory administration of facially neutral statutes. At what level ought purpose be evaluated? Can a law enacted for neutral reasons nonetheless be found purposefully discriminatory in practice?

In Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 351 (1886), petitioner was convicted of violating a local ordinance prohibiting operation of a laundry not located in a brick or stone building without the consent of the board of supervisors. He alleged that he and more than two hundred other Chinese nationals had petitioned the board of supervisors for consent, but that all of their petitions were denied, whereas all but one of the petitions filed by non-Chinese were granted. The Court unanimously reversed Yick Wo's conviction. It held that the facts shown establish an administration directed so exclusively against a particular class of persons as to warrant and require the conclusion, that, whatever may have been the intent of the ordinances as adopted, they are applied by the public authorities charged with their administration, and thus representing the State itself, with a mind so unequal and oppressive as to amount to a practical denial by the State of [equal] protection of the laws.

Note that there might be two separate explanations for the problem identified in Yick Wo. First, a statute might be passed for neutral reasons but administered in a discriminatory fashion unintended by the statute's drafters. Second, a legislative body might enact statutes that accord low-level government agents tremendous discretion with the understanding that such discretion will be administered in a discriminatory manner precisely because proving the purpose behind individual implementations of a policy would be relatively difficult.

In this light, consider the well-developed line of authority reversing convictions where it is shown that facially neutral jury selection statutes are administered in a discriminatory fashion. See page 560, infra, for treatment of these cases. See, e.g., Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482 (1977); Carter v. Jury Commission, 396 U.S. 320 (1970); Avery v. Georgia, 345 U.S. 559 (1953). Moreover, in the jury context, reversal is required even in the absence of a showing that any prejudice (in the sense of a different outcome) resulted from the discriminatory policy. See Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254 (1986); Rose v. Mitchell, 443 U.S. 545 (1979). In Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), discussed at pages 560-561, infra, the Court extended these cases to the use of peremptory challenges by prosecutors to remove individual jurors on the basis of race.

4. Statutes enacted for discriminatory purposes. Is discriminatory purpose review less troublesome when a statute contains a classification that is deliberately “gerrymandered” to produce a disproportionate impact on racial minorities? Consider the following two examples in which the Court found such a motive.

Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339 (1960), concerned an Alabama statute that altered the shape of the city of Tuskegee from a square to an “uncouth twenty-eight sided figure.” The plaintiffs alleged that the new boundary lines removed from the city all but four or five of the city’s 400 black voters, while not removing a single white voter. The Court held that, if these allegations were proved, the statute infringed on the right of blacks to vote in violation of the fifteenth amendment:

If these allegations upon a trial remained uncontradicted or unqualified, the conclusion would be irresistible, tantamount for all practical purposes to a mathematical demonstration, that the legislation is solely concerned with segregating white and colored voters by fencing Negro citizens out of town so as to deprive them of their pre-existing municipal vote. It is difficult to appreciate what stands in the way of adjudging a statute having this inevitable effect invalid.

Similarly, in Hunter v. Underwood, 471 U.S. 222 (1985), the Court confronted a provision of the Alabama Constitution, adopted in 1901, that disenfranchised all persons convicted of misdemeanors of moral turpitude. A unanimous Court, in an opinion by Justice Rehnquist, invalidated the provision because it was largely motivated by the desire to disenfranchise blacks: The list of disenfranchising misdemeanors was picked because the provision’s drafters thought blacks were particularly prone to the specified offenses. Why should the motivation of the 1901 legislature determine the validity of the provision in 1985? Note also that the laws challenged in Gomillion and Underwood were both enacted during periods in which legislators were quite candid about the racial motivations behind their actions. Consider whether “gerrymandering” today is likely to be more sophisticated and less able to detect.

5. “De facto” racial classifications. Should a statute be subject to strict scrutiny even if it does not use race per se as a classifying principle and is not intended simply to circumvent the presumption against racial classifications if the classification correlates especially closely with race?

Consider Hernandez v. New York, 500 U.S. 352 (1991). Hernandez claimed that the prosecutor at his criminal trial had used peremptory challenges to exclude Latinos from the jury. The prosecutor told the trial judge that the challenges were based on his fear that the challenged jurors, who were bilingual, would have difficulty following only the official interpreter for Spanish-speaking witnesses rather than their own understanding of the testimony. The trial court rejected the defendant's claim, and the Supreme Court affirmed. According to Justice Kennedy, in an opinion joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices White and Souter, this was a disparate impact case and therefore governed by Washington v. Davis:

As explained by the prosecutor, the challenges rested neither on the intention to exclude Latino or bilingual jurors, nor on stereotypical assumptions about Latinos or bilinguals. The prosecutor's articulated basis for these challenges divided potential jurors into two classes: those whose conduct during the voir dire would persuade him they might have difficulty in accepting the translator's rendition of Spanish-language testimony and those potential jurors who gave no such reason for doubt. Each category would include both Latinos and non-Latinos. While the prosecutor's criterion might well result in the disproportionate removal of prospective Latino jurors, that disproportionate impact does not turn the prosecutor's actions into a per se violation of the Equal Protection Clause.

[I] believe that the plurality opinion goes farther than it needs to in assessing the constitutionality of the prosecutor's asserted justification for his peremptory strikes....

In this case, the prosecutor's asserted justification for striking certain Hispanic jurors was his uncertainty about the jurors' ability to accept the official translation of trial testimony. If this truly was the purpose of the strikes, they were not strikes because of race, and therefore did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. [They] may have acted like strikes based on race, but they were not based on race. No matter how closely tied or significantly correlated to race the explanation for a peremptory strike may be, the strike does not implicate the Equal Protection Clause unless it is based on race.

Compare Hernandez with Rice v. Cayetano, 528 U.S. 495 (2000). The Hawaiian constitution establishes the Office of Hawaiian Affairs (OHA), which is vested with authority to administer revenue from land held in trust for the betterment of the conditions of the descendants of the indigenous people who inhabited the island in 1778, the date when England's Captain Cook made landfall in Hawaii. (The constitutionality of this arrangement was not before the Court, and the Court expressed no opinion on this subject.) The right to vote for the nine trustees composing the governing body of the OHA was limited to descendants of people inhabiting Hawaii in 1778. Rice challenged this limitation on the ground that it violated the fifteenth amendment prohibition against racial restrictions on the right to vote. In a seven-to-two decision, the Supreme Court, per Justice Kennedy, agreed:

Ancestry can be a proxy for race. It is that proxy here. Even if the residents of Hawaii in 1778 had been of more diverse ethnic backgrounds and cultures, it is far from clear that a voting test favoring their descendants would not be a race-based qualification. But that is not this case. For centuries Hawaii was isolated from migration. The inhabitants shared common physical characteristics, and by 1778 they had a common culture....

Simply because a class defined by ancestry does not include all members of the race does not suffice to make the classification race neutral. Here, the State's argument is undermined by its express racial purpose and by its actual effects.

Justice Stevens, in an opinion joined by Justice Ginsburg, dissented:

The OHA voter qualification speaks in terms of ancestry and current residence, not of race or color....

Ancestry surely can be a proxy for race, or a pretext for invidious racial discrimination. But it is simply neither proxy nor pretext here....

[The] OHA election provision excludes all full-blooded Polynesians currently residing in Hawaii who are not descended from a 1778 resident of Hawaii. Conversely, [the] OHA scheme excludes no descendant of a 1778 resident because he or she is also part European, Asian, or African as a matter of race. The classification here is thus both too inclusive and not inclusive enough to fall strictly along racial lines.

Are Hernandez and Cayetano consistent?

6. Racially motivated classifications that are not strictly scrutinized. Does it follow from Yick Wo and Gomillion that racially motivated classifications should always be subject to strict scrutiny? The Court has demonstrated some reluctance to strictly scrutinize such classifications in three situations:

a. Palmer and the problem of racially motivated classifications with neutral effects. Compare Gomillion with Palmer v. Thompson, 403 U.S. 217 (1971), in which a city council closed municipal swimming pools following court-ordered integration. In a five-to-four decision, the Court held that the closing did not violate the equal protection clause. After observing that “no case in this Court has held that a legislative act may violate equal protection solely because of the motivations of the men who voted for it,” the Court advanced several reasons why investigation of purpose was improper:

First, it is extremely difficult for a court to ascertain the motivation, or collection of different motivations, that lie behind a legislative enactment. [Furthermore], there is an element of futility in a judicial attempt to invalidate a law because of the bad motives of its supporters. If the law is struck down for this reason, rather than because of its facial content or effect, it would presumably be valid as soon as the legislature or relevant governing body repassed it for different reasons.

The Court distinguished Gomillion as a case resting on the “actual effect” of the enactment, “not upon the motivation which led the [State] to behave as [it] did.”

Is this explanation of Gomillion consistent with Washington v. Davis? The Washington Court attempted to explain Palmer on the ground that the pool closing extended “identical treatment to both whites and Negroes.” Taken together, Palmer and Washington suggest that a facially neutral statute is subject to enhanced review only when it has both a discriminatory purpose and a disproportionate impact. However, it is difficult to see how a holding that the closing of integrated pools does not produce a disproportionate racial impact is consistent with Brown v. Board of Education. See Brest, Palmer v. Thompson: An Approach to the Problem of Unconstitutional Legislative Motive, 1971 Sup. Ct. Rev. 95, 132. Is it conceivable that the Court would uphold a statute that by its terms required the closing of any municipal facility ordered desegregated? Compare Bush v. Orleans Parish School Board, 187 F. Supp. 42 (E.D. La. 1960), aff’d, 365 U.S. 569 (1961) (statute providing for closing of all integrated schools unconstitutional).

b. “Discretionary” decisions. Should there be a class of “discretionary” governmental decisions not subject to improper purpose review? Suppose, for example, that the President chooses a nominee for the Supreme Court or for a cabinet post partially on the basis of racial or ethnic considerations. Will, or should, the courts review that choice? Is the absence of such suits a practical consequence of standing rules: What disappointed aspirant is likely to bring suit? And what would the remedy be?

c. The causation requirement. Should an improperly motivated classification be subject to strict scrutiny if the state is able to show that the same classification would have been used even in the absence of the improper motive? Note that Arlington Heights suggests that perhaps the answer to this question is “no.” The Court has never suggested that a statute that discriminates on its face against racial minorities can be saved from strict scrutiny by a showing that the same classification would have been used in the absence of racial animus. Indeed, on one view the reason why the Court requires a compelling government interest and a tight fit between means and ends is to ascertain whether the same law would have been adopted if the legislature were not “prejudiced.” Does it follow that strict scrutiny is also the appropriate technique for investigating the causation question when facially neutral statutes are infected by a discriminatory purpose?

7. The transsubstantive nature of the discriminatory purpose inquiry. Stated abstractly, there appears to be a sharp distinction between a “purpose” and an “effects” test for the constitutionality of facially neutral statutes that disproportionately disadvantage racial minorities. In practice, however, the importance of the distinction turns on the willingness of courts to infer discriminatory purpose from either discriminatory effect or the absence of other plausible purposes. The more willing the courts are to infer purpose from effect or to insist on proof of important nondiscriminatory purposes, the less important the distinction is. The Court’s willingness to infer purpose from effect has varied across substantive areas. In this respect, consider Ortiz, The Myth of Intent in Equal Protection, 41 Stan. L. Rev. 1105, 1107 (1989):

Instead of regulating the inputs to decisionmaking, intent serves, I believe, as a way of judging substantive outcomes. In particular, it works...by allocating burdens of proof between the individual and the state. Of particular interest is the way the doctrine allocates these burdens differently in different contexts....The nature of the case makes all the difference.

In my view, intent allocates these burdens differently in different contexts in order to “balance” individual and societal interests consistently with the ideology of traditional liberalism. Where (as in housing and employment) this ideology either relegates decisionmaking to markets or allows the state much leeway in allocating goods, intent makes judicial supervision of decisionmaking difficult. On the other hand, where liberal ideology insists on particular types of nonmarket allocation (as in voting, jury selection, and sometimes education), intent makes judicial intervention more likely....[Thus, the] intent doctrine serves to reinforce and protect many of our reigning political and economic values. The doctrine’s significance lies in the way it simultaneously achieves and hides this purpose.

Note: Distinctive Problems in the Administration of Criminal Justice

Applying the equal protection clause to claims of racial discrimination in the criminal justice system poses many of the general problems associated with equal protection law in particularly acute form, especially with respect to determining whether facially neutral practices in fact reflect a discriminatory purpose.

Even though Strauder squarely established the principle that laws excluding blacks from serving on juries violate the equal protection clause, they continued in the South to be largely excluded from juries for a variety of reasons until the last half of the twentieth century. Some of this exclusion was the product of intentionally discriminatory enforcement of facially neutral laws regarding who could serve on juries. Particularly in jurisdictions where individual jury commissioners decided whom to call for jury service, exclusion was rampant. See, e.g., Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482 (1977); Carter v. Jury Commission, 396 U.S. 320 (1970); Avery v. Georgia, 345 U.S. 559 (1953). Some of the exclusion was due to the interaction of laws regarding jury service with other laws that were intentionally discriminatory. For example, in jurisdictions where jury summonses were based on individuals being on the voting rolls, racial discrimination in registration would also affect jury composition.

When jury selection procedures are challenged as racially discriminatory, the Court has been relatively receptive to arguments based on disproportionate effects, at least as a device for shifting the burden of proof to the state. Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482 (1977), sets out the standard method of proof. A defendant who claims he is a member of a racial group that has wrongly been excluded must show the “degree” of underrepresentation “by comparing the proportion of the group in the total population to the proportion called to serve as [jurors], over a significant period of time.” If he also shows that the jury selection procedure is “susceptible of abuse or is not racially neutral,” this will create a “presumption of discrimination,” and “the burden then shifts to the State to rebut that case.” What explains the Court’s greater willingness to infer purpose from effect in the jury context?

The remedy the Court applied in cases where racial discrimination was proved was reversal of a defendant’s conviction, even in the absence of a showing that any prejudice resulted from the discriminatory policy. See Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254 (1986); Rose v. Mitchell, 443 U.S. 545 (1979).

In Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), the Court extended these cases to the use of peremptory challenges by prosecutors to remove individual jurors on the basis of race. In an opinion by Justice Powell, the Court held that [although] a prosecutor ordinarily is entitled to exercise permitted peremptory challenges “for any reason at all, as long as that reason is related to his view concerning the outcome” of the case to be tried, the Equal Protection Clause forbids the prosecutor to challenge potential jurors solely on account of their race or on the assumption that black jurors as a group will be unable impartially to consider the State’s case against a black defendant.

In a dissenting opinion, Chief Justice Burger, joined by Justice Rehnquist, argued that peremptory challenges are often lodged, of necessity, for reasons “normally thought irrelevant to legal proceedings or official actions, namely, the race, religion, nationality, occupation or affiliation of people summoned for jury duty.” Moreover, in making peremptory challenges, both the prosecutor and defense attorney necessarily act on only limited information or hunch. The process can not be indicted on the sole basis that such decisions are made on the basis of “assumption” or “intuitive judgment.” As a result, unadulterated equal protection analysis is simply inapplicable to peremptory challenges exercised in any particular case.

[There] is simply nothing “unequal” about the State using its peremptory challenges to strike blacks from the jury in cases involving black defendants so long as such challenges are also used to exclude whites in cases involving white defendants, Hispanics in cases involving Hispanic defendants, Asians in cases involving Asian defendants, and so on. This case-specific use of peremptory challenges by the State does not single out blacks, or members of any other race for that matter, for discriminatory treatment. Such use of peremptories is at best based upon seat-of-the-pants instincts, which are undoubtedly crudely stereotypical and may in many cases be hopelessly mistaken. But as long as they are applied across the board to jurors of all races and nationalities, I do not see [how] their use violates the Equal Protection Clause.

See also Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400 (1991) (holding that Batson applied when the defendant and the excluded juror do not “share the same race”); Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614 (1991) (holding that race-based peremptory challenges by private litigants in civil litigation violated the Constitution); Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42 (1992) (holding that Batson applied to defense, as well as prosecutorial, challenges).

Consider Justice Thomas's attack on Batson in his opinion concurring in the judgment in McCollum:

[I] am certain that black criminal defendants will rue the day that this court ventured down this road that inexorably will lead to the elimination of peremptory strikes.

In Strauder, [we] invalidated a state law that prohibited blacks from serving on juries. In the course of the decision, we observed that the racial composition of a jury may affect the outcome of a criminal case....

We reasonably surmised, without direct evidence in any particular case, that all-white juries might judge black defendants unfairly.

The Batson principle has proved notoriously difficult to enforce in practice. With nearly twenty years of hindsight, consider the observations made by Justice Breyer in his concurring opinion in Miller-El v. Dretke, 545 U.S. 213 (2005), a case involving a Batson claim that spawned two trips to the Supreme Court:

As the Court's opinion makes clear, Miller-El marshaled extensive evidence of racial bias. But despite the strength of his claim, Miller-El's challenge has resulted in 17 years of largely unsuccessful and protracted litigation—including 8 different judicial proceedings and 8 different judicial opinions, and involving 23 judges, of whom 6 found the Batson standard violated and 16 the contrary....

Given the inevitably clumsy fit between any objectively measurable standard and the subjective decisionmaking at issue, I am not surprised to find studies and anecdotal reports suggesting that, despite Batson, the discriminatory use of peremptory challenges remains a problem. See, e.g., Baldus, Woodworth, Zuckerman, Weiner, & Broffitt, The Use of Peremptory Challenges in Capital Murder Trials: A Legal and Empirical Analysis, 3 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 3, 52–53, 73, n.197 (2001) (in 317 capital trials in Philadelphia between 1981 and 1997, prosecutors struck 51% of black jurors and 26% of nonblack jurors; defense counsel struck 26% of black jurors and 54% of nonblack jurors; and race-based uses of prosecutorial peremptories declined by only 2% after Batson); Rose, The Peremptory Challenge Accused of Race or Gender Discrimination? Some Data from One County, 23 Law and Human Behavior 695, 698–699 (1999) (in one North Carolina county, 71% of excused black jurors were removed by the prosecution; 81% of excused white jurors were removed by the defense)....

[Peremptory] challenges seem increasingly anomalous in our judicial system. On the one hand, the Court has widened and deepened Batson's basic constitutional rule. [On] the other hand, the use of race- and gender-based stereotypes in the jury-selection process seems better organized and more systematized than ever before....

[These] examples reflect a professional effort to fulfill the lawyer's obligation to help his or her client. Nevertheless, the outcome in terms of jury selection is the same as it would be were the motive less benign. And as long as that is so, the law's antidiscrimination command and a peremptory jury-selection system that permits or encourages the use of stereotypes work at cross-purposes.

I recognize that peremptory challenges have a long historical pedigree. They may help to reassure a party of the fairness of the jury. But long ago, Blackstone recognized the peremptory challenge as an "arbitrary and capricious species of [a] challenge." 4 W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 346 (1769). If used to express stereotypical judgments about race, gender, religion, or national origin, peremptory challenges betray the jury's democratic origins and undermine its representative function. The "scientific" use of peremptory challenges may also contribute to public cynicism about the fairness of the jury system and its role in American government. And, of course, the right to a jury free of discriminatory taint is constitutionally protected—the right to use peremptory challenges is not.

Should the inability of the courts to police the Batson principle lead them to ban the use of peremptory challenges altogether?

McCleskey v. Kemp

JUSTICE POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

[McCleskey, an African American, was convicted in a Georgia state court of murdering a white police officer and sentenced to death. On habeas corpus, he alleged that the Georgia capital sentencing scheme was administered in a racially discriminatory manner in violation of the equal protection clause.

[In support of this claim, he proffered a statistical study prepared by Professor David Baldus (the "Baldus study"), which examined more than two thousand murder cases occurring in Georgia in the 1970s. The raw numbers collected by Baldus indicated that the death penalty was assessed in 22 percent of the cases involving black defendants and white victims; 8 percent of the cases involving white defendants and white victims; 1 percent of the cases involving black defendants and black victims; and 3 percent of the cases involving white defendants and black victims.

[Baldus then subjected his data to statistical analysis that attempted to account for other variables that might have explained these differences on nonracial grounds. After taking into account a variety of nonracial variables, he concluded that defendants charged with killing whites were 4.3 times more likely to receive a death sentence than defendants charged with killing blacks. The study further indicated that black defendants who killed white victims had the greatest likelihood of receiving a death sentence.

[The district court found the Baldus study flawed in several respects, held that it “[failed] to contribute anything of value” to McCleskey’s claim, and dismissed the petition. The court of appeals affirmed. Although it assumed arguendo that the study was valid, the court held that the statistics were “insufficient to demonstrate discriminatory intent.”]

Our analysis begins with the basic principle that a defendant who alleges an equal protection violation has the burden of proving “the existence of purposeful discrimination.”⁷ Thus, to prevail under the Equal Protection Clause, McCleskey must prove that the decisionmakers in his case acted with discriminatory purpose. He offers no evidence specific to his own case that would support an inference that racial considerations played a part in his sentence....

[T]he nature of the capital sentencing decision, and the relationship of the statistics to that decision, are fundamentally different from the corresponding elements in the venire-selection or Title VII cases. Most importantly, each particular decision to impose the death penalty is made by a petit jury selected from a properly constituted venire. Each jury is unique in its composition, and the Constitution requires that its decision rest on consideration of innumerable factors that vary according to the characteristics of the individual defendant and the facts of the particular capital offense. Thus, the application of an inference drawn from the general statistics to a specific decision in a trial and sentencing simply is not comparable to the application of an inference drawn from general statistics to a specific venire-selection or Title VII case. In those cases, the statistics relate to fewer entities, and fewer variables are relevant to the challenged decisions.

Another important difference [is] that, in the venire-selection and Title VII contexts, the decisionmaker has an opportunity to explain the statistical disparity. Here, the State has no practical opportunity to rebut the Baldus study. [The] policy considerations behind a prosecutor’s traditionally “wide discretion” suggest the impropriety of our requiring prosecutors to defend their decisions to seek death penalties, “often years after they were made.” Moreover, absent far stronger proof, it is unnecessary to seek such a rebuttal, because a legitimate and unchallenged explanation for the decision is apparent from the record: McCleskey committed an act for which the United States Constitution and Georgia laws permit imposition of the death penalty.

Finally, McCleskey’s statistical proffer must be viewed in the context of his challenge. McCleskey challenges decisions at the heart of the State’s criminal justice system. [Because] discretion is essential to the criminal justice process, we would demand exceptionally clear proof before we would infer that the discretion has been abused....

McCleskey also suggests that the Baldus study proves that the State as a whole has acted with a discriminatory purpose. He appears to argue that the State has violated the Equal Protection Clause by adopting the capital punishment statute and allowing it to remain in force despite its allegedly discriminatory application. But “[d]iscriminatory purpose’...implies more than intent as volition or intent as awareness of consequences. It implies that the decisionmaker, in this case a state legislature, selected or reaffirmed a particular course of action at least in part ‘because of,’ not merely ‘in spite of,’ its adverse effects upon an identifiable group.” [Personnel Administrator v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256 (1979).] For this claim to prevail, McCleskey would have to prove that the Georgia Legislature enacted or maintained the death penalty statute because of an anticipated racially discriminatory effect. [There is] no evidence [that] the Georgia Legislature enacted the capital punishment statute to further a racially discriminatory purpose....

[The] capital sentencing decision requires the individual jurors to focus their collective judgment on the unique characteristics of a particular criminal defendant. It is not surprising that such collective judgments often are difficult to explain. But the inherent lack of predictability of jury decisions does not justify their condemnation. On the contrary, it is the jury’s function to make the difficult and uniquely human judgments that defy codification and that “buil[d] discretion, equity, and flexibility into a legal system.” H. Kalven & H. Zeisel, The American Jury 498 (1966).

McCleskey’s argument that the Constitution condemns the discretion allowed decisionmakers in the Georgia capital sentencing system is antithetical to the fundamental role of discretion in our criminal justice system. [Of] course, “the power to be lenient [also] is the power to discriminate,” K. Davis, Discretionary Justice 170 (1973), but a capital-punishment system that did not allow for discretionary acts of leniency “would be totally alien to our notions of criminal justice.” Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 200, n.50 (1976).

[Where] the discretion that is fundamental to our criminal process is involved, we decline to assume that what is unexplained is invidious. In light of the safeguards designed to minimize racial bias in the process, the fundamental value of jury trial in our criminal justice system, and the benefits that discretion provides to criminal defendants, we hold that the Baldus study does not demonstrate a constitutionally significant risk of racial bias affecting the Georgia capital sentencing process....

McCleskey's claim, taken to its logical conclusion, throws into serious question the principles that underlie our entire criminal justice system. [If] we accepted McCleskey's claim that racial bias has impermissibly tainted the capital sentencing decision, we could soon be faced with similar claims as to other types of penalty. Moreover, the claim that his sentence rests on the irrelevant factor of race easily could be extended to apply to claims based on unexplained discrepancies that correlate to membership in other minority groups, and even to gender. [The] Constitution does not require that a State eliminate any demonstrable disparity that correlates with a potentially irrelevant factor in order to operate a criminal justice system that includes capital punishment....

[Affirmed.]

JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom JUSTICE MARSHALL, [JUSTICE BLACKMUN, and JUSTICE STEVENS] join, dissenting....

At some point in this case, Warren McCleskey doubtless asked his lawyer whether a jury was likely to sentence him to die. A candid reply to this question would have been disturbing. [The] story could be told in a variety of ways, but McCleskey could not fail to grasp its essential narrative line: there was a significant chance that race would play a prominent role in determining if he lived or died....

The Baldus study indicates that, after taking into account some 230 nonracial factors that might legitimately influence a sentencer, the jury more likely than not would have spared McCleskey's life had his victim been black....

Evaluation of McCleskey's evidence cannot rest solely on the numbers themselves. We must also ask whether the conclusion suggested by those numbers is consonant with our understanding of history and human experience. Georgia's legacy of a race-conscious criminal justice system, as well as this Court's own recognition of the persistent danger that racial attitudes may affect criminal proceedings, indicate that McCleskey's claim is not a fanciful product of mere statistical artifice.

For many years, Georgia operated openly and formally precisely the type of dual system the evidence shows is still effectively in place. The criminal law expressly differentiated between crimes committed by and against blacks and whites, distinctions whose lineage traced back to the time of slavery....

This historical review of Georgia criminal law is not intended as a bill of indictment calling the State to account for past transgressions. Citation of past practices does not justify the automatic condemnation of current ones. But it would be unrealistic to ignore the influence of history in assessing the plausible implications of McCleskey's evidence. “[A]mericans share a historical experience that has resulted in individuals within the culture ubiquitously attaching a significance to race that is irrational and often outside their awareness.” Lawrence, The Id, The Ego, and Equal Protection: Reckoning with Unconscious Racism, 39 Stan. L. Rev. 317 (1987)....

The Court maintains that petitioner's claim “is antithetical to the fundamental role of discretion in our criminal justice system.”...

Reliance on race in imposing capital punishment, however, is antithetical to the very rationale for granting sentencing discretion. Discretion is a means, not an end....

Considering the race of a defendant or victim in deciding if the death penalty should be imposed is completely at odds with [the] concern that an individual be evaluated as a unique human being. Decisions influenced by race rest in part on a categorical assessment of the worth of human beings according to color, insensitive to whatever qualities the individuals in question may possess....

The Court next states that its unwillingness to regard the petitioner's evidence as sufficient is based in part on the fear that recognition of McCleskey's claim would open the door to widespread challenges to all aspects of criminal sentencing. Taken on its face, such a statement seems to suggest a fear of too much justice. Yet surely the majority would acknowledge that if striking evidence indicated that other minority groups, or women, or even persons with blond hair, were disproportionately sentenced to death, such a state of affairs would be repugnant to deeply rooted conceptions of fairness. The prospect that there may be more widespread abuse than McCleskey documents may be dismaying, but it does not justify complete abdication of our judicial role....

Note: Racial Disparities in Investigating, Charging, and Sentencing

1. The problem of selective insensitivity. Does the Court's formulation of the intent requirement in McCleskey adequately heed the risk that legislatures will be selectively indifferent to the welfare of politically powerless groups? Consider the following argument: Of course, the equal protection clause prohibits governmental action deliberately undertaken to harm racial and other minorities. But few laws are passed because legislators have a sadistic desire to inflict disabilities on these groups. The more common problem arises when the legislature is pursuing a neutral aim but, in doing so, is selectively indifferent to the welfare of certain groups. Thus, the question the McCleskey Court should have asked is not whether Georgia's capital punishment scheme was designed to harm African Americans, but rather whether the legislature would have been as willing to inflict the death penalty if most of the persons executed had been white. Compare Brest, Foreword: In Defense of the Antidiscrimination Principle, 90 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 6–8 (1976).

2. Questions of stereotypes and statistical validity. The Court returned to the problem of defining discriminatory purpose in a criminal justice context in United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456 (1996). Armstrong, an African American, had been charged with conspiring to possess with intent to distribute "crack" cocaine. He sought discovery from the prosecution to gather evidence supporting his claim that the government was not prosecuting similarly situated suspects of other races. The court of appeals upheld an order granting this request. In an eight-to-one decision the Supreme Court, per Chief Justice Rehnquist, reversed, holding that the defendant had failed to make a threshold showing:

To establish a discriminatory effect in a race case, the claimant must show that similarly situated individuals of a different race were not prosecuted....

[If] the claim of selective prosecution were well founded, it should not have been an insuperable task to prove that persons of other races were being treated differently than respondents....[We] think the required threshold—a credible showing of different treatment of similarly situated persons—adequately balances the Government's interest in vigorous prosecution and the defendant's interest in avoiding selective prosecution....

The Court of Appeals reached its decision in part because it started "with the presumption that people of all races commit all types of crimes—not with the premise that any type of crime is the exclusive province of any particular racial or ethnic group." It cited no authority for this proposition, which seems contradicted by the most recent statistics of the United States Sentencing Commission. Those statistics show that: More than 90% of the persons sentenced in 1994 for crack cocaine trafficking were black; 93.4% of convicted LSD dealers were white; and 91% of those convicted for pornography or prostitution were white. Presumptions at war with presumably reliable statistics have no proper place in the analysis of this issue.

Do statistics about racial differentials in sentencing and conviction refute claims of racial discrimination in prosecution? Even more fundamentally, do they undermine the court of appeals' presumption that levels of criminal behavior are similar? But even if these statistics are valid, how can the Court's position in Armstrong be reconciled with Batson and other cases holding that the constitutional prohibition against race discrimination prevents the state from relying on even accurate racial generalizations?

Note that Armstrong did not allege that the statutory penalties for possession and distribution of "crack" were influenced by the racial composition of the class charged with violating the statute. How should such a claim be evaluated?

For discussion of the question whether decisions to use race as part of the calculus in deciding when to make investigatory stops, see D. Cole, No Equal Justice: Race and Class in the American Criminal Justice System 24–38 (1999) (arguing that pretextual traffic stops are conducted in a pervasively discriminatory manner). Professor Cole notes that police stops yield essentially the same "hit rates"—searches that actually find evidence of criminal behavior—for both white and nonwhite motorists and argues that this suggests that levels of criminal behavior among whites and nonwhites are similar; thus the fact that nonwhite motorists are stopped at much higher rates is evidence of discrimination. In response, consider the observations in Banks, Beyond Profiling: Race, Policing, and the Drug War, 56 Stan. L. Rev. 571, 592–593 (2003), that the studies' findings "are also consistent with the possibility that the extensive investigation of racial minorities reflects their higher rates of criminal activity, along with officers' rational use of racial profiling." Finally, consider Harcourt, Rethinking Racial Profiling: A Critique of the Economics, Civil Liberties, and Constitutional Literature, and of Criminal Profiling More Generally, 71 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1275 (2004). Harcourt argues that data upon which current research rests is of little empirical use. Absent data regarding natural offending rates by racial group and the comparative elasticity of offending to policing, Harcourt suggests, it is difficult to articulate how racial profiling should be used in policing.

Regardless of the empirical debate, racial profiling—at least with respect to "ordinary" crime (as opposed to profiling related to interdiction of terrorists)—has been largely condemned by politicians and citizens across the spectrum. Banks, supra at 574–575, suggests this "attests to the cultural resonance of antidiscrimination claims inflected by tropes of irrationality and innocence. The campaign against racial profiling has converted varied bases of drug war opposition and concerns about police treatment of minorities into a morally compelling and politically potent constitutional claim of discrimination.”

3. Difficulties of proof connected to one-time decisionmakers. To what extent are cases involving the criminal justice system made more difficult to prove by the fact that so many decisions are delegated to low-level officials (such as individual police officers deciding whom to stop and investigate from among a universe of potential targets or individual assistants in a prosecutor’s office deciding against whom to exercise peremptory challenges in a series of cases)? Is this problem exacerbated in the McCleskey context by the fact that individual juries make only one decision and are not required (and indeed, in some states are affirmatively discouraged) from ever providing any reason for their decision? See Alschuler, The Supreme Court and the Jury: Voir Dire, Peremptory Challenges, and the Review of Jury Verdicts, 56 U. Chi. L. Rev. 153, 218–229 (1989) (discussing the various rules and decisions that limit inquiry into a jury’s deliberations). For some observations regarding the possible effects of judges’ race and sex on sentencing decisions, see Schanzenbach, Racial and Sex Disparities in Prison Sentences: The Effect of District-Level Judicial Demographics, 34 J. Legal Stud. 57 (2005).

In Pena-Rodriguez v. Colorado, 137 S. Ct. 855 (2017), the Court addressed the potential problem from a different angle. It held that the long-standing and widespread evidentiary rule that generally prohibits jurors from undermining the verdict by testifying as to statements made during deliberations must give way in cases where the testimony describes a clear statement by a juror that the juror relied on racial stereotypes or animus to convict a criminal defendant. During the deliberations in Pena-Rodriguez’s trial, one of the jurors stated “I think he did it because he’s Mexican and Mexican men take whatever they want,” and expressed his disbelief of the defendant’s alibi witness because the witness was “an illegal.” (In fact, the witness testified that he was a legal resident of the United States.) Justice Kennedy’s opinion for the Court pointed to the “imperative to purge racial prejudice from the administration of justice.”

“[T]he central purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to eliminate racial discrimination emanating from official sources in the States.” In the years before and after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, it became clear that racial discrimination in the jury system posed a particular threat both to the promise of the Amendment and to the integrity of the jury trial....

Permitting racial prejudice in the jury system damages “both the fact and the perception” of the jury’s role as “a vital check against the wrongful exercise of power by the State.”...

A constitutional rule that racial bias in the justice system must be addressed—including, in some instances, after the verdict has been entered—is necessary to prevent a systemic loss of confidence in jury verdicts, a confidence that is a central premise of the Sixth Amendment trial right.

Justice Thomas filed a brief dissent, finding it dispositive that “[our] common-law history does not establish that—in either 1791 (when the Sixth Amendment was ratified) or 1868 (when the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified)—a defendant had the right to impeach a verdict with juror testimony of juror misconduct.” Justice Alito, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Thomas, wrote a longer dissent. He took the position that no-impeachment rules served important interests and that impartiality among jurors was protected sufficiently by other mechanisms, such as voir dire and the use of extrinsic evidence. He also disputed the majority’s position that, as a matter of Sixth Amendment law, racial bias was different than other forms of bias, none of which justified relaxing the no-impeachment rule.

4. Questions of remedy. Suppose that the Court had decided McCleskey in favor of the defendant. What remedy would the Court order? Would a state’s decision to execute more individuals who killed black victims cure the equal protection violation? Consider Karlan, Race, Rights, and Remedies in Criminal Adjudication, 96 Mich. L. Rev. 2001, 2027–2028 (1998):

The general assumption in contemporary equal protection law, which seems to play out most of the time, is that faced with a finding of unconstitutionality, the state will remedy the inequality by providing the benefit to the previously excluded group (that is, by “levelling up”) rather than by depriving the previously included group (“levelling down”).....

Precisely because prosecution is the converse of most government goods, [defendants will seek] levelling down....

The problem with...mandating levelling up as a remedy instead, is that then no one will seek to vindicate the right: it is hard to imagine the defendant who would bring a selective-prosecution claim if the only available remedy is that his trial goes forward but someone else of a different race goes to prison as well. Misery loves company, but not that much.

3. Race-Specific Classifications Designed to Benefit Racial Minorities

The Supreme Court did not articulate and apply the requirement that racial classifications be subjected to strict scrutiny until the mid-1960s, in cases like McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184 (1964) (striking down a Florida statute that prohibited interracial cohabitation), and Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), reprinted at pages 536-538, supra. By then, the Court had already declared a wide range of racial classifications unconstitutional. And with only one exception—the California Department of Corrections’ use of a policy that temporarily assigned cellmates to inmates on the basis of race, see Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499 (2005), discussed at pages 546-547, supra—the Supreme Court has not decided an equal protection case since Loving in which the plaintiff was a member of a minority group who was challenging an explicit racial classification.

Instead, the modern equal protection cases involving explicit racial classifications have all involved challenges by nonminority plaintiffs to affirmative action programs. Over time, the Court came to hold that strict scrutiny should apply to these programs as well. This decision then raised a series of subsidiary questions. Which government purposes count as sufficiently “compelling” to justify using race? What constraints does the Constitution impose on the design and operation of affirmative action programs? More fundamentally, does strict scrutiny operate the same way across different areas of law? Should it?

Note: The Imposition of Strict Scrutiny

For roughly a generation, the Supreme Court struggled with the question whether to apply strict scrutiny to racial classifications designed to benefit minorities. Almost as soon as the Court completed the project of requiring strict scrutiny for all racial classifications by whatever level of government, however, the Court started subtly to transform the content of strict scrutiny.

1. Bakke. The Court’s first sustained encounter with affirmative action came in Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978), a case concerning the constitutionality of a program designed to increase minority enrollment at the University of California at Davis medical school. Under the program, sixteen of the school’s one hundred seats were set aside each year for members of specified minority groups found by a special committee to have suffered from economic or educational deprivation.

The case produced a splintered decision. Four justices (Brennan, White, Marshall, and Blackmun) would have upheld the program. They would have used an “intermediate” level of scrutiny somewhere between the rational basis test used for “ordinary” legislation and the strict scrutiny used for race-specific statutes that disadvantage minorities. As Justice Brennan explained:

[Because] of the significant risk that racial classifications established for ostensibly benign purposes can be misused, causing effects not unlike those created by invidious classifications, it is inappropriate to inquire only whether there is any conceivable basis that might sustain such a classification. Instead, to justify such a classification an important and articulated purpose for its use must be shown. In addition, any statute must be stricken that stigmatizes any group or that singles out those least well represented in the political process to bear the brunt of a benign program.

For this group of justices, the purpose of remedying the continuing effects of prior discrimination was valid and sufficiently important to satisfy this test. Since the use of race was reasonable in light of the program’s objectives, and since there was no evidence that the program stigmatized any individual or group, these justices would have upheld it.

Four other justices (Burger, Stewart, Rehnquist, and Stevens) thought that the program violated title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act and therefore would not have reached its constitutionality. (Title VI prohibits racial discrimination in programs receiving federal financial assistance.)

The Court’s judgment was controlled by Justice Powell, although in some respects he disagreed with all eight of his colleagues. Justice Powell took the position that all racial classifications—including those supposedly benefiting racial minorities—were suspect and should be subject to strict scrutiny. Although the state had a “legitimate and substantial” interest in remedying prior discrimination, that interest did not justify the Davis program because there had been no prior judicial, administrative, or legislative findings of such discrimination. Although the university’s interest in a diverse student body did justify some use of racial criteria in admission decisions, it did not justify Davis’s rigid, two-track system under which nonminority applicants were precluded from competing for certain seats. Hence, Justice Powell joined Justices Burger, Stewart, Rehnquist, and Stevens to hold that Bakke had been unconstitutionally denied admission under the existing Davis plan. However, he also joined Justices Brennan, Marshall, White, and Blackmun in refusing to enjoin all use of race in the future. Instead, he would have permitted an admissions program under which “race [was] deemed a ‘plus’ in a particular applicant’s file,” but did not insulate the individual from comparison with all other candidates for the available seats. [An] admissions program operated in this way is flexible enough to consider all pertinent elements of diversity in light of the particular qualifications of each applicant, and to place them on the same footing for consideration, although not necessarily according them the same weight.

Consider how Justice Powell's view—that achieving "diversity" is a permissible state interest justifying considerations of race—which, at the time of Bakke, no other Justice advanced, later became the dominant position.

2. Fullilove. Two years after Bakke, in Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448 (1980), the Court considered a federal affirmative action program. The results were again inconclusive. At issue was a provision of the Public Works Employment Act of 1977, which provided federal financial assistance to state and local governments to build public facilities. The act required that, absent an administrative waiver, 10 percent of the funds granted for the projects had to be used to procure services or supplies from "minority business enterprises" (MBEs)—defined as businesses owned or controlled by "citizens of the United States who are Negroes, Spanish-speaking, Orientals, Indians, Eskimos, and Aleuts." On this occasion, the Court upheld the program but, once again, no opinion attracted the votes of a majority of the justices.

In an opinion announcing the Court's judgment and joined by Justices White and Powell, Chief Justice Burger emphasized the narrowness of the holding. The plurality noted that "a program that employs racial or ethnic criteria, even in a remedial context, calls for close examination." Here, the program was constitutional, albeit reaching the outer limits of congressional authority. In reaching this conclusion, the plurality relied in part on the limited duration of the program, on Congress's unique authority under section 5 of the fourteenth amendment to devise remedial measures for racial discrimination, on the fact that no nonminority contractor was severely injured by the program, and on the fact that a waiver provision permitted deviation from the 10 percent requirement in cases where the increased costs of nonminority contractors could be shown not to be caused by prior discrimination.

In a concurring opinion, Justice Powell repeated his view that "[racial] classifications must be assessed under the most stringent level of review because immutable characteristics, which bear no relation to individual merit or need, are irrelevant to almost every governmental decision." In this case, however, he agreed with the plurality that the statute was "justified as a remedy that serves the compelling governmental interest in eradicating the continuing effects of past discrimination identified by Congress."

Justice Marshall, joined by Justices Brennan and Blackmun, also concurred. He argued that Congress had a sound basis for finding that minority firms were hampered by the continuing effects of past discrimination, and that the means chosen by Congress were substantially related to the achievement of this remedial purpose.

In a dissenting opinion joined by Justice Rehnquist, Justice Stewart asserted that “[under] our Constitution, the government may never act to the detriment of a person solely because of that person’s race.” Justice Stevens also dissented in an opinion that emphasized the absence of congressional deliberation.

3. Croson. In City of Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469 (1989), a majority of the Court held that state and local affirmative action programs should be subject to strict scrutiny. The Justices rejected a Richmond, Virginia, set-aside program modeled on the one upheld in Fullilove.

In an opinion joined in relevant part by Chief Justice Rehnquist, and Justices White and Kennedy, Justice O’Connor rejected the argument that Fullilove required deference to the city’s conclusion that race-conscious affirmative action was required. Far from principles of federalism supporting the city’s position, the constitutional structure in fact undercut the city’s claim:

What appellant ignores is that Congress, unlike any State or political subdivision, has a specific constitutional mandate to enforce the dictates of the Fourteenth Amendment. The power to “enforce” may at times also include the power to define situations which Congress determines threaten principles of equality and to adopt prophylactic rules to deal with those situations....

Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment is an explicit constraint on state power, and the States must undertake any remedial efforts in accordance with that provision. To hold otherwise would be to cede control over the content of the Equal Protection Clause to the 50 state legislatures and their myriad political subdivisions....

In his concurrence in the judgment, Justice Scalia elaborated on this point:

A sound distinction between federal and state (or local) action based on race rests not only upon the substance of the Civil War Amendments, but upon social reality and governmental theory....The struggle for racial justice has historically been a struggle by the national society against oppression in the individual States. And the struggle retains that character in modern times. Not all of that struggle has involved discrimination against blacks, and not all of it has been in the Old South. What the record shows, in other words, is that racial discrimination against any group finds a more ready expression at the state and local than at the federal level. To the children of the Founding Fathers, this should come as no surprise. An acute awareness of the heightened danger of oppression from political factions in small, rather than large, political units dates to the very beginning of our national history. As James Madison observed in support of the proposed Constitution's enhancement of national powers:

The smaller the society, the fewer probably will be the distinct parties and interests composing it; the fewer the distinct parties and interests, the more frequently will a majority be found of the same party; and the smaller the number of individuals composing a majority, and the smaller the compass within which they are placed, the more easily will they concert and execute their plan of oppression. Extend the sphere and you take in a greater variety of parties and interests; you make it less probable that a majority of the whole will have a common motive to invade the rights of other citizens; or if such a common motive exists, it will be more difficult for all who feel it to discover their own strength and to act in unison with each other.

The Federalist No. 10, 82-84 (C. Rossiter ed., 1961).

Both Justice O'Connor and Justice Scalia also emphasized that a majority of the Richmond City Council was black. Consider the relevance of this point to the question whether the plan was remedial or simply represented a contemporary version of spoils politics.

Turning to the question whether strict scrutiny should apply, Justice O'Connor's plurality opinion disputed the proposition that strict scrutiny was unnecessary in cases involving benign uses of race:

[The] Richmond Plan denies certain citizens the opportunity to compete for a fixed percentage of public contracts based solely upon their race. To whatever racial group these citizens belong, their "personal rights" to be treated with equal dignity and respect are implicated by a rigid rule erecting race as the sole criterion in an aspect of public decisionmaking.

Absent searching judicial inquiry into the justification for such race-based measures, there is simply no way of determining what classifications are "benign" or "remedial" and what classifications are in fact motivated by illegitimate notions of racial inferiority or simple racial politics. Indeed, the purpose of strict scrutiny is to "smoke out" illegitimate uses of race by assuring that the legislative body is pursuing a goal important enough to warrant use of a highly suspect tool.

Applying strict scrutiny to Richmond's program, Justice O'Connor concluded that the program failed both prongs of the strict scrutiny inquiry. First, although remedying the city's own prior unconstitutional discrimination might serve as a compelling state purpose, Justice O'Connor rejected the idea that remedying the effects of "past societal discrimination" could serve as a compelling state interest.

To accept Richmond's claim that past societal discrimination alone can serve as the basis for rigid racial preferences would be to open the door to competing claims for "remedial relief" for every disadvantaged group. The dream of a Nation of equal citizens in a society where race is irrelevant to personal opportunity and achievement would be lost in a mosaic of shifting preferences based on inherently unmeasurable claims of past wrongs. [We] think such a result would be contrary to both the letter and spirit of a constitutional provision whose central command is equality.

Second, with respect to the question whether Richmond's plan was narrowly tailored, Justice O'Connor, now delivering an opinion for the Court, observed that there does not appear to have been any consideration of the use of race-neutral means to increase minority business participation in city contracting. Many of the barriers to minority participation in the construction industry relied upon by the city to justify a racial classification appear to be race neutral. If MBEs disproportionately lack capital or cannot meet bonding requirements, a race-neutral program of city financing for small firms would, a fortiori, lead to greater minority participation.

Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun dissented. Consistent with their views in Bakke, they would have applied a form of intermediate scrutiny. Justice Marshall's dissent, which all three joined, argued that Richmond had "two powerful interests" justifying its set-aside program: "The first is the city's interest in eradicating the effects of past racial discrimination. It is far too late in the day to doubt that remedying such discrimination is a compelling, let alone an important, interest....[A] second compelling interest" consisted in "the prospective one of preventing the city's own spending decisions from reinforcing and perpetuating the exclusionary effects of past discrimination." The dissenters thought Richmond's own experience undercut the notion that race-neutral means could achieve substantial minority participation and that the choice of the 30 percent figure was appropriate given the city's overall population.

Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena

515 U.S. 200 (1995)

JUSTICE O'CONNOR announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion with respect to Parts I, II, III-A, III-B, III-D, and IV, which is for the Court except insofar as it might be inconsistent with the views expressed in Justice Scalia's concurrence, and an opinion with respect to Part III-C in which JUSTICE KENNEDY joins.

Petitioner Adarand Constructors, Inc., claims that the Federal Government's practice of giving general contractors on government projects a financial incentive to hire subcontractors controlled by "socially and economically disadvantaged individuals," and in particular, the Government's use of race-based presumptions in identifying such individuals, violates the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The Court of Appeals rejected Adarand's claim. We conclude, however, that courts should analyze cases of this kind under a different standard of review than the one the Court of Appeals applied. We therefore vacate the Court of Appeals' judgment and remand the case for further proceedings.

I

In 1989, the Central Federal Lands Highway Division (CFLHD), which is part of the United States Department of Transportation (DOT), awarded the prime contract for a highway construction project in Colorado to Mountain Gravel & Construction Company. Mountain Gravel then solicited bids from subcontractors for the guardrail portion of the contract. Adarand, a Colorado-based highway construction company specializing in guardrail work, submitted the low bid. Gonzales Construction Company also submitted a bid.

The prime contract's terms provide that Mountain Gravel would receive additional compensation if it hired subcontractors certified as small businesses controlled by "socially and economically disadvantaged individuals." Gonzales is certified as such a business; Adarand is not. Mountain Gravel awarded the subcontract to Gonzales, despite Adarand's low bid, and Mountain Gravel's Chief Estimator has submitted an affidavit stating that Mountain Gravel would have accepted Adarand's bid, had it not been for the additional payment it received by hiring Gonzales instead. Federal law requires that a subcontracting clause similar to the one used here must appear in most federal agency contracts, and it also requires the clause to state that “the contractor shall presume that socially and economically disadvantaged individuals include Black Americans, Hispanic Americans, Native Americans, Asian Pacific Americans, and other minorities, or any other individual found to be disadvantaged by the [Small Business] Administration pursuant to section 8(a) of the Small Business Act.” Adarand claims that the presumption set forth in that statute discriminates on the basis of race in violation of the Federal Government’s Fifth Amendment obligation not to deny anyone equal protection of the laws....

The Government urges that “the Subcontracting Compensation Clause program is...a program based on disadvantage, not on race,” and thus that it is subject only to “the most relaxed judicial scrutiny.” To the extent that the statutes and regulations involved in this case are race neutral, we agree. The Government concedes, however, that “the race-based rebuttable presumption used in some certification determinations under the Subcontracting Compensation Clause” is subject to some heightened level of scrutiny. The parties disagree as to what that level should be....

Adarand’s claim arises under the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution, which provides that “No person shall...be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.” Although this Court has always understood that Clause to provide some measure of protection against arbitrary treatment by the Federal Government, it is not as explicit a guarantee of equal treatment as the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides that “No State shall...deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.” Our cases have accorded varying degrees of significance to the difference in the language of those two Clauses....

[T]he Court’s cases through Croson had established three general propositions with respect to governmental racial classifications. First, skepticism: “any preference based on racial or ethnic criteria must necessarily receive a most searching examination.” Second, consistency: “the standard of review under the Equal Protection Clause is not dependent on the race of those burdened or benefited by a particular classification.” And third, congruence: “equal protection analysis in the Fifth Amendment area is the same as that under the Fourteenth Amendment.” Taken together, these three propositions lead to the conclusion that any person, of whatever race, has the right to demand that any governmental actor subject to the Constitution justify any racial classification subjecting that person to unequal treatment under the strictest judicial scrutiny.

[Accordingly,] we hold today that all racial classifications, imposed by whatever federal, state, or local governmental actor, must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny. In other words, such classifications are constitutional only if they are narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests....

[In dissent,] Justice Stevens chides us for our “supposed inability to differentiate between ‘invidious’ and ‘benign’ discrimination,” because it is in his view sufficient that “people understand the difference between good intentions and bad.” But, [the] point of strict scrutiny is to “differentiate between” permissible and impermissible governmental use of race. And Justice Stevens himself has already explained in his dissent in Fullilove why “good intentions” alone are not enough to sustain a supposedly “benign” racial classification: “Even though it is not the actual predicate for this legislation, a statute of this kind inevitably is perceived by many as resting on an assumption that those who are granted this special preference are less qualified in some respect that is identified purely by their race. Because that perception—especially when fostered by the Congress of the United States—can only exacerbate rather than reduce racial prejudice, it will delay the time when race will become a truly irrelevant, or at least insignificant, factor. Unless Congress clearly articulates the need and basis for a racial classification, and also tailors the classification to its justification, the Court should not uphold this kind of statute.” Fullilove (dissenting opinion)....

Perhaps it is not the standard of strict scrutiny itself, but our use of the concepts of “consistency” and “congruence” in conjunction with it, that leads Justice Stevens to dissent. According to Justice Stevens, our view of consistency “equates remedial preferences with invidious discrimination,” and ignores the difference between “an engine of oppression” and an effort “to foster equality in society,” or, more colorfully, “between a ‘No Trespassing’ sign and a welcome mat.” It does nothing of the kind. The principle of consistency simply means that whenever the government treats any person unequally because of his or her race, that person has suffered an injury that falls squarely within the language and spirit of the Constitution’s guarantee of equal protection. It says nothing about the ultimate validity of any particular law; that determination is the job of the court applying strict scrutiny. The principle of consistency explains the circumstances in which the injury requiring strict scrutiny occurs. The application of strict scrutiny, in turn, determines whether a compelling governmental interest justifies the infliction of that injury....

D

Finally, we wish to dispel the notion that strict scrutiny is “strict in theory, but fatal in fact.” Fullilove (Marshall, J., concurring in judgment). The unhappy persistence of both the practice and the lingering effects of racial discrimination against minority groups in this country is an unfortunate reality, and government is not disqualified from acting in response to it. When race-based action is necessary to further a compelling interest, such action is within constitutional constraints if it satisfies the “narrow tailoring” test this Court has set out in previous cases....

JUSTICE SCALIA, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

I join the opinion of the Court,...except insofar as it may be inconsistent with the following: In my view, government can never have a “compelling interest” in discriminating on the basis of race in order to “make up” for past racial discrimination in the opposite direction. Individuals who have been wronged by unlawful racial discrimination should be made whole; but under our Constitution there can be no such thing as either a creditor or a debtor race. That concept is alien to the Constitution’s focus upon the individual, [and] its rejection of dispositions based on [race]. To pursue the concept of racial entitlement—even for the most admirable and benign of purposes—is to reinforce and preserve for future mischief the way of thinking that produced race slavery, race privilege and race hatred. In the eyes of government, we are just one race here. It is American....

JUSTICE THOMAS, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

I agree with the majority’s conclusion that strict scrutiny applies to all government classifications based on race. I write separately, however, to express my disagreement with the premise underlying Justice Stevens’ and Justice Ginsburg’s dissents: that there is a racial paternalism exception to the principle of equal protection. I believe that there is a “moral [and] constitutional equivalence,” (Stevens, J., dissenting), between laws designed to subjugate a race and those that distribute benefits on the basis of race in order to foster some current notion of equality. Government cannot make us equal; it can only recognize, respect, and protect us as equal before the law.

That these programs may have been motivated, in part, by good intentions cannot provide refuge from the principle that under our Constitution, the government may not make distinctions on the basis of race....

These programs not only raise grave constitutional questions, they also undermine the moral basis of the equal protection principle. Purchased at the price of immeasurable human suffering, the equal protection principle reflects our Nation's understanding that such classifications ultimately have a destructive impact on the individual and our society. Unquestionably, "invidious [racial] discrimination is an engine of oppression." It is also true that "remedial" racial preferences may reflect "a desire to foster equality in society." But there can be no doubt that racial paternalism and its unintended consequences can be as poisonous and pernicious as any other form of discrimination. So-called "benign" discrimination teaches many that because of chronic and apparently immutable handicaps, minorities cannot compete with them without their patronizing indulgence. Inevitably, such programs engender attitudes of superiority or, alternatively, provoke resentment among those who believe that they have been wronged by the government's use of race. These programs stamp minorities with a badge of inferiority and may cause them to develop dependencies or to adopt an attitude that they are "entitled" to preferences....

In my mind, government-sponsored racial discrimination based on benign prejudice is just as noxious as discrimination inspired by malicious prejudice. In each instance, it is racial discrimination, plain and simple.

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE GINSBURG joins, dissenting....

The Court's concept of "consistency" assumes that there is no significant difference between a decision by the majority to impose a special burden on the members of a minority race and a decision by the majority to provide a benefit to certain members of that minority notwithstanding its incidental burden on some members of the majority. In my opinion that assumption is untenable. There is no moral or constitutional equivalence between a policy that is designed to perpetuate a caste system and one that seeks to eradicate racial subordination. Invidious discrimination is an engine of oppression, subjugating a disfavored group to enhance or maintain the power of the majority. Remedial race-based preferences reflect the opposite impulse: a desire to foster equality in society. No sensible conception of the Government's constitutional obligation to "govern impartially," should ignore this distinction....

The consistency that the Court espouses would disregard the difference between a “No Trespassing” sign and a welcome mat. It would treat a Dixiecrat Senator’s decision to vote against Thurgood Marshall’s confirmation in order to keep African Americans off the Supreme Court as on a par with President Johnson’s evaluation of his nominee’s race as a positive factor. It would equate a law that made black citizens ineligible for military service with a program aimed at recruiting black soldiers....

The Court’s explanation for treating dissimilar race-based decisions as though they were equally objectionable is a supposed inability to differentiate between “invidious” and “benign” discrimination. But the term “affirmative action” is common and well understood. Its presence in everyday parlance shows that people understand the difference between good intentions and bad. As with any legal concept, some cases may be difficult to classify, but our equal protection jurisprudence has identified a critical difference between state action that imposes burdens on a disfavored few and state action that benefits the few “in spite of its adverse effects on the many.” Feeney....

Moreover, the Court may find that its new “consistency” approach to race-based classifications is difficult to square with its insistence upon rigidly separate categories for discrimination against different classes of individuals. For example, as the law currently stands, the Court will apply “intermediate scrutiny” to cases of invidious gender discrimination and “strict scrutiny” to cases of invidious race discrimination, while applying the same standard for benign classifications as for invidious ones. [The Court’s articulation of an “intermediate” standard of review in cases of gender discrimination is discussed at pages 645-653, infra.] If this remains the law, then today’s lecture about “consistency” will produce the anomalous result that the Government can more easily enact affirmative-action programs to remedy discrimination against women than it can enact affirmative-action programs to remedy discrimination against African Americans—even though the primary purpose of the Equal Protection Clause was to end discrimination against the former slaves. When a court becomes preoccupied with abstract standards, it risks sacrificing common sense at the altar of formal consistency.

The Court’s concept of “congruence” assumes that there is no significant difference between a decision by the Congress of the United States to adopt an affirmative-action program and such a decision by a State or a municipality. In my opinion that assumption is untenable. It ignores important practical and legal differences between federal and state or local decisionmakers....

[Federal] affirmative-action programs represent the will of our entire Nation's elected representatives, whereas a state or local program may have an impact on nonresident entities who played no part in the decision to enact it. Thus, in the state or local context, individuals who were unable to vote for the local representatives who enacted a race-conscious program may nonetheless feel the effects of that program. This difference recalls the goals of the Commerce Clause, which permits Congress to legislate on certain matters of national importance while denying power to the States in this area for fear of undue impact upon out-of-state residents....

Note: The Constitutionality of “Benign” Racial Classifications

Adarand and Croson establish that “benign” racial classifications, like those that harm racial minorities, are subject to strict scrutiny. The decisions leave uncertain, however, the exact nature of this scrutiny, as well as the kinds of justifications that will count as “compelling” government interests.

1. The level of scrutiny for classifications that benefit racial minorities. Recall the justifications for strict scrutiny for race-based classifications that harm racial minorities, discussed at pages 540-544, supra. Which, if any, of these arguments apply to affirmative action measures?

a. Text and original intent. By its terms, the fourteenth amendment says nothing about heightened review for racial classifications. As noted previously, see pages 475-476, supra, the original impetus for passage of the amendment was a desire to expand the scope of congressional power to enact the nineteenth-century analogue of affirmative action measures. For a discussion, see Schnapper, Affirmative Action and the Legislative History of the Fourteenth Amendment, 71 Va. L. Rev. 753 (1985). Congress wished to lay a firm constitutional grounding for Reconstruction statutes that had the specific purpose of benefiting and protecting the newly freed slaves. There is also a sense in which the amendment was designed to restrict judicial power. Members of the Reconstruction Congress feared that the Supreme Court would invalidate the 1866 Civil Rights Act and adopted the fourteenth amendment so as to avoid that result. In light of this history, is there an originalist justification for strict scrutiny of affirmative action measures?

b. Race consciousness. Do affirmative action measures merit strict scrutiny because of “the basic principle that the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution protect persons, not groups”? Adarand, supra. The Court’s statement cannot be taken literally in light of its regular application of low-level scrutiny to statutes that use group characteristics to categorize people in nonracial contexts. Perhaps, though, there are special dangers associated with group generalizations based on race

c. History. Does the fact that whites as a group have not suffered from a history of discrimination justify a lower standard of review for statutes disadvantaging them? Consider Lempert, The Force of Irony: On the Morality of Affirmative Action and United Steelworkers v. Weber, 95 Ethics 86, 89 (1984):

[A] claim made by a white person as a member of the dominant majority draws its moral force largely from our collective horror at centuries of oppressing black people. It would be ironic indeed if evils visited on blacks had lent enough force to the moral claims of whites to prevent what appears to many at this point to be the most effective means of eliminating the legacy of those evils.

Might not the same history be characterized as demonstrating the evils of racial discrimination regardless of the race against which it is directed?

d. Political process. Does the fact that whites have “adequate” political power justify a lower level of scrutiny when laws disadvantage them? Consider Ely, The Constitutionality of Reverse Racial Discrimination, 41 U. Chi. L. Rev. 723, 735–736 (1974):

When the group that controls the decision making process classifies so as to advantage a minority and disadvantage itself, the reasons for being unusually suspicious, and, consequently, employing a stringent brand of review are lacking. A White majority is unlikely to disadvantage itself for reasons of racial prejudice; nor is it likely to be tempted either to underestimate the needs and deserts of Whites relative to those of others, or to overestimate the cost of devising an alternative classification that would extend to certain Whites the advantages generally extended to Blacks....

Is it a necessary implication of this view that a race-conscious program might be constitutional if adopted by a city council dominated by whites but unconstitutional if adopted by a city council like Richmond’s with a black majority? If the arguments for affirmative action are ultimately persuasive, why should it matter who is persuaded by them?

Does Ely's argument unrealistically assume that affirmative action disadvantages a monolithic white majority capable of protecting itself politically? Consider Greenberg, Affirmative Action in Higher Education: Confronting the Condition and Theory, 43 B.C. L. Rev. 521, 537 (2002):

In Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, the Supreme Court had never been informed that U.C. Davis's Dean personally admitted about a half-dozen applicants each year, including children of rich and influential physicians who had been rejected or wait-listed by the office of admissions. Allan Bakke challenged U.C. Davis's affirmative action program on the ground that it denied him a place in the incoming class; the identical criticism could have been made of the Dean's special admissions program.

e. "Innocent victims." It is sometimes argued that "benign" discrimination should be strictly scrutinized because it disadvantages individuals on the basis of immutable characteristics when those individuals are not themselves responsible for the evil to be corrected. Is it persuasive to insist on a general rule that the government should not disadvantage "innocent" individuals even when doing so promotes the general welfare? Does a merit-based system for dispensing scarce resources satisfy this requirement? Consider Karst and Horowitz, Affirmative Action and Equal Protection, 60 Va. L. Rev. 955, 962 (1974):

Whether "merit" be defined in terms of demonstrated achievement or of potential achievement, it includes a large and hard-to-isolate ingredient of native talents. These talents resemble race in that they are beyond the control of the individual whose "merit" is being evaluated. If racial classifications are "suspect" partly for this reason, then it may be appropriate to insist that public rewards for native talents be justified by a showing of compelling necessity.

Is the "innocent victims" argument merely an artifact of an unduly narrow conception of the purposes of affirmative action programs? If, for example, the purpose of affirmative action is not to remedy past discrimination (particularly past discrimination against the beneficiaries of the affirmative action program), but rather to create integrated institutions for the future, would white claims of "innocence" count for less?

f. Identifying affirmative action. Is strict scrutiny for affirmative action programs necessary because, without such scrutiny, "there is simply no way of determining what classifications are 'benign' or 'remedial'"? Croson, supra.

In this respect, consider Justice Kennedy's observation in Metro Broadcasting v. FCC, 497 U.S. 547 (1990). There, the Court upheld FCC policies that gave a preference to minority-owned companies in competitions for new broadcast licenses and permitted sales of existing licenses to minority-owned companies under circumstances where other sales would be precluded.

In dissent, Justice Kennedy wrote:

The Court also justifies its result on the ground that "Congress and the Commission have determined that there may be important differences between the broadcasting practices of minority owners and those of their nonminority counterparts." The Court is all too correct that the type of reasoning employed by the Commission and Congress is not novel. Policies of racial separation and preference are almost always justified as benign, even when it is clear to any sensible observer that they are not. The following statement, for example, would fit well among those offered to uphold the Commission's racial preference policy: "The policy is not based on any concept of superiority or inferiority, but merely on the fact that people differ, particularly in their group associations, loyalties, cultures, outlook, modes of life and standards of development." See South Africa and the Rule of Law 37 (1968) (official publication of the South African Government).

2. Justifications for affirmative action. Under the strict scrutiny that Adarand and Croson require, "benign" classifications will be upheld only if they are narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling government interest. What interests are compelling? Remedy past discrimination? Assuring some prospective allocation of benefits and burdens? Complying with federal statutes that themselves go beyond constitutional prohibitions on purposeful racial discrimination to forbid practices with a racially disparate impact? Achieving representation of various groups or diversity within a government-sponsored program? These issues are fleshed out in several cases discussed in the remainder of this section.

3. Empirical questions. To what extent does the dispute about affirmative action turn on disagreement about empirical questions? For example, opponents and proponents of affirmative action may disagree about whether affirmative action helps or hurts its intended beneficiaries, about whether it increases or decreases racial antagonism, and about whether a "color-blind" regime eliminates or perpetuates discrimination.

For an excellent summary of the social psychological literature bearing on these and other questions, see Krieger, Civil Rights Perestroika: Intergroup Relations after Affirmative Action, 86 Cal. L. Rev. 1251, 1264, 1267–1268, 1294, 1331 (1998). According to Krieger, there is reason for concern that at least certain types of affirmative action may harm intended beneficiaries. The evidence that affirmative action produces self-derogating effects is mixed and largely depends on how the program is described and implemented. The effects of such programs on nonbeneficiaries are more troublesome. For example:

In one group of studies, experimenters asked subjects to evaluate the qualifications of people supposedly selected for employment or admission to programs of higher education. Researchers indirectly informed subjects in one condition that the selecting institution had an affirmative action program. In a second condition, researchers made no mention of affirmative action. Subjects in the “affirmative action” condition consistently rated the files of selected women and minorities as reflecting lower levels of competence, qualification, and accomplishment than did subjects evaluating identical files in the “non-affirmative action” condition....

Absent some explanatory theory, the presence of women or minorities [in positions] [indicating] high levels of ability and accomplishment would disconfirm a variety of inconsistent, negative racial or gender stereotypes. [Preferential] selection, however, provides a plausible situational attribution for the stereotype-inconsistent information. Once female or minority presence in “high places” is attributed to preferential selection rather than to merit-related factors, pre-existing negative stereotypes are insulated from the potentially disconfirming effect of the otherwise stereotype disconfirming data.

To some degree these negative effects can be mitigated by programs that take into account both “merit” and group membership, by emphasizing a pattern of discrimination against the group in describing the programs, and by avoiding numerical quotas.

Krieger concludes that

[for] better or for worse, the application of insights from social cognition and social identity theory complicates rather than simplifies the affirmative action debate. On the one hand, there is reason to fear that preferential forms of affirmative action, at least in some contexts, may indeed exacerbate intergroup tensions and perpetuate rather than reduce subtle forms of intergroup bias. [On] the other hand, insights derived from these fields suggest that we are not yet ready to abandon preferential forms of affirmative action for the simple reason that we have nothing adequate with which to replace them.

For a detailed and mostly positive empirical study of the effects of affirmative action in higher education, see W. Bowen and D. Bok, The Shape of the River (1998).

How, if at all, do you think that such studies should affect the constitutional issue? For criticism of Bowen and Bok's study, see, e.g., Sandalow, Minority Preferences Reconsidered, 97 Mich. L. Rev. 1874 (1999).

Grutter v. Bollinger

JUSTICE O'CONNOR delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case requires us to decide whether the use of race as a factor in student admissions by the University of Michigan Law School [is] unlawful.

I

[The Law School's admission policy required admissions officials to evaluate each applicant based upon the entire file, including a personal statement, letters of recommendation, and an essay. Admissions officers were directed to take into account undergraduate grades and LSAT scores, but the policy made clear that no score led to either automatic admission or rejection. Instead, officials also looked to "soft variables" such as the enthusiasm of recommenders or the areas and difficulty of undergraduate course selection. The policy also emphasized diversity of various sorts. In this connection, the policy reaffirmed the Law School's commitment to "racial and ethnic diversity with special reference to the inclusion of students from groups which have been historically discriminated against, like African-Americans, Hispanics and Native Americans, who without this commitment might not be represented in our student body in meaningful numbers."]

[Grutter, a white resident of Michigan whose application to the Law School was rejected, brought suit claiming that she had not been admitted because the Law School had relied on race in violation of the equal protection clause.]

Since this Court's splintered decision in Bakke, Justice Powell's opinion announcing the judgment of the Court has served as the touchstone for constitutional analysis of race-conscious admissions policies. Public and private universities across the Nation have modeled their own admissions programs on Justice Powell's views on permissible race-conscious policies....

[For] the reasons set out below, today we endorse Justice Powell's view that student body diversity is a compelling state interest that can justify the use of race in university admissions.

We have held that all racial classifications imposed by government "must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny." [Adarand]....

Although all governmental uses of race are subject to strict scrutiny, not all are invalidated by it. [When] race-based action is necessary to further a compelling governmental interest, such action does not violate the constitutional guarantee of equal protection so long as the narrow-tailoring requirement is also satisfied....

[W]e turn to the question whether the Law School's use of race is justified by a compelling state interest. [The] Law School asks us to recognize, in the context of higher education, a compelling state interest in student body diversity.

We first wish to dispel the notion that the Law School's argument has been foreclosed, either expressly or implicitly, by our affirmative-action cases decided since Bakke. [We] have never held that the only governmental use of race that can survive strict scrutiny is remedying past discrimination....

The Law School's educational judgment that such diversity is essential to its educational mission is one to which we defer. The Law School's assessment that diversity will, in fact, yield educational benefits is substantiated by respondents and their amici. Our scrutiny of the interest asserted by the Law School is no less strict for taking into account complex educational judgments in an area that lies primarily within the expertise of the university. Our holding today is in keeping with our tradition of giving a degree of deference to a university's academic decisions, within constitutionally prescribed limits.

As part of its goal of "assembling a class that is both exceptionally academically qualified and broadly diverse," the Law School seeks to "enroll a 'critical mass' of minority students." The Law School's interest is not simply "to assure within its student body some specified percentage of a particular group merely because of its race or ethnic origin.” [Bakke (opinion of Powell, J.)]. That would amount to outright racial balancing, which is patently unconstitutional.... Rather, the Law School’s concept of critical mass is defined by reference to the educational benefits that diversity is designed to produce.

These benefits are substantial. As the District Court emphasized, the Law School’s admissions policy promotes “cross-racial understanding,” helps to break down racial stereotypes, and “enables [students] to better understand persons of different races.” These benefits are “important and laudable,” because “classroom discussion is livelier, more spirited, and simply more enlightening and interesting” when the students have “the greatest possible variety of backgrounds.”

The Law School’s claim of a compelling interest is further bolstered by its amici, who point to the educational benefits that flow from student body diversity....

These benefits are not theoretical but real, as major American businesses have made clear that the skills needed in today’s increasingly global marketplace can only be developed through exposure to widely diverse people, cultures, ideas, and viewpoints. Brief for 3M et al. as Amici Curiae; Brief for General Motors Corp. as Amicus Curiae. What is more, high-ranking retired officers and civilian leaders of the United States military assert that, “[b]ased on [their] decades of experience,” a “highly qualified, racially diverse officer corps...is essential to the military’s ability to fulfill its principle mission to provide national security.” The primary sources for the Nation’s officer corps are the service academies and the Reserve Officers Training Corps (ROTC) the latter comprising students already admitted to participating colleges and universities. At present, “the military cannot achieve an officer corps that is both highly qualified and racially diverse unless the service academies and the ROTC used limited race-conscious recruiting and admissions policies.” (emphasis in original)....

Moreover, universities, and in particular, law schools, represent the training ground for a large number of our Nation’s leaders. Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629, 634 (1950) (describing law school as a “proving ground for legal learning and practice”). Individuals with law degrees occupy roughly half the state governorships, more than half the seats in the United States Senate, and more than a third of the seats in the United States House of Representatives. The pattern is even more striking when it comes to highly selective law schools. A handful of these schools accounts for 25 of the 100 United States Senators, 74 United States Courts of Appeals judges, and nearly 200 of the more than 600

United States District Court judges.

In order to cultivate a set of leaders with legitimacy in the eyes of the citizenry, it is necessary that the path to leadership be visibly open to talented and qualified individuals of every race and ethnicity. All members of our heterogeneous society must have confidence in the openness and integrity of the educational institutions that provide this training. As we have recognized, law schools “cannot be effective in isolation from the individuals and institutions with which the law interacts.” See Sweatt v. Painter. Access to legal education (and thus the legal profession) must be inclusive of talented and qualified individuals of every race and ethnicity, so that all members of our heterogeneous society may participate in the educational institutions that provide the training and education necessary to succeed in America....

To be narrowly tailored, a race-conscious admissions program cannot use a quota system—it cannot “insulat[e] each category of applicants with certain desired qualifications from competition with all other applicants.” Bakke (opinion of Powell, J.). Instead, a university may consider race or ethnicity only as a “‘plus’ in a particular applicant’s file, without ‘insulat[ing]’ the individual from comparison with all other candidates for the available seats.”...

The Law School’s goal of attaining a critical mass of underrepresented minority students does not transform its program into a quota. As the Harvard plan described by Justice Powell recognized, there is of course “some relationship between numbers and achieving the benefits to be derived from a diverse student body, and between numbers and providing a reasonable environment for those students admitted.” [Bakke]. “[Some] attention to numbers,” without more, does not transform a flexible admissions system into a rigid quota. Nor, as Justice Kennedy posits, does the Law School’s consultation of the “daily reports,” which keep track of the racial and ethnic composition of the class (as well as of residency and gender), “suggest[] there was no further attempt at individual review save for race itself during the final stages of the admissions process. To the contrary, the Law School’s admissions officers testified without contradiction that they never gave race any more or less weight based on the information contained in these reports. Moreover, as Justice Kennedy concedes, between 1993 and 2000, the number of African-American, Latino, and Native-American students in each class at the Law School varied from 13.5 to 20.1 percent, a range inconsistent with a quota....

Here, the Law School engages in a highly individualized, holistic review of each applicant's file, giving serious consideration to all the ways an applicant might contribute to a diverse educational environment. The Law School affords this individualized consideration to applicants of all races. There is no policy, either de jure or de facto, of automatic acceptance or rejection based on any single "soft" variable. Unlike the program at issue in Gratz v. Bollinger [discussed at pages 595–598, infra], the Law School awards no mechanical, predetermined diversity "bonuses" based on race or ethnicity....

We also find that, like the Harvard plan Justice Powell referenced in Bakke, the Law School's race-conscious admissions program adequately ensures that all factors that may contribute to student body diversity are meaningfully considered alongside race in admissions decisions. With respect to the use of race itself, all underrepresented minority students admitted by the Law School have been deemed qualified. By virtue of our Nation's struggle with racial inequality, such students are both likely to have experiences of particular importance to the Law School's mission, and less likely to be admitted in meaningful numbers on criteria that ignore those experiences.

The Law School does not, however, limit in any way the broad range of qualities and experiences that may be considered valuable contributions to student body diversity. To the contrary, the 1992 policy makes clear "[t]here are many possible bases for diversity admissions," and provides examples of admittees who have lived or traveled widely abroad, are fluent in several languages, have overcome personal adversity and family hardship, have exceptional records of extensive community service, and have had successful careers in other fields....

What is more, the Law School actually gives substantial weight to diversity factors besides race. The Law School frequently accepts nonminority applicants with grades and test scores lower than underrepresented minority applicants (and other nonminority applicants) who are rejected.

Petitioner and the United States argue that the Law School's plan is not narrowly tailored because race-neutral means exist to obtain the educational benefits of student body diversity that the Law School seeks. We disagree. Narrow tailoring does not require exhaustion of every conceivable race-neutral alternative. Nor does it require a university to choose between maintaining a reputation for excellence or fulfilling a commitment to provide educational opportunities to members of all racial groups. Narrow tailoring does, however, require serious, good faith consideration of workable race-neutral alternatives that will achieve the diversity the university seeks.

We agree with the Court of Appeals that the Law School sufficiently considered workable race-neutral alternatives. The District Court took the Law School to task for failing to consider race-neutral alternatives such as “using a lottery system” or “decreasing the emphasis for all applicants on undergraduate GPA and LSAT scores.” But these alternatives would require a dramatic sacrifice of diversity, the academic quality of all admitted students, or both.

The Law School’s current admissions program considers race as one factor among many, in an effort to assemble a student body that is diverse in ways broader than race. Because a lottery would make that kind of nuanced judgment impossible, it would effectively sacrifice all other educational values, not to mention every other kind of diversity. So too with the suggestion that the Law School simply lower admissions standards for all students, a drastic remedy that would require the Law School to become a much different institution and sacrifice a vital component of its educational mission. The United States advocates “percentage plans,” recently adopted by public undergraduate institutions in Texas, Florida, and California to guarantee admission to all students above a certain class-rank threshold in every high school in the State. The United States does not, however, explain how such plans could work for graduate and professional schools. Moreover, even assuming such plans are race-neutral, they may preclude the university from conducting the individualized assessments necessary to assemble a student body that is not just racially diverse, but diverse along all the qualities valued by the university....

We are mindful, however, that “[a] core purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to do away with all governmentally imposed discrimination based on race.” Palmore v. Sidoti. Accordingly, race-conscious admissions policies must be limited in time....

In the context of higher education, the durational requirement can be met by sunset provisions in race-conscious admissions policies and periodic reviews to determine whether racial preferences are still necessary to achieve student body diversity. Universities in California, Florida, and Washington State, where racial preferences in admissions are prohibited by state law, are currently engaged in experimenting with a wide variety of alternative approaches. Universities in other States can and should draw on the most promising aspects of these race-neutral alternatives as they develop....

We take the Law School at its word that it would “like nothing better than to find a race-neutral admissions formula” and will terminate its race-conscious admissions program as soon as practicable. It has been 25 years since Justice Powell first approved the use of race to further an interest in student body diversity in the context of public higher education. Since that time, the number of minority applicants with high grades and test scores has indeed increased. We expect that 25 years from now, the use of racial preferences will no longer be necessary to further the interest approved today....

JUSTICE GINSBURG, with whom JUSTICE BREYER joins, concurring....

It is well documented that conscious and unconscious race bias, even rank discrimination based on race, remain alive in our land, impeding realization of our highest values and ideals. As to public education, data for the years 2000–2001 show that 71.6% of African-American children and 76.3% of Hispanic children attended a school in which minorities made up a majority of the student body. And schools in predominantly minority communities lag far behind others measured by the educational resources available to them.

However strong the public's desire for improved education systems may be, it remains the current reality that many minority students encounter markedly inadequate and unequal educational opportunities. Despite these inequalities, some minority students are able to meet the high threshold requirements set for admission to the country's finest undergraduate and graduate educational institutions. As lower school education in minority communities improves, an increase in the number of such students may be anticipated. From today's vantage point, one may hope, but not firmly forecast, that over the next generation's span, progress toward nondiscrimination and genuinely equal opportunity will make it safe to sunset affirmative action.

I do not believe, however, that the University of Michigan Law School's [means] are narrowly tailored to the interest it asserts. The Law School claims it must take the steps it does to achieve a "critical mass" of underrepresented minority students. But its actual program bears no relation to this asserted goal. Stripped of its "critical mass" veil, the Law School's program is revealed as a naked effort to achieve racial balancing....

From 1995 through 2000, the Law School admitted between 1,130 and 1,310 students. Of those, between 13 and 19 were Native American, between 91 and 108 were African-Americans, and between 47 and 56 were Hispanic. If the Law School is admitting between 91 and 108 African-Americans in order to achieve "critical mass," thereby preventing African-American students from feeling "isolated or like spokespersons for their race," one would think that a number of the same order of magnitude would be necessary to accomplish the same purpose for Hispanics and Native Americans. Similarly, even if all of the Native American applicants admitted in a given year matriculate, which the record demonstrates is not at all the case, how can this possibly constitute a "critical mass” of Native Americans in a class of over 350 students?...

Only when the “critical mass” label is discarded does a likely explanation for these numbers emerge....

[The] correlation between the percentage of the Law School’s pool of applicants who are members of the three minority groups and the percentage of the admitted applicants who are members of these same groups is far too precise to be dismissed as merely the result of the school paying “some attention to [the] numbers.”...

JUSTICE KENNEDY, dissenting....

The Court’s refusal to apply meaningful strict scrutiny will lead to serious consequences. By deferring to the law schools’ choice of minority admissions programs, the courts will lose the talents and resources of the faculties and administrators in devising new and fairer ways to ensure individual consideration. Constant and rigorous judicial review forces the law school faculties to undertake their responsibilities as state employees in this most sensitive of areas with utmost fidelity to the mandate of the Constitution. [By contrast, under Michigan’s system, one witness] testified that faculty members were “breathtakingly cynical” in deciding who would qualify as a member of underrepresented minorities. An example he offered was faculty debate as to whether Cubans should be counted as Hispanics: One professor objected on the grounds that Cubans were Republicans. Many academics at other law schools who are “affirmative action’s more forthright defenders readily concede that diversity is merely the current rationale of convenience for a policy that they prefer to justify on other grounds.” Schuck, Affirmative Action: Past, Present, and Future, 20 Yale L. & Pol’y Rev. 1, 34 (2002) (citing Levinson, Diversity, 2 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 573, 577–578 (2000); Rubenfeld, Affirmative Action, 107 Yale L.J. 427, 471 (1997)). This is not to suggest the faculty at Michigan or other law schools do not pursue aspirations they consider laudable and consistent with our constitutional traditions. It is but further evidence of the necessity for scrutiny that is real, not feigned, where the corrosive category of race is a factor in decisionmaking....

JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom JUSTICE THOMAS joins, concurring in part and dissenting in part....

The “educational benefit” that the University of Michigan seeks to achieve by racial discrimination consists, according to the Court, of “cross-racial understanding,” and “better prepar[ation of] students for an increasingly diverse workforce and society,” all of which is necessary not only for work, but also for good “citizenship.” This is not, of course, an “educational benefit” on which students will be graded on their Law School transcript (Works and Plays Well with Others: B+) or tested by the bar examiners (Q: Describe in 500 words or less your cross-racial understanding). For it is a lesson of life rather than law—essentially the same lesson taught to (or rather learned by, for it cannot be “taught” in the usual sense) people three feet shorter and twenty years younger than the full-grown adults at the University of Michigan Law School, in institutions ranging from Boy Scout troops to public-school kindergartens. If properly considered an “educational benefit” at all, it is surely not one that is either uniquely relevant to law school or uniquely “teachable” in a formal educational setting. And therefore: If it is appropriate for the University of Michigan Law School to use racial discrimination for the purpose of putting together a “critical mass” that will convey generic lessons in socialization and good citizenship, surely it is no less appropriate—indeed, particularly appropriate—for the civil service system of the State of Michigan to do so. There, also, those exposed to “critical masses” of certain races will presumably become better Americans, better Michiganders, better civil servants. And surely private employers cannot be criticized—indeed, should be praised—if they also “teach” good citizenship to their adult employees through a patriotic, all-American system of racial discrimination in hiring. The nonminority individuals who are deprived of a legal education, a civil service job, or any job at all by reason of their skin color will surely understand.

Unlike a clear constitutional holding that racial preferences in state educational institutions are impermissible, or even a clear unconstitutional holding that racial preferences in state educational institutions are OK, today’s Grutter-Gratz split double header seems perversely designed to prolong the controversy and the litigation....

JUSTICE THOMAS, with whom JUSTICE SCALIA joins as to Parts I–VII, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

Frederick Douglass, speaking to a group of abolitionists almost 140 years ago, delivered a message lost on today’s majority:

[I]n regard to the colored people, there is always more that is benevolent, I perceive, than just, manifested towards us. What I ask for the negro is not benevolence, not pity, not sympathy, but simply justice. The American people have always been anxious to know what they shall do with us....I have had but one answer from the beginning. Do nothing with us! Your doing with us has already played the mischief with us. Do nothing with us! If the apples will not remain on the tree of their own strength, if they are worm-eaten at the core, if they are early ripe and disposed to fall, let them fall!...And if the negro cannot stand on his own legs, let him fall also. All I ask is, give him a chance to stand on his own legs! Let him alone!...[Y]our interference is doing him positive injury.

What the Black Man Wants: An Address Delivered in Boston, Massachusetts, on 26 January 1865, reprinted in 4 The Frederick Douglass Papers 59, 68 (J. Blassingame & J. McKivigan eds. 1991) (emphasis in original).

Like Douglass, I believe blacks can achieve in every avenue of American life without the meddling of university administrators....

No one would argue that a university could set up a lower general admission standard and then impose heightened requirements only on black applicants. Similarly, a university may not maintain a high admission standard and grant exemptions to favored races. The Law School, of its own choosing, and for its own purposes, maintains an exclusionary admissions system that it knows produces racially disproportionate results. Racial discrimination is not a permissible solution to the self-inflicted wounds of this elitist admissions policy.

The majority agrees that the Law School's racial discrimination should be subjected to strict scrutiny....

Where the Court has accepted only national security, [Korematsu] and rejected even the best interests of a child, [Palmore v. Sidoti] as a justification for racial discrimination, I conclude that only those measures the State must take to provide a bulwark against anarchy, or to prevent violence, will constitute a "pressing public necessity."...

B

Under the proper standard, there is no pressing public necessity in maintaining a public law school at all and, it follows, certainly not an elite law school. Likewise, marginal improvements in legal education do not qualify as a compelling state interest.

While legal education at a public university may be good policy or otherwise laudable, it is obviously not a pressing public necessity when the correct legal standard is applied. Additionally, circumstantial evidence as to whether a state activity is of pressing public necessity can be obtained by asking whether all States feel compelled to engage in that activity. [In] this sense, the absence of a public, American Bar Association (ABA) accredited, law school in Alaska, Delaware, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, provides further evidence that Michigan's maintenance of the Law School does not constitute a compelling state interest.

[Still,] even assuming that a State may, under appropriate circumstances, demonstrate a cognizable interest in having an elite law school, Michigan has failed to do so here.

This Court has limited the scope of equal protection review to interests and activities that occur within that State's jurisdiction....

The only cognizable state interests vindicated by operating a public law school are, therefore, the education of that State's citizens and the training of that State's lawyers....

The Law School today, however, does precious little training of those attorneys who will serve the citizens of Michigan. [Less] than 16% of the Law School's graduating class elects to stay in Michigan after law school....

It does not take a social scientist to conclude that it is precisely the Law School's status as an elite institution that causes it to be a way-station for the rest of the country's lawyers, rather than a training ground for those who will remain in Michigan. The Law School's decision to be an elite institution does little to advance the welfare of the people of Michigan or any cognizable interest of the State of Michigan....

IV...

With the adoption of different admissions methods, such as accepting all students who meet minimum qualifications, the Law School could achieve its vision of the racially aesthetic student body without the use of racial discrimination....

The Court's deference to the Law School's conclusion that its racial experimentation leads to educational benefits will, if adhered to, have serious collateral consequences. The Court relies heavily on social science evidence to justify its deference. The Court never acknowledges, however, the growing evidence that racial (and other sorts) of heterogeneity actually impairs learning among black students. [Justice Thomas cites studies showing that black students attending historically black colleges (HBCs) report higher academic achievement than those attending predominantly white colleges.]...

The majority grants deference to the Law School's "assessment that diversity will, in fact, yield educational benefits." It follows, therefore, that an HBC's assessment that racial homogeneity will yield educational benefits would similarly be given deference. An HBC's rejection of white applicants in order to maintain racial homogeneity seems permissible, therefore, under the majority's view of the Equal Protection Clause....Contained within today's majority opinion is the seed of a new constitutional justification for a concept I thought long and rightly rejected—racial segregation....

The sky has not fallen at Boalt Hall at the University of California, Berkeley. Prior to Proposition 209's adoption of Cal. Const. Art. 1, §31(a), which bars the State from "grant[ing] preferential treatment...on the basis of race...in the operation of...public education," Boalt Hall enrolled 20 blacks and 28 Hispanics in its first-year class for 1996. In 2002, without deploying express racial discrimination in admissions, Boalt's entering class enrolled 14 blacks and 36 Hispanics. Total underrepresented minority student enrollment at Boalt Hall now exceeds 1996 levels. Apparently the Law School cannot be counted on to be as resourceful. The Court is willfully blind to the very real experience in California and elsewhere, which raises the inference that institutions with "reputation[s] for excellence" rivaling the Law School's have satisfied their sense of mission without resorting to prohibited racial discrimination.

Putting aside the absence of any legal support for the majority's reflexive deference, there is much to be said for the view that the use of tests and other measures to "predict" academic performance is a poor substitute for a system that gives every applicant a chance to prove he can succeed in the study of law.

The rallying cry that in the absence of racial discrimination in admissions there would be a true meritocracy ignores the fact that the entire process is poisoned by numerous exceptions to “merit.” For example, in the national debate on racial discrimination in higher education admissions, much has been made of the fact that elite institutions utilize a so-called “legacy” preference to give the children of alumni an advantage in admissions. This, and other, exceptions to a “true” meritocracy give the lie to protestations that merit admissions are in fact the order of the day at the Nation’s universities. The Equal Protection Clause does not, however, prohibit the use of unseemly legacy preferences or many other kinds of arbitrary admissions procedures. What the Equal Protection Clause does prohibit are classifications made on the basis of race. So while legacy preferences can stand under the Constitution, racial discrimination cannot. I will not twist the Constitution to invalidate legacy preferences or otherwise impose my vision of higher education admissions on the Nation. The majority should similarly stay its impulse to validate faddish racial discrimination the Constitution clearly forbids.

In any event, there is nothing ancient, honorable, or constitutionally protected about “selective” admissions. The University of Michigan should be well aware that alternative methods have historically been used for the admission of students, for it brought to this country the German certificate system in the late-19th century....Under this system, a secondary school was certified by a university so that any graduate who completed the course offered by the school was offered admission to the university. The certification regime supplemented, and later virtually replaced (at least in the Midwest), the prior regime of rigorous subject-matter entrance examinations. The facially race-neutral “percent plans” now used in Texas, California, and Florida are in many ways the descendants of the certificate system.

Certification was replaced by selective admissions in the beginning of the 20th century, as universities sought to exercise more control over the composition of their student bodies. Since its inception, selective admissions has been the vehicle for racial, ethnic, and religious tinkering and experimentation by university administrators. The initial driving force for the relocation of the selective function from the high school to the universities was the same desire to select racial winners and losers that the Law School exhibits today. Columbia, Harvard, and others infamously determined that they had “too many” Jews, just as today the Law School argues it would have “too many” whites if it could not discriminate in its admissions process.

Columbia employed intelligence tests precisely because Jewish applicants, who were predominantly immigrants, scored worse on such tests....

Similarly no modern law school can claim ignorance of the poor performance of blacks, relatively speaking, on the Law School Admissions Test (LSAT). Nevertheless, law schools continue to use the test and then attempt to “correct” for black underperformance by using racial discrimination in admissions so as to obtain their aesthetic student body. The Law School’s continued adherence to measures it knows produce racially skewed results is not entitled to deference by this Court. The Law School itself admits that the test is imperfect, as it must, given that it regularly admits students who score at or below 150 (the national median) on the test....

Having decided to use the LSAT, the Law School must accept the constitutional burdens that come with this decision. The Law School may freely continue to employ the LSAT and other allegedly merit-based standards in whatever fashion it likes. What the Equal Protection Clause forbids, but the Court today allows, is the use of these standards hand-in-hand with racial discrimination. An infinite variety of admissions methods are available to the Law School. Considering all of the radical thinking that has historically occurred at this country’s universities, the Law School’s intractable approach toward admissions is striking....

VI...

I believe what lies beneath the Court’s decision today are the benighted notions that one can tell when racial discrimination benefits (rather than hurts) minority groups, and that racial discrimination is necessary to remedy general societal ills.

I must contest the notion that the Law School’s discrimination benefits those admitted as a result of it....

The Law School tantalizes unprepared students with the promise of a University of Michigan degree and all of the opportunities that it offers. These overmatched students take the bait, only to find that they cannot succeed in the cauldron of competition. And this mismatch crisis is not restricted to elite institutions. Indeed, to cover the tracks of the aestheticists, this cruel farce of racial discrimination must continue—in selection for the Michigan Law Review, see University of Michigan Law School Student Handbook 2002–2003, pp. 39–40 (noting the presence of a “diversity plan” for admission to the review), and in hiring at law firms and for judicial clerkships—until the “beneficiaries” are no longer tolerated. While these students may graduate with law degrees, there is no evidence that they have received a qualitatively better legal education (or become better lawyers) than if they had gone to a less “elite” law school for which they were better prepared. And the aestheticists will never address the real problems facing “underrepresented minorities,” instead continuing their social experiments on other people’s children....

It is uncontested that each year, the Law School admits a handful of blacks who would be admitted in the absence of racial discrimination. Who can differentiate between those who belong and those who do not? The majority of blacks are admitted to the Law School because of discrimination, and because of this policy all are tarred as undeserving....When blacks take positions in the highest places of government, industry, or academia, it is an open question today whether their skin color played a part in their advancement. The question itself is the stigma....

For the immediate future, [the] majority has placed its imprimatur on a practice that can only weaken the principle of equality embodied in the Declaration of Independence and the Equal Protection Clause. “Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens.” Plessy v. Ferguson (Harlan, J., dissenting). It has been nearly 140 years since Frederick Douglass asked the intellectual ancestors of the Law School to “[d]o nothing with us!” and the Nation adopted the Fourteenth Amendment. Now we must wait another 25 years to see this principle of equality [vindicated].

Note: The Contemporary Application of Strict Scrutiny

1. What counts as a compelling interest? The Court’s opinion in Grutter rests on the conclusion that diversity in higher education—particularly in law schools—constitutes a compelling state interest. At the same time, the Court seems to abandon a retrospective, remedial justification for affirmative action in favor of a prospective, diversity-based rationale. Jeffries describes this as a significant shift. He locates its origins in Justice Powell’s opinion in Bakke:

Powell saw little prospect that the compensatory rationale would place any meaningful limit on the duration of [racial] preferences. Powell thought of affirmative action as a transition, a short-term departure from the ideal of color-blindness justified only by pressing necessity. Allowing minority set-asides to continue until all effects of past societal discrimination had been eliminated might mean they would last forever.

Powell therefore crafted an approach designed both to permit affirmative action and to constrain it. He wanted to allow racial preferences in higher education while preserving the grounds for objecting to them, to permit race-conscious admissions under current conditions without conceding their long-term future. In short, he wanted to say “yes” now, while implying “no” later....

Diversity was a softer and more fluid concept. It directed attention to participation rather than to compensation, to the importance of some, though not necessarily perfect, representation from all groups. Because diversity was a less ambitious goal, it could plausibly be the sooner achieved. Most important, diversity put the justification for racial preferences squarely on improving the educational experience of all students, rather than on helping a favored few....

Jeffries, Bakke Revisited, 2003 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1, 6–7.

Does the diversity rationale extend beyond higher education to other government decisions, such as government employment? Consider Professor Guinier’s view:

The task of constituting each [entering] class [at a selective public institution] is a political act because it implicates the institution’s sense of itself as a community, as well as the larger society’s sense of itself as a democracy. Such acts allocate resources in a way that affects those who are admitted to the institution, those who are rejected, those who fail to apply, and those who simply use the institution’s selection criteria as an interpretive guide. Thus, they affect all members of society, both directly, as described above, and indirectly, by helping determine future political, economic, and social leaders. Directly or indirectly, taxpayers support these institutions, which function as gateways to upward mobility and help legitimize democratic ideals of participation, fairness, and equal opportunity.

Guinier, Admissions Rituals as Political Acts: Guardians at the Gates of Our Democratic Ideals, 117 Harv. L. Rev. 113, 135 (2003). Consider also Post:

In contrast to Powell’s opinion in Bakke, Grutter does not offer an account of the intrinsic value of the educational process. It instead conceives of education as instrumental for the achievement of extrinsic social goods like professionalism, citizenship, or leadership. It follows from this way of conceptualizing the problem that the Law School can have a compelling interest in using diversity to facilitate the attainment of these social goods only if there is an independently compelling interest in the actual attainment of these goods. Grutter’s justifications for diversity thus potentially reach far more widely than do

Powell's....

Post, Foreward: Fashioning the Legal Constitution: Culture, Courts, and Law, 117 Harv. L. Rev. 4, 60, 62–63 (2003). In thinking about the extent of the diversity and citizenship rationales, consider the Court’s later decision in Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1, 551 U.S. 701 (2007), which appears at pages 616-632, infra. There, the Court struck down two public school systems’ policies of taking race into account in assigning students to particular schools. In his opinion for the Court, Chief Justice Roberts wrote that public school assignment policies “are not governed by Grutter” because Grutter “relied upon considerations unique to institutions of higher education, noting that in light of ‘the expansive freedoms of speech and thought associated with the university environment, universities occupy a special niche in our constitutional tradition.’” By contrast, in dissent, Justice Breyer emphasized as part of his view that the school districts had a compelling interest in taking race into account that “there is a democratic element: an interest in producing an educational environment that reflects the ‘pluralistic society’ in which our children will live. It is an interest in helping our children learn to work and play together with children of different racial backgrounds. It is an interest in teaching children to engage in the kind of cooperation among Americans of all races that is necessary to make a land of three hundred million people one Nation.”

For criticism of the diversity argument, see Lawrence, Two Views of the River: A Critique of the Liberal Defense of Affirmative Action, 101 Colum. L. Rev. 928 (2001), which argues that “supporters of affirmative action have used the diversity argument to defend affirmative action at elite universities and law schools without questioning the ways that traditional admissions criteria continue to perpetuate race and class privilege.”

2. Who decides what counts as a compelling interest? Note that the Court explicitly defers to the law school’s determination that diversity constitutes a compelling interest. Is such deference to the defendant’s views appropriate in deciding what counts as a compelling interest? Could another state conclude that diversity is not a weighty interest? Note that several states have forbidden consideration of race by state institutions as a matter of state constitutional law. In Schuette v. Coalition to Defend Affirmative Action, 134 S. Ct. 1623 (2014), the Supreme Court upheld such a prohibition against constitutional attack. Why was the Court prepared to defer to educational administrators in Grutter when it was skeptical of city council members in Croson?

Is there something distinctive about the very process of higher education that led the Court to defer here when it held in Adarand that “skepticism” is a core principle of equal protection review?

3. The role of race in the admissions process. The Court’s opinion places great weight on the fact that the law school was using a “holistic” admissions process. What does this mean? In what ways does this process differ from the contracting processes at issue in Croson and Adarand? Is it that the fact of “merit” or “desert” is more contested or more complicated in the context of higher education admissions than in government contracting? Consider:

[The] affirmative action cases that produced [the Supreme Court’s] embrace of strict scrutiny—Croson and Adarand—involved the highly formal and thus somewhat atypical practice of competitive bidding. In competitive bidding, anonymity is easy to achieve, and, assuming the bid meets the specifications, bids can be ranked against each other along one entirely quantifiable dimension, namely, price....

[In] higher education, elite institutions could rely entirely on a few raw or mechanically adjusted numbers....At most elite institutions, however, it would be possible to produce entering classes with vastly different characteristics, each made up entirely of well-qualified students. The numbers themselves, even when adjusted, may offer a spurious precision with respect to particular applicants. A school...may decide that a variety of other factors beyond standardized test scores and grade point averages will enhance its various missions. In that regard, it might decide, even in the complete absence of racial considerations, to take into account factors such as geographic diversity, choice of specialization, distinctive extra-curricular experiences, nonquantifiable evidence that an applicant’s future promise is not adequately signaled by her past performance, and the like. Moreover, along [somewhat more] vaguely venal lines..., a school may decide to grant preferences to children of alumni or other financial or political supporters....

The reasons for going beyond the numbers are both “pluralist” and “republican.” Within the institution, using multidimensional admissions criteria may be important for programmatic purposes....In the broader world, the institution’s continued vitality may depend on there being broad political support for its mission.

Karlan, Easing the Spring: Strict Scrutiny and Affirmative Action After the Redistricting Cases, 43 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 1569, 1578, 1596–1597 (2002).

4. The efficacy of law school affirmative action. In the wake of Grutter, Sander offered a different critique of race-conscious affirmative action in law schools, claiming that black students admitted to law school through racial preferences are disadvantaged in the long term. As a result of affirmative action, Sander argues, black students are subject to an “academic mismatch”: They have significantly lower credentials (LSAT scores and undergraduate grades) than students admitted without regard to race. Mismatched students, Sander argues, are less likely to perform well in law school (where instruction will be pitched toward students with better academic preparation), less likely to graduate, and less likely to pass the bar:

[The] absolute number of black law graduates passing the bar on their first attempt—an achievement important both for a lawyer’s self-esteem and for success in the legal market—would be much larger under a race-blind regime than under the current system of preferences....[The] elimination of racial preferences would put blacks into schools where they were perfectly competitive with all other students—and that would lead to dramatically higher performance in law school and on the bar. Black students’ grades, graduation rates, and bar passage rates would all converge toward white students’ rates. The overall rate of blacks graduating from law school and passing the bar on their first attempt would rise from...45%...to somewhere between 64% and 70%. Conversely, the black students excluded by a switch to a race-blind system have such weak academic credentials that they add only a comparative handful of attorneys to total national production.

Sander, A Systemic Analysis of Affirmative Action in American Law Schools, 57 Stan. L. Rev. 367, 474 (2004). Sander’s empirical methods, as well as the conclusions he draws from his data sets, have been extensively criticized. One study found that students with the same LSAT score, undergraduate GPA, and gender performed similarly on the bar regardless of which law school they attended and concluded that “[while] it is true that similarly qualified black students get lower grades as a result of going to a higher-tier school, they perform equally well on the bar irrespective of law school tier.” Ho, Why Affirmative Action Does Not Cause Black Students to Fail the Bar, 114 Yale L.J. 1997, 2004 (2005). Another study found a “reverse mismatch” effect: For both white and black students, attending a higher-tier school was positively correlated with ultimately becoming a lawyer. Ayres and Brooks, Does Affirmative Action Reduce the Number of Black Lawyers?, 57 Stan. L. Rev. 1807, 1824–1825 (2005); see also Alon and Tienda, Assessing the “Mismatch” Hypothesis: Differential in College Graduation Rates by Institutional Selectivity, 78 Soc. Educ. 295 (2005) (finding that the likelihood of minority students graduating from college increases as the selectivity of the institution attended rises). For other empirical critiques of Sander's work, see, e.g., Harris and Kidder, The Black Student Mismatch Myth in Legal Education: The Systemic Flaws in Richard Sander's Affirmative Action Study, J. Blacks Higher Educ. 103 (Winter 2005); Johnson and Onwuachi-Willig, Cry Me a River: The Limits of "A Systemic Analysis of Affirmative Action in American Law Schools," 7 Afr.-Am. L. & Poly. Rep. 1 (2005).

Consider two goals of affirmative action: promoting diversity and remedying past wrongs. To what extent is Sander's argument useful in addressing these goals? In this regard, consider Wilkins, A Systematic Response to Systemic Disadvantage: A Response to Sander, 57 Stan. L. Rev. 1915, 1938 (2005):

Sander treats the success of the black graduates from elite law schools as if this were solely a benefit to the individuals involved. This seriously underestimates the importance of developing a viable black elite. Blacks who have achieved positions of power and influence in the legal profession, most of whom, as we have seen, are graduates of elite law schools, have played a critical role in opening the doors of opportunity for other black lawyers. Black partners routinely serve on hiring committees, form organizations dedicated to improving the hiring and retention of minority lawyers, and devote countless hours to mentoring black associates and law students. As many blacks have left law firms for in-house counsel positions, these newly minted purchasing agents have sought to use their new positions of authority to distribute work to minority lawyers and to press firms to report their progress on diversity and improve upon it.

Additionally, Sander recommends that schools make their admissions policies "transparent," so students can consider the grades and scores of students in their demographic group and make informed decisions about their chances of success at a particular law school. Do you agree? Would making this information more available serve the goals of affirmative action? Compare Ayres and Brooks, supra, at 1851 (suggesting better disclosure might be beneficial), with Wilkins, supra, at 1955–1959 (suggesting greater disclosure might undermine the goals of affirmative action).

5. What counts as narrow tailoring? Does Grutter significantly ease the tailoring inquiry? Note the Court's rejection of the idea that race-neutral means are always more narrowly tailored than race-conscious programs. Does this depend on the idea that the state is pursuing many goals simultaneously? Justices Scalia and Thomas criticize the majority by noting that the law school could achieve racial diversity quite easily if it simply abandoned its reliance on selection criteria that have a differential impact.

GRATZ v. BOLLINGER, 539 U.S. 244 (2003). This companion case to Grutter perhaps clarified the tailoring inquiry. The case concerned admissions to the undergraduate college of liberal arts and sciences at the University of Michigan. The University ranked college applicants according to a 150-point scale. Students receiving over 100 points were generally admitted, while those receiving under 75 points were generally delayed or rejected. Applicants received points based upon factors like high school grade point average, standardized test scores, the academic quality of an applicant's high school, in-state residency, and alumni relationships. Up to 110 points could be assigned for academic performance, and up to 40 points could be assigned for the other, nonacademic factors. Michigan residents, for example, received 10 points, and children of alumni received 4. Counselors could assign an outstanding essay up to 3 points and could award up to 5 points for an applicant's personal achievement, leadership, or public service. An applicant automatically received a 20-point bonus if he or she possessed any one of the following "miscellaneous" factors: membership in an underrepresented minority group; attendance at a predominantly minority or disadvantaged high school; or recruitment for athletics.

This point system was supplemented by the review of some applications by an Admissions Review Committee (ARC). Under this system, some applications were "flagged" for review by the Committee if it was determined that the applicant was academically prepared to succeed at the University, had received a minimum index score, and possessed characteristics important to the University's composition of its freshman class, such as high class rank, unique life experiences, challenges, circumstances, interests or talents, socioeconomic disadvantage, or underrepresented race, ethnicity, or geography. The Committee reviewed "flagged" applications individually and determined whether to admit or deny each applicant.

Chief Justice Rehnquist delivered the opinion of the Court: "Justice Powell's opinion in Bakke emphasized the importance of considering each particular applicant as an individual, assessing all of the qualities that individual possesses, and in turn, evaluating that individual's ability to contribute to the unique setting of higher education....

"The [challenged] policy does not provide such individualized consideration. The [policy] automatically distributes 20 points to every single applicant from an 'underrepresented minority' group, as defined by the University. The only consideration that accompanies this distribution of points is a factual review of an application to determine whether an individual is a member of one of these minority groups. Moreover, unlike Justice Powell's example, where the race of a 'particular black applicant' could be considered without being decisive, see Bakke, the [University's] automatic distribution of 20 points has the effect of making 'the factor of race...decisive' for virtually every minimally qualified underrepresented minority applicant.

"Respondents emphasize the fact that the [college] has created the possibility of an applicant's file being flagged for individualized consideration by the ARC.

"But the fact that the 'review committee can look at the applications individually and ignore the points,' once an application is flagged, is of little comfort under our strict scrutiny analysis. The record does not reveal precisely how many applications are flagged for this individualized consideration, but it is undisputed that such consideration is the exception and not the [rule]. Additionally, this individualized review is only provided after admissions counselors automatically distribute the University's version of a 'plus' that makes race a decisive factor for virtually every minimally qualified underrepresented minority applicant.

"Respondents contend that '[t]he volume of applications and the presentation of applicant information make it impractical for [the College] to use the... admissions system' upheld by the Court today in Grutter. But the fact that the implementation of a program capable of providing individualized consideration might present administrative challenges does not render constitutional an otherwise problematic system."

Justice O'Connor wrote a concurring opinion: "Although the Office of Undergraduate Admissions does assign 20 points to some 'soft' variables other than race, the points available for other diversity contributions, such as leadership and service, personal achievement, and geographic diversity, are capped at much lower levels. Even the most outstanding national high school leader could never receive more than five points for his or her accomplishments —a mere quarter of the points automatically assigned to an underrepresented minority solely based on the fact of his or her race. Of course, as Justice Powell made clear in Bakke, a university need not 'necessarily accord[d]' all diversity factors 'the same weight,' and the 'weight attributed to a particular quality may vary from year to year depending on the "mix" both of the student body and the applicants for the incoming class.' But the selection index, by setting up automatic, predetermined point allocations for the soft variables, ensures that the diversity contributions of applicants cannot be individually assessed. This policy stands in sharp contrast to the law school's admissions plan, which enables admissions officers to make nuanced judgments with respect to the contributions each applicant is likely to make to the diversity of the incoming class."

Justices Thomas and Breyer also wrote concurring opinions.

Justice Souter, joined by Justice Ginsburg, dissented: "The record does not describe a system with a quota like the one struck down in Bakke, which 'insulate[d]' all nonminority candidates from competition from certain seats. [The] Bakke plan 'focused solely on ethnic diversity' and effectively told nonminority applicants that '[n]o matter how strong their qualifications, quantitative and extracurricular, including their own potential for contribution to educational diversity, they are never afforded the chance to compete with applicants from the preferred [groups].'

"The plan here, in contrast, lets all applicants compete for all places and values an applicant's offerings for any place not solely on the grounds of [race]. A nonminority applicant who scores highly in [other] categories can readily garner a selection index exceeding that of a minority applicant who gets the 20-point bonus....

"[In] contrast to the college's forthrightness in saying just what plus factor it gives for membership in an underrepresented minority, it is worth considering the character of one alternative thrown up as preferable, because supposedly not based on race. Drawing on admissions systems used at public universities in California, Florida, and Texas, the United States contends that Michigan could get student diversity [by] guaranteeing admission to a fixed percentage of the top students from each high school in Michigan.

"While there is nothing unconstitutional about such a practice, it nonetheless suffers from a serious disadvantage. It is the disadvantage of deliberate obfuscation. The 'percentage plans' are just as race conscious as the point system (and fairly so), but they get their racially diverse results without saying directly what they are doing or why they are doing it. In contrast, Michigan states its purpose directly and, if this were a doubtful case for me, I would be tempted to give Michigan an extra point of its own for its frankness. Equal protection cannot become an exercise in which the winners are the ones who hide the ball."

Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justice Souter, also dissented: "The stain of generations of racial oppression is still visible in our society, and the determination to hasten its removal remains vital. One can reasonably anticipate, therefore, that colleges and universities will seek to maintain their minority enrollment—and the networks and opportunities thereby opened to minority graduates—whether or not they can do so in full candor through adoption of affirmative action plans of the kind here at issue. Without recourse to such plans, institutions of higher education may resort to camouflage. For example, schools may encourage applicants to write of their cultural traditions in the essays they submit, or to indicate whether English is their second language. Seeking to improve their chances for admission, applicants may highlight the minority group associations to which they belong, or the Hispanic surnames of their mothers or grandparents. In turn, teachers' recommendations may emphasize who a student is as much as what he or she has accomplished. If honesty is the best policy, surely Michigan's accurately described, fully disclosed College affirmative action program is preferable to achieving similar numbers through winks, nods, and disguises."

In an opinion joined by Justice Souter, Justice Stevens dissented on the ground that the plaintiffs lacked standing.

Note: Scrutiny of Means

1. The significance of candor. Is the only difference between the law school and the undergraduate plans the frankness with which they admit the salience of race? Is holistic, individualized review necessarily less troubling than more mechanical processes? Or, to the contrary, does "mechanical decision making" better "restrain[] the state in its race consciousness"? See Rodriguez, Against Individualized Consideration, 83 Ind. L.J. 1405, 1409 (2008).

Are there methods of achieving the goals of affirmative action without utilizing facially racial classifications? Consider S. Cashin, Place Not Race: A New Vision of Opportunity in America xix (2014):

The rub for proponents of affirmative action is that as long as they hold on to race as the sine qua non of diversity, they stymie possibilities for transformative change. The civil rights community, for example, expends energy on a policy that primarily benefits the most advantaged children of color, while contributing to a divisive politics that makes it difficult to create quality K-12 education for all children. [The] next generation of diversity strategies should encourage rather than discourage cross-racial alliances and social mobility. [Meaningful] diversity can be achieved if institutions rethink exclusionary practices, cultivate strivers from overlooked places, and give special consideration to highly qualified applicants of all races that have had to overcome structural disadvantages like segregation.

In this regard, consider the history of affirmative action at the University of Texas. After the Fifth Circuit held in Hopwood v. Texas, 78 F.3d 932 (5th Cir. 1996), that the University of Texas's consideration of race in its admissions process violated the equal protection clause because it did not further a compelling government interest, the Texas legislature adopted a measure known as the Top Ten Percent Law. That statute granted automatic admission to the University (as well as other public institutions) to all students from Texas high schools who are in the top 10 percent of their class. The plan was expressly designed, in part, to enable the admission of black and Latino students, and took advantage of the fact that pervasive segregation in K-12 education guaranteed there would be a significant pool of black and Latino students graduating at the top of their classes. Following the Supreme Court's decision in Grutter, the University adopted an additional admissions program in which race was one factor taken into account in admitting the portion of the entering class that was not admitted under the Top Ten Percent Law.

Was the Top Ten Percent plan, standing alone, constitutionally unproblematic?

The Court's subsequent decisions addressing the combined plan are discussed on pages 601-607, infra.

2. Deference to means? The Supreme Court deferred to institutions' decisions about whether racial diversity is a compelling interest. By contrast, when it comes to the means of pursuing that racial diversity, the Supreme Court has been less deferential. In Fisher v. University of Texas, 133 S. Ct. 2411 (2013) (Fisher I), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, held that the court of appeals had not applied "the correct standard of strict scrutiny":

The University must prove that the means chosen by the University to attain diversity are narrowly tailored to that goal. On this point, the University receives no deference. Grutter made clear that it is for the courts, not for university administrators, to ensure that "[t]he means chosen to accomplish the [government's] asserted purpose must be specifically and narrowly framed to accomplish that purpose." True, a court can take account of a university's experience and expertise in adopting or rejecting certain admissions processes. But, as the Court said in Grutter, it remains at all times the University's obligation to demonstrate, and the Judiciary's obligation to determine, that admissions processes "ensure that each applicant is evaluated as an individual and not in a way that makes an applicant's race or ethnicity the defining feature of his or her application."

Narrow tailoring also requires that the reviewing court verify that it is "necessary" for a university to use race to achieve the educational benefits of diversity. Bakke. This involves a careful judicial inquiry into whether a university could achieve sufficient diversity without using racial classifications. Although “[n]arrow tailoring does not require exhaustion of every conceivable race-neutral alternative,” strict scrutiny does require a court to examine with care, and not defer to, a university’s “serious, good faith consideration of workable race-neutral alternatives.” See Grutter. Consideration by the university is of course necessary, but it is not sufficient to satisfy strict scrutiny: The reviewing court must ultimately be satisfied that no workable race-neutral alternatives would produce the educational benefits of diversity. If “‘a nonracial approach...could promote the substantial interest about as well and at tolerable administrative expense,’” Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 280, n.6 (1986) (quoting Greenawalt, Judicial Scrutiny of “Benign” Racial Preference in Law School Admissions, 75 Colum. L. Rev. 559, 578-579 (1975)), then the university may not consider race. A plaintiff, of course, bears the burden of placing the validity of a university’s adoption of an affirmative action plan in issue. But strict scrutiny imposes on the university the ultimate burden of demonstrating, before turning to racial classifications, that available, workable race-neutral alternatives do not suffice.

Justice Scalia wrote a short concurring opinion adhering to the view he expressed in Grutter that the Fourteenth Amendment “proscribes government discrimination on the basis of race, and state-provided education is no exception,” but noting that because Fisher had not asked the Court to overrule Grutter, he joined the Court’s opinion.

Justice Thomas wrote a lengthier concurrence, reiterating his position that “a State’s use of race in higher education admissions decisions is categorically prohibited by the Equal Protection Clause.”

Justice Ginsburg issued a short dissent, stating that she would have upheld the University’s admissions policy.

FISHER v. UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS (FISHER II), 136 S. Ct. 2198 (2016). After a remand, in which the court of appeals again upheld Texas’s combined use of its Ten Percent Plan and race-conscious review, the case returned to the Supreme Court, which upheld the admissions process.

Justice Kennedy wrote the opinion for the Court. He described race as “but a ‘factor of a factor of a factor’ in the holistic-review calculus.” And he emphasized that consideration of race was not limited to underrepresented minorities, but “‘within the full context of the entire application, may be beneficial to any UT Austin applicant—including whites and Asian—

Americans.””

Much of his opinion seemed to turn on the distinctive posture of the case before the Court:

“Petitioner’s acceptance of the Top Ten Percent Plan complicates this Court’s review. In particular, it has led to a record that is almost devoid of information about the students who secured admission to the University through the [Ten Percent] Plan. The Court thus cannot know how students admitted solely based on their class rank differ in their contribution to diversity from students admitted through holistic review.

“In an ordinary case, this evidentiary gap perhaps could be filled by a remand to the district court for further factfinding. When petitioner’s application was rejected, however, the University’s combined percentage-plan/holistic-review approach to admission had been in effect for just three years. While studies undertaken over the eight years since then may be of significant value in determining the constitutionality of the University’s current admissions policy, that evidence has little bearing on whether petitioner received equal treatment when her application was rejected in 2008. If the Court were to remand, therefore, further factfinding would be limited to a narrow 3-year sample, review of which might yield little insight....

“Under the circumstances of this case, then, a remand would do nothing more than prolong a suit that has already persisted for eight years and cost the parties on both sides significant resources. Petitioner long since has graduated from another college, and the University’s policy—and the data on which it first was based—may have evolved or changed in material ways.”

Although the opinion thus resolved only a narrow question, Justice Kennedy emphasized that the University had a “continuing obligation to satisfy the burden of strict scrutiny in light of changing circumstances. The University engages in periodic reassessment of the constitutionality, and efficacy, of its admissions program. Going forward, that assessment must be undertaken in light of the experience the school has accumulated and the data it has gathered since the adoption of its admissions plan.”

The Court rejected Fisher’s argument that consideration of race was unnecessary because the University had been achieving a “critical mass” of black and Hispanic students through the Top Ten Percent Plan plus its prior race-neutral holistic review:

“To start, the demographic data the University has submitted show consistent stagnation in terms of the percentage of minority students enrolling at the University from 1996 to 2002....

“Although demographics alone are by no means dispositive, they do have some value as a gauge of the University's ability to enroll students who can offer underrepresented perspectives.

"In addition to this broad demographic data, the University put forward evidence that minority students admitted under the Hopwood regime experienced feelings of loneliness and isolation.

"This anecdotal evidence is, in turn, bolstered by further, more nuanced quantitative data. In 2002, 52 percent of undergraduate classes with at least five students had no African-American students enrolled in them, and 27 percent had only one African-American student. In other words, only 21 percent of undergraduate classes with five or more students in them had more than one African-American student enrolled. Twelve percent of these classes had no Hispanic students, as compared to 10 percent in 1996. Though a college must continually reassess its need for race-conscious review, here that assessment appears to have been done with care, and a reasonable determination was made that the University had not yet attained its goals."

Building off a point made in Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 551 U.S. 701 (2007)—that there was a tension between arguing that race-conscious action is necessary and a claim that it has only a small effect—Fisher had argued that considering race was unnecessary because it affected the admissions of very few students. Justice Kennedy rejected this argument as well: "The fact that race consciousness played a role in only a small portion of admissions decisions should be a hallmark of narrow tailoring, not evidence of unconstitutionality."

Finally, the Court rejected the argument that there were workable race-neutral means available to the University:

"A review of the record reveals, however, that, at the time of petitioner's application, none of her proposed alternatives was a workable means for the University to attain the benefits of diversity it sought. For example, petitioner suggests that the University could intensify its outreach efforts to African-American and Hispanic applicants. But the University submitted extensive evidence of the many ways in which it already had intensified its outreach efforts to those students. The University has created three new scholarship programs, opened new regional admissions centers, increased its recruitment budget by half-a-million dollars, and organized over 1,000 recruitment events. Perhaps more significantly, in the wake of Hopwood, the University spent seven years attempting to achieve its compelling interest using race-neutral holistic review. None of these efforts succeeded, and petitioner fails to offer any meaningful way in which the University could have improved upon them at the time of her application.

“Petitioner also suggests altering the weight given to academic and socioeconomic factors in the University’s admissions calculus. This proposal ignores the fact that the University tried, and failed, to increase diversity through enhanced consideration of socioeconomic and other factors. And it further ignores this Court’s precedent making clear that the Equal Protection Clause does not force universities to choose between a diverse student body and a reputation for academic excellence.

“Petitioner’s final suggestion is to uncap the Top Ten Percent Plan, and admit more—if not all—the University’s students through a percentage plan. As an initial matter, petitioner overlooks the fact that the Top Ten Percent Plan, though facially neutral, cannot be understood apart from its basic purpose, which is to boost minority enrollment. Percentage plans are “adopted with racially segregated neighborhoods and schools front and center stage.” Fisher I, 570 U.S., at —— (GINSBURG, J., dissenting). ‘It is race consciousness, not blindness to race, that drives such plans.’ Ibid. Consequently, petitioner cannot assert simply that increasing the University’s reliance on a percentage plan would make its admissions policy more race neutral.

“Even if, as a matter of raw numbers, minority enrollment would increase under such a regime, petitioner would be hard-pressed to find convincing support for the proposition that college admissions would be improved if they were a function of class rank alone. That approach would sacrifice all other aspects of diversity in pursuit of enrolling a higher number of minority students. A system that selected every student through class rank alone would exclude the star athlete or musician whose grades suffered because of daily practices and training. It would exclude a talented young biologist who struggled to maintain above-average grades in humanities classes. And it would exclude a student whose freshman-year grades were poor because of a family crisis but who got herself back on track in her last three years of school, only to find herself just outside of the top decile of her class.

“These are but examples of the general problem. Class rank is a single metric, and like any single metric, it will capture certain types of people and miss others. This does not imply that students admitted through holistic review are necessarily more capable or more desirable than those admitted through the Top Ten Percent Plan. It merely reflects the fact that privileging one characteristic above all others does not lead to a diverse student body. Indeed, to compel universities to admit students based on class rank alone is in deep tension with the goal of educational diversity as this Court’s cases have defined it.”

Justice Thomas wrote a brief dissent restating his view that Grutter should be overruled.

Justice Alito, joined by the Chief Justice and Justice Thomas, wrote a lengthier dissent. He criticized the University's efforts in defense of its plan as "shifting, unpersuasive, and, at times, less than candid."

"Over the past 20 years, UT has frequently modified its admissions policies, and it has generally employed race and ethnicity in the most aggressive manner permitted under controlling precedent....

"Although UT claims that race is but a 'factor of a factor of a factor of a factor,' UT acknowledges that 'race is the only one of [its] holistic factors that appears on the cover of every application,' Tr. of Oral Arg. 54 (Oct. 10, 2012). Because an applicant's race is identified at the front of the admissions file, reviewers are aware of it throughout the evaluation."

Justice Alito's dissent critiqued the university's claims regarding critical mass as being about anything other than sheer numbers. He then turned to a discussion of diversity and discrimination:

"Moreover, if UT is truly seeking to expose its students to a diversity of ideas and perspectives, its policy is poorly tailored to serve that end. UT's own study...demonstrated that classroom diversity was more lacking for students classified as Asian-American than for those classified as Hispanic. But the UT plan discriminates against Asian-American students....

"Hispanics are better represented than Asian-Americans in UT classrooms. In fact, [the majority and the court of appeals] act almost as if Asian-American students do not exist. Only the District Court acknowledged the impact of UT's policy on Asian-American students. But it brushed aside this impact, concluding —astoundingly—that UT can pick and choose which racial and ethnic groups it would like to favor. According to the District Court, 'nothing in Grutter requires a university to give equal preference to every minority group,' and UT is allowed 'to exercise its discretion in determining which minority groups should benefit from the consideration of race.'

"This reasoning, which the majority implicitly accepts by blessing UT's reliance on the classroom study, places the Court on the 'tortuous' path of 'decid[ing] which races to favor.' Metro Broadcasting, 497 U.S., at 632 (Kennedy, J., dissenting). And the Court's willingness to allow this 'discrimination against individuals of Asian descent in UT admissions is particularly troubling, in light of the long history of discrimination against Asian Americans, especially in education.' [See, e.g.,] Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U.S. 78, 81–82 (1927) (holding that a 9-year-old Chinese-American girl could be denied entry to a 'white' school because she was 'a member of the Mongolian or yellow race'). In sum, '[w]hile the Court repeatedly refers to the preferences as favoring ‘minorities,’...it must be emphasized that the discriminatory policies upheld today operate to exclude’ Asian-American students, who ‘have not made [UT’s] list’ of favored groups. Metro Broadcasting (Kennedy, J., dissenting).

“Perhaps the majority finds discrimination against Asian-American students benign, since Asian-Americans are ‘overrepresented’ at UT. But ‘[h]istory should teach greater humility.’...

“In addition to demonstrating that UT discriminates against Asian-American students, the classroom study also exhibits UT’s use of a few crude, overly simplistic racial and ethnic categories....

“For example, students labeled ‘Asian American,’ seemingly include ‘individuals of Chinese, Japanese, Korean, Vietnamese, Cambodian, Hmong, Indian and other backgrounds comprising roughly 60% of the world’s population.’ It would be ludicrous to suggest that all of these students have similar backgrounds and similar ideas and experiences to share. So why has UT lumped them together and concluded that it is appropriate to discriminate against Asian-American students because they are ‘overrepresented’ in the UT student body? UT has no good answer. And UT makes no effort to ensure that it has a critical mass of, say, ‘Filipino Americans’ or ‘Cambodian Americans.’ As long as there are a sufficient number of ‘Asian Americans,’ UT is apparently satisfied....

“Finally, it seems clear that the lack of classroom diversity is attributable in good part to factors other than the representation of the favored groups in the UT student population. UT offers an enormous number of classes in a wide range of subjects, and it gives undergraduates a very large measure of freedom to choose their classes. UT also offers courses in subjects that are likely to have special appeal to members of the minority groups given preferential treatment under its challenged plan, and this of course diminishes the number of other courses in which these students can enroll. Having designed an undergraduate program that virtually ensures a lack of classroom diversity, UT is poorly positioned to argue that this very result provides a justification for racial and ethnic discrimination, which the Constitution rarely allows.

“UT’s purported interest in intraracial diversity, or ‘diversity within diversity,’ also falls short. At bottom, this argument relies on the unsupported assumption that there is something deficient or at least radically different about the African-American and Hispanic students admitted through the Top Ten Percent Plan....

“UT complained that the Top Ten Percent Law hinders its efforts to assemble a broadly diverse class because the minorities admitted under that law are drawn largely from certain areas of Texas where there are majority-minority schools. These students, UT argued, tend to come from poor, disadvantaged families, and the University would prefer a system that gives it substantial leeway to seek broad diversity within groups of underrepresented minorities. In particular, UT asserted a need for more African-American and Hispanic students from privileged backgrounds. See, e.g., Brief for Respondents in No. 11–345, at 34 (explaining that UT needs race-conscious admissions in order to admit ‘[t]he African-American or Hispanic child of successful professionals in Dallas’); ibid. (claiming that privileged minorities ‘have great potential for serving as a ‘bridge’ in promoting cross-racial understanding, as well as in breaking down racial stereotypes’); ibid. (intimating that the underprivileged minority students admitted under the Top Ten Percent Plan ‘reinforc[e]’ ‘stereotypical assumptions’); Tr. of Oral Arg. 43–45 (Oct. 10, 2012) ([A]lthough the percentage plan certainly helps with minority admissions, by and large, the minorities who are admitted tend to come from segregated, racially-identifiable schools,’ and ‘we want minorities from different backgrounds’). Thus, the Top Ten Percent Law is faulted for admitting the wrong kind of African-American and Hispanic students....

“Remarkably, UT now contends that petitioner has ‘fabricat[ed]’ the argument that it is seeking affluent minorities. That claim is impossible to square with UT’s prior statements to this Court in the briefing and oral argument in Fisher I. Moreover, although UT reframes its argument, it continues to assert that it needs affirmative action to admit privileged minorities. For instance, UT’s brief highlights its interest in admitting ‘[t]he black student with high grades from Andover.’ Similarly, at oral argument, UT claimed that its ‘interests in the educational benefits of diversity would not be met if all of [the] minority students were...coming from depressed socioeconomic backgrounds.’

“Ultimately, UT’s intraracial diversity rationale relies on the baseless assumption that there is something wrong with African-American and Hispanic students admitted through the Top Ten Percent Plan, because they are ‘from the lower-performing, racially identifiable schools.’ ... UT’s assumptions appear to be based on the pernicious stereotype that the African-Americans and Hispanics admitted through the Top Ten Percent Plan only got in because they did not have to compete against very many whites and Asian-Americans.....

“In addition to relying on stereotypes, UT’s argument that it needs racial preferences to admit privileged minorities turns the concept of affirmative action on its head. When affirmative action programs were first adopted, it was for the purpose of helping the disadvantaged. Now we are told that a program that tends to admit poor and disadvantaged minority students is inadequate because it does not work to the advantage of those who are more fortunate. This is affirmative action gone wild.

“It is also far from clear that UT’s assumptions about the socioeconomic status of minorities admitted through the Top Ten Percent Plan are even remotely accurate. Take, for example, parental education. In 2008, when petitioner applied to UT, approximately 79% of Texans aged 25 years or older had a high school diploma, 17% had a bachelor’s degree, and 8% had a graduate or professional degree. In contrast, 96% of African-Americans admitted through the Top Ten Percent Plan had a parent with a high school diploma, 59% had a parent with a bachelor’s degree, and 26% had a parent with a graduate or professional degree. Similarly, 83% of Hispanics admitted through the Top Ten Percent Plan had a parent with a high school diploma, 42% had a parent with a bachelor’s degree, and 21% had a parent with a graduate or professional degree. As these statistics make plain, the minorities that UT characterizes as ‘coming from depressed socioeconomic backgrounds,’ generally come from households with education levels exceeding the norm in Texas.

“Or consider income levels. In 2008, the median annual household income in Texas was $49,453. The household income levels for Top Ten Percent African-American and Hispanic admittees were on par: Roughly half of such admittees came from households below the Texas median, and half came from households above the median. And a large portion of these admittees are from households with income levels far exceeding the Texas median. Specifically, 25% of African-Americans and 27% of Hispanics admitted through the Top Ten Percent Plan in 2008 were raised in households with incomes exceeding $80,000. In light of this evidence, UT’s actual argument is not that it needs affirmative action to ensure that its minority admittees are representative of the State of Texas. Rather, UT is asserting that it needs affirmative action to ensure that its minority students disproportionately come from families that are wealthier and better educated than the average Texas family....

“[I]t is simply not true that Top Ten Percent minority admittees are academically inferior to holistic admittees. In fact, as UT’s president explained in 2000, ‘top 10 percent high school students make much higher grades in college than non-top 10 percent students,’ and ‘[s]trong academic performance in high school is an even better predictor of success in college than standardized test scores.’ Indeed, the statistics in the record reveal that, for each year between 2003 and 2007, African-American in-state freshmen who were admitted under the Top Ten Percent Law earned a higher mean grade point average than those admitted outside of the Top Ten Percent Law. The same is true for Hispanic students. These conclusions correspond to the results of nationwide studies showing that high school grades are a better predictor of success in college than

“It is important to understand what is and what is not at stake in this case. What is not at stake is whether UT or any other university may adopt an admissions plan that results in a student body with a broad representation of students from all racial and ethnic groups. UT previously had a race-neutral plan that it claimed had ‘effectively compensated for the loss of affirmative action,’ and UT could have taken other steps that would have increased the diversity of its admitted students without taking race or ethnic background into account.

“What is at stake is whether university administrators may justify systematic racial discrimination simply by asserting that such discrimination is necessary to achieve ‘the educational benefits of diversity,’ without explaining—much less proving—why the discrimination is needed or how the discriminatory plan is well crafted to serve its objectives. Even though UT has never provided any coherent explanation for its asserted need to discriminate on the basis of race, and even though UT’s position relies on a series of unsupported and noxious racial assumptions, the majority concludes that UT has met its heavy burden. This conclusion is remarkable—and remarkably wrong.”

Justice Kagan again did not participate.

Does Fisher II mark a significant change in the Court’s approach to race-conscious affirmative action?

Note: The Special Problem of Facially Neutral but Race-Specific Voting Districts

1. The problem. How should standard principles of equal protection law apply to the construction of electoral districts? Gomillion v. Lightfoot, page 556, supra, and succeeding cases establish that when districts are purposely constructed to reduce the voting power of minorities, the plans are unconstitutional. (Indeed, the Court has not even applied strict scrutiny in such cases.) The Voting Rights Act of 1965, 52 U.S.C. §10301 et seq., goes further than the Constitution, to prohibit the use of districting plans that result in the dilution of minority voting strength regardless of the government’s motivation in adopting or maintaining such plans.

The question is more complex when a legislature draws district lines in a fashion designed accurately to reflect, rather than to reduce, overall minority voting strength. Suppose, for example, that 30 percent of a state’s population is African American. If district lines are drawn according to some “traditional” districting criteria (e.g., compactness or contiguity) and without regard to the racial composition of the ensuing districts, the result may produce few, if any, districts in which African Americans are a majority of the electorate. If voting is racially polarized, the result may be that black voters are unable to elect the candidates they prefer in any district. Is it permissible for the state to counteract this effect by deliberately drawing district lines so as to ensure that some percentage of the districts have African-American majorities? On the one hand, state efforts to ensure that groups are represented in proportion to their numbers might be thought desirable and, perhaps, even constitutionally mandatory. Yet on the other hand, deliberately placing individuals within districts based on race might be thought to run afoul of the prohibition on even facially neutral race-specific classifications.

2. Shaw. In Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630 (1993), plaintiffs challenged the constitutionality of a state reapportionment plan that included one “majority-minority” district with what the Court characterized as a “dramatically irregular” shape. In a five-to-four decision, the Court, per Justice O’Connor, held that the plaintiffs had stated a cognizable claim. A redistricting plan is unconstitutional when “though race-neutral on its face, [it] rationally cannot be understood as anything other than an effort to separate voters into different districts on the basis of race, and that the separation lacks sufficient justification.” This might be the case, for example, when a state “concentrated a dispersed minority population in a single district by disregarding traditional districting principles such as compactness, contiguity, and respect for political subdivisions.” As the Court explained:

[We] believe that reapportionment is one area in which appearances do matter. A reapportionment plan that includes in one district individuals who belong to the same race, but who are otherwise widely separated by geographical and political boundaries, and who may have little in common with one another but the color of their skin, bears an uncomfortable resemblance to political apartheid. It reinforces the perception that members of the same racial group—regardless of their age, education, economic status, or the community in which they live—think alike, share the same political interests, and will prefer the same candidates at the polls. We have rejected such perceptions elsewhere as impermissible racial stereotypes. By perpetuating such notions, a racial gerrymander may exacerbate the very patterns of racial bloc voting the majority-minority districting is sometimes said to counteract.

3. The problem of injury. Who is harmed by race-specific districting? In Brown, the Court thought that racial segregation generated “a feeling of inferiority as to [the] status [of black children] in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone.” In Loving, the Court found that the ban on interracial marriages was “designed to maintain White Supremacy.” In affirmative action cases, the Court has held that plaintiffs denied the possibility of competing for a benefit or position on equal terms are harmed by that denial. See Northeastern Florida Chapter of Associated General Contractors v. Jacksonville, 508 U.S. 656 (1993). Is it plausible that race-specific districting equalizing statewide representation has any of these effects?

In United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737 (1995), the Court held that plaintiffs living within a district subject to a racial gerrymander have standing to contest the districting, but that plaintiffs outside the district lack standing unless they can show that they have personally been subject to a racial classification. Is this distinction coherent? Haven’t the voters who were excluded from a particular district because of their race also suffered an injury? See Sinkfield v. Kelley, 531 U.S. 28 (2000) (holding that white voters lacked standing to challenge the majority white district in which they were placed in order to create an adjacent majority-black district). Consider also Justice Stevens’s discussion of the standing issue in his dissenting opinion in Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899 (1996):

[The] supposedly insidious messages that [Shaw] contends will follow from extremely irregular race-based districting will presumably be received in equal measure by all State residents. For that reason, the claimed violation of a shared right to a color-blind districting process would not seem to implicate the Equal Protection Clause at all precisely because it rests neither on a challenge to the State’s decision to distribute burdens and benefits unequally, nor on a claim that the State’s formally equal treatment of its citizens in fact stamps persons of one race with a badge of inferiority in a context that results in no race-based unequal treatment.

Does the Court’s conception of harm match its restrictive standing rule? Compare Ely, Standing to Challenge Pro-Minority Gerrymanders, 111 Harv. L. Rev. 576, 594 (1997) (arguing that white voters “have standing basically because they’ve been deprived of a meaningful shot at helping to elect a representative whose race is the same as theirs”), with Issacharoff and Karlan, Standing and Misunderstanding in Voting Rights Law, 111 Harv. L. Rev. 2276 (1998) (arguing that the Court’s standing doctrine is completely incoherent because it fails to explain the dividing line between those voters who have standing and those who lack standing and that the plaintiffs in the race-specific districting cases deliberately declined to claim vote dilution or the inability to elect their preferred candidates).

4. The implementation of the Shaw principle. The Shaw Court decided only that plaintiffs had presented a cognizable claim. The opinion left many questions unanswered, including the evidentiary showing necessary to trigger strict scrutiny; what interests might justify taking race into account; what to do about “mixed motive” cases when bizarrely shaped districts result from the intersection of ordinary political considerations and racial criteria; and how the narrow tailoring requirement should apply.

In Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900 (1995), the Court elaborated upon the question of what a plaintiff would have to show to trigger strict scrutiny. Following the 1990 census, and under substantial pressure from the U.S. Department of Justice, Georgia redrew its congressional districts to create two additional majority-black districts. The Eleventh Congressional District stretched from Atlanta, in the center of the state to Savannah, on the Atlantic coast, linking by narrow, relatively underpopulated corridors a set of majority black neighborhoods.

Justice Kennedy delivered the Court’s opinion:

[Just] as the State may not, absent extraordinary justification, segregate citizens on the basis of race in its public parks, buses, golf courses, beaches, and schools, so did we recognize in Shaw that it may not separate its citizens into different voting districts on the basis of race....

Our observation in Shaw of the consequences of racial stereotyping was not meant to suggest that a district must be bizarre on its face before there is a constitutional violation. [Shape] is relevant not because bizarreness is a necessary element of the constitutional wrong or a threshold requirement of proof, but because it may be persuasive circumstantial evidence that race for its own sake, and not other districting principles, was the legislature’s dominant and controlling rationale in drawing its district lines. The logical implication, as courts applying Shaw have recognized, is that parties may rely on evidence other than bizarreness to establish race-based districting....

The plaintiff’s burden is to show, either through circumstantial evidence of a district’s shape and demographics or more direct evidence going to legislative purpose, that race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature’s decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district. To make this showing, a plaintiff must prove that the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles, including but not limited to compactness, contiguity, respect for political subdivisions or communities defined by actual shared interests, to racial considerations....

In our view, the District Court applied the correct analysis, and its finding that race was the predominant factor motivating the drawing of the Eleventh District was not clearly erroneous.

Note the way in which Miller shifted the nature of the inquiry into whether a facially neutral law constitutes a racial classification. See also Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952 (1996) (plurality opinion) (explaining that “[strict] scrutiny does not apply merely because redistricting is performed with consciousness of race. Nor does it apply to all cases of intentional creation of majority-minority districts. [For] strict scrutiny to apply, the plaintiffs must prove that other, legitimate districting principles were ‘subordinated’ to race. By that, we mean that race must be ‘the predominant factor motivating the legislature’s [redistricting] decision.’”) Contrast Miller and Vera with Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 265–266 (1977):

Rarely can it be said that a legislature...made a decision motivated solely by a single concern, or even that a particular purpose was the “dominant” or “primary” one. In fact, it is because legislators and administrators are properly concerned with balancing numerous competing considerations that courts refrain from reviewing the merits of their decisions, absent a showing of arbitrariness or irrationality. But racial discrimination is not just another competing consideration. When there is a proof that a discriminatory purpose has been a motivating factor in the decision, this judicial deference is no longer justified.

Under the Arlington Heights test, “[proof] that the decision by the Village was motivated in part by a racially discriminatory purpose...would...have shifted to the [defendant] the burden of establishing that the same decision would have resulted even had the impermissible purpose not been considered. If this were established, the complaining party in a case of this kind no longer fairly could attribute the injury complained of to improper consideration of a discriminatory purpose.”

Why does the Court treat voting cases differently? Is it because race serves a different function in the political process, correlating with political preferences rather than describing individuals? Is it because redistricting is inherently a process of treating people as members of groups? Consider Justice Ginsburg’s point in dissent:

Along with attention to size, shape, and political subdivisions, the Court recognizes as an appropriate districting principle, “respect for...communities defined by actual shared interests.” The Court finds no community here, however, because a report in the record showed “fractured political, social, and economic interests within the Eleventh District’s black population.”

But ethnicity itself can tie people together, as volumes of social science literature have documented—even people with divergent economic interests....

[To] accommodate the reality of ethnic bonds, legislatures have long drawn voting districts along ethnic lines. Our Nation’s cities are full of districts identified by their ethnic character—Chinese, Irish, Italian, Jewish, Polish, Russian, for example. The creation of ethnic districts reflecting felt identity is not ordinarily viewed as offensive or demeaning to those included in the delineation.

[In] adopting districting plans, [States] do not treat people as individuals. Apportionment schemes, by their very nature, assemble people in groups. States do not assign voters to districts based on merit or achievement, standards States might use in hiring employees or engaging contractors....

[That] ethnicity defines some of these groups is a political reality. Until now, no constitutional infirmity has been seen in districting Irish or Italian voters together, for example, so long as the delineation does not abandon familiar apportionment practices. If Chinese-Americans and Russian-Americans may seek and secure group recognition in the delineation of voting districts, then African-Americans should not be dissimilarly treated. Otherwise, in the name of equal protection, we would shut out “the very minority group whose history in the United States gave birth to the Equal Protection Clause.”...

In Bethune-Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 137 S. Ct. 788 (2017), the Court examined Virginia state legislative districts drawn after the 2010 census. The general assembly drew 12 districts with black voting-age populations of at least 55 percent. A three-judge district court rejected the plaintiffs’ challenge to the districts, holding that strict scrutiny was triggered only if plaintiffs could show an actual conflict between traditional redistricting criteria and race. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, disagreed. The Court held that in order to show that race predominated, a plaintiff could use either “circumstantial evidence of a district’s shape and demographics or more direct evidence going to legislative purpose.” Thus, race can predominate even if a plan respects traditional districting principles.

Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234 (2001), revisited the North Carolina redistricting that first appeared before the Court in Shaw. This case involved a challenge to a redrawn version of North Carolina’s Twelfth Congressional District, the district challenged originally in Shaw and struck down as unjustifiably race conscious in Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899 (1996). This time around, the Court held that the district court had erred in finding that race, rather than politics, drove the legislature's districting decision.

Justice Breyer's opinion for the Court sharpened the distinction between race "simply hav[ing] been 'a motivation for the drawing of a majority minority district"—which would be permissible—and race being the "predominant factor," the showing that would trigger strict scrutiny. Justice Breyer cautioned against concluding that race was the predominant factor in situations "where the State has articulated a legitimate political explanation for its districting decision, and the voting population is one in which race and political affiliation are highly correlated."

Justice Breyer's opinion performed a painstakingly thorough review of the record, going beyond the district court's findings to examine the entire testimony of the expert witness on whom the trial court had relied. It also discounted the direct evidence relied on by the district court. One of the leaders of the redistricting process, State Senator Roy Cooper, testified before the legislative committee considering the plan that "overall it provides for a fair, geographic, racial and partisan balance throughout the State of North Carolina...." Justice Breyer agree[d] that one can read the statement about "racial...balance" as the District Court read it—to refer to the current congressional delegation's racial balance. But even as so read, the phrase shows that the legislature considered race, along with other partisan and geographic considerations; and as so read it says little or nothing about whether race played a predominant role comparatively speaking.

We can put the matter more generally as follows: In a case such as this one where majority-minority districts (or the approximate equivalent) are at issue and where racial identification correlates highly with political affiliation, the party attacking the legislatively drawn boundaries must show at the least that the legislature could have achieved its legitimate political objectives in alternative ways that are comparably consistent with traditional districting principles. That party must also show that those districting alternatives would have brought about significantly greater racial balance.

Justice Thomas, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Kennedy, dissented, stating that "[i]n light of the direct evidence of racial motive and the inferences that may be drawn from the circumstantial evidence, I am satisfied that the District Court's finding was permissible, even if not compelled by the record." Given the standard of review for district court findings of fact, he would have affirmed.

Two redistricting cycles later, the Court revisited the North Carolina congressional districts yet again. Prior to the 2010 redistricting, House Districts 1 and 12 had both consistently elected candidates preferred by the majority of African American voters in each district although neither district had a majority black voting-age population. Nevertheless, when the state legislature drew the new districts, it significantly increased the percentage of black citizens in each of the districts, making the districts majority-black. A three-judge district court held both districts unconstitutional, finding that race was the state's predominant motive for drawing the new lines and rejecting the state's claim that the increase in black population was required by the Voting Rights Act. The Supreme Court affirmed in Cooper v. Harris, 137 S. Ct. 1455 (2017). Justice Kagan wrote the Court's opinion. The Court agreed that race was the predominant factor explaining the configuration of House District 1, and it rejected the state's argument that the Voting Rights Act required those lines, especially because minority voters had been electing their preferred candidates for nearly twenty years from non-majority-black districts. With respect to House District 12, the Court rejected the state's argument that the mapmakers had moved voters in and out of the district as part of a "strictly" political gerrymander, without regard to race. And it rejected the state's argument that when race and politics are competing explanations for how a district was drawn, a court cannot conclude that race predominated unless the plaintiffs can show a different map that meets the state's political goals without relying so much on race.

Justice Thomas provided the fifth vote for the majority. He wrote a concurrence explaining that he thought "North Carolina's concession that it created [House District 1] as a majority-black district is by itself sufficient to trigger strict scrutiny." He emphasized that his position reflected deference to the district court's factual findings.

Justice Alito, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Kennedy, dissented. They thought that political considerations, rather than racial ones, best explained how North Carolina had drawn the challenged districts.

5. Compelling state interests. Once strict scrutiny is triggered, what sort of government interest is sufficiently weighty to justify race-specific districting?

a. Compliance with the Voting Rights Act. Recall that the Voting Rights Act, unlike the Constitution, does more than merely prohibit districting that has the purpose of reducing minority representation. To some extent, it also requires jurisdictions to avoid districting that has the "result" of understating such representation. Of course, to the extent that jurisdictions attempt to avoid this result, they run the risk of violating the Miller and Shaw restrictions on race-specific districting. This dilemma might be avoided if the Court treated compliance with the act as a compelling state interest sufficient to justify race-specific districting.

In Bush v. Vera, supra, Justice O'Connor, writing for a plurality of the Court, assumed, without deciding, that compliance with the act was such an interest. The Court found, however, that the act did not require “a State to create, on predominantly racial lines, a district that is not ‘reasonably compact.’” Since Texas had created such a district, the Court did not have to reach the question whether the need to obey the act would provide a compelling government interest. A majority of the Court reached a similar conclusion in Shaw v. Hunt, supra. However, in an unusual concurrence to her own plurality opinion in Bush, Justice O'Connor stated her view that compliance with the “results” test mandated by the act was a compelling interest. See also League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399 (2006), in which six justices, in two separate opinions, agreed that compliance with the Voting Rights Act can constitute a compelling interest that justifies race-conscious line drawing.

b. Remedying the effects of prior discrimination. In Bush v. Vera, Justice O'Connor's plurality opinion addressed the argument that remedying the effects of racially polarized voting, produced by prior discrimination, was a compelling government interest. Drawing from the Court's affirmative action jurisprudence, she concluded that the state has a compelling interest in remedying prior discrimination only when there is “specific, identified discrimination” and when the state has a “strong basis in evidence” to conclude that the remedial action is necessary. The Court returned to this issue in Shaw v. Hunt. Writing for the majority, Chief Justice Rehnquist acknowledged that “[a] State's interest in remedying the effects of past or present racial discrimination may in the proper case justify a government's use of racial distinctions.” However, on the facts of this case, “the District Court found that an interest in ameliorating past discrimination did not actually precipitate the use of race in the redistricting plan.” Compare Justice Stevens's dissenting opinion:

[Some] legislators felt that the sorry history of race relations in North Carolina [was] sufficient reason for making it easier for more black leaders to participate in the legislative [process]. Even if that history does not provide the kind of precise guidance that will justify certain specific affirmative action programs in particular industries, it surely provides an adequate basis for a decision to facilitate the election of representatives of the previously disadvantaged minority.

In light of the history of redistricting litigation, consider Karlan, Easing the Spring: Strict Scrutiny and Affirmative Action After the Redistricting Cases, 43 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 1569, 1586, 1602–1603 (2002):

[The] redistricting cases suggest there is definitely more than one kind of strict scrutiny. Faced with the prospect of applying a form of strict scrutiny that threatened to resegregate state legislatures and congressional delegations, the Supreme Court has been unwilling to apply strict scrutiny strictly. It has constricted the domain in which strict scrutiny comes into play, permitting race to be taken into account when it is one factor among many and its inclusion produces districts that do not deviate too obviously from the sorts of districts created for other groups. It has also broadened the interests that can justify race-conscious redistricting, by holding that compliance with the Voting Rights Act's results tests can serve as a compelling state interest. The understanding of political equality embodied in the Act goes beyond what the Constitution itself demands. It requires states to arrange their electoral institutions to minimize the lingering effects of prior unconstitutional discrimination not otherwise chargeable to them, as well as to mitigate the impact of racially polarized voting that involves otherwise constitutionally protected private choice. In short, the theory of strict scrutiny yielded to the need for an electoral system that is equally open to members of minority groups.

Note: The “Special” Case of Indigenous People

Are the many statutes providing special treatment for American Indians and other native peoples consistent with the strict scrutiny supposedly accorded race-specific statutes? In his dissenting opinion in Rice v. Cayetano, 528 U.S. 495 (2000), Justice Stevens summarized the current state of the law:

Throughout our Nation’s history, this Court has recognized both the plenary power of Congress over the affairs of native Americans and the fiduciary character of the special federal relationship with descendants of those once sovereign peoples....As our cases have consistently recognized, Congress’ plenary power over these peoples has been exercised time and again to implement a federal duty to provide native peoples with special “care and protection.” [Today], the Federal Bureau of Indian Affairs [administers] countless modern programs responding to [pragmatic] concerns, including health, education, housing, and impoverishment. Federal regulation in this area is not limited to the strictly practical but has encompassed as well the protection of cultural values....

[This] Court has taken account of the “numerous occasions” on which “legislation that singles out Indians for particular and special treatment” has been upheld, and has concluded that as “long as the special treatment can be tied rationally to fulfillment of Congress’ unique obligations towards the Indians, such legislative judgments will not be disturbed.”

Can this body of law be reconciled with the Court’s treatment of race-based affirmative action in other contexts? What is it about sovereignty—as distinct from individual liberty—that justifies placing unique obligations on Congress with respect to Native Americans but not with respect to African Americans?

In Rice v. Cayetano itself, the Court held that Hawaii could not limit voting for the trustees who administer the Office of Hawaiian Affairs, which manages huge plots of land held in trust for the descendants of the Polynesians who occupied the Hawaiian Islands before the 1778 arrival of Captain Cook, to only the descendants of those persons. Writing for the Court, Justice Kennedy rejected the analogy to statutes dealing specially with American Indians:

The decisions of this Court, interpreting the effect of treaties and congressional enactments on the subject, have held that various tribes retained some elements of quasi-sovereign authority, even after cession of their lands to the United States. In reliance on that theory the Court has sustained a federal provision giving employment preferences to persons of tribal ancestry. [Morton v. Mancari, 417 U.S. 535 (1974).]...

It does not follow from Mancari, however, that Congress may authorize a State to establish a voting scheme that limits the electorate for its public officials to a class of tribal Indians, to the exclusion of all non-Indian citizens.

[If] a non-Indian lacks the right to vote in tribal elections, it is for the reason that such elections are the internal affair of a quasi-sovereign. The OHA elections, by contrast, are the affair of the State of Hawaii....

To extend Mancari to this context would be to permit a State, by racial classification, to fence out whole classes of its citizens from decisionmaking in critical state affairs.

Justice Stevens, joined by Justice Ginsburg, dissented:

The descendants of the native Hawaiians share with the descendants of the Native Americans on the mainland or in the Aleutian islands not only a history of subjugation at the hands of colonial forces, but also a purposefully created and specialized “guardian-ward” relationship with the Government of the United States. It follows that legislation targeting the native Hawaiians must be evaluated according to the same understanding of equal protection that this Court has long applied to the Indians on the continental United States: that “special treatment...be tied rationally to the fulfillment of Congress’ unique obligation” toward the native peoples....

[The] Federal Government [has] not been limited in its special dealings with the native peoples to laws affecting tribes or tribal Indians alone. In light of this precedent, it is a painful irony indeed to conclude that native Hawaiians are not entitled to special benefits designed to restore a measure of native self-governance because they currently lack any vestigial native government—a possibility of which history and the actions of this Nation have deprived them.

Consider the extent to which the last paragraph of Justice Stevens’s opinion might apply to African Americans as well. See Blacksher, Majority Black Districts, Kiryas Joel, and Other Challenges to American Nationalism, 26 Cumb. L. Rev. 407 (1996) (arguing that African Americans, like Native Americans, should be entitled to exercise a form of political sovereignty). See also Katz, Race and the Right to Vote after Rice v. Cayetano, 99 Mich. L. Rev. 491, 503 (2000).

For an examination of the equal protection problems posed by defining membership in Indian tribes based upon racial criteria, see Gould, Mixing Bodies and Beliefs: The Predicament of Tribes, 101 Colum. L. Rev. 702 (2001).

Note: A Comparative Perspective

Should the Constitution be amended to explicitly define the allowable scope of affirmative action (if any)? Does the inclusion of a specific provision dealing with affirmative action mean that the general equality provision would otherwise bar this practice?

Like the United States, India is a multicultural democracy with a history of class and religious divisions. Before independence in 1948, the British frequently distributed benefits based on membership in ethnic or communal groups. The original India Constitution sharply restricted these practices. The drafters rejected proposals to reserve legislative seats, cabinet posts, and public positions for minorities and included a broad provision prohibiting the state from discriminating “against any citizen on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth, or any of them.” However, another, nonjusticiable provision provides that “[the] State shall promote with special care the educational and economic interests of the weaker sections of the people, and, in particular, of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes, and shall protect them from social injustice and all forms of exploitation.”

In 1951, the India Supreme Court invalidated a state program that allocated seats in medical and engineering colleges on the basis of caste and religion. See State of Madras v. Champakam Dorairajan, A.I.R. 1951 S.C. 226, 1951 S.C.J. 313. Within two months of the decision, it had been reversed by a series of constitutional amendments. Among the amendments adopted was one providing that nothing in the constitution “shall prevent the State from making any special provision for the advancement of any socially and educationally backward classes of citizens or for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.”

There has been considerable controversy about how to reconcile this and other amendments apparently authorizing affirmative action with the broader guarantee of equality. Some cases have treated the two sets of provisions as in conflict with each other and have therefore read the authorization for affirmative action narrowly. See, e.g., State of Andhra Pradesh v. Sagar, A.I.R. 1968 S.C. 1379, 1382 (broad reading would effectively eviscerate guarantee of equality). However, in a path-breaking decision in 1975, the India Supreme Court held that in some contexts affirmative action was required by the equality requirement rather than being in tension with it. See State of Kerala v. N. M. Thomas, A.I.R. 1976 S.C. 490. This decision has granted the government greater discretion as to its choice of means in pursuing compensatory measures, and today there are widespread “reservations” of positions in employment and education based on caste and minority status. For an account, see M. Galanter, Competing Equalities 363–395 (1985).

These reservations have produced considerable resentment and even violence. For conflicting accounts of their success in reducing inequality, compare M. Galanter, Law and Society in Modern India 185–197 (1989) (a costly success), with T. Sowell, Preferential Policies 90–103 (1990) (a failure). Galanter argues that compensatory discrimination has produced substantial redistribution, contributed to the growth of a middle class, and diminished stereotypes concerning ignorance and incompetence among the lower castes. Sowell argues that reserved seats in universities are often unused because they require supplemental assistance to take advantage of them, that they have led to a lowering of standards, that the most prosperous members of the benefited groups receive a disproportionate share of the benefits, and that resentment against preferential policies has led to a violent backlash.

Consider more generally the extent to which the Indian experience has relevance to the United States in light of the arguably unique history of race relations in this country.

4. The Synthesis of Brown and Affirmative Action

Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 551 U.S. 701 (2007)

CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS announced the judgment of the Court, and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III-A, and III-C, and an opinion with respect to Parts III-B and IV, in which JUSTICES SCALIA, THOMAS, and ALITO join.

The school districts in these cases [from Seattle, Washington, and Jefferson County, Kentucky] voluntarily adopted student assignment plans that rely upon race to determine which public schools certain children may attend....Parents of students denied assignment to particular schools under these plans solely because of their race brought suit, contending that allocating children to different public schools on the basis of race violated the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee of equal protection. The Courts of Appeals below upheld the plans. We granted certiorari, and now reverse.

Seattle School District No. 1 operates 10 regular public high schools. In 1998, it adopted the plan at issue in this case for assigning students to these schools. The plan allows incoming ninth graders to choose from among any of the district's high schools, ranking however many schools they wish in order of preference.

Some schools are more popular than others. If too many students list the same school as their first choice, the district employs a series of "tiebreakers" to determine who will fill the open slots at the oversubscribed school. The first tiebreaker selects for admission students who have a sibling currently enrolled in the chosen school. The next tiebreaker depends upon the racial composition of the particular school and the race of the individual student. In the district's public schools approximately 41 percent of enrolled students are white; the remaining 59 percent, comprising all other racial groups, are classified by Seattle for assignment purposes as nonwhite. If an oversubscribed school is not within 10 percentage points of the district's overall white/nonwhite racial balance, it is what the district calls “integration positive,” and the district employs a tiebreaker that selects for assignment students whose race “will serve to bring the school into balance.”...

Seattle has never operated segregated schools—legally separate schools for students of different races—nor has it ever been subject to court-ordered desegregation. It nonetheless employs the racial tiebreaker in an attempt to address the effects of racially identifiable housing patterns on school assignments....

Jefferson County Public Schools operates the public school system in metropolitan Louisville, Kentucky. In 1973 a federal court found that Jefferson County had maintained a segregated school system, and in 1975 the District Court entered a desegregation decree. Jefferson County operated under this decree until 2000, when the District Court dissolved the decree after finding that the district had achieved unitary status by eliminating “to the greatest extent practicable” the vestiges of its prior policy of segregation.

In 2001, after the decree had been dissolved, Jefferson County adopted the voluntary student assignment plan at issue in this case. Approximately 34 percent of the district’s 97,000 students are black; most of the remaining 66 percent are white. The plan requires all nonmagnet schools to maintain a minimum black enrollment of 15 percent, and a maximum black enrollment of 50 percent.

At the elementary school level, based on his or her address, each student is designated a “resides” school to which students within a specific geographic area are assigned; elementary resides schools are “grouped into clusters in order to facilitate integration.” The district assigns students to nonmagnet schools in one of two ways: Parents of kindergartners, first-graders, and students new to the district may submit an application indicating a first and second choice among the schools within their cluster; students who do not submit such an application are assigned within the cluster by the district....If a school has reached the “extremes of the racial guidelines,” a student whose race would contribute to the school’s racial imbalance will not be assigned there....

It is well established that when the government distributes burdens or benefits on the basis of individual racial classifications, that action is reviewed under strict scrutiny. Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 505–506 (2005); Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 326 (2003)....In order to satisfy this searching standard of review, the school districts must demonstrate that the use of individual racial classifications in the assignment plans here under review is “narrowly tailored” to achieve a “compelling” government interest.

Without attempting in these cases to set forth all the interests a school district might assert, it suffices to note that our prior cases, in evaluating the use of racial classifications in the school context, have recognized two interests that qualify as compelling. The first is the compelling interest of remedying the effects of past intentional discrimination. See Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467, 494 (1992). Yet the Seattle public schools have not shown that they were ever segregated by law, and were not subject to court-ordered desegregation decrees. The Jefferson County public schools were previously segregated by law and were subject to a desegregation decree entered in 1975. In 2000, the District Court that entered that decree dissolved it, finding that Jefferson County had “eliminated the vestiges associated with the former policy of segregation and its pernicious effects,” and thus had achieved “unitary” status. Jefferson County accordingly does not rely upon an interest in remedying the effects of past intentional discrimination in defending its present use of race in assigning students.

Nor could it. We have emphasized that the harm being remedied by mandatory desegregation plans is the harm that is traceable to segregation, and that “the Constitution is not violated by racial imbalance in the schools, without more.” Milliken v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267, 280, n.14 (1977). Once Jefferson County achieved unitary status, it had remedied the constitutional wrong that allowed race-based assignments. Any continued use of race must be justified on some other basis.

The second government interest we have recognized as compelling for purposes of strict scrutiny is the interest in diversity in higher education upheld in Grutter....

The entire gist of the analysis in Grutter was that the admissions program at issue there focused on each applicant as an individual, and not simply as a member of a particular racial group. The classification of applicants by race upheld in Grutter was only as part of a “highly individualized, holistic review.”....

In upholding the admissions plan in Grutter,...this Court relied upon considerations unique to institutions of higher education, noting that in light of “the expansive freedoms of speech and thought associated with the university environment, universities occupy a special niche in our constitutional tradition.”...The present cases are not governed by Grutter.

Perhaps recognizing that reliance on Grutter cannot sustain their plans, both school districts assert additional interests, distinct from the interest upheld in Grutter, to justify their race-based assignments. In briefing and argument before this Court, Seattle contends that its use of race helps to reduce racial concentration in schools and to ensure that racially concentrated housing patterns do not prevent nonwhite students from having access to the most desirable schools. Jefferson County has articulated a similar goal, phrasing its interest in terms of educating its students “in a racially integrated environment.” Each school district argues that educational and broader socialization benefits flow from a racially diverse learning environment, and each contends that because the diversity they seek is racial diversity—not the broader diversity at issue in Grutter—it makes sense to promote that interest directly by relying on race alone.

The parties and their amici dispute whether racial diversity in schools in fact has a marked impact on test scores and other objective yardsticks or achieves intangible socialization benefits. The debate is not one we need to resolve, however, because it is clear that the racial classifications employed by the districts are not narrowly tailored to the goal of achieving the educational and social benefits asserted to flow from racial diversity. In design and operation, the plans are directed only to racial balance, pure and simple, an objective this Court has repeatedly condemned as illegitimate....

Accepting racial balancing as a compelling state interest would justify the imposition of racial proportionality throughout American society, contrary to our repeated recognition that “at the heart of the Constitution’s guarantee of equal protection lies the simple command that the Government must treat citizens as individuals, not as simply components of a racial, religious, sexual or national class.”....

The districts assert, as they must, that the way in which they have employed individual racial classifications is necessary to achieve their stated ends. The minimal effect these classifications have on student assignments, however, suggests that other means would be effective. Seattle’s racial tiebreaker results, in the end, only in shifting a small number of students between schools. Approximately 307 student assignments were affected by the racial tiebreaker in 2000–2001....

Similarly, Jefferson County’s use of racial classifications has only a minimal effect on the assignment of students. Elementary school students are assigned to their first- or second-choice school 95 percent of the time....Jefferson County estimates that the racial guidelines account for only 3 percent of assignments....

While we do not suggest that greater use of race would be preferable, the minimal impact of the districts’ racial classifications on school enrollment casts doubt on the necessity of using racial classifications....

Justice Breyer’s dissent takes a different approach to these cases....

Justice Breyer speaks of bringing “the races” together (putting aside the purely black-and-white nature of the plans), as the justification for excluding individuals on the basis of their race. Again, this approach to racial classifications is fundamentally at odds with our precedent, which makes clear that the Equal Protection Clause “protects persons, not groups.” This fundamental principle goes back, in this context, to Brown itself. See Brown v. Board of Education, 349 U.S. 294, 300 (1955) (Brown II) (“At stake is the personal interest of the plaintiffs in admission to public schools...on a nondiscriminatory basis” (emphasis added)). For the dissent, in contrast, “‘individualized scrutiny’ is simply beside the point.”...

Justice Breyer’s dissent ends on an unjustified note of alarm....

[It] suggests that other means for achieving greater racial diversity in schools are necessarily unconstitutional if the racial classifications at issue in these cases cannot survive strict scrutiny. These other means—e.g., where to construct new schools, how to allocate resources among schools, and which academic offerings to provide to attract students to certain schools—implicate different considerations than the explicit racial classifications at issue in these cases, and we express no opinion on their validity—not even in dicta. Rather, we employ the familiar and well-established analytic approach of strict scrutiny to evaluate the plans at issue today, an approach that in no way warrants the dissent’s cataclysmic concerns. Under that approach, the school districts have not carried their burden of showing that the ends they seek justify the particular extreme means they have chosen—classifying individual students on the basis of their race and discriminating among them on that basis....

If the need for the racial classifications embraced by the school districts is unclear, even on the districts' own terms, the costs are undeniable. "Distinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality."...

All this is true enough in the contexts in which these statements [have repeatedly been] made [by this Court—in] government contracting, voting districts, allocation of broadcast licenses, and electing state officers—but when it comes to using race to assign children to schools, history will be heard. In Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954) (Brown I), we held that segregation deprived black children of equal educational opportunities regardless of whether school facilities and other tangible factors were equal, because government classification and separation on grounds of race themselves denoted inferiority. It was not the inequality of the facilities but the fact of legally separating children on the basis of race on which the Court relied to find a constitutional violation in 1954. The next Term, we accordingly stated that "full compliance" with Brown I required school districts "to achieve a system of determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis." Brown II, 349 U.S., at 300–301 (emphasis added).

The parties and their amici debate which side is more faithful to the heritage of Brown, but the position of the plaintiffs in Brown was spelled out in their brief and could not have been clearer: "The Fourteenth Amendment prevents states from according differential treatment to American children on the basis of their color or race." Brief for Appellants in Nos. 1, 2, and 4 and for Respondents in No. 10 on Reargument in Brown I, O. T. 1953, p. 15 (Summary of Argument). What do the racial classifications at issue here do, if not accord differential treatment on the basis of race? As counsel who appeared before this Court for the plaintiffs in Brown put it: "We have one fundamental contention which we will seek to develop in the course of this argument, and that contention is that no State has any authority under the equal-protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to use race as a factor in affording educational opportunities among its citizens." Tr. of Oral Arg. in Brown I, p. 7 (Robert L. Carter, Dec. 9, 1952). There is no ambiguity in that statement. And it was that position that prevailed in this Court....

Racial imbalance is not segregation.² Although presently observed racial imbalance might result from past de jure segregation, racial imbalance can also result from any number of innocent private decisions, including voluntary housing choices.

Although there is arguably a danger of racial imbalance in schools in Seattle and Louisville, there is no danger of resegregation. No one contends that Seattle has established or that Louisville has reestablished a dual school system that separates students on the basis of race....

This Court has carved out a narrow exception to [the] general rule [forbidding government use of race] for cases in which a school district has a “history of maintaining two sets of schools in a single school system deliberately operated to carry out a governmental policy to separate pupils in schools solely on the basis of race.” In such cases, race-based remedial measures are sometimes required....⁶

Neither of the programs before us today is compelled as a remedial measure, and no one makes such a claim....

II

Lacking a cognizable interest in remediation, neither of these plans can survive strict scrutiny because neither plan serves a genuinely compelling state interest.

[The] dissent argues that the interest in integration has an educational element. The dissent asserts that racially balanced schools improve educational outcomes for black children. In support, the dissent unquestioningly cites certain social science research to support propositions that are hotly disputed among social scientists. In reality, it is far from apparent that coerced racial mixing has any educational benefits, much less that integration is necessary to black achievement.

Scholars have differing opinions as to whether educational benefits arise from racial balancing. Some have concluded that black students receive genuine educational benefits....Others have been more circumspect....And some have concluded that there are no demonstrable educational benefits....

Add to the inconclusive social science the fact of black achievement in “racially isolated” environments. See T. Sowell, Education: Assumptions Versus History 7–38 (1986). Before Brown, the most prominent example of an exemplary black school was Dunbar High School. Id., at 29 (“In the period 1918–1923, Dunbar graduates earned fifteen degrees from Ivy League colleges, and ten degrees from Amherst, Williams, and Wesleyan”). Dunbar is by no means an isolated example. See id., at 10–32 (discussing other successful black schools)....Even after Brown, some schools with predominantly black enrollments have achieved outstanding educational results....

The Seattle school board itself must believe that racial mixing is not necessary to black achievement. Seattle operates a K-8 “African-American Academy,” which has a “nonwhite” enrollment of 99%. That school was founded in 1990 as part of the school board’s effort to “increase academic achievement.” This racially imbalanced environment has reportedly produced test scores “higher across all grade levels in reading, writing and math.” Contrary to what the dissent would have predicted, the children in Seattle’s African American Academy have shown gains when placed in a “highly segregated” environment.

Given this tenuous relationship between forced racial mixing and improved educational results for black children, the dissent cannot plausibly maintain that an educational element supports the integration interest, let alone makes it compelling....

Perhaps recognizing as much, the dissent argues that the social science evidence is “strong enough to permit a democratically elected school board reasonably to determine that this interest is a compelling one.” This assertion is inexplicable. It is not up to the school boards—the very government entities whose race-based practices we must strictly scrutinize—to determine what interests qualify as compelling under the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Rather, this Court must assess independently the nature of the interest asserted and the evidence to support it in order to determine whether it qualifies as compelling under our precedents....To adopt the dissent’s deferential approach would be to abdicate our constitutional responsibilities....

Most of the dissent’s criticisms of today’s result can be traced to its rejection of the color-blind Constitution. The dissent attempts to marginalize the notion of a color-blind Constitution by consigning it to me and Members of today's plurality. But I am quite comfortable in the company I keep. My view of the Constitution is Justice Harlan's view in Plessy: "Our Constitution is colorblind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens." Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559 (1896) (dissenting opinion). And my view was the rallying cry for the lawyers who litigated Brown....

The dissent appears to pin its interpretation of the Equal Protection Clause to current societal practice and expectations, deference to local officials, likely practical consequences, and reliance on previous statements from this and other courts. Such a view was ascendant in this Court's jurisprudence for several decades. It first appeared in Plessy, where the Court asked whether a state law providing for segregated railway cars was "a reasonable regulation." The Court deferred to local authorities in making its determination, noting that in inquiring into reasonableness "there must necessarily be a large discretion on the part of the legislature."....

The segregationists in Brown embraced the arguments the Court endorsed in Plessy. Though Brown decisively rejected those arguments, today's dissent replicates them to a distressing extent. Thus, the dissent argues that "each plan embodies the results of local experience and community consultation." Similarly, the segregationists made repeated appeals to societal practice and expectation. The dissent argues that "weight [must be given] to a local school board's knowledge, expertise, and concerns," and with equal vigor, the segregationists argued for deference to local authorities. The dissent argues that today's decision "threatens to substitute for present calm a disruptive round of race-related litigation," and claims that today's decision "risks serious harm to the law and for the Nation." The segregationists also relied upon the likely practical consequences of ending the state-imposed system of racial separation.

The similarities between the dissent's arguments and the segregationists' arguments do not stop there. Like the dissent, the segregationists repeatedly cautioned the Court to consider practicalities and not to embrace too theoretical a view of the Fourteenth Amendment. And just as the dissent argues that the need for these programs will lessen over time, the segregationists claimed that reliance on segregation was lessening and might eventually end.

What was wrong in 1954 cannot be right today....

JUSTICE KENNEDY, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment....

II

Our Nation from the inception has sought to preserve and expand the promise of liberty and equality on which it was founded. Today we enjoy a society that is remarkable in its openness and opportunity. Yet our tradition is to go beyond present achievements, however significant, and to recognize and confront the flaws and injustices that remain. This is especially true when we seek assurance that opportunity is not denied on account of race. The enduring hope is that race should not matter; the reality is that too often it does.

This is by way of preface to my respectful submission that parts of the opinion by The Chief Justice imply an all-too-unyielding insistence that race cannot be a factor in instances when, in my view, it may be taken into account. The plurality opinion is too dismissive of the legitimate interest government has in ensuring all people have equal opportunity regardless of their race. The plurality's postulate that "the way to stop discrimination on the basis of race is to stop discriminating on the basis of race," is not sufficient to decide these cases. Fifty years of experience since Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), should teach us that the problem before us defies so easy a solution. School districts can seek to reach Brown's objective of equal educational opportunity. The plurality opinion is at least open to the interpretation that the Constitution requires school districts to ignore the problem of de facto resegregation in schooling. I cannot endorse that conclusion. To the extent the plurality opinion suggests the Constitution mandates that state and local school authorities must accept the status quo of racial isolation in schools, it is, in my view, profoundly mistaken.

The statement by Justice Harlan that "our Constitution is color-blind" was most certainly justified in the context of his dissent in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559 (1896). The Court's decision in that case was a grievous error it took far too long to overrule....[A]s an aspiration, Justice Harlan's axiom must command our assent. In the real world, it is regrettable to say, it cannot be a universal constitutional principle.

In the administration of public schools by the state and local authorities it is permissible to consider the racial makeup of schools and to adopt general policies to encourage a diverse student body, one aspect of which is its racial composition....

School boards may pursue the goal of bringing together students of diverse backgrounds and races through other means, including strategic site selection of new schools; drawing attendance zones with general recognition of the demographics of neighborhoods; allocating resources for special programs; recruiting students and faculty in a targeted fashion; and tracking enrollments, performance, and other statistics by race. These mechanisms are race conscious but do not lead to different treatment based on a classification that tells each student he or she is to be defined by race, so it is unlikely any of them would demand strict scrutiny to be found permissible. Executive and legislative branches, which for generations now have considered these types of policies and procedures, should be permitted to employ them with candor and with confidence that a constitutional violation does not occur whenever a decisionmaker considers the impact a given approach might have on students of different races. Assigning to each student a personal designation according to a crude system of individual racial classifications is quite a different matter; and the legal analysis changes accordingly....

In the cases before us it is noteworthy that the number of students whose assignment depends on express racial classifications is limited. I join Part III-C of the Court's opinion because I agree that in the context of these plans, the small number of assignments affected suggests that the schools could have achieved their stated ends through different means. These include the facially race-neutral means set forth above or, if necessary, a more nuanced, individual evaluation of school needs and student characteristics that might include race as a component. The latter approach would be informed by Grutter, though of course the criteria relevant to student placement would differ based on the age of the students, the needs of the parents, and the role of the schools.

[If] it is legitimate for school authorities to work to avoid racial isolation in their schools, must they do so only by indirection and general policies? Does the Constitution mandate this inefficient result? Why may the authorities not recognize the problem in candid fashion and solve it altogether through resort to direct assignments based on student racial classifications? So, the argument proceeds, if race is the problem, then perhaps race is the solution.

The argument ignores the dangers presented by individual classifications, dangers that are not as pressing when the same ends are achieved by more indirect means. When the government classifies an individual by race, it must first define what it means to be of a race. Who exactly is white and who is nonwhite? To be forced to live under a state-mandated racial label is inconsistent with the dignity of individuals in our society. And it is a label that an individual is powerless to change....On the other hand race-conscious measures that do not rely on differential treatment based on individual classifications present these problems to a lesser degree....

This Nation has a moral and ethical obligation to fulfill its historic commitment to creating an integrated society that ensures equal opportunity for all of its children. A compelling interest exists in avoiding racial isolation, an interest that a school district, in its discretion and expertise, may choose to pursue. Likewise, a district may consider it a compelling interest to achieve a diverse student population. Race may be one component of that diversity, but other demographic factors, plus special talents and needs, should also be considered. What the government is not permitted to do, absent a showing of necessity not made here, is to classify every student on the basis of race and to assign each of them to schools based on that classification. Crude measures of this sort threaten to reduce children to racial chits valued and traded according to one school's supply and another's demand....

The decision today should not prevent school districts from continuing the important work of bringing together students of different racial, ethnic, and economic backgrounds. Due to a variety of factors—some influenced by government, some not—neighborhoods in our communities do not reflect the diversity of our Nation as a whole. Those entrusted with directing our public schools can bring to bear the creativity of experts, parents, administrators, and other concerned citizens to find a way to achieve the compelling interests they face without resorting to widespread governmental allocation of benefits and burdens on the basis of racial classifications.

With this explanation I concur in the judgment of the Court.

JUSTICE STEVENS, dissenting....

There is a cruel irony in the Chief Justice's reliance on our decision in Brown v. Board of Education, 349 U.S. 294 (1955). The first sentence in the concluding paragraph of his opinion states: "Before Brown, schoolchildren were told where they could and could not go to school based on the color of their skin." This sentence reminds me of Anatole France's observation: "The majestic equality of the law, forbids rich and poor alike to sleep under bridges, to beg in the streets, and to steal their bread." The Chief Justice fails to note that it was only black schoolchildren who were so ordered; indeed, the history books do not tell stories of white children struggling to attend black schools. In this and other ways, The Chief Justice rewrites the history of one of this Court's most important decisions....

If we look at cases decided during the interim between Brown and Adarand, we can see how a rigid adherence to tiers of scrutiny obscures Brown's clear message. Perhaps the best example is provided by our approval of the decision of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in 1967 upholding a state statute mandating racial integration in that State's school system. See School Comm. of Boston v. Board of Education, 352 Mass. 693, 227 N.E.2d 729. Rejecting arguments comparable to those that the plurality accepts today, that court noted: "It would be the height of irony if the racial imbalance act, enacted as it was with the laudable purpose of achieving equal educational opportunities, should, by prescribing school pupil allocations based on race, founder on unsuspected shoals in the Fourteenth Amendment."

Invoking our mandatory appellate jurisdiction, the Boston plaintiffs prosecuted an appeal in this Court. Our ruling on the merits simply stated that the appeal was "dismissed for want of a substantial federal question." School Comm. of Boston v. Board of Education, 389 U.S. 572 (1968) (per curiam). That decision not only expressed our appraisal of the merits of the appeal, but it constitutes a precedent that the Court overrules today. The subsequent statements by the unanimous Court in Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S. 1, 16 (1971)...and by the host of state court decisions cited by Justice Breyer, were fully consistent with that disposition. Unlike today's decision, they were also entirely loyal to Brown.

The Court has changed significantly since it decided School Comm. of Boston in 1968. It was then more faithful to Brown and more respectful of our precedent than it is today. It is my firm conviction that no Member of the Court that I joined in 1975 would have agreed with today's decision.

FACTS...

Between 1968 and 1980, the number of black children attending a school where minority children constituted more than half of the school fell from 77% to 63% in the Nation (from 81% to 57% in the South) but then reversed direction by the year 2000, rising from 63% to 72% in the Nation (from 57% to 69% in the South). Similarly, between 1968 and 1980, the number of black children attending schools that were more than 90% minority fell from 64% to 33% in the Nation (from 78% to 23% in the South), but that too reversed direction, rising by the year 2000 from 33% to 37% in the Nation (from 23% to 31% in the South). As of 2002, almost 2.4 million students, or over 5% of all public school enrollment, attended schools with a white population of less than 1%....Today, more than one in six black children attend a school that is 99–100% minority. In light of the evident risk of a return to school systems that are in fact (though not in law) resegregated, many school districts have felt a need to maintain or to extend their integration efforts.

The upshot is that myriad school districts operating in myriad circumstances have devised myriad plans, often with race-conscious elements, all for the sake of eradicating earlier school segregation, bringing about integration, or preventing retrogression. Seattle and Louisville are two such districts, and the histories of their present plans set forth typical school integration stories....

In both Seattle and Louisville, the local school districts began with schools that were highly segregated in fact. In both cities plaintiffs filed lawsuits claiming unconstitutional segregation. In Louisville, a federal district court found that school segregation reflected pre-Brown state laws separating the races. In Seattle, the plaintiffs alleged that school segregation unconstitutionally reflected not only generalized societal discrimination and residential housing patterns, but also school board policies and actions that had helped to create, maintain, and aggravate racial segregation. In Louisville, a federal court entered a remedial decree. In Seattle, the parties settled after the school district pledged to undertake a desegregation plan. In both cities, the school boards adopted plans designed to achieve integration by bringing about more racially diverse schools. In each city the school board modified its plan several times in light of, for example, hostility to busing, the threat of resegregation, and the desirability of introducing greater student choice. And in each city, the school boards' plans have evolved over time in ways that progressively diminish the plans' use of explicit race-conscious criteria....

THE LEGAL STANDARD

A longstanding and unbroken line of legal authority tells us that the Equal Protection Clause permits local school boards to use race-conscious criteria to achieve positive race-related goals, even when the Constitution does not compel it. Because of its importance, I shall repeat what this Court said about the matter in Swann. Chief Justice Burger, on behalf of a unanimous Court in a case of exceptional importance, wrote:

School authorities are traditionally charged with broad power to formulate and implement educational policy and might well conclude, for example, that in order to prepare students to live in a pluralistic society each school should have a prescribed ratio of Negro to white students reflecting the proportion for the district as a whole. To do this as an educational policy is within the broad discretionary powers of school authorities.

The statement was not a technical holding in the case. But the Court set forth in Swann a basic principle of constitutional law—a principle of law that has found “wide acceptance in the legal culture.”...

Courts are not alone in accepting as constitutionally valid the legal principle that Swann enunciated—i.e., that the government may voluntarily adopt race-conscious measures to improve conditions of race even when it is not under a constitutional obligation to do so. That principle has been accepted by every branch of government and is rooted in the history of the Equal Protection Clause itself....

That Swann’s legal statement should find such broad acceptance is not surprising. For Swann is predicated upon a well-established legal view of the Fourteenth Amendment. That view understands the basic objective of those who wrote the Equal Protection Clause as forbidding practices that lead to racial exclusion....

There is reason to believe that those who drafted an Amendment with this basic purpose in mind would have understood the legal and practical difference between the use of race-conscious criteria in defiance of that purpose, namely to keep the races apart, and the use of race-conscious criteria to further that purpose, namely to bring the races together....

[The plurality claims] that later cases—in particular Johnson, Adarand, and Grutter—supplanted Swann....

First,...[the] Court did not say in Adarand or in Johnson or in Grutter that it was overturning Swann or its central constitutional principle.

[In Adarand,] the Court...sought to “dispel the notion that strict scrutiny” is as likely to condemn inclusive uses of “race-conscious” criteria as it is to invalidate exclusionary uses....

The Court in Grutter elaborated:

“...Context matters when reviewing race-based governmental action under the Equal Protection Clause.”...

Here, the context is one in which school districts seek to advance or to maintain racial integration in primary and secondary schools. It is a context, as Swann makes clear, where history has required special administrative remedies. And it is a context in which the school boards' plans simply set race-conscious limits at the outer boundaries of a broad range.

This context is not a context that involves the use of race to decide who will receive goods or services that are normally distributed on the basis of merit and which are in short supply. It is not one in which race-conscious limits stigmatize or exclude; the limits at issue do not pit the races against each other or otherwise significantly exacerbate racial tensions. They do not impose burdens unfairly upon members of one race alone but instead seek benefits for members of all races alike. The context here is one of racial limits that seek, not to keep the races apart, but to bring them together....

Nonetheless, in light of Grutter and other precedents,...I shall apply the version of strict scrutiny that those cases embody. I shall consequently ask whether the school boards in Seattle and Louisville adopted these plans to serve a “compelling governmental interest” and, if so, whether the plans are “narrowly tailored” to achieve that interest. If the plans survive this strict review, they would survive less exacting review a fortiori....

APPLYING THE LEGAL STANDARD

Compelling Interest

The principal interest advanced in these cases to justify the use of race-based criteria goes by various names. Sometimes a court refers to it as an interest in achieving racial “diversity.” Other times a court, like the plurality here, refers to it as an interest in racial “balancing.” I have used more general terms to signify that interest, describing it, for example, as an interest in promoting or preserving greater racial “integration” of public schools. By this term, I mean the school districts’ interest in eliminating school-by-school racial isolation and increasing the degree to which racial mixture characterizes each of the district’s schools and each individual student’s public school experience.

Regardless of its name, however, the interest at stake possesses three essential elements. First, there is a historical and remedial element: an interest in setting right the consequences of prior conditions of segregation....

Second, there is an educational element: an interest in overcoming the adverse educational effects produced by and associated with highly segregated schools. Studies suggest that children taken from those schools and placed in integrated settings often show positive academic gains.

Other studies reach different conclusions. But the evidence supporting an educational interest in racially integrated schools is well established and strong enough to permit a democratically elected school board reasonably to determine that this interest is a compelling one....

Third, there is a democratic element: an interest in producing an educational environment that reflects the “pluralistic society” in which our children will live. It is an interest in helping our children learn to work and play together with children of different racial backgrounds. It is an interest in teaching children to engage in the kind of cooperation among Americans of all races that is necessary to make a land of three hundred million people one Nation.

Again, data support this insight....

For his part, Justice Thomas faults my citation of various studies supporting the view that school districts can find compelling educational and civic interests in integrating their public schools. He is entitled of course to his own opinion as to which studies he finds convincing....If we are to insist upon unanimity in the social science literature before finding a compelling interest, we might never find one. I believe only that the Constitution allows democratically elected school boards to make up their own minds as to how best to include people of all races in one America.

Narrow Tailoring...

First, the race-conscious criteria at issue...constitute but one part of plans that depend primarily upon other, nonracial elements. To use race in this way is not to set a forbidden “quota.”

In fact, the defining feature of both plans is greater emphasis upon student choice. In Seattle, for example, in more than 80% of all cases, that choice alone determines which high schools Seattle’s ninth graders will attend....Choice, therefore, is the “predominant factor” in these plans. Race is not....

Second, broad-range limits on voluntary school choice plans are less burdensome, and hence more narrowly tailored, than other race-conscious restrictions this Court has previously approved. Indeed, the plans before us are more narrowly tailored than the race-conscious admission plans that this Court approved in Grutter. Here, race becomes a factor only in a fraction of students’ non-merit-based assignments—not in large numbers of students' merit-based applications. Moreover, the effect of applying race-conscious criteria here affects potentially disadvantaged students less severely, not more severely, than the criteria at issue in Grutter. Disappointed students are not rejected from a State's flagship graduate program; they simply attend a different one of the district's many public schools, which in aspiration and in fact are substantially equal....

Third, the manner in which the school boards developed these plans itself reflects "narrow tailoring." Each plan was devised to overcome a history of segregated public schools. Each plan embodies the results of local experience and community consultation. Each plan is the product of a process that has sought to enhance student choice, while diminishing the need for mandatory busing. And each plan's use of race-conscious elements is diminished compared to the use of race in preceding integration plans....

Nor could the school districts have accomplished their desired aims (e.g., avoiding forced busing, countering white flight, maintaining racial diversity) by other means....[As] to "strategic site selection," Seattle has built one new high school in the last 44 years (and that specialized school serves only 300 students). In fact, six of the Seattle high schools involved in this case were built by the 1920's; the other four were open by the early 1960's. As to "drawing" neighborhood "attendance zones" on a racial basis, Louisville tried it, and it worked only when forced busing was also part of the plan. As to "allocating resources for special programs," Seattle and Louisville have both experimented with this; indeed, these programs are often referred to as "magnet schools," but the limited desegregation effect of these efforts extends at most to those few schools to which additional resources are granted. In addition, there is no evidence from the experience of these school districts that it will make any meaningful impact. As to "recruiting faculty" on the basis of race, both cities have tried, but only as one part of a broader program. As to "tracking enrollments, performance and other statistics by race," tracking reveals the problem; it does not cure it....

CONSEQUENCES

The Founders meant the Constitution as a practical document that would transmit its basic values to future generations through principles that remained workable over time. Hence it is important to consider the potential consequences of the plurality's approach, as measured against the Constitution's objectives. To do so provides further reason to believe that the plurality's approach is legally unsound.

For one thing, consider the effect of the plurality's views on the parties before us and on similar school districts throughout the Nation....

The districts' past and current plans are not unique. They resemble other plans, promulgated by hundreds of local school boards, which have attempted a variety of desegregation methods that have evolved over time in light of experience....

At a minimum, the plurality's views would threaten a surge of race-based litigation. Hundreds of state and federal statutes and regulations use racial classifications for educational or other purposes. In many such instances, the contentious force of legal challenges to these classifications, meritorious or not, would displace earlier calm.

The wide variety of different integration plans that school districts use throughout the Nation suggests that the problem of racial segregation in schools, including de facto segregation, is difficult to solve. The fact that many such plans have used explicitly racial criteria suggests that such criteria have an important, sometimes necessary, role to play. The fact that the controlling opinion would make a school district's use of such criteria often unlawful (and the plurality's "color-blind" view would make such use always unlawful) suggests that today's opinion will require setting aside the laws of several States and many local communities....

The plurality, or at least those who follow Justice Thomas' "color-blind" approach, may feel confident that, to end invidious discrimination, one must end all governmental use of race-conscious criteria including those with inclusive objectives. By way of contrast, I do not claim to know how best to stop harmful discrimination; how best to create a society that includes all Americans; how best to overcome our serious problems of increasing de facto segregation, troubled inner city schooling, and poverty correlated with race. But, as a judge, I do know that the Constitution does not authorize judges to dictate solutions to these problems. Rather, the Constitution creates a democratic political system through which the people themselves must together find answers. And it is for them to debate how best to educate the Nation's children and how best to administer America's schools to achieve that aim. The Court should leave them to their work. And it is for them to decide, to quote the plurality's slogan, whether the best "way to stop discrimination on the basis of race is to stop discriminating on the basis of race."

Finally, what of the hope and promise of Brown? For much of this Nation's history, the races remained divided. It was not long ago that people of different races drank from separate fountains, rode on separate buses, and studied in separate schools. In this Court's finest hour, Brown v. Board of Education challenged this history and helped to change it. For Brown held out a promise. It was a promise embodied in three Amendments designed to make citizens of slaves. It was the promise of true racial equality—not as a matter of fine words on paper, but as a matter of everyday life in the Nation's cities and schools. It was about the nature of a democracy that must work for all Americans. It sought one law, one Nation, one people, not simply as a matter of legal principle but in terms of how we actually live.

Not everyone welcomed this Court's decision in Brown. Three years after that decision was handed down, the Governor of Arkansas ordered state militia to block the doors of a white schoolhouse so that black children could not enter. The President of the United States dispatched the 101st Airborne Division to Little Rock, Arkansas, and federal troops were needed to enforce a desegregation decree. See Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1 (1958). Today, almost 50 years later, attitudes toward race in this Nation have changed dramatically. Many parents, white and black alike, want their children to attend schools with children of different races. Indeed, the very school districts that once spurned integration now strive for it. The long history of their efforts reveals the complexities and difficulties they have faced. And in light of those challenges, they have asked us not to take from their hands the instruments they have used to rid their schools of racial segregation, instruments that they believe are needed to overcome the problems of cities divided by race and poverty. The plurality would decline their modest request.

The plurality is wrong to do so. The last half-century has witnessed great strides toward racial equality, but we have not yet realized the promise of Brown. To invalidate the plans under review is to threaten the promise of Brown. The plurality's position, I fear, would break that promise. This is a decision that the Court and the Nation will come to regret.

I must dissent.

Note: Parents Involved and the Synthesis of Equal Protection Law

1. How the Court reads Brown. In Parents Involved, the justices almost seem more focused on the meaning of Brown than on the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. Consider Karlan, The Law of Small Numbers: Gonzales v. Carhart, Parents Involved in Community Schools, and Some Themes from the First Full Term of the Roberts Court, 86 N.C. L. Rev. 1369, 1393, 1396 (2008):

The Court was quite conscious in Parents Involved that the Justices were involved in a struggle over the meaning of Brown v. Board of Education. Chief Justice Roberts's opinion for the Court sought to end the debate by quoting what the counsel for the Brown plaintiffs said at oral argument....The Court saw "no ambiguity in [his] statement."...

The attorney who made that statement, Robert L. Carter, is now a distinguished federal district judge. Asked for his reaction to the Court's statement, [he responded]...“All that race was used for at that point in time was to deny equal opportunity to black people,’ Judge Carter said of the 1950s. ‘It’s to stand that argument on its head to use race the way they use [it] now.’”

Consider also Liu, “History Will Be Heard”: An Appraisal of the Seattle/Louisville Decision, 2 Harv. L. & Pol. Rev. 53, 62 (2008):

Tellingly, the forty-one-page plurality opinion in Seattle/Louisville contains only one quotation from Brown: a paltry sentence fragment: “The impact [of segregation] is greater when it has the sanction of the law”—that omits the crucial adjacent words locating the illegality of segregation in its detrimental effects on black children. This inattention leads the plurality to identify the violation in 1954 as “differential treatment on the basis of race,” again implying equal burdens on blacks and whites. But Brown did not speak of the violation that way. The Court nowhere used the term “colorblind” or availed itself of the familiar quotation from Harlan’s dissent in Plessy. Instead, Brown’s most memorable utterance was its recognition that segregation harms black children by “generat[ing] a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone.”...

What strategic role did the justices’ citation of Brown play in their positions? See Karlan, What Can Brown® Do for You?: Neutral Principles and the Struggle over the Equal Protection Clause, 58 Duke L.J. 1049 (2009).

2. Justice Kennedy’s position. Justice Kennedy’s concurrence plays a pivotal role in the case. Is he accurately describing the factors that trigger strict scrutiny, or, as he did with his opinion for the Court in Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 911 (1995), discussed at pages 609-610, supra, is he subtly recasting and relaxing the standard? Is his description here consistent with the Court’s cases holding that strict scrutiny is triggered for facially neutral classifications that are intended to serve as proxies for racial classifications?

In this regard, consider Gerken, Justice Kennedy and the Domains of Equal Protection, 121 Harv. L. Rev. 104, 108, 114–117 (2007):

Most of us think we already know the story of race. We tell the same story no matter what the domain. But every domain—schools, the marketplace, democracy—has an overarching narrative. What if we tried to fit race within that narrative rather than vice versa?...

The way Justice Kennedy frames his opinion provides some evidence that a domain-centered narrative is driving him....Chief Justice Roberts, for instance, opens his analysis by invoking general equal protection principles and ends with the aphorism that “the way to stop discrimination on the basis of race is to stop discriminating on the basis of race.” Justice Thomas begins his concurrence by characterizing the case as being about “state entities” rather than public schools, and he ends by invoking general language on race from Dred Scott and Justice Harlan’s dissent in Plessy.

Justice Kennedy, in sharp contrast, anchors his concurrence in the domain of education. He opens his opinion by trumpeting the role that public schools play in teaching civic morality and explicitly linking that role to integration....This opening certainly resonates with parts of Brown’s legacy. But its core narrative is less about equal educational opportunity, the dominant note in any equal protection story, than about the role schools play in teaching civic morality....

Public schools are, of course, a place where the state regulates pervasively, and at least on Kennedy’s account, their job is to teach students to be citizens. This combination—pervasive regulation and an identifiable mission—makes it particularly hard to insist upon a race-neutral approach....[Even] a judge committed to the colorblind ideal might worry, as Kennedy seems to, that the value of colorblindness cannot be learned in a racially segregated school. The narrative of the educational domain, then, may be what focuses Justice Kennedy on the poor fit between his preference for a race-neutral state and his desire for a race-neutral society. Perhaps this is why the question for Kennedy seems to have changed in the domain of education. It is no longer whether the state can act race consciously, but how....[Perhaps] Justice Kennedy sincerely believes what Scalia suggested only sarcastically in Grutter: that “cross-racial understanding” and “good citizenship” are lessons to be learned by “people three feet shorter and 20 years younger than the full-grown adults at the University of Michigan Law School, in...public-school kindergartens.”

Consider also the views in Siegel, The Virtue of Judicial Statesmanship, 86 Tex. L. Rev. 959, 1009–1013 (2008):

In important ways, Kennedy's effort in Parents Involved seems to exhibit the practice of judicial statesmanship. He appeared not merely to tolerate but actually to entertain the strongly held moral claims of each party to the conflict over exactly whom equal protection protects and in what ways....

Perhaps most significant of all, he apprehended both the potentially balkanizing and stigmatizing consequences of government inaction in the face of widespread residential segregation and the potentially balkanizing and stigmatizing consequences of race-conscious state action aimed at ameliorating the problem.

Kennedy, in short, seemed to appreciate what total defeat would mean for both sides....

Those commentators, including myself, who disagree with his analysis and resolution of the cases—whether because they would have upheld the plans or because they would have gone further in banning any use of race—should not be quick to dismiss the ways in which Kennedy handled the controversy in a statesmanlike way....

Yet it bears mention that throughout his opinion, Kennedy too was not completely transparent. He did not explain why addressing the problem of de facto segregation “in a general way”—“by indirection and general policies”—is less troubling than doing so through “individual typing by race.” He did not specify why a racial classification that determines some student assignments “tells each student he or she is to be defined by race” to a greater extent than, say, a race-conscious attendance zone. He did not identify why it mattered so much that the “racial classifications at issue here” were “personal” and “explicit”—why it made a difference that the cases involved “official labels proclaiming the race of all persons in a broad class of citizens.” He did not clarify why “individual classifications” present “dangers that are not as pressing when the same ends are achieved by more indirect means”....

Those are not trivial omissions. It is not as if race-conscious attendance zones avoid classifying groups of citizens in part based on their race. Nor is it the case that race-conscious attendance zones necessarily avoid imposing material harms on individuals based on their race: carving a district one way as opposed to another determines who goes to which schools. The primary difference between the methods that Kennedy approved and those that he disapproved may lie in the likelihood that the individual who is treated by the government in part as a member of a racial group will actually register that he or she is being so treated. In other words, the constitutional problem for Kennedy (and Powell and O'Connor) may lie not in “being forced to live under a state-mandated racial label” but in the individual’s perception that he or she is living in that way....

It is striking that three major efforts at judicial statesmanship in the area of race and equal protection put pressure on the rule-of-law value of transparency.

3. The judicial role. In discussing the question whether local school boards have compelling interest in increasing racial integration within schools, does the Court adequately differentiate between what the Constitution would authorize judges to order over a jurisdiction’s objection and what a jurisdiction can voluntarily undertake? In this regard, consider the observations of Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson, himself the author of an influential book on the meaning of Brown:

[Justice Breyer’s] dissent rests in part on a shrewd tactical maneuver. The Justice seeks to co-opt all the traditional conservative arguments against race-based decisionmaking and harness them to his own ends....

It has long been an article of faith among conservatives that the Constitution permits the use of race only for strictly remedial ends....Justice Breyer converts the term “remedial” to his own uses....

[It] has long been critical to the conservative self-perception that opponents were “activist” and that conservatives were guardians of “restraint.” It was, after all, the Warren Court that made activism “a dirty word”....Conservatives saw themselves as protectors of restraint, stability, and the federal system with all its appreciation of democratic values and of the rights of states and localities to pursue their own distinctive policies.

In Parents Involved, Justice Breyer seeks to turn the tables. In some respects, the opinion is one long paean to the tradition of local control over local school systems....

The Justice has left no stone unturned. It is his view, he says, that will foster the deference to democracy, the appreciation for local experimentation, the diminished litigation, the judicial restraint, and, above all, the binding ties to one nation that conservatives have wanted all along. The opinion consciously seeks to use the terminology of the other side and flip it. In one sense the dissent is unrelenting; in another it seeks to make a conciliatory case. The maneuver must be admired for its shrewdness and its attempt to appeal to opponents in a case made largely through their values and on their terms.

Why then does this best case fail ultimately to persuade? It fails because it recognizes few, if any, limits to the explicit use of race and ethnicity in public decisions. It fails because it risks abandoning America to a race-based course.... Without the prospect of strict judicial scrutiny of race-based classifications, it is anything but certain that racial proportionality would not become more prevalent as citizens and their representatives demand that public benefits be based on race, namely their own. At a minimum, supporters of racial allocation must offer analytical breaks on a practice that, once blessed, would start rolling downhill.

Wilkinson, The Seattle and Louisville School Cases: There Is No Other Way, 121 Harv. L. Rev. 158, 176, 177–179 (2007).

4. Affirmative action, democracy, and the standard of review. In Schuette v. Coalition to Defend Affirmative Action, 134 S. Ct. 1623 (2014), the Supreme Court upheld a Michigan constitutional amendment, enacted through a popular initiative, that, among other things, forbid “discriminat[ion] against, or grant[ing] preferential treatment to, any individual or group on the basis of race...in the operation of...public education.” In upholding the initiative, Justice Kennedy’s opinion announcing the judgment of the Court (joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito) expressed the view that “[it] is demeaning to the democratic process to presume that the voters are not capable of deciding an issue of this sensitivity on decent and rational grounds” and that “[freedom] embraces the right, indeed the duty, to engage in a rational, civic discourse in order to determine how best to form a consensus to shape the destiny of the Nation and its people.” Is this position consistent with the Court’s insistence on strictly scrutinizing decisions by the political branches to adopt affirmative action programs? Is the Court’s insistence on strict scrutiny for these programs, even when their purpose is benign, consistent with its use of rational basis review when a facially neutral statute harms racial minorities for benign purposes?

Siegel, Foreword: Equality Divided, 127 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 50 (2013), argues that equal protection doctrine expresses more concern with the “racial meaning and impact of state action” in the context of affirmative action than it does with respect to facially neutral laws that disadvantage minority communities. Siegel concludes that the Court has thereby turned its traditional Carolene Products approach inside out to create “a form of judicial review that cares more about protecting members of majority groups from actions of representative government that promote minority opportunities than it cares about protecting ‘discrete and insular minorities’ from actions of representative government that reflect ‘prejudice.’” Does this criticism place too little weight on the fact that affirmative action programs make facial distinctions whereas programs like the one upheld in Feeney are facially neutral? If so, why is this difference so significant?

5. A more radical challenge to existing doctrine? In Ricci v. DeStefano, 557 U.S. 557 (2009), Justice Scalia raised the possibility that strict scrutiny for racial classifications puts into doubt the constitutionality of much of the edifice of modern antidiscrimination law. Recall that many federal antidiscrimination statutes—for example, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which deals with employment discrimination, and section 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965—prohibit practices that have a disparate impact regardless of the defendant’s intent. In Ricci, the Court faced a Title VII and equal protection clause-based challenge to a city’s decision not to certify the results of a promotional test for firefighters in light of the test’s disparate impact on black and Latino applicants. The Court disposed of the case on statutory grounds, not reaching the constitutional question. In his concurrence, however, Justice Scalia observed that the Court’s decision merely postpones the evil day on which the Court will have to confront the question: Whether, or to what extent, are the disparate-impact provisions of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 consistent with the Constitution’s guarantee of equal protection? The question is not an easy one. See generally Primus, Equal Protection and Disparate Impact: Round Three, 117 Harv. L. Rev. 493 (2003).

The difficulty is this:...Title VII not only permits but affirmatively requires [“remedial”] actions when a disparate-impact violation would otherwise result. But if the Federal Government is prohibited from discriminating on the basis of race, Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 500 (1954), then surely it is also prohibited from enacting laws mandating that third parties—e.g., employers, whether private, State, or municipal—discriminate on the basis of race....

Intentional discrimination is still occurring, just one step up the chain. Government compulsion of such design would therefore seemingly violate equal protection principles. Nor would it matter that Title VII requires consideration of race on a wholesale, rather than retail, level....

[T]he war between disparate impact and equal protection will be waged sooner or later, and it behooves us to begin thinking about how—and on what terms—to make peace between them.

In this light, consider also Texas Department of Housing and Community Affairs v. Inclusive Communities Project, Inc., 135 S. Ct. 2507 (2015). In that case, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, interpreted the Fair Housing Act of 1968 to prohibit not just actions that had a discriminatory intent, but also actions that had a disproportionately adverse effect on minorities and are otherwise unjustified by a legitimate rationale. The Court noted, however, that remedial orders issued under a disparate impact theory “must be consistent with the Constitution.” To meet this requirement, courts “should concentrate on the elimination of the offending practice that ‘arbitrar[ily]…operate[s] invidiously to discriminate on the basis of rac[e].’ If additional measures are adopted, courts should strive to design them to eliminate racial disparities through race-neutral means. [Remedial] orders that impose racial targets or quotas might raise more difficult constitutional questions.” Nonetheless, the Court observed, race “may be considered in certain circumstances and in a proper fashion. [When] setting their larger goals, local housing authorities may choose to foster diversity and combat racial isolation with race-neutral tools, and mere awareness of race in attempting to solve the problems facing inner cities does not doom that endeavor at the outset.”

Justice Thomas, and Justice Alito, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Scalia and Thomas, wrote opinions dissenting on the statutory construction question.

6. Abandoning special scrutiny? The plurality, Justice Kennedy’s concurrence, and Justice Breyer’s dissent all offer different formulations of what strict scrutiny means. And the Court seems to apply strict scrutiny quite differently to racial classifications in different contexts. Consider whether these decisions constitute a dilution or abandonment of strict scrutiny, in fact if not in name. Karlan, Easing the Spring: Strict Scrutiny and Affirmative Action After the Redistricting Cases, 43 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 1569 (2002), argues that these cases suggest that “strict scrutiny may be strict in theory, but...rather pliable in practice.” Id. at 1573. Similarly, Goldberg, Equality without Tiers, 77 S. Cal. L. Rev. 481 (2004), argues that the Court has really adopted a far more fluid scale than the conventional account of strict scrutiny and rationality review captures.

In Griffin, Judicial Supremacy and Equal Protection in a Democracy of Rights, 4 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 281 (2002), the author argues that the Court should formally abandon strict scrutiny for racial classifications. From a strategic point of view, Griffin contends, recent decisions make clear that minorities gain little from such scrutiny. As Griffin puts it, “If you are a member of a racial minority, the Supreme Court is not your friend.” Id. at 282. Moreover, “the protection against unjust discrimination all Americans receive from civil rights statutes is plainly superior to the protection provided by the Equal Protection Clause.” Id. Would minorities be better off today if the Court were simply to announce that racial classifications were no longer subject to strict scrutiny?

D. EQUAL PROTECTION METHODOLOGY: HEIGHTENED SCRUTINY AND THE PROBLEM OF GENDER

Does the Constitution impose a special burden of justification when government action discriminates on the basis of gender? Under what circumstances can laws treat men and women differently?

1. The Early Cases

Until the 1970s, the Court applied only minimal scrutiny to gender classifications and consistently rejected constitutional attacks on statutes disadvantaging women. In Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 130 (1873), for example, decided the day after The Slaughter-House Cases, pages 476-477, supra, the Court upheld Illinois' refusal to license a woman to practice law. In an opinion by Justice Miller, the author of The Slaughter-House Cases, the Court held that the right to practice law was not a privilege or immunity of national citizenship and therefore was not protected by the fourteenth amendment.

Justice Bradley, who had dissented in The Slaughter-House Cases, added a much-quoted concurring opinion. In The Slaughter-House Cases, Justice Bradley had written that "a law which prohibits a large class of citizens from adopting a lawful [employment deprives] them of liberty as well as property without due process of law." Thus, one might have assumed that he would be sympathetic to Bradwell's claim. In Bradwell, however, he asserted that

[the] natural and proper timidity and delicacy which belongs to the female sex evidently unfits it for many of the occupations of civil life. The constitution of the family organization, which is founded in the divine ordinance, as well as in the nature of things, indicates the domestic sphere as that which properly belongs to the domain and functions of womanhood. The harmony, not to say identity, of interests and views which belong or should belong to the family institution, is repugnant to the idea of a woman adopting a distinct and independent career from that of her husband....

It is true that many women are unmarried and not affected by any of the duties, complications, and incapacities arising out of the married state but these are exceptions to the general rule. The paramount destiny and mission of woman are to fulfill the noble and benign offices of wife and mother. This is the law of the Creator. And the rules of civil society must be adapted to the general constitution of things, and cannot be based upon exceptional cases.

See also In re Lockwood, 154 U.S. 116 (1894).

Two years after Bradwell, in Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 162 (1875), the Court acknowledged that women were “persons” and “citizens” within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment, but held that the right to vote was not a privilege of U.S. citizenship and that women could therefore be denied the franchise. (Note that in addition to the equal protection clause, the fourteenth amendment also contained a reduction-of-representation clause in section 2 that penalized states that denied the right to vote “to any of the male inhabitants” of the state.) Minor was overturned by the nineteenth amendment, which provides in pertinent part that “[the] right of citizens to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.” Still, as late as Breedlove v. Suttles, 302 U.S. 277 (1937), the Supreme Court upheld the imposition of a poll tax on men only: “In view of burdens necessarily borne by them for the preservations of the race, the State reasonably may exempt [women] from poll taxes.” Still, women were exempt from paying the tax only if they did not register to vote. In effect, the statute lifted the tax burden by discouraging women from participating in the political process. For extensive discussions of suffrage and equality, see L. Kerber, No Constitutional Right to Be Ladies 81–124 (1998); A. Keyssar, The Right to Vote: The Contested History of Democracy in the United States 172–223 (2000); Winkler, A Revolution Too Soon: Woman Suffragists and the “Living Constitution,” 76 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1456 (2001).

The early cases were decided against the backdrop of The Slaughter-House Cases, which had given an extremely narrow reading to the fourteenth amendment’s due process and equal protection clauses. They therefore paid little attention to claims that gender discrimination violated these provisions. But even when the Court began to invalidate other legislation on due process and equal protection grounds, it resisted application of these clauses to gender discrimination.

In Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908), for example, the Court upheld an Oregon statute prohibiting the employment of women in factories for more than ten hours per day. In doing so, it distinguished its earlier decision in Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), in which it had held that the liberty of contract implicit in the due process clause prohibited a similar restriction on the working hours of bakers. In Muller, the Court maintained that “the inherent difference between the two sexes” justified limitations on a woman’s right to contract. But see Adkins v. Children’s Hospital, 261 U.S. 525 (1923) (invalidating minimum wage legislation for women on substantive due process grounds). Adkins was overruled in West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379 (1937). (For discussion of these cases, see generally Chapter 6, section D, infra.)

The Court was similarly unsympathetic to equal protection claims. In Goesaert v. Cleary, 335 U.S. 464 (1948), for example, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Frankfurter, upheld a Michigan statute prohibiting a woman from working as a bartender unless she was the wife or daughter of a bar's male owner. See also Quong Wing v. Kirkendall, 223 U.S. 59 (1912). And in 1961, the Court, in Hoyt v. Florida, 368 U.S. 57, upheld as "rational" a jury selection system excluding women who did not affirmatively indicate a desire to serve.

2. The Road to Intermediate Scrutiny

In the early 1970s, the Court became more receptive to constitutional attacks on gender classifications. Consider the extent to which the Court's position reflected an emerging popular view. What does this suggest about the willingness or ability of the Court to take positions that go far beyond contemporary views? See generally Siegel, Constitutional Culture, Social Movement, and Constitutional Change: The Case of the De Facto ERA, 94 Cal. L. Rev. 1323 (2006).

REED v. REED, 404 U.S. 71 (1971). This was the first Supreme Court decision to invalidate a gender classification under the equal protection clause. Idaho's law governing the estates of persons who had died intestate (that is, without a will) established a hierarchy of classes of persons eligible for appointment as administrators (e.g., the surviving spouse, the children, or the parents of the decedent). But within any class, the law provided that "of several persons claiming and equally entitled to administer, males must be preferred to females." Reed's parents were separated and when Reed died intestate, his mother filed a petition seeking to administer her son's estate. Reed's father subsequently filed a request that he be named administrator instead, and the state court judge appointed the father in light of the Idaho statute.

In a terse opinion, a unanimous Court held that this preference violated the equal protection clause. Chief Justice Burger, writing for the Court, characterized the issue as "whether a difference in the sex of competing applicants [bears] a rational relationship to a state objective that is sought to be advanced by the operation of [the statute]." The state defended the preference on the ground that it eliminated an area of controversy when two or more persons, otherwise equally entitled, sought to administer an estate. Although the Court acknowledged that reducing the workload of probate courts by eliminating one class of contests was legitimate, the Court maintained that the means used to achieve that objective—that is, a gender classification—was “the very kind of arbitrary legislative choice forbidden by the Equal Protection Clause.”

If the decision to afford preference to men violated the equal protection clause because it was arbitrary, what other choices within otherwise similarly situated classes of potential administrators would not be unacceptably arbitrary? Would flipping a coin be non-arbitrary? Picking the older of two applicants?

FRONTIERO v. RICHARDSON, 411 U.S. 677 (1973). Under federal law, a male member of the uniformed armed services could automatically claim his spouse as a dependent, thereby receiving a larger housing allowance and higher medical benefits. However, a female service member could claim comparable benefits only if she demonstrated that her spouse was in fact dependent on her for over half his support. Although divided as to the appropriate standard of review, eight members of the Court agreed that this distinction violated the equal protection component of the fifth amendment’s due process clause.

Writing for four justices, Justice Brennan argued that classifications based on gender are inherently suspect and, like racial classifications, should be subject to close scrutiny. Justice Brennan found “at least implicit support for such an approach” in Reed, since there the Court had “implicitly rejected appellee’s apparently rational explanation of the statutory scheme.” Moreover, this departure from “‘traditional’ rational-basis analysis” was “clearly justified” in Justice Brennan’s opinion:

“There can be no doubt that our Nation has had a long and unfortunate history of sex discrimination. Traditionally, such discrimination was rationalized by an attitude of ‘romantic paternalism’ which, in practical effect, put women, not on a pedestal, but in a cage....

“As a result of notions such as these, our statute books gradually became laden with gross, stereotyped distinctions between the sexes and, indeed, throughout much of the 19th century the position of women in our society was, in many respects, comparable to that of blacks under the pre-Civil War slave codes. Neither slaves nor women could hold office, serve on juries, or bring suit in their own names, and married women traditionally were denied the legal capacity to hold or convey property or to serve as legal guardians of their own children. And although blacks were guaranteed the right to vote in 1870, women were denied even that right [until] adoption of the Nineteenth Amendment half a century later.

“It is true, of course, that the position of women in America has improved markedly in recent decades. Nevertheless, it can hardly be doubted that, in part because of the high visibility of the sex characteristic, women still face pervasive, although at times more subtle, discrimination in our educational institutions, in the job market and, perhaps most conspicuously in the political arena.

“Moreover, since sex, like race and national origin, is an immutable characteristic determined solely by the accident of birth, the imposition of special disabilities upon the members of a particular sex because of their sex would seem to violate ‘the basic concept of our system that legal burdens should bear some relationship to individual responsibility.’ And what differentiates sex from such nonsuspect statuses as intelligence or physical disability, and aligns it with the recognized suspect criteria, is that the sex characteristic frequently bears no relation to ability to perform or contribute to society.”

Finally, relying on title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which prohibited employment discrimination based on gender, and congressional approval of the equal rights amendment to the Constitution, Justice Brennan argued that “Congress itself has concluded that classifications based upon sex are inherently invidious, and this conclusion of a coequal branch of Government is not without significance.” (At the time Justice Brennan wrote, the equal rights amendment had been submitted to the states for ratification. In 1982, the time period for ratification expired. See pages 677-678, infra.)

Turning to the classification at issue, Justice Brennan concluded that it could not survive strict scrutiny. The government argued that differential treatment of men and women served the purpose of administrative convenience, since, as an empirical matter, wives were usually dependent on their husbands for at least half their support, whereas husbands were rarely similarly dependent upon their wives.

“The Government offers no concrete evidence [tending] to support its view that such differential treatment in fact saves the Government any money. [In] any case, [when] we enter the realm of ‘strict judicial scrutiny,’ there can be no doubt that ‘administrative convenience’ is not a shibboleth, the mere recitation of which dictates constitutionality. On the contrary, any statutory scheme which draws a sharp line between the sexes, solely for the purpose of achieving administrative convenience, necessarily commands ‘dissimilar treatment for men and women who are [similarly] situated,’ and, therefore, involves the ‘very kind of arbitrary legislative choice forbidden by the [Constitution.]’ [Reed.]”

In a separate opinion joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Blackmun, Justice Powell concurred in the judgment but expressly disassociated himself from Justice Brennan’s assertion that classifications based on sex are suspect. Justice Powell thought that in light of Reed it was unnecessary to reach that question in order to invalidate the statute. Moreover, he noted that the equal rights amendment, which had been passed by Congress and was then pending ratification by the states, would, if adopted, resolve the issue.

“If this Amendment is duly adopted, it will represent the will of the people accomplished in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. By acting prematurely and unnecessarily, [the] Court has assumed a decisional responsibility at the very time when state legislatures, functioning within the traditional democratic processes, are debating the proposed Amendment.”

Justice Stewart also concurred in the judgment.

Justice Rehnquist dissented without opinion.

Note: From Reed to Craig v. Boren: Evolution and Doctrinal Confusion

Reed inaugurated a period of intense judicial interest in gender classifications, and the Court began to use a variety of techniques to invalidate laws embodying distinctions based on sex.

1. Due process and conclusive presumptions. A few months after Reed, in Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645 (1972), a divided Court struck down an Illinois statute that automatically made children of unwed fathers wards of the state on the death of their mothers. In contrast, unwed mothers could be deprived of their children only on a showing that they were unfit parents. The Court held that this scheme deprived fathers of due process of law by erecting a “conclusive presumption” of unfitness. In Cleveland Board of Education v. LaFleur, 414 U.S. 632 (1974), the Court used a similar technique to invalidate regulations requiring a school teacher to take maternity leave well before the expected birth date of her child. The Court held that the due process clause did not permit a “conclusive presumption” that pregnant women were medically unfit to teach. (In Weinberger v. Salfi, 422 U.S. 749 (1975), the Court sharply restricted use of the “conclusive presumption” technique for attacking statutory classifications. For a more detailed discussion of the problem, see Chapter 6, section G2, infra.)

In his concurrence in the judgment, Justice Powell declared that “[it] seems to me that equal protection analysis is the appropriate frame of reference”:

A range of possible school board goals emerge from the cases. Several may be put to one side. The records before us abound with proof that a principal purpose behind the adoption of the regulations was to keep visibly pregnant teachers out of the sight of school-children. The boards do not advance this today as a legitimate objective, yet its initial primacy casts a shadow over these cases. Moreover, most of the after-the-fact rationalizations proposed by these boards are unsupported in the records. The boards emphasize teacher absenteeism, classroom discipline, the safety of schoolchildren, and the safety of the expectant mother and her unborn child. No doubt these are legitimate concerns. But the boards have failed to demonstrate that these interests are in fact threatened by the continued employment of pregnant teachers....

[The] classifications chosen by these boards, so far as we have been shown, are either counterproductive or irrationally overinclusive even with regard to [the] significant, nonillusory goal [of ensuring continuity of personnel within a classroom.] Accordingly, in my opinion these regulations are invalid under rational-basis standards of equal protection review.

Although Justice Powell noted that “[most] school teachers are women, a certain percentage of them are pregnant at any given time, and pregnancy is a normal biological function,” he did not think it necessary to decide “whether sex-based classifications invoke strict judicial scrutiny, for example, Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677 (1973), or whether these regulations involve sex classifications at all. Whether the challenged aspects of the regulations constitute sex classifications..., they must at least rationally serve some legitimate articulated or obvious state interest.” Note that the due process approach in LaFleur did not rest on any showing that the challenged practice was gender-based or that male teachers were treated differently with respect to potentially disabling physical conditions.

To what extent does the Court’s holding rest simultaneously on both the ways in which men and women are the same—for example, in their ability to serve competently on juries—and the ways in which they are different—for example, in their perspective on the questions jurors are asked to decide? Justice White’s opinion for the Court observed that “women are sufficiently numerous and distinct from men...that if they are systematically eliminated from jury panels, the Sixth Amendment’s fair-cross-section requirement cannot be satisfied.” He relied on the Court’s earlier opinion in Ballard v. United States, 329 U.S. 187 (1946), where the Court had held that a federal court’s exclusion of female potential jurors in a state where women were eligible as a matter of state law to serve violated the sixth amendment:

The thought is that the factors which tend to influence the action of women are the same as those which influence the action of men—personality, background, economic status—and not sex. Yet it is not enough to say that women when sitting as jurors neither act nor tend to act as a class. Men likewise do not act as a class. But, if the shoe were on the other foot, who would claim that a jury was truly representative of the community if all men were intentionally and systematically excluded from the panel? The truth is that the two sexes are not fungible; a community made up exclusively of one is different from a community composed of both; the subtle interplay of influence one on the other is among the imponderables. To insulate the courtroom from either may not in a given case make an iota of difference. Yet a flavor, a distinct quality is lost if either sex is excluded. The exclusion of one may indeed make the jury less representative of the community than would be true if an economic or racial group were excluded.

3. Equal protection. In Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636 (1975), the Court used equal protection analysis to strike down a section of the Social Security Act entitling a widowed mother, but not a widowed father, to benefits based on the earnings of the deceased spouse. The Court characterized Frontiero as standing for the proposition that gender classifications based on “archaic and overbroad [generalizations]” were unconstitutional. The statutory distinction between widows and widowers ran afoul of this principle by assuming “that male workers’ earnings are vital to the support of their families, while the earnings of female wage earners do not significantly contribute to their families’ support.”

Less than a month after Wiesenfeld, the Court renewed its attack on “old notions” regarding sex roles as a sufficient justification for gender classifications. A Utah statute required parents to support their male children until age twenty-one, but required support of female children only until age eighteen. In Stanton v. Stanton, 421 U.S. 7 (1975), the Court held that this distinction violated the equal protection clause. The state argued that it was generally the responsibility of men to provide a home, and that they therefore needed a good education before undertaking this task. Women, in contrast, “tend generally to mature physically, emotionally and mentally before boys” and “tend to marry earlier.” The Court categorically rejected this justification.

Notwithstanding the “old notions” to which the [state refers], we perceive nothing rational in the distinction drawn by [the statute]. [No] longer is the female destined solely for the home and the rearing of the family, and only the male for the marketplace and the world of ideas. Women's activities and responsibilities are increasing and expanding.

4. Unsuccessful challenges to gender classifications. Although the post-Reed period was marked by dramatic advances for opponents of gender classifications, not all of their attacks were successful.

In Kahn v. Shevin, 416 U.S. 351 (1974), for example, the Court sustained a Florida statute providing a property tax exemption for widows but not for widowers. The Court held that the distinction was justified by the greater financial difficulties confronting a lone woman: "Whether from overt discrimination or from the socialization process of a male-dominated culture, the job market is inhospitable to the woman seeking any but the lowest paid jobs."

Similarly, in Schlesinger v. Ballard, 419 U.S. 498 (1975), the Court sustained a federal statute granting women in the Navy a longer period in which to achieve mandatory promotion than men. The Court reasoned that this distinction, unlike those disapproved in Frontiero and Reed, was not based on "archaic and overbroad generalizations." Rather, it reflected the "demonstrable fact that male and female line officers in the Navy are not similarly situated with respect to opportunities for professional service." Since women were precluded from participating in combat and most sea duty, they would "not generally have compiled records of seagoing service comparable to those of male lieutenants."

Can Kahn be distinguished from Reed v. Reed or Frontiero? Is the Florida statute an example of gender-conscious affirmative action or does it simply perpetuate stereotypes about the economic division of labor within marriages? This issue is explored further at pages 674-675, infra.

5. What constitutes a gender-based distinction? In Geduldig v. Aiello, 417 U.S. 484 (1974), the Court rejected an attack on a California disability insurance program that excluded pregnancy-related disabilities from coverage. The Court held that California's insurance limitation was justified by the state's "legitimate interest in maintaining the self-supporting nature of its insurance program." In a footnote, the Court added that the case was "a far cry from cases like [Reed] and [Frontiero], involving discrimination based on gender as such. The California insurance program does not exclude anyone from benefit eligibility because of gender but merely removes one physical condition—pregnancy—from the list of compensable disabilities."

Geduldig is one of the few equal protection cases involving a claim of sex discrimination in which the members of the Court disagreed over whether the challenged practice even involved gender-based discrimination. In a footnote,

Justice Stewart's opinion for the Court denied that it did:

Absent a showing that distinctions involving pregnancy are mere pretexts designed to effect an invidious discrimination against the members of one sex or the other, lawmakers are constitutionally free to include or exclude pregnancy from the coverage of legislation such as this on any reasonable basis, just as with respect to any other physical condition.

The lack of identity between the excluded disability and gender as such under this insurance program becomes clear upon the most cursory analysis. The program divides potential recipients into two groups—pregnant women and non-pregnant persons. While the first group is exclusively female, the second includes members of both sexes. The fiscal and actuarial benefits of the program thus accrue to members of both sexes.

In dissent, Justice Brennan noted that under the California plan, “compensation is denied for disabilities suffered in connection with a ‘normal’ pregnancy—disabilities suffered only by women.”

In my view, by singling out for less favorable treatment a gender-linked disability peculiar to women, the State has created a double standard for disability compensation: a limitation is imposed upon the disabilities for which women workers may recover, while men receive full compensation for all disabilities suffered, including those that affect only or primarily their sex, such as prostatectomies, circumcision, hemophilia, and gout. In effect, one set of rules is applied to females and another to males. Such dissimilar treatment of men and women, on the basis of physical characteristics inextricably linked to one sex, inevitably constitutes sex discrimination.

In Coleman v. Maryland Court of Appeals, 566 U.S. 30 (2012)—a case concerning the sick-leave provision of the Family and Medical Leave Act—Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justices Breyer, Sotomayor, and Kagan, called for Geduldig to be overruled:

First, “[a]s an abstract statement,” it is “simply false” that “a classification based on pregnancy is gender-neutral.” Rather, discriminating on the basis of pregnancy “[b]y definition...discriminates on account of sex; for it is the capacity to become pregnant which primarily differentiates the female from the male.”...

Second, pregnancy provided a central justification for the historic discrimination against women....Relatedly, discrimination against pregnant employees was often “based not on the pregnancy itself but on predictions concerning the future behavior of the pregnant woman when her child was born or on views about what her behavior should be.”...

In sum, childbearing is not only a biological function unique to women. It is also inextricably intertwined with employers’ “stereotypical views about women’s commitment to work and their value as employees.” Because pregnancy discrimination is inevitably sex discrimination, and because discrimination against women is tightly interwoven with society’s beliefs about pregnancy and motherhood, I would hold that Aiello was egregiously wrong to declare that discrimination on the basis of pregnancy is not discrimination on the basis of sex.

6. The legacy of Reed. These mixed results in the period immediately following Reed sent confused signals. On the one hand, it was indisputable that the Court had become far more receptive to claims of sex discrimination. It seemed clear as well that, whatever it said in its opinions, the Court was subjecting gender classifications to some form of heightened scrutiny. Yet, on the other hand, the justices went to extraordinary lengths to leave intact prior equal protection doctrine that had supported the old approach. Thus, in Taylor, Stanley, and LaFleur, the Court managed to overturn gender classifications without any substantial reliance on equal protection analysis. While the Court did resort to equal protection principles in Reed, Stanton, and Wiesenfeld, it purported to use only low-level, rational basis review to invalidate the challenged statutes. And when confronted with an express invitation to afford heightened scrutiny for gender classifications in Frontiero, five justices declined to accept. In the case that follows, the Court for the first time applied heightened review to a gender classification.

Craig v. Boren

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The interaction of two sections of an Oklahoma statute prohibits the sale of “nonintoxicating” 3.2% beer to males under the age of 21 and to females under the age of 18. The question to be decided is whether such a gender-based differential constitutes a denial to males 18–20 years of age of the equal protection of the laws in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment....

[Analysis] may appropriately begin with the reminder that Reed emphasized that statutory classifications that distinguish between males and females are “subject to scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause.” To withstand constitutional challenge, previous cases establish that classifications by gender must serve important governmental objectives and must be substantially related to achievement of those objectives. Thus, in Reed, the objectives of “reducing the workload on probate courts,” and “avoiding intrafamily controversy,” were deemed of insufficient importance to sustain use of an overt gender criterion in the appointment of administrators of intestate decedents’ estates. Decisions following Reed similarly have rejected administrative ease and convenience as sufficiently important objectives to justify gender-based classifications.⁶ ...

We turn then to the question whether, under Reed, the difference between males and females with respect to the purchase of 3.2% beer warrants the differential in age drawn by the Oklahoma statute. We conclude that it does not.

We accept for purposes of discussion the District Court’s identification of the objective underlying [the statute] as the enhancement of traffic safety. Clearly, the protection of public health and safety represents an important function of state and local governments. However, appellees’ statistics in our view cannot support the conclusion that the gender-based distinction closely serves to achieve that objective and therefore the distinction cannot under Reed withstand equal protection challenge....

Even [if the statistical evidence offered by the appellees were] accepted as accurate, it nevertheless offers only a weak answer to the equal protection question presented here. The most focused and relevant of the statistical surveys, arrests of 18–20-year-olds for alcohol-related driving offenses, exemplifies the ultimate unpersuasiveness of this evidentiary record. Viewed in terms of the correlation between sex and the actual activity that Oklahoma seeks to regulate —driving while under the influence of alcohol—the statistics broadly establish that .18% of females and 2% of males in that age group are arrested for that offense. While such a disparity is not trivial in a statistical sense, it hardly can form the basis for employment of a gender line as a classifying device. Certainly if maleness is to serve as a proxy for drinking and driving, a correlation of 2% must be considered an unduly tenuous “fit.” Indeed, prior cases have consistently rejected the use of sex as a decisionmaking factor even though the statutes in question certainly rested on far more predictive empirical relationships than this.¹³ ...

There is no reason to belabor this line of analysis. It is unrealistic to expect either members of the judiciary or state officials to be well versed in the rigors of experimental or statistical technique. But this merely illustrates that proving broad sociological propositions by statistics is a dubious business, and one that inevitably is in tension with the normative philosophy that underlies the Equal Protection Clause. Suffice to say that the showing offered by the appellees does not satisfy us that sex represents a legitimate, accurate proxy for the regulation of drinking and driving. In fact, when it is further recognized that Oklahoma's statute prohibits only the selling of 3.2% beer to young males and not their drinking the beverage once acquired (even after purchase by their 18–20-year-old female companions), the relationship between gender and traffic safety becomes far too tenuous to satisfy Reed's requirement that the gender-based difference be substantially related to achievement of the statutory objective.

We hold, therefore, that under Reed, Oklahoma's 3.2% beer statute invidiously discriminates against males 18–20 years of age....

MR. JUSTICE POWELL, concurring.

I join the opinion of the Court as I am in general agreement with it. I do have reservations as to some of the discussion concerning the appropriate standard for equal protection analysis and the relevance of the statistical evidence.

Reed and subsequent cases involving gender-based classifications make clear that the Court subjects such classifications to a more critical examination than is normally applied when “fundamental” constitutional rights and “suspect classes” are not present.*

I view this as a relatively easy case. No one questions the legitimacy or importance of the asserted governmental objective: the promotion of highway safety. The decision of the case turns on whether the state legislature, by the classification it has chosen, has adopted a means that bears a “fair and substantial relation” to this objective.

It seems to me that the statistics offered by appellees and relied upon by the District Court do tend generally to support the view that young men drive more, possibly are inclined to drink more, and—for various reasons—are involved in more accidents than young women. Even so, I am not persuaded that these facts and the inferences fairly drawn from them justify this classification based on a three-year age differential between the sexes, and especially one that is so easily circumvented as to be virtually meaningless. Putting it differently, this gender-based classification does not bear a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation.

MR. JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring.

There is only one Equal Protection Clause. It requires every State to govern impartially. It does not direct the courts to apply one standard of review in some cases and a different standard in other cases. Whatever criticism may be leveled at a judicial opinion implying that there are at least three such standards applies with the same force to a double standard.

I am inclined to believe that what has become known as the two-tiered analysis of equal protection claims does not describe a completely logical method of deciding cases, but rather is a method the Court has employed to explain decisions that actually apply a single standard in a reasonably consistent fashion. I also suspect that a careful explanation of the reasons motivating particular decisions may contribute more to an identification of that standard than an attempt to articulate it in all-encompassing terms. It may therefore be appropriate for me to state the principal reasons which persuaded me to join the Court's opinion.

In this case, the classification is not as obnoxious as some the Court has condemned, nor as inoffensive as some the Court has accepted. It is objectionable because it is based on an accident of birth, because it is a mere remnant of the now almost universally rejected tradition of discriminating against males in this age bracket, and because, to the extent it reflects any physical difference between males and females, it is actually perverse.⁴ The question then is whether the traffic safety justification put forward by the State is sufficient to make an otherwise offensive classification acceptable.

The classification is not totally irrational. For the evidence does indicate that there are more males than females in this age bracket who drive and also more who drink. Nevertheless, there are several reasons why I regard the justification as unacceptable. It is difficult to believe that the statute was actually intended to cope with the problem of traffic safety, since it has only a minimal effect on access to a not very intoxicating beverage and does not prohibit its consumption. Moreover, the empirical data submitted by the State accentuate the unfairness of treating all 18–20-year-old males as inferior to their female counterparts. The legislation imposes a restraint on 100% of the males in the class allegedly because about 2% of them have probably violated one or more laws relating to the consumption of alcoholic beverages. It is unlikely that this law will have a significant deterrent effect either on that 2% or on the law-abiding 98%. But even assuming some such slight benefit, it does not seem to me that an insult to all of the young men of the State can be justified by visiting the sins of the 2% on the 98%.

[Concurring opinions by Justices Stewart and Blackmun and a dissenting opinion by Chief Justice Burger are omitted.]

MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST, dissenting.

The Court's disposition of this case is objectionable on two grounds. First is its conclusion that men challenging a gender-based statute which treats them less favorably than women may invoke a more stringent standard of judicial review than pertains to most other types of classifications. Second is the Court's enunciation of this standard, without citation to any source, as being that "classifications by gender must serve important governmental objectives and must be substantially related to achievement of those objectives." The only redeeming feature of the Court's opinion, to my mind, is that it apparently signals a retreat by those who joined the plurality opinion in [Frontiero] from their view that sex is a "suspect" classification for purposes of equal protection analysis. I think the Oklahoma statute challenged here need pass only the "rational basis" equal protection analysis....

Most obviously unavailable to support any kind of special scrutiny in this case, is a history or pattern of past discrimination, such as was relied on by the plurality in Frontiero to support its invocation of strict scrutiny. There is no suggestion in the Court's opinion that males in this age group are in any way peculiarly disadvantaged, subject to systematic discriminatory treatment, or otherwise in need of special solicitude from the courts....

The Court's conclusion that a law which treats males less favorably than females "must serve important governmental objectives and must be substantially related to achievement of those objectives" apparently comes out of thin air. The Equal Protection Clause contains no such language, and none of our previous cases adopt that standard. I would think we have had enough difficulty with the two standards of review which our cases have recognized—the norm of "rational basis," and the "compelling state interest" required where a "suspect classification" is involved—so as to counsel weightily against the insertion of still another "standard" between those two. How is this Court to divine what objectives are important? How is it to determine whether a particular law is "substantially" related to the achievement of such objective, rather than related in some other way to its achievement? Both of the phrases used are so diaphanous and elastic as to invite subjective judicial preferences or prejudices relating to particular types of legislation, masquerading as judgments whether such legislation is directed at "important" objectives or, whether the relationship to those objectives is "substantial" enough....

The Court "accept[s] for purposes of discussion" the District Court's finding that the purpose of the provisions in question was traffic safety, and proceeds to examine the statistical evidence in the record in order to decide if "the gender-based distinction closely serves to achieve that objective." [One] need not immerse oneself in the fine points of statistical analysis, however, in order to see the weaknesses in the Court's attempted denigration of the evidence at hand.

One survey of arrest statistics assembled in 1973 indicated that males in the 18–20 age group were arrested for “driving under the influence” almost 18 times as often as their female counterparts, and for “drunkenness” in a ratio of almost 10 to 1. Accepting, as the Court does, appellants’ comparison of the total figures with 1973 Oklahoma census data, this survey indicates a 2% arrest rate among males in the age group, as compared to a .18% rate among females....

The Court’s criticism of the statistics relied on by the District Court conveys the impression that a legislature in enacting a new law is to be subjected to the judicial equivalent of a doctoral examination in statistics. Legislatures are not held to any rules of evidence such as those which may govern courts or other administrative bodies, and are entitled to draw factual conclusions on the basis of the determination of probable cause which an arrest by a police officer normally represents. In this situation, they could reasonably infer that the incidence of drunk driving is a good deal higher than the incidence of arrest.

And while, [such] statistics may be distorted as a result of stereotyping, the legislature is not required to prove before a court that its statistics are perfect. In any event, if stereotypes are as pervasive as the Court suggests, they may in turn influence the conduct of the men and women in question, and cause the young men to conform to the wild and reckless image which is their stereotype....

[The] Court notes that only 2% of males (as against .18% of females) in the age group were arrested for drunk driving, and that this very low figure establishes “an unduly tenuous ‘fit’” between maleness and drunk driving in the 18–20-year-old group. On this point the Court misconceives the nature of the equal protection inquiry....

[The] clearest demonstration of this is the fact that the precise argument made by the Court would be equally applicable to a flat bar on such purchases by anyone, male or female, in the 18–20 age group....What the Court’s argument is relevant to is not equal protection, but due process—whether there are enough persons in the category who drive while drunk to justify a bar against purchases by all members of the group....

Note: Heightened Scrutiny for Gender Classifications?

1. The relevance of heightened scrutiny. Since Craig, the Court has not been altogether consistent in how it articulates the appropriate standard of review in gender discrimination cases. For example, in Michael M. v. Sonoma County Superior Court, page 664, infra, Justice Rehnquist, writing for a plurality of the Court, propounded a seemingly less stringent test: “[This] Court has consistently upheld statutes where the gender classification is not invidious, but rather realistically reflects the fact that the sexes are not similarly situated in certain circumstances.” On the other hand, in United States v. Virginia, pages 654-661, infra, Justice Ginsburg, writing for the Court, announced a seemingly more stringent test: “[The] reviewing court must determine whether the proffered justification is ‘exceedingly persuasive.’ The burden of justification is demanding and it rests entirely on the State.” As you read the material that follows, consider the extent to which the standard of review makes a difference. Is the Court evaluating fact situations under a predetermined standard of review, or is it manipulating the standard of review so as to justify a predetermined result?

To what extent is the pressure for an “intermediate” tier of scrutiny simply a product of the solidifying in the previous decade of a two-tiered structure treating racial classification as subject to a different test than virtually all other classifications? That is, once there are two tiers of scrutiny and the outcome seems to depend primarily on the tier into which a classification is placed, does this create a strong pressure for creating additional tiers?

2. Arguments for heightened scrutiny. Assuming that racial classifications require heightened scrutiny, are there persuasive reasons to accord gender classifications similar treatment? Consider the following possibilities:

a. Original understandings. In The Slaughter-House Cases, Justice Miller began his consideration of the fourteenth amendment by observing that its “one pervading purpose” was “the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him.” Is there anything in the history of the fourteenth amendment that provides analogous support for heightened scrutiny of gender classifications? Consider the following observations made by Justice O’Connor:

The Civil War and the emancipation of former slaves brought the suffrage question to the forefront. If newly freed blacks were to be guaranteed the same civil rights, including suffrage, as all other citizens, there was no reason that women should not also be swept up by the momentum and included in the resulting expansion of the right to vote. The reformers were in for quite a shock, however. The draft of the Fourteenth Amendment, introduced into Congress in 1866, sought to incorporate an unprecedented gender restriction into the Constitution. The draft declared that the right to vote should not be “denied to any of the male inhabitants” of a state.

The reformers realized that if this proposal were adopted, yet another constitutional amendment would be required to give women the right to vote in federal elections. Elizabeth Cady Stanton recognized what a monumental task securing such an amendment would be. She believed that the women's suffrage movement would be set back a full century if the proposal were adopted. In fact, she was not far wrong: it took another sixty years. The Fourteenth Amendment, which includes the word "male" not once but three times, was ratified in July 1868. The Fifteenth Amendment, which followed less than two years later, also failed to provide the suffragists with any cause for optimism. It decreed that no citizen could be denied the right to vote because of "race, color or previous condition of servitude," but made no mention of gender. Taken together, the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments caused women to wonder if they were indeed fully citizens of the United States.

O'Connor, The History of the Women's Suffrage Movement, 49 Vand. L. Rev. 657, 660–661 (1996). As a result of their concern with section 2's provision requiring the reduction of representation in the House of Representatives for states that "denied [the right to vote] to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States," infuriated feminists, such as Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cady Stanton, actually worked to defeat the fourteenth amendment. See E. Flexner, Century of Struggle 146–148 (1975); A. Keyssar, The Right to Vote: The Contested History of Democracy in the United States 172–223 (2000).

Even apart from the history surrounding section 2 of the fourteenth amendment, it is hard to make the case that the framers had any intention of bringing into question laws that discriminated on the basis of gender. As Justice Ginsburg wrote in an article published before her appointment to the Court:

Boldly dynamic interpretation, departing radically from the original understanding, is required to tie to the fourteenth amendment's equal protection clause a command that government treat men and women as individuals equal in rights, responsibilities, and opportunities....

When the post-Civil War amendments were added to the Constitution, women were not accorded the vote. [Married] women in many states could not contract, hold property, litigate on their own behalf, or even control their own earnings. The fourteenth amendment left all that untouched.?

Ginsburg, Sexual Equality under the Fourteenth and Equal Rights Amendments, 1979 Wash. U. L.Q. 161, 161–163. In a similar vein, Justice Scalia, asked whether “we’ve gone off in error by applying the 14th Amendment” to sex discrimination, responded: “Yes, yes. Sorry, to tell you that....But, you know, if indeed the current society has come to different views, that’s fine. You do not need the Constitution to reflect the wishes of the current society. Certainly the Constitution does not require discrimination on the basis of sex. The only issue is whether it prohibits it. It doesn’t. Nobody ever thought that that’s what it meant. Nobody ever voted for that. If the current society wants to outlaw discrimination by sex, hey we have things called legislatures, and they enact things called laws. You don’t need a constitution to keep things up-to-date. All you need is a legislature and a ballot box.” The Originalist, Cal. Law., Jan. 2011, at 33.

b. Arguments by analogy. Even if the framers of the equal protection clause did not specifically intend to ban gender discrimination, might the clause be read to require a special burden of justification for classifications that are similar in relevant respects to racial classifications? Does gender discrimination satisfy this test? For example, should gender discrimination be treated like racial discrimination because it is based on “a trait that is immutable and highly visible” and therefore “lends itself to a system of thought dominated by stereotype, which automatically consigns an individual to a general category [often] implying the inferiority of the person so categorized”? Karst, Foreword: Equal Citizenship under the Fourteenth Amendment, 91 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 23 (1977). Because the pervasive nature of sexual stereotypes and the historical subjugation of women make gender “like” race for purposes of the equal protection clause? Because women, like blacks, are effectively excluded from the political process?

For a criticism of the Court’s reliance on the race analogy, see Siegel, She the People: The Nineteenth Amendment, Sex Equality, Federalism, and the Family, 115 Harv. L. Rev. 949, 960 (2002). Siegel argues that seeing gender discrimination through the lens of race [obscures] the extent to which gender status regulation had its own constitutional and common law history and distinctive social forms. Doctrinal effacement of this history [has] two important consequences. By enjoining sex discrimination on the ground that it resembled race discrimination prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court suggested that the new body of sex discrimination doctrine lacked independent grounding in our constitutional history. At the same time, the Court’s effort to reason by analogy deflected attention from the ways that race and gender status regulation intersect and [differ].

Instead of focusing on the fourteenth amendment alone, Siegel advocates a “synthetic” approach that reads the fourteenth amendment against the backdrop of the struggle to attain women’s suffrage, which culminated in the nineteenth amendment. (For a more general defense of an approach that attempts to integrate language from different parts of the constitutional text, see Amar, Intratextualism, 112 Harv. L. Rev. 748 (1999).)

Of course, on its face, the nineteenth amendment does no more than guarantee women the right to vote. But Siegel argues that its adoption constituted a rejection of two interrelated arguments: that men adequately represented women within the family, and that the family, as so understood, was immune from federal regulation. Rejection of these arguments, in turn, should be read back into the fourteenth amendment conception of equality.

Given that the language of the nineteenth amendment more nearly tracks the language of the fifteenth amendment, which has been given an extremely narrow reading (protecting against racial discrimination only with respect to formal participation in the political process and not even reaching questions of vote dilution), does reading the nineteenth amendment in tandem with the fourteenth amendment instead raise interpretive problems?

c. “Archaic” gender distinctions. Should gender distinctions be subject to heightened scrutiny when they are “archaic”? Consider J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust 167 (1980):

[Most] laws classifying by sex weren’t passed this morning or even the day before yesterday: in fact, it is rare to see a gender-based classification enacted since the New Deal. In general, women couldn’t even vote until the Nineteenth Amendment was ratified in 1920, and most of these laws probably predate even that: they should be invalidated.

Compare Michael M., in which the Court upheld California’s statutory rape law making men, but not women, criminally liable for acts of sexual intercourse involving a female under age eighteen. In a footnote to his plurality opinion, Justice Rehnquist noted that the California legislature had recently rejected a proposal to make the statute sex-neutral.

That is enough to answer petitioner’s contention that the statute was the “accidental byproduct of a traditional way of thinking about females.” Certainly this decision of the California Legislature is as good a source as is this Court in deciding what is “current” and what is “outmoded” in the perception of women.

d. The problem of overgeneralization. Can heightened scrutiny of even modern statutes be defended on the ground that gender classifications pose a peculiar risk of unthinking overgeneralization?

Consider the suggestion in Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718 (1982), that a skeptical attitude toward gender classifications is designed to ensure that government action is “determined through reasoned analysis rather than through the mechanical application of traditional, often inaccurate assertions about the proper roles of men and women.” Under this view, judicial inspection of the means/ends connection and the substantiality of the state’s interest is intended to ensure that such “reasoned analysis” is in fact at work.

3. Gender segregation. As the preceding discussion suggests, gender classifications are like racial classifications in some respects but different in others. Does the intermediate scrutiny announced in Craig therefore represent a sensible compromise, recognizing that the analogy has force in some contexts but not in others? In what contexts is the analogy inappropriate?

Consider in this connection the problem of gender segregation. In some situations, gender segregation is relatively uncontroversial:

[The] primary evil of [racial segregation] was that [it] designedly and effectively marked off all black persons as degraded, dirty, less than fully developed persons who were unfit for full membership in the political, social, and moral community. [It] is worth observing that the social realities of sexually segregated bathrooms appear to be different. [There] is no notion of the possibility of contamination from use; or [of] inferiority or superiority. What seems to be involved—at least in part—is the importance of inculcating and preserving a sense of secrecy concerning the genitalia of the opposite sex.

R. Wasserstrom, Philosophy and Social Issues 21 (1980).

Is the analogy between gender and racial segregation more persuasive in other settings? In Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan, supra, the Court struck down the exclusion of men from the University’s school of nursing, stating that “excluding males from admission to the School of Nursing tends to perpetuate the stereotyped view of nursing as an exclusively woman’s job.” The Court was careful to note, however, that it was not ruling on the constitutionality of the exclusion of males from other schools in the Mississippi University for Women or on the permissibility of a general policy of “separate but equal” education for men and women.

After Hogan, could the Mississippi University for Women establish an all-female school of mechanical engineering? Could it create two schools of nursing, each one sex-segregated (so that its maintenance of an all-female school did not deny anyone the ability to study nursing at the University)? The Court threw some light on these questions in United States v. Virginia, a case considered in more detail in the following section. Are state-supported, sexually segregated athletic programs unconstitutional because they reinforce stereotypes concerning women's athletic ability? Would integrated programs be unconstitutional because they fail to take account of differences between men and women and might therefore deny women an equal chance to participate?

3. Archaic and Overbroad Generalizations versus “Real” Differences

In the cases decided since Craig, the Court has attempted to assimilate the analysis of gender discrimination into its basic equal protection methodology. Thus, it has looked (albeit with heightened scrutiny) to see whether a law or policy treats men and women differently. If it does, it has asked whether the difference in treatment corresponds to a relevant difference between the genders.

As applied to gender discrimination, this methodology has been criticized on a number of grounds. Some critics have complained that the differences between men and women that the Court has relied on to justify different treatment are not “natural” or inevitable. Instead, they are “constructed” by the very legal regime that they are used to defend. Others have argued that the Court’s insistence on “facial” or “formal” equality has harmed women by ignoring important differences between the genders. Treating men and women identically is said to hold women to an implicitly male standard. Still others have complained that the preoccupation with “sameness” and “difference” is diversionary and that the Court should instead focus on fundamental power imbalances between the genders. On this view, constitutional doctrine should be reformulated so as to end male domination.

As you read the following material, consider which, if any, of these criticisms is valid. Has the Court responded to the most serious obstacles to gender equality? Is such a response possible from within standard constitutional methodology?

United States v. Virginia

518 U.S. 515 (1996)

JUSTICE GINSBURG delivered the opinion of the Court.

Virginia’s public institutions of higher learning include an incomparable military college, Virginia Military Institute (VMI). The United States maintains that the Constitution's equal protection guarantee precludes Virginia from reserving exclusively to men the unique educational opportunities VMI affords. We agree.

I

Founded in 1839, VMI is today the sole single-sex school among Virginia's 15 public institutions of higher learning. VMI's distinctive mission is to produce "citizen-soldiers," men prepared for leadership in civilian life and in military service. VMI pursues this mission through pervasive training of a kind not available anywhere else in Virginia. Assigning prime place to character development, VMI uses an "adversative method" modeled on English public schools and once characteristic of military instruction....

VMI has notably succeeded in its mission to produce leaders; among its alumni are military generals, Members of Congress, and business executives. The school's alumni overwhelmingly perceive that their VMI training helped them to realize their personal goals. VMI's endowment reflects the loyalty of its graduates; VMI has the largest per-student endowment of all undergraduate institutions in the Nation....

VMI produces its "citizen-soldiers" through "an adversative, or doubting, model of education" which features "physical rigor, mental stress, absolute equality of treatment, absence of privacy, minute regulation of behavior, and indoctrination in desirable values."...

VMI cadets live in spartan barracks where surveillance is constant and privacy nonexistent; they wear uniforms, eat together in the mess hall, and regularly participate in drills. Entering students are incessantly exposed to the rat line, "an extreme form of the adversative model," comparable in intensity to Marine Corps boot camp. Tormenting and punishing, the rat line bonds new cadets to their fellow sufferers and, when they have completed the 7-month experience, to their former tormentors....

[In 1990, the United States sued Virginia and VMI, alleging that VMI's admission policy violated the equal protection clause. At the conclusion of a trial, the district court found that "some women, at least" would want to attend

VMI and were capable of all the activities required of VMI cadets. The district court nonetheless ruled in favor of VMI. The court acknowledged that women were denied a unique education opportunity available only at VMI, but held that if women were admitted, “some aspects of the [school’s] distinctive method would be altered.” Specifically, allowance for personal privacy would have to be made, physical education requirements would have to be altered, and the adversative environment could not survive unmodified. The court found that these changes would impinge on the state interest in diversity in public education.

The court of appeals reversed, holding that “neither the goal of producing citizen soldiers nor VMI’s implementing methodology is inherently unsuitable to women.” It remanded the case to the district court for purposes of selecting a remedy.]

In response to the Fourth Circuit’s ruling, Virginia proposed a parallel program for women: Virginia Women’s Institute for Leadership (VWIL). The 4-year, state-sponsored undergraduate program would be located at Mary Baldwin College, a private liberal arts school for women, and would be open, initially, to about 25 to 30 students. Although VWIL would share VMI’s mission—to produce “citizen-soldiers”—the VWIL program would differ, as does Mary Baldwin College, from VMI in academic offerings, methods of education, and financial resources.

The average combined SAT score of entrants at Mary Baldwin is about 100 points lower than the score for VMI freshmen. Mary Baldwin’s faculty holds “significantly fewer Ph.D.’s than the faculty at VMI,” and receives significantly lower salaries. While VMI offers degrees in liberal arts, the sciences, and engineering, Mary Baldwin, at the time of trial, offered only bachelor of arts degrees. A VWIL student seeking to earn an engineering degree could gain one, without public support, by attending Washington University in St. Louis, Missouri, for two years, paying the required private tuition.

Experts in educating women at the college level composed the Task Force charged with designing the VWIL program; Task Force members were drawn from Mary Baldwin’s own faculty and staff. Training its attention on methods of instruction appropriate for “most women,” the Task Force determined that a military model would be “wholly inappropriate” for VWIL....

In lieu of VMI’s adversative method, the VWIL Task Force favored “a cooperative method which reinforces self-esteem.” In addition to the standard bachelor of arts program offered at Mary Baldwin, VWIL students would take courses in leadership, complete an off-campus leadership externship, participate in community service projects, and assist in arranging a speaker series.

Virginia represented that it will provide equal financial support for in-state VWIL students and VMI cadets, and the VMI Foundation agreed to supply a $5.4625 million endowment for the VWIL program. Mary Baldwin's own endowment is about $19 million; VMI's is $131 million. Mary Baldwin will add $35 million to its endowment based on future commitments; VMI will add $220 million. The VMI Alumni Association has developed a network of employers interested in hiring VMI graduates. The Association has agreed to open its network to VWIL graduates, but those graduates will not have the advantage afforded by a VMI degree....

[The district court approved this remedial plan, and the court of appeals affirmed.]...

IV

[Parties] who seek to defend gender-based government action must demonstrate an “exceedingly persuasive justification” for that action....

[The] burden of justification is demanding and it rests entirely on the State. The State must show “at least that the [challenged] classification serves ‘important governmental objectives and that the discriminatory means employed’ are ‘substantially related to the achievement of those objectives.’” The justification must be genuine, not hypothesized or invented post hoc in response to litigation. And it must not rely on overbroad generalizations about the different talents, capacities, or preferences of males and females.

The heightened review standard our precedent establishes does not make sex a proscribed classification. Supposed “inherent differences” are no longer accepted as a ground for race or national origin classifications. See Loving v. Virginia. Physical differences between men and women, however, are enduring.

“Inherent differences” between men and women, we have come to appreciate, remain cause for celebration, but not for denigration of the members of either sex or for artificial constraints on an individual’s opportunity. Sex classifications may be used to compensate women “for particular economic disabilities [they have] suffered,” to “promote equal employment opportunity,” to advance full development of the talent and capacities of our Nation's people. But such classifications may not be used, as they once were, to create or perpetuate the legal, social, and economic inferiority of women.

Measuring the record in this case against the review standard just described, we conclude that Virginia has shown no "exceedingly persuasive justification" for excluding all women from the citizen-soldier training afforded by VMI. We therefore affirm the Fourth Circuit's initial judgment, which held that Virginia had violated the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. Because the remedy proffered by Virginia—the Mary Baldwin VWIL program—does not cure the constitutional violation, i.e., it does not provide equal opportunity, we reverse the Fourth Circuit's final judgment in this case.

[Virginia] asserts two justifications in defense of VMI's exclusion of women. First, the Commonwealth contends, "single-sex education provides important educational benefits," and the option of single-sex education contributes to "diversity in educational approaches." Second, the Commonwealth argues, "the unique VMI method of character development and leadership training," the school's adversative approach, would have to be modified were VMI to admit women. We consider these two justifications in turn.

A

Single-sex education affords pedagogical benefits to at least some students, Virginia emphasizes, and that reality is uncontested in this litigation. Similarly, it is not disputed that diversity among public educational institutions can serve the public good. But Virginia has not shown that VMI was established, or has been maintained, with a view to diversifying, by its categorical exclusion of women, educational opportunities within the State. In cases of this genre,...a tenable justification must describe actual state purposes, not rationalizations for actions in fact differently grounded....

Virginia next argues that VMI's adversative method of training provides educational benefits that cannot be made available, unmodified, to women. Alterations to accommodate women would necessarily be "radical," so "drastic," Virginia asserts, as to transform, indeed "destroy," VMI's program....

[It] is uncontested that women's admission would require accommodations, primarily in arranging housing assignments and physical training programs for female cadets. It is also undisputed, however, that "the VMI methodology could be used to educate women." ["Some] women," the expert testimony established, "are capable of all of the individual activities required of VMI cadets." The parties, furthermore, agree that "some women can meet the physical standards [VMI] now imposes on men."...

It may be assumed, for purposes of this decision, that most women would not choose VMI's adversative method. As Fourth Circuit Judge Motz observed, however, in her dissent from the Court of Appeals' denial of rehearing en banc, it is also probable that "many men would not want to be educated in such an environment." (On that point, even our dissenting colleague might agree.) [The] question is whether the State can constitutionally deny to women who have the will and capacity, the training and attendant opportunities that VMI uniquely affords.

The notion that admission of women would downgrade VMI's stature, destroy the adversative system and, with it, even the school, is a judgment hardly proved, a prediction hardly different from other "self-fulfilling prophecies," once routinely used to deny rights or opportunities. When women first sought admission to the bar and access to legal education, concerns of the same order were expressed. For example, in 1876, the Court of Common Pleas of Hennepin County, Minnesota, explained why women were thought ineligible for the practice of law. Women train and educate the young, the court said, which "forbids that they shall bestow that time (early and late) and labor, so essential in attaining to the eminence to which the true lawyer should ever aspire. It cannot therefore be said that the opposition of courts to the admission of females to practice...is to any extent the outgrowth of...‘old fogeyism[.]’...It arises rather from a comprehension of the magnitude of the responsibilities connected with the successful practice of law, and a desire to grade up the profession." A like fear, according to a 1925 report, accounted for Columbia Law School's resistance to women's admission, although the faculty...never maintained that women could not master legal learning....No, its argument has been...more practical. If women were admitted to the Columbia Law School, [the faculty] said, then the choicer, more manly and red-blooded graduates of our great universities would go to the Harvard Law School!...

Women's successful entry into the federal military academies, and their participation in the Nation's military forces, indicate that Virginia's fears for the future of VMI may not be solidly grounded. The State's justification for excluding all women from "citizen-soldier" training for which some are qualified, in any event, cannot rank as "exceedingly persuasive," as we have explained and applied that standard....

The State's misunderstanding...is apparent from VMI's mission: to produce "citizen-soldiers," individuals "imbued with love of learning, confident in the functions and attitudes of leadership, possessing a high sense of public service, advocates of the American democracy and free enterprise system, and ready...to defend their country in time of national peril."

Surely that goal is great enough to accommodate women, who today count as citizens in our American democracy equal in stature to men. Just as surely, the State's great goal is not substantially advanced by women's categorical exclusion, in total disregard of their individual merit, from the State's premier "citizen-soldier" corps. Virginia, in sum, "has fallen far short of establishing the 'exceedingly persuasive justification,'" that must be the solid base for any gender-defined classification.

[V]irginia chose not to eliminate, but to leave untouched, VMI's exclusionary policy. For women only, however, Virginia proposed a separate program, different in kind from VMI and unequal in tangible and intangible facilities. Having violated the Constitution's equal protection requirement, Virginia was obliged to show that its remedial proposal "directly addressed and related to" the violation, i.e., the equal protection denied to women ready, willing, and able to benefit from educational opportunities of the kind VMI offers....

VWIL affords women no opportunity to experience the rigorous military training for which VMI is famed. Instead, the VWIL program "deemphasizes" military education, and uses a "cooperative method" of education "which reinforces self-esteem."...

Virginia maintains that these methodological differences are "justified pedagogically," based on "important differences between men and women in learning and developmental needs," "psychological and sociological differences" Virginia describes as "real" and "not stereotypes."...

As earlier stated, generalizations about "the way women are," estimates of what is appropriate for most women, no longer justify denying opportunity to women whose talent and capacity place them outside the average description.

Notably, Virginia never asserted that VMI’s method of education suits most men. It is also revealing that Virginia accounted for its failure to make the VWIL experience “the entirely militaristic experience of VMI” on the ground that VWIL “is planned for women who do not necessarily expect to pursue military careers.” By that reasoning, VMI’s “entirely militaristic” program would be inappropriate for men in general or as a group, for “only about 15% of VMI cadets enter career military service.”¹⁹ ...

In myriad respects other than military training, VWIL does not qualify as VMI’s equal. VWIL’s student body, faculty, course offerings, and facilities hardly match VMI’s. Nor can the VWIL graduate anticipate the benefits associated with VMI’s 157-year history, the school’s prestige, and its influential alumni network....

Virginia, in sum, while maintaining VMI for men only, has failed to provide any “comparable single-gender women’s institution.” Instead, the Commonwealth has created a VWIL program fairly appraised as a “pale shadow” of VMI in terms of the range of curricular choices and faculty stature, funding, prestige, alumni support and influence.

Virginia’s VWIL solution is reminiscent of the remedy Texas proposed 50 years ago, in response to a state trial court’s 1946 ruling that, given the equal protection guarantee, African Americans could not be denied a legal education at a state facility. See Sweatt v. Painter. Reluctant to admit African Americans to its flagship University of Texas Law School, the State set up a separate school for Herman Sweatt and other black law students....

More important than the tangible features, the [Sweatt] Court emphasized, are “those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness” in a school, including “reputation of the faculty, experience of the administration, position and influence of the alumni, standing in the community, traditions and prestige.” Facing the marked differences reported in the Sweatt opinion, the Court unanimously ruled that Texas had not shown “substantial equality in the [separate] educational opportunities” the State offered. Accordingly, the Court held, the Equal Protection Clause required Texas to admit African Americans to the University of Texas Law School. In line with Sweatt, we rule here that Virginia has not shown substantial equality in the separate educational opportunities the State supports at VWIL and VMI....

JUSTICE THOMAS took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST, concurring in the judgment.

The Court holds first that Virginia violates the Equal Protection Clause by maintaining [VMI's] all-male admissions policy, and second that establishing the [VWIL] program does not remedy that violation. While I agree with these conclusions, I disagree with the Court's analysis and so I write separately.

I

Two decades ago in Craig v. Boren, we announced that "to withstand constitutional challenge,...classifications by gender must serve important governmental objectives and must be substantially related to achievement of those objectives." We have adhered to that standard of scrutiny ever since. While the majority adheres to this test today, it also says that the State must demonstrate an "exceedingly persuasive justification" to support a gender-based classification. It is unfortunate that the Court thereby introduces an element of uncertainty respecting the appropriate test.

While terms like "important governmental objective" and "substantially related" are hardly models of precision, they have more content and specificity than does the phrase "exceedingly persuasive justification." That phrase is best confined, as it was first used, as an observation on the difficulty of meeting the applicable test, not as a formulation of the test itself....

II

An adequate remedy in my opinion might be a demonstration by Virginia that its interest in educating men in a single-sex environment is matched by its interest in educating women in a single-sex institution. To demonstrate such, the State does not need to create two institutions with the same number of faculty PhD's, similar SAT scores, or comparable athletic fields. Nor would it necessarily require that the women's institution offer the same curriculum as the men's; one could be strong in computer science, the other could be strong in liberal arts. It would be a sufficient remedy, I think, if the two institutions offered the same quality of education and were of the same overall calibre.

If a state decides to create single-sex programs, the state would, I expect, consider the public's interest and demand in designing curricula. And rightfully so. But the state should avoid assuming demand based on stereotypes; it must not assume a priori, without evidence, that there would be no interest in a women's school of civil engineering, or in a men's school of nursing.

In the end, the women's institution Virginia proposes, VWIL, fails as a remedy, because it is distinctly inferior to the existing men's institution and will continue to be for the foreseeable future. VWIL simply is not, in any sense, the institution that VMI is....I therefore ultimately agree with the Court that Virginia has not provided an adequate remedy.

JUSTICE SCALIA, dissenting.

Today the Court shuts down an institution that has served the people of the Commonwealth of Virginia with pride and distinction for over a century and a half....

Much of the Court's opinion is devoted to deprecating the closed-mindedness of our forebears with regard to women's education, and even with regard to the treatment of women in areas that have nothing to do with education. Closed-minded they were—as every age is, including our own, with regard to matters it cannot guess, because it simply does not consider them debatable. The virtue of a democratic system with a First Amendment is that it readily enables the people, over time, to be persuaded that what they took for granted is not so, and to change their laws accordingly. That system is destroyed if the smug assurances of each age are removed from the democratic process and written into the Constitution. So to counterbalance the Court's criticism of our ancestors, let me say a word in their praise: they left us free to change. The same cannot be said of this most illiberal Court, which has embarked on a course of inscribing one after another of the current preferences of the society (and in some cases only the counter-majoritarian preferences of the society's law-trained elite) into our Basic Law. Today it enshrines the notion that no substantial educational value is to be served by an all-men's military academy—so that the decision by the people of Virginia to maintain such an institution denies equal protection to women who cannot attend that institution but can attend others. Since it is entirely clear that the Constitution of the United States—the old one—takes no sides in this educational debate, I dissent....

Note: “Real Differences” and Formal Equality

1. Integration or “separate but equal”? As the Virginia Court acknowledges, only a small number of women are likely to benefit from the education VMI provides. Is the cause of gender equality significantly advanced by giving an opportunity to these women? Would the “separate but equal” approach suggested by Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion do more or less to benefit women?

Virginia raises difficult questions about the extent to which the cause of gender equality is advanced by insisting on formally equal treatment. On the one hand, Virginia vindicates the right of individual women to be judged by the same standard used to judge men. It does so by refusing to permit the state to generalize about men and women as a group. On the other, to the extent that these generalizations are accurate, the decision leaves women as a group vulnerable to standards created for men. Notice in this regard that Virginia does not cast constitutional doubt on the “adversative” model itself.

In contrast to the majority’s approach, Chief Justice Rehnquist would use VMI’s policy as a lever to extract from the state resources that might provide a better education to a larger group of women. In doing so, however, he would provide no remedy for individual women who might benefit from adversative training. Moreover, his approach arguably leaves intact gender stereotypes that reinforce existing gender roles. Which approach better promotes gender equality?

In Hasday, The Principle and Practice of Women’s “Full Citizenship”: A Case Study of Sex-Segregated Public Education, 101 Mich. L. Rev. 755, 757–758 (2002), the author points out that sex-segregated public education has “historically been entangled in both racial and class stratification” and suggests that “a decisionmaker regulating single-sex public schools [would] be well-advised to consider whether some or all of those schools have different consequences for different groups of women.” The author also argues that historically “the differences [between] sex-segregated and coeducational public education [may be] relatively unimportant in terms of their substantive impact on women’s status.” If this remains true, “it is hard to see why a jurisprudence committed to women’s ‘full citizenship’ would want to emphasize form by absolutely prohibiting sex-segregated public schooling, or how transferring all public school students to coeducational schools would advance women’s ‘full citizenship stature’ and fight their ‘inferiority.’”

Virginia involves an institution of higher education. Would a different analysis apply to single-sex K–12 schools? In this light, consider the observation made in Simson, Separate But Equal and Single-Sex Schools, 90 Cornell L. Rev. 443, 456 (2005), that single-sex schools at the middle- or high-school level can be explained in terms that do not so obviously incorporate harmful gender stereotypes—that is, as an attempt to respond to special problems widely experienced by adolescent girls and as providing an environment in which teaching methods can most easily be tailored to ways of learning that girls generally seem to find most congenial. These explanations, however, are not unambiguously affirming of girls’ abilities and potential, and altogether it is difficult to deny that there is some risk that the creation of the girls school sends a message to both girls and boys that girls are in some sense inferior to boys—whether that means more needy, less adaptable, more fragile, or some other disempowering comparative generalization.

2. The role of gender in law school and other facially neutral institutions. Kornhauser found significant gender segregation within law school faculties, finding that nearly 80 percent of courses had “a disproportionate number of men or women teaching the subject as compared to the gender composition of all law school professors” and that this disparity had increased over time:

Courses with a female disparity—such as Juvenile Law, Poverty Law, and Legal Writing and Research—generally fit within a typical gender schema of “feminine.” These courses are less central to the core of law and law school, less prestigious, and often associated with traditionally female traits such as care and relationships. Similarly, men are over-concentrated in the most traditional, and hence most “masculine,” courses such as Constitutional Law, Evidence, Corporations, and Government Contracts. Men are also over-concentrated in “hot” or prestigious courses such as Law and Economics and Constitutional Law.

Kornhauser, Rooms of Their Own: An Empirical Study of Occupational Segregation by Gender among Law Professors, 73 UMKC L. Rev. 293, 324 (2004). Does it matter whether women and men voluntarily choose different teaching packages? Kornhauser notes that the question of prestige is complex. Does this complicate determining in which direction causation runs—that is, whether fields become less prestigious because they attract disproportionate numbers of female teachers or whether women are assigned to fields because they are less prestigious?

Is law school itself “gendered”? Empirical research suggests women are less comfortable than men participating in certain aspects of law school, such as volunteering answers and approaching professors outside of class. For an overview of research on race and gender in law school, see L. Guinier et al., Becoming Gentlemen: Women, Law School, and Institutional Change (1997); Cassman and Pruitt, A Kinder, Gentler Law School? Race, Ethnicity, Gender, and Legal Education at King Hall, 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 1209 (2005).

3. In a different “voice”? Is it ever permissible for the government to recognize that men and women speak with a different “voice” on some questions? Is there a plausible argument that the government might be constitutionally compelled to recognize these differences?

For an unusually candid debate among the justices on this topic, see J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B., 511 U.S. 127 (1994). The case concerned the constitutionality of the state's use of gender-based peremptory challenges in a trial to determine whether the defendant was the father of a child and the extent of his child support obligations. (For a discussion of the constitutionality of race-based peremptory challenges, see pages 560-562, supra.) The state used nine of its ten peremptory strikes to remove male jurors. The defendant used all but one of his strikes to remove female jurors. As a result, all the selected jurors were female.

In an opinion by Justice Blackmun, the Court held that gender-based peremptory challenges were unconstitutional:

Far from proffering an exceptionally persuasive justification for its gender-based peremptory challenges, respondent maintains that its decision to strike virtually all the males from the jury in this case "may reasonably have been based upon the perception, supported by history, that men otherwise totally qualified to serve upon a jury might be more sympathetic and receptive to the arguments of a man alleged in a paternity action to be the father of an out-of-wedlock child, while women equally qualified to serve upon a jury might be more sympathetic and receptive to the arguments of the complaining witness who bore the child."

We shall not accept as a defense to gender-based peremptory challenges "the very stereotype the law condemns."

In a footnote, Justice Blackmun added that, even if "a measure of truth can be found in some of the gender stereotypes used to justify gender-based peremptory challenges," that fact was irrelevant. "[A] shred of truth may be contained in some stereotypes, but [the equal protection clause] requires that state actors look beyond the surface before making judgments about people that are likely to stigmatize as well as to perpetuate historical patterns of discrimination."

Consider Justice O'Connor's concurring opinion:

We know that like race, gender matters. A plethora of studies make clear that in rape cases, for example, female jurors are somewhat more likely to vote to convict than male jurors. Moreover, though there have been no similarly definitive studies regarding, for example, sexual harassment, child custody, or spousal or child abuse, one need not be a sexist to share the intuition that in certain cases a person's gender and resulting life experience will be relevant to his or her view of the case.

Today's decision severely limits a litigant's ability to act on this intuition. [But] to say that gender makes no difference as a matter of law is not to say that gender makes no difference as a matter of fact. [Today's] decision is a statement that, in an effort to eliminate the potential discriminatory use of the peremptory, gender is now governed by the special rule of relevance formerly reserved for race. Though we gain much from this statement, we cannot ignore what we lose.

Justice Kennedy also wrote a concurring opinion.

Is gender discrimination in jury selection unconstitutional because the law recognizes that the genders speak with different "voices" and that both require representation, or because it insists that they speak with the same "voice" and that distinctions between them are therefore irrational?

4. Accommodation for "real differences." In some cases, the Court has been willing to uphold sex-based distinctions to account for the supposed "real differences" between men and women. In doing so, has the Court escaped the gender stereotypes it purports to be policing?

In Michael M. v. Sonoma County Superior Court, 450 U.S. 464 (1981), the Court upheld a statute defining statutory rape as "an act of sexual intercourse accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator, where the female is under the age of 18 years." Petitioner, a seventeen-year-old male, was convicted under the statute for having intercourse with a sixteen-year-old female. In an opinion for a plurality of the Court, Justice Rehnquist found that the purpose of the statute was to prevent illegitimate pregnancies and that the state had a strong interest in preventing such pregnancies:

Because virtually all of the significant harmful and inescapably identifiable consequences of teenage pregnancy fall on the young female, a legislature acts well within its authority when it elects to punish only the participant who, by nature, suffers few of the consequences of his conduct. [Moreover], the risk of pregnancy itself constitutes a substantial deterrence to young females. No similar natural sanctions deter males. A criminal sanction imposed solely on males thus serves to roughly "equalize" the deterrents on the sexes.

Is it relevant, even if true, that more women than men are deterred by the risk of pregnancy from engaging in sexual intercourse? Since the California statute prohibits consensual intercourse, it applies only in cases where the female partner is undeterred by the risk of pregnancy (else the intercourse would not be consensual). What difference does it make, then, that there is another class of women, to whom the statute has no application in any event, who are deterred by this risk?

Might the result in Michael M. be justified on the ground that many rape laws fail to deal adequately with acts of intercourse that do not involve overt force, yet are also not fully consensual? See, e.g., S. Estrich, Real Rape 29–41 (1987); Olsen, Statutory Rape: A Feminist Critique of Rights Analysis, 63 Tex. L. Rev. 387, 427–428 (1984). Does this problem amount to the kind of “exceedingly persuasive” justification that Virginia requires?

NGUYEN v. IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE, 533 U.S. 53 (2001). Nguyen was born in Vietnam to unmarried parents. His father was a U.S. citizen and his mother was a citizen of Vietnam. Nguyen spent much of his early childhood being raised by nonrelatives; he came to the United States at the age of six, became a lawful permanent resident, and was raised by his father. At age twenty-two, after being convicted of a felony, the Immigration and Naturalization Service initiated deportation proceedings against him as an alien who had been convicted of crimes of moral turpitude. While the matter was pending, Nguyen’s father obtained an order of parentage from state court based on a DNA test that conclusively demonstrated paternity and Nguyen sought to claim U.S. citizenship.

Under federal law, a child born abroad to unmarried parents automatically acquires U.S. citizenship if the child’s mother is a U.S. citizen who at some previous point in her life had been physically present in the United States for a continuous period of one year. By contrast, a child born abroad to unmarried parents does not automatically become a U.S. citizen if only the child’s father is a U.S. citizen. Rather, such a child can be naturalized if the blood relationship between the child and his or her citizen father is “established by clear and convincing evidence,” the father agrees in writing to provide support for the child, and, before the child turns eighteen, the child or the father obtains formal recognition of the father’s paternity. See 8 U.S.C. §1409(a). Because Nguyen’s father had not obtained a formal paternity order before Nguyen turned eighteen, the Board of Immigration Appeals rejected Nguyen’s claim to U.S. citizenship. Nguyen and his father appealed.

In a five-to-four decision, the Court, in an opinion written by Justice Kennedy, upheld the statute.

Justice Kennedy began his analysis by noting the requirements that gender-based classifications serve important governmental objectives and be substantially related to the achievement of those objectives. “The first governmental interest to be served [by the statute] is the importance of assuring that a biological parent-child relationship exists. In the case of the mother, the relation is verifiable from the birth itself....

“In the case of the father, the uncontestable fact is that he need not be present at the birth. If he is present, furthermore, that circumstance is not incontrovertible proof of fatherhood....

“Petitioners argue that the requirement of [the statute] that a father provide clear and convincing evidence of parentage is sufficient to achieve the end of establishing paternity, given the sophistication of modern DNA tests. [The statute] does not actually mandate a DNA test, however. The Constitution, moreover, does not require that Congress elect one particular mechanism from among many possible methods of establishing paternity, even if that mechanism arguably might be the most scientifically advanced method. With respect to DNA testing, the expense, reliability, and availability of such testing in various parts of the world may have been a particular concern of Congress....

“[To] require Congress to speak without reference to the gender of the parent with regard to its objective of ensuring a blood tie between parent and child would be to insist on a hollow neutrality....

“[Here,] the use of gender specific terms takes into account a biological difference between the parents. The differential treatment is inherent in a sensible statutory scheme, given the unique relationship of the mother to the event of birth.

“The second important governmental interest furthered in a substantial manner by [the statute] is the determination to ensure that the child and the citizen parent have some demonstrated opportunity or potential to develop not just a relationship that is recognized, as a formal matter, by the law, but one that consists of the real, everyday ties that provide a connection between child and citizen parent and, in turn, the United States. In the case of a citizen mother and a child born overseas, the opportunity for a meaningful relationship between citizen parent and child inheres in the very event of birth, an event so often critical to our constitutional and statutory understandings of citizenship. The mother knows that the child is in being and is hers and has an initial point of contact with him. There is at least an opportunity for mother and child to develop a real, meaningful relationship.

“The same opportunity does not result from the event of birth, as a matter of biological inevitability, in the case of the unwed father. Given the 9-month interval between conception and birth, it is not always certain that a father will know that a child was conceived, nor is it always clear that even the mother will be sure of the father’s identity. This fact takes on particular significance in the case of a child born overseas and out of wedlock. One concern in this context has always been with young people, men for the most part, who are on duty with the Armed Forces in foreign countries.

“[The] passage of time has produced additional and even more substantial grounds to justify the statutory distinction. The ease of travel and the willingness of Americans to visit foreign countries have resulted in numbers of trips abroad that must be of real concern when we contemplate the prospect of accepting petitioners’ argument, which would mandate, contrary to Congress’ wishes, citizenship by male parentage subject to no condition save the father’s previous length of residence in this country....

“[This] difference does not result from some stereotype, defined as a frame of mind resulting from irrational or uncritical analysis. There is nothing irrational or improper in the recognition that at the moment of birth—the critical event in the statutory scheme and in the whole tradition of citizenship law—the mother’s knowledge of the child and the fact of parenthood have been established in a way not guaranteed in the case of the unwed father. This is not a stereotype....

“[The] question remains whether the means Congress chose to further its objective—the imposition of certain additional requirements upon an unwed father—substantially relate to [the ends of the statute].

“[It] should be unsurprising that Congress decided to require that an opportunity for a parent-child relationship occur during the formative years of the child’s minority....

“[Petitioners] assert that, although a mother will know of her child’s birth, ‘knowledge that one is a parent, no matter how it is acquired, does not guarantee a relationship with one’s child.’ They thus maintain that imposition of the additional requirements of [the statute] only on the children of citizen fathers must reflect a stereotype that women are more likely than men to actually establish a relationship with their children.

“[Congress] would of course be entitled to advance the interest of ensuring an actual, meaningful relationship in every case before citizenship is conferred. Or Congress could excuse compliance with the formal requirements when an actual father-child relationship is proved. It did neither here, perhaps because of the subjectivity, intrusiveness, and difficulties of proof that might attend an inquiry into any particular bond or tie. Instead, Congress enacted an easily administered scheme to promote the different but still substantial interest of ensuring at least an opportunity for a parent-child relationship to develop....

“To fail to acknowledge even our most basic biological differences—such as the fact that a mother must be present at birth but the father need not be—risks making the guarantee of equal protection superficial, and so disserving it. Mechanistic classification of all our differences as stereotypes would operate to obscure those misconceptions and prejudices that are real. The distinction embodied in the statutory scheme here at issue is not marked by misconception and prejudice, nor does it show disrespect for either class. The difference between men and women in relation to the birth process is a real one, and the principle of equal protection does not forbid Congress to address the problem at hand in a manner specific to each gender.”

Justice O’Connor, joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, dissented:

“While the Court invokes heightened scrutiny, the manner in which it explains and applies this standard is a stranger to our precedents....

“It is [difficult] to see how [the statute’s] limitation of the time allowed for obtaining proof of paternity substantially furthers the assurance of a blood relationship. Modern DNA testing, in addition to providing accuracy unmatched by other methods of establishing a biological link, essentially negates the evidentiary significance of the passage of time....

“Assuming as the majority does, that Congress was actually concerned about ensuring a ‘demonstrated opportunity’ for a relationship, it is questionable whether such an opportunity qualifies as an ‘important’ governmental interest apart from the existence of an actual relationship. [It] is difficult to see how [anyone] profits from a ‘demonstrated opportunity’ for a relationship in the absence of the fruition of an actual tie....

“Moreover, available sex-neutral alternatives would at least replicate, and could easily exceed, whatever fit there is between [the statute’s] discriminatory means and the majority’s asserted end. [Congress] could simply substitute for [the statute] a requirement that the parent be present at birth or have knowledge of birth. Congress could at least allow proof of such presence or knowledge to be one way of demonstrating an opportunity for a relationship. [Indeed], the idea that a mother’s presence at birth supplies adequate assurance of an opportunity to develop a relationship while a father’s presence at birth does not would appear to rest only on an overbroad sex-based generalization....

“The claim that [the statute] substantially relates to the achievement of the goal of a ‘real practical relationship’ thus finds support not in biological differences but instead in a stereotype....

“The majority asserts that a ‘stereotype’ is ‘defined as a frame of mind resulting from irrational or uncritical analysis.’ This Court has long recognized, however, that an impermissible stereotype may enjoy empirical support and thus be in a sense ‘rational.’...

“Nor do stereotypes consist only of those overbroad generalizations that the reviewing court considers to ‘show disrespect’ for a class. [Indeed], arbitrary distinction between the sexes may rely on no identifiable generalization at all but may simply be a denial of opportunity out of pure caprice. Such a distinction, of course, would nonetheless be a classic equal protection violation.”

SESSIONS v. MORALES-SANTANA, 137 S. Ct. 1678 (2017). Ngyuyen upheld differential treatment of parental transmission of citizenship predicated on women’s and men’s being differently situated at the moment of a child’s birth. The Court subsequently rejected differential treatment in the transmission of citizenship absent such a difference.

The main rule for transmitting citizenship to children born abroad to parents only one of whom is a U.S. citizen appears in 8 U.S.C. §1401(g). It requires that the U.S. citizen parent have been physically present in the United States for ten years prior to the child’s birth. That rule applies both to married couples and to unmarried couples where the father is the U.S. citizen. A separate rule applies to children born to unmarried couples where the mother is the U.S. citizen. Under that rule, which appears in 8 U.S.C. §1409(c), an unwed mother can transmit her citizenship to a child born abroad if she has lived in the United States for just one year prior to the child’s birth.

Luis Ramón Morales-Santana’s father, a U.S. citizen, was just 20 days short of meeting the physical-presence requirement when Luis was born in the Dominican Republic. (His mother, to whom his father was not then married, was Dominican.) Luis moved to the United States when he was 13. When Luis was 38 years old, the government placed him in removal proceedings after he was convicted of a number of state law offenses. An immigration judge rejected his claim to citizenship and the Board of Immigration Appeals rejected his constitutional challenge to the statutory regime for transmitting citizenship. The court of appeals agreed with Morales-Santana, holding first that the differential treatment of unwed mothers and fathers violated the equal protection component of the due process clause and second that “[t]o cure the constitutional flaw,” Morales-Santana should be given citizenship.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Ginsburg, affirmed in part and reversed in part. The Court began its analysis by declaring that the statutes providing differential treatment based on whether the U.S. citizen parent is a father or a mother “date from an era when the lawbooks of our Nation were rife with overbroad generalizations about the way men and women are. Today, laws of this kind are subject to review under the heightened scrutiny that now attends ‘all gender-based classifications.’”

The Court found that the government had failed to supply an “‘exceedingly persuasive justification,’ for [the] ‘gender-based’ and ‘gender-biased’ disparity.”

“History reveals what lurks behind §1409....[That provision] ended a century and a half of congressional silence on the citizenship of children born abroad to unwed parents. During this era, two once habitual, but now untenable, assumptions pervaded our Nation’s citizenship laws and underpinned judicial and administrative rulings: In marriage, husband is dominant, wife subordinate; unwed mother is the natural and sole guardian of a nonmarital child....

“This unwed-mother-as-natural-guardian notion renders §1409’s gender-based residency rules understandable. Fearing that a foreign-born child could turn out ‘more alien than American in character,’ the administration believed that a citizen parent with lengthy ties to the United States would counteract the influence of the alien parent. Concern about the attachment of foreign-born children to the United States explains the treatment of unwed citizen fathers, who, according to the familiar stereotype, would care little about, and have scant contact with, their nonmarital children. For unwed citizen mothers, however, there was no need for a prolonged residency prophylactic: The alien father, who might transmit foreign ways, was presumptively out of the picture....

“[T]he Court has held that no ‘important [governmental] interest’ is served by laws grounded, as §1409(a) and (c) are, in the obsolescing view that ‘unwed fathers [are] invariably less qualified and entitled than mothers’ to take responsibility for nonmarital children. Overbroad generalizations of that order, the Court has come to comprehend, have a constraining impact, descriptive though they may be of the way many people still order their lives....”

The Court rejected the government’s argument that Nguyen should control the outcome.

“Unlike the paternal-acknowledgment requirement at issue in Nguyen..., the physical-presence requirements now before us relate solely to the duration of the parent’s prebirth residency in the United States, not to the parent’s filial tie to the child....”

Having found that the statutory scheme violated equal protection principles, however, the Court went on to hold that it was “not equipped to grant the relief Morales-Santana seeks, i.e., extending to his father (and, derivatively, to him) the benefit of the one-year physical-presence term §1409(c) reserves for unwed mothers.”

The Court pointed out that there were “two remedial alternatives” available.

The first was to “extend the coverage” of the more favorable statute—here, the shorter residency period for unwed mothers—to the children of unwed fathers as well. The second was to declare the special provision benefiting the children of unwed mothers a nullity. Scholars refer to the former strategy as “levelling up” and the latter as “levelling down.” See Karlan, Race, Rights, and Remedies in Criminal Adjudication, 96 Mich. L. Rev. 2001, 2027-29 (1998); Brake, When Equality Leaves Everyone Worse Off: The Problem of Leveling Down in Equality Law, 46 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 513 (2004).

In this case, the Court explained that “[t]he choice between these outcomes is governed by the legislature’s intent, as revealed by the statute at hand.” While ordinarily courts level up, “[h]ere, however, the discriminatory exception consists of favorable treatment for a discrete group (a shorter physical-presence requirement for unwed U.S.-citizen mothers giving birth abroad)....[S]triking the discriminatory exception—leads here to extending the general rule of longer physical-presence requirements to cover the previously favored group.” Moreover, “if §1409(c)’s one-year dispensation were extended to unwed citizen fathers, would it not be irrational to retain the longer term when the U.S.-citizen parent is married? Disadvantageous treatment of marital children in comparison to nonmarital children is scarcely a purpose one can sensibly attribute to Congress.” The Court therefore left it to Congress to “address the issue and settle on a uniform prescription that neither favors nor disadvantages any person on the basis of gender. In the interim,...the five-year requirement should apply, prospectively, to children born to unwed U.S.-citizen mothers.”

Justice Gorsuch did not participate in the decision. Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Alito, concurred in the judgment. He took the position that the Court’s remedial holding resolved the case so it was “unnecessary” for the Court to reach the constitutional question.

Note: The Relevance of “Real Differences”

1. What makes a difference real? In light of the cases discussed in this section, consider what makes a difference between the genders “real” for constitutional purposes. Must it be linked to some purely physiological distinction between the sexes? Which, if any, of the statutes considered in these cases can be justified on this basis alone? Are demonstrated differences in behavior sufficient? It is at least conceivable that some such differences are a product of cultural expectations reinforced by the very statutes under attack, rather than any “natural” difference. To the extent that this is true, the statutes become self-validating. Recall, for example, Justice O’Connor’s concern in Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan that Mississippi's policy "makes the assumption that nursing is a field for women a self-fulfilling prophecy." Is it this phenomenon that concerned Justice Brennan in Craig when he wrote that statistical demonstrations are "in tension with the normative philosophy that underlies the Equal Protection Clause"?

Consider the argument that differences between the genders not only are socially constructed but also serve to reinforce male domination. See C. MacKinnon, Feminism Unmodified: Discourses on Life and Law 3, 8–9 (1987):

The idea of gender difference helps keep the reality of male dominance in place.

Difference is the velvet glove on the iron fist of domination. This is as true when differences are affirmed as when they are denied, when their substance is applauded or when it is disparaged, when women are punished or [when] they are protected in their name. A sex inequality is not a difference gone wrong, a lesson the law of sex discrimination has yet to learn. One of the most deceptive anti-feminisms in society, scholarship, politics, and law is the persistent treatment of gender as if it truly is a question of difference, rather than treating the gender difference as a construct of the difference gender makes.

If many gender differences are socially constructed, is the right question, what, if any, gender differences would exist in a "state of nature" before cultural forces have taken hold? Recall Justice Bradley's assertion over a century ago that a woman's duty "to fulfill the noble and benign offices of wife and mother" was "the law of the Creator." Is the current Court's search for "real differences" a modern-day analogue to this sort of reasoning? How likely is it that the justices can escape their own culture in deciding which differences are culturally determined?

Consider Case, Of Richard Epstein and Other Radical Feminists, 18 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y. 369, 375 (1995):

Law is precisely that which fights against nature. If something were all that natural, a law would not be needed to bring it about. This is clear in almost every area of legal scholarship other than those pertaining to sex and gender. [The] evidence for natural human aggression is far stronger than any of the evidence [in] favor of difference between the sexes. No one [would], however, suggest that just because human beings are naturally aggressive there should be no laws of murder and assault.

With regard to the “naturalness” of gender differences, consider the possibility that current constitutional doctrine does not deal adequately with “people for whom gender and anatomical birth sex in some way diverge.” Flynn, Transforming the Debate: Why We Need to Include Transgender Rights in the Struggles for Sex and Sexual Orientation Equality, 101 Colum. L. Rev. 392, 394 (2001). Flynn argues that this problem leads to the failure to remedy much of the discrimination experienced by women and sexual minorities, specifically the discrimination based on gender nonconformity. This failure is premised on a prevalent juridical assumption that the law should target discrimination based on sex (i.e., whether a person is anatomically male or female), rather than gender (i.e., whether a person has qualities that society considers masculine or feminine). In both law and life, though, conceptions of sex and gender are so firmly cemented together that courts’ frequent refusals to address gender-based inequalities mean that much discrimination against women and sexual minorities goes unremedied.

Id. at 394–395.

For a discussion of the relationship between gender discrimination and discrimination based on sexual orientation, see pages 690-692, infra.

2. Difference theory. A second critique takes the opposite tack. It argues that there are significant differences between men and women, and sees the problem as the law’s insistence on formal equality in the face of these differences. There are two ways in which this denial of difference might be problematic. First, practices might treat male traits as the norm and expect women to conform to these male traits. Alternatively, because traditional equal protection analysis focuses solely on legislative means (i.e., on whether a difference between men and women is relevant to a given legislative end), it may ignore ways in which legislative ends, which are treated as outside of the analysis, may themselves be the product of male domination.

How would constitutional doctrine have to be constructed to respond to these observations by Becker, Obscuring the Struggle: Sex Discrimination, Social Security, and Stone, Seidman, Sunstein and Tushnet’s Constitutional Law, 89 Colum. L. Rev. 264, 283 (1989):

[The] social security system fails to afford women as reliable an old-age security system as that afforded men. [Women] who lead ordinary lives are less likely to be well protected by the social security system than men who live ordinary lives because the system prefers those who have successfully fulfilled men’s traditional breadwinner role over those who fulfilled women's traditional roles. Social security discriminates against women because it is designed so that women are at a much greater risk of poverty than are men. It exerts pressure on homemakers to depend economically on men in old age, despite the riskiness of such dependence.

In thinking about these questions, consider Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721 (2003). At issue was whether section 5 of the fourteenth amendment provided Congress with the power to authorize private suits for damages against state governments under the Family and Medical Leave Act. (The general question of congressional power under section 5 is covered in Chapter 3, section B, supra.) The act authorized eligible employees to take up to twelve weeks of unpaid leave annually to care for a spouse, child, or parent with a serious medical condition.

In a six-to-three decision, the Court upheld the statute. Chief Justice Rehnquist delivered the opinion of the Court:

According to evidence that was before Congress, [States] continue to rely on invalid gender stereotypes in the employment context, specifically in the administration of leave benefits....

Congress [heard] testimony that “[p]arental leave for fathers...is rare. Even...[w]here child-care leave policies do exist, men, both in the public and private sectors, receive notoriously discriminatory treatment in their requests for such leave.” [Many] States offer women extended “maternity” leave that far exceeded the typical 4- to 8-week period of physical disability due to pregnancy and childbirth, but very few States grant men a parallel [benefit]. This and other differential leave policies were not attributable to any differential physical needs of men and women, but rather to the pervasive sex-role stereotype that caring for family members is women’s work.

Given the social roles commonly played by men and women, are the state practices upon which the Court relies evidence of gender discrimination or are they, instead, efforts to respond to gender discrimination? According to Chief Justice Rehnquist, [Mutually] reenforcing stereotypes [that women have domestic responsibilities and men do not] created a self-fulfilling cycle of discrimination that forced women to continue to assume the role of primary family caregiver, and fostered employers’ stereotypical views about women’s commitment to work and their value as employees....

By creating an across-the-board routine employment benefit for all eligible employees, Congress sought to ensure that family-care leave would no longer be stigmatized as an inordinate drain on the workplace caused by female employees, that the employers could not evade leave obligations simply by hiring men.

In the Court's view, a simple requirement that states administer leave benefits in a gender neutral fashion would not solve this problem:

Such a law would allow States to provide for no family leave at all. Where “[t]wo thirds of the nonprofessional caregivers for older, chronically ill, or disabled persons are working women” and state practices continue to reinforce the stereotype of women as caregivers, such a policy would exclude far more women than men from the workplace.

Why is this fact relevant? Isn't this mode of analysis in tension with the Court's own conclusion that official recognition of different social roles performed by men and women serves to reinforce stereotypes about those roles? In light of the statistics cited by the Court, would it be constitutional for Congress to mandate caretaker leave for women but not for men?

3. Real differences and substantive values. If we cannot rely on actual differences in behavior between men and women, and if we also cannot rely on suppositions about differences that would exist in the absence of cultural forces, what test should we use to evaluate gender discrimination claims? Is there in the end any way to judge the appropriateness of gender classifications without a substantive vision of the role gender would play in a just society?

4. Beyond real differences. Do the difficulties associated with the identification of “real differences” suggest that we might be better off, after all, with a virtual per se rule prohibiting gender classifications? Consider Brown, Emerson, Falk, and Freedman, The Equal Rights Amendment: A Constitutional Basis for Equal Rights for Women, 80 Yale L.J. 871, 873–874 (1971):

Many of the efforts to create a separate legal status for women stem from a good faith attempt to advance the interests of women. Nevertheless, the preponderant effect has been to buttress the social and economic subordination of women. [Whatever] the motivation for different treatment, the result is to create a dual system of rights and responsibilities in which the rights of each group are governed by a different set of values. History and experience have taught us that in such a dual system one group is always dominant and the other subordinate. As long as woman's place is defined as separate, a male-dominated society will define her place as inferior.

Is the cause of equality advanced by insisting on gender-neutral laws that disproportionately affect women because they are differently situated with respect to the laws? Consider Law, Rethinking Sex and the Constitution, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 955, 1007 (1984):

[Pregnancy,] abortion, reproduction, and creation of another human being are special—very special. Women have these experiences. Men do not. An equality doctrine that ignores the unique quality of these experiences implicitly says that women can claim equality only insofar as they are like men. Such doctrine demands that women deny an important aspect of who they are.

Note: Gender Discrimination as a Two-Edged Sword

A surprisingly high proportion of the Supreme Court's sex discrimination cases were brought by male plaintiffs. This was true both during the era when the Court laid down the basic doctrine, see Baer, Women's Rights and the Limits of Constitutional Doctrine, 44 W. Pol. Q. 821, 823 (1991) (men brought more than two-thirds of the constitutional sex discrimination cases adjudicated between 1971 and 1984), and in more recent years, see, e.g., Sessions v. Morales-Santana, 137 S. Ct. 1678 (2017); Coleman v. Maryland Court of Appeals, 566 U.S. 30 (2012); Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721 (2003); Nguyen v. Immigration & Naturalization Service, 533 U.S. 53 (2001). Why?

The conventional account focuses on strategic choices by sex discrimination litigators, most notably Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who was head of the American Civil Liberties Union's Women's Rights Project. It suggests that Ginsburg chose these plaintiffs to appeal to the empathy of an overwhelmingly male judiciary. See, e.g., Cole, Strategies of Difference: Litigating for Women's Rights in a Man's World, 2 Law & Ineq. 33 (1984); Torrey, Thirty Years, 22 Women's Rts. L. Rep. 147, 149 (2001). More recently, a revisionist account asserts that [conventional] wisdom suggests that the WRP's reliance on male plaintiffs was a strategic and ultimately conservative choice designed to elicit sympathy and fellow feeling from male Justices. But this is not what happened. The first time a male plaintiff appeared before the Court in a sex-based equal protection case—as half of a married couple—the suggestion that he might be a victim of sex discrimination was treated as a joke. In subsequent cases, when it became clear that the WRP was serious about establishing the right of men to be free from sex discrimination, the laughter turned to confusion and disbelief, and, in some cases, to anger and disgust....

To understand why “the fact that many of the cases Ruth Bader Ginsburg brought to the Court had male plaintiffs...did not make the Court’s job any easier,” it is useful to consider who these plaintiffs were. One of them, the first male plaintiff Ginsburg represented, was a lifelong bachelor and primary caregiver to his elderly and ailing mother. Another was a stay-at-home father. Several were married to women who contributed substantially to their support. Most of them, in one way or another, rejected or failed to satisfy masculine gender norms circa 1975. If Ginsburg’s aim had been to “capitalize[] on sex-based ingroup biases,” selecting gender-bending men as plaintiffs would not have been a wise strategy.

Ginsburg was well aware of this. The groundbreaking sex discrimination casebook she published in 1974 opened with a note explaining that men and women both encounter discrimination when they deviate from “assigned roles,” but that “the very assurance of [male] dominance marks out for even greater social disapproval men whose unconventional interests and abilities lead them to choose different lifestyles.”...

If Ginsburg knew male sex discrimination plaintiffs would strike the Justices as odd, why did she choose to represent them?...Ginsburg pressed the claims of male plaintiffs in order to promote a new theory of equal protection founded on an anti-stereotyping principle. This anti-stereotyping theory dictated that the state could not act in ways that reflected or reinforced traditional conceptions of men’s and women’s roles. It was not simply anti-classificationist: It permitted the state to classify on the basis of sex in instances where doing so served to dissipate sex-role stereotypes. Nor was it strictly anti-subordinationist: Because discrimination against women had traditionally been viewed as a benefit to them, Ginsburg was concerned that an anti-subordination principle would provide courts with too little guidance about which forms of regulation warrant constitutional concern. The anti-stereotyping approach was designed to provide such guidance; its aim was to direct courts’ attention to the particular institutions and social practices that perpetuate inequality in the context of sex....

Unlike the more radical critics of “the sex-role structure,” the WRP aimed not to eradicate sex roles but to stop the state from enforcing them. [The] WRP began to challenge laws that reflected a “separate-spheres’ mentality” and reinforced the “breadwinner-homemaker dichotomy.” By the mid-1970s, the Court itself had begun to reason about sex discrimination from an anti-stereotyping perspective. It recognized—particularly in male plaintiff cases we tend to overlook today—that laws that steer men out of traditionally female roles effectively require women to assume those roles, and it interpreted the Equal Protection Clause as a bar to such “role-typing.”

Franklin, The Anti-Stereotyping Principle in Constitutional Law, 85 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 83, 86–90 (2010).

In thinking about who is being benefited and who is being burdened, note that many of the Court’s cases involved laws that affected married couples. Consider the contrast between two cases, decided less than a month apart. In Califano v. Goldfarb, 430 U.S. 199 (1977), the Court struck down a federal benefits program that provided a widow with survivors’ benefits based on the earnings of her deceased husband, while a widower received benefits based on the earnings of his deceased wife only if he had been receiving “at least one-half of his support” from her. Justice Brennan’s opinion announcing the judgment of the Court treated the case as one involving discrimination against female workers because it “deprive[d] women of protection for their families which men receive as a result of their employment.” A woman like Mrs. Goldfarb “worked and paid social security taxes for 25 years at the same rate as her male colleagues, but because of [the statute] the insurance protection received by the males was broader than hers. Plainly then [the statute] disadvantages women contributors to the social security system as compared to similarly situated men.” Justice Stevens concurred in the judgment and focused on the differential treatment not of workers, but of their survivors. “Congress had simply assumed that all widows should be regarded as ‘dependents’ in some general sense, even though they could not satisfy the statutory support test later imposed on men.” He was “persuaded that this discrimination against a group of males is merely the accidental byproduct of a traditional way of thinking about females.”

Justice Rehnquist, joined by Chief Justice Burger, Justice Stewart, and Justice Blackmun, dissented.

In Califano v. Webster, 430 U.S. 313 (1977), by contrast, the Court upheld a provision of the Social Security Act that allowed women to exclude more years in which they had low earnings from the formula for computing monthly old-age benefits than men were permitted to exclude. As a result some retired female workers received higher benefits than similarly situated male workers. The Court’s per curiam opinion noted that prior decisions had held that “[reduction] of the disparity in economic condition between men and women caused by the long history of discrimination against women” could constitute a sufficiently “important governmental objective” to justify sex-based distinctions. In the Court’s opinion, the provision of the Social Security Act served that function:

The more favorable treatment of the female wage earner enacted here was not a result of “archaic and overbroad generalizations” about women or of “the role-typing society has long imposed” upon women, such as casual assumptions that women are “the weaker sex” or are more likely to be child rearers or dependents.

[Rather, the] challenged statute operated directly to compensate women for past economic discrimination. Retirement benefits under the Act are based on past earnings. But as we have recognized: “Whether from overt discrimination or from the socialization process of a male-dominated culture, the job market is inhospitable to the woman seeking any but the lowest paid jobs.” Thus, allowing women, who as such have been unfairly hindered from earning as much as men, to eliminate additional low-earning years from the calculation of their retirement benefits works directly to remedy some part of the effect of past discrimination.

Chief Justice Burger, with whom Justices Stewart, Blackmun, and Rehnquist joined, concurred in the judgment, but found it “somewhat difficult to distinguish the Social Security provision upheld here from that struck down so recently in [Goldfarb].”

Note: The Problem of “Benign” Gender Classifications

1. Conceptualizing the victim of discrimination. In what sense did the statute invalidated in Goldfarb discriminate against women, as opposed to men? Compare Goldfarb with Wengler v. Druggists Mutual Insurance Co., 446 U.S. 142 (1980), in which the Court invalidated a portion of Missouri’s workers’ compensation statute under which a widower of a deceased worker was entitled to death benefits only if he was mentally or physically incapacitated from wage earning or proved actual dependence on his wife’s earnings. In contrast, a widow was automatically entitled to death benefits without having to demonstrate dependence. The Court concluded that the challenged statute discriminated against both men and women. Women were harmed because “[the] benefits [that] the working woman can expect to be paid to her spouse in the case of her work-related death are less than those payable to the spouse of the deceased male wage earner.” Men were also discriminated against because “the surviving male spouse must prove his incapacity or dependency [while the] widow of a deceased wage earner [is] presumed dependent and is guaranteed a weekly benefit for life or until remarriage.” If, as the Court asserts, the Missouri statute discriminated against women simply because their spouses were deprived of a benefit, don’t virtually all laws that discriminate against men also discriminate against women? If, as the Court asserts, the Missouri statute discriminates against both men and women, in what sense does it involve gender discrimination? What argument is there for heightened scrutiny of statutes that classify on the basis of gender if neither men nor women as a class are disadvantaged by them?

If stereotyping is the problem, then are men victims of discrimination as well? Consider Kanowitz, “Benign” Sex Discrimination: Its Troubles and Their Cure, 31 Hastings L.J. 1379, 1394 (1980):

[A] casual glance at the treatment males have received at the hands of the law solely because they are males suggests that they have paid an awesome price for other advantages they have presumably enjoyed over females in our society. Whether one talks of the male’s unique obligation of compulsory military service, his primary duty for spousal and child support, his lack of the same kinds of protective labor legislation that have traditionally been enjoyed by women, or the statutory or judicial preference in child custody disputes that has long been accorded to mothers vis-à-vis fathers of minor children, sex discrimination against males in statutes and judicial decisions has been widespread and severe.

It is, of course, possible that both men and women have been harmed in different ways by gender stereotyping. But if both sexes are harmed to equivalent degrees, what is the basis for judicial intervention? Kanowitz argues:

Centuries of sex-role allocations, based on “habit, rather than analysis,” simply disabled Americans of either sex from restructuring the duties of military service, family support, and protections in the work place so as to permit men and women to share the burdens and benefits of social existence more equitably. Viewed in this light, the apparent power of men to change their sex-based roles in the past can be seen as being more theoretical than real. In this respect, men were as powerless as any other discrete, insular minority.

Can both men and women be discrete and insular minorities? Under this expansive version of the political process argument, is there any group that cannot claim judicial protection?

Is the real point of Goldfarb and Wengler that, even though the laws invalidated in those cases superficially benefited women, they “really” discriminated against them by reinforcing stereotypes of dependence and passivity that make women the losers in the long run?

2. Affirmative action for women. The Court seems to have taken the view that affirmative action measures disadvantaging men are subject to intermediate scrutiny, and that remedying disparities between men and women, at least if caused by prior discrimination, qualifies as an “important government objective” for purposes of that test. However, the Court’s pronouncements on this matter occurred at a time when the appropriate standard for racial affirmative action was still confused. The Court now insists that in the racial context, affirmative action statutes are subject to the same strict scrutiny as statutes disadvantaging racial minorities. See section C3 supra. What impact does this change have on the gender cases? Given the history of the equal protection clause, it seems implausible that efforts to remedy racial discrimination must satisfy a stricter test than efforts to remedy gender discrimination. Perhaps, then, gender affirmative action measures should also be subject to strict scrutiny. But this result is also deeply problematic, since it would leave laws disadvantaging women subject to a lower level of review than laws benefiting them.

Note: Sex Discrimination Law and Constitutional Evolution

1. A comparative perspective. Most modern constitutions contain explicit bans on sex discrimination (along with explicit reference to other forbidden classifications, such as race, religion, sexual orientation, caste, or disability). See, e.g., Can. Const. pt. I (Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms), §15 (providing both that every individual “has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on...sex” and that this prohibition “does not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of...sex”); India Const. pt. III, art. 15 (providing that “[the] State shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds...of...sex”); S. Afr. Const. §9(3) (providing that “[the] state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including...gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status”). Is the specific enumeration of prohibited classifications and protected classes a superior technique for constitutional drafting? Note that the U.S. Constitution is more than two hundred years old, while the average national constitution lasts for only a generation.

2. The equal rights amendment. In 1972, Congress approved and submitted to the states for ratification the following constitutional amendment:

Section 1. Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Section 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Section 3. This amendment shall take effect two years after the date of ratification.

Although about half of the required three-fourths of the states ratified the ERA within a few months of its submission, progress then became stalled. In 1978, Congress extended the period for ratification until June 30, 1982, but the second deadline expired with only thirty-five of the necessary thirty-eight states having approved the amendment.

The ERA was the subject of passionate debate, both within Congress and during the ratification process. And yet, even as the amendment was being defeated, the Supreme Court was interpreting the equal protection clause to provide much of the protection that the ERA would have afforded. Consider the following perspectives on the relationship between social movements, constitutional amendments, and constitutional interpretation. Did the ERA “fail[] partly because it was widely seen as unnecessary” in light of this changed judicial interpretation of the fifth and fourteenth amendments? C. Sunstein, The Second Bill of Rights 126 (2004). Consider also Siegel, Constitutional Culture, Social Movement Conflict and Constitutional Change: The Case of the De Facto ERA, 94 Cal. L. Rev. 1323, 1324, 1336, 1338–1339, 1369 (2006):

The ERA was not ratified, but the amendment’s proposal and defeat played a crucial role in enabling and shaping the modern law of sex discrimination....

[Proponents] and opponents of the Equal Rights Amendment wanted their Article V struggles to reverberate through Article I, II, and III pathways, and shape judicial interpretation of equal protection under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. Advocates understood that even without completed acts of constitutional law making, the Article V process offered a vehicle for influencing the constitutional judgments of judges and elected officials—offering a point of system feedback like debates over the nomination and confirmation of judges. They passionately supported and opposed the ERA on this understanding, and Congress and the Supreme Court seem to have interpreted the Constitution responsively....

[An] extended and highly structured national conversation about questions of equal citizenship and the family focused public debate on how the abstract principles of the constitutional tradition applied to concrete practices, and provided material on which different members of the Court would draw as they argued over the meaning of the Constitution's equal protection guarantee in the ensuing decade. Interaction between movements and the Court helped forge the understanding that the Equal Protection Clause prohibited classifications "on the basis of sex," as well as understandings about the particular practices this prohibition constrained. Long running dispute about whether to amend the Constitution's text changed public understandings of the Constitution's text, and so imbued the Court with authority to enforce the Constitution in new and unprecedented ways.

3. Constitutional versus ordinary lawmaking. Proponents of the equal rights amendment hoped to constitutionalize a wide variety of issues relating to gender discrimination. And yet, many of the most sweeping protections against sex discrimination—from title VII's prohibition on sex discrimination in employment (including in public employment since 1972) to title IX's prohibition on sex discrimination by institutions that receive federal funding (which, among other things, has provided a major impetus for the expansion in funding for girls' and women's athletic programs) to the Family Medical Leave Act have been the product of ordinary legislation. To what extent was the Supreme Court's doctrinal innovation in the area of sex discrimination simply a reflection of changes in cultural understanding? Note also that many contemporary statutes reach the actions of private parties, whose conduct would not be controlled by the Constitution directly. See Chapter 9 infra. Is sex discrimination so intimately linked with private ordering that legislation under the commerce clause or the spending clause, rather than judicial interpretation of the equal protection clause, better protects women's interests?

E. EQUAL PROTECTION METHODOLOGY: THE PROBLEM OF SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Should laws and policies that discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation be strictly scrutinized? If so, how should the protected class be defined?

Note: The Nature of the Class at Issue

What defines the class of people who might raise equal protection challenges to laws that discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation? Is the relevant group individuals who engage in homosexual acts (however defined) or individuals who have a desire or propensity to engage in such acts? Consider the alternative possibilities.

1. Acts. In Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), the Supreme Court held that the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment prohibits states from criminalizing private, noncommercial consensual sexual intimacy between two adults of the same sex. It therefore struck down a Texas statute that had criminalized oral and anal sex only between individuals of the same sex. (Lawrence is discussed in greater detail in Chapter 6, section F3, infra.)

Although the Court in Lawrence declined to rely explicitly on the equal protection clause, the Court stated that [equality] of treatment and the due process right to demand respect for conduct protected by the substantive guarantee of liberty are linked in important respects. ...When homosexual conduct is made criminal by the law of the State, that declaration in and of itself is an invitation to subject homosexual persons to discrimination both in the public and in the private spheres.

In this respect, consider Karlan, Loving Lawrence, 102 Mich. L. Rev. 1447, 1457 (2004):

The situation of gay people provokes an “analogical crisis” because in some ways it involves regulation of particular acts in which gay people engage, and so seems most amenable to analysis under the liberty prong of the Due Process Clause, while in other ways it involves regulation of a group of people who are defined not so much by what they do in the privacy of their bedrooms, but by who they are in the public sphere. As the Court itself phrased the issue, “[w]hen homosexual conduct is made criminal...that declaration...is an invitation to subject homosexual persons to discrimination.” It is hard to substitute other adjectives for “homosexual” and continue to have the sentence make sense. No one, for example, would modify both “conduct” and “persons” with words like “larcenous” or “perjurious” or even, although it might be less initially jarring, “violent.”...[This] must be in part because homosexuality straddles the line between conduct and status in ways that make it hard to apply conventional constitutional doctrine. A state cannot make it a crime to “be gay” since the Eighth Amendment prohibits states from criminalizing a particular status in the absence of “any antisocial behavior.” So a state that wants to express its disapproval of gay people must instead craft a law that makes it a crime to engage in behaviors connected in some way with being gay. But the fact that the law explicitly targets behavior and not persons does not mean that it is not also class legislation.

How does this consideration map onto the ways in which other suspect classes are defined? Note that express racial and gender-based classifications distinguish among individuals on the basis of status rather than on the basis of particular acts. Even in the case of facially neutral classifications that are intended to disadvantage racial minorities or women, the classification is a proxy for underlying status, rather than some particular act.

2. Desires. Suppose the suspect class is defined in terms of “orientation” or “desires” rather than in terms of acts. Is the state ever justified in discriminating against an individual because of a wholly mental event? Consider in this regard Equality Foundation of Greater Cincinnati v. Cincinnati, 54 F.3d 261 (6th Cir. 1995), vacated and remanded for reconsideration, 518 U.S. 1001 (1996), reaffirmed, 128 F.3d 289 (6th Cir. 1997):

[No] law can successfully be drafted that is calculated to burden or penalize [an] unidentifiable group or class of individuals whose identity is defined by subjective and unapparent characteristics such as innate desires, drives, and thoughts. Those persons having a homosexual “orientation” simply do not, as such comprise an identifiable class. Many homosexuals successfully conceal their orientation. Because homosexuals generally are not identifiable “on sight,” unless they elect to be so identifiable by conduct, [they] cannot constitute a suspect [class].

Why must a characteristic be identifiable “on sight” to trigger strict scrutiny? Must individuals visibly possess the protected characteristic to bring equal protection claims? What about the long-standing practice of “passing” or “covering”? See K. Yoshino, Covering: The Hidden Assault on Our Civil Rights (2007).

3. Relationships. Does it make sense to discuss sexual orientation as an individual trait, in the way that sex or age is? Consider the argument that sexual orientation is always defined in relational terms: It concerns an individual’s attraction to other people. Consider whether this view means that discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation is discrimination on the basis of sex, in the way that discrimination against individuals in interracial relationships is discrimination on the basis of race.

Romer v. Evans

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

One century ago, the first Justice Harlan admonished this Court that the Constitution “neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens.” Plessy v. Ferguson (dissenting opinion). Unheeded then, those words now are understood to state a commitment to the law’s neutrality where the rights of persons are at stake. The Equal Protection Clause enforces this principle and today requires us to hold invalid a provision of Colorado’s Constitution.

I

[“Amendment 2” was added to the state constitution by a statewide referendum held in 1992. It was enacted after a number of Colorado municipalities had adopted ordinances prohibiting discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in many transactions and activities such as housing, employment, education, public accommodations, and health and welfare services. It provided:

NO PROTECTED STATUS BASED ON HOMOSEXUAL, LESBIAN, OR BISEXUAL ORIENTATION

Neither the State of Colorado, through any of its branches or departments, nor any of its agencies, political subdivisions, municipalities or school districts, shall enact, adopt or enforce any statute, regulation, ordinance or policy whereby homosexual, lesbian or bisexual orientation, conduct, practices or relationships shall constitute or otherwise be the basis of or entitle any person or class of persons to have or claim any minority status, quota preferences, protected status or claim of discrimination. This Section of the Constitution shall be in all respects self-executing.]

II

The State’s principal argument in defense of Amendment 2 is that it puts gays and lesbians in the same position as all other persons. So, the State says, the measure does no more than deny homosexuals special rights. This reading of the amendment’s language is implausible....

Homosexuals, by state decree, are put in a solitary class with respect to transactions and relations in both the private and governmental spheres. The amendment withdraws from homosexuals, but no others, specific legal protection from the injuries caused by discrimination, and it forbids reinstatement of these laws and policies.

The change that Amendment 2 works in the legal status of gays and lesbians in the private sphere is far-reaching, both on its own terms and when considered in light of the structure and operation of modern anti-discrimination laws. That structure is well illustrated by contemporary statutes and ordinances prohibiting discrimination by providers of public accommodations. “At common law, innkeepers, smiths, and others who ‘made profession of a public employment,’ were prohibited from refusing, without good reason, to serve a customer.” The duty was a general one and did not specify protection for particular groups. The common law rules, however, proved insufficient in many instances, and it was settled early that the Fourteenth Amendment did not give Congress a general power to prohibit discrimination in public accommodations. In consequence, most States have chosen to counter discrimination by enacting detailed statutory schemes....

These statutes and ordinances...depart from the common law by enumerating the groups or persons within their ambit of protection. Enumeration is the essential device used to make the duty not to discriminate concrete and to provide guidance for those who must comply. In following this approach, Colorado’s state and local governments have not limited anti-discrimination laws to groups that have so far been given the protection of heightened equal protection scrutiny under our cases. Rather, they set forth an extensive catalogue of traits which cannot be the basis for discrimination, including age, military status, marital status, pregnancy, parenthood, custody of a minor child, political affiliation, physical or mental disability of an individual or of his or her associates and, in recent times, sexual orientation.

Amendment 2 bars homosexuals from securing protection against the injuries that these public-accommodations laws address. That in itself is a severe consequence, but there is more. Amendment 2, in addition, nullifies specific legal protections for this targeted class in all transactions in housing, sale of real estate, insurance, health and welfare services, private education, and employment.

Not confined to the private sphere, Amendment 2 also operates to repeal and forbid all laws or policies providing specific protection for gays or lesbians from discrimination by every level of Colorado government. The State Supreme Court cited two examples of protections in the governmental sphere that are now rescinded and may not be reintroduced. The first is Colorado Executive Order D0035 (1990), which forbids employment discrimination against “all state employees, classified and exempt’ on the basis of sexual orientation.” Also repealed, and now forbidden, are “various provisions prohibiting discrimination based on sexual orientation at state colleges.”...

Amendment 2’s reach may not be limited to specific laws passed for the benefit of gays and lesbians. It is a fair, if not necessary, inference from the broad language of the amendment that it deprives gays and lesbians even of the protection of general laws and policies that prohibit arbitrary discrimination in governmental and private settings. At some point in the systematic administration of these laws, an official must determine whether homosexuality is an arbitrary and thus forbidden basis for decision. Yet a decision to that effect would itself amount to a policy prohibiting discrimination on the basis of homosexuality, and so would appear to be no more valid under Amendment 2 than the specific prohibitions against discrimination the state court held invalid.

If this consequence follows from Amendment 2, as its broad language suggests, it would compound the constitutional difficulties the law creates....In any event, even if...homosexuals could find some safe harbor in laws of general application, we cannot accept the view that Amendment 2’s prohibition on specific legal protections does no more than deprive homosexuals of special rights. To the contrary, the amendment imposes a special disability upon those persons alone. Homosexuals are forbidden the safeguards that others enjoy or may seek without constraint. They can obtain specific protection against discrimination only by enlisting the citizenry of Colorado to amend the state constitution or perhaps, on the State’s view, by trying to pass helpful laws of general applicability. This is so no matter how local or discrete the harm, no matter how public and widespread the injury. We find nothing special in the protections Amendment 2 withholds. These are protections taken for granted by most people either because they already have them or do not need them; these are protections against exclusion from an almost limitless number of transactions and endeavors that constitute ordinary civic life in a free society.

III

The Fourteenth Amendment’s promise that no person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws must co-exist with the practical necessity that most legislation classifies for one purpose or another, with resulting disadvantage to various groups or persons. We have attempted to reconcile the principle with the reality by stating that, if a law neither burdens a fundamental right nor targets a suspect class, we will uphold the legislative classification so long as it bears a rational relation to some legitimate end.

Amendment 2 fails, indeed defies, even this conventional inquiry. First, the amendment has the peculiar property of imposing a broad and undifferentiated disability on a single named group, an exceptional and, as we shall explain, invalid form of legislation. Second, its sheer breadth is so discontinuous with the reasons offered for it that the amendment seems inexplicable by anything but animus toward the class that it affects; it lacks a rational relationship to legitimate state interests.

Taking the first point, even in the ordinary equal protection case calling for the most deferential of standards, we insist on knowing the relation between the classification adopted and the object to be attained....

Amendment 2 confounds this normal process of judicial review. It is at once too narrow and too broad. It identifies persons by a single trait and then denies them protection across the board. The resulting disqualification of a class of persons from the right to seek specific protection from the law is unprecedented in our jurisprudence. The absence of precedent for Amendment 2 is itself instructive; “discriminations of an unusual character especially suggest careful consideration to determine whether they are obnoxious to the constitutional provision.”

It is not within our constitutional tradition to enact laws of this sort. Central both to the idea of the rule of law and to our own Constitution’s guarantee of equal protection is the principle that government and each of its parts remain open on impartial terms to all who seek its assistance. “Equal protection of the laws is not achieved through indiscriminate imposition of inequalities.” Respect for this principle explains why laws singling out a certain class of citizens for disfavored legal status or general hardships are rare. A law declaring that in general it shall be more difficult for one group of citizens than for all others to seek aid from the government is itself a denial of equal protection of the laws in the most literal sense....

A second and related point is that laws of the kind now before us raise the inevitable inference that the disadvantage imposed is born of animosity toward the class of persons affected. “If the constitutional conception of ‘equal protection of the laws’ means anything, it must at the very least mean that a bare...desire to harm a politically unpopular group cannot constitute a legitimate governmental interest.” [Department of Agriculture v. Moreno.] Even laws enacted for broad and ambitious purposes often can be explained by reference to legitimate public policies which justify the incidental disadvantages they impose on certain persons. Amendment 2, however, in making a general announcement that gays and lesbians shall not have any particular protections from the law, inflicts on them immediate, continuing, and real injuries that outrun and belie any legitimate justifications that may be claimed for it. We conclude that, in addition to the far-reaching deficiencies of Amendment 2 that we have noted, the principles it offends, in another sense, are conventional and venerable; a law must bear a rational relationship to a legitimate governmental purpose, and Amendment 2 does not.

The primary rationale the State offers for Amendment 2 is respect for other citizens' freedom of association, and in particular the liberties of landlords or employers who have personal or religious objections to homosexuality. Colorado also cites its interest in conserving resources to fight discrimination against other groups. The breadth of the Amendment is so far removed from these particular justifications that we find it impossible to credit them. We cannot say that Amendment 2 is directed to any identifiable legitimate purpose or discrete objective. It is a status-based enactment divorced from any factual context from which we could discern a relationship to legitimate state interests; it is a classification of persons undertaken for its own sake, something the Equal Protection Clause does not permit. "Class legislation...[is] obnoxious to the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment...." Civil Rights Cases.

We must conclude that Amendment 2 classifies homosexuals not to further a proper legislative end but to make them unequal to everyone else. This Colorado cannot do. A State cannot so deem a class of persons a stranger to its laws. Amendment 2 violates the Equal Protection Clause, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Colorado is affirmed.

JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom [CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST] and JUSTICE THOMAS join, dissenting.

The Court has mistaken a Kulturkampf for a fit of spite. The constitutional amendment before us here is not the manifestation of a "bare...desire to harm" homosexuals, but is rather a modest attempt by seemingly tolerant Coloradans to preserve traditional sexual mores against the efforts of a politically powerful minority to revise those mores through use of the laws. That objective, and the means chosen to achieve it, are not only unimpeachable under any constitutional doctrine hitherto pronounced (hence the opinion's heavy reliance upon principles of righteousness rather than judicial holdings); they have been specifically approved by the Congress of the United States and by this Court.

In holding that homosexuality cannot be singled out for disfavorable treatment, the Court...places the prestige of this institution behind the proposition that opposition to homosexuality is as reprehensible as racial or religious bias. Whether it is or not is precisely the cultural debate that gave rise to the Colorado constitutional amendment (and to the preferential laws against which the amendment was directed). Since the Constitution of the United States says nothing about this subject, it is left to be resolved by normal democratic means, including the democratic adoption of provisions in state constitutions. This Court has no business imposing upon all Americans the resolution favored by the elite class from which the Members of this institution are selected, pronouncing that “animosity” toward homosexuality, is evil. I vigorously dissent.

Let me first discuss Part II of the Court’s opinion, its longest section, which is devoted to rejecting the State’s arguments that Amendment 2 “puts gays and lesbians in the same position as all other persons,” and “does no more than deny homosexuals special rights.”...

The amendment prohibits special treatment of homosexuals, and nothing more. It would not affect, for example, a requirement of state law that pensions be paid to all retiring state employees with a certain length of service; homosexual employees, as well as others, would be entitled to that benefit. But it would prevent the State or any municipality from making death-benefit payments to the “life partner” of a homosexual when it does not make such payments to the long-time roommate of a nonhomosexual employee....

Despite all of its hand-wringing about the potential effect of Amendment 2 on general antidiscrimination laws, the Court’s opinion ultimately does not dispute all this, but assumes it to be true. The only denial of equal treatment it contends homosexuals have suffered is this: They may not obtain preferential treatment without amending the state constitution. That is to say, the principle underlying the Court’s opinion is that one who is accorded equal treatment under the laws, but cannot as readily as others obtain preferential treatment under the laws, has been denied equal protection of the laws. If merely stating this alleged “equal protection” violation does not suffice to refute it, our constitutional jurisprudence has achieved terminal silliness.

The central thesis of the Court’s reasoning is that any group is denied equal protection when, to obtain advantage (or, presumably, to avoid disadvantage), it must have recourse to a more general and hence more difficult level of political decisionmaking than others. The world has never heard of such a principle, which is why the Court’s opinion is so long on emotive utterance and so short on relevant legal citation. And it seems to me most unlikely that any multilevel democracy can function under such a principle....

[No] principle set forth in the Constitution, nor even any imagined by this Court in the past 200 years, prohibits what Colorado has done here. But the case for Colorado is much stronger than that. What it has done is not only unprohibited, but eminently reasonable, with close, congressionally approved precedent in earlier constitutional practice.

First, as to its eminent reasonableness. The Court's opinion contains grim, disapproving hints that Coloradans have been guilty of "animus" or "animosity" toward homosexuality, as though that has been established as Unamerican. Of course it is our moral heritage that one should not hate any human being or class of human beings. But I had thought that one could consider certain conduct reprehensible—murder, for example, or polygamy, or cruelty to animals—and could exhibit even "animus" toward such conduct. Surely that is the only sort of "animus" at issue here: moral disapproval of homosexual conduct, the same sort of moral disapproval that produced the centuries-old criminal laws that we held constitutional in [Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)]....*

But though Coloradans are, as I say, entitled to be hostile toward homosexual conduct, the fact is that the degree of hostility reflected by Amendment 2 is the smallest conceivable. The Court's portrayal of Coloradans as a society fallen victim to pointless, hate-filled "gay-bashing" is so false as to be comical. Colorado not only is one of the 25 States that have repealed their antisodomy laws, but was among the first to do so. But the society that eliminates criminal punishment for homosexual acts does not necessarily abandon the view that homosexuality is morally wrong and socially harmful; often, abolition simply reflects the view that enforcement of such criminal laws involves unseemly intrusion into the intimate lives of citizens.

There is a problem, however, which arises when criminal sanction of homosexuality is eliminated but moral and social disapprobation of homosexuality is meant to be retained. The Court cannot be unaware of that problem; it is evident in many cities of the country, and occasionally bubbles to the surface of the news, in heated political disputes over such matters as the introduction into local schools of books teaching that homosexuality is an optional and fully acceptable "alternate life style." The problem (a problem, that is, for those who wish to retain social disapprobation of homosexuality) is that, because those who engage in homosexual conduct tend to reside in disproportionate numbers in certain communities, have high disposable income, and of course care about homosexual-rights issues much more ardently than the public at large, they possess political power much greater than their numbers, both locally and statewide. Quite understandably, they devote this political power to achieving not merely a grudging social toleration, but full social acceptance, of homosexuality.

By the time Coloradans were asked to vote on Amendment 2, their exposure to homosexuals' quest for social endorsement was not limited to newspaper accounts of happenings in places such as New York, Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Key West. Three Colorado cities—Aspen, Boulder, and Denver—had enacted ordinances that listed "sexual orientation" as an impermissible ground for discrimination, equating the moral disapproval of homosexual conduct with racial and religious bigotry. The phenomenon had even appeared statewide: the Governor of Colorado had signed an executive order pronouncing that "in the State of Colorado we recognize the diversity in our pluralistic society and strive to bring an end to discrimination in any form," and directing state agency-heads to "ensure non-discrimination" in hiring and promotion based on, among other things, "sexual orientation." I do not mean to be critical of these legislative successes; homosexuals are as entitled to use the legal system for reinforcement of their moral sentiments as are the rest of society. But they are subject to being countered by lawful, democratic countermeasures as well.

That is where Amendment 2 came in. It sought to counter both the geographic concentration and the disproportionate political power of homosexuals by (1) resolving the controversy at the statewide level, and (2) making the election a single-issue contest for both sides. It put directly, to all the citizens of the State, the question: Should homosexuality be given special protection? They answered no. The Court today asserts that this most democratic of procedures is unconstitutional. Lacking any cases to establish that facially absurd proposition, it simply asserts that it must be unconstitutional, because it has never happened before....

[The constitutions] of the States of Arizona, Idaho, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Utah to this day contain provisions stating that polygamy is "forever prohibited." Polygamists, and those who have a polygamous "orientation," have been "singled out" by these provisions for much more severe treatment than merely denial of favored status; and that treatment can only be changed by achieving amendment of the state constitutions. The Court's disposition today suggests that these provisions are unconstitutional, and that polygamy must be permitted in these States on a state-legislated, or perhaps even local-option, basis—unless, of course, polygamists for some reason have fewer constitutional rights than homosexuals.

The United States Congress, by the way, required the inclusion of these antipolygamy provisions in the constitutions of Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Utah, as a condition of their admission to statehood. (For Arizona, New Mexico, and Utah, moreover, the Enabling Acts required that the antipolygamy provisions be “irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State”—so that not only were “each of [the] parts” of these States not “open on impartial terms” to polygamists, but even the States as a whole were not; polygamists would have to persuade the whole country to their way of thinking.) [Thus], this “singling out” of the sexual practices of a single group for statewide, democratic vote—so utterly alien to our constitutional system, the Court would have us believe—has not only happened, but has received the explicit approval of the United States Congress....

[The] Court today, announcing that Amendment 2 “defies...conventional [constitutional] inquiry,” and “confounds [the] normal process of judicial review,” employs a constitutional theory heretofore unknown to frustrate Colorado’s reasonable effort to preserve traditional American moral values. The Court’s stern disapproval of “animosity” towards homosexuality might be compared with what an earlier Court (including the revered Justices Harlan and Bradley) said in Murphy v. Ramsey, 114 U.S. 15 (1885), rejecting a constitutional challenge to a United States statute that denied the franchise in federal territories to those who engaged in polygamous cohabitation:

Certainly no legislation can be supposed more wholesome and necessary in the founding of a free, self-governing commonwealth, fit to take rank as one of the coordinate States of the Union, than that which seeks to establish it on the basis of the idea of the family, as consisting in and springing from the union for life of one man and one woman in the holy estate of matrimony; the sure foundation of all that is stable and noble in our civilization; the best guaranty of that reverent morality which is the source of all beneficent progress in social and political improvement.

I would not myself indulge in such official praise for heterosexual monogamy, because I think it no business of the courts (as opposed to the political branches) to take sides in this culture war.

But the Court today has done so, not only by inventing a novel and extravagant constitutional doctrine to take the victory away from traditional forces, but even by verbally disparaging as bigotry adherence to traditional attitudes. To suggest, for example, that this constitutional amendment springs from nothing more than “a bare...desire to harm a politically unpopular group” is nothing short of insulting. (It is also nothing short of preposterous to call “politically unpopular” a group which enjoys enormous influence in American media and politics, and which, as the trial court here noted, though composing no more than 4% of the population had the support of 46% of the voters on Amendment 2.)

When the Court takes sides in the culture wars, it tends to be with the knights rather than the villeins—and more specifically with the Templars, reflecting the views and values of the lawyer class from which the Court’s Members are drawn. How that class feels about homosexuality will be evident to anyone who wishes to interview job applicants at virtually any of the Nation’s law schools. The interviewer may refuse to offer a job because the applicant is a Republican; because he is an adulterer; because he went to the wrong prep school or belongs to the wrong country club; because he eats snails; because he is a womanizer; because she wears real-animal fur; or even because he hates the Chicago Cubs. But if the interviewer should wish not to be an associate or partner of an applicant because he disapproves of the applicant’s homosexuality, then he will have violated the pledge which the Association of American Law Schools requires all its member-schools to exact from job interviewers: “assurance of the employer’s willingness” to hire homosexuals. This law-school view of what “prejudices” must be stamped out may be contrasted with the more plebeian attitudes that apparently still prevail in the United States Congress, which has been unresponsive to repeated attempts to extend to homosexuals the protections of federal civil rights laws, and which took the pains to exclude them specifically from the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990.

Today’s opinion has no foundation in American constitutional law, and barely pretends to. The people of Colorado have adopted an entirely reasonable provision which does not even disfavor homosexuals in any substantive sense, but merely denies them preferential treatment. Amendment 2 is designed to prevent piecemeal deterioration of the sexual morality favored by a majority of Coloradans, and is not only an appropriate means to that legitimate end, but a means that Americans have employed before. Striking it down is an act, not of judicial judgment, but of political will. I dissent.

Note: The Meaning of Romer

1. Baselines again. The Court claims that its decision guarantees for homosexuals only “equal” and not “special” protection. This is so, the Court asserts, because under modern conditions the baseline is a general right to be free from discrimination. Protections against discrimination are “taken for granted by most people either because they already have them or do not need them; these are protections against exclusion from an almost limitless number of transactions and endeavors that constitute ordinary civic life in a free society.” Suppose Colorado had never enacted Amendment 2 but had simply failed to enact measures protecting homosexuals from discrimination. Does it follow from the Court’s analysis that a state acts “irrationally” and therefore violates the Constitution if it provides general protection against discrimination for a wide range of group but fails to provide such protection for gay men and lesbians?

In Perry v. Brown, 671 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2012), the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals held that a California constitutional amendment (“Proposition 8”) restoring the restriction of marriage to opposite-sex couples (after a California Supreme Court decision struck down a prior restriction and 18,000 same-sex marriages had taken place) violated equal protection. It reasoned that “Like Amendment 2, Proposition 8 [had] the ‘peculiar property,’ of ‘withdraw[ing] from homosexuals, but no others,’ an existing legal right—here, access to the official designation of ‘marriage’—that had been broadly available, notwithstanding the fact that the Constitution did not compel the state to confer it in the first place.” Furthermore, “like Amendment 2, Proposition 8 constitutionalizes that disability, meaning that gays and lesbians may overcome it ‘only by enlisting the citizenry of [the state] to amend the State Constitution’ for a second time.” The court recognized that there were some significant differences between Amendment 2 and Proposition 8.

[But] Proposition 8 is no less problematic than Amendment 2 merely because its effect is narrower; to the contrary, the surgical precision with which it excises a right belonging to gay and lesbian couples makes it even more suspect. A law that has no practical effect except to strip one group of the right to use a state-authorized and socially meaningful designation is all the more “unprecedented” and “unusual”...and raises an even stronger “inference that the disadvantage imposed is born of animosity toward the class of persons affected.”

The Supreme Court vacated the Ninth Circuit’s decision in light of its conclusion that the proponents of Proposition 8 had lacked standing to appeal the district court’s decision striking it down. Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652 (2013).

2. Justice Scalia’s dissent. What is the meaning of the first sentence of Justice Scalia’s opinion? “Kulturkampf” is the German word for “culture war.” The term refers to the effort by the German government in the late nineteenth century, under the leadership of Count Bismarck, to reduce the influence of the Roman Catholic Church. Among other things, Bismarck insisted that the state train and license priests and imprisoned priests and bishops who disobeyed his orders. Consider the possibility that our Constitution outlaws state-supported “Kulturkampfs” and that Amendment 2 violated the Constitution precisely because it formed part of an official “culture war” against a particular subsection of the population. Note that the majority and dissenting opinions each accuse the other of departing from a position of state neutrality in this conflict. What does state neutrality mean in this context? Is neutrality a desirable or constitutionally required objective? For a discussion of the equal rights/special rights distinction, see Rubin, Equal Rights, Special Rights, and the Nature of Antidiscrimination Law, 97 Mich. L. Rev. 564 (1998).

3. Beyond equal protection. Perhaps because the Court’s opinion does not follow the conventional outline for equal protection decisions, commentators have read the opinion in a variety of ways. On the decision’s reach, compare Sunstein, Foreword: Leaving Things Undecided, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 4 (1996) (defending a “minimalist” interpretation), with Seidman, Romer’s Radicalism: The Unexpected Revival of Warren Court Activism, 1996 Sup. Ct. Rev. 67 (defending a “radical” interpretation). On its meaning, see, e.g., Jeffries and Levinson, The Non-Retrogression Principle in Constitutional Law, 86 Cal. L. Rev. 1211 (1998) (analyzing and criticizing Romer as embodying a nonretrogression principle); Amar, Attainder and Amendment 2: Romer’s Rightness, 95 Mich. L. Rev. 203 (1996) (analyzing Romer under the bill of attainder clause); Farber and Sherry, The Pariah Principle, 13 Const. Comment. 257 (1996) (analyzing Romer under the principle that “forbids government from designating any societal group as untouchable, regardless of whether the group in question is generally entitled to some special degree of judicial protection”); Alexander, Sometimes Better Boring and Correct: Romer v. Evans as an Exercise of Ordinary Equal Protection Analysis, 68 U. Colo. L. Rev. 335 (1996) (analyzing Romer in terms of “ordinary” equal protection principles). See generally Symposium, Gay Rights and the Courts: The Amendment 2 Controversy, 68 U. Colo. L. Rev. 285 (1996).

Note: The Standard of Review

Part of the Court’s explanation for its decision in Romer was the very breadth of Amendment 2. Thus, the Court never confronted the conventional question of what level of scrutiny to apply to laws that discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation with respect to a particular burden or benefit. Consider the various possibilities.

1. Strict scrutiny. No court has held that discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation triggers strict scrutiny as a matter of federal equal protection law. But the California Supreme Court held that discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation triggers strict scrutiny under the state analogue to the equal protection clause:

[Sexual] orientation is a characteristic (1) that bears no relation to a person's ability to perform or contribute to society, and (2) that is associated with a stigma of inferiority and second-class citizenship, manifested by the group's history of legal and social disabilities....

[It is irrelevant] that there is a question as to whether this characteristic is or is not "immutable." Although we noted in [an earlier case holding that sex-based distinctions trigger strict scrutiny] that generally a person's gender is viewed as an immutable trait, immutability is not invariably required in order for a characteristic to be considered a suspect classification for equal protection purposes. California cases establish that a person's religion is a suspect classification for equal protection purposes, and one's religion, of course, is not immutable but is a matter over which an individual has control. ([And] alienage [is] treated as a suspect classification notwithstanding circumstance that alien can become a citizen.) Because a person's sexual orientation is so integral an aspect of one's identity, it is not appropriate to require a person to repudiate or change his or her sexual orientation in order to avoid discriminatory treatment.

In his briefing before this court, the Attorney General...argues that a fourth requirement should be imposed before a characteristic is considered a constitutionally suspect basis for classification for equal protection purposes—namely, that "a 'suspect' classification is appropriately recognized only for minorities who are unable to use the political process to address their needs." The Attorney General's brief asserts that "[since] the gay and lesbian community in California is obviously able to wield political power in defense of its interests, this Court should not hold that sexual orientation constitutes a suspect classification."

Although some California decisions in discussing suspect classifications have referred to a group's "political powerlessness," our cases have not identified a group's current political powerlessness as a necessary prerequisite for treatment as a suspect class. Indeed, if a group's current political powerlessness were a prerequisite to a characteristic's being considered a constitutionally suspect basis for differential treatment, it would be impossible to justify the numerous decisions that continue to treat sex, race, and religion as suspect classifications. Instead, our decisions make clear that the most important factors in deciding whether a characteristic should be considered a constitutionally suspect basis for classification are whether the class of persons who exhibit a certain characteristic historically has been subjected to invidious and prejudicial treatment, and whether society now recognizes that the characteristic in question generally bears no relationship to the individual's ability to perform or contribute to society. Thus, "courts must look closely at classifications based on that characteristic lest outdated social stereotypes result in invidious laws or practices." This rationale clearly applies to statutory classifications that mandate differential treatment on the basis of sexual orientation....

In re Marriage Cases, 43 Cal. 4th 757, 183 P.3d 384 (2008). Note that California also applies strict, rather than intermediate, scrutiny to classifications based on gender.

2. Intermediate scrutiny. Is discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation simply sex discrimination? Consider the sodomy statute at issue in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003). (Lawrence is discussed in more detail at pages 678-679 and 693-694, infra, and in Chapter 6, section F3, infra.) The statute criminalized consensual oral or anal sex between two adults of the same sex (but not the same acts when performed by individuals of different sexes). Or consider statutes that restrict marriage to persons of opposite sexes. In either situation, it would be accurate to say that a man challenging the statute would have been treated differently had he been a woman (and a woman challenging the statute would have been treated differently if she had been a man). Is something important gained (or lost) by differentiating between sex discrimination claims and sexual orientation discrimination claims?

Consider Koppelman, Why Discrimination against Lesbians and Gay Men Is Sex Discrimination, 69 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 197, 235 (1994) (emphasis omitted):

Most Americans learn no later than high school that one of the nastier sanctions that one will suffer if one deviates from the behavior traditionally deemed appropriate for one's sex is the imputation of homosexuality....

[The] central outrage of male sodomy is that a man is reduced to the status of a woman, which is understood to be degrading. Just as miscegenation was threatening because it called into question the distinctive and superior status of being white, homosexuality is threatening because it calls into question the distinctive and superior status of being male. Male homosexuals and lesbians, respectively, are understood to be guilty of one aspect of the dual crime of the miscegenating white woman: self-degradation and insubordination. As with miscegenation, a member of the superior caste who allows his body to be penetrated is thereby polluted and degraded, and he assumes the status of the subordinate caste: he becomes womanlike.

For a skeptical examination of the gender discrimination argument, see Stein, Evaluating the Sex Discrimination Argument for Lesbian and Gay Rights, 49 UCLA L. Rev. 471 (2001).

In Windsor v. United States, 699 F.3d 169 (2d Cir. 2012), the Second Circuit became the first federal court of appeals to apply intermediate scrutiny to claims of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, not as a subset of sex discrimination claims more generally but because discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation should trigger heightened scrutiny in its own right. The case before it concerned a challenge to the federal Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA). Section 3 of DOMA provides that [in] determining the meaning of any Act of Congress, or of any ruling, regulation, or interpretation of the various administrative bureaus and agencies of the United States, the word “marriage” means only a legal union between one man and one woman as husband and wife, and the word “spouse” refers only to a person of the opposite sex who is a husband or a wife.

Edith Windsor, a widow whose marriage was recognized by New York State, sued for a refund of estate taxes levied on the estate of her deceased spouse: had Windsor’s spouse been a man, rather than a woman, her estate would have passed to Windsor untaxed. The Second Circuit held that all four of the factors the Supreme Court had used “to decide whether a new classification qualifies as a quasi-suspect class” militated in favor of imposing heightened scrutiny here. First, the Second Circuit pointed to the fact that lesbian and gay people had experienced a history of official discrimination. Second, the court, quoting City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, 473 U.S. 432 (1985), concluded that sexual orientation had no “relation to ability to perform or contribute to society.” To the contrary, “[t]he aversion homosexuals experience has nothing to do with aptitude or performance.” Third, the court of appeals concluded that “homosexuality is a sufficiently discernible characteristic to define a discrete minority class.” The court found that it did not matter whether sexual orientation was “necessarily fixed” or might “change over time, range along a continuum, and overlap (for bisexuals).” It pointed out that “[c]lassifications based on alienage, illegitimacy, and national origin are all subject to heightened scrutiny, even though these characteristics do not declare themselves, and often may be disclosed or suppressed as a matter of preference.”

Indeed, “[a]lienage and illegitimacy are actually subject to change.” Finally, the court concluded that “homosexuals are still significantly encumbered” in using the political process to protect themselves from discrimination: “The question is not whether homosexuals have achieved political successes over the years; they clearly have. The question is whether they have the strength to politically protect themselves from wrongful discrimination.”

The Second Circuit saw “parallels between the status of women at the time of Frontiero and homosexuals today: their position ‘has improved markedly in recent decades,’ but they still ‘face pervasive, although at times more subtle, discrimination...in the political arena.’”

Applying intermediate scrutiny, the Second Circuit struck down Section 3 of DOMA, finding that it was not substantially related to any important governmental purpose.

The third and fourth factors discussed by the Second Circuit in Windsor map onto Carolene Products’ identification of “prejudice against discrete and insular minorities” as “a special condition, which tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities, and which may call for a correspondingly more searching judicial inquiry.” Do these concerns operate differently with respect to gay men and lesbians than with respect to other groups receiving heightened scrutiny? See Sunstein, Homosexuality and the Constitution, 70 Ind. L.J. 1, 8 (1994):

Homosexuals may well be politically powerless in the constitutionally relevant sense. [Precisely] because they are often anonymous [and] diffuse [they] face large barriers to exerting adequate political influence. [The] ability to conceal can actually make things worse from the standpoint of exercising political power. This problem, severe in itself, is heightened by the fact that people who challenge discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation are often “accused” of being homosexuals [themselves]. The existence of widespread hostility against homosexuals can thus make it difficult for homosexuals and heterosexuals alike to speak out against this form of discrimination.

See also Ackerman, Beyond Carolene Products, 98 Harv. L. Rev. 713, 718 (1985) (arguing that precisely because gay people are neither “discrete”—because they are not always easily identifiable, and thus can avoid being forced into political solidarity with one another—nor “insular” they face higher political organization costs and thus have a particularly strong claim “upon Carolene’s concern with the fairness of the political process”).

Compare Duncan, Who Wants to Stop the Church?: Homosexual Rights

Legislation, Public Policy, and Religious Freedom, 69 Notre Dame L. Rev. 393, 409 (1994):

Not only are homosexuals an affluent and a highly educated class, they are also politically powerful. Homosexuals are far more likely than average to vote, and one of the fastest-growing political action organizations in Washington is the Human Rights Campaign, a pro-gay group that raised $4.5 million in 1992. During the Democratic primaries in [1992], all five of the leading Democratic candidates for president "actively courted the gay vote." And, of course, President Clinton is a strong supporter of the gay political agenda.

The Supreme Court affirmed the Second Circuit's judgment in United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675 (2013). The opinions in the case are described in Chapter 6, section F. Justice Kennedy, writing for the Court's majority, stated that "[t]he liberty protected by the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause contains within it the prohibition against denying to any person the equal protection of the laws. While the Fifth Amendment itself withdraws from Government the power to degrade or demean in the way this law does, the equal protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment makes that Fifth Amendment right all the more specific and all the better understood and preserved." The Court's opinion, however, did not discuss the appropriate standard of review.

3. Rationality review with "bite." Another federal court of appeals faced with a challenge to the Defense of Marriage Act declined to apply intermediate scrutiny. In Massachusetts v. U.S. Department of Health & Human Services, 682 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2012), it offered a different view:

[T]o create such a new suspect classification for same-sex relationships would have far-reaching implications....Nothing indicates that the Supreme Court is about to adopt this new suspect classification....

However, that is not the end of the matter. Without relying on suspect classifications, Supreme Court equal protection decisions have both intensified scrutiny of purported justifications where minorities are subject to discrepant treatment and have limited the permissible justifications....

In a set of equal protection decisions, the Supreme Court has now several times struck down state or local enactments without invoking any suspect classification. In each, the protesting group was historically disadvantaged or unpopular, and the statutory justification seemed thin, unsupported or impermissible....

[U.S. Department of Agriculture v. Moreno, 413 U.S. 528 (1973), City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, 473 U.S. 432 (1985), and Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)] did not adopt some new category of suspect classification or employ rational basis review in its minimalist form; instead, the Court rested on the case-specific nature of the discrepant treatment, the burden imposed, and the infirmities of the justifications offered....

All three of the cited cases...stressed the historic patterns of disadvantage suffered by the group adversely affected by the statute. As with the women, the poor and the mentally impaired, gays and lesbians have long been the subject of discrimination....

Accordingly, we conclude that the extreme deference accorded to ordinary economic legislation in cases like Lee Optical would not be extended to DOMA by the Supreme Court; and without insisting on “compelling” or “important” justifications or “narrow tailoring,” the Court would scrutinize with care the purported bases for the legislation....

Does the First Circuit’s approach give any guidance as to how that court would analyze other statutes or policies that discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation?

4. Conventional rationality review. In Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), the Supreme Court held that laws criminalizing private, consensual sex between two adults of the same sex violate the due process clause. (Lawrence is discussed in more detail in Chapter 6, section F3, infra.) Lawrence overruled Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), in which the Court had upheld a Georgia law criminalizing all oral or anal sex as applied to homosexual activity. (While the Romer majority never mentioned Hardwick, Justice Scalia’s dissent spent considerable time arguing that if states were entitled to criminalize gay sexual activity, a fortiori they could refuse to accord special protection to gay men and lesbians.) The Lawrence Court recognized that Romer “cast [the Bowers v. Hardwick] holding into...doubt,” but declined to rely on Romer in striking down the Texas statute because “[were] we to hold the statute invalid under the Equal Protection Clause some might question whether a prohibition would be valid if drawn differently, say, to prohibit the conduct both between same-sex and different-sex participants.”

Was the Court correct? Does its concern rest on the probability that a facially neutral statute would be enforced in a selective manner? If it does, is the real problem the difficulty of teasing out discriminatory purpose?

In a concurrence in the judgment in Lawrence, Justice O’Connor embraced an equal protection clause basis for striking down Texas’s statute. Notably, she did not argue for strict scrutiny. Rather, she concluded that Texas’s law failed even to serve a legitimate state interest:

We have consistently held, however, that some objectives, such as “a bare... desire to harm a politically unpopular group,” are not legitimate state interests. [Moreno; Cleburne; Romer.] When a law exhibits such a desire to harm a politically unpopular group, we have applied a more searching form of rational basis review to strike down such laws under the Equal Protection Clause.

We have been most likely to apply rational basis review to hold a law unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause where, as here, the challenged legislation inhibits personal relationships....

The statute at issue here makes sodomy a crime only if a person “engages in deviate sexual intercourse with another individual of the same sex.” Sodomy between opposite-sex partners, however, is not a crime in Texas....

The Texas statute makes homosexuals unequal in the eyes of the law by making particular conduct—and only that conduct—subject to criminal sanction.

The effect of Texas’s sodomy law is not just limited to the threat of prosecution or consequence of conviction. Texas’s sodomy law brands all homosexuals as criminals, thereby making it more difficult for homosexuals to be treated in the same manner as everyone else. Indeed, Texas itself has previously acknowledged the collateral effects of the law, stipulating in a prior challenge to this action that the law “legally sanctions discrimination against [homosexuals] in a variety of ways unrelated to the criminal law,” including in the areas of “employment, family issues, and housing.”...

This case raises [the question]...whether, under the Equal Protection Clause, moral disapproval is a legitimate state interest to justify by itself a statute that bans homosexual sodomy, but not heterosexual sodomy. It is not. Moral disapproval of this group, like a bare desire to harm the group, is an interest that is insufficient to satisfy rational basis review under the Equal Protection Clause.

Is the desire to express disapproval of homosexual activity or to condemn gay people as immoral always an impermissible government purpose? If it is, is there any law that treats homosexuals and heterosexuals differently that can withstand rationality review?

In this light, consider the history of “don’t ask, don’t tell.” For years, gay men and lesbians were barred from military service. See generally R. Shilts, Conduct Unbecoming (1993). In 1993, responding to President Clinton’s indication that he might lift the ban, Congress enacted 10 U.S.C. §654.

Declaring that “unit cohesion” was critical to combat capability and that combat troops were required “involuntarily to accept living conditions and working conditions that are often spartan, primitive, and characterized by forced intimacy with little or no privacy,” Congress required that, under most circumstances, members of the armed forces should be separated from service if they stated that they were homosexual or bisexual or engaged in homosexual acts. The policy was repeatedly, and unsuccessfully, challenged as a denial of equal protection. See Cook v. Gates, 528 F.3d 42 (1st Cir. 2008) (holding that “don’t ask, don’t tell” was subject only to rationality review, which it satisfied because of the government’s interest in service members’ morale and unit cohesion); cf. Witt v. Department of the Air Force, 527 F.3d 806 (9th Cir. 2008) (affirming the dismissal of a service member’s equal protection claim, but allowing her to go forward on her procedural and substantive due process claims).

If the major argument about unit cohesion rests on the potential disruption caused by other service members’ dislike of or discomfort around gay people, can unit cohesion provide a legitimate or compelling reason for exclusion? In this regard, consider Palmore v. Sidoti, 466 U.S. 429 (1984), discussed on page 545, supra. There, the Supreme Court held that a court deciding a child custody case could not take into account the potential prejudice that would be suffered by a white child if custody were granted to a parent who had subsequently entered into an interracial marriage. Although the state had “a duty of the highest order to protect the interests of minor children,” and there was “a risk that a child living with a step-parent of a different race may be subject to a variety of pressures and stresses,” the “reality of private biases and the possible injury they might inflict” were not “permissible considerations. [Private] biases may be outside the reach of the law, but the law cannot, directly or indirectly, give them effect.” Are the government interests served by unit cohesion more compelling? Does the answer to this question necessarily require considering whether sexual orientation is a suspect classification? Note also in this regard the Court’s general deference to the military, even in cases involving sex discrimination, when military operations are at issue.

More generally, does Palmore undercut decisionmaking on the basis of sexual orientation with respect to family law matters, such as adoption or child custody decisions?

Although equal protection challenges to don’t ask, don’t tell failed, the policy was repealed by Congress.

5. Same-sex marriage. Do laws that restrict marriage to opposite-sex couples violate the equal protection clause? Beginning in the 1990s, several state supreme courts addressed this question under state constitutional provisions dealing with equality. See, e.g., Varnum v. Brien, 763 N.W.2d 862 (Iowa 2009); In re Marriage Cases, 43 Cal. 4th 757, 183 P.3d 384 (2008); Kerrigan v. Commissioner of Public Health, 289 Conn. 135, 957 A.2d 407 (2008); Baehr v. Lewin, 74 Haw. 645, 852 P.2d 44 (1993); Conaway v. Deane, 401 Md. 219, 932 A.2d 571 (2007); Goodridge v. Department of Public Health, 440 Mass. 309, 798 N.E.2d 941 (2003); Lewis v. Harris, 188 N.J. 415, 908 A.2d 196 (2006); Hernandez v. Robles, 7 N.Y.3d 338, 855 N.E.2d 1 (2006); Baker v. State, 170 Vt. 194, 744 A.2d 864 (1999); Andersen v. King County, 158 Wis. 2d 1, 138 P.3d 963 (2006).

Courts addressing the issue have applied a variety of legal standards, ranging from strict scrutiny (the California case), to intermediate scrutiny (the Connecticut case), to rationality review (the New York, Vermont, and Washington cases). Even when state courts applied rationality review, they reached different conclusions regarding the rationality of the state's proffered reasons for restricting marriage to opposite-sex couples.

In Obergefell v. Hodges, 135 S. Ct. 2584 (2015), the Court relied on both the due process clause and the equal protection clause to hold that state laws excluding same-sex couples from the right to marry are unconstitutional. Once again, the Court's discussion of the equal protection clause did not specify the standard of review that it was using. (The case is covered more fully in Chapter 6, section F.).

To what extent do the judicial and political responses to questions of sexual orientation generally, and same-sex marriage specifically, suggest the limits of constitutional adjudication as a mechanism for settling hotly contested social issues? For representative discussions of the relationship between judicial decisions, popular opinion, and social change, see D. Cole, Engines of Liberty: The Power of Citizen Activists to Make Constitutional Law 17–93 (2016); M. Klarman, From the Closet to the Altar: Courts, Backlash, and the Struggle for Same-Sex Marriage (2012); Egan, Persily, and Wallsten, Gay Rights, in Public Opinion and Constitutional Controversy (N. F. EQUAL PROTECTION METHODOLOGY: OTHER CANDIDATES FOR HEIGHTENED SCRUTINY

What, if any, other classifications should be regarded as "suspect"? What criteria should the Court use in assessing the claims of other "groups for heightened scrutiny"? Is the analogy to race and gender useful? If so, which characteristics of blacks and women must other candidates for heightened scrutiny share? Might heightened scrutiny for some classifications be justified even though the problems of the group are entirely different from those facing racial minorities and women? If so, what sorts of problems should trigger judicial intervention?

1. Alienage

One way to think about heightened scrutiny for suspect classifications is that it is the appropriate judicial response to efforts by the majority to exclude certain groups from the political community. In the famous footnote 4 of United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938), the Supreme Court intimated that “more searching judicial inquiry” in cases involving discrete and insular minorities might rest on the fact that prejudice “tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities.” Yet the Constitution itself seems to contemplate different access to the political system for citizens and noncitizens: The amendments that explicitly protect the right to vote against discrimination on the basis of race, sex, and age, for example, each provide that the right “of citizens of the United States” cannot be denied on a forbidden basis. And the United States does not invariably owe the same protections to persons outside the nation as it does to those within its jurisdiction. See, e.g., United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990) (fourth amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures does not apply to a search of property owned by a nonresident alien in Mexico).

The moral and legal legitimacy of this power to define boundaries for the political community is intensely controversial. At one time, many groups we now include within the community—most notably racial minorities—were excluded. And yet at some point lines must be drawn. For example, some who claim that the U.S. government owes a duty to citizens of Mexico base the claim on physical proximity and are prepared to acknowledge that it may not owe the same duty to citizens of Pakistan. See Lopez, Undocumented Mexican Migration: In Search of a Just Immigration Law and Policy, 28 UCLA L. Rev. 615, 698–700 (1981).

Can the need to draw some boundaries around the political community be reconciled with heightened scrutiny for classifications disadvantaging some groups outside those boundaries? Are there principled limits on the way in which the boundaries can be defined? The Supreme Court’s treatment of statutes disadvantaging aliens raises these questions.

Sugarman v. Dougall

MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court....

[Appellees challenged the constitutionality of a New York statute that excluded aliens from all government civil service positions filled by competitive examination. Such positions included the “full range of work tasks [all] the way from the menial to the policy making.” However, the exclusion did not apply to higher offices in the state executive departments and to elected officers and offices filled by the Governor or by legislative appointment.]

As is so often the case, it is important at the outset to define the precise and narrow issue that is here presented. The Court is faced only with the question whether New York’s flat statutory prohibition against the employment of aliens in the competitive classified civil service is constitutionally valid. The Court is not asked to decide whether a particular alien, any more than a particular citizen, may be refused employment or discharged on an individual basis for whatever legitimate reason the State might possess.

Neither is the Court reviewing a legislative scheme that bars some or all aliens from closely defined and limited classes of public employment....

It is established, of course, that an alien is entitled to the shelter of the Equal Protection Clause. [Appellants] argue, however, that [the statute] does not violate the equal protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment because [it] “establishes a generic classification reflecting the special requirements of public employment in the career civil service.” The distinction drawn between the citizen and the alien, it is said, “rests on the fundamental concept of identity between a government and the members, or citizens, of the state.” The civil servant “participates directly in the formulation and execution of government policy,” and thus must be free of competing obligations to another power. The State’s interest in having an employee of undivided loyalty is substantial, for obligations attendant upon foreign citizenship “might impair the exercise of his judgment or jeopardize public confidence in his objectivity.” [It] is at once apparent, however, that appellants’ asserted justification proves both too much and too little. [The] State’s broad prohibition of the employment of aliens applies to many positions with respect to which the State’s proffered justification has little, if any, relationship. At the same time, the prohibition has no application at all to positions that would seem naturally to fall within the State’s asserted purpose. Our standard of review of statutes that treat aliens differently from citizens requires a greater degree of precision.

In Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365, 372 (1971), we observed that aliens as a class “are a prime example of a ‘discrete and insular’ minority (see United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 152–153, n.4 (1938)),” and that classifications based on alienage are “subject to close judicial scrutiny.”

[Graham concerned a constitutional challenge to state statutes disqualifying aliens from receipt of various forms of welfare assistance. Justice Blackmun’s opinion for the Court held that “classifications based on alienage, like those based on nationality or race, are inherently suspect.” Applying strict scrutiny to the challenged statutes, the Court found that the “State’s desire to preserve limited welfare benefits for its own citizens is inadequate to justify [making] noncitizens ineligible for public assistance.”]

Applying this standard to New York’s purpose in confining civil servants in the competitive class to those persons who have no ties of citizenship elsewhere, [the statute] does not withstand the necessary close scrutiny. We recognize a State’s interest in establishing its own form of government, and in limiting participation in that government to those who are within “the basic conception of a political community.” Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 344 (1972). We recognize, too, the State’s broad power to define its political community. But in seeking to achieve this substantial purpose, with discrimination against aliens, the means the State employs must be precisely drawn in light of the acknowledged purpose.

[The statute] is neither narrowly confined nor precise in its application. Its imposed ineligibility may apply to the “sanitation man, class B,” to the typist, and to the office worker, as well as to the person who directly participates in the formulation and execution of important state policy....

[We do not hold] that a State may not, in an appropriately defined class of positions, require citizenship as a qualification for office. Just as “the Framers of the Constitution intended the States to keep for themselves, as provided in the Tenth Amendment, the power to regulate elections,” “[e]ach State has the power to prescribe the qualifications of its officers and the manner in which they shall be chosen.” Such power inheres in the State by virtue of its obligation, already noted, “to preserve the basic conception of a political community.” And this power and responsibility of the State applies, not only to the qualifications of voters, but also to persons holding state elective or important nonelective executive, legislative, and judicial positions, for officers who participate directly in the formulation, execution, or review of broad public policy perform functions that go to the heart of representative government....

This Court has never held that aliens have a constitutional right to vote or to hold high public office under the Equal Protection Clause. Indeed implicit in many of this Court’s voting rights decisions is the notion that citizenship is a permissible criterion for limiting such rights. A restriction on the employment of noncitizens, narrowly confined, could have particular relevance to this important state responsibility, for alienage itself is a factor that reasonably could be employed in defining “political community.”...

MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST, dissenting.

The Court [holds] that an alien is not really different from a citizen, and that any legislative classification on the basis of alienage is “inherently suspect.” The Fourteenth Amendment, the Equal Protection Clause of which the Court interprets as invalidating the state legislation here involved, contains no language concerning “inherently suspect classifications,” or for that matter, merely “suspect classifications.” The principal purpose of those who drafted and adopted the Amendment was to prohibit the States from invidiously discriminating by reason of race, Slaughter-House Cases, and, because of this plainly manifested intent, classifications based on race have rightly been held “suspect” under the Amendment. But there is no language used in the Amendment, or any historical evidence as to the intent of the Framers, which would suggest to the slightest degree that it was intended to render alienage a “suspect” classification, that it was designed in any way to protect “discrete and insular minorities” other than racial minorities, or that it would in any way justify the result reached by the Court in these two cases....

[The record contains] no indication that the aliens suffered any disability that precluded them, either as a group or individually, from applying for and being granted the status of naturalized citizens. [The] “status” of these individuals was not, therefore, one with which they were forever encumbered; they could take steps to alter it when and if they chose....¹

The Court, by holding in these cases and in Graham v. Richardson that a citizen-alien classification is “suspect” in the eyes of our Constitution, fails to mention, let alone rationalize, the fact that the Constitution itself recognizes a basic difference between citizens and aliens. That distinction is constitutionally important in no less than 11 instances in a political document noted for its brevity....

Our society, consisting of over 200 million individuals of multitudinous origins, customs, tongues, beliefs, and cultures is, to say the least, diverse. It would hardly take extraordinary ingenuity for a lawyer to find “insular and discrete” minorities at every turn in the road. Yet, unless the Court can precisely define and constitutionally justify both the terms and analysis it uses, these decisions today stand for the proposition that the Court can choose a “minority” it “feels” deserves “solicitude” and thereafter prohibit the States from classifying that “minority” differently from the “majority.” I cannot find, and the Court does not cite, any constitutional authority for such a “ward of the Court” approach to equal protection....

It is not irrational to assume that aliens as a class are not familiar with how we as individuals treat others and how we expect “government” to treat us. An alien who grew up in a country in which political mores do not reject bribery or self-dealing to the same extent that our culture does; in which an imperious bureaucracy historically adopted a complacent or contemptuous attitude toward those it was supposed to serve; in which fewer if any checks existed on administrative abuses; in which “low-level” civil servants serve at the will of their superiors—could rationally be thought not to be able to deal with the public and with citizen civil servants with the same rapport that one familiar with our political and social mores would, or to approach his duties with the attitude that such positions exist for service, not personal sinecures of either the civil servant or his or her superior.

Note: Strict Scrutiny for Classifications Based on Alienage: Defining the Political Community

Is there an adequate justification for subjecting alienage classifications to special scrutiny? Consider the following arguments.

1. History of discrimination. Is strict scrutiny for alienage classifications required because aliens, like blacks and women, have suffered a history of discrimination in the United States? Historically, different states at different times have denied aliens the right to vote, prohibited them from engaging in a wide range of occupations, discriminated against them in taxation, and restricted their ownership of property. Moreover, a general sense of xenophobia has affected American attitudes and policies at various times in our history. In the Alien Act of 1798 and during the “Red Scare” after World War I, for example, the federal government adopted especially severe measures to deal with suspected subversion by aliens. See generally W. Gibson, Aliens and the Law (1940); M. Konvitz, The Alien and the Asiatic in American Law (1946); J. Smith, Freedom’s Fetters (1956). See also Takahashi v. Fish & Game Commission, 334 U.S. 410 (1948) (invalidating a California law restricting the right of aliens to fish); Oyama v. California, 332 U.S. 633 (1948) (invalidating a California law restricting the right of aliens to own land); Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33 (1915) (invalidating an Arizona law prohibiting any business employing five or more persons from employing more than 20 percent aliens).

2. Alienage as an immutable characteristic. Is strict scrutiny for alienage classifications required because it is an immutable characteristic over which the disadvantaged individual can exercise no control? Note that many resident aliens may be eligible for U.S. citizenship but choose not to become citizens. In Nyquist v. Maucler, 432 U.S. 1 (1977), the Supreme Court rejected New York's argument that it was entitled to deny financial aid to noncitizen students who had neither applied for citizenship nor had affirmed their intent to apply as soon as they became eligible.

If aliens are free to change their status at will, why aren't classifications disadvantaging this group justified as a means of encouraging naturalization? Compare Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982), where the Court invalidated a Texas policy of refusing to provide free public education to illegally present alien children. The Court rejected the assertion that illegal aliens are a suspect class. "Unlike most of the classifications that we have recognized as suspect, entry into this class, by virtue of entry into this country, is the product of voluntary action. Indeed, entry into the class is itself a crime." But, although "[persuasive] arguments support the view that a State may withhold its beneficence from those whose very presence within the United States is the product of their own unlawful conduct," these arguments do not apply with the same force to classifications imposing disabilities on the minor children of such illegal entrants. [The] "parents have the ability to conform their conduct to societal norms," and presumably the ability to remove themselves from the State's jurisdiction; but the children who are plaintiffs in these cases "can affect neither their parents' conduct nor their own status" [quoting Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762 (1977)]. Even if the State found it expedient to control the conduct of adults by acting against their children, legislation directing the onus of a parent's misconduct against his children does not comport with fundamental conceptions of justice.

Because Texas's policy "[imposed] a lifetime hardship on a discrete class of children not accountable for their disabling status," the Court concluded that the discrimination "can hardly be considered rational unless it furthers some substantial goal of the State." Chief Justice Burger filed a dissenting opinion, in which Justices White, Rehnquist, and O'Connor joined.

Illegal aliens are subject to deportation and, if deported, these aliens would be denied an education in the Texas public schools. Does it make sense, then, to say that their rights are violated when they are denied such an education while illegally residing in Texas? Like several of the other cases discussed in this section, Plyler raises a question—addressed more fully in Chapter 6, section E, infra—whether equal protection decisions are sometimes inflected by the underlying interests at stake.

3. Aliens as a “discrete” and “insular” minority. Are aliens members of a “discrete and insular [minority]” hampered by the kind of prejudice “which tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities”? United States v. Carolene Products, 304 U.S. 144, 152 n.4 (1938). Consider Lusky, Footnote Redux: A Carolene Products Reminiscence, 82 Colum. L. Rev. 1087, 1093 n.72 (1982):

As a matter of language, “discrete” means separate or distinct and “insular” means isolated or detached. The words do not describe aliens as such; many of them, who are anglophones, pass unnoticed, and many if not most others fit into the social scene with little difficulty. Of course, there are sizeable ethnic groups, and they include citizens as well as aliens, who are held at arm’s length—Chicanos, Orientals, and so on—but that is quite another matter.

But compare Rosberg, The Protection of Aliens from Discriminatory Treatment by the National Government, 1977 Sup. Ct. Rev. 275, 309–310:

Given the exclusion of aliens from the political process, it is [reasonable] for the Court to demand a special showing from the state if it is to classify on the basis of alienage. The state has presumably weighed its interest in giving a preference to the members of its polity against the aliens’ interest in enjoying the benefits at issue. But aliens have had no opportunity to participate in the process of measuring the relative weight of these two interests. Since the legislature has denied aliens any chance to assert their own interests in the political forum, it cannot expect the courts to maintain their usual deference to the legislature’s balancing of the interests.

Does basing strict scrutiny on the political disabilities that the law itself imposes on aliens involve circular reasoning? In the second paragraph of the Carlene Products footnote, Justice Stone suggested that strict scrutiny might be appropriate for laws that “[restrict] those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation.” If aliens are politically vulnerable because they lack the franchise, why isn’t the appropriate solution to scrutinize strictly the laws denying them the right to vote? See generally Rosberg, Aliens and Equal Protection: Why Not the Right to Vote?, 75 Mich. L. Rev. 1092 (1977). Note that the Court in Sugarman affirms the states’ right to restrict the franchise and policymaking positions to citizens. Is there a justification for these restrictions that would survive strict scrutiny?

4. Alienage and the political community. In In re Griffiths, 413 U.S. 717 (1973), a case decided on the same day as Sugarman, the Court held that a state could not constitutionally exclude aliens from membership in the bar. However, in a series of subsequent cases the Court has upheld a number of state restrictions on employment of aliens on the theory that the positions involve the formulation or execution of broad public policy and may therefore be limited to members of the political community. See Foley v. Connelie, 435 U.S. 291 (1978) (upholding prohibition on aliens serving on state police force); Ambach v. Norwick, 441 U.S. 68 (1979) (upholding citizenship requirement for public school teachers); Cabell v. Chavez-Salido, 454 U.S. 432 (1982) (upholding citizenship requirement for probation officers). In Bernal v. Fainter, 467 U.S. 216 (1984), however, a unanimous Court invalidated a citizenship requirement for notaries public.

Can the results in these cases be reconciled? In Cabell v. Chavez-Salido, the Court acknowledged that the alienage decisions “have not formed an unwavering line over the years. [But] to say that the decisions do not fall into a neat pattern is not to say that they fall into no pattern.” According to the Court:

The cases through Graham dealt for the most part with attempts by the States to retain certain economic benefits exclusively for citizens. Since Graham, the Court has confronted claims distinguishing between the economic and sovereign functions of government. This distinction has been supported by the argument that although citizenship is not a relevant ground for the distribution of economic benefits, it is a relevant ground for determining membership in the political community.

Is this distinction sound? Note that the Court has relied on a similar distinction under the dormant commerce clause where it has been willing to uphold state actions as a “market participant” that would be invalidated if the state were acting as a “market regulator.” See Chapter 2, section D, supra.

How does one separate the “economic” and “sovereign” functions of government? In Cabell, the Court set out a two-pronged test:

First, the specificity of the classification will be examined: a classification that is substantially overinclusive or underinclusive tends to undercut the governmental claim that the classification serves legitimate political ends. [Second], even if the classification is sufficiently tailored, it may be applied in the particular case only to “persons holding state elective or important nonelective executive, legislative, and judicial positions,” those officers who “participate directly in the formulation, execution, or review of broad public policy” and hence “perform functions that go to the heart of representative government.” [Sugarman.]

Is this test workable? How can one determine whether a classification is over- or underinclusive without first settling on the level of review under which the fit is to be measured?

What is the justification for separating the “economic” and “sovereign” functions of government? Doesn’t this distinction turn the Carolene Products theory on its head? That theory suggests that strict scrutiny is appropriate precisely when political, rather than economic, rights are at stake.

If “representation-reinforcement” for politically disadvantaged minorities is not the basis for the Court’s intervention in this area, what is? Consider the possibility that the decisions reflect a concern that classifications in this area are peculiarly likely to reflect hostility or prejudice and not to respond to a legitimate effort by the state to promote the public interest. Is that a plausible distinction? How does it differ from an approach based on representation-reinforcement?

Note: Alienage and Federal Preemption

Can the alienage cases be explained on the ground that the states have only a narrow role to play when dealing with problems of immigration and naturalization? On this view, many state alienage classifications are invalid not simply because they discriminate against aliens, or because the policies they advance are inherently illegitimate, but rather because those policies are best pursued in a unified way on the national level. See Note, The Equal Treatment of Aliens: Preemption or Equal Protection?, 31 Stan. L. Rev. 1069 (1979).

In Graham itself, which first announced that alienage classifications were suspect for equal protection purposes, the Court also relied on federalism grounds as an alternative basis for invalidating the state law. State restrictions on the eligibility of aliens for welfare benefits, in the Court’s view, conflicted with “overriding national policies in an area constitutionally entrusted to the Federal Government.” Since Graham, federalism and preemption concerns have become an increasingly important theme in alienage cases. See, e.g., Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387 (2012) (holding that a number of state provisions restricting aliens’ employment were preempted by federal law).

1. The federal cases. In Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67 (1976), a unanimous Court upheld a federal statute limiting participation in a federal medical insurance program to citizens and aliens who had continuously resided in the United States for five years and had been admitted for permanent residence. Writing for the Court, Justice Stevens explained:

In the exercise of its broad power over naturalization and immigration, Congress regularly makes rules that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens. [In] particular, the fact that Congress has provided some welfare benefits for citizens does not require it to provide like benefits for all aliens. Neither the overnight visitor, the unfriendly agent of a hostile foreign power, the resident diplomat, nor the illegal entrant, can advance even a colorable constitutional claim to a share in the bounty that a conscientious sovereign makes available to its own citizens and some of its guests. The decision to share that bounty with our guests may take into account the character of the relationship between the alien and this country: Congress may decide that as the alien's tie grows stronger, so does the strength of his claim to an equal share of that munificence.

The Court asserted that the federalism prong of Graham supported its holding here because "it is the business of the political branches of the Federal Government, rather than that of either the States or the Federal Judiciary, to regulate the conditions of entry and residence of aliens" for while "the Constitution inhibits every State's power to restrict travel across its own borders, Congress is explicitly empowered to exercise that type of control over travel across the borders of the United States."

After Diaz, do any limits remain on the federal government's power to impose special rules governing the conduct of aliens? Could Congress prohibit resident aliens from having abortions? From working as lawyers? Could it insist that an alien doctor admitted to this country to practice medicine continue to do so while she or he remains here? See Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 525 U.S. 936 (1999) (holding that in general aliens cannot challenge their deportations on the ground that they are being selectively prosecuted).

Can federal power over aliens be justified on the ground that the federal government could exclude aliens altogether, and that it therefore may condition their admission on the waiver of certain rights?

Compare Diaz with Hampton v. Mow Sun Wong, 426 U.S. 88 (1976), decided on the same day. In Hampton, the Court invalidated a Civil Service Commission policy excluding aliens from most civil service jobs. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Stevens, acknowledged that "there may be overriding national interests which justify selective federal legislation that would be unacceptable for an individual State. [The] paramount federal power over immigration and naturalization [forecloses] a simple extension of the holding in Sugarman.” Nonetheless, the Court held that imposition of a citizenship requirement by the Civil Service Commission violated due process:

We may assume [that] if the Congress or the President had expressly imposed the citizenship requirement, it would be justified by the national interest in providing an incentive for aliens to become naturalized, or possibly even as providing the President with an expendable token for treaty negotiating purposes; but we are not willing to presume that the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission [was] deliberately fostering an interest so far removed from his normal responsibilities. [By] broadly denying this class substantial opportunities for employment, the Civil Service Commission rule deprives its members of an aspect of liberty. Since these residents were admitted as a result of decisions made by the Congress and the President, [due process] requires that the decision to impose that deprivation of an important liberty be made either at a comparable level of government or, if it is to be permitted to be made by the Civil Service Commission, that it be justified by reasons which are properly the concern of that agency.

Justice Rehnquist wrote a dissenting opinion that was joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justices White and Blackmun.

If Congress could exclude aliens from civil service jobs, why is there a constitutional obstacle to congressional delegation of this power to the Civil Service Commission? Does Hampton suggest a revitalization of the nondelegation doctrine? See Chapter 4, section D2, supra.

In the wake of the September 11 attacks, the President ordered the establishment of military tribunals with jurisdiction to try aliens, but not American citizens, for, inter alia, engaging in acts of “international terrorism.” (The order is discussed at greater length in Chapter 4, section C1, supra.) In light of Diaz, is there a plausible argument that the order unconstitutionally discriminates against noncitizens? Consider Katyal and Tribe, Waging War, Deciding Guilt: Trying the Military Tribunals, 111 Yale L.J. 1259, 1300–1301 (2002):

[Deferential] review of federal distinctions between citizens and aliens [has] its roots in the wide berth accorded the political branches “in the area of immigration and naturalization.” When a categorical preference for American citizens cannot be justified in terms of immigration and naturalization policy or as an adjunct to our international bargaining posture, the basis for relaxing the scrutiny otherwise applicable to discrimination against aliens as a class [evaporates].

Even more important, the decisions manifesting relaxed [scrutiny] of federal discrimination [have] involved nothing beyond the preferential availability to our own citizens of government employment or other socioeconomic benefits that do not touch the raw nerve of equal justice under [law]. Crucially, the Military Order curtails rights that, at least when made available to others similarly situated, have long been deemed too fundamental to be dispensed with on a merely rational basis.

For a more general criticism of the government's treatment of aliens in the wake of the World Trade Center attack, see Cole, Enemy Aliens, 54 Stan. L. Rev. 953 (2002).

2. The state cases. Can the state cases also be read as resting on a concern that the proper unit of government make a judgment about the status of aliens rather than on a concern about the merits of the judgment itself? On occasion, the Court has expressly relied on preemption grounds to invalidate state citizenship requirements. In Toll v. Moreno, 458 U.S. 1 (1982), for example, the Court considered a state policy denying in-state status to nonimmigrant aliens for purposes of qualifying for tuition reductions at state universities. Without reaching the equal protection question, the Court held the state policy unconstitutional under the supremacy clause. In light of the “long recognized [preeminent] role of the Federal Government with respect to the regulation of aliens within our borders,” the Court held that “state regulation not congressionally sanctioned that discriminates against aliens lawfully admitted to the country is impermissible if it imposes additional burdens not contemplated by Congress” (quoting De Canas v. Bica, 424 U.S. 351 (1976)). Similarly, in Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387 (2012), the Court held that an Arizona statute making it a misdemeanor for an unauthorized alien to seek or engage in work in the state was preempted by Congress’s decision, in federal immigration law, to criminalize only the actions of the employer who hires such workers.

In other cases, however, federalism concerns have played a more indirect role in the Court’s reasoning. Instead of relying directly on the supremacy clause, the Court has referred to the federal government’s “preeminent role” regarding aliens when it assesses the legitimacy of state concerns that might otherwise justify the classification under the equal protection clause.

In Nyquist v. Mauclet, supra, for example, the state sought to justify its citizenship requirement for higher education financial assistance on the ground that it encouraged naturalization and ensured a “degree of national affinity.” But the Court rejected this goal as “not a permissible one for a State. Control over immigration and naturalization is entrusted exclusively to the Federal Government, and a State has no power to interfere.” Similarly, in Plyler v. Doe, supra, the Court was unimpressed by the state’s claim that its refusal to enroll illegal aliens in public schools supported the federal policy against illegal immigration:

To be sure, like all persons who have entered the United States unlawfully, these children are subject to deportation. But there is no assurance that a child subject to deportation will ever be deported. An illegal entrant might be granted federal permission to continue to reside in this country, or even to become a citizen. In light of the discretionary federal power to grant relief from deportation, a State cannot realistically determine that any particular undocumented child will in fact be deported until after deportation proceedings have been completed. It would of course be most difficult for the State to justify a denial of education to a child enjoying an inchoate federal permission to remain.

To what extent do arguments about preemption and heightened scrutiny depend on the assumption that states or localities are distinctively hostile to the rights of aliens? In recent years, some states have continued to provide social services to aliens, including undocumented aliens, despite federal authorization to deny such services, and have proposed providing additional rights, such as drivers’ licenses to undocumented aliens. See Schuck, Taking Immigration Federalism Seriously, 2007 U. Chi. Legal F. 57. At the same time, other jurisdictions have embarked on ordinances designed to physically exclude undocumented aliens. For discussions of these developments, see Huntingdon, The Constitutional Dimension of Immigration Federalism, 61 Vand. L. Rev. 787 (2008); Motomura, Immigration Outside the Law, 108 Colum. L. Rev. 2037 (2008); Olivas, Immigration-Related State and Local Ordinances: Preemption, Prejudice, and the Proper Role for Enforcement, 2007 U. Chi. Legal F. 27; Rodriguez, The Significance of the Local in Immigration Regulation, 106 Mich. L. Rev. 567 (2008).

2. Wealth Classifications

Are the poor entitled to special judicial protection under the equal protection clause? In the late 1950s and 1960s, the Court repeatedly suggested that classifications based on indigence were suspect. See, e.g., Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956) (“In criminal trials a State can no more discriminate on account of poverty than on account of religion, race, or color"); Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966) ("Lines drawn on the basis of wealth or property, like those of race, are traditionally disfavored"). By the 1970s, however, the Court had rejected the idea that "financial need alone identifies a suspect class for purposes of equal protection analysis." Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977). The history of how the Court reached this conclusion illustrates some important themes in considering when strict scrutiny should apply.

Note: Defining the Class

1. Poverty as a relative category. If "the poor" are a suspect class, how should the class be defined? The concept of "poverty," unlike gender and alienage, is inherently relative: Individuals are poor by comparison to other individuals. Does it make sense to define a class without reference to the ability to purchase particular goods and services? Harper, for example, involved payment of a $1.50 poll tax as a prerequisite to voting in state elections. Most individuals were able to pay that tax. The Court held that denying individuals the right to vote for failure to pay the poll tax violated the equal protection clause. In Harper, the class of individuals unable to pay consisted of persons for whom the payment of a wide range of fees would be difficult. By contrast, many state institutions of higher education (particularly professional schools) charge tuition and fees that may be well beyond the average individual's ability to pay. Does who falls within the class of "the poor" shift depending on the goods or services involved? Is this a coherent way of defining a class of individuals?

2. Facial discrimination against the poor. Laws that explicitly single out poor individuals for different treatment are relatively rare. Historically, a number of state statutes treated "paupers"—persons who received public assistance—differently. See, e.g., Steinfeld, Property and Suffrage in the Early American Republic, 41 Stan. L. Rev. 335 (1989) (discussing how many states denied voting rights to individuals receiving various forms of public assistance); Belt, Ballots for Bullets?: Disabled Veterans and the Right to Vote, 69 Stan. L. Rev. 435 (2017) (discussing the disenfranchisement after the Civil War of disabled veterans living in soldiers' homes). In Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160 (1941), the Court addressed a California statute that made it a misdemeanor to bring or to assist in bringing into the state "an indigent person who is not a resident of the state." Although the Court relied solely on the commerce clause to invalidate the statute, it suggested in passing that it would not accept stereotypical judgments about the poor as justifications for laws disadvantaging them: "[We] do not think that it will now be seriously contended that because a person is without employment and without funds he constitutes a ‘moral pestilence.’ Poverty and immorality are not synonymous.” Justice Jackson’s concurring opinion went further. He urged the Court to “say now, and in no uncertain terms, that a man’s mere property status, without more, cannot be used by a state to test, qualify, or limit his rights as a citizen of the United States. ‘Indigence’ in itself is neither a source of rights nor a basis for denying them. The mere state of being without funds is a neutral fact—constitutionally an irrelevance, like race, creed or color.”

3. “De facto” wealth classifications. The primary context in which equal protection claims involving wealth have arisen does not involve explicit distinctions between individuals who are affluent and individuals who are not. Rather, it involves challenges to government-imposed fees (for example, a poll tax or tuition charge at a state university) or claims that the government has wrongly failed to subsidize some activity that can be engaged in only if one has the money to purchase it in private markets (for example, the failure to subsidize abortions when the government subsidizes other medical care under Medicaid). Doesn’t defining the class in these terms amount to saying that there is a constitutional right to the good in question?

Is defining the class entitled to heightened scrutiny in these terms inconsistent with Washington v. Davis, discussed on pages 549-552, supra? There, the Court held that proof of a disparate impact, without proof of a discriminatory purpose, is insufficient to trigger strict scrutiny of a facially neutral government decision. Consider in this connection M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102 (1996), where the state relied on Washington v. Davis to defend its requirement that litigants pay record preparation fees before appealing from decisions terminating parental rights. The state reasoned that this requirement, like the practice at issue in Washington v. Davis, involved no facial classification but at most had only a disproportionate impact on the affected class. In a six-to-three decision, the Court rejected this argument:

Sanctions of [this] genre [are] not merely disproportionate in impact. Rather, they are wholly contingent on one’s ability to pay, and thus “visit different consequences on two categories of persons” [citing Williams v. Illinois]; they apply to all indigents and do not reach anyone outside that class.

As a facial matter, doesn’t the requirement that litigants pay the record preparation fee disadvantage everyone who, for whatever reason, does not pay the fee? If so, in what sense does the requirement apply only to indigents?

Compare M.L.B. to James v. Valtierra, 402 U.S. 137 (1971). An amendment to the state's constitution provided that no low-rent housing project should be developed, constructed, or acquired in any manner by a state public body until the project was approved by a majority of those voting at a community election. The Court upheld the provision, rejecting the claim that the amendment constituted a violation of the equal protection clause "because it hampers persons desiring public housing from achieving their objective when no such roadblock faces other groups seeking to influence other public decisions to their advantage." The Court held that "of course a lawmaking procedure that 'disadvantages' a particular group does not always deny equal protection. Under any such holding, presumably a State would not be able to require referendums on any subject unless referendums were required on all, because they would always disadvantage some group." Consider the possibility that, given Washington v. Davis, both M.L.B. and James are wrongly decided: Unlike the statute invalidated in M.L.B., the provision upheld in James really does facially discriminate against the indigent since they are the only group who benefit from low-income housing.

Note: Wealth Discrimination and the Problem of Affirmative Rights

1. The evolution of heightened scrutiny in the context of particular rights. As suggested earlier, the cases in which the Supreme Court addressed wealth discrimination generally arose within the context of challenges to the denial of access to specific government programs. In the 1950s and 1960s, the Court ruled for the claimants in several such challenges. See, e.g., Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956) (holding that the equal protection clause requires states to provide trial transcripts or their equivalent to indigents appealing their criminal convictions); Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963) (holding that states must provide indigents with counsel on a first appeal of right to challenge a criminal conviction); Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966) (holding a state law conditioning the vote on payment of a $1.50 poll tax denied equal protection); Cipriano v. City of Houma, 395 U.S. 701 (1969) (holding invalid a state statute restricting the franchise to property owners in a state election to approve issuance of revenue bonds by a municipal utility). (These cases are discussed more fully in conjunction with the "implied fundamental rights" strand of equal protection, Chapter 6, section E, infra.)

During the same period, the Court also hinted that strict judicial scrutiny might be appropriate when the state failed to provide the poor with "necessities." See, e.g., Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969) (classification "[denies] welfare aid upon which may depend the ability of the families to obtain the very means to subsist—food, shelter, and other necessities of life”); Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970) (“Welfare, by meeting the basic demands of subsistence, can help bring within the reach of the poor the same opportunities that are available to others to participate meaningfully in the life of the community. [Public] assistance, then, is not mere charity, but a means to ‘promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity’”).

But although some of the Court’s rhetoric was sweeping, its actual holdings were far narrower. Those wealth classifications that were invalidated were all associated with access to “fundamental” rights, such as the franchise and the ability to challenge criminal convictions. No holding during this period established that it was unconstitutional as a general matter for the state to deny services or benefits to those who could not pay for them. Moreover, even with regard to fundamental rights, the Court never suggested that absolute equality was required so long as the poor were not denied minimal benefits (e.g., although the poor were entitled to representation on a first appeal of right, the Court never suggested that they had a constitutional right to the best lawyer that money could buy, and it later held that they were not entitled to appointed counsel for discretionary appeals or, with few exceptions, post-conviction proceedings). Finally, despite some suggestive dicta, no holding during this period established that the state had an affirmative constitutional obligation to guarantee subsistence to those in need.

In the 1970s, the Court veered sharply away from its earlier suggestions that wealth classifications were suspect. Although none of the earlier holdings were overturned, the Court was, in general, unwilling to extend these holdings. See, e.g., Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600 (1974) (refusing to extend the Douglas principle to require counsel in discretionary appeals beyond a first appeal of right); United States v. Kras, 409 U.S. 434 (1973) (holding that there is no general equal protection principle barring the imposition of filing fees in ordinary civil litigation, even when they prevent the indigent from securing access to the courts).

At about the same time, the Court ended speculation that it might read the equal protection clause to impose an affirmative obligation on government to provide the poor with necessities. In Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471 (1970), for example, the Court turned aside an equal protection challenge to Maryland’s practice of imposing an upper limit on the size of grants under its Aid to Families with Dependent Children Program regardless of the size of the family. Similarly, in Lindsey v. Normet, 405 U.S. 56 (1972), the Court rejected a constitutional challenge to Oregon’s summary eviction procedures.

The Court's most detailed treatment of a wealth discrimination claim during this period came in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1 (1973). The decision grew out of a constitutional challenge to the manner in which Texas, and many other states, financed public education. Much of the revenue needed for public schools was raised locally by an ad valorem property tax on the property located within each district. The result of this system was that children located in districts with more valuable property benefited from higher expenditures than children in districts with less valuable property, even though both districts made the same tax effort. Appellees claimed that this method of financing education should be strictly scrutinized under the equal protection clause because, inter alia, it discriminated against the poor. (Appellees also argued that it impinged on their fundamental right to education. This aspect of the case is discussed in greater detail in Chapter 6, section E5, infra.)

In a five-to-four decision, the Court rejected this claim and, applying rationality review, upheld the system. In its discussion of the wealth discrimination claim, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Powell, said that in prior cases,

[the] individuals, or groups of individuals, who constituted the class discriminated against [shared] two distinguishing characteristics; because of their impecuniousness they were completely unable to pay for some desired benefit, and as a consequence, they sustained an absolute deprivation of a meaningful opportunity to enjoy that benefit. [Even] a cursory examination, however, demonstrates that neither of the two distinguishing characteristics of wealth classifications can be found here. First, in support of their charge that the system discriminates against the “poor,” appellees have made no effort to demonstrate that it operates to the peculiar disadvantage of any class fairly definable as indigent. [There] is no basis on the record in this case for assuming that the poorest people—defined by reference to any level of absolute impecuniousness—are concentrated in the poorest districts.

Second, [lack] of personal resources has not occasioned an absolute deprivation of the desired benefit. [Apart] from the unsettled and disputed question whether the quality of education may be determined by the amount of money expended for it, a sufficient answer to appellees’ argument is that, at least where wealth is involved, the Equal Protection Clause does not require absolute equality or precisely equal advantages.

2. Wealth discrimination and the efficient allocation of scarce resources. Even if charging a price for a government service discriminates in some sense against the poor, might that decision be justified by the state's desire to allocate scarce resources in an efficient manner? Consider, for example, Michelman, Foreword: On Protecting the Poor through the Fourteenth Amendment, 83 Harv. L. Rev. 7, 27–28 (1969):

Unlike a de facto racial classification which usually must seek its justifications in purposes completely distinct from its race-related impacts, a de facto pecuniary classification typically carries a highly persuasive justification inseparable from the very effect which excites antipathy—i.e., the hard choices it forces upon the financially straitened. [A] de facto pecuniary classification [is] usually nothing more or less than the making of a market (e.g., in trial transcripts) or the failure to relieve someone of the vicissitudes of market pricing (e.g., for appellate legal services). But the risk of exposure to markets and their “decisions” is not normally deemed objectionable, to say the least, in our society. Not only do we not inveigh generally against unequal distribution of income or full-cost pricing for most goods. We usually regard it as both the fairest and most efficient arrangement to require each consumer to pay the full market price of what he consumes, limiting his consumption to what his income permits.

Is this argument persuasive when the government charges for “public goods” where the consumption of the goods by some does not interfere with their consumption by others? Is it constitutional, for example, for the government to charge an admission fee to cover the cost of running a municipal swimming pool when the cost remains constant regardless of the number of users? Does it matter whether the goods are uniquely within the control of the government? Note that this rationale played an important role in the Court’s decision in Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371 (1971), that individuals could not be precluded from obtaining divorces for inability to pay a filing fee given the government’s monopoly over marital status.

Is the argument persuasive when the government charges for goods in circumstances where the demand declines relatively little, even when the price rises? For example, could a government hospital refuse to perform life-saving surgery on a person too poor to pay the cost? Note that in many situations, statutes provide individuals with some version of the right in question; deprivation of those statutory rights without due process is an independent constitutional violation separate from any equal protection claim.

Is it constitutional for the state to substitute government regulation for the constraint normally exercised by the market when providing benefits to poor people? Would it be constitutional, for example, to provide appellate counsel for the poor only in cases where a preliminary review of the record demonstrated that there were nonfrivolous issues to be raised on appeal? Consider Draper v. Washington, 372 U.S. 487 (1963):

The State [argues] that in practical effect there is no difference at all between the rights it affords indigents and nonindigents, because a moneyed defendant, motivated by a “sense of thrift,” will choose not to appeal in exactly the same circumstances that an indigent will be denied a transcript. We reject this contention as untenable. It defies common sense to think that a moneyed defendant faced with long-term imprisonment and advised by counsel that he has substantial grounds for appeal, as petitioners were here, will choose not to appeal merely to save the cost of a transcript.

But see Smith v. Robbins, 528 U.S. 259 (2000), upholding a procedure under which appointed appellate counsel who believes that there are no nonfrivolous issues to appeal files a brief summarizing the procedural and factual history of the case and attesting that he has reviewed the record, explained his evaluation of the case to his client, provided the client with a copy of the brief, and informed the client of his right to file a pro se supplemental brief. Counsel then requests that the court independently examine the record for arguable issues.

3. The Constitution and affirmative rights. Are the wealth cases explicable in terms of a more general principle of constitutional construction under which the Constitution is seen primarily as a limitation on governmental power and not as an affirmative guarantee against conditions for which government is not responsible? Consider, for example, Justice Harlan’s dissenting opinions in Griffin and Douglas, the cases establishing the equal protection right of the poor to a trial transcript and counsel in order to pursue an appeal of right in a criminal case. In Griffin, Justice Harlan wrote that “[all] that Illinois has done is to fail to alleviate the consequences of differences in economic circumstances that exist wholly apart from any state action. [The] issue here is not the typical equal protection question of the reasonableness of a ‘classification’ on the basis of which the State has imposed legal disabilities, but rather the reasonableness of the State’s failure to remove natural disabilities.” In Douglas, he added that every financial exaction which the State imposes on a uniform basis is more easily satisfied by the well-to-do than by the indigent. Yet I take it that no one would dispute the constitutional power of the State to levy a uniform sales tax, to charge tuition at a state university, to fix rates for the purchase of water from a municipal corporation, to impose a standard fine for criminal violations, or to establish minimum bail for various categories of offenses. Laws such as these do not deny equal protection to the less fortunate for one essential reason: the Equal Protection Clause does not impose on the States “an affirmative duty to lift the handicaps flowing from differences in economic circumstances” [quoting from his Griffin dissent]. To so construe it would be to read into the Constitution a philosophy of leveling that would be foreign to many of our basic concepts of the proper relations between government and society.

Note the affinity between this argument and the Washington v. Davis principle. One way to state that principle is that the equal protection clause does not impose on the states an affirmative obligation to compensate for unequal outcomes produced by a facially neutral governmental policy. The argument is also closely related to the “state action” doctrine. Under that doctrine, the Constitution in general protects individuals from state invasions of their rights and does not confer a right to affirmative governmental intervention to remedy privately imposed deprivations. (The state action doctrine is discussed in greater detail in Chapter 9 infra.) Finally, the argument is related to the more general orientation toward the equal protection clause pursuant to which different treatment of individuals similarly situated is viewed as more problematical than similar treatment of individuals differently situated.

Is Justice Harlan’s argument persuasive? In what sense are the disabilities under which the poor labor “natural”? Why is the state not responsible for them? Consider L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 1335–1336 (2d ed. 1988):

[The] demise of the Lochner era [during which the Supreme Court read the due process clause to protect liberty of contract and thereby invalidated much social legislation] reflected the view that [the] system of governmental decisions—some statutory and some made by common-law judges—bore an active responsibility for the plight of those who could not earn a decent living. [It] should be stressed that this perspective does not entail a judicially cognizable remedy against government for every instance of substandard wages or unmet needs. [But] at least sometimes, the person who is forced to work too hard for too little, or can find no work at all, must be regarded as the victim of the system of contract and property rights rather than the author of his own plight.

Is it sensible to suppose that a court could ever ascertain the extent to which the condition of the poor is the product of government action? Even if it were possible to do so in principle, why should the answer to this question matter?

Why is the equality principle satisfied by government inaction that leaves the disadvantaged at the mercy of private forces?

In connection with these issues, consider Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980), wherein the Court upheld the constitutionality of the so-called Hyde Amendment prohibiting virtually all federal funding for abortions under the Medicaid program. The Court acknowledged that the Constitution protected a woman's freedom of choice regarding abortions:

But...it simply does not follow that a woman's freedom of choice carries with it a constitutional entitlement to financial resources to avail herself of the full range of protected choices. [Although] government may not place obstacles in the path of a woman's exercise of her freedom of choice, it need not remove those not of its own creation. Indigency falls in the latter category. [Although] Congress has opted to subsidize medically necessary services generally, but not certain medically necessary abortions, the fact remains that the Hyde Amendment leaves an indigent woman with at least the same range of choice in deciding whether to obtain a medically necessary abortion as she would have had if Congress had chosen to subsidize no health care costs at all.

In a footnote, the Court rejected the argument that the Hyde Amendment unconstitutionally "penalized" a woman's choice to abort the fetus because funding was available for live births. It noted, however:

A substantial constitutional question would arise if Congress had attempted to withhold all Medicaid benefits from an otherwise eligible candidate simply because that candidate had exercised her constitutionally protected freedom to terminate her pregnancy by abortion. [But] the Hyde Amendment [does] not provide for such a broad disqualification from receipt of public benefits. Rather, the Hyde Amendment [represents] simply a refusal to subsidize certain protected conduct. A refusal to fund protected activity, without more, cannot be equated with the imposition of a "penalty" on that activity.

Is the Court's distinction between penalization and refusal to subsidize convincing? If one begins with the premise that it is important for women to have the abortion option, is there a sensible theory under which it is possible to distinguish between interference with that option by state action and interference by private action that the state fails to prevent?

4. Alternative doctrinal routes for protecting poor individuals. Although in recent times, the Court has been generally reluctant to treat the poor as a “suspect” class for equal protection purposes, it has sometimes reached the same result through other doctrinal routes. Recall, for example, United States Department of Agriculture v. Moreno, section B supra, where the Court used rational basis review to invalidate a law disqualifying from the federal food stamp program unrelated individuals who lived together. Similarly, some cases have extended rights to the poor through due process analysis. See, e.g., M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102 (1996) (using both due process and equal protection analysis to hold that the state may not condition appeals from decrees terminating parental rights on the parent’s ability to pay record preparation fees); Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985) (due process requires the state to pay for psychiatric assistance for indigent defendant where there is preliminary showing that sanity is likely to be significant factor at trial); Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387 (1985) (holding that due process requires effective assistance of counsel on first appeal of right, and suggesting that Griffin-Douglas line of cases rests in part on due process principles); Little v. Streater, 452 U.S. 1 (1981) (due process requires state to pay for blood test of indigent defendant in paternity action); Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371 (1971) (holding unconstitutional on due process grounds the imposition of court fees preventing an indigent from securing a divorce).

For an effort to build a case for the constitutional protection of welfare rights from strands in existing doctrine, see Edelman, Essay: The Next Century of Our Constitution: Rethinking Our Duty to the Poor, 39 Hastings L.J. 1 (1987). For skepticism that this can be done unless there are profound changes in the political climate, see Liu, Rethinking Constitutional Welfare Rights, 61 Stan. L. Rev. 203 (2008).

3. Other Disadvantaged Groups

Are there other “discrete and insular minorities” entitled to special judicial protection from the political process?

CITY OF CLEBURNE v. CLEBURNE LIVING CENTER, 473 U.S. 432 (1985). A city zoning ordinance prevented construction in a residential neighborhood of a group home for the individuals who were mentally retarded. Although it affirmed the decision below insofar as it invalidated the ordinance as applied—because the Court held that the refusal to grant a variance reflected illegitimate motives, see pages 516-517, supra—the Supreme Court held that the lower court had erred in applying heightened scrutiny. The Court, in an opinion by Justice White, advanced several reasons for rejecting heightened scrutiny:

“First, it is undeniable [that] those who are mentally retarded have a reduced ability to cope with and function in the everyday world. [They] are thus different, immutably so, in relevant respects, and the states’ interest in dealing with and providing for them is plainly a legitimate one. How this large and diversified group is to be treated under the law is a difficult and often technical matter, very much a task for legislators guided by qualified professionals and not by the perhaps ill-informed opinions of the judiciary.

“Second, the distinctive legislative response, both national and state, to the plight of those who are mentally retarded demonstrates not only that they have unique problems, but also that the lawmakers have been addressing their difficulties in a manner that belies a continuing antipathy or prejudice and a corresponding need for more intrusive oversight by the judiciary. Thus, the federal government has not only outlawed discrimination against the mentally retarded in federally funded programs, but it has also provided the retarded with the right to receive ‘appropriate treatment services and habilitation’ in a setting that is ‘least restrictive of [their] personal liberty.’...

“Such legislation thus singling out the retarded for special treatment reflects the real and undeniable differences between the retarded and others. That a civilized and decent society expects and approves such legislation indicates that governmental consideration of those differences in the vast majority of situations is not only legitimate but desirable. [Even] assuming that many of these laws could be shown to be substantially related to an important governmental purpose, merely requiring the legislature to justify its efforts in these terms may lead it to refrain from acting at all. [Especially] given the wide variation in the abilities and needs of the retarded themselves, governmental bodies must have a certain amount of flexibility and freedom from judicial oversight in shaping and limiting their remedial efforts.

“Third, the legislative response, which could hardly have occurred and survived without public support, negates any claim that the mentally retarded are politically powerless in the sense that they have no ability to attract the attention of lawmakers....

“Fourth, if the large and amorphous class of the mentally retarded were deemed quasi-suspect [it] would be difficult to find a principled way to distinguish a variety of other groups who have perhaps immutable disabilities setting them off from others, who cannot themselves mandate the desired legislative responses, and who can claim some degree of prejudice from at least part of the public at large. One need mention in this respect only the aging, the disabled, the mentally ill, and the infirm. We are reluctant to set out on that course, and we decline to do so.

"Doubtless, there have been and there will continue to be instances of discrimination against the retarded that are in fact [invidious]. But the appropriate method of reaching such instances is not to create a new quasi-suspect classification and subject all governmental action based on that classification to more searching evaluation."

Justice Marshall, joined by Justices Brennan and Blackmun, wrote an opinion concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part:

"[The] mentally retarded have been subject to a 'lengthy and tragic history' of segregation and discrimination that can only be called grotesque. [By] the latter part of the [nineteenth] century and during the first decades of the new one, [social] views of the retarded underwent a radical transformation. Fueled by the rising tide of Social Darwinism, the 'science' of eugenics, and the extreme xenophobia of those years, leading medical authorities and others began to portray the 'feebleminded' as a 'menace to society and civilization [responsible] in a large degree for many, if not all, our social problems.' A regime of state-mandated segregation and degradation soon emerged that in its virulence and bigotry rivaled, and indeed paralleled, the worst excesses of Jim Crow....

"Prejudice, once let loose, is not easily cabined. As of 1979, most states still categorically disqualified 'idiots' from voting, without regard to individual capacity and with discretion to exclude left in the hands of low-level officials. Not until Congress enacted the Education of the Handicapped Act were 'the door[s] of public education' opened wide to handicapped children. But most important, lengthy and continuing isolation of the retarded has perpetuated the ignorance, irrational fears, and stereotyping that long have plagued them.

"In light of the importance of the interest at stake and the history of discrimination the retarded have suffered, the Equal Protection Clause requires us to do more than review the distinctions drawn by Cleburne's zoning ordinance as if they appeared in a taxing statute or in economic or commercial legislation. The searching scrutiny I would give to restrictions on the ability of the retarded to establish community group homes leads me to conclude that Cleburne's vague generalizations for classifying the 'feeble-minded' with drug addicts, alcoholics, and the insane, and excluding them where the elderly, the ill, the boarder, and the transient are allowed, are not substantial or important enough to overcome the suspicion that the ordinance rests on impermissible assumptions or outmoded and perhaps invidious stereotypes."

Justice Stevens, joined by Chief Justice Burger, also wrote a concurring opinion.

Note: Evaluating the Claims of Other Disadvantaged Groups

1. Individuals with cognitive deficits as a suspect class. Does the Cleburne Court adequately explain why classifications disadvantaging persons who are mentally retarded need only survive low-level review? Do the courts really face problems of institutional competence here that don't exist with respect to other equal protection claims? Why does legislative protection for this group argue against heightened review, given that racial minorities and women have received legislative protection in recent decades? Even if "the real and undeniable differences between the retarded and others" make strict scrutiny inappropriate, why didn't the Court opt for intermediate review?

Does the broader category of people with physical or mental disabilities constitute a suspect class? In Tennessee v. Lane, 541 U.S. 509 (2004), the Court rejected a constitutional attack on title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (which prohibits qualified persons with disabilities from being "excluded from participation or denied the benefits of the services, programs or activities of a public entity") as applied to physically disabled individuals who claimed that their disabilities prevented them from gaining access to state courthouses. Tennessee argued that the measure exceeded Congress's enforcement power under section 5 of the fourteenth amendment. In the course of rejecting this argument, Justice Stevens, writing for the Court, stated the following:

Congress enacted Title II against a backdrop of pervasive unequal treatment in the administration of state services and programs, including systematic deprivations of fundamental rights....Similarly, a number of States have prohibited and continue to prohibit persons with disabilities from engaging in activities such as marrying and serving as jurors. The historical experience that Title II reflects is also documented in this Court's cases, which have identified unconstitutional treatment of disabled persons by state agencies in a variety of settings, including unjustified commitment; the abuse and neglect of persons committed to state mental health hospitals; and irrational discrimination in zoning decisions. The decisions of other courts, too, document a pattern of unequal treatment in the administration of a wide range of public services, programs, and activities, including the penal system, public education, and voting.

In light of this history, should disability discrimination be subject to heightened scrutiny? In Lane, the Court was not required to answer this question because it found that the Americans with Disabilities Act, as applied, was a permissible congressional effort to enforce the access to courts guaranteed by due process of law. Note that the Americans with Disabilities Act in some circumstances requires “reasonable accommodation” of persons with disabilities. If disability constituted a suspect classification, would this requirement be constitutionally vulnerable under the Court’s affirmative action jurisprudence? Conversely, if disability were a suspect class, would governments be constitutionally required to accommodate persons with disabilities?

Although the Supreme Court upheld Congress’s ability to authorize private damages lawsuits against states to enforce title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act in cases where individuals are denied access to the courts—itself a fundamental right whose denial would be subject to strict scrutiny—the Court rejected Congress’s attempt to authorize private damages lawsuits against states to enforce title I of the act, which forbids discrimination in employment. See Board of Trustees of the University of Alabama v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356 (2001). Does this suggest that the right being denied, rather than the class whose rights are being denied, is the key to the Court’s holding in Lane? In this respect, consider Karlan, Loving Lawrence, 102 Mich. L. Rev. 1447, 1460 (2004): “By contrast to the incremental possibilities of fundamental rights/due process-based strict scrutiny, suspect classification/equal protection-based strict scrutiny seems far more binary: either a group is entitled to heightened scrutiny across the board or it isn’t.”

Is the problem here that applying strict scrutiny across the board to discrimination against persons with disabilities will either result in courts invalidating a range of justifiable legislation or somehow water down the concept of strict scrutiny?

2. Other potentially suspect classifications. In light of Cleburne, are there any other groups that can plausibly claim suspect status? In a series of cases beginning in 1968, the Court has invalidated a number of statutes disadvantaging children born to unmarried parents. Although the Court has refused formally to elevate discrimination against this group to “suspect” status, it has at least on occasion subjected them to something more than conventional rational basis review. See, e.g., Levy v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 68 (1968) (invalidating statute that excluded nonmarital children from coverage of wrongful death statute); Glona v. American Guarantee & Liability Insurance Co., 391 U.S. 73 (1968) (same); Weber v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 406 U.S. 164 (1972) (exclusion from workers’ compensation invalidated); Gomez v. Perez, 409 U.S. 535 (1973) (failure to provide support rights for nonmarital children violates equal protection). But see Mathews v. Lucas, 427 U.S. 495 (1976) (upholding section of Social Security Act depriving certain nonmarital children of survivors’ benefits); Lalli v. Lalli, 439 U.S. 259 (1978) (upholding statute providing that nonmarital children could inherit intestate from father only if court declared paternity during lifetime of father). In general, the Court has rejected the argument that statutes disadvantaging nonmarital children can be justified as a means of deterring or punishing their parents for illicit sexual activity. It has been somewhat more sympathetic to the argument that special problems concerning proof of paternity when parents are not married may justify different treatment. See, e.g., Nguyen v. INS, 533 U.S. 53 (2001), discussed at pages 664-667, supra.

In Massachusetts Board of Retirement v. Murgia, 427 U.S. 307 (1976), the Court rejected the argument that the aged were entitled to special judicial solicitude:

While the treatment of the aged in this Nation has not been wholly free of discrimination, such persons, unlike, say, those who have been discriminated against on the basis of race or national origin, have not experienced a “history of purposeful unequal treatment” or been subjected to unique disabilities on the basis of stereotyped characteristics not truly indicative of their abilities. [Old] age does not define a “discrete and insular” group in need of “extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process.” Instead, it marks a stage that each of us will reach if we live out our normal span.

See also Vance v. Bradley, 440 U.S. 93 (1979) (using rational basis review to uphold federal law requiring Foreign Service personnel to retire at age 60). Compare Schweiker v. Wilson, 450 U.S. 221 (1981) (avoiding the question whether persons who are mentally ill form a discrete and insular minority). As with persons with disabilities, older individuals are often protected statutorily, through such provisions as the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. But in contrast to its decision upholding the Family Medical Leave Act’s authorization of private damages suits against state employers in Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721 (2003), as an appropriate exercise of congressional enforcement power to ensure sex equality, or its decision in Lane to uphold damages lawsuits claiming denials of access to the courts, the Supreme Court held that Congress lacked the power to authorize private damages lawsuits against states for discrimination on the basis of age. Kimel v. Florida Board of Regents, 528 U.S. 62 (2000).

For a discussion of whether and to what extent suspect categories should be expanded, see Scales-Trent, Black Women and the Constitution: Finding Our Place, Asserting Our Rights, 24 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L. Rev. 9 (1989).

Consider whether statutes disadvantaging any of the following groups should be strictly scrutinized: ethnic minorities; children; families with children; families without children; future generations; “ugly” persons; obese persons; residents of the District of Columbia; incarcerated individuals.

Do the Court’s decisions provide reasonably clear standards under which the claims of these groups can be evaluated? Some of the Court’s decisions indicate that heightened scrutiny is applied when there is a likelihood of impermissible motivation. But what is the motivation made impermissible by the equal protection clause? Can one distinguish between hostility or prejudice and good faith moral beliefs or empirical judgments? Is the notion that legislation must be based on “reasoned analysis” and reflect something other than power subject to judicial enforcement?

Do you agree with Justice Rehnquist that “[it] would hardly take extraordinary ingenuity for a lawyer to find ‘insular and discrete’ minorities at every turn in the road”? Sugarman v. Dougall (dissenting opinion), supra.

Consider the accuracy of the following description of how the Court goes about deciding which groups to protect:

[The] present Court [is] reluctant to strike down particular discriminations so long as the minority group is totally marginalized and powerless. [Once] an historically excluded group shows political clout and cultural and economic resonance, however, the Court becomes sensitive to discriminations against the group and increasingly willing to nullify some such discriminations at the retail level, but remains unenthusiastic about insisting on radical, or wholesale, revisions. Such revisions would be risky for the Court, because people whose status or values depend on discriminating against the minority group will be riled by any big constitutional entitlement for the group. The Court’s current strategy is to send up trial balloons and to see what happens.

Eskridge, Destabilizing Due Process and Evolutive Equal Protection, 47 UCLA L. Rev. 1183, 1216–1217 (2000).

Consider also the suggestion in Dorf, Equal Protection Incorporation, 88 Va. L. Rev. 951 (2002), that the Court can give the strict scrutiny doctrine principled content by “incorporating” other provisions of the Constitution into equal protection analysis. Under this approach, the first, fourteenth, and nineteenth amendments make discrimination based upon religion, race, color, previous condition of servitude, and sex presumptively unconstitutional. Moreover, the twenty-sixth amendment raises important questions about the constitutionality of age discrimination. For another discussion of how the equal protection and due process clauses inform one another, see Karlan, Equal Protection, Due Process, and the Stereoscopic Fourteenth Amendment, 33 McGeorge L. Rev. 473 (2002).

3. The relevance of suspectness. In Cleburne, the Court insisted that it was not subjecting the statute to heightened scrutiny. Nonetheless, it looked closely enough at the purported justifications for the law to invalidate it. In this respect, the decision is reminiscent of the early gender discrimination cases in which the Court struck down a number of statutes disadvantaging women, while insisting that it was engaged in low-level review. Only in retrospect did the Court acknowledge that these cases in fact involved heightened scrutiny. See section D2 supra.

On the other hand, the Court has upheld a number of gender-based statutes, racial affirmative action measures, and laws disadvantaging aliens despite the supposedly heightened review to which these laws were subjected. These cases raise questions concerning the significance of the Court's categorization of levels of review. Is the Court really following a two-step process pursuant to which it first decides how closely to scrutinize a classification and then applies that level of scrutiny? Is it possible (desirable) to insulate the two steps of this process from each other? Might the Court's decisions more accurately be described as a series of ad hoc, intuitive judgments concerning the appropriateness of various classifications? For suggestions that heightened scrutiny has in fact taken on this flexible cast, see, e.g., Goldberg, Equality without Tiers, 77 S. Cal. L. Rev. 481 (2004); Winkler, Fatal in Theory and Strict in Fact: An Empirical Analysis of Strict Scrutiny in the Federal Courts, 59 Vand. L. Rev. 793 (2006).

Is the effort to single out particular groups entitled to special judicial protection from majoritarian processes a useful way to think about constitutional law? Is there a better alternative?

* The Court was later to hold, in Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954), that the due process clause of the fifth amendment contains an equality principle. See page [490] infra.

State's objectives. Massachusetts Bd. of Retirement v. Murgia, [427 U.S. 307, 314]. State legislation 'does not violate the Equal Protection Clause merely because the classifications [it makes] are imperfect.' Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471, 485." Washington v. Yakima Indian Nation, 439 U.S. 463, 501–502....

15 [Heroin] addiction is a special problem of the poor, and the addict population is composed largely of racial minorities that the Court has previously recognized as politically powerless and historical subjects of majoritarian neglect. Persons on methadone maintenance have few interests in common with members of the majority, and thus are unlikely to have their interests protected, or even considered, in governmental decision-making. Indeed, petitioners stipulated that "[o]ne of the reasons for the...drug policy is the fact that [petitioners] fee[l] an adverse public reaction would result if it were generally known that [petitioners] employed persons with a prior history of drug abuse, including persons participating in methadone maintenance programs." It is hard for me to reconcile that stipulation of animus against former addicts with our past holdings that "a bare...desire to harm a politically unpopular group cannot constitute a legitimate governmental interest." United States Dept. of Agriculture v. Moreno, 413 U.S. 528, 534 (1973). On the other hand, the afflictions to which petitioners are more sympathetic, such as alcoholism and mental illness, are shared by both white and black, rich and poor.

Some weight should also be given to the history of the rule. Petitioners admit that it was not the result of a reasoned policy decision and stipulated that they had never studied the ability of those on methadone maintenance to perform petitioners' jobs. Petitioners are not directly accountable to the public, are not the type of official body that normally makes legislative judgments of fact such as those relied upon by the majority today, and are by nature more concerned with business efficiency than with other public policies for which they have no direct responsibility....

7 [In] equal protection analysis, this court will assume that the objectives articulated by the legislature are actual purposes of the statute, unless an examination of the circumstances forces us to conclude that they "could not have been a goal of the legislation." [Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636, 648 n.16 (1975).] Here, a review of the legislative history supports the Minnesota Supreme Court's conclusion that the principal purposes of the Act were [environmental]. The contrary evidence cited by respondents [is] easily understood, in context, as economic defense of an Act genuinely proposed for environmental reasons. We will not invalidate a state statute under the Equal Protection Clause merely because some legislators sought to obtain votes for the measure on the basis of its beneficial side effects on state industry.

11 Appellants point out that the State's concern in these statutes, as expressed in the words of the 1924 Act's title, "An Act to Preserve Racial Integrity," extends only to the integrity of the white race. While Virginia prohibits whites from marrying any nonwhite, [Negroes], Orientals, and any other racial class may intermarry without statutory interference. Appellants contend that this distinction renders Virginia's miscegenation statutes arbitrary and unreasonable even assuming the constitutional validity of an official purpose to preserve "racial integrity." We need not reach this contention because we find the racial classifications in these statutes repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment, even assuming an even-handed state purpose to protect the "integrity" of all races.

7 [As] did the Court of Appeals, we assume the study is valid statistically without reviewing the factual findings of the District Court. Our assumption that the Baldus study is statistically valid does not include the assumption that the study shows that racial considerations actually enter into any sentencing decisions in Georgia. Even a sophisticated multiple regression analysis such as the Baldus study can only demonstrate a risk that the factor of race entered into some capital sentencing decisions and a necessarily lesser risk that race entered into any particular sentencing decision. [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

2 The dissent refers repeatedly and reverently to “integration.” However, outside of the context of remediation for past de jure segregation, “integration” is simply racial balancing. Therefore, the school districts’ attempts to further “integrate” are properly thought of as little more than attempts to achieve a particular racial balance.

6 As I have explained elsewhere, the remedies this Court authorized lower courts to compel in early desegregation cases like Green and Swann were exceptional. Sustained resistance to Brown prompted the Court to authorize extraordinary race-conscious remedial measures (like compelled racial mixing) to turn the Constitution’s dictate to desegregate into reality. Even if these measures were appropriate as remedies in the face of widespread resistance to Brown’s mandate, they are not forever insulated from constitutional scrutiny....

6 [Kahn] and [Ballard], upholding the use of gender-based classifications, rested upon the court’s perception of the laudatory purposes of those laws as remedying disadvantageous conditions suffered by women in economic and military life. Needless to say, in this case Oklahoma does not suggest that the age-sex differential was enacted to ensure the availability of 3.2% beer for women as compensation for previous deprivations.

13 For example, we can conjecture that in Reed, Idaho’s apparent premise that women lacked experience in formal business matters (particularly compared to men) would have proved to be accurate in substantially more than 2% of all cases. And in both Frontiero and Wiesenfeld, we expressly found appellees’ empirical defense of mandatory dependency tests for men but not women to be unsatisfactory, even though we recognized that husbands are still far less likely to be dependent on their wives than vice versa.

* As is evident from our opinions, the Court has had difficulty in agreeing upon a standard of equal protection analysis that can be applied consistently to the wide variety of legislative classifications. There are valid reasons for dissatisfaction with the “two-tier” approach that has been prominent in the Court’s decisions in the past decade. Although viewed by many as a result-oriented substitute for more critical analysis, that approach—with its narrowly limited “upper-tier”—now has substantial precedential support. As has been true of Reed and its progeny, our decision today will be viewed by some as a “middle-tier” approach. While I would not endorse that characterization and would not welcome a further subdividing of equal protection analysis, candor compels the recognition that the relatively deferential “rational basis” standard of review normally applied takes on a sharper focus when we address a gender-based classification. So much is clear from our recent cases....

4 Because males are generally heavier than females, they have a greater capacity to consume alcohol without impairing their driving ability than do females.

19 Admitting women to VMI would undoubtedly require alterations necessary to afford members of each sex privacy from the other sex in living arrangements, and to adjust aspects of the physical training programs. [Experience] shows such adjustments are manageable. [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

539 U.S. 558 (2003).—Eds.]

1 Although some of the members of the class had not been residents of the United States for five years at the time the complaint was filed, and therefore were ineligible to apply immediately for citizenship, there is no indication that these members, assuming that they are in the same “class” as the named appellees, would be prohibited from seeking citizenship status after they had resided in this country for the required period. In any event, this circumstance only underscores the fact that it is not unreasonable to assume that they have not learned about and adapted to our mores and institutions to the same extent as one who had lived here for five years would have through social contact.

VI

Implied Fundamental Rights

A. INTRODUCTION

This chapter examines whether and in what sense the Constitution in general and the fourteenth amendment in particular create “implied” rights.

An important caveat: Although conventionally drawn, the line between express and implied rights is hardly clear. The right to equal protection of the laws is an express right. But what about the right to be free from racial segregation? The right to free speech is express. But what about the right to spend large sums of money on political campaigns? In disputed cases, the general express right does not answer the question whether the particular right at issue is entitled to protection. For this reason, there is a sense in which most controversial Supreme Court decisions involve the implication of rights.

Despite the haziness of the distinction between implied and express rights, both courts and commentators have often insisted upon it. The debate over implied rights goes back to the very beginning of constitutional interpretation. Recall Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 386 (1798), Chapter 1, section D, supra. Commentators and the Court itself have frequently treated the recognition of implied rights as particularly problematic. For example, many commentators have condemned the Court’s decision in Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), striking down a state statute that restricted the working hours of bakers, because the Court enforced an implied liberty of contract that was not expressly provided for in the constitutional text. See the discussion at page 754, infra. Others have criticized the Court for creating a right to abortion without clear textual foundation in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). And the Court itself acknowledged in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), that it was “most vulnerable and comes nearest to illegitimacy when it deals with judge-made constitutional law having little or no cognizable roots in the language or design of the Constitution.”

As you read the material below, consider the extent to which these criticisms depend upon a sharp distinction between implied and express rights and the extent to which the distinction can be maintained.

One way to maintain the distinction is to insist that constitutional interpretation must be tightly tethered to the “original understanding” of constitutional text. The Note that follows discusses the plausibility of this interpretive technique.

Note: Theories of Constitutional Interpretation—“Originalism” and Its Critics

1. The terms of the debate. Originalism embodies the view that interpretation of the Constitution requires discovery of the Constitution’s meaning, which was fixed at the time the Constitution was adopted. However, this simple statement papers over considerable disagreement among originalists. Depending on the type of originalism one embraces, the gap between originalists and nonoriginalists may be smaller or larger. For overviews of the varieties of originalism, see Colby and Smith, Living Originalism, 59 Duke L.J. 239 (2009); Fleming, The Balkanization of Originalism, 67 Md. L. Rev. 10 (2007).

2. The beginnings of the modern debate. Judges and scholars have been arguing about originalism for as long as there has been a Constitution, but the modern debate began with President Reagan’s nomination of Robert Bork to the Supreme Court in 1987. While a professor at Yale Law School, Bork had written an article arguing that the Supreme Court acted illegitimately when it invalidated laws based upon principles not specified in the Constitution. See Bork, Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems, 47 Ind. L.J. 1 (1971). Many of Bork’s critics read the article as providing the intellectual foundations for a broad-based rejection of the work of the Warren and Burger Courts. The article included a critique of Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 471 (1965), which struck down a state law prohibiting married couples from using contraceptive devices. Although Bork defended Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954) in his article, his critics pointed to a large body of evidence indicating that the framers of the fourteenth amendment did not intend to outlaw segregation. They also argued that originalism could not accommodate many other Supreme Court decisions, including those striking down various forms of gender discrimination. Bork’s nomination was ultimately defeated, but not before triggering an unusual public debate about the appropriate sources for constitutional decision making.

3. The changing face of originalism.

a. “Expected application” originalism. Many originalists at the time of the Bork nomination defended the view that what mattered was the original intent of the framers. Moreover, that intent was defined at a very specific level, sometimes referred to as the “expected application” approach. On this view, a court was required to determine how the authors of a constitutional provision believed it would apply to the specific question before the court. For example, a court asked to determine whether a statute excluding women from juries violated the equal protection clause should determine whether the framers of the fourteenth amendment meant to prohibit such statutes. For representative defenses of expected application originalism, see R. Berger, Government by Judiciary (1977); Maltz, Some New Thoughts on an Old Problem—The Role of the Intent of the Framers in Constitutional Theory, 63 B.U. L. Rev. 353 (1981); Kay, Adherence to the Original Intentions in Constitutional Adjudication: Three Objections and Responses, 82 Nw. U. L. Rev. 226 (1988).

This form of originalism came under intense attack. Scholars pointed out that it was often impossible and perhaps conceptually incoherent to determine the intent of the large number of people who wrote or voted for constitutional provisions. They argued that this form of originalism provided no answer in cases where the framers had no specific intent, perhaps because they could not imagine how the provision would interact with facts that did not exist at the time of the drafting. They pointed out that some constitutional language was written in broad terms, which seemed to invite modern judgments about application of the language. And, they argued, this form of originalism produced some clearly unacceptable results. For early criticisms along these lines, see Brest, The Misconceived Quest for the Original Understanding, 60 B.U. L. Rev. 204 (1980); Tushnet, Following the Rules Laid Down: A Critique of Interpretivism and Neutral Principles, 96 Harv. L. Rev. 781 (1983).

b. The “new originalism.” Some scholars continue to adhere to the expected application approach, and judicial opinions sometimes refer to how the authors of a provision meant to apply it. In recent years, however, many originalists have modified their approach. Instead of focusing on the intent of the framers, they have focused on the “original public meaning” of the Constitution’s text. See, e.g., Scalia, Common-Law Courts in a Civil-Law System: The Role of United States Federal Courts in Interpreting the Constitution and Laws, in A Matter of Interpretation: Federal Courts and the Law 3 (A. Gutmann ed., 1997); R. Barnett, Restoring the Lost Constitution: The Presumption of Liberty (2004). On this approach, the relevant question is not what the framers expected or wanted, but what average members of the public would have understood the text to mean.

Some new originalists ground this approach in a theory about how language works in general. See, e.g., Lawrence B. Solum, The Fixation Thesis: The Role of Historical Fact in Original Meaning, 91 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1, 21, 22, 25 (2015):

[If] you were reading a book of recipes written in the eighteenth century and [you] learned that “kale” was the eighteenth-century word for what we now call “radishes,” you would be very unlikely to insist that the recipe actually referred to the acephala group of barassica oleracea, the green- or purple-leaved vegetable, which is quite unlike what we call a “radish.” Of course, you might be inspired to try the recipe with some leaves from a plant in the acephala group of barassica oleracea, but that would be an experimental deviation from the recipe and not a case of following the recipe.

Even if this is a correct account of how language works when following a recipe, does it follow that language works this way when the reader has other purposes? Would the reader of a novel who had the purpose of getting the most aesthetic and intellectual satisfaction from it feel herself bound to interpret it according to the original understanding? What is the purpose of constitutional interpretation, and how does that purpose intersect with the way the language should be read?

Some new originalists distinguish between “interpretation” and “construction.” See, e.g., K. Whittington, Constitutional Construction (1999); Solum, The Interpretation-Construction Distinction, 27 Const. Comment. 95 (2010); Solum, District of Columbia v. Heller and Originalism, 103 Nw. U. L. Rev. 923 (2009). Interpretation involves determining the semantic meaning of the provision in question. It requires discovery of a fact that exists in the world —how people at the time a measure was adopted would have understood the words in question. What would a new originalist do if historical inquiry discloses significant disagreements about a provision’s meaning among reasonably well-informed people at the time the provision was adopted? In such a case, does the provision have no semantic meaning? For some new originalists, cases like this are within the domain of construction. Construction is the process by which semantic meaning is translated into a legal rule. It inevitably implicates normative rather than factual questions. For example, the semantic meaning of the word “equal” in the equal protection clause tells us little or nothing about whether different levels of scrutiny are required for different sorts of statutes.

In many cases, where constitutional language is clear, construction is quite unimportant. Once the semantic meaning of the requirement that the President be at least 35 years of age is established, there is very little to construe. In other cases, though, constitutional language is indeterminate either because it is ambiguous—it might have more than one semantic meaning—or it is vague—the boundaries of the semantic meaning are uncertain. Constitutional provisions that express broad principles or aspirations—that, for example, protect “the freedom of speech,” prohibit “cruel or unusual punishment,” or guarantee “equal protection of the laws”—are especially subject to this problem. When the semantic meaning is indeterminate, interpretation must necessarily be supplemented by construction. Most new originalists believe that construction must be consistent with semantic meaning. (Consider, though, the problem of stare decisis, where judges arguably enforce results that are inconsistent with their best interpretation of the Constitution’s semantic meaning.) But many new originalists believe that construction is not fully determined by the Constitution’s semantic meaning and may actually contradict the framers’ expected application.

c. New versus old. Expected application originalism served two important functions. It provided theoretical grounding for a broad-based attack on Warren and Burger Court precedent that had, among other things, greatly expanded the rights of criminal defendants, created an abortion right, and expanded the protection of free speech. Its proponents asserted that it also legitimated constitutional law by constraining the discretion of judges and grounding constitutional doctrine in something other than the value judgments of unelected judges. As explained above, however, this form of originalism faced serious problems related to the difficulty of discovering and defining original intent and seemingly unacceptable results it sometimes produced.

The new originalism is designed to meet these problems. Does it do so successfully? For criticisms of the new originalism, see Berman, Originalism Is Bunk, 84 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1 (2009); Dorf, The Undead Constitution, 125 Harv. L. Rev. 2011 (2012). Even if it does, it arguably achieves this end only by giving up on the objectives achieved by the old originalism. On the one hand, the new originalism provides less certain grounding for criticisms of “liberal” results. For example, “liberal” new originalists have argued that there is a good originalist case for recognition of a constitutional abortion right. See J. Balkin, Living Originalism 214–219 (2011). True, this was not the expected application of the fourteenth amendment, but neither is it inconsistent with the amendment’s semantic meaning, and it might be the best construction of the amendment. On the other hand, depending on the size of the domains of interpretation and construction, the new originalism may leave considerable room for judicial discretion based upon judicial value choices. Consider, for example, the constitutional status of same-sex marriage. Once one abandons an expected application approach, is it really possible to determine whether same-sex and straight marriage are “the same” for purposes of the equal protection clause without making a contestable moral judgment about gay marriage? For a negative answer, see Seidman, Gay Sex and Marriage, the Reciprocal Disadvantage Problem, and the Crisis in Liberal Constitutional Theory, 31 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y. 135 (2008).

4. Alternatives to originalism. What would it mean to utilize a nonoriginalist approach to constitutional law? Opponents of originalism take a variety of positions that are not fully compatible with each other. As you consider these possibilities think about (a) whether the approaches really reject new originalism, or whether, alternatively, they are reactions to expected application originalism; and (b) whether the approaches resolve the problems of judicial discretion and create an uncontroversial normative foundation for constitutional law that motivated the creation of originalist approaches in the first place.

a. Natural law. Grey, Do We Have an Unwritten Constitution?, 27 Stan. L. Rev. 703, 715–716 (1975):

For the generation that framed the Constitution, the concept of a “higher law,” protecting “natural rights,” and taking precedence over ordinary positive law as a matter of political obligation, was widely shared and deeply felt. An essential element of American constitutionalism was the reduction to written form—and hence to positive law—of some of the principles of natural rights. But at the same time, it was generally recognized that written constitutions could not completely codify the higher law. Thus in the framing of the original American constitutions it was widely accepted that there remained unwritten but still binding principles of higher law. [And as] it came to be accepted that the judiciary had the power to enforce the commands of the written Constitution when these conflicted with ordinary law, it was also widely assumed that judges would enforce as constitutional restraints the unwritten natural rights as well.

For a comprehensive historical discussion of the framers’ intent, concluding that the “founding generation...expected the judiciary to keep legislatures from transgressing the natural rights of mankind, whether or not those rights found their way into the written Constitution,” see Sherry, The Founders’ Unwritten Constitution, 54 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1127, 1177 (1987). See also Grey, Origins of the Unwritten Constitution: Fundamental Law in American Revolutionary Thought, 30 Stan. L. Rev. 843 (1978); Corwin, The “Higher Law” Background of American Constitutional Law, 42 Harv. L. Rev. 149, 365 (1928–1929).

If the natural law argument has force, should we be bound by the framers’ conception of natural law, by modern views, or by the objective content—if any —of natural law?

b. Moral arguments and the search for “integrity.” A. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch 24–26 (1962):

[Government] should serve not only what we conceive from time to time to be our immediate material needs but also certain enduring values. [But] such values do not present themselves ready-made. They [must] be continually derived, enunciated, and seen in relevant application. [Courts] have certain capacities for dealing with matters of principle that legislatures and executives do not possess. Judges have, or should have, the leisure, the training, and the insulation to follow the ways of the scholar in pursuing the ends of government. This is crucial in sorting out the enduring values of a society.

See also R. Dworkin, Freedom’s Law (1997). Dworkin’s theory of interpretation—to simplify a complex argument—asks judges to provide the “best constructive account” of existing legal materials by putting constitutional text, and constitutional precedents, in the best possible light. On this view, judges have two obligations: to “fit” the existing legal materials and to “justify” them by making them sensible and good rather than senseless and bad. Judges therefore have obligations to constitutional text and history, but they also have an obligation to make the system fair and just rather than the opposite. See generally R. Dworkin, Law’s Empire (1985). Moral philosophy plays a role in this account, not on the ground that judges should do what philosophy tells them to do, but on the ground that when the legal materials leave gaps and uncertainties, judges should try to put them in the best light, and here philosophical arguments, of one kind or another, are inevitable. Is this view meaningfully different from new originalism? Consider the possibility that under Dworkin’s approach, originalism must be rejected, first because it does not “fit” our tradition, and second because it does not “justify” it, for a system of constitutional law based on originalism would offer an absurdly truncated set of constitutional rights. How might an originalist respond to these claims?

c. Tradition. Sandalow, Constitutional Interpretation, 79 Mich. L. Rev. 1033, 1036, 1068–1069, 1071 (1971):

[There is a] need to accommodate the Constitution to changing circumstances and values. [Constitutional] law thus emerges not as exegesis, but as a process by which each generation gives formal expression to the values it holds [fundamental]. Judges [who] wish to appeal to the Constitution must demonstrate that the principles upon which they propose to confer constitutional status express values that [are] rooted in history. [The] relevant past for purposes of constitutional law, thus, is to be found not only in the intentions of those who drafted and ratified the document but in the entirety of our history.

d. Common law and “living constitutionalism.” Perhaps constitutional law is a common law process in which judgments emerge from the cumulative impact of particular cases rather than from text or history. On this view, the “meaning” of the constitution is not fixed at the time of the framing, but, rather, evolves as new circumstances put pressure on old meanings and as language changes to deal with those pressures. See Strauss, Common Law Constitutional Interpretation, 63 U. Chi. L. Rev. 877 (1996), for a detailed treatment. See also Strauss, Foreword: Does the Constitution Mean What It Says?, 129 Harv. L. Rev. 1 (2015):

[There] are times when established principles are simply inconsistent with the text. Beyond that, constitutional “interpretation” usually has little to do, in practice, with the words of the text. There are times when the text is decisive, and it is never acceptable to announce that you are ignoring the text. But routinely the text, although not flatly inconsistent with the outcome of a case, has very little to do with the way the case is argued or decided. In most litigated cases, constitutional law resembles the common law much more closely than it resembles a text-based system.

e. Representation-reinforcement. J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust 7–8, 87–88 (1980):

[Rule] in accord with the consent of a majority [is] the core of the American governmental system. [But] that cannot be the whole story, since a majority with untrammeled power [is] in a position to deal itself benefits at the expense of the [minority]. The tricky task [is to devise] a way [of] protecting minorities from majority tyranny that is not a flagrant contradiction of the principle of majority [rule]. [To accomplish this task,] the Constitution [is] overwhelmingly concerned [with] procedural fairness [and] with ensuring broad participation in the processes [of] government. [Thus,] a representation-reinforcing approach to judicial review, [which focuses on “clearing the channels of political change” and “facilitating the representation of minorities,” is] supportive of [the] underlying premises of the American system of representative democracy. [Moreover,] such an approach [involves] tasks that courts, as experts on process and [as] political outsiders, can sensibly claim to be better qualified [to] perform than political officials.

Under this view, courts are obligated to enforce unambiguous provisions in the Constitution. When interpreting open textured provisions, however, judges should read them in light of the Constitution's general commitment to democratic representation, but not to recognize or create fundamental rights unrelated to representation. This position would support decisions protecting minorities and rights of access to the political process. It would not readily support decisions recognizing rights of privacy or economic liberty. C. Sunstein, The Partial Constitution (1993), argues that the constitutional commitment to "deliberative democracy" should be the source of interpretative principles; this approach has a clear connection to Ely's. Consider the possibility that Ely's approach accepts the new originalist view of interpretation and offers a particular argument about construction that is not required by but not ruled out by the new originalism.

f. Unsettlement. On this view, originalism is misguided precisely because it attempts to use the Constitution to settle political disputes. Open textured constitutional text should, instead, be read so as to foster disagreement and debate about its meaning. See L. Seidman, Our Unsettled Constitution 8 (2001):

Any constitutional settlement is bound to produce losers who will continue to nurse deep-seated grievances. [But] a constitution that unsettles creates no permanent losers. By destabilizing whatever outcomes are produced by the political process, it provides citizens with a forum and a vocabulary that they can use to continue the argument. Even when they suffer serious losses in the political sphere, citizens will have reason to maintain their allegiance to the community—not because constitutional law settles disputes, but because it provides arguments grounded in society's foundational commitments, for why the political settlement they oppose is unjust.

If open textured clauses of the Constitution are ambiguous or vague and if they embody no more than general principles, might not an insistence on adhering to their original public meaning produce unsettlement?

5. Rebuttals. Do the sources outlined above meet the objections from history and democracy? Consider the following objections:

a. Natural law. Ely, supra, at 48–50:

At the time the original Constitution was ratified, [a] number of people espoused the existence of a system of natural law principles. [But the] historical record [is] not so uncomplicated as it is sometimes made to appear. [In any event, the] idea is a discredited one in our society, [and] for good reason. “[A]ll theories of natural law have a singular vagueness which is both an advantage and disadvantage in the application of the theories.” The advantage [is] that you can invoke natural law to support anything you want. The disadvantage is that everybody understands that.

b. Moral arguments. Ely, supra, at 56–58:

[The view] that judges, in seeking constitutional value judgments, should [employ] “the method of reason familiar to the discourse of moral philosophy” [assumes] that moral philosophy is what constitutional law is properly about, that there exists a correct way of doing such philosophy, and that judges are better than others at identifying and engaging in it. [But] surely the claim here cannot be that lawyers and judges are the best imaginable people to tell good moral philosophy from bad. [Moreover, this view assumes] that something exists called “the method of moral philosophy” whose contours sensitive experts will agree on. [That] is not the way things are. [There] simply does not exist a method of moral philosophy.

Consider the following response: The existence of competing methods of moral philosophy no more disqualifies moral philosophy as a source of constitutional interpretation than the existence of competing methods of ascertaining the original understanding disqualifies originalism as a source of constitutional interpretation. The critical issue is not whether there are unitary or uncontroversial answers to moral questions, but whether it is possible to engage in rational discourse about such questions—whether moral philosophy is ultimately about anything more than a wholly subjective and inevitably relativist choice of competing value preferences. But might we be nervous about moral reasoning by judges even if we are not nervous about moral reasoning in general? See R. Posner, The Problematics of Moral and Legal Theory (1998); C. Sunstein, Legal Reasoning and Political Conflict (1997), both emphasizing the problems with judge-made assessments of political philosophy.

c. Tradition. Ely, supra, at 60, 62:

Tradition is an obvious place to seek fundamental values, but one whose problems are also obvious. [Tradition] can be invoked in support of almost any cause. [Moreover, tradition’s] overtly backward-looking character highlights its undemocratic nature: it is hard to square with the theory of our government that yesterday's majority [should not] control today's. [And] "[i]f the Constitution protects only interests which comport with traditional values, the persons most likely to be penalized for their way of life will be those least likely to receive judicial protection," and that flips the point of the [Constitution] exactly upside down.

d. Common law and “living constitutionalism.” If, as common law advocates argue, it is never permissible for judges to expressly disavow or disregard constitutional text, how is this approach different from the new originalism? If the common law approach requires judges to continually “update” constitutional doctrine in light of changing conditions, what constrains their discretion? Consider in this regard, these comments by Justice Scalia:

the Constitution is not a living organism; it is a legal document. It says something and doesn't say other [things]. [Proponents of the living constitution want matters to be decided] not by the people, but by the justices of the Supreme Court. [They] are not looking for legal flexibility, they are looking for rigidity, whether it's the right to abortion or the right to homosexual activity, they want that right to be embedded from coast to coast and to be unchangeable.

e. Representation-reinforcement. Brest, The Substance of Process, 42 Ohio St. L.J. 131, 140, 142 (1981):

[Most] instances of representation-reinforcing review demand value judgments not different in kind or scope from the fundamental values sort. [Indeed, the] representation-reinforcing enterprise is shot full of value choices, starting with the decision of just how representative our various systems of government ought to be and who ought to be included in the political community, and ending with (covert) choices about who is justifiably the object of prejudice and whether legislative goals are sufficiently important to warrant the burdens they impose on some members of society. [In his] attempt to establish a value-free mode of constitutional adjudication, [Ely] has come as close as anyone could to proving that it can't be done.

f. Unsettlement. Samaha, Dead Hand Arguments and Constitutional Interpretation, 108 Colum. L. Rev. 606, 668–669 (2008):

[Even] assuming positive unifying effects from the situation, no one should blinker the decision costs associated with interpretive openness combined with supremacy. This combination encourages arguments over the content of supreme constitutional law, which require resources to resolve, even when short-term distributive consequences are the only stakes. At least some of the arguments surrounding the written Constitution involve nothing more majestic.

More important, the actual interpretive advice from an unsettlement theory is challenging to operationalize. What should an individual interpreter do when faced with a constitutional argument? In the unsettlement model, rights claims are supposed to be indeterminate. Should there be an institutional mechanism for assuring a plurality of interpretive perspectives at any given point in time, or perhaps shifting methods from time to time? Such a mechanism seems to qualify as a constitutional settlement forbidden by the theory.

6. Concluding thoughts. In reading the materials that follow, consider the following possibilities:

a. There is an ambiguous relation between originalism and judicial restraint. At least some versions of originalism are perfectly comfortable with relatively frequent judicial invalidation of democratic decisions; they insist only that such invalidation must follow from the original understanding. When it does, originalist judges let the chips fall where they may. Originalists are concerned to limit judicial discretion but not necessarily to restrict the number of invalidations. Some originalists believe in an active judicial role in invalidating statutes; others do not.

b. Originalism risks internal contradiction because, like any theory, it must offer reasons why it should be adopted. Those reasons, themselves, cannot be derived from originalist sources without arguing in a circle. Moreover, those reasons will inevitably involve contestable claims about the nature of a well-functioning constitutional democracy. Those who defend an active judicial role in (for example) protecting minorities will have to resort to something other than history. So, too, with those who defend originalism. In these respects, some kind of choice about values is inescapable—originalists themselves must defend their choices in terms of political theory—even though people often try to escape it.

c. Methods of construction through tradition and representation-reinforcement, and more, might be compatible with the new originalism. If so, does it matter whether we think of originalism, either in its old or new form, as the primary method of interpretation or, instead, as one of a repertoire of interactive techniques that include tradition, representation-reinforcement, and more?

d. The Court has not selected any particular “theory” of interpretation; it has not settled on any particular “method.” Instead, it often brackets theoretical issues when it decides cases. See C. Sunstein, One Case at a Time (1999); Sunstein, Incompletely Theorized Agreements, 108 Harv. L. Rev. 1733 (1995). Does this make judicial review, as it is currently practiced, “unprincipled”? Would it be better if the Court made a decision in favor of a single method of interpretation? Could it? See Vermeule, The Judiciary Is a They, Not an It: Interpretive Theory and the Fallacy of Division, 14 J. Contemp. L. Issues 549 (2005).

B. THE PRIVILEGES OR IMMUNITIES CLAUSE

Section 1 of the fourteenth amendment provides that “[no] State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.” The enactment of the fourteenth amendment is examined in Chapter 5, section A, supra. Of the considerable body of literature concerning the adoption of the Civil War amendments, useful works are A. Amar, The Bill of Rights (1999); R. Berger, Government by Judiciary (1977); C. Fairman, Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864–1888, pt. 1, ch. 20 (1971); H. Flack, The Adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment (1908); J. James, The Framing of the Fourteenth Amendment (1956); Fairman, Does the Fourteenth Amendment Incorporate the Bill of Rights? The Original Understanding, 2 Stan. L. Rev. 5 (1949); Frank and Munro, The Original Understanding of “Equal Protection of the Laws,” 1972 Wash. U. L.Q. 421.

What are the “privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States”?

The Slaughter-House Cases

83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873)

MR. JUSTICE MILLER delivered the opinion of the Court.

[A statute passed by the Louisiana legislature granted to the Crescent City Live-Stock Landing and Slaughter-House Company the exclusive right to engage in the livestock landing and slaughterhouse business within an area including the City of New Orleans. The company was required to permit any person to slaughter animals in its slaughterhouse at charges fixed by law. Plaintiffs, several butchers whose businesses were restricted by the statute, sued to invalidate the monopoly. They claimed that the statute violated various provisions of the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments, including the privileges and immunities clause.]

The most cursory glance at [the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments] discloses a unity of purpose, when taken in connection with the history of the times, which cannot fail to have an important bearing on any question of doubt concerning their true meaning. [For] in the light of [events,] almost too recent to be called history, but which are familiar to us all; and on the most casual examination of the language of these amendments, no one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in them all, lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have been even suggested; we mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him....

We do not say that no one else but the negro can share in this protection. [But] what we do say, and what we wish to be understood is, that in any fair and just construction of any section or phrase of these amendments, it is necessary to look to the purpose which we have said was the pervading spirit of them all....

The first section of the fourteenth article, to which our attention is more specially invited, opens with a definition of citizenship—not only citizenship of the United States, but citizenship of the States....

“All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.”

The first observation we have to make on this clause is, that it [overturns] the Dred Scott decision by making all persons born within the United States and subject to its jurisdiction citizens of the United States....

The next observation is more important in view of the arguments of counsel in the present case. It is, that the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established. [There] is a citizenship of the United States, and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the [plaintiffs], speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several States....

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested; for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

The first occurrence of the words “privileges and immunities” in our [Constitution] is to be found in [article IV, section 2, which provides that] “The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.” [The] first and the leading case on [this clause] is that of Corfield v. Coryell, decided by Mr. Justice Washington in the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania in 1823.

“The inquiry,” he says, is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are fundamental; which belong of right to the citizens of all free governments, and which have at all times been enjoyed by citizens of the several States which compose this Union, from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are, it would be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may all, however, be comprehended under the following general heads: protection by the government, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the government may prescribe for the general good of the whole....

[Article IV, section 2] did not create those rights, which it called privileges and immunities of citizens of the States. [Its] sole purpose was to declare to the several States, that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify, or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other States within your jurisdiction.

[Thus,] up to the adoption of the recent amendments, no claim or pretence was set up that those rights depended on the Federal government for their existence or protection. [Was] it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned, from the States to the Federal government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

All this and more must follow, if the proposition of the [plaintiffs] be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States, in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction [would] constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States, on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights, as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument we admit is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress, in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other and of both these governments to the people; the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt....

[Lest] it should be said that no [privileges] and immunities [of federal citizenship] are to be found if those we have been considering are excluded, we venture to suggest some which owe their existence to the Federal government, its National character, its Constitution, or its laws.

One of these is well described in the case of Crandall v. Nevada. [73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 35 (1867).] It is said to be the right of the citizen of this great country, protected by implied guarantees of its Constitution, "to come to the seat of government to assert any claim he may have upon that government, to transact any business he may have with it, to seek its protection, to share its offices, to engage in administering its functions. He has the right of free access to its seaports, through which all operations of foreign commerce are conducted, to the sub-treasuries, land offices, and courts of justice in the several States."

Another privilege of a citizen of the United States is to demand the care and protection of the Federal government over his life, liberty, and property when on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of a foreign government. [The] right to peaceably assemble and petition for redress of grievances, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, are rights of the citizen guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. The right to use the navigable waters of the United States, however they may penetrate the territory of the several States, all rights secured to our citizens by treaties with foreign nations, are dependent upon citizenship of the United States, and not citizenship of a State. [To] these may be added the rights secured by the thirteenth and fifteenth articles of amendment, and by the other [clauses] of the fourteenth....

[The Court also rejected claims that the statute violated the thirteenth amendment and the equal protection and due process clauses of the fourteenth amendment.]

The judgments of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in these cases are affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE FIELD, dissenting....

The act of Louisiana presents the naked case [where] a right to pursue a lawful and necessary calling, previously enjoyed by every citizen, [is] taken away and vested exclusively [in] a single corporation....

The question presented is, therefore, one of the gravest importance, not merely to the parties here, but to the whole country. It is nothing less than the question whether the recent amendments to the Federal Constitution protect the citizens of the United States against the deprivation of their common rights by State legislation. In my judgment the fourteenth amendment does afford such protection, and was so intended by the Congress which framed and the States which adopted it....

If [the privileges and immunities clause] only refers, as held by the majority of the court in their opinion, to such privileges and immunities as were before its adoption specially designated in the Constitution or necessarily implied as belonging to citizens of the United States, it was a vain and idle enactment, which accomplished nothing, and most unnecessarily excited Congress and the people on its passage. With privileges and immunities thus designated or implied no State could ever have interfered by its laws, and no new constitutional provision was required to inhibit such interference. The supremacy of the Constitution and the laws of the United States always controlled any State legislation of that character. But if the amendment refers to the natural and inalienable rights which belong to all citizens, the inhibition has a profound significance and consequence.

What, then, are the privileges and immunities which are secured against abridgment by State legislation?

[Justice Washington's interpretation of the "privileges and immunities" protected by article IV, section 2] appears to me to be a sound construction of the clause in question. The privileges and immunities designated are those which of right belong to the citizens of all free governments. Clearly among these must be placed the right to pursue a lawful employment in a lawful manner, without other restraint than such as equally affects all persons....

I am authorized by THE CHIEF JUSTICE, MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE, and MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY, to state that they concur with me in this dissenting opinion.

MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY, also dissenting....

The right of a State to regulate the conduct of its citizens is undoubtedly a very broad and extensive one, and not to be lightly restricted. But there are certain fundamental rights which this right of regulation cannot infringe. It may prescribe the manner of their exercise, but it cannot subvert the rights themselves. [In] this free country, the people of which inherited certain traditional rights and privileges from their ancestors, citizenship means something....

The people of this country brought with them to its shores the rights of Englishmen; the rights which had been wrested from English sovereigns at various periods of the nation's history. [Blackstone] classifies these fundamental rights under three heads, as the absolute rights of individuals, to wit: the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty, and the right of private property. [These] are the fundamental rights which can only be [interfered with] by lawful regulations necessary or proper for the mutual good of all....[And among the privileges and immunities of citizens,] none is more essential and fundamental than the right to follow such profession or employment as each one may choose, subject only to uniform regulations equally applicable to all....

[Great] fears are expressed that this construction of the amendment will lead to enactments by Congress interfering with the internal affairs of the States, and [that] it will lead the Federal courts to draw to their cognizance the supervision of State tribunals on every subject of judicial inquiry, on the plea of ascertaining whether the privileges and immunities of citizens have not been abridged.

In my judgment no such practical inconveniences would arise. Very little, if any, legislation on the part of Congress would be required to carry the amendment into effect. [And as] the privileges and immunities protected are only those fundamental ones which belong to every citizen, they would soon become so far defined as to cause but a slight accumulation of business in the Federal courts. [In any event, the] argument from inconvenience ought not to have a very controlling influence in questions of this sort. The National will and National interest are of far greater importance....

Note: The Demise of the Privileges or Immunities Clause

1. The Slaughter-House Cases. Consider the following criticisms of Justice

Miller's interpretation of the privileges or immunities clause:

a. "Unique among constitutional provisions, the privileges and [sic] immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment enjoys the distinction of having been rendered a 'practical nullity' by a single decision of the Supreme Court within five years after its ratification." E. Corwin, The Constitution of the United States of America 965 (1953). See Currie, The Constitution in the Supreme Court: Limitations on State Power, 1865–1873, 51 U. Chi. L. Rev. 329, 348 (1983):

[As Justice Field observed in dissent, the difficulty] was with Miller's apparent conclusion that the sole office of the clause was to protect rights already given by some other federal law. Apart from the amendment's less than conclusive reference to dual citizenship, his sole justification was that a broader holding would "radically [change] the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other and of both these governments to the people"—which quite arguably was precisely what the authors of the amendment had in mind.

b. Graham, Our "Declaratory" Fourteenth Amendment, 7 Stan. L. Rev. 3, 23, 25 (1954):

A single change was made in Section One after it had been reported by the Joint Committee. This was the addition of the first sentence defining citizenship. [Significantly,] no one observed that while citizenship was made dual in this first sentence, only the privileges or immunities of "citizens of the United States" were specifically protected in the second sentence against abridgment by the states. The reason for this apparent oversight is that [opponents] of slavery had regarded all the important "natural" and constitutional rights as being privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. This had been the cardinal premise of anti-slavery theory. [The] real purpose of adding this citizenship definition was to [overrule Dred Scott]. [To] reach the conclusion of Justice Miller and the majority, one must disregard not only all antislavery from 1834 on, but one must ignore virtually every word said in the debates of 1865–66.

For a defense of Justice Miller's opinion, see Palmer, The Parameters of Constitutional Reconstruction: Slaughter-House, Cruikshank, and the Fourteenth Amendment, 1984 U. Ill. L. Rev. 739.

c. Kaczorowski, The Politics of Judicial Interpretation: The Federal Courts, Department of Justice and Civil Rights, 1866–1876, at 154–155, 161 (1985):

Theoretical rationalizations of legal doctrine are also means to achieve political objectives. [Slaughter-House] may thus be explained in terms of its political goals. Miller was quite explicit about the majority's desire to resist the nationalizing impact of the Civil War by redefining American federalism as a states rights-centered dual federalism. [Although the Court may not have] shared the political objectives and values of Democratic Conservatives of the South, [it clearly was] more concerned about preserving the states' regulatory functions [than] in establishing national authority to protect the civil rights of black Americans. [Moreover, the] revitalization of states rights was crucial to the success of Northern states in their struggle to cope with the stresses of industrialization, [for] it endorsed the state police power necessary to control the growing concentrations of monopolistic power of rising business.

2. The Slaughter-House dissents. The dissenters maintained that the “right to pursue a lawful employment in a lawful manner” is a “fundamental” right that belongs “to the citizens of all free governments.” But perhaps this formulation is “question begging, because [the] question how lawfulness is to be determined is unresolved.” Kurland, The Privileges or Immunities Clause: “Its Hour Come Round at Last?”, 1972 Wash. U. L.Q. 405, 409. If the Slaughter-House dissenters had prevailed, what other rights would constitute “privileges or immunities of citizens”?

3. Alternative interpretations.

a. Justice Black’s approach. “My study of the historical events that culminated in the Fourteenth Amendment [persuades] me that one of the chief objects that [the] Amendment’s first section [was] intended to accomplish was to make the Bill of Rights applicable to the states.” Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46, 71–72 (1947) (Black, J., dissenting). “[The] words ‘No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States’ seem to me an eminently reasonable way of expressing the idea that henceforth the Bill of Rights shall apply to the States. What more precious ‘privilege’ of American citizenship could there be than that privilege to claim the protection of our great Bill of Rights?” Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 166 (1968) (Black, J., concurring).

In support of this view, note that Representative Bingham, the framer of the provision, stated that “the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States [are] chiefly defined in the first eight amendments to the Constitution.” Cong. Globe, 42d Cong., 1st Sess., app. 85 (1871). See also Kaczorowski, Revolutionary Constitutionalism in the Era of the Civil War and Reconstruction, 61 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 863 (1986). But note that the privileges and immunities of the original Constitution referred to something altogether different from the original bill of rights; and note also that the due process clause is included in the fourteenth amendment, an inclusion that would create redundancy if the bill of rights was already comprehended within the privileges and immunities clause.

b. Academic criticism of Justice Black's approach. Consider Fairman, Does the Fourteenth Amendment Incorporate the Bill of Rights? The Original Understanding, 2 Stan. L. Rev. 5, 132, 137–139 (1949):

[Apart from a few isolated references, the theory that the] privileges and immunities clause incorporated Amendments I to VIII found no recognition in the practice of Congress, or the action of state legislatures, constitutional conventions, or courts. [The] freedom that the states traditionally [had] exercised to develop their own systems for administering justice repels any thought that the [Bill of Rights] provisions on grand jury, criminal jury, and civil jury were fastened upon them in 1868. Congress would not have attempted such a thing, the country would not have stood for it, the legislatures would not have ratified.

If the founders of the Fourteenth Amendment did not intend the privileges and immunities clause to impose Amendments I to VIII, then what, it may be asked, did they mean? [If] one seeks some inclusive and exclusive definition, such that one could say, this is precisely what they had in mind—pretty clearly there never was any such clear conception. [The opponents of the measure magnified] the proposal to render it odious. [The advocates] offered illustrations of particular evils that would be repressed; [but] stayed away from any explanation of a fundamental principle. [Brooding] over the matter [has] slowly brought [me to] the conclusion that [the protection of those rights that are] “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty” [comes] as close as one can to catching the vague aspirations that were hung upon the privileges and immunities clause.

In support of this view, note that Senator Howard, who presented the amendment to the Senate on behalf of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, explained that the clause protects all “fundamental rights lying at the basis of all society,” and that the precise scope of the rights incorporated in the clause would be left “to be discussed and adjudicated when they should happen practically to arise.” Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2765–2766 (1866). Consider also R. Berger, Government by Judiciary 18, 20 (1977):

The “privileges or immunities” clause was the central provision of the Amendment’s §1 and the key to its meaning is furnished by the immediately preceding Civil Rights Act of 1866, which, all are agreed, it was the purpose of the Amendment to embody and protect. The objectives of the [Civil Rights] Act were quite limited. [The act provided that “there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities on account of race [but] the inhabitants of every race [shall] have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence; to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, and shall be subject to like punishment [and] no other.”] The three clauses of §1 [of the fourteenth amendment] were [thus] three facets of one and the same concern: to insure that there would be no discrimination against [blacks] in respect of “fundamental rights,” which had a clearly understood and narrow compass [as exemplified by the Civil Rights Act].

In support of this view, note Representative Garfield’s comment that the proposed amendment will “lift [the Civil Rights Act] above the reach of political strife, [where] no storm of passion can shake it.” Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2462 (1866).

c. The rights of citizens. Amar, The Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment, 101 Yale L.J. 1193 (1992), argues for “refined incorporation”:

[All] of the privileges and immunities of citizens recognized in the Bill of Rights became applicable against states by dint of the Fourteenth Amendment. But not all of the provisions of the original Bill of Rights were indeed rights of citizens. Some instead were at least in part rights of states, and as such, awkward to incorporate fully against states. [The] right question is whether the provision really guarantees a privilege or immunity of individual citizens rather than a right of states or the public at large.

Amar’s basic conclusion is that when a privilege or immunity of individual citizens is at issue, incorporation is appropriate. See also A. Amar, The Bill of Rights (1998).

4. Subsequent developments. Although the Court has generally adhered to the Slaughter-House interpretation of the privileges or immunities clause, it has on rare occasions relied upon it, most recently in Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489 (1999), with regard to the right to travel, discussed in more detail in section E3 infra.

In McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. 742 (2010), a majority of the Court relied upon the fourteenth amendment’s due process clause to hold that the second amendment right to bear arms was applicable to the states. (This portion of the Court’s opinion is discussed at pages 738-746, infra). Writing for a plurality of the Court on whether the result should be justified under the privileges or immunities clause, Justice Alito refused to revisit the Slaughter-House Cases.

[In] petitioners’ view, the Privileges or Immunities Clause protects all of the rights set out in the Bill of Rights, as well as some others but petitioners are unable to identify the Clause’s full scope. Nor is there any consensus on that question among scholars who agree that the Slaughter-House Cases’ interpretation is flawed. We see no need to reconsider that interpretation here.

Compare Justice Thomas’s opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment:

As a consequence of this Court’s marginalization of the [Privileges or Immunities] Clause, litigants seeking federal protection of fundamental rights turned to [the due process clause]....

[The] notion that a constitutional provision that guarantees only “process” [could] define the substance of those rights strains credulity for even the most casual user of words. Moreover, this fiction is a particularly dangerous one. The one theme that links the Court’s substantive due process precedents together is their lack of a guiding principle to distinguish “fundamental” rights that warrant protection from nonfundamental rights that do not....

[I] believe the original meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment offers a superior alternative, and that a return to that meaning would allow this Court to enforce the rights the Fourteenth Amendment is designed to protect with greater clarity and predictability than the substantive due process framework has so far managed.

Justice Thomas’s review of the legislative history of the privileges or immunities clause led him to conclude that the clause “enforces at least those fundamental rights enumerated in the Constitution against the States, including the Second Amendment right to keep and bear arms.”

For other instances where individual justices have relied on the clause, see Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496 (1939) (opinion of Roberts, J.) (right to assemble and discuss national issues is a privilege of national citizenship); Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160 (1941) (Douglas, J., concurring) (right of interstate travel is a privilege of national citizenship); Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968) (Black, J., concurring) (right to jury trial is a privilege of national citizenship).

As you read the material about substantive due process below, consider whether it would have made any difference if the Court had considered the same issues under the privileges or immunities clause.

C. THE DUE PROCESS CLAUSE AND THE INCORPORATION CONTROVERSY

In Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 243 (1833), decided before the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, the Court, per Chief Justice Marshall, held that the rights guaranteed in the first eight amendments do not apply to the states. Did adoption of the fourteenth amendment effectively overrule Barron?

In Slaughter-House, the Court held that the rights guaranteed in the first eight amendments are not “privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States” and thus are not applicable to the states via the privileges or immunities clause of the fourteenth amendment. The fourteenth amendment also provides, however, that “[no] State shall [deprive] any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.” To what extent, if any, does the fourteenth amendment due process clause “incorporate” the specific guarantees of the bill of rights?

Note: Due Process and Incorporation

1. The fundamental fairness approach. In a series of cases decided during the first half of the twentieth century, the Court held that the due process clause did not incorporate the specific protections contained in the bill of rights. See Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 788 (1908) (self-incrimination clause); Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937) (double jeopardy clause); Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46 (1947) (self-incrimination clause). The Court nonetheless held that the due process clause protected some fundamental rights that on occasion overlapped with rights protected by the bill of rights. The Court used this technique to hold that persons enjoyed the rights to freedom of speech, press, assembly, religion, and counsel, against state infringement.

What was the test for determining whether a particular right fell within the fundamental category? The Court used a variety of verbal formulations. In Twining, it said that the test was whether the right was “[a] fundamental principle of liberty and justice which inheres in the very idea of free government and is the inalienable right of a citizen of such a government.” In Palko, the Court asked whether the right was “of the very essence of a scheme of ordered liberty” and whether “[to] abolish [it violates] a ‘principle of justice so rooted in the tradition and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental.’” In a concurring opinion in Adamson, Justice Frankfurter wrote that the test was whether state action offended “those canons of decency and fairness which express the notions of justice of English-speaking peoples.”

2. Total incorporation. Beginning with Adamson, Justice Black wrote a series of separate opinions setting out his view that the fourteenth amendment was intended to incorporate the entire bill of rights. Part of Black’s objection to the majority’s approach was that it gave the Court the “power under ‘natural law’ periodically to expand and contract constitutional standards to conform to [its] conception of what at a particular time constitutes ‘civilized decency’ and ‘fundamental liberty and justice.’” In addition, Black wrote that

[my] study of the historical events that culminated in the Fourteenth Amendment, and the expressions of those who sponsored and favored, as well as those who opposed its submission and passage, persuades me that one of the chief objects that the provisions of the Amendment’s first section, separately, and as a whole, were intended to accomplish was to make the Bill of Rights applicable to the states. With full knowledge of the import of the Barron decision, the framers and backers of the Fourteenth Amendment proclaimed its purpose to be to overturn the constitutional rule that case had announced....

3. Selective incorporation. Although Black’s “total incorporation” position never won majority support on the Court, the Court gradually moved away from Twining. Instead of either the fundamental fairness or the total incorporation approach, the Court endorsed “selective incorporation.” On the one hand, the Court made separate determinations about whether individual provisions in the bill of rights were incorporated. In this respect, selective incorporation is consistent with Twining. But on the other hand, once a right was incorporated, its scope was fully determined by the scope of the bill of rights protection. Put differently, the due process right did not merely overlap with the federal right. Instead, it was completely determined by it. In this sense, the Court’s approach drew on Justice Black’s total incorporation position.

Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968), upholding a state criminal defendant’s due process right to a jury trial, provides an example of how selective incorporation worked. Writing for the Court, Justice White stated that

[in] one sense recent cases applying provisions of the first eight Amendments to the States represent a new approach to the “incorporation” debate. Earlier the Court can be seen as having asked [if] a civilized system could be imagined that would not accord the particular protection. [Citing Palko.] The recent cases, on the other hand, have proceeded upon the valid assumption that state criminal processes are not imaginary and theoretical schemes but actual systems bearing virtually every characteristic of the common-law system that has been developing contemporaneously in England and in this country. The question thus is whether given this kind of system a particular procedure is fundamental—whether, that is, a procedure is necessary to an Anglo-American regime of ordered liberty.

The Court utilized this test to incorporate almost all the bill of rights protections against the states. (The principal protections that have not been incorporated are the seventh amendment right to a civil jury and the fifth amendment right to a grand jury indictment. Is there something about these rights that makes them especially inappropriate candidates for incorporation?) Moreover, once a right was incorporated, it provided the same protection against the states that the original bill of rights provision provided against the federal government.

4. The modern status of incorporation. In recent years, the incorporation debate seemed settled. Although some scholars expressed lingering doubts about the coherence of the Court’s approach and about whether it comported with the original understanding of the fourteenth amendment, none of the justices expressed interest in revisiting the issue. Then the Court decided District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570 (2008), holding that the second amendment made unconstitutional a District of Columbia statute prohibiting possession of any firearm. (Heller is discussed in detail in Chapter 1, section D, supra.) Heller left open whether second amendment guarantees extended to the states, and when the Court turned to that issue, it revived long dormant questions about the appropriate approach to incorporation.

McDonald v. City of Chicago

561 U.S. 742 (2010)

JUSTICE ALITO announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II-A, II-B, II-D, III-A, and III-B, in which [CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS], JUSTICE SCALIA, JUSTICE KENNEDY, and JUSTICE THOMAS join, and an opinion with respect to Parts II-C, IV, and V, in which the CHIEF JUSTICE, JUSTICE SCALIA, and JUSTICE KENNEDY join.

[Chicago had a law similar to the District of Columbia statute invalidated in Heller. The City defended the law on the ground that the second amendment was not incorporated against the states.] We have previously held that most of the provisions of the Bill of Rights apply with full force to both the Federal Government and the States. Applying the standard that is well established in our case law, we hold that the Second Amendment right is fully applicable to the States....

C

[In a portion of the opinion joined only by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Kennedy and Scalia, the Court declined to read the privileges or immunities clause as incorporating the second amendment. This portion of the opinion is discussed at page 735, supra.]

D

[The Court outlined its “selective incorporation” approach, emphasizing that only a handful of bill of rights protections remain unincorporated and that once a right was incorporated it applied fully to the states.]

III

With this framework in mind, we now turn directly to the question whether the Second Amendment right to keep and bear arms is incorporated in the concept of due process. In answering that question, as just explained, we must decide whether the right to keep and bear arms is fundamental to our scheme of ordered liberty, or as we have said in a related context, whether this right is “deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition,” Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 721 (1997) (internal quotation marks omitted).

Our decision in Heller points unmistakably to the answer. Self-defense is a basic right, recognized by many legal systems from ancient times to the present day, and in Heller, we held that individual self-defense is “the central component” of the Second Amendment right....

By the 1850's, the perceived threat that had prompted the inclusion of the Second Amendment in the Bill of Rights—the fear that the National Government would disarm the universal militia—had largely faded as a popular concern, but the right to keep and bear arms was highly valued for purposes of self-defense....

After the Civil War, many of the over 180,000 African Americans who served in the Union Army returned to the States of the old Confederacy, where systematic efforts were made to disarm them and other blacks. The laws of some States formally prohibited African Americans from possessing firearms. Throughout the South, armed parties, often consisting of ex-Confederate soldiers serving in the state militias, forcibly took firearms from newly freed slaves....

Union Army commanders took steps to secure the right of all citizens to keep and bear arms, but the 39th Congress concluded that legislative action was necessary. Its efforts to safeguard the right to keep and bear arms demonstrate that the right was still recognized to be fundamental.

The most explicit evidence of Congress' aim appears in §14 of the Freedmen's Bureau Act of 1866, which provided that "the right...to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings concerning personal liberty, personal security, and the acquisition, enjoyment, and disposition of estate, real and personal, including the constitutional right to bear arms, shall be secured to and enjoyed by all the citizens...without respect to race or color, or previous condition of slavery." Section 14 thus explicitly guaranteed that "all the citizens," black and white, would have "the constitutional right to bear arms."

The Civil Rights Act of 1866, which was considered at the same time as the Freedmen's Bureau Act, similarly sought to protect the right of all citizens to keep and bear arms....

Congress, however, ultimately deemed these legislative remedies insufficient....

In debating the Fourteenth Amendment, the 39th Congress referred to the right to keep and bear arms as a fundamental right deserving of protection....

Evidence from the period immediately following the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment only confirms that the right to keep and bear arms was considered fundamental....

The right to keep and bear arms was also widely protected by state constitutions at the time when the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified....

Despite all this evidence, municipal respondents contend that Congress, in the years immediately following the Civil War, merely sought to outlaw “discriminatory measures taken against freedmen, which it addressed by adopting a non-discrimination principle” and that even an outright ban on the possession of firearms was regarded as acceptable, “so long as it was not done in a discriminatory manner.” [This] argument is implausible. [While] §1 of the Fourteenth Amendment contains “an antidiscrimination rule,” namely, the Equal Protection Clause, municipal respondents can hardly mean that §1 does no more than prohibit discrimination. If that were so, then the First Amendment, as applied to the States, would not prohibit nondiscriminatory abridgments of the rights to freedom of speech or freedom of religion; the Fourth Amendment, as applied to the States, would not prohibit all unreasonable searches and seizures but only discriminatory searches and seizures—and so on....

[This portion of Justice Alito’s opinion is joined only by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Kennedy and Scalia.]

[Municipal] respondents’ main argument is nothing less than a plea to disregard 50 years of incorporation precedent and return (presumably for this case only) to a by-gone era. Municipal respondents submit that the Due Process Clause protects only those rights “recognized by all temperate and civilized governments, from a deep and universal sense of [their] justice.” According to municipal respondents, if it is possible to imagine any civilized legal system that does not recognize a particular right, then the Due Process Clause does not make that right binding on the States....

This line of argument is, of course, inconsistent with the long-established standard we apply in incorporation cases. And the present-day implications of municipal respondents’ argument are stunning. For example, many of the rights that our Bill of Rights provides for persons accused of criminal offenses are virtually unique to this country....

JUSTICE SCALIA, concurring.

I join the Court’s opinion. Despite my misgivings about Substantive Due Process as an original matter, I have acquiesced in the Court’s incorporation of certain guarantees in the Bill of Rights “because it is both long established and narrowly limited.” This case does not require me to reconsider that view, since straightforward application of settled doctrine suffices to decide it. I write separately only to respond to some aspects of Justice Stevens' dissent....

The subjective nature of Justice Stevens' standard is [apparent] from his claim that it is the courts' prerogative—indeed their duty—to update the Due Process Clause so that it encompasses new freedoms the Framers were too narrow-minded to imagine. Courts, he proclaims, must “do justice to [the Clause's] urgent call and its open texture” by exercising the “interpretive discretion the latter embodies.” (Why the people are not up to the task of deciding what new rights to protect, even though it is they who are authorized to make changes, see U.S. Const., Art. V, is never explained.) [It] is only we judges, exercising our “own reasoned judgment,” who can be entrusted with deciding the Due Process Clause's scope—which rights serve the Amendment's “central values”—which basically means picking the rights we want to protect and discarding those we do not....

Justice Stevens moves on to the “most basic” constraint on subjectivity his theory offers: that he would “esche[w] attempts to provide any all-purpose, top-down, totalizing theory of ‘liberty.’” The notion that the absence of a coherent theory of the Due Process Clause will somehow curtail judicial caprice is at war with reason. Indeterminacy means opportunity for courts to impose whatever rule they like; it is the problem, not the solution. [If] there are no right answers, there are no wrong answers either....

Justice Stevens also argues that requiring courts to show “respect for the democratic process” should serve as a constraint. That is true, but Justice Stevens would have them show respect in an extraordinary manner. In his view, if a right “is already being given careful consideration in, and subjected to ongoing calibration by, the States, judicial enforcement may not be appropriate.” In other words, a right, such as the right to keep and bear arms, that has long been recognized but on which the States are considering restrictions, apparently deserves less protection, while a privilege the political branches (instruments of the democratic process) have withheld entirely and continue to withhold, deserves more. That topsy-turvy approach conveniently accomplishes the objective of ensuring that the rights this Court held protected in Casey [upholding a right to secure an abortion], Lawrence [upholding the right to gay sexual intimacy], and other such cases fit the theory—but at the cost of insulting rather than respecting the democratic process.

The next constraint Justice Stevens suggests is harder to evaluate. He describes as “an important tool for guiding judicial discretion” “sensitivity to the interaction between the intrinsic aspects of liberty and the practical realities of contemporary society.” I cannot say whether that sensitivity will really guide judges because I have no idea what it is. Is it some sixth sense instilled in judges when they ascend to the bench? Or does it mean judges are more constrained when they agonize about the cosmic conflict between liberty and its potentially harmful consequences? Attempting to give the concept more precision, Justice Stevens explains that “sensitivity is an aspect of a deeper principle: the need to approach our work with humility and caution.” Both traits are undeniably admirable, though what relation they bear to sensitivity is a mystery. But it makes no difference, for the first case Justice Stevens cites in support, Casey, dispels any illusion that he has a meaningful form of judicial modesty in mind....

Justice Stevens’ response to this concurrence makes the usual rejoinder of “living Constitution” advocates to the criticism that it empowers judges to eliminate or expand what the people have prescribed: The traditional, historically focused method, he says, reposes discretion in judges as well....

I will stipulate to that. But the question to be decided is not whether the historically focused method is a perfect means of restraining aristocratic judicial Constitution writing; but whether it is the best means available in an imperfect world. Or indeed, even more narrowly than that: whether it is demonstrably much better than what Justice Stevens proposes. I think it beyond all serious dispute that it is much less subjective, and intrudes much less upon the democratic process. It is less subjective because it depends upon a body of evidence susceptible of reasoned analysis rather than a variety of vague ethicopolitical First Principles whose combined conclusion can be found to point in any direction the judges favor. [Moreover], the methodological differences that divide historians, and the varying interpretive assumptions they bring to their work, are nothing compared to the differences among the American people (though perhaps not among graduates of prestigious law schools) with regard to the moral judgments Justice Stevens would have courts pronounce. And whether or not special expertise is needed to answer historical questions, judges most certainly have no “comparative...advantage” in resolving moral disputes. What is more, his approach would not eliminate, but multiply, the hard questions courts must confront, since he would not replace history with moral philosophy, but would have courts consider both....

[Justice Thomas’s opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment is discussed at page 736, supra.]

JUSTICE STEVENS, dissenting.

[The] question we should be answering in this case is whether the Constitution “guarantees individuals a fundamental right,” enforceable against the States, “to possess a functional, personal firearm, including a handgun, within the home.” That is a different—and more difficult—inquiry than asking if the Fourteenth Amendment “incorporates” the Second Amendment. The so-called incorporation question was squarely and, in my view, correctly resolved in the late 19th century. [Heller] sheds no light on the meaning of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Our decisions construing that Clause to render various procedural guarantees in the Bill of Rights enforceable against the States likewise tell us little about the meaning of the word “liberty” in the Clause or about the scope of its protection of nonprocedural rights.

This is a substantive due process case.

I...

The first, and most basic, principle established by our cases is that the rights protected by the Due Process Clause are not merely procedural in nature. At first glance, this proposition might seem surprising, given that the Clause refers to “process.” But substance and procedure are often deeply entwined. Upon closer inspection, the text can be read to “impos[e] nothing less than an obligation to give substantive content to the words ‘liberty’ and ‘due process of law,’” Washington v. Glucksberg (1997) (Souter, J., concurring in judgment), lest superficially fair procedures be permitted to “destroy the enjoyment” of life, liberty, and property, Poe v. Ullman (Harlan, J., dissenting), and the Clause’s prepositional modifier be permitted to swallow its primary command. Procedural guarantees are hollow unless linked to substantive interests; and no amount of process can legitimize some deprivations....

The second principle woven through our cases is that substantive due process is fundamentally a matter of personal liberty. For it is the liberty clause of the Fourteenth Amendment that grounds our most important holdings in this field. It is the liberty clause that enacts the Constitution’s “promise” that a measure of dignity and self-rule will be afforded to all persons....

It follows that the term “incorporation,” like the term “unenumerated rights,” is something of a misnomer. Whether an asserted substantive due process interest is explicitly named in one of the first eight Amendments to the Constitution or is not mentioned, the underlying inquiry is the same: We must ask whether the interest is “comprised within the term liberty.”...

The third precept to emerge from our case law flows from the second: The rights protected against state infringement by the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause need not be identical in shape or scope to the rights protected against Federal Government infringement by the various provisions of the Bill of Rights....

II

[When] confronted with a substantive due process claim, we must ask whether the allegedly unlawful practice violates values “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty.” If the practice in question lacks any “oppressive and arbitrary” character, if judicial enforcement of the asserted right would not materially contribute to “a fair and enlightened system of justice,” then the claim is unsuitable for substantive due process protection. [Liberty] claims that are inseparable from the customs that prevail in a certain region, the idiosyncratic expectations of a certain group, or the personal preferences of their champions, may be valid claims in some sense; but they are not of constitutional stature....

[This] test undeniably requires judges to apply their own reasoned judgment, but that does not mean it involves an exercise in abstract philosophy. [Historical] and empirical data of various kinds ground the analysis. Textual commitments laid down elsewhere in the Constitution, judicial precedents, English common law, legislative and social facts, scientific and professional developments, practices of other civilized societies, and, above all else, the “traditions and conscience of our people,” Palko (quoting Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 105 (1934)), are critical variables....

A rigid historical test is inappropriate in this case, most basically, because our substantive due process doctrine has never evaluated substantive rights in purely, or even predominantly, historical terms....

[For] if it were really the case that the Fourteenth Amendment’s guarantee of liberty embraces only those rights “so rooted in our history, tradition, and practice as to require special protection,” Glucksberg, then the guarantee would serve little function, save to ratify those rights that state actors have already been according the most extensive protection. That approach is unfaithful to the expansive principle Americans laid down when they ratified the Fourteenth Amendment and to the level of generality they chose when they crafted its language; it promises an objectivity it cannot deliver and masks the value judgments that pervade any analysis of what customs, defined in what manner, are sufficiently “rooted”; it countenances the most revolting injustices in the name of continuity, for we must never forget that not only slavery but also the subjugation of women and other rank forms of discrimination are part of our history; and it effaces this Court’s distinctive role in saying what the law is, leaving the development and safekeeping of liberty to majoritarian political processes. It is judicial abdication in the guise of judicial modesty....

III

At this point a difficult question arises. In considering such a majestic term as “liberty” and applying it to present circumstances, how are we to do justice to its urgent call and its open texture—and to the grant of interpretive discretion the latter embodies—without injecting excessive subjectivity or unduly restricting the States’ “broad latitude in experimenting with possible solutions to problems of vital local concern,” Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 597 (1977)? One part of the answer, already discussed, is that we must ground the analysis in historical experience and reasoned judgment, and never on “merely personal and private notions.”...

The most basic [guidepost] is that we have eschewed attempts to provide any all-purpose, top-down, totalizing theory of “liberty.” That project is bound to end in failure or worse. The Framers did not express a clear understanding of the term to guide us, and the now-repudiated Lochner line of cases attests to the dangers of judicial overconfidence in using substantive due process to advance a broad theory of the right or the good. In its most durable precedents, the Court “has not attempted to define with exactness the liberty...guaranteed” by the Fourteenth Amendment. Meyer; see also, e.g., Bolling. By its very nature, the meaning of liberty cannot be “reduced to any formula; its content cannot be determined by reference to any code.” Poe (Harlan, J., dissenting).

Yet while “the ‘liberty’ specially protected by the Fourteenth Amendment” is “perhaps not capable of being fully clarified,” Glucksberg, it is capable of being refined and delimited. We have insisted that only certain types of especially significant personal interests may qualify for especially heightened protection.²⁴

Rather than seek a categorical understanding of the liberty clause, our precedents have thus elucidated a conceptual core. The clause safeguards, most basically, “the ability independently to define one’s identity,” Roberts v. United States Jaycees; “the individual’s right to make certain unusually important decisions that will affect his own, or his family’s, destiny,” Fitzgerald, 523 F.2d, at 719, and the right to be respected as a human being. Self-determination, bodily integrity, freedom of conscience, intimate relationships, political equality, dignity and respect—these are the central values we have found implicit in the concept of ordered liberty.

Another key constraint on substantive due process analysis is respect for the democratic process. If a particular liberty interest is already being given careful consideration in, and subjected to ongoing calibration by, the States, judicial enforcement may not be appropriate....

As this discussion reflects, to acknowledge that the task of construing the liberty clause requires judgment is not to say that it is a license for unbridled judicial lawmaking. To the contrary, only an honest reckoning with our discretion allows for honest argumentation and meaningful accountability.

IV...

The question in this case, then, is not whether the Second Amendment right to keep and bear arms (whatever that right's precise contours) applies to the States because the Amendment has been incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment. It has not been. The question, rather, is whether the particular right asserted by petitioners applies to the States because of the Fourteenth Amendment itself, standing on its own bottom....

Understood as a plea to keep their preferred type of firearm in the home, petitioners' argument has real force. The decision to keep a loaded handgun in the house is often motivated by the desire to protect life, liberty, and property. It is comparable, in some ways, to decisions about the education and upbringing of one's children. For it is the kind of decision that may have profound consequences for every member of the family, and for the world beyond....

While the individual's interest in firearm possession is thus heightened in the home, the State's corresponding interest in regulation is somewhat weaker....

While I agree with the Court that our substantive due process cases offer a principled basis for holding that petitioners have a constitutional right to possess a usable firearm in the home, I am ultimately persuaded that a better reading of our case law supports the city of Chicago. I would not foreclose the possibility that a particular plaintiff—say, an elderly widow who lives in a dangerous neighborhood and does not have the strength to operate a long gun—may have a cognizable liberty interest in possessing a handgun. But I cannot accept petitioners' broader submission. A number of factors, taken together, lead me to this conclusion....

[First], in evaluating an asserted right to be free from particular gun-control regulations, liberty is on both sides of the equation. Guns may be useful for self-defense, as well as for hunting and sport, but they also have a unique potential to facilitate death and destruction and thereby to destabilize ordered liberty....

Second, the right to possess a firearm of one's choosing is different in kind from the liberty interests we have recognized under the Due Process Clause. [It] does not appear to be the case that the ability to own a handgun, or any particular type of firearm, is critical to leading a life of autonomy, dignity, or political equality....

[The] experience of other advanced democracies, including those that share our British heritage, undercuts the notion that an expansive right to keep and bear arms is intrinsic to ordered liberty. Many of these countries place restrictions on the possession, use, and carriage of firearms far more onerous than the restrictions found in this Nation....

VI...

[Although] Justice Scalia aspires to an “objective,” “neutral” method of substantive due process analysis, his actual method is nothing of the sort. Under the “historically focused” approach he advocates, numerous threshold questions arise before one ever gets to the history. At what level of generality should one frame the liberty interest in question? What does it mean for a right to be “deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition”? By what standard will that proposition be tested? Which types of sources will count, and how will those sources be weighed and aggregated? There is no objective, neutral answer to these questions. There is not even a theory—at least, Justice Scalia provides none—of how to go about answering them....

It is hardly a novel insight that history is not an objective science, and that its use can therefore “point in any direction the judges favor.”...

Justice Scalia’s method invites not only bad history, but also bad constitutional law. [It] makes little sense to give history dispositive weight in every case. And it makes especially little sense to answer questions like whether the right to bear arms is “fundamental” by focusing only on the past, given that both the practical significance and the public understandings of such a right often change as society changes. What if the evidence had shown that, whereas at one time firearm possession contributed substantially to personal liberty and safety, nowadays it contributes nothing, or even tends to undermine them? Would it still have been reasonable to constitutionalize the right?

The concern runs still deeper. Not only can historical views be less than completely clear or informative, but they can also be wrong. Some notions that many Americans deeply believed to be true, at one time, turned out not to be true....

D. SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS: THE PROTECTION OF ECONOMIC INTERESTS AND THE QUESTION OF REDISTRIBUTION

The Constitution contains several provisions that expressly restrict the government's power to interfere with market ordering and the private economic interests of individuals. The fifth and fourteenth amendments, for example, provide that “[no] person shall [be] deprived of [property,] without due process of law.” Article I, section 10 provides that “[no] State shall [pass] any [Law] impairing the Obligation of Contracts.” And the fifth amendment provides that “private property” shall not “be taken for public use, without just compensation.” Although these provisions reflect the importance of private property, they have usually been understood to protect private economic interests only against certain narrowly defined forms of government interference. See section H infra. Is there a more general constitutional limitation on the power of government to interfere with private economic decisions?

In its 1905 decision in Lochner v. New York, infra, the Court held that the due process clauses of the fifth and fourteenth amendments protect liberty of contract and private property against putatively unwarranted government interference. The Lochner period has played a major role in defining the appropriate place of the Court in American government. This section traces the rise—and fall—of this exceptionally important doctrine.

Note: The Road to Lochner

1. Early intimations. Although the doctrine of economic substantive due process did not come into full flower until the Court’s 1905 decision in Lochner, several pre-Lochner decisions flirted with analogous doctrines. In Calder v. Bull, Chapter 1, section D, supra, more than a century before Lochner, Justice Chase’s “natural law” theory clearly reflected a concern with property rights, and in Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 87 (1810), in which the Court held that a state legislature could not constitutionally rescind land grants to individuals who had purchased the land in good faith, Chief Justice Marshall explained that the result was justified both by the contract clause and “by general principles which are common to our free institutions.” In Wynehamer v. People, 13 N.Y. 378 (1856), the New York Court of Appeals relied expressly on the state due process clause in invalidating a liquor prohibition statute that prohibited the use or possession even of liquor owned prior to the enactment of the statute. The New York court explained that, when “a law annihilates the value of property, [the] owner is deprived of it [within] the spirit of a constitutional provision intended expressly to shield private rights from the exercise of arbitrary power.” A year after Wynehamer, in Dred Scott v. Sanford, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393 (1857), the Court held that Congress could not prohibit slavery in the territories. The Court observed, without explanation, that an “act of Congress which deprives a citizen of the United States of his liberty or property, merely because he came himself or brought his property into a particular [Territory,] could hardly be dignified with the name of due process of law.”

These intermittent intimations of economic substantive due process did not seriously challenge the prevailing view that the due process guarantee was essentially procedural in nature. See Den ex dem. Murray v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co., 59 U.S. (18 How.) 272 (1856). Moreover, in The Slaughter-House Cases, the Court held not only that the Louisiana statute did not violate the privileges or immunities clause of the fourteenth amendment, but also that it did not violate the fourteenth amendment due process clause.

Slaughter-House did not end the matter, however.

Lochner’s antecedents. Shifting judicial attitudes toward substantive due process were produced in part by economic and social developments. The rise of industrial organization in the late nineteenth century transformed American society. As ownership of productive property became increasingly concentrated, inequalities in private economic power grew sharper, and the number of persons without significant productive property and dependent on industrial employment increased. As the twentieth century approached, state legislatures began to address the conditions accompanying the concentration of private power in business.

Opponents of the new regulatory laws maintained that “fundamental” rights of property were not being respected by the popularly controlled state legislatures. See, e.g., C. Tiedeman, A Treatise on the Limitations of the Police Power in the United States (1886). They relied in part on an older constitutional tradition of opposition to “class legislation”—that is, laws that benefitted specific groups rather than the general public. On this view, there was a sharp distinction between the “police power”—the general authority of the government to legislate do so as to protect public health, safety, and morals—and special interest legislation that impermissibly invaded the private sphere. For example, the minimum wage was said to increase unemployment, thus harming some of the most vulnerable members of society, for the benefit of better situated workers.

In Munn v. Illinois, 94 U.S. 113 (1877), the Court held that an Illinois law fixing the maximum charges for grain-storage warehouses did not violate the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment. The Court noted, however, that “under some circumstances,” such statutes may violate due process. The critical inquiry was whether the “private property is ‘affected with a public interest,’ [for when] one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good.” The Court held that the businesses regulated in Munn were clearly “affected with a public interest,” for they had a “virtual monopoly” on the storage of grain bound from the Midwest to national and international markets. In such circumstances, the Court would not consider the “reasonableness” of government-imposed rates.

In later cases, warnings about the limits of government regulatory power became more pointed. In The Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U.S. 307 (1886), the Court sustained state regulation of railroad rates but emphasized that there were bounds to judicial deference: “[The] power to regulate is not a power to [destroy]. Under pretence of regulating fares and freights, the State cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation, or without due process of law.”

Later that same year, in Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad, 116 U.S. 394 (1886), the Court held that corporations were “persons” within the meaning of the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment, thus opening the door for direct challenges to regulations by corporations. See Graham, The “Conspiracy Theory” of the Fourteenth Amendment, 47 Yale L.J. 371 (1938). The following year, in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U.S. 623 (1887), the Court upheld a state law prohibiting the sale of alcoholic beverages but again cautioned that not every regulatory measure “is to be accepted as a legitimate exertion of the police powers of the State.” In The Minnesota Rate Case (Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway v. Minnesota), 134 U.S. 418 (1890), the Court held unconstitutional a state statute authorizing a commission to set final and unreviewable railroad rates, thus marking the first time that the Court relied directly on the due process clause to invalidate a state economic regulation. The Court explained that “[the] question of reasonableness of a rate of charge for transportation by a railroad company [is] eminently a question for judicial investigation, requiring due process of law for its determination.” By the end of the decade, the Court was actively in the business of reviewing the reasonableness of rates. See Smith v. Ames, 169 U.S. 466 (1898) (establishing the rule that rates must yield a fair return on a fair present value); Federal Power Commission v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 320 U.S. 591 (1944) (tracing the evolution and eventual repudiation of the rule of Smith v. Ames); Siegel, Understanding the Lochner Era: Lessons from the Controversy over Railroad and Utility Rate Regulation, 70 Va. L. Rev. 187 (1984).

In Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U.S. 578 (1897), the Court took the final step toward Lochner. Allgeyer invalidated a state statute that prohibited any person from issuing insurance on property in the state with companies that had not been admitted to do business in the state. Although Justice Peckham, writing for a unanimous Court, focused primarily on state power over foreign corporations, he also offered a comprehensive articulation of the “liberty of contract”:

The liberty mentioned in [the due process clause] means not only the right of the citizen to be free from the mere physical restraint of his person, as by incarceration, but the term is deemed to embrace the right of the citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties; to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purposes mentioned above. [In] the privilege of pursuing an ordinary calling or trade and of acquiring, holding and selling property must be embraced the right to make all proper contracts in relation thereto, and although it may be conceded that this right to contract [or] to do business within the jurisdiction of the State may be regulated and sometimes prohibited when the contracts or business conflict with the policy of the State as contained in its statutes, yet the power does not and cannot extend to prohibiting a citizen from making contracts of the nature involved in this case outside of the limits and jurisdiction of the State, and which are also to be performed outside of such jurisdiction.

Lochner v. New York

MR. JUSTICE PECKHAM [delivered] the opinion of the Court.

[The Court held unconstitutional a New York statute providing that no employee shall “work in a biscuit, bread or cake bakery or confectionary establishment more than sixty hours in any one week, or more than ten hours in any one day.”]

The statute necessarily interferes with the right of contract between the employer and employes [sic], concerning the number of hours in which the latter may labor in the bakery of the employer. The general right to make a contract in relation to his business is part of the liberty of the individual protected by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution. [Allgeyer.] Under that provision no State can deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law. The right to purchase or to sell labor is part of the liberty protected by this amendment, unless there are circumstances which exclude the right. There are, however, certain powers, existing in the sovereignty of each State in the Union, somewhat vaguely termed police powers, the exact description and limitation of which have not been attempted by the courts. Those powers [relate] to the safety, health, morals and general welfare of the public. Both property and liberty are held on such reasonable conditions as may be imposed by the governing power of the State in the exercise of those powers, and with such conditions the Fourteenth Amendment was not designed to interfere. [Mugler.]

This court has recognized the existence and upheld the exercise of the police powers of the States in many cases. [Among] the [cases] where the state law has been upheld by this court is that of Holden v. Hardy, 169 U.S. 366 [1898]. A provision in the act of the legislature of Utah was there under consideration, the act limiting the employment of workmen in all underground mines or workings, to eight hours per day, "except in cases of emergency, where life or property is in imminent danger." [The] act was held to be a valid exercise of the police powers of the State. [It] was held that the kind of employment [and] the character of the employes [were] such as to make it reasonable and proper for the State to interfere to prevent the employes from being constrained by the rules laid down by the proprietors in regard to labor. [There] is nothing in Holden v. Hardy which covers the case now before us....

It must, of course, be conceded that there is a limit to the valid exercise of the police power by the State. There is no dispute concerning this general proposition. Otherwise the Fourteenth Amendment would have no efficacy and the legislatures of the States would have unbounded power. [In] every case that comes before this court, therefore, where legislation of this character is concerned and where the protection of the Federal Constitution is sought, the question necessarily arises: Is this a fair, reasonable and appropriate exercise of the police power of the State, or is it an unreasonable, unnecessary and arbitrary interference with the right of the individual to his personal liberty or to enter into those contracts in relation to labor which may seem to him appropriate or necessary for the support of himself and his family? Of course the liberty of contract relating to labor includes both parties to it. The one has as much right to purchase as the other to sell labor.

This is not a question of substituting the judgment of the court for that of the legislature. If the act be within the power of the State it is valid, although the judgment of the court might be totally opposed to the enactment of such a law. But the question would still remain: Is it within the police power of the State? and that question must be answered by the court.

The question whether this act is valid as a labor law, pure and simple, may be dismissed in a few words. There is no reasonable ground for interfering with the liberty of person or the right of free contract, by determining the hours of labor, in the occupation of a baker. There is no contention that bakers as a class are not equal in intelligence and capacity to men in other trades or manual occupations, or that they are not able to assert their rights and care for themselves without the protecting arm of the State, interfering with their independence of judgment and of action. They are in no sense wards of the State. Viewed in the light of a purely labor law, with no reference whatever to the question of health, we think that a law like the one before us involves neither the safety, the morals nor the welfare of the public, and that the interest of the public is not in the slightest degree affected by such an act. The law must be upheld, if at all, as a law pertaining to the health of the individual engaged in the occupation of a baker. It does not affect any other portion of the public than those who are engaged in that occupation. Clean and wholesome bread does not depend upon whether the baker works but ten hours per day or only sixty hours a week....

We think the limit of the police power has been reached and passed in this case. There is, in our judgment, no reasonable foundation for holding this to be necessary or appropriate as a health law to safeguard the public health or the health of the individuals who are following the trade of a baker. If this statute be valid, [there] would seem to be no length to which legislation of this nature might not go....

We think that there can be no fair doubt that the trade of a baker, in and of itself, is not an unhealthy one to that degree which would authorize the legislature to interfere with the right to labor, and with the right of free contract on the part of the individual, either as employer or employe. In looking through statistics regarding all trades and occupations, it may be true that the trade of a baker does not appear to be as healthy as some other trades, and is also vastly more healthy than still others. To the common understanding the trade of a baker has never been regarded as an unhealthy one. [It] might be safely affirmed that almost all occupations more or less affect the health. There must be more than the mere fact of the possible existence of some small amount of unhealthiness to warrant legislative interference with liberty. It is unfortunately true that labor, even in any department, may possibly carry with it the seeds of unhealthiness. But are we all, on that account, at the mercy of legislative majorities?...

It is also urged, pursuing the same line of argument, that it is to the interest of the State that its population should be strong and robust, and therefore any legislation which may be said to tend to make people healthy must be valid as health laws, enacted under the police power. If this be a valid argument and a justification for this kind of legislation, it follows that the protection of the Federal Constitution from undue interference with liberty of person and freedom of contract is visionary, wherever the law is sought to be justified as a valid exercise of the police power. Scarcely any law but might find shelter under such Assumptions. [Not] only the hours of employes, but the hours of employers could be regulated, and doctors, lawyers, scientists, all professional men, as well as athletes and artisans, could be forbidden to fatigue their brains and bodies by prolonged hours of exercise, lest the fighting strength of the State be impaired. We mention these extreme cases because the contention is extreme. We do not believe in the soundness of the views which uphold this law. [The] act is not, within any fair meaning of the term, a health law, but is an illegal interference with the rights of individuals, both employers and employes, to make contracts regarding labor upon such terms as they may think best, or which they may agree upon with the other parties to such contracts. Statutes of the nature of that under review, limiting the hours in which grown and intelligent men may labor to earn their living, are mere meddlesome interferences with the rights of the individual, and they are not saved from condemnation by the claim that they are passed in the exercise of the police power and upon the subject of the health of the individual whose rights are interfered with, unless there be some fair ground, reasonable in and of itself, to say that there is material danger to the public health or to the health of the employes, if the hours of labor are not curtailed. [All that the State] could properly do has been done by it with regard to the conduct of bakeries, as provided for in the other sections of the act, [which] provide for the inspection of the premises where the bakery is carried on, with regard to furnishing proper wash-rooms and water-closets, [with] regard to providing proper drainage, plumbing and painting [and] for other things of that nature....

It was further urged [that] restricting the hours of labor in the case of bakers was valid because it tended to cleanliness on the part of the workers, as a man was more apt to be cleanly when not overworked, and if cleanly then his "output" was also more likely to be so. [In] our judgment it is not possible in fact to discover the connection between the number of hours a baker may work in the bakery and the healthful quality of the bread made by the workman. The connection, if any exists, is too shadowy and thin to build any argument for the interference of the legislature. [When] assertions such as we have adverted to become necessary in order to give, if possible, a plausible foundation for the contention that the law is a "health law," it gives rise to at least a suspicion that there was some other motive dominating the legislature than the purpose to subserve the public health or welfare.

This interference on the part of the legislatures of the several States with the ordinary trades and occupations of the people seems to be on the increase....

It is impossible for us to shut our eyes to the fact that many of the laws of this character, while passed under what is claimed to be the police power for the purpose of protecting the public health or welfare, are, in reality, passed from other motives. We are justified in saying so when, from the character of the law and the subject upon which it legislates, it is apparent that the public health or welfare bears but the most remote relation to the law....

It is manifest to us that the [law here] has no such direct relation to and no such substantial effect upon the health of the employe, as to justify us in regarding the section as really a health law. It seems to us that the real object and purpose were simply to regulate the hours of labor between the master and his employes (all being men, sui juris), in a private business, not dangerous in any degree to morals or in any real and substantial degree, to the health of the employes. Under such circumstances the freedom of master and employe to contract with each other in relation to their employment [cannot] be prohibited or interfered with, without violating the Federal Constitution....

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, with whom MR. JUSTICE WHITE and MR. JUSTICE DAY concurred, dissenting....

[The] statute must be taken as expressing the belief of the people of New York that, as a general rule, and in the case of the average man, labor in excess of sixty hours during a week in such establishments may endanger the health of those who thus labor. Whether or not this be wise legislation it is not the province of the court to inquire. Under our systems of government the courts are not concerned with the wisdom or policy of legislation. So that in determining the question of power to interfere with liberty of contract, the court may inquire whether the means devised by the State are germane to an end which may be lawfully accomplished and have a real or substantial relation to the protection of health, as involved in the daily work of the persons, male and female, engaged in bakery and confectionery establishments. But when this inquiry is entered upon I find it impossible, in view of common experience, to say that there is here no real or substantial relation between the means employed by the State and the end sought to be accomplished by its legislation....

Professor Hirt in his treatise on the "Diseases of the Workers" has said:

The labor of the bakers is among the hardest and most laborious imaginable, because it has to be performed under conditions injurious to the health of those engaged in it. It is hard, very hard work, not only because it requires a great deal of physical exertion in an overheated workshop and during unreasonably long hours, but more so because of the erratic demands of the public, compelling the baker to perform the greater part of his work at night, thus depriving him of an opportunity to enjoy the necessary rest and sleep, a fact which is highly injurious to his health.

Another writer says:

The constant inhaling of flour dust causes inflammation of the lungs and of the bronchial tubes. The eyes also suffer through this dust....The long hours of toil to which all bakers are subjected produce rheumatism, cramps and swollen legs. The intense heat in the workshops [is] another source of a number of diseases of various organs. [The] average age of a baker is below that of other workmen; they seldom live over their fiftieth year, most of them dying between the ages of forty and fifty....

I do not stop to consider whether any particular view of this economic question presents the sounder theory. What the precise facts are it may be difficult to say. It is enough for the determination of this case, and it is enough for this court to know, that the question is one about which there is room for debate and for an honest difference of opinion. There are many reasons of a weighty, substantial character, based upon the experience of mankind, in support of the theory that, all things considered, more than ten hours' steady work each day, from week to week, in a bakery or confectionery establishment, may endanger the health, and shorten the lives of the workmen, thereby diminishing their physical and mental capacity to serve the State, and to provide for those dependent upon them.

If such reasons exist that ought to be the end of this case, for the State is not amenable to the judiciary, in respect of its legislative enactments, unless such enactments are plainly, palpably, beyond all question inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States....

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES, dissenting....

This case is decided upon an economic theory which a large part of the country does not entertain. If it were a question whether I agreed with that theory, I should desire to study it further and long before making up my mind. But I do not conceive that to be my duty, because I strongly believe that my agreement or disagreement has nothing to do with the right of a majority to embody their opinions in law. It is settled by various decisions of this court that state constitutions and state laws may regulate life in many ways which we as legislators might think as injudicious or if you like as tyrannical as this, and which equally with this interfere with the liberty to contract. Sunday laws and usury laws are ancient examples. A more modern one is the prohibition of lotteries. The liberty of the citizen to do as he likes so long as he does not interfere with the liberty of others to do the same, which has been a shibboleth for some well-known writers, is interfered with by school laws, by the Post Office, by every state or municipal institution which takes his money for purposes thought desirable, whether he likes it or not. The Fourteenth Amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's Social Statics. The other day we sustained the Massachusetts vaccination law. Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11. United States and state statutes and decisions cutting down the liberty to contract by way of combination are familiar to this court. [The] decision sustaining an eight hour law for miners is still recent. [Holden v. Hardy.] Some of these laws embody convictions or prejudices which judges are likely to share. Some may not. But a constitution is not intended to embody a particular economic theory, whether of paternalism and the organic relation of the citizen to the State or of laissez faire. It is made for people of fundamentally differing views, and the accident of our finding certain opinions natural and familiar or novel and even shocking ought not to conclude our judgment upon the question whether statutes embodying them conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

General propositions do not decide concrete cases. The decision will depend on a judgment or intuition more subtle than any articulate major premise. But I think that the proposition just stated, if it is accepted, will carry us far toward the end. Every opinion tends to become a law. I think that the word liberty in the Fourteenth Amendment is perverted when it is held to prevent the natural outcome of a dominant opinion, unless it can be said that a rational and fair man necessarily would admit that the statute proposed would infringe fundamental principles as they have been understood by the traditions of our people and our law. It does not need research to show that no such sweeping condemnation can be passed upon the statute before us. A reasonable man might think it a proper measure on the score of health. Men whom I certainly could not pronounce unreasonable would uphold it as a first instalment of a general regulation of the hours of work....

Note: The (Alleged?) Vices of Lochner

Lochner “is one of the most condemned cases in United States history and has been used to symbolize judicial dereliction and abuse.” B. Siegan, Economic Liberties and the Constitution 23 (1980). But people have differed in their explanation of why the decision should be condemned, and not everyone is sure that it should be condemned. Embedded in the debate about Lochner are some of the most important arguments on the largest questions of constitutional law and theory.

Consider the following objections and the responses to them:

1. The “liberty of contract” protected in Lochner is not within the “liberty” protected by the due process clause. Consider the view of Justice Thomas: “[It] is hard to see how the ‘liberty’ protected by the [Due Process] Clause could be interpreted to include anything broader than freedom from physical restraint. That was the consistent usage of the time when ‘liberty’ was paired with ‘life’ and ‘property.’ And that usage avoids rendering superfluous those protections for ‘life’ and ‘property.’”

Notice, though, that the fourteenth amendment was written in large part to ensure the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act of 1868, and that that Act protected a wide range of “liberties” including the right to make contracts.

2. Even if the “liberty of contract” is a “liberty” protected by the due process clause, workers, under the circumstances that then existed, were not acting freely when they entered labor contracts. On this theory, these contracts were the product of a preexisting and unfair distribution of economic entitlements that in effect “coerced” laborers to accept contracts that they would have preferred to decline. The New York statute, by overcoming collective action problems, actually increased rather than decreased workers’ liberty of contract. Does this argument sweep too broadly because it has the potential to unravel virtually any constitutional right? For example, might some decisions to adhere to a particular religious faith, to marry, or to secure an abortion also be said to be the product of “coercive” circumstances that the individual making the decision did not choose?

3. Even if the “liberty of contract” is a “liberty” protected by the due process clause, that clause does not guarantee substantive rights. The due process clause is, by its own terms, concerned exclusively with “process,” and thus has no relevance to the statute at issue in Lochner. “Substantive due process,” is “a contradiction in terms—sort of like ‘green pastel redness.’” J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust 18 (1980). In response, consider the argument that procedural protections are meaningless without some substantive substrate that the procedures attach to. Consider also the argument that statutes like the one invalidated in Lochner are premised on a set of findings made by the legislature —findings, for example, about the health effects of long hours of work in a bakery—and that opponents of the statute have a procedural right to contest these findings before a court. For further discussion, see section G infra.

Alternatively, one might argue that the due process clause accords substantive protection to all “fundamental” rights, but that the “liberty of contract” is not “fundamental.” Under this view, “the error of [Lochner] lay not in judicial intervention to protect ‘liberty’ but in a misguided understanding of what liberty actually required.” L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 564 (1978).

Is the “liberty of contract” a “fundamental” right? Consider Siegan, supra, at 83:

A free society cannot exist unless government is prohibited from confiscating private property. If government can seize something owned by a private citizen, it can exert enormous power over people. One would be reluctant to speak, write, pray, or petition in a manner displeasing to the authorities lest he lose what he has already earned and possesses. As [Alexander] Hamilton stated, a power over a man’s subsistence amounts to a power over his will.

The historical commitment to the “liberty of contract” and to rights of property runs deep: “[In the view of the Framers,] a major function of government was protecting and preserving property rights. [The] Framers probably subscribed to Blackstone’s definition that the right of property is ‘absolute...[and] consists in the free use, enjoyment and disposal [by man] of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the laws of the land.’” Siegan, supra, at 30–31. See also R. Epstein, Takings (1985). Moreover, in Calder v. Bull, Justice Chase maintained that “natural law” prohibits “a law that destroys or impairs the lawful private contracts of citizens [or] that takes property from A. and gives it to B.” In Corfield v. Coryell, 6 F. Cas. 546 (1823), a decision recognized by all of the justices participating in Slaughter-House as defining the “fundamental” rights of individuals, Justice Washington declared that the “fundamental” privileges and immunities of individuals include the “right [to] take, hold and dispose of property.” The Civil Rights Act of 1866, which provided the impetus for the fourteenth amendment, expressly protected the right of blacks “to make and enforce contracts [and to] purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property.”

On the other hand, it was also widely recognized that rights of contract and property were subject to “reasonable” regulation under the police power. How should a court decide what kinds of regulations are “reasonable.”

4. The means/ends connection: Even if the “liberty of contract” is entitled to “substantive” protection under the due process clause, the statute at issue in Lochner was justified by the state’s interest in protecting the health of bakery employees. In his opinion for the Court, Justice Peckham declared that, for the statute to be “saved from condemnation,” there must “be some fair ground, reasonable in and of itself, to say that there is material danger to the public health or to the health of the employes, if the hours of labor are not curtailed.” Is this standard too stringent? Perhaps the Court should have sustained the law because, as Justice Harlan observed, “the question is one about which there is room for debate and for an honest difference of opinion.” And even if one assumes that Justice Peckham stated the appropriate standard, why weren’t the data offered by Justice Harlan sufficient to satisfy that standard?

The Court’s careful examination of the means/ends connection might be criticized on two grounds. The first is that judges do not have the fact-finding competence to engage in such inquiries; the second is that judges are unelected and therefore lack the accountability that would support such a role.

With regard to the first argument, why is a court with subpoena power and the ability to secure testimony from experts less able to make accurate fact-finding than a legislature? With regard to the second, is it proper to think of the case as posing a conflict between legislatures and courts, or, rather, between individuals and government? Put differently, if the health risks of being a baker are in fact contested, why shouldn’t potential bakers decide for themselves whether the risks are worth taking?

In Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908), the Court sustained against due process attack an Oregon statute forbidding the employment of women “in any mechanical establishment, or factory, or laundry” for more than ten hours in any one day because the extensive evidence marshaled by Louis D. Brandeis in his “factual” brief convinced the Court that there was ample justification for the “widespread belief that woman’s physical structure, and the functions she performs in consequence thereof, justify special legislation restricting or qualifying the conditions under which she should be permitted to toil.” On the “Brandeis brief,” see P. Freund, On Understanding the Supreme Court 86–91 (1949); Bikle, Judicial Determination of Questions of Fact Affecting the Constitutional Validity of Legislative Action, 38 Harv. L. Rev. 6 (1924); Karst, Legislative Facts in Constitutional Litigation, 1960 Sup. Ct. Rev. 75. Is Muller explainable on the ground that the Court regarded women as a dependent class analogous to children or workers in mining camps? Should the Court have viewed bakers as similarly dependent? Recall the discussion of gender discrimination in Chapter 5, section D, supra.

5. The problem of ends: Even if the “liberty of contract” is entitled to “substantive” protection under the due process clause, the statute at issue in Lochner was justified as a “labor law, pure and simple.” Why wasn’t the New York statute justified as a means of compensating for the unequal bargaining position of bakery workers? Here, the Court seems to have ruled certain kinds of redistributive regulation off limits. Consider, though, whether regulation of this sort ends up making workers even worse off. The minimum wage, for example, might increase unemployment or lead to the displacement of marginal workers with more skilled workers. What is especially notable is that the Court dismissed the “labor law” justification, unlike the health justification, as an effort to further an illegitimate end. What made this purpose illegitimate? Consider the following observations.

a. Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U.S. 1, 17–18 (1915):

[It] is said [that] “employees, as a rule, are not financially able to be as independent in making contracts for the sale of their labor as are employers in making contracts of purchase thereof.” No doubt, wherever the right of private property exists, there must and will be inequalities of fortune. [Thus, it is] impossible to uphold freedom of contract and the right of private property without at the same time recognizing as legitimate those inequalities of fortune that are the necessary result of the exercise of those rights. [And] since a State may not strike [those rights] down directly it is clear that it may not do so indirectly, as by declaring in effect that the public good requires the removal of those inequalities that are but the normal and inevitable result of their [exercise]. The police power is broad, [but] it cannot be given the wide scope that is here asserted for it, without in effect nullifying the constitutional guaranty.

b. Sunstein, Naked Preferences and the Constitution, 84 Colum. L. Rev. 1689, 1697, 1718 (1984):

In the Lochner era, the Court attempted to create a separate category of impermissible ends, using the libertarian framework of the common law as a theoretical basis. Under that framework, the government's police power was sharply limited, and modern social legislation [appeared] not as an effort to promote a public value, but instead as a raw exercise of political power by the beneficiaries of the legislation. But the theoretical basis of the Lochner era [is undermined once one recognizes] that the market status quo [is] itself the product of government choices. [Once it becomes] clear that harms produced by the marketplace [are themselves] the products of public choices, efforts to alleviate those harms [must] be regarded as permissible exercises of government power.

c. Siegan, supra, at 123–124:

[Judges] who had received their education [during] the Civil War era viewed labor [in light of the antislavery tradition]. Freedom of contract for both employer and employee was strongly espoused by the antislavery movement. It was accepted that the right of the individual to bestow his labor as he pleased was among the rights for which the Civil War had been fought. [Accordingly, the Court's] contention [that] government has no legitimate interest in [protecting labor] was far less controversial than contemporary generations might suppose. The Court believed that the labor market itself would operate to support the welfare of both workers and employers.

For evaluations of this “belief,” compare Kennedy, Distributive and Paternalistic Motives in Contract and Tort Law, with Special Reference to Compulsory Terms and Unequal Bargaining Power, 41 Md. L. Rev. 563 (1982), with Epstein, A Common Law for Labor Relations: A Critique of the New Deal Labor Legislation, 92 Yale L.J. 1357 (1983).

6. Lochner and the political process. Consider the following arguments.

a. Lochner is defensible in terms of “representation-reinforcement.” There are circumstances in which statutes owe their existence primarily to the organized power of special interest groups and are enacted even though the majority does not approve of them and even though the majority may be harmed by their operation. Indeed, the theory of “public choice” postulates certain conditions in which even a properly functioning democratic process will frequently thwart majority values. See Stigler, The Theory of Economic Regulation, 2 Bell J. Econ. & Mgmt. Sci. 3 (1971). The theory of “public choice” is examined in more detail in the context of the dormant commerce clause. See Chapter 2, section D, supra.

In Lochner itself, the New York statute was at least arguably the product of a political process in which labor unions had an organizational advantage (1) over consumers, who would ultimately pay for the regulation through higher prices for bread, and (2) over nonunionized, frequently immigrant workers who were willing or even eager to accept long-hour jobs in unregulated transactions with employers. Moreover, large employers and those already engaged in collective bargaining with unions had little incentive to oppose the legislation, for it simply imposed on all bakers regulations that had already been extracted in collective bargaining from some. In such circumstances, the unions were able, through maximum hour laws, to capture the legislative process to the disadvantage of the majority and to the disadvantage of otherwise competitive immigrant labor as well. The Court acted appropriately to rectify this defect in the operation of the representative process. For description of the political circumstances surrounding the adoption of the New York legislation, see D. Bernstein, Rehabilitating Lochner: Defending Individual Rights against Progressive Reform (2011); Siegan, supra, at 116–118; Tarrow, Lochner v. New York: A Political Analysis, 5 Lab. Hist. 277 (1964).

b. Lochner was wrongly decided because, as Justice Holmes recognized, the political process is inevitably a process of unprincipled compromises among competing social groups. Indeed, most “public policies are better explained as the outcome of a pure power struggle—clothed in a rhetoric of public interest that is a mere figleaf—among narrow interest or pressure groups.” Posner, The DeFunis Case and the Constitutionality of Preferential Treatment of Racial Minorities, 1974 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1, 27. The due process clause cannot logically prohibit legislatures from passing laws merely because powerful groups want and press for them. Such an approach would ultimately prove counterproductive, for, if the courts prevent powerful groups from having their way in the legislative process, the political pressures will be bottled up and eventually emerge in even more destructive forms elsewhere.

Consider the view that, ironically, even though Justice Holmes’s opinion denies that social Darwinism is constitutionally required, his own position rests on his general acceptance of social Darwinism: Note Holmes’s reference to “the natural outcome of a dominant opinion.” In another context, he wrote, “What proximate test of excellence can be found except correspondence to the actual equilibrium of force in the community—that is, conformity to the wishes of the dominant power. Of course, such conformity may lead to destruction, and it is desirable that the dominant power be wise. But wise or not, the proximate test of a good government is that the dominant power has its way.” Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes: His Book Notices and Uncollected Letters and Papers 250 (H.

C. Shriver ed. 1936). See generally A. Alschuler, Law without Values: The Life, Work, and Legacy of Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. (2002); Rogat, Mr. Justice Holmes: Some Modern Views—The Judge as Spectator, 31 U. Chi. L. Rev. 213 (1964).

7. Are the reports of Lochner's death premature? Consider Colby & Smith, The Return of Lochner, 100 Corn. L. Rev. 527 (2015):

[The] orthodoxy in modern conservative legal thought is on the verge of changing. There are increasing signs that the movement is ready, once again, to embrace Lochner—although perhaps not in name—by recommitting to some form of robust judicial protection for economic rights....

[Although] there are likely many factors contributing to this change, it has been greatly facilitated by important modifications to the theory of [originalism].

[Originalism] has slowly changed from a theory of judging, concerned principally with judicial restraint [to] an interpretive methodology that seeks objective semantic textual meaning. [Unlike] its forerunner, this “new originalism” can readily accommodate claims that the Fourteenth Amendment (and perhaps other provisions of the Constitution as well) protects an unenumerated right to freedom of contract.

As you read the material that follows, consider the extent to which Lochner-like ideas lie behind aspects of free speech, due process, takings clause, and state action doctrine. Notice also how the Court’s contemporary dormant commerce clause jurisprudence, discussed in Chapter II, section D arguably sometimes treat market allocations as constitutionally mandatory. Can these constitutional provisions be given meaning without reference to a presumptive baseline formed by market transactions?

8. Summary. Objections to the Lochner decision generally fall into two camps. Some are institutional and emphasize that the Court overstepped its bounds in relation to the legislature. These objections focus on the Court’s careful scrutiny of the means/ends connection and on its willingness to declare certain legislative ends impermissible. The problem here is that the Court interfered in a realm of policymaking; it does not matter what the basis for the interference was.

Other objections are substantive, in the sense that they have less to do with the role of the Court and more to do with the particular ideas at work in Lochner about the appropriate role of government. Here the problem is that the Court attempted to vindicate, as a matter of constitutional law, a laissez-faire conception of the role of government that could not be sustained. Under this view, Lochner saw the market status quo—market wages and prices—as a part of the state of nature rather than as a product of a set of legal choices defined in terms of common law categories. Lochner thus relied on a bad “baseline” from which to see whether there was impermissible redistribution. It took the existing distribution of rights and entitlements as a neutral or natural standpoint from which to see whether government had been impermissibly partisan.

Note that these two types of objections have very different implications. The institutional view suggests that courts should take a deferential approach to legislation—particularly in the realm of social and economic affairs. The substantive view leaves open the possibility that judicial deference might not be required if the Court acts in the service of some end other than laissez-faire.

Note: The Lochner Era, 1905–1934

From the decision in Lochner in 1905 to the mid-1950s, the Court invalidated approximately two hundred economic regulations, usually under the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment. These decisions centered primarily, although not exclusively, on labor legislation, the regulation of prices, and restrictions on entry into business. Although the Court employed substantive due process on many occasions, it sustained at least as many regulations as it struck down. See D. Bernstein, Lochner's Legacy's Legacy, 82 Tex. L. Rev. 1 (2003), for the suggestion with “a few famous exceptions,” the Court upheld redistributive measures. Moreover, as reflected in Lochner, the Court was often divided. Justices Holmes, Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo and Chief Justice Hughes dissented regularly from the Court’s invalidation of economic regulations. This Note describes some of the more significant decisions. For comprehensive surveys, see Bernstein, supra; F. Strong, Substantive Due Process of Law: A Dichotomy of Sense and Nonsense (1986); The Constitution of the United States 1602–1612, 1643–1709 (Government Printing Office 1973 ed.); B. Wright, The Growth of American Constitutional Law 153–168 (1942); Jacobson, Federalism and Property Rights, 15 N.Y.U. L.Q. Rev. 319 (1938).

1. Maximum hour legislation. Although the Court invalidated maximum hour legislation in Lochner, three years later, in Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908), the Court upheld a statute prohibiting the employment of women in laundries for more than ten hours per day. The Court distinguished Lochner on the ground that “woman’s physical structure” placed her at a disadvantage in the “struggle for subsistence” and legislation to protect women was thus “necessary to secure a real equality of right.” In Bunting v. Oregon, 243 U.S. 426 (1917), the Court, in a rather cryptic opinion, upheld a statute establishing a maximum ten-hour day for factory workers of both sexes. Although Bunting overruled the specific holding of Lochner sub silentio, the constitutional theory on which Lochner was based continued to be enforced.

2. “Yellow-dog” contracts. In Adair v. United States, 208 U.S. 161 (1908), and Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U.S. 1 (1915), the Court invalidated federal and state legislation forbidding employers to require employees to agree not to join a union. The Court observed in Adair that “it is not within the functions of government [to] compel any person in the course of his business [to] retain the personal services of another.” In Coppage, the Court emphasized that efforts to compensate for “unequal” bargaining power were beyond the legitimate scope of the police power and maintained that, although the individual has a right “to join the union, he has no inherent right to do this and still remain in the employ of one who is unwilling to employ a union man, any more than the same individual has a right to join the union without the consent of that organization.”

3. Minimum wages. Although Muller upheld a law establishing maximum working hours for women, the Court invalidated a law establishing minimum wages for women in Adkins v. Children’s Hospital, 261 U.S. 525 (1923). In distinguishing Muller, the Court observed:

But the ancient inequality of the sexes, otherwise than physical, [has] continued “with diminishing intensity.” In view of the great [changes] which have taken place since [Muller], in the contractual, political and civil status of women, culminating in the Nineteenth Amendment, it is not unreasonable to say that these differences have now come almost, if not quite, to the vanishing point. [Thus], while the physical differences must be recognized in appropriate cases, and legislation fixing hours or conditions of work may properly take them into account, we cannot accept the doctrine that women of mature age, sui juris, require or may be subjected to restrictions upon their liberty of contract which could not lawfully be imposed in the case of men under similar circumstances.

4. Price regulation. In a line of cases after Munn, the Court initially adopted a broad definition of “affected with a public interest” and thus upheld a wide range of laws regulating prices. See, e.g., German Alliance Insurance Co. v. Lewis, 233 U.S. 389 (1914) (fire insurance); Block v. Hirsh, 256 U.S. 135 (1921) (rental housing). Thereafter, the Court increasingly narrowed the Munn standard and invalidated laws regulating prices with regard to such matters as gasoline, Williams v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U.S. 235 (1929); employment agencies, Ribnik v. McBride, 277 U.S. 350 (1928); and theater tickets, Tyson &

Brother v. Banton, 273 U.S. 418 (1927).

5. Business entry. On several occasions, the Court invalidated laws restricting entry into particular lines of business. In New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262 (1932), for example, the Court invalidated a law prohibiting any person to manufacture ice without first obtaining a certificate of convenience and necessity. The Court explained that, as in the context of price regulation, the critical issue was “whether the business is [charged] with a public use,” for “a regulation which has the effect of denying [the] common right to engage in a lawful private business, such as that under review, cannot be upheld.” See also Louis K. Liggett Co. v. Baldridge, 278 U.S. 105 (1928) (invalidating a law limiting entry into the pharmacy business to pharmacists).

6. The demise of Lochner. As these decisions indicate, the Court’s decisions in the Lochner era were often inconsistent. The unifying theme seemed to be the Court’s perception of the “real” reason for the regulation. If the Court believed the regulation was truly designed to protect the health, safety, or morals of the general public, it was apt to uphold the law. But if the Court perceived the law to be an effort to readjust the market in favor of one party to the contract, it was more likely to hold the regulation invalid.

By the mid-1930s, the Court was prepared to abandon Lochner. This was due to changes in the composition of the Court, internal tensions in the doctrine, an attack on market ordering as a product of law and as sometimes inefficient and unjust, increasing judicial and academic criticism—and, perhaps most important, the economic realities of the Depression and President Franklin Delano Roosevelt’s New Deal, which seemed to undermine Lochner’s central premises.

NEBBIA v. NEW YORK, 291 U.S. 502 (1934). During 1932, the prices received by farmers for milk fell much below the cost of production, and the situation of the families of dairy producers in New York grew “desperate.” A legislative committee, established to investigate the matter, concluded that milk “is an essential item of diet,” and that the failure “of producers to receive a reasonable return for their labor and investment over an extended period threatens a relaxation of vigilance against contamination.” The committee further found that the “production and distribution of milk is a paramount industry of the state” and that the “milk industry is affected by factors of [price] instability [which] call for special methods of control.” The legislature thus established the Milk Control Board, which was authorized to fix minimum and maximum retail prices for milk. Nebbia, the owner of a grocery store in Rochester, was convicted of selling milk below the minimum price fixed by the board. The Court, in a five-to-four decision, upheld the law.

Justice Roberts delivered the opinion of the Court:

"The legislature adopted [the law] as a method of correcting the evils, which the report of the committee showed could not be expected to right themselves through the ordinary play of the forces of supply and demand, owing to the peculiar and uncontrollable factors affecting the industry. [Under] our form of government the use of property and the making of contracts are normally matters of private and not of public concern. The general rule is that both shall be free of governmental interference. But neither property rights nor contract rights are absolute; for government cannot exist if the citizen may at will use his property to the detriment of his fellows, or exercise his freedom of contract to work them harm. [Thus] has this court from the early days affirmed that the power to promote the general welfare is inherent in government. [These] correlative rights, that of the citizen to exercise exclusive dominion over property and freely to contract about his affairs, and that of the state to regulate the use of property and the conduct of business, are always in collision. [But] subject only to constitutional restraint the private right must yield to the public need.

"The Fifth Amendment, in the field of federal activity, and the Fourteenth, as respects state action, do not prohibit governmental regulation for the public welfare. They merely condition the exertion of the admitted power, by securing that the end shall be accomplished by methods consistent with due process. And the guaranty of due process, as has often been held, demands only that the law shall not be unreasonable, arbitrary or capricious, and that the means selected shall have a real and substantial relation to the object sought to be attained. [The] Constitution does not guarantee the unrestricted privilege to engage in a business or to conduct it as one pleases....

"But we are told that because the law essays to control prices it denies due process. Notwithstanding the admitted power to correct existing economic ills by appropriate regulation of business, [the] appellant urges that direct fixation of prices [is] per se unreasonable and unconstitutional, save as applied to businesses affected with a public interest; [and that no] business is so affected [unless it is in the nature of a public utility or a monopoly]. But this is a misconception. [There] is no closed class or category of businesses affected with a public interest, and the function of courts in the application of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments is to determine in each case whether circumstances vindicate the challenged regulation as a reasonable exertion of governmental authority or condemn it as arbitrary or discriminatory. [The] phrase 'affected with a public interest' can, in the nature of things, mean no more than that an industry, for adequate reason, is subject to control for the public good....

"So far as the requirement of due process is concerned, [a] state is free to adopt whatever economic policy may reasonably be deemed to promote public welfare, and to enforce that policy by legislation adapted to its purpose. The courts are without authority either to declare such policy, or, when it is declared by the legislature, to override it. [If] the legislative policy be to curb unrestrained and harmful competition [it] does not lie with the courts to determine that the rule is unwise. [Times] without number we have said that the legislature is primarily the judge of the necessity of such an enactment, that every possible presumption is in favor of its validity, and that though the court may hold views inconsistent with the wisdom of the law, it may not be annulled unless palpably in excess of legislative power. [Price] control, like any other form of regulation, is unconstitutional only if arbitrary, discriminatory, or demonstrably irrelevant to the policy the legislature is free to adopt, and hence an unnecessary and unwarranted interference with individual liberty."

Justice McReynolds, joined by Justices Van Devanter, Sutherland, and Butler, dissented.

WEST COAST HOTEL CO. v. PARRISH, 300 U.S. 379 (1937). In a five-to-four decision, the Court explicitly overruled Adkins v. Children's Hospital and upheld a state law establishing a minimum wage for women. Chief Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the Court:

"[The] violation alleged by those attacking minimum wage regulation for women is deprivation of freedom of contract. What is this freedom of contract? The Constitution does not speak of freedom of contract. It speaks of liberty and prohibits the deprivation of liberty without due process of law. [Regulation] which is reasonable in relation to its subject and is adopted in the interests of the community is due process....

"What can be closer to the public interest than the health of women and their protection from unscrupulous and overreaching employers? And if the protection of women is a legitimate end of the exercise of state power, how can it be said that the requirement of the payment of a minimum wage fairly fixed in order to meet the very necessities of existence is not an admissible means to that end? The legislature of the State was clearly entitled to consider the situation of women in employment, the fact that they are in the class receiving the least pay, that their bargaining power is relatively weak, and that they are the ready victims of those who would take advantage of their necessitous circumstances....

"There is an additional and compelling consideration which recent economic experience has brought into a strong light. The exploitation of a class of workers who are in an unequal position with respect to bargaining power and are thus relatively defenseless against the denial of a living wage is not only detrimental to their health and well being but casts a direct burden for their support upon the community. What these workers lose in wages the taxpayers are called upon to pay. The bare cost of living must be met. We may take judicial notice of the unparalleled demands for relief which arose during the recent period of depression. [The] community is not bound to provide what is in effect a subsidy for unconscionable employers. The community may direct its law-making power to correct the abuse which springs from their selfish disregard of the public interest. [Adkins] should be, and it is, overruled."

Justice Sutherland, joined by Justices Van Devanter, McReynolds, and Butler, dissented.

Note: The End of an Era

For discussion of the political context of West Coast Hotel, and the possible significance of President Roosevelt's "Court-packing plan," see Chapter 2, section C, supra. The decision may also have been influenced by extraordinary economic circumstances. The country was in the midst of the Great Depression, which caused massive economic dislocation and suffering and, some thought, threatened the very continuance of democratic governance.

However, the Court's disavowal of Lochner-style substantive due process review continued long after the immediate political and economic crisis had abated. In United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100 (1941), for example, the Court unanimously rejected a substantive due process challenge to the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act establishing maximum hours and minimum wages for all covered employees.

Later that term, in Phelps Dodge Corp. v. National Labor Relations Board, 313 U.S. 177 (1941), the Court upheld a provision of the National Labor Relations Act declaring it an unfair labor practice for an employer to encourage or discourage union membership. On the same day, in Olsen v. Nebraska, 313 U.S. 236 (1941), the Court unanimously upheld a state statute fixing the maximum fee that an employment agency could collect from employees, thus overruling Ribnik v. McBride, 277 U.S. 350 (1928). The Court observed that "the only constitutional prohibitions or restraints which respondents have suggested for invalidation of this legislation are those notions of public policy embodied in earlier decisions of this Court but which, as Mr. Justice Holmes long admonished, should not be read into the Constitution."

In Lincoln Federal Union v. Northwestern Iron & Metal Co., 335 U.S. 525 (1949), the Court upheld a state right-to-work law that prohibited closed shops. The Court explained that it had abandoned "the Allgeyer-Lochner-Adair- Coppage constitutional doctrine” and returned “to the earlier constitutional principle that states have power to legislate against what are found to be injurious practices in their internal commercial and business affairs, so long as their laws do not run afoul of some specific federal constitutional prohibition.” And in Day-Brite Lighting, Inc. v. Missouri, 342 U.S. 421 (1952), the Court upheld a law authorizing employees to take four hours’ leave with full pay on election day, noting that, “if our recent cases mean anything, they leave debatable issues as respects business, economic, and social affairs to legislative decision.” Consider the following three decisions.

UNITED STATES v. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO., 304 U.S. 144 (1938). After extensive hearings, two congressional committees made the following findings:

There is an extensive commerce in milk compounds made of condensed milk from which the butter fat has been extracted and an equivalent amount of vegetable oil [has been] substituted. [By] reason of the extraction of the natural milk fat the compounded product [known as “filled milk”] can be manufactured and sold at a lower cost than pure milk. Butter fat [is] rich in vitamins [that] are wanting in vegetable oils. The use of filled milk as a dietary substitute for pure milk results [in] undernourishment. [Despite] compliance with the branding and labeling requirements of the Pure Food and Drugs Act, there is widespread use of filled milk as a substitute for pure milk. This is aided by their identical taste and appearance, by the similarity of the containers in which they are sold, by the practice of dealers in offering the inferior product to customers as being as good as or better than pure condensed milk sold at a higher price, by customers’ ignorance of the respective food values of the two products, and in many sections of the country by their inability to read the labels.

Based on these findings, Congress enacted the Filled Milk Act of 1923, which declared that “filled milk” is an “adulterated article of food, injurious to the public health,” and that “its sale constitutes a fraud upon the public.” The act therefore prohibited any person to ship filled milk in interstate commerce. In Carolene Products, the Court upheld the act. Justice Stone delivered the opinion of the Court:

“We may assume for present purposes that no pronouncement of a legislature can forestall attack upon the constitutionality of [a prohibition] by applying opprobrious epithets to the prohibited act, and that a statute would deny due process which precluded the disproof in judicial proceedings of all facts which would show or tend to show that a statute depriving the suitor of life, liberty or property had a rational basis.

“But such we think is not the purpose [of] the statutory characterization of filled milk as injurious to health and as a fraud upon the public. There is no need to consider it here as more than a declaration of the legislative findings deemed to support and justify the action taken, [aiding] informed judicial review, as do the reports of legislative committees, by revealing the rationale of the legislation. Even in the absence of such aids the existence of facts supporting the legislative judgment is to be presumed, for regulatory legislation affecting ordinary commercial transactions is not to be pronounced unconstitutional unless in the light of the facts made known or generally assumed it is of such a character as to preclude the assumption that it rests upon some rational basis....

“Where the existence of a rational basis for legislation [depends] upon facts beyond the sphere of judicial notice, such facts may properly be made the subject of judicial inquiry, [and] the constitutionality of a statute predicated upon the existence of a particular state of facts may be challenged by showing to the court that those facts have ceased to exist. [Similarly] we recognize that the constitutionality of a statute, valid on its face, may be assailed by proof of facts tending to show that the statute as applied to a particular article is without support in reason because the article, although within the prohibited class, is so different from others of the class as to be without the reason for the prohibition, [though] the effect of such proof depends on the relevant circumstances of each case, as for example the administrative difficulty of excluding the article from the regulated class. [But] by their very nature such inquiries, where the legislative judgment is drawn in question, must be restricted to the issue whether any state of facts either known or which could reasonably be assumed affords support for it. Here the [appellee] challenges the validity of the statute on its face and it is evident from all the considerations presented to Congress, and those of which we may take judicial notice, that the question is at least debatable whether commerce in filled milk should be left unregulated, or in some measure restricted, or wholly prohibited. As that decision was for Congress, neither the finding of a court arrived at by weighing the evidence, nor the verdict of a jury can be substituted for it. [The act is] constitutional.”

Does Carolene Products accord too much deference to legislative judgment?

For a detailed study of the problem in Carolene Products, see Miller, The True Story of Carolene Products, 1988 Sup. Ct. Rev. 397, 398–399, claiming that the statute upheld in the case was an utterly unprincipled “example of special interest legislation.” The purported “public interest” justifications so credulously reported by Justice Stone were patently bogus....The consequence of the decision was to expropriate the property of a lawful and beneficial industry; to deprive working and poor people of a healthful, nutritious, and low-cost food; and to impair the health of the nation’s children by encouraging the use as baby food of a sweetened condensed milk product that was 42 percent sugar.

Suppose it is clear that Professor Miller’s account is accurate. Was the case wrongly decided?

WILLIAMSON v. LEE OPTICAL OF OKLAHOMA, 348 U.S. 483 (1955). An ophthalmologist is a licensed physician who specializes in the care of the eyes. An optometrist examines for refractive error, recognizes diseases of the eye, and fills prescriptions for eyeglasses. An optician is an artisan qualified to grind lenses, fill prescriptions, and fit frames. In Lee Optical, the Court considered the constitutionality of an Oklahoma statute that made it unlawful for an optician to fit or duplicate lenses without a prescription from an ophthalmologist or optometrist. The district court held that through “ordinary skills the optician could take a broken lens or a fragment thereof, measure its power, and reduce it to prescriptive terms,” that the requirement of a prescription from an ophthalmologist or optometrist was thus not “reasonably and rationally related to the health and welfare of the people,” and that the law therefore “violated the Due Process Clause by arbitrarily interfering with the optician’s right to do business.” The Supreme Court reversed. Justice Douglas delivered the opinion of the Court:

“The Oklahoma law may exact a needless, wasteful requirement in many cases. But it is for the legislature, not the courts, to balance the advantages and disadvantages of the new requirement. It appears that in many cases the optician can easily supply the new frames or new lenses without reference to the old written prescription. [But] in some cases the directions contained in the prescription are essential. [The] legislature might have concluded that the frequency of occasions when a prescription is necessary was sufficient to justify this regulation of the fitting of eyeglasses. [Or] the legislature may have concluded that eye examinations were so critical, not only for correction of vision but also for detection of latent ailments or diseases, that every change in frames and every duplication of a lens should be accompanied by a prescription from a medical expert. To be sure, the present law does not require a new examination of the eyes every time the frames are changed or the lenses duplicated. [But] the law need not be in every respect logically consistent with its aims to be constitutional. It is enough that there is an evil at hand for correction, and that it might be thought that the particular legislative measure was a rational way to correct it. [The] day is gone when this Court uses the Due Process Clause [to] strike down state laws, regulatory of business and industrial conditions, because they may be unwise, improvident, or out of harmony with a particular school of thought.”

FERGUSON v. SKRUPA, 372 U.S. 726 (1963). A Kansas statute declared it unlawful for any person to engage in the business of debt adjusting except as incident to “the lawful practice of law.” The statute defined “debt adjusting” as the making of a contract with a debtor whereby the debtor pays money periodically to the adjuster who then distributes it to the debtor’s creditors in accordance with an agreed-on plan. Skrupa, a debt adjuster who was put out of business by the statute, filed this action. The district court held that the statute was an unreasonable regulation of a “lawful business” and thus violative of due process. The Supreme Court reversed. Justice Black delivered the opinion of the Court:

“Under the system of government created by our Constitution, it is up to legislatures, not courts, to decide on the wisdom and utility of legislation. There was a time when the Due Process Clause was used by this Court to strike down laws which were thought unreasonable, that is, unwise or incompatible with some particular economic or social philosophy. [That doctrine] has long since been discarded. [It] is now settled that States ‘have power to legislate against what are found to be injurious practices in their internal commercial and business affairs, so long as their laws do not run afoul of some specific federal constitutional prohibition....’ [The] Kansas legislature was free to decide for itself that legislation was needed to deal with the business of debt adjusting. Unquestionably, there are arguments showing that the business of debt adjusting has social utility, but such arguments are properly addressed to the legislature, not to us. [The] Kansas debt adjusting statute may be wise or unwise. But relief, if any be needed, lies not with us but with the body constituted to pass laws for the State of Kansas.” Justice Harlan concurred in the judgment “on the ground that this state measure bears a rational relation to a constitutionally permissible objective. See [Lee Optical].”

Note: Pluralism, Naked Wealth Transfers, and the Courts

1. Economic substantive due process today. In Carolene Products, the Court indicated that it would uphold economic legislation if any state of facts either known or reasonably inferable could support the legislative judgment. In Lee Optical, however, the Court went even further and resorted to wholly hypothetical facts and reasons to sustain the legislation. And in Ferguson, the Court appeared to uphold the legislation without any inquiry into the rationality of the means/ends connection.

It has been argued that economic substantive due process review has become so deferential in the post-Lochner era in part because “a wide range of justifications count as exercises of the police power and are not treated as naked wealth transfers.” Sunstein, Naked Preferences and the Constitution, 84 Colum. L. Rev. 1689, 1718 (1984). Thus, almost all legislation—even that which reflects the untrammeled play of private self-interested groups, with the thinnest veil of public-regarding justifications—is upheld. In the post-Lochner era, what, if anything, constitutes an “impermissible” end? Are governmental actions based only on raw power and unsupported by any public value “impermissible”? Would Carolene Products, Lee Optical, and Ferguson pass muster under such a standard?

In any event, after decisions like Carolene Products, Lee Optical, and Ferguson, “there could be little doubt as to the practical result: no claim of substantive economic rights would now be sustained by the Supreme Court. The judiciary had abdicated the field.” McCloskey, Economic Due Process and the Supreme Court: An Exhumation and Reburial, 1962 Sup. Ct. Rev. 34, 38. Indeed, the Court has not invalidated an economic regulation on substantive due process grounds since 1937. For decisions rejecting substantive due process challenges to economic regulation, see, e.g., Texaco v. Short, 454 U.S. 516 (1982); PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74 (1980); Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental Study Group, Inc., 438 U.S. 59 (1978); Exxon Corp. v. Governor of Maryland, 437 U.S. 117 (1978). But cf. Stop the Beach Renourishment v. Florida Department of Environmental Protection, 560 U.S. 702 (2010), where Justice Kennedy, in an opinion joined by Justice Sotomayor, noted that “[if] a judicial decision, as opposed to an act of the executive or the legislature, eliminates an established property right, the judgment could be set aside as a deprivation of property without due process of law. The Due Process Clause, in both its substantive and procedural aspects, is a central limitation upon the exercise of judicial power.” Writing for a plurality of the Court on this point, Justice Scalia replied that “we have held for many years (logically or not) that the ‘liberties’ protected by Substantive Due Process do not include economic liberties. Justice Kennedy’s language propels us back to what is referred to (usually deprecatingly) as ‘the Lochner era.’”

2. Alternatives to abdication? Perhaps the Court has gone too far in its withdrawal from the substantive review of economic legislation. Should it continue to ask whether there was a substantial relationship between the statute at issue and legitimate statutory ends? Consider B. Siegan, Economic Liberties and the Constitution 260, 262, 284, 302–303 (1980):

The low esteem in which economic due process is held suggests to many that judicial review of economic matters is undesirable and harmful and that the judiciary should accept without reservation almost all legislative and administrative solutions to social and economic problems. Society was worse off, the proponents of this approach contend, as a result of the interventions of the “laissez-faire” Court. [But] studies effectively disclose the error in [the] New Deal emphasis on government intervention to solve existing economic problems. The studies demonstrate that the very people who [most] require the regulators’ assistance—those at the lower end of the economic spectrum—actually suffer greatly from regulation. [The studies] are proving the wisdom of the Old Court’s guiding principle, that freedom of contract is the rule and restraint the exception. [The] conclusion is warranted that the Old Court’s policy of review is [preferable] to the contemporary Supreme Court’s abdication.

But see Elhauge, Does Interest Group Theory Justify More Intrusive Judicial Review?, 101 Yale L.J. 31 (1991). Elhauge offers a number of arguments in favor of a negative answer to the conclusion posed in his title. He argues:

What interest group theory does identify are the factors that make certain groups more willing than others to expend resources on petitioning for governmental action. However, identifying those factors cannot alone demonstrate which groups’ petitioning efforts are normatively disproportionate. Such a normative conclusion is only possible if we have some baseline for determining what level of petitioning activity is normatively proportional to each group’s interest. Interest group theory does not itself provide such a normative baseline. Rather, implicit normative baselines are adopted, usually without any discussion, when analysis draws normative implications from the degree of political influence predicted by interest group theory.

Elhauge also claims that “interest group theory does not establish...that the litigation process is, overall, less defective than the political process,” and that “more intrusive judicial review would have several adverse effects on the transaction costs of legal change.”

3. The implications of abdication: the decline of Lochner and the doctrine of governmental action. Consider the following view: The position suggested in West Coast Hotel and other decisions marking the decline of Lochner—that government's apparent failure to act may in some circumstances amount to governmental action—does not justify judicial abdication as a general rule. To the contrary, the understanding that the “private” sphere is itself a governmental creation suggests that a wide range of practices might be vulnerable to constitutional attack. Perhaps most dramatically, the existence of poverty itself may be understood as in part the product of governmental “action.” In fact President Roosevelt himself came to propose a second bill of rights, including the right to a useful and remunerative job; the right to a decent home; the right to adequate medical care and the opportunity to achieve and enjoy good health; and the right to a good education. See C. Sunstein, The Second Bill of Rights (2004). Many modern constitutions, in fact, recognize rights of this sort, as does the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. See id.

Alternatively: Some redistributions are in fact unprincipled and in fact hurt only the vulnerable members of society—including those nominally designed to help the disadvantaged. The wholesale exclusion of debt adjusters from the marketplace might well be an example; so, too, with the burdens placed on opticians. Is it so clear that the courts should do nothing about this? In this connection, consider the following:

The demise of the laissez-faire jurisprudence of the Lochner era [came] at a most inopportune time for black Americans. Federal labor law and policy of the 1930s cartelized the labor market on behalf of racist labor unions, while black workers remained unprotected by civil rights legislation. Lochner-style judicial intervention to protect free labor markets could have saved hundreds of thousands [of] blacks from being permanently deprived of their livelihoods. [It] is possible to imagine that but for the interruption of the Great Depression and the New Deal, entirely different forms of civil rights protections would have arisen—a laissez-faire combination of equal protection of the law, liberty of contract, and freedom of association, instead of the more statist combination of interest group liberalism, the welfare state, and government enforcement of nondiscrimination norms against private parties.

Bernstein, Roots of the “Underclass”: The Decline of Laissez-Faire Jurisprudence and the Rise of Racist Labor Legislation, 43 Am. U. L. Rev. 85, 86–87, 135 (1993).

4. The implications of abdication: The decline of Lochner and the rise of the “double standard.” Why is there a “presumption of constitutionality” when the Court reviews economic legislation? Does this presumption govern all constitutional review? All substantive due process review? All substantive due process review except where the right at issue is expressly guaranteed in the bill of rights? All substantive due process review except where the right at issue is “fundamental”?

Consider Justice Stone’s famous footnote 4 in Carolene Products:

There may be narrower scope for operation of the presumption of constitutionality when legislation appears on its face to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution, such as those of the first ten amendments, which are deemed equally specific when held to be embraced within the Fourteenth....

It is unnecessary to consider now whether legislation which restricts those political processes [such as voting, expression, and political association] which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation, is to be subjected to more exacting judicial scrutiny under the general prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment than are most other types of legislation....

Nor need we enquire whether similar considerations enter into the review of statutes directed at particular religious, [or] national, [or] racial minorities[;]
whether prejudice against discrete and insular minorities may be a special condition, which tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities, and which may call for a correspondingly more searching judicial inquiry.

For an interesting account of the origins of footnote 4, see Lusky, Footnote Redux: A Carolene Products Reminiscence, 82 Colum. L. Rev. 1093 (1982).

E. FUNDAMENTAL INTERESTS AND THE EQUAL PROTECTION CLAUSE

This section explores the intersection of equal protection and implied fundamental rights jurisprudence. Chapter 5, supra, examined two basic models of equal protection analysis. The first model focuses on classification based on race or other “suspect” criteria. As we saw, the Court tests such classifications by varying forms of “strict” scrutiny. The second model focuses on classifications in the economic and social realm that do not involve “suspect” criteria. As we also saw, the Court tests such classifications by a highly usually deferential form of “rational basis” review, similar to the standard that the Court currently employs in considering substantive due process challenges to economic regulation.

This section asks whether there is a third model of equal protection analysis. That is: Should the degree of scrutiny vary not only with the “suspectness” of the criterion on which the classification is based but also with the “importance” or “fundamentality” of the interest that is distributed or affected “unequally”? Should inequalities involving “fundamental” interests be analyzed differently from inequalities involving “nonfundamental” interests? The inquiry is relevant here because the “fundamentality” of the interest is sometimes implied without clear textual support. Consider in this regard whether or how fundamental interest equal protection review differs from substantive due process review.

Skinner v. Oklahoma

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case touches a sensitive and important area of human rights. Oklahoma deprives certain individuals of a right which is basic to the perpetuation of a race—the right to have offspring....

The statute involved is Oklahoma’s Habitual Criminal Sterilization Act. That Act defines an “habitual criminal” as a person who [has been convicted three] or more times for crimes “amounting to felonies involving moral turpitude.” [Machinery] is provided for the institution by the Attorney General of a proceeding against such a person in the Oklahoma courts for a judgment that such person shall be rendered sexually sterile. [If] the court or jury finds that the defendant is an “habitual criminal” and that he “may be rendered sexually sterile without detriment to his or her general health,” then the court “shall render judgment to the effect that said defendant be rendered sexually sterile” by the operation of vasectomy in case of a male, and of salpingectomy in case of a female. Only one other provision of the Act is material here, and that provides that “offenses arising out of the violation of the prohibitory laws, revenue acts, embezzlement, or political offenses, shall not come or be considered within the terms of this Act.”

Petitioner was convicted in 1926 of the crime of stealing chickens, [and in 1929 and 1934] he was convicted of robbery with firearms. [In] 1936 the Attorney General instituted proceedings against him. [A] judgment directing that the operation of vasectomy be performed on petitioner was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Oklahoma....

[The Act fails] to meet the requirements of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

We do not stop to point out all of the inequalities in this Act. A few examples will suffice. In Oklahoma, [a] clerk who appropriates over $20 from his employer's till and a stranger who steals the same amount are [both] guilty of felonies. If the latter repeats his act and is convicted three times, he may be sterilized. But the clerk is not subject to the pains and penalties of the Act no matter how large his embezzlements nor how frequent his convictions. A person who enters a chicken coop and steals chickens commits a felony and he may be sterilized if he is thrice convicted. If, however, he is a bailee of the property and fraudulently appropriates it, he is an embezzler. Hence, no matter how habitual his proclivities for embezzlement are and no matter how often his conviction, he may not be sterilized. Thus, the nature of the two crimes is intrinsically the same and they are punishable in the same manner....

[If] we had here only a question as to a State's classification of crimes, such as embezzlement or larceny, no substantial federal question would be raised. [For] a State is not constrained in the exercise of its police power to ignore experience which marks a class of offenders or a family of offenses for special treatment. Nor is it prevented by the equal protection clause from confining "its restrictions to those classes of cases where the need is deemed to be clearest."...

But the instant legislation runs afoul of the equal protection clause, though we give Oklahoma that large deference which the rule of the foregoing cases requires. We are dealing here with legislation which involves one of the basic civil rights of man. Marriage and procreation are fundamental to the very existence and survival of the race. The power to sterilize, if exercised, may have subtle, far-reaching and devastating effects. In evil or reckless hands it can cause races or types which are inimical to the dominant group to wither and disappear. There is no redemption for the individual whom the law touches. Any experiment which the State conducts is to his irreparable injury. He is forever deprived of a basic liberty. We mention these matters not to reexamine the scope of the police power of the States. We advert to them merely in emphasis of our view that strict scrutiny of the classification which a State makes in a sterilization law is essential, lest unwittingly, or otherwise, invidious discriminations are made against groups or types of individuals in violation of the constitutional guaranty of just and equal laws. The guaranty of "equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws." When the law lays an unequal hand on those who have committed intrinsically the same quality of offense and sterilizes one and not the other, it has made as invidious a discrimination as if it had selected a particular race or nationality for oppressive treatment....

Reversed.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE STONE, concurring.

I concur in the result, but I am not persuaded that we are aided in reaching it by recourse to the equal protection clause.

If Oklahoma may resort generally to the sterilization of criminals on the assumption that their propensities are transmissible to future generations by inheritance, I seriously doubt that the equal protection clause requires it to apply the measure to all criminals in the first instance, or to none.

Moreover, if we must presume that the legislature knows—what science has been unable to ascertain—that the criminal tendencies of any class of habitual offenders are transmissible regardless of the varying mental characteristics of its individuals, I should suppose that we must likewise presume that the legislature, in its wisdom, knows that the criminal tendencies of some classes of offenders are more likely to be transmitted than those of others. And so I think the real question we have to consider is not one of equal protection, but whether the wholesale condemnation of a class to such an invasion of personal liberty, without opportunity to any individual to show that his is not the type of case which would justify resort to it, satisfies the demands of due process.

There are limits to the extent to which the presumption of constitutionality can be pressed, especially where the liberty of the person is concerned (see United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 152, n.4) and where the presumption is resorted to only to dispense with a procedure which the ordinary dictates of prudence would seem to demand for the protection of the individual from arbitrary action. Although petitioner here was given a hearing to ascertain whether sterilization would be detrimental to his health, he was given none to discover whether his criminal tendencies are of an inheritable type....

[A] law which condemns, without hearing, all the individuals of a class to so harsh a measure as the present because some or even many merit condemnation, is lacking in the first principles of due process. [The] state is called on to sacrifice no permissible end when it is required to reach its objective by a reasonable and just procedure adequate to safeguard rights of the individual which concededly the Constitution protects.

[A concurring opinion of Justice Jackson is omitted.]

Note: The Fundamental “Right to Have Offspring”

1. Equal protection or due process? Note that the state could cure the equal protection problem by extending the sterilization penalty to a larger class of offenders. If sterilization invades a fundamental right, how is the situation made better by invading the rights of a larger group of people?

2. “Fundamental” interests and the equal protection clause. Skinner might be thought inconsistent with the Court’s essentially contemporaneous renunciation of economic substantive due process. Can the right to have offspring, unlike the liberty of contract, be thought to be a true “fundamental” right? Or is fundamental interest analysis more appropriate in equal protection jurisprudence than in due process jurisprudence?

Consider the following arguments: (a) Inequality with respect to a trivial interest is not as significant as inequality with respect to an important interest. (b) Inequality with respect to a fundamental interest is inherently irrational unless there are very good reasons for the inequality. (c) Inequality with respect to a fundamental interest suggests a possible improper motivation, for it is unlikely that those who framed the classification would have deprived themselves of the fundamental interest in the absence of extraordinary necessity. (d) The 1866 Civil Rights Act, on which the fourteenth amendment was based, protected African Americans against inequality only with respect to certain specified interests, thus suggesting that the importance of the interest affected is central to the constitutionality of a classification.

3. Is the “right to have offspring” a “fundamental” interest? Is it more “fundamental” than the “liberty of contract”? Suppose that Oklahoma sentenced some, but not all felons to life imprisonment without conjugal visits. Would such a sentence violate the equal protection clause? Consider the following views:

a. “[The] Court in Skinner was moved to recognize the fundamental personal character of a right to reproductive autonomy in part because of fear about the invidious and potentially genocidal way in which governmental control over reproductive matters might be exercised if the choice of whether or when to beget a child were to be transferred from the individual to the state.” L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 923 (1978). Note in this regard that the statutory distinction in Skinner was itself at least arguably class-based. White-collar crimes, and others likely to be committed by those relatively better off, would not be punished with sterilization. Should this bear on the equal protection issue?

b. “[The] right of procreation [rests] most securely on the interest in status and dignity. [The] choice to be [a] parent is, among other things, a choice of social role and of self-concept. For the state to deny such a choice is for the organized society to deny the individual [the] presumptive right to be treated as a person, one of equal worth among citizens.” Karst, Foreword: Equal Citizenship under the Fourteenth Amendment, 91 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 32 (1977). On this view, would a statute prohibiting in vitro fertilization be unconstitutional as applied to a woman who could not otherwise become pregnant?

c. Skinner was simply wrong. The case is an example of the proposition that hard cases make bad law. Lacking a secure constitutional foundation for invalidating an oppressive law, the Court just made it up.

4. A right not to have offspring? In Skinner, the Court held that the right to have offspring is “fundamental.” Is there also a fundamental right not to have offspring? Suppose, for example, that a married couple uses in vitro fertilization and freezes some of the resulting preembryos. If the parties then divorce, is it constitutional for the state to permit the wife to implant these preembryos if the husband objects? For an argument that there is no right not to be a genetic parent when genetic parenthood is divorced from gestational and legal parenthood, see Cohen, The Constitution and the Rights Not to Procreate, 60 Stan. L. Rev. 1135 (2008). See section F infra.

1. Voting

In footnote 4 of Carolene Products, Chief Justice Stone suggested that there “may be a narrower scope for operation of the presumption of constitutionality when [legislation] restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation.” He then offered “restrictions upon the right to vote” as a specific example. This section examines three aspects of the right to vote: denial of the right to vote, dilution of the right to vote, and denial of access to the ballot.

a. Denial of the “Right to Vote”

The original Constitution left the states free determine the qualifications of voters for both national and state elections, requiring only that electors for the House of Representatives “shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature.” See U.S. Const, art. I, §2, cl. 1; art. II, §1, cl. 2. The fourteenth amendment, enacted in 1868, did not directly prohibit discrimination in voting. Section 2 of the amendment, however, provided for a reduction in representation in the House of Representatives in proportion to the number of “male inhabitants of [the] State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States,” who were not permitted to vote. The fifteenth amendment, adopted in 1870, provided that the right of citizens to vote “shall not be denied or abridged [on] account of race, color or previous condition of servitude.” The nineteenth amendment, enacted in 1920, provided that the right of citizens to vote “shall not be denied or abridged [on] account of sex.” The twenty-fourth amendment, adopted in 1964, provided that the right of any citizen to vote in any election for president, vice-president, or members of Congress “shall not be denied or abridged [by] reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax.” And the twenty-sixth amendment, enacted in 1971, provided that the right of any citizen eighteen years or older to vote “shall not be denied or abridged [on] account of age.”

Until the 1960s, the Court generally deferred to the states in determining the qualifications to vote except where a particular qualification was expressly prohibited by a specific amendment. In Breedlove v. Suttles, 302 U.S. 277 (1937), for example, the Court unanimously upheld a Georgia statute requiring the payment of a $1 poll tax as a precondition for voting. Similarly, in Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections, 360 U.S. 45 (1959), the Court unanimously upheld a North Carolina statute providing that to be eligible to vote an individual must “be able to read and write any section of the [state constitution] in the English language.” The Court said that “in our society where newspapers, periodicals, books, and other printed matter canvass and debate campaign issues, a State might conclude that only those who are literate should exercise the franchise.”

In 1964, however, in Reynolds v. Sims, section E1b, infra, a decision involving dilution of the right to vote, the Court observed: “[The] right of suffrage is a fundamental matter in a free and democratic society. Especially since the right to exercise the franchise in a free and unimpaired manner is preservative of other basic civil and political rights, any alleged infringement of the right of citizens to vote must be carefully and meticulously scrutinized.” Reynolds opened the door to a more active judicial scrutiny of voter qualifications.

Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections
383 U.S. 663 (1966)

[The Court, overruling Breedlove v. Suttles, invalidated a Virginia law requiring the payment of a poll tax not to exceed $1.50 as a precondition for voting. The Court held that “a State violates the Equal Protection Clause [whenever] it makes the affluence of the voter or payment of any fee an electoral standard.”]

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court....

[The] right to vote in state elections is nowhere expressly mentioned [in the Constitution]. It is argued that the right to vote in state elections is implicit, particularly by reason of the First Amendment. [We] do not stop to canvass the relation between voting and political expression. For it is enough to say that once the franchise is granted to the electorate, lines may not be drawn which are inconsistent with the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment....

[The] Lassiter case does not govern the result here, because, unlike a poll tax, the “ability to read and write...has some relation to standards designed to promote intelligent use of the ballot.” [Voter] qualifications have no relation to wealth nor to paying or not paying this or any other tax....

It is argued that a State may exact fees from citizens for many different kinds of licenses; that if it can demand from all an equal fee for a driver’s license, it can demand from all an equal poll tax for voting. But we must remember that the interest of the State, when it comes to voting, is limited to the power to fix qualifications. Wealth, like race, creed, or color, is not germane to one’s ability to participate intelligently in the electoral process. Lines drawn on the basis of wealth or property, like those of race [are] traditionally disfavored. See [Griffin v. Illinois and Douglas v. California, section E2, infra]. To introduce wealth or payment of a fee as a measure of a voter’s qualifications is to introduce a capricious or irrelevant factor....

We agree, of course, with Mr. Justice Holmes that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment “does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer’s Social Statics.” [Lochner.] Likewise, the Equal Protection Clause is not shackled to the political theory of a particular era. In determining what lines are unconstitutionally discriminatory, we have never been confined to historic notions of [equality]. Notions of what constitutes equal treatment for purposes of the Equal Protection Clause do change. [Comparing Plessy v. Ferguson with Brown v. Board of Education.]

[We] have long been mindful that where fundamental rights and liberties are asserted under the Equal Protection Clause, classifications which might invade or restrain them must be closely scrutinized and carefully confined. See, e.g., [Skinner].

Those principles apply here. For to repeat, wealth or fee paying has, in our view, no relation to voting qualifications; the right to vote is too precious, too fundamental to be so burdened or conditioned.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, dissenting....

[Under] a proper interpretation of the Equal Protection Clause States are to have the broadest kind of leeway in areas where they have a general constitutional competence to act. [State] poll tax legislation can “reasonably,” “rationally” and without an “invidious” or evil purpose to injure anyone be found to rest on a number of state policies including (1) the State’s desire to collect its revenue, and (2) its belief that voters who pay a poll tax will be interested in furthering the State's welfare when they vote. [And] history is on the side of "rationality" of the State's poll tax policy. Property qualifications existed in the Colonies and were continued by many States after the Constitution was adopted....

Another reason for my dissent [is that the Court] seems to be using the old "natural-law-due-process formula" to justify striking down state laws as violations of the Equal Protection Clause....

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART joins, dissenting....

[The Court uses] captivating phrases, but they are wholly inadequate to satisfy the standard governing adjudication of the equal protection issue: Is there a rational basis for Virginia's poll tax as a voting qualification? I think the answer to that question is undoubtedly "yes."

Property qualifications and poll taxes have been a traditional part of our political structure. In the Colonies the franchise was generally a restricted one. [It] is certainly a rational argument that payment of some minimal poll tax promotes civic responsibility, weeding out those who do not care enough about public affairs to pay $1.50 or thereabouts a year for the exercise of the franchise. It is also arguable, indeed it was probably accepted as sound political theory by a large percentage of Americans through most of our history, that people with some property have a deeper stake in community affairs, and are consequently more responsible, more educated, more knowledgeable, more worthy of confidence, than those without means, and that the community and Nation would be better managed if the franchise were restricted to such citizens....

Note: Is the Right to Vote "Fundamental"?

1. The basis of Harper: wealth as a "suspect classification." The Court relied in Harper on both the "suspect classification" and the "fundamental interest" aspects of equal protection analysis. To what extent, if any, can Harper be explained on the ground that "lines drawn on the basis of wealth [are] traditionally disfavored"? Consider that (a) the poll tax does not expressly classify on the basis of wealth; (b) like ordinary license fees, and indeed any system that requires an expenditure, it might be seen to have a differential effect on the poor; and (c) the Court invalidated the poll tax in its entirety, not only as applied to the poor.

2. The basis of Harper: voting as a fundamental interest. The Harper Court assumed that there is no constitutional right to vote in state elections. This view is endorsed by some, but not all commentators. See R. Berger, Government by Judiciary ch. 4 (1977). But cf. Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112, 229 (1970) (Brennan, J.); Van Alstyne, The Fourteenth Amendment, the “Right” to Vote, and the Understanding of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, 1965 Sup. Ct. Rev. 33. Given the Court’s assumption, how does it justify its conclusion that the right to vote is “fundamental”?

Consider J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust 77, 101–103 (1980):

Malfunction occurs when [the] ins are choking off the channels of political change to ensure that they will stay in and the outs will stay out. [Unblocking] stoppages in the democratic process is what judicial review ought preeminently to be about, and denial of the vote seems the quintessential stoppage. [We] cannot trust the ins to decide who stays out, and it is therefore incumbent on the courts to ensure not only that no one is denied the vote for no reason, but also that where there is a reason [it] had better be a very convincing one.

3. Bush v. Gore. In connection with the putative “fundamental” character of the right to vote, consider the Supreme Court decision that brought to a conclusion the disputed presidential election of 2000. (The decision is explored more generally in Chapter 1, section F3, supra.) With the presidential candidates separated by no more than a few hundred votes and the deadline for the casting of electoral ballots fast approaching, the Florida Supreme Court ordered a statewide, manual recount of all ballots on which the voting machines had failed to detect a vote for president. In Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98 (2000), the Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision, reversed. In a per curiam opinion, joined by five justices, the Court held that the failure of the Florida court to specify standards for determining which votes would count violated the equal protection clause:

When the state legislature vests the right to vote for President in its people, the right to vote as the legislature has prescribed is fundamental; and one source of its fundamental nature lies in the equal weight accorded to each vote and the equal dignity owned to each voter....

The right to vote is protected in more than the initial allocation of the franchise. Equal protection applies as well to the manner of its exercise. Having once granted the right to vote on equal terms, the State may not, by later arbitrary and disparate treatment, value one person’s vote over that of another....

The recount mechanisms implemented in response to the decisions of the Florida Supreme Court do not satisfy the minimum requirement for non-arbitrary treatment of voters necessary to secure the fundamental right. [The] problem inheres in the absence of specific standards to ensure [equal] application. The formulation of uniform rules to determine intent based on [recurring] circumstances is practicable and, we conclude, necessary....

Our consideration is limited to the present circumstances, for the problem of equal protection in election processes generally presents many complexities.

The question before the Court is not whether local entities, in the exercise of their expertise, may develop different systems for implementing elections. Instead, we are presented with a situation where a state court with the power to assure uniformity has ordered a statewide recount with minimal procedural safeguards. When a court orders a statewide remedy, there must be at least some assurance that the rudimentary requirements of equal treatment and fundamental fairness are satisfied.

The Court went on to hold that it was impossible to conduct a recount satisfying equal protection standards before the deadline specified in 3 U.S.C. §5, which made conclusive state resolutions of election controversies if the determination was made at least six days prior to the date for the casting of electoral votes. (By the time the Court rendered its decision, this deadline was only hours away.) The Court also determined that the Florida legislature intended to take advantage of this “safe harbor.” Accordingly, the Court held that the recount could not proceed. Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justices Scalia and Thomas, wrote a concurring opinion. Justices Souter and Breyer both wrote opinions in which they agreed with the majority that the absence of uniform standards for the recount created constitutional difficulties. However, both would have remanded the case to the Florida court so that it could formulate such standards. Justices Ginsburg and Stevens also wrote dissenting opinions.

Does the result in Bush v. Gore follow from Harper? Note that Florida had a decentralized voting system under which the ballots had been counted in different ways before the recount was ordered. The Court nowhere suggested that the initial balloting was unconstitutional. From a constitutional perspective, did the recount make things worse or better?

Kramer v. Union Free School District
395 U.S. 621 (1969)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Section 2012] of the New York Education Law [provides] that in certain New York school districts residents [may] vote in the school district election only if they (1) own (or lease) taxable real property within the district, or (2) are parents (or have custody of) children enrolled in the local public schools. Appellant, a bachelor who neither owns nor leases taxable real property, [claims] that §2012 denied him equal protection of the laws....

In determining whether or not [this] law violates the Equal Protection Clause, [we] must give the statute a close and exacting examination. [This] careful examination is necessary because statutes distributing the franchise constitute the foundation of our representative society.

[Statutes] granting the franchise to residents on a selective basis always pose the danger of denying some citizens any effective voice in the governmental affairs which substantially affect their lives. Therefore, if a challenged state statute grants the right to vote to some bona fide residents of requisite age and citizenship and denies the franchise to others, the Court must determine whether the exclusions are necessary to promote a compelling state interest.

[The] presumption of constitutionality and the approval given “rational” classifications in other types of enactments are based on an assumption that the institutions of state government are structured so as to represent fairly all the people. However, when the challenge to the statute is in effect a challenge of this basic assumption, the assumption can no longer serve as the basis for presuming constitutionality. And, the assumption is no less under attack because the legislature which decides who may participate at the various levels of political choice is fairly elected. Legislation which delegates decision making to bodies elected by only a portion of those eligible to vote for the legislature can cause unfair representation....

[We] turn therefore to question whether the exclusion is necessary to promote a compelling state interest. [Appellees] argue that the State has a legitimate interest in limiting the franchise in school district elections [to] those “primarily interested in such elections” [and] that the State may reasonably and permissibly conclude that “property taxpayers” (including lessees of taxable property who share the tax burden through rent payments) and parents of the children enrolled in the district’s schools are those “primarily interested” in school affairs....

We need express no opinion as to whether the State in some circumstances might limit the exercise of the franchise to those “primarily interested” or “primarily affected.” [For,] assuming, arguendo, that New York legitimately might limit the franchise in these school district elections to those “primarily interested in school affairs,” close scrutiny of the §2012 classifications demonstrates that they do not accomplish this purpose with sufficient precision to justify denying appellant the franchise.

[The] requirements of §2012 are not sufficiently tailored to limiting the franchise to those “primarily interested” in school affairs to justify the denial of the franchise to appellant and members of his class....

MR. JUSTICE STEWART, with whom MR. JUSTICE BLACK and MR. JUSTICE HARLAN join, dissenting....

Clearly a State may reasonably assume that its residents have a greater stake in the outcome of elections held within its boundaries than do other persons. Likewise, it is entirely rational for a state legislature to suppose that residents, being generally better informed regarding state affairs than are nonresidents, will be more likely than nonresidents to vote responsibly. And the same may be said of legislative assumptions regarding the electoral competence of adults and literate persons on the one hand, and of minors and illiterates on the other. It is clear, of course, that lines thus drawn cannot infallibly perform their intended legislative function. Just as “[i]lliterate people may be intelligent voters,” nonresidents or minors might also in some instances be interested, informed, and intelligent participants in the electoral process.

[Nor] is there any other justification for imposing the Court’s “exacting” equal protection test. This case does not involve racial classifications [and] this statute is not one that impinges upon a constitutionally protected right, [for] “the Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one.”...

Note: Kramer and Its Progeny

In examining the Court’s decisions in the line inaugurated by Kramer, consider what the Court means in this context by “strict scrutiny.”

1. The meaning of strict scrutiny. In the wake of Kramer, the Court has drawn an uncertain line between permissible and impermissible voting qualifications. For example, it has invalidated most property ownership requirements, see In Cipriano v. City of Houma, 395 U.S. 701 (1969); Phoenix v. Kolodziejski, 399 U.S. 204 (1970), but upheld them for “limited purpose governmental units. See Salyer Land Co. v. Tulare Lake Basin Water Storage District, 410 U.S. 719 (1973) (upholding a California statute permitting only landowners to vote in water storage district elections and allocating votes in proportion to the assessed valuation of the land); Ball v. James, 451 U.S. 355 (1981) (upholding a “one acre—one vote” scheme for voting for directors of a large water reclamation district in Arizona). It invalidated a one-year residency requirement in Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330 (1972), but upheld a fifty-day requirement in Marston v. Lewis, 410 U.S. 679 (1973), and Burns v. Fortson, 410 U.S. 686 (1973). See also McDonald v. Board of Election Commissioners, 394 U.S. 802 (1969) (upholding an Illinois statute that granted absentee ballots to some classes of persons but not to “unsentenced inmates awaiting trial” in circumstances where nothing in the record indicated that inmates could not vote at polling places); O’Brien v. Skinner, 414 U.S. 524 (1974) (invalidating a statute prohibiting absentee ballots for some persons incarcerated while awaiting trial when other inmates were granted absentee ballots); Richardson v. Ramirez, 418 U.S. 24 (1974) (upholding a statute that denied the vote to convicted felons even if they had completed their sentences and paroles). Compare Rosario v. Rockefeller, 410 U.S. 752 (1973) upholding a statute requiring voters to register their party affiliation at least thirty days before a general election in order to be eligible to vote in the next party primary) with Kusper v. Pontikes, 414 U.S. 51 (1973) (invalidating a statute that prohibited any person “from voting in the primary election of a political party if he has voted in the primary of any other party within the preceding 23 months”).

2. Strict scrutiny for laws requiring proof of voter qualification? In Crawford v. Marion County Election Board, 553 U.S. 181 (2008), the Court rejected a facial challenge to an Indiana statute that required citizens to present a government-issued photo identification before voting. The state offered free photo identification to qualified voters who could establish their residence and identity. An indigent voter, or one who had a religious objection to being photographed, could cast a provisional ballot that would be counted only if she executed an appropriate affidavit with a circuit county clerk within ten days following the election. Voters who had photo identification but were unable to present the identification on election day could also file provisional ballots that would be counted if they brought photo identification to the clerk’s office within the ten-day period.

Writing for himself, Chief Justice Roberts, and Justice Kennedy, Justice Stevens stated that the strict scrutiny applied in Harper was inapplicable because this was not a case where the restriction was an invidious limitation unrelated to voter qualifications. Instead, he applied the “general rule” that required the court to “identify and evaluate the interests put forward by the State as justifications for the burden imposed by its rule, and then make the ‘hard judgment’ that our adversary system demands.”

In support of the rule, Justice Stevens emphasized the need to prevent voter fraud. Although noting that “[the] record contains no evidence of any such [in-person] fraud actually occurring in Indiana at any time in its history,” the Court observed that there had been “flagrant examples of such fraud in other parts of the country” and that “[there] is no question about the legitimacy or importance of the State’s interest in counting only the votes of eligible voters.”

In Justice Stevens’s view, this interest counterbalanced the burden placed upon voters who lacked, or failed to produce, photo identification.

[On] the basis of the record that has been made in this litigation, we cannot conclude that the statute imposes “excessively burdensome requirements” on any class of voters. A facial challenge must fail where the statute has a “plainly legitimate sweep.” When we consider only the statute’s broad application to all Indiana voters we conclude that it “imposes only a limited burden on voters’ rights.”

Justice Scalia, joined by Justices Thomas and Alito, concurred in the judgment. Although agreeing with Justice Stevens’s conclusion, Justice Scalia would have applied “deferential” scrutiny on the ground that strict scrutiny was appropriate only for laws that “severely restrict the right to vote.”

Justice Souter filed a dissenting opinion in which Justice Ginsburg joined. Justice Breyer also filed a dissenting opinion.

b. Dilution of the “Right to Vote”

Until 1962, the Court held that legislative districting controversies were nonjusticiable. In Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549 (1946), for example, the Court declined to consider a claim that an Illinois law unconstitutionally prescribed congressional districts that were not approximately equal in population. Justice Frankfurter, writing for a plurality, explained that “this controversy concerns matters that bring courts into immediate and active relations with party contests. [It] is hostile to a democratic system to involve the judiciary in the politics of the people. [Courts] ought not to enter this political thicket.”

In Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962), however, the Court changed course. In a case involving a claim that the apportionment of the Tennessee General Assembly violated the appellants’ rights under the equal protection clause “by virtue of the debasement of their votes,” the Court held “that a justiciable cause of action is stated upon which appellants would be entitled to appropriate relief.” Baker is examined more fully in Chapter 1, section F3, supra.

Reynolds v. Sims

377 U.S. 533 (1964)

[In Reynolds and five companion cases, the Court held that in six states the system of apportionment of one or both houses of the legislature was unconstitutional. Reynolds involved Alabama; the other cases involved Colorado, Delaware, Maryland, New York, and Virginia. The Court observed: "Legislative apportionment in Alabama is signally illustrative and symptomatic of the seriousness of this problem in a number of States. [There has] been no reapportionment of seats in the Alabama Legislature for over 60 years. [This has resulted] in the perpetuated scheme becoming little more than an irrational anachronism [enabling] a minority stranglehold on the State Legislature."]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court....

A predominant consideration in determining whether a State's legislative apportionment scheme constitutes an invidious discrimination violative of rights asserted under the Equal Protection Clause is that the rights allegedly impaired are individual and personal in nature. [Since] the right of suffrage is a fundamental matter in a free and democratic society [and] is preservative of other basic civil and political rights, any alleged infringement of the right of citizens to vote must be carefully and meticulously scrutinized....

Legislators represent people, not trees or acres. Legislators are elected by voters, not farms or cities or economic interests. As long as ours is a representative form of government, [the] right to elect legislators in a free and unimpaired fashion is a bedrock of our political system. It could hardly be gainsaid that a constitutional claim had been asserted by an allegation that certain otherwise qualified voters had been entirely prohibited from voting for members of their state legislature. And, if a State should provide that the votes of citizens in one part of the State should be given two times, or five times, or 10 times the weight of votes of citizens in another part of the State, it could hardly be contended that the right to vote of those residing in the disfavored areas had not been effectively diluted. [Of] course, the effect of state legislative districting schemes which give the same number of representatives to unequal numbers of constituents is identical....

Logically, in a society ostensibly grounded on representative government, it would seem reasonable that a majority of the people of a State could elect a majority of that State's legislators. [Since] the achieving of fair and effective representation for all citizens is concededly the basic aim of legislative apportionment, we conclude that the Equal Protection Clause guarantees the opportunity for equal participation by all voters in the election of state legislators. Diluting the weight of votes because of place of residence impairs basic constitutional rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. [Our] constitutional system amply provides for the protection of minorities by means other than giving them majority control of state legislatures....

We are told that the matter of apportioning representation in a state legislature is a complex and many-faceted one. We are advised that States can rationally consider factors other than population in apportioning legislative representation. We are admonished not to restrict the power of the States to impose differing views as to political philosophy on their citizens. We are cautioned about the dangers of entering into political thickets and mathematical quagmires. Our answer is this: a denial of constitutionally protected rights demands judicial protection; our oath and our office require no less of us. [To] the extent that a citizen's right to vote is debased, he is that much less a citizen. [The] weight of a citizen's vote cannot be made to depend on where he lives. Population is, of necessity, the starting point for consideration and the controlling criterion for judgment in legislative apportionment controversies. A citizen, a qualified voter, is no more nor no less so because he lives in the city or on the farm. This is the clear and strong command of our Constitution's Equal Protection Clause....

We hold that, as a basic constitutional standard, the Equal Protection Clause requires that the seats in both houses of a bicameral state legislature must be apportioned on a population basis. Simply stated, an individual's right to vote for state legislators is unconstitutionally impaired when its weight is in a substantial fashion diluted when compared with votes of citizens living in other parts of the State....

[We] find the federal analogy inapposite and irrelevant to state legislative districting schemes....

The system of representation in the two Houses of the Federal Congress is one ingrained in our Constitution [and] is based on the consideration that in establishing our type of federalism a group of formerly independent States bound themselves together under one national government. [A] compromise between the larger and smaller States on this matter averted a deadlock in the Constitutional Convention which had threatened to abort the birth of our Nation.

Political subdivisions of States—counties, cities, or whatever—never were and never have been considered as sovereign entities....

By holding that as a federal constitutional requisite both houses of a state legislature must be apportioned on a population basis, we mean that the Equal Protection Clause requires that a State make an honest and good faith effort to construct districts, in both houses of its legislature, as nearly of equal population as is practicable. We realize that it is a practical impossibility to arrange legislative districts so that each one has an identical number of residents, or citizens, or voters. [So] long as the divergences from a strict population standard are based on legitimate considerations incident to the effectuation of a rational state policy, some deviations from the equal-population principle are constitutionally permissible [but] neither history alone, nor economic or other sorts of group interests, are permissible factors in attempting to justify disparities from population-based representation. Citizens, not history or economic interests, cast votes. Considerations of area alone provide an insufficient justification for deviations from the equal-population principle. Again, people, not land or trees or pastures, vote....

A consideration that appears to be of more substance in justifying some deviations from population-based representation in state legislatures is that of insuring some voice to political subdivisions, as political subdivisions. [In] many States much of the legislature's activity involves the enactment of so-called local legislation, directed only to the concerns of particular political subdivisions. [But] if, even as a result of a clearly rational state policy of according some legislative representation to political subdivisions, population is submerged as the controlling consideration in the apportionment of seats in the particular legislative body, then the right of all of the State's citizens to cast an effective and adequately weighted vote would be unconstitutionally impaired....

[Affirmed and remanded.]

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, dissenting [in all six cases]....

[The] history of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment provides conclusive evidence that neither those who proposed nor those who ratified the Amendment believed that the Equal Protection Clause limited the power of the States to apportion their legislatures as they saw fit. Moreover, the history demonstrates that the intention to leave this power undisturbed was deliberate and was widely believed to be essential to the adoption of the Amendment. [Justice Harlan's extensive historical analysis is omitted.]

It is difficult to imagine a more intolerable and inappropriate interference by the judiciary with the independent legislatures of the States....

[The] Court says [only] that "legislators represent people, not trees or acres." [This] may be conceded. But it is surely equally obvious, and, in the context of elections, more meaningful to note that people are not ciphers and that legislators can represent their electors only by speaking for their interests—economic, social, political—many of which do reflect the place where the electors live....

[An opinion by Justice Stewart, joined by Justice Clark, dissenting in the Colorado and New York cases, is omitted]

Note: Reynolds and Its Progeny

1. “One person, one vote.” Note that Kramer was denied the right to vote, whereas no one in Reynolds was denied that right. In this sense, the slogan “one person, one vote” that is often used to characterize Reynolds does not accurately describe its holding. Does the right to an equally weighted vote follow from the equality principle or from the conclusion that the “right to vote” is “fundamental”?

2. Reapportionment: a “success story”? Within four years of Reynolds, congressional and state legislative district lines had been redrawn on a one person—one vote basis in almost every state. Does this make Reynolds a success story? For an argument that it does, see McKay, Reapportionment: Success Story of the Warren Court, 67 Mich. L. Rev. 223 (1968). For more skeptical views, see A. Bickel, The Supreme Court and the Idea of Progress (1970); Bork, supra, at 88–90. Note also that the one person—one vote standard does nothing to limit partisan gerrymandering, a practice that remains very widespread. (The problem of vote dilution through gerrymandering is considered below.)

3. Popularly mandated malapportionment. Reynolds was designed, in part, to protect majoritarianism and to prevent “minority control of state legislative bodies.” But malapportionment has been held unconstitutional even if it is approved by a majority of the state’s voters. In Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly, 377 U.S. 713 (1964), a companion case to Reynolds, the Colorado scheme, which apportioned only one of the two Houses on the basis of population, had been approved in 1962 by a statewide referendum in which the voters specifically rejected a plan to apportion both Houses on the basis of population. Nonetheless, the Court held the scheme invalid: “An individual’s constitutionally protected right to cast an equally weighted vote cannot be denied even by a vote of a majority of a State’s electorate, if the apportionment scheme [fails] to measure up to the requirements of the Equal Protection Clause. [A] citizen’s constitutional rights can hardly be infringed simply because a majority of the people choose that it be.”

4. Supermajorities. If Reynolds was designed in part to protect majoritarianism and to prevent minority control of government, may a state constitutionally require the assent of a “supermajority” to enact legislation or take other action? In Gordon v. Lance, 403 U.S. 1 (1971), the Court upheld a West Virginia law prohibiting political subdivisions from incurring bonded indebtedness without the approval of 60 percent of the voters in a referendum election. The Court explained:

[Any] departure from strict majority rule gives disproportionate power to the minority. But there is nothing in the language of the Constitution, our history or our cases that requires that a majority always prevail on every issue. [The] Constitution itself provides that a simple majority vote is insufficient on some issues. [We] conclude that so long as such provisions do not discriminate against or authorize discrimination against any identifiable class they do not violate the Equal Protection Clause.

The Court added in a footnote: “We intimate no view on the constitutionality of a provision requiring unanimity or giving a veto power to a very small group. Nor do we decide whether a State may [require] extraordinary majorities for the election of public officers.” See also See Lockport v. Citizens for Community Action, 430 U.S. 259 (1977) (upholding a provision that prohibited a new county charter from being adopted unless it was approved by “majorities of the voters who live in the cities within the county, and of those who live outside the cities”).

5. Local government units. The Court extended Reynolds to local governmental units in Avery v. Midland County, 390 U.S. 474 (1968) and Hadley v. Junior College District, 397 U.S. 50 (1970).

6. Permissible deviations from “one person, one vote.” The courts have developed a number of statistical indices to measure malapportionment. The most prominent index is the “maximum percentage deviation.” For example, if a state with a population of ten million is allotted ten congressmen, the ideal district will have a population of one million. If the largest district has a population of 1.1 million (10 percent above the ideal) and the smallest has 0.9 million (10 percent below the ideal), the maximum percentage deviation is 20 percent. What is the maximum percentage deviation that should satisfy Reynolds?

a. Congressional districting. In Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1 (1964), the Court held that the provision of article I, section 2 that United States representatives “be chosen ‘by the People of the several States’ means that as nearly as is practicable one man’s vote in a congressional election is to be worth as much as another’s.” The Court thus invalidated a Georgia congressional districting scheme with a maximum percentage deviation of more than 140 percent. The Court has relied on Wesberry to invalidate congressional districting plans with much smaller deviations. See Kirkpatrick v. Preisler, 394 U.S. 526 (1969) (5.97 percent); Wells v. Rockefeller, 394 U.S. 542 (1969) (13.1 percent);

White v. Weiser, 412 U.S. 783 (1973) (4.13 percent); Karcher v. Daggett, 462 U.S. 725 (1983) (0.7 percent).

In Kirkpatrick, the Court held that no variance from absolute equality could be justified as de minimis. In Karcher, the Court reaffirmed Kirkpatrick. It again explained that states must “come as nearly as practicable to population equality.”

b. State districting. The Court has tolerated significant deviations from the mathematical ideal in its review of districting plans for state and local offices. For example, in Harris v. Arizona Indep. Redistricting Commn., 136 S. Ct. 1301 (2016), the Court upheld a state redistricting scheme with a maximum population deviation of under 10 percent. Writing for a unanimous Court, Justice Breyer stated that those attacking a state-approved plan must show that it is more probable than not that a deviation of less than 10% reflects the predominance of illegitimate reapportionment factors rather than the “legitimate considerations” to which we have referred in Reynolds and other cases. Given the inherent difficulty of measuring and comparing factors that may legitimately account for small deviations from strict mathematical equality, we believe that attacks on deviations under 10% will succeed only rarely, in unusual cases.

7. The unit of measurement. The cases discussed above address the extent to which jurisdictions may depart from the ideal of equality. But how should equality be measured? Should the relevant population consist of eligible voters, registered voters, or total population? Suppose, for example, a district has a large number of undocumented noncitizens or a large prison facility where inmates are not permitted to vote within its borders. Is it unconstitutional to consider these persons for purposes of apportionment? How often (and with what degree of accuracy) must the measurement be taken?

Both article I, §2, cl.2 and §2 of the fourteenth amendment provide that members of Congress shall be apportioned among the states “according to their respective numbers.” However, the Constitution is silent about how members of Congress should be apportioned within states and about how state legislators should be apportioned.

In practice, all states now utilize a total population measure as determined by the decennial census, but surprisingly, for more than a half century after its decisions in Reynolds and Wesberry, the Court said virtually nothing about the legality of this practice. It finally addressed the question in Evenwel v. Abbott, 136 S. Ct. 1120 (2016). Districting for the state senate of Texas yielded a maximum total-population deviation of 8.04 percent, well within the Supreme Court's guidelines, but if equality was measured by the total number of eligible or registered voters, the maximum population deviation exceeded 40 percent. Appellants, residents of a district with a large number of voters, claimed that their votes were unconstitutionally diluted under the Reynolds one person–one vote standard. In an opinion written by Justice Ginsburg, the Court held that the Constitution did not require a voter-based standard, but that “we need not and do not resolve whether [States] may draw districts to equalize voter-eligible population” (emphasis added).

According to the Court, a state is permitted (and perhaps required) to assume that a representative serves residents of her district even if they are not permitted to vote. Is this assumption plausible? If it is correct, why can't a state assume that a representative serves residents of the entire state, including people who cannot vote in her district because they live somewhere else?

City of Mobile v. Bolden

[Since 1911, the city of Mobile, Alabama, has been governed by a City Commission consisting of three commissioners who jointly exercise all legislative, executive, and administrative power. The commissioners are elected not by the residents of three distinct districts but by the residents of the city at large. This electoral system “is followed by literally thousands of municipalities.” Although Mobile has a substantial black population, no black has ever been elected to the commission. In Bolden, the Court rejected a claim that the retention of the at-large electoral system in such circumstances unconstitutionally diluted the voting strength of blacks.]

MR. JUSTICE STEWART announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion, in which [CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER], MR. JUSTICE POWELL, and MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST joined.

[At the outset, Justice Stewart observed that the “claim that at-large electoral schemes” violate the equal protection clause “is rooted in their winner-take-all aspects, their tendency to submerge minorities.” Stewart noted that, despite this feature, multimember legislative districts “are not unconstitutional per se.” Rather, he maintained, they are invalid only if their purpose is “invidiously to minimize or cancel out the voting potential of racial or ethnic minorities.” “A plaintiff,” in other words, “must prove that the disputed plan was ‘conceived or operated’ as [a] purposeful devic[e] to further [racial] discrimination.” Justice Stewart explained that this “burden of proof is simply one aspect of the basic principle that only if there is purposeful discrimination can there be a violation of the Equal Protection Clause.” Applying the intent standard, Justice Stewart concluded that “the evidence [falls] far short of showing that the appellants ‘conceived or operated [a] purposeful devic[e] to further racial [discrimination].’”]

We turn finally to the arguments advanced in [Mr.] Justice Marshall’s dissenting opinion. The theory [appears] to be that every “political group,” or at least every such group that is in the minority, has a federal constitutional right to elect candidates in proportion to its numbers.²² Moreover, a political group’s “right” to have its candidates elected is said to be a “fundamental interest,” the infringement of which may be established without proof that a State has acted with the purpose of impairing anybody’s access to the political process. This dissenting opinion finds the “right” infringed in the present case because no Negro has been elected to the Mobile City Commission.

Whatever appeal the dissenting opinion’s view may have as a matter of political theory, it is not the law. The Equal Protection Clause [does] not require proportional representation as an imperative of political organization. The entitlement that the dissenting opinion assumes to exist simply is not to be found in the Constitution of the United States.

It is of course true that a law that impinges upon a fundamental right [is] presumptively unconstitutional. [And it is true] that the Equal Protection Clause confers a substantive right to participate in elections on an equal basis with other qualified voters. See [Dunn v. Blumstein; Reynolds v. Sims]. But this right to equal participation in the electoral process does not protect any “political group,” however defined, from electoral defeat.

The dissenting opinion erroneously discovers the asserted entitlement to group representation within the “one person, one vote” principle of Reynolds v. Sims, supra, and its progeny. [The] Court [there] recognized that a voter’s right to “have an equally effective voice” in the election of representatives is impaired where representation is not apportioned substantially on a population basis. [There] can be, of course, no claim that the “one person, one vote” principle has been violated in this case, because the city of Mobile is a unitary electoral district and the Commission elections are conducted at large. It is therefore obvious that nobody’s vote has been “diluted” in the sense in which that word was used in the Reynolds case. [It] is, of course, true that the right of a person to vote on an equal basis with other voters draws much of its significance from the political associations that its exercise reflects, but it is an altogether different matter to conclude that political groups themselves have an independent constitutional claim to representation.²⁶

[Reversed and remanded.]

[Opinions by Justices Blackmun and Stevens concurring in the judgment and by Justices Brennan and White dissenting are omitted].

MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL, dissenting....

[The] equal protection problem attacked by the “one person, one vote” principle is [one] of vote dilution: under Reynolds, each citizen must have an “equally effective voice” in the election of representatives. In the present cases, the alleged vote dilution, though caused by the combined effects of the electoral structure and social and historical factors rather than by unequal population distribution, is analytically the same concept: the unjustified abridgment of a fundamental right....

The plurality’s response is that my approach amounts to nothing less than a constitutional requirement of proportional representation for groups. [I] explicitly reject the notion that the Constitution contains any such requirement. The constitutional protection against vote dilution [does] not extend to those situations in which a group has merely failed to elect representatives in proportion to its share of the population. To prove unconstitutional vote dilution, the group is also required to carry the far more onerous burden of demonstrating that it has been effectively fenced out of the political process. Typical of the plurality’s mischaracterization of my position is its assertion that I would provide protection against vote dilution for “every ‘political group,’ or at least every such group that is in the minority.” The vote-dilution doctrine can logically apply only to groups whose electoral discreteness and insularity allow dominant political factions to ignore them.

The plaintiffs [proved] that no Negro had ever been elected to the Mobile City Commission, despite the fact that Negroes constitute about one-third of the electorate, and that the persistence of severe racial bloc voting made it highly unlikely that any Negro could be elected at large in the foreseeable future. [The] plaintiffs convinced the District Court that Mobile Negroes were unable to use alternative avenues of political influence. They showed that Mobile Negroes still suffered pervasive present effects of massive historical official and private discrimination, and that the City Commission had been quite unresponsive to the needs of the minority community. [Negroes] are grossly underrepresented on city boards and committees. [The] city’s distribution of public services is racially discriminatory....

[Even if] it is assumed that proof of discriminatory intent is necessary to support the vote-dilution claims in these cases, the question becomes what evidence will satisfy this requirement....

I would apply the common-law foreseeability presumption to the present cases....

The plurality [fails] to recognize that the maintenance of multimember districts in the face of foreseeable discriminatory consequences strongly suggests that officials are blinded by “racially selective sympathy and indifference.” Like outright racial hostility, selective racial indifference reflects a belief that the concerns of the minority are not worthy of the same degree of attention paid to problems perceived by whites. When an interest as fundamental as voting is diminished along racial lines, a requirement that discriminatory purpose must be proved should be satisfied by a showing that official action was produced by this type of pervasive bias....

Note: Vote Dilution and the Interests of Groups

1. A “fundamental interest” in “proportional” representation? Do you agree with Justice Stewart that there is no constitutional right to proportional representation? How would you distinguish between “one person, one vote” and “one group, one representative”? Consider Note, The Constitutional Imperative of Proportional Representation, 94 Yale L.J. 163, 172–173, 175–176, 182 (1984):

Two fundamental values underlie the Supreme Court’s debate about constitutional rights in voting: majority rule and minority representation. The debate has taken the traditional system of winner-take-all single-member districts as a given. [But this] system contains a strong majoritarian bias. If the supporters of two parties were distributed uniformly throughout the area of the elections, the party winning the most votes would win every seat in the legislature. The votes for the minority candidate would in effect be wasted. [Under the Court’s analysis, majority] rule is conceptualized [as] an individual right deserving the strongest protection, whereas minority representation is conceptualized [as] a group right that will not be vindicated without proof of invidious discrimination. But the opposition of individual and group rights is logically [untenable]: The rights labeled as group rights are also individual rights and vice versa. [The] real distinction [is] not between individual and group rights but between the right to an equally weighted vote and the right to an equally powerful or equally meaningful vote.

Is it clear that proportional representation is always in the interest of an electoral minority? Might not a minority be better off with numerous representatives at least partly beholden to it than with one or two representatives wholly within its control? Consider also the view that it is false and pernicious to refer to something called “the interest of African Americans” and “the interest of whites,” as if these were unitary things rather than to emphasize overlapping interests among racial and other groups.

2. The permissibility of “fair representation.” City of Mobile holds that a “fair representation” system is not constitutionally mandatory. Is it constitutionally permissible? In Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735 (1973), the challengers of the districting plan maintained that, even if the plan satisfied the one person—one vote requirement of Reynolds, it was nonetheless “invidiously discriminatory” because it was admittedly drawn to “achieve a rough approximation of statewide political strengths of the Democratic and Republican Parties.” The Court held that the “political fairness principle” was not unconstitutional:

Politics and political considerations are inseparable from districting and apportionment. [It] may be suggested that those who redistrict and reapportion should work with census, not political, data and achieve population equality without regard for political impact. But this politically mindless approach may produce, whether intended or not, the most grossly gerrymandered results. [Districting schemes may be invalid] if racial or political groups [are] fenced out of the political process and their voting strength invidiously minimized, [but there is no] constitutional warrant to invalidate a state plan, otherwise within tolerable population limits, because it undertakes, not to minimize or eliminate the political strength of any group or party, but to recognize it and, through districting, provide a rough sort of proportional representation in the legislative halls of the State.

Suppose that you are a Republican living in a district deliberately created under a “political fairness” plan to elect a Democrat. Is it a sufficient answer to your complaint about this districting that some other district has been deliberately created so as to elect a Republican?

The Court has been much more skeptical of the “fairness” principle when it has been utilized to insure “fair representation” of racial groups. In Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900 (1995), the Court held that where “race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature’s decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district,” and where the legislature “subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles,” a fourteenth amendment violation had been made out. Taken together, Gaffney and Miller stand for the proposition that legislatures are constitutionally permitted to assure equal representation for political parties, but not for minority racial groups. Is this distinction consistent with the purposes and history that underlie the equal protection clause?

3. Political gerrymandering. Suppose that a legislature deliberately gerrymanders district lines not to produce fair representation of political groups, but to underestimate the voting strength of such a group.

a. Vieth. In Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267 (2004), a four-justice plurality of the Court, per Justice Scalia, would have held that partisan gerrymandering posed a political question that should not be answered by courts. (This portion of the Court's opinion is excerpted at Chapter 1, section F3, supra.) Justice Kennedy concurred in the judgment, but would not have "[foreclosed] all possibility of judicial relief if some limited and precise rationale were found to correct an established violation of the Constitution in some redistricting cases." Justices Stevens, Souter (joined by Justice Ginsburg), and Breyer filed separate dissents. Consider the views of Justice Breyer:

[One] should begin by asking why [the] Constitution does not insist that the membership of legislatures better reflect different political views held by different groups of voters. [The] answer [lies] in the fact that a single-member-district system helps to ensure certain democratic objectives better than many "more representative" (i.e., proportional) electoral systems. [Single-member] districts [diminish] the need for coalition governments. And that fact makes it easier for voters to identify which party is responsible for government decision-making (and which rascals to throw out) while simultaneously providing greater legislative stability....

If single-member districts are the norm, however, then political considerations will likely play an important, and proper, role in the drawing of district boundaries. [Given] a fairly large state population with a fairly large congressional delegation, districts assigned so as to be perfectly random in respect to politics would translate a small shift in political sentiment, say a shift from 51% Republican to 49% Republican, into a seismic shift in the makeup of the legislative delegation, say from 100% Republican to 100% Democratic. [Any] such exaggeration of tiny electoral changes—virtually wiping out legislative representation of the minority party—would itself seem highly undemocratic.

Given the resulting need for single-member districts with nonrandom boundaries, it is not surprising that "traditional" districting principles have rarely, if ever, been politically neutral....

At the same time, these considerations can help identify at least one circumstance where use of purely political boundary-drawing factors can amount to a serious, and remediable, abuse, namely the unjustified use of political factors to entrench a minority in power. By entrenchment I mean a situation in which a party that enjoys only minority support among the populace has nonetheless contrived to take, and hold, legislative power. By unjustified entrenchment, I mean that the minority's hold on power is purely the result of partisan manipulation and not other factors....

Courts need not intervene often to prevent the kind of abuse I have described, because those harmed constitute a political majority, and a majority normally can work its political will....

But we cannot always count on a severely gerrymandered legislature itself to find and implement a remedy....

When it is necessary, a court should prove capable of finding an appropriate remedy....

[Courts] can identify a number of strong indicia of abuse. The presence of actual entrenchment, while not always unjustified (being perhaps a chance occurrence) is such a sign, particularly when accompanied by the use of partisan boundary drawing criteria[, i.e.], a use that both departs from traditional criteria and cannot be explained other than by efforts to achieve partisan advantage. [The] scenarios fall along a continuum: The more permanently entrenched the minority's hold on power becomes, the less evidence courts will need that the minority engaged in gerrymandering to achieve the desired result.

Compare Justice Scalia's response:

The criterion Justice Breyer proposes is nothing more precise than "the unjustified use of political factors to entrench a minority in power." While he invokes in passing the Equal Protection Clause, it should be clear to any reader that what constitutes unjustified entrenchment depends on his own theory of "effective government." While one must agree with Justice Breyer's incredibly abstract starting point that our Constitution sought to create a "basically democratic" form of government, that is a long and impassable distance away from the conclusion that the Judiciary may assess whether a group (somehow defined) has achieved a level of political power (somehow defined) commensurate with that to which they would be entitled absent unjustified political machinations (whatever that means).

b. Perry. In League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399 (2006), the Court confronted a controversial effort by Texas Republicans to redraw congressional district lines in 2003 after they had gained control of both houses of the state legislature the year earlier. The redistricting was a radical departure from the normal practice of changing district lines only after the decennial census.

After the 1990 census, Democrats, then in control of the state legislature and governorship, redrew district lines in a fashion that led to only thirteen Republican seats out of thirty despite Republicans carrying 59 percent of the state-wide vote. After the 2000 census, the legislature, then divided between a Republican Senate and a Democratic House, could not agree on a districting plan. As a result, a federal district court imposed a new plan that, to the extent possible, tracked the 1990 plan. The Court-imposed plan gave the Republicans an advantage in twenty of the thirty-two congressional seats, but in the actual election (held in 2002), Republicans were unable to fully capitalize on this advantage and won only fifteen of the thirty-two seats.

When the Republicans gained control of the State House of Representatives, the Republican Governor called a special session of the legislature in order to replace the Court-imposed plan. The result was a dramatic standoff, with the legislature temporarily unable to act because Democratic Senators left the state so as to deprive the Senate of a quorum. Eventually, a plan was enacted which, the district court found, had the “single-minded purpose of [gaining] partisan advantage.” In elections held under the new plan in 2004, Republicans gained six congressional seats over their 2002 total.

In a portion of his opinion announcing the judgment in which he wrote only for himself, Justice Kennedy rejected the argument that mid-decennial redistricting, when solely motivated by partisan objectives, is unconstitutional:

[A] successful claim attempting to identify unconstitutional acts of partisan gerrymandering must do what appellants’ sole-motivation theory explicitly disavows: show a burden, as measured by a reliable standard, on the complainants’ representational rights....

[The new plan] can be seen as making the party balance more congruent to statewide party power. To be sure, there is no constitutional requirement of proportional representation, and equating a party’s statewide share of the vote with its portion of the congressional delegation is a rough measure at best. Nevertheless, a congressional plan that more closely reflects the distribution of state party power seems a less likely vehicle for partisan discrimination than one that entrenches an electoral minority. By this standard [the new plan] can be seen as fairer than the plan that survived in Vieth and the two previous Texas [plans].

Justice Stevens, in an opinion joined by Justice Breyer, dissented from the Court's judgment upholding the mid-decennial partisan districting.

Justice Souter, in an opinion joined by Justice Ginsburg, stated that he saw "nothing to be gained by working through these cases on the standard I would have applied in Vieth because here as in Vieth we have no majority for any single criterion of impermissible gerrymander. [I] therefore treat the broad issue of gerrymander much as the subject of an improvident grant of certiorari." He added that he did not "share Justice Kennedy's seemingly flat rejection of any test of gerrymander turning on the process followed in redistricting."

Writing for himself and Justice Alito, Chief Justice Roberts agreed with the determination that appellants have not provided "a reliable standard for identifying unconstitutional political gerrymanders." He added that "[the] question whether any such standard exists—that is, whether a challenge to a political gerrymander presents a justiciable case or controversy—has not been argued in these cases. I therefore take no position on that question, which has divided the Court."

Writing for himself and Justice Thomas, Justice Scalia reaffirmed his position in Vieth that partisan gerrymandering claims are nonjusticiable.

In light of Vieth and Perry, how should lower courts treat cases of partisan gerrymandering?

c. Nonpartisan redistricting. In Arizona State Legislature v. Arizona Independent Redistricting Commn., 135 S. Ct. 2652 (2015), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Ginsburg, upheld Arizona's decision to vest redistricting decisions in an independent redistricting commission. Petitioners argued that the commission violated article I, §4, cl. 1 of the Constitution which provides that "[the] Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each state by the Legislature [thereof]." The Court rejected this argument, noting that "[the] history and purpose of the Clause weigh heavily against such a preclusion, as does the animating principle of our Constitution that the people themselves are the originating source of all powers of government." Chief Justice Roberts, joined by Justices Scalia, Thomas, and Alito; Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas; and Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia filed dissenting opinions.

c. Denial of "Access to the Ballot"

WILLIAMS v. RHODES, 393 U.S. 23 (1968). Under Ohio law, political parties that had received 10 percent of the vote in the prior gubernatorial election automatically qualified for the next presidential election ballot. Other political parties, however, could earn a place on the ballot only if they had an elaborate party structure, held “a primary election conforming to detailed and rigorous standards,” and filed a petition nine months before the election signed “by qualified electors totaling 15 percent of the number of ballots cast in the last preceding gubernatorial election.” Noting that the law had “made it virtually impossible for a new political party [to] be placed on [the] ballot,” the Court invalidated the Ohio scheme.

Justice Black delivered the opinion of the Court: “In determining whether or not a state law violates the Equal Protection Clause, we must consider the facts and circumstances behind the law, the interests which the State claims to be protecting, and the interests of those who are disadvantaged by the classification. [Here] the state laws [burden] two different, although overlapping, kinds of rights—the right of individuals to associate for the advancement of political beliefs, and the right of qualified voters [to] cast their votes effectively. [The challenged laws] give the two old, established parties a decided advantage [and] thus place substantially unequal burdens on both the right to vote and the right to associate. [In] determining whether the State has power to place such unequal burdens on minority groups where rights of this kind are at stake, [we] have consistently held that ‘only a compelling interest [can] justify limiting [such] freedoms.’...”

“The State asserts that [it] may validly promote a two-party system in order to encourage compromise and political stability. [But] the Ohio system does not merely favor a ‘two-party system’; it favors two particular parties—the Republicans and the Democrats—and in effect [gives] them a complete monopoly. [Ohio argues further] that its highly restrictive provisions are justified because without them a large number of parties might qualify for the ballot, and the voters would then be confronted with a choice so confusing that the popular will could be frustrated. But [experience] demonstrates that no more than a handful of parties attempts to qualify for ballot positions even when a very low number of signatures, such as 1% of the electorate, is required. [Thus,] at the present time this danger [is] no more than ‘theoretically imaginable.’ No such remote danger can justify the immediate and crippling impact on the basic constitutional rights involved in this case.”

Justice Harlan concurred in the result on the ground “that Ohio’s statutory scheme violates the basic right of political association assured by the First Amendment.” Chief Justice Warren and Justices Stewart and White dissented.

Note: Williams and Its Progeny

1. Access to the ballot. If there is a fundamental interest in gaining access to the franchise, is there necessarily also a fundamental interest in gaining access to the ballot? Whose right is the Court protecting? The candidate's? The party member's? The potential voter's?

2. Petition requirements. In Jenness v. Forston, 403 U.S. 431 (1971), the Court distinguished Williams and unanimously upheld a Georgia law providing that any political organization whose candidate received 20 percent of the vote at the most recent gubernatorial or presidential election automatically qualified for the ballot, but that a nominee of any other political organization must file a petition five months before the election signed by at least 5 percent of those eligible to vote at the last election for the office he is seeking. The Court explained:

Unlike Ohio, Georgia freely provides for write-in votes, [it] does not require every candidate to be the nominee of a political party, [it] does not fix an unreasonably early filing deadline, [and it] does not impose upon a small party or a new party [the] requirement of establishing elaborate primary election [machinery]. In a word, Georgia in no way freezes the status [quo].

See also American Party of Texas v. White, 415 U.S. 767 (1974) (conditioning minor party ballot access on holding a nominating convention and obtaining signatures totaling at least 1 percent of the persons voting in the last preceding gubernatorial election); Illinois State Board of Elections v. Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. 173 (1979) (invalidating a state statute that had the effect of requiring more signatures to qualify for access to the ballot in Chicago elections than in statewide elections); Munro v. Socialist Workers Party, 479 U.S. 189 (1986) (upholding statute that required minor party to receive at least 1 percent of the votes cast in a "blanket primary" at which registered voters could vote for any candidate, irrespective of the candidate's political party affiliation).

3. Filing fees. In Lubin v. Panish, 415 U.S. 709 (1974), the Court invalidated as applied to indigents a California law requiring payment of a filing fee of 2 percent of the annual salary for the office sought. The Court pointed out that "a wealthy candidate with not the remotest chance of election may secure a place on the ballot by writing a check [while] impecunious but serious candidates may be prevented from running" and held that "a State may [not] require from an indigent candidate filing fees he cannot pay."

4. Party loyalty requirements. In Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. 724 (1974), the Court upheld a California statute forbidding a ballot position to an independent candidate who “had a registered affiliation with [a] political party at any time within one year prior to the immediately preceding primary election.” The Court explained:

[The challenged provision] involves no discrimination against independents. [Just as] the independent candidate must be clear of political party affiliations for a year before the primary, the party candidate must not have been registered with another party for a year before he files his [declaration]. [The challenged provision] protects the direct primary process by refusing to recognize independent candidates who do not make early plans to leave a [party]. It works against independent candidacies prompted by short-range political goals, pique, or personal quarrel. [It thus] furthers the State’s [compelling] interest in the stability of its political system.

In Tashjian v. Republican Party, 479 U.S. 208 (1986), the Court distinguished Storer and invalidated a Connecticut statute requiring the voters in any party primary to be registered members of that party. The Republican Party, which had adopted a party rule permitting independents to vote in its primary, challenged the provision. Writing for the Court, Justice Marshall distinguished Storer as follows:

The statute in Storer was designed to protect the parties and the party system against the disorganizing effect of independent candidacies launched by unsuccessful putative party nominees. This protection [was] undertaken to prevent the disruption of the political parties from without, and not, as in this case, to prevent the parties from taking internal steps affecting their own process for the selection of candidates....

The Party’s determination of the boundaries of its own association, and of the structure which best allows it to pursue its political goals, is protected by the Constitution.

Justice Stevens, joined by Justice Scalia, dissented. Justice Scalia also wrote a separate dissenting opinion, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice O’Connor.

5. Disqualification of public officials. In Clements v. Fashing, 457 U.S. 957 (1982), the Court upheld two provisions of the Texas Constitution. Section 19 provides that certain public officials shall not “be eligible to the Legislature” until the expiration of their current term of office. Section 65 provides that certain public officials who run for any other state or federal office must automatically resign their current position.

In a plurality opinion, Justice Rehnquist, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justices Powell and O'Connor, reasoned:

[We have never held that] candidacy [is] a “fundamental right.” [Rather, our] ballot access cases [focus] on the degree to which the challenged restrictions operate as a mechanism to exclude certain classes of candidates from the electoral process. The inquiry is whether the challenged restriction unfairly or unnecessarily burdens the “availability of political opportunity.” [The] Court has departed from traditional equal protection analysis [in] two [lines] of ballot access cases. One line [involves] classifications based on wealth. [E.g., Lubin.] The second [involves] classification schemes that impose burdens on new or small political parties or independent candidates. [E.g., Williams; White; Storer.] The provisions [challenged] in this case do not [fall within either of these lines]. [It is thus] necessary to examine the provisions in question in terms of the extent of the burdens that they place on the candidacy of current holders of public office. [Section 19] merely prohibits officeholders from cutting short their current term of office in order to serve in the Legislature. [As applied to appellee, a Justice of the Peace, section 19 establishes] a maximum “waiting period” of two [years]. A “waiting period” is hardly a significant barrier to candidacy. [Citing Storer.] We conclude that this sort of insignificant interference with access to the ballot need only rest on a rational predicate in order to [survive]. Section 19 clearly rests on a rational predicate [for] Texas has a legitimate interest in discouraging its Justices of the Peace from vacating their current terms of office. [The] burdens that §65 imposes on candidacy are even less substantial than those imposed by §19 [and the] two provisions [serve] essentially the same state interests.

6. A different approach? In Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780 (1983), the Court invalidated an Ohio law requiring independent candidates to file their nominating petitions in mid-March in order to qualify for the ballot in the November election. Interestingly, Justice Stevens’s majority opinion relied on the first amendment rather than the equal protection clause:

[We] base our conclusions directly on the First [Amendment] and do not engage in a separate Equal Protection Clause analysis. We rely, however, on the analysis in a number of our prior election cases resting on the Equal Protection Clause. [These] cases, applying the “fundamental rights” strand of equal protection analysis, have identified the First [Amendment] rights implicated by restrictions on the eligibility of voters and [candidates]. Constitutional challenges to specific provisions of a State’s election laws [cannot] be resolved by any “litmus-paper test” that will separate valid from invalid restrictions. Instead, a court [must] first consider the character and magnitude of the asserted injury to [First Amendment rights]. It then must identify and evaluate the precise interests put forward by the State as justifications for the burden imposed. [The] Court must not only determine the legitimacy and strength of each of those interests; it also must consider the extent to which those interests make it necessary to burden [First Amendment] rights. Only after weighing all these factors is the reviewing court in a position to decide whether the challenged provision is unconstitutional.

The Court concluded that Ohio’s interests in “voter education, equal treatment for partisan and independent candidates, and political stability” were either illegitimate or too remotely related to the early filing deadline to justify such a substantial barrier to independent candidates.

2. Access to the Judicial Process

If there is a fundamental interest in equal access to the franchise, is there also a fundamental interest in equal access to the judicial process?

GRiffin v. ILLINOIS, 351 U.S. 12 (1956). The Court held that a state must furnish an indigent criminal defendant with a free trial transcript if such a transcript is necessary for “adequate and effective appellate review” of his conviction. In a plurality opinion, Justice Black, joined by Chief Justice Warren and Justices Douglas and Clark, explained: “[Our] constitutional guaranties of due process and equal protection both call for procedures in criminal trials which allow no invidious discriminations between persons and different groups of persons. [Plainly] the ability to pay costs in advance bears no rational relationship to a defendant’s guilt or innocence and could not be used as an excuse to deprive a defendant of a fair trial. [It] is true that a State is not required by the Federal Constitution to provide appellate courts or a right to appellate review at all. See, e.g., McKane v. Durston, 153 U.S. 684 [1894]. But that is not to say that a State that does grant appellate review can do so in a way that discriminates against some convicted defendants on account of their poverty....

“[To] deny adequate appellate review to the poor means that many of them may lose their life, liberty or property because of unjust convictions which appellate courts would set aside. [Such] a denial is a misfit in a country dedicated to affording equal justice to all and special privileges to none in the administration of its criminal law. There can be no equal justice where the kind of trial a man gets depends on the amount of money he has. Destitute defendants must be afforded as adequate appellate review as defendants who have money enough to buy transcripts.”

Justice Frankfurter concurred in the judgment. Justices Burton, Minton, Reed, and Harlan dissented.

DOUGLAS v. CALIFORNIA, 372 U.S. 353 (1963). In a six-to-three decision, the Court held unconstitutional a California rule requiring state appellate courts, on the request of an indigent criminal defendant for counsel on appeal, to make “an independent investigation of the record” and to “appoint counsel [only] if in their opinion it would be helpful to the defendant or the court.” Justice Douglas delivered the opinion of the Court:

“[The denial] ‘of counsel on appeal [to an indigent] would seem to be at least as invidious [a discrimination] as that condemned in [Griffin.]’ [Under the California rule,] the type of an appeal a person is afforded [hinges] upon whether or not he can pay for the assistance of counsel....

“When an indigent is forced to run this gauntlet of a preliminary showing of merit, the right to appeal does not comport with fair procedure. [The] discrimination is not between ‘possibly good and obviously bad cases,’ but between cases where the rich man can require the court to listen to argument of counsel before deciding on the merits, but a poor man cannot. There is lacking that equality demanded by the Fourteenth Amendment where the rich man, who appeals as of right, enjoys the benefit of counsel’s examination into the record, research of the law, and marshalling of arguments on his behalf, while the indigent, already burdened by a preliminary determination that his case is without merit, is forced to shift for himself. The indigent, where the record is unclear or the errors are hidden, has only the right to a meaningless ritual, while the rich man has a meaningful appeal.”

Justice Harlan, joined by Justice Stewart, dissented.

Note: Fundamental Interests and the Criminal Justice System

1. The basis of Griffin and Douglas: wealth as a “suspect” classification. As in Harper, section E1a, supra, the Court in Griffin and Douglas relied on both the “suspect” classification and the “fundamental” interest aspects of equal protection analysis. To what extent, if any, can Griffin and Douglas be explained on the ground that “a State can no more discriminate on account of poverty than on account of religion, race, or color”? Consider that the rules invalidated in Griffin and Douglas (a) do not expressly classify on the basis of wealth but instead involved a fee of the sort that is charged in the private market and often by the state as it provides services; (b) like ordinary license fees, have a differential effect on the poor; and (c) unlike the poll tax, were invalidated not in their entirety but only as applied to the poor.

2. The basis of Griffin and Douglas: equal access to appeal as a fundamental interest. Justice Black conceded in Griffin that there is no constitutional right “to appellate review.” How, then, does he justify his implicit conclusion that the right “to appellate review” is fundamental? In Harper, the Court suggested that the right to vote is fundamental because it is “preservative of all rights.” Perhaps the “right to sue and defend in the courts” is similarly fundamental because “it is the right conservative of all other rights, and lies at the foundation of orderly government.” Chambers v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, 207 U.S. 142, 148 (1907).

3. Equal protection or due process? What is the real concern in Griffin and Douglas—the inequality or the lack of an effective opportunity to appeal? If the due process clause guarantees a right to appeal, Griffin and Douglas would pose a coherent due process issue. But everyone seems to agree that the due process clause does not require the states to create an appellate system, and that there is thus no due process right to appeal. That being so, can one sensibly argue that the restrictions at issue in Griffin and Douglas violate due process because they limit the opportunity to appeal? Consider the following argument: Even if the due process clause does not require a state to create an appellate system, it does require a state that decides voluntarily to create such a system to permit access to the system unless its restrictions are justified by important government interests.

If there is no due process right to appeal, can one nonetheless argue that the interest in equal access to appeal is “fundamental” for purposes of the equal protection clause?

4. The limits of Griffin and Douglas. In Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600 (1974), the Court held that the Constitution does not require states to provide counsel for indigent defendants petitioning for discretionary state appellate review or for review in the U.S. Supreme Court. Justice Rehnquist delivered the opinion of the Court:

The precise rationale for the Griffin and Douglas lines of cases has never been explicitly stated, some support being derived from the Equal Protection Clause [and] some from the Due Process [Clause]. Neither clause by itself provides an entirely satisfactory basis for the result reached, each depending on a different inquiry which emphasizes different factors....

We do not believe that the Due Process Clause requires North Carolina to provide [counsel in this situation]. [T]he State need not provide any appeal at all. [The] fact that an appeal has been provided does not automatically mean that a State then acts unfairly by refusing to provide counsel to indigent defendants at every stage of the way. [Unfairness] results only if indigents are singled out by the State and denied meaningful access to the appellate system because of their poverty. That question is more profitably considered under an equal protection analysis....

The [equal protection clause] “does not require absolute equality or precisely equal advantages,” nor does it require the State to “equalize economic conditions.” It does require that the state appellate system be “free of unreasoned distinctions,” and that indigents have an adequate opportunity to present their claims fairly within the adversary system. The State cannot adopt procedures which leave an indigent defendant “entirely cut off from any appeal at all,” by virtue of his indigency, or extend to such indigent defendants merely a “meaningless ritual” while others in better economic circumstances have a “meaningful appeal.” That question is not one of absolutes, but one of degrees.

North Carolina has followed the mandate of Douglas v. California [and] authorized appointment of counsel for a convicted defendant appealing to the intermediate Court of Appeals, but has not gone beyond Douglas to provide for appointment of counsel for a defendant who seeks [review] in the Supreme Court of North Carolina or a writ of certiorari here. We do not believe that [a] defendant in respondent’s circumstances is denied meaningful access to the [state] Supreme Court [or to this Court] simply because the State does not appoint counsel to aid him in seeking [review]. At that stage he will have, at the very least, a transcript or other record of trial proceedings, a brief on his behalf in the Court of Appeals setting forth his claims of error, and in many cases an opinion by the Court of Appeals disposing of his case. These materials [would] appear to provide [an] adequate basis for [the] decision to grant or deny review.

Justice Douglas, joined by Justices Brennan and Marshall, dissented. See also United States v. MacCollom, 426 U.S. 317 (1976) (criminal defendant has no right to a free transcript to challenge federal conviction on collateral review); Fuller v. Oregon, 417 U.S. 40 (1974) (state may recoup legal expenses paid on behalf of a convicted defendant to the extent that he later becomes able to pay). But see James v. Strange, 407 U.S. 128 (1972) (invalidating a statute providing for the recoupment of all state expenditures for indigent defendants because the statute deprived such defendants of all the exemptions and restrictions ordinarily afforded civil judgment debtors and thus failed to accord “even treatment of indigent criminal defendants with other classes of debtors”); Rinaldi v. Yeager, 384 U.S. 305 (1966) (invalidating on similar grounds a statute requiring unsuccessful appellants confined to prison, but not those receiving suspended sentences, placed on probation, or penalized only by a fine, to repay the state for the cost of transcripts).

5. Imprisonment for failure to pay a fine. In Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235 (1970), appellant, who had been convicted of petty theft, received the maximum authorized sentence of one year in prison and a $500 fine. A state statute provided that defendants in default of payment of a fine must remain in jail to “work off” their obligations at a rate of $5 per day. “Applying the teaching [of] Griffin” the Court held the statute unconstitutional as applied to an indigent defendant insofar as it authorized imprisonment beyond the maximum statutory term. The Court reasoned that “when the aggregate imprisonment exceeds the maximum period fixed by the statute and results directly from an involuntary nonpayment of a fine or court costs we are confronted with an impermissible discrimination that rests on ability to pay.” The Court concluded that no substantial state interest justified the discriminatory impact, for the state had “numerous alternatives,” including the use of installment plans, for recouping the monetary penalties from indigents.

See also Tate v. Short, 401 U.S. 395 (1971), in which the Court held that a state could not constitutionally imprison an indigent defendant for failure to pay traffic fines not otherwise punishable by imprisonment, but added that Williams did not necessarily preclude imprisonment “as an enforcement method when alternative means are unsuccessful despite the defendant’s reasonable efforts to satisfy the fines by those means”; Bearden v. Georgia, 461 U.S. 660 (1983), in which the Court, relying on Williams and Tate, held that probation may be revoked for nonpayment of a fine only if the probationer made no bona fide effort to pay or there are no “adequate alternative forms of punishment.”

BODDIE v. CONNECTICUT, 401 U.S. 371 (1971). The Court held unconstitutional as applied to indigents a state requirement that individuals pay court fees and costs of about $60 in order to sue for divorce. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the Court: “American society [bottoms] its systematic definition of individual rights and duties [on] the common-law model. It is to courts [that] we ultimately look for the implementation of a regularized, orderly process of dispute settlement. [It] is upon this premise that this Court has [put] flesh upon the due process principle. [Past] litigation has, however, typically involved rights of defendants—not, as here, persons seeking access to the judicial process in the first instance. This is because our society has been so structured that resort to the courts is not usually the only available, legitimate means of resolving private disputes. Indeed, private structuring of individual relationships [is] largely encouraged in American life, [and] this Court has [thus] seldom been asked to view access to the courts as an element of due process....

“As this Court [has] recognized, marriage involves interests of basic importance in our society. See, e.g., Loving v. Virginia [Chapter 5, section C1, supra]; Skinner v. Oklahoma [section E supra]; Meyer v. Nebraska [section F infra]. It is not surprising, then, that the States have seen fit to oversee many aspects of that institution. Without a prior judicial imprimatur, individuals may freely enter into and rescind commercial contracts, for example, but we are unaware of any jurisdiction where private citizens may covenant for or dissolve marriages without state approval. [The] State’s refusal to admit these appellants to its courts, the sole means in Connecticut for obtaining a divorce, must be regarded as the equivalent of denying them an opportunity to be heard upon their claimed right to a dissolution of their marriages, and, in the absence of a sufficient countervailing [justification,] a denial of due process.”

The Court emphasized that “[w]e do not decide that access for all individuals to the courts is a right that is, in all circumstances, guaranteed by the Due Process Clause,” but only that, “given the basic position of the marriage relationship in this society’s hierarchy of values and the concomitant state monopolization of the means for legally dissolving this relationship, due process does prohibit a State from denying, solely because of inability to pay, access to its courts to individuals who seek judicial dissolution of their marriages.”

Justice Douglas and Justice Brennan concurred.

Justice Black dissented: “[Griffin is distinguishable.] Civil lawsuits [are] not like government prosecutions for crime. [In] such cases the government is not usually involved as a party, and there is no deprivation of life, liberty, or property as punishment for crime. [There] is consequently no necessity [why] government should in civil trials be hampered [by the strict] due process rules the Constitution has provided to protect people charged with crime. [The] Court’s opinion appears to rest solely on a philosophy that any law violates due process if it is unreasonable, arbitrary, indecent, deviates from the fundamental, is shocking to the conscience, or fails to meet other tests [equally] lacking in any possible constitutional precision. [The] Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses [do not justify] judges in trying [to] hold laws constitutional or not on the basis of a judge’s sense of fairness.”

Note: Access to the Judicial Process in Civil Cases

1. Boddie extended.

a. Little v. Streeter, 452 U.S. 1 (1981). A state law required the party moving for blood grouping tests in a paternity action to pay for the tests, as applied to an indigent party. In a unanimous opinion written by Chief Justice Burger, the Court held that the payment requirement violated the due process clause.

b. M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102 (1996). A state law conditioned appeals from trial court decrees terminating parental rights on the affected party's payment of fees for preparation of the record. In an opinion written by Justice Ginsburg, the Court held that the law violated both the due process and the equal protection clauses. Justice Kennedy wrote an opinion concurring in the judgment. Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia and, in part, by Chief Justice Rehnquist, wrote dissenting opinions.

c. Turner v. Rogers, 564 U.S. 431 (2011). The state failed to provide counsel to an indigent person faced with incarceration for civil contempt for failure to pay child support. In a five-to-four decision, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Breyer, held that the due process clause did not automatically require the provision of counsel, but that Turner's incarceration violated due process because the state had failed to provide him with alternative safeguards. Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia and Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito in part, dissented.

2. Boddie distinguished.

a. United States v. Kras, 409 U.S. 434 (1973). The Bankruptcy Act requires individuals seeking voluntary discharge to pay costs and fees of about $50. In a five-to-four decision, the Court, in an opinion written by Justice Blackmun, upheld the provision. The Court emphasized that bankruptcy, unlike divorce, was not an interest of fundamental importance under the Constitution and that the government's control over the dissolution of debt was not exclusive in the same way that its control over divorce was. Justice Stewart, joined by Justices Douglas, Brennan, and Marshall, and Justice Marshall wrote dissenting opinions.

b. Ortwein v. Schwab, 410 U.S. 656 (1973). By a five-to-four vote, the Court, in a per curiam opinion, upheld a $25 appellate court filing fee as applied to indigents who sought to appeal administrative decisions reducing their welfare benefits. The Court again emphasized that the interest in increased welfare payments had less constitutional significance than the interest in divorce. Justices Douglas, Stewart, Brennan, and Marshall dissented. On welfare as a "fundamental" interest, see section E4 infra.

3. Due process or equal protection? Note Justice Harlan's reliance on due process rather than equal protection. Does Justice Harlan's analysis invalidate every limitation on the filing of divorce actions or only those that exclude the poor?

Shapiro v. Thompson

394 U.S. 618 (1969)

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Each of these three appeals is] from a decision [holding] unconstitutional a State or District of Columbia statutory provision which denies welfare assistance to residents [who] have not resided within their jurisdictions for at least one year immediately preceding their applications for such assistance. We affirm....

There is no dispute that the effect of the waiting-period requirement [is] to create two classes of needy resident families indistinguishable from each other except that one is composed of residents who have resided a year or more, and the second of residents who have resided less than a year, in the jurisdiction. [The] second class is denied welfare aid upon which may depend the ability of the families to obtain the very means to subsist—food, shelter, and other necessities of life. [This scheme] constitutes an invidious discrimination [denying] equal protection of the laws. [The] interests which appellants assert are promoted by the classification either may not constitutionally be promoted by government or are not compelling governmental interests.

Primarily, appellants justify the waiting-period requirement as a protective device to preserve the fiscal integrity of state public assistance programs. It is asserted that people who require welfare assistance during their first year of residence in a State are likely to become continuing burdens on state welfare programs. Therefore, the argument runs, if such people can be deterred from entering the jurisdiction by denying them welfare benefits during the first year, state programs to assist long-time residents will not be impaired by a substantial influx of indigent newcomers....

We do not doubt that the one-year waiting-period device is well suited to discourage the influx of poor families in need of assistance. An indigent who desires to migrate, resettle, find a new job, and start a new life will doubtless hesitate if he knows that he must risk making the move without the possibility of falling back on state welfare assistance during his first year of residence, when his need may be most acute. But the purpose of inhibiting migration by needy persons into the State is constitutionally impermissible.

This Court long ago recognized that the nature of our Federal Union and our constitutional concepts of personal liberty unite to require that all citizens be free to travel throughout the length and breadth of our land uninhibited by statutes, rules, or regulations which unreasonably burden or restrict this movement....

We have no occasion to ascribe the source of this right to travel interstate to a particular constitutional provision. It suffices that, as Mr. Justice Stewart said for the Court in United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 757–758 (1966): “The constitutional right to travel from one State to another...occupies a position fundamental to the concept of our Federal Union. It is a right that has been firmly established and repeatedly recognized....”

Thus, the purpose of deterring the in-migration of indigents cannot serve as justification for the classification created by the one-year waiting period, since that purpose is constitutionally impermissible. If a law has “no other purpose... than to chill the assertion of constitutional rights by penalizing those who choose to exercise them, then it [is] patently unconstitutional.”

Alternatively, appellants argue that even if it is impermissible for a State to attempt to deter the entry of all indigents, the challenged classification may be justified as a permissible state attempt to discourage those indigents who would enter the State solely to obtain larger benefits. [But] a State may no more try to fence out those indigents who seek higher welfare benefits than it may try to fence out indigents generally. [We] do not perceive why a mother who is seeking to make a new life for herself and her children should be regarded as less deserving because she considers, among other factors, the level of a State’s public assistance. Surely such a mother is no less deserving than a mother who moves into a particular State in order to take advantage of its better educational facilities.

Appellants argue further that the challenged classification may be sustained as an attempt to distinguish between new and old residents on the basis of the contribution they have made to the community through the payment of taxes. [But this] would logically permit the State to bar new residents from schools, parks, and libraries or deprive them of police and fire protection. Indeed it would permit the State to apportion all benefits and services according to the past tax contributions of its citizens. The Equal Protection Clause prohibits such an apportionment of state services.¹⁰

We recognize that a State [may] legitimately attempt to limit its expenditures, whether for public assistance, public education, or any other program. But a State may not accomplish such a purpose by invidious distinctions between classes of its citizens. It could not, for example, reduce expenditures for education by barring indigent children from its schools.

Similarly, [appellants] must do more than show that denying welfare benefits to new residents saves money. The saving of welfare costs cannot justify an otherwise invidious classification....

Appellants next advance as justification certain administrative and related governmental objectives allegedly served by the waiting-period requirement. They argue that the requirement (1) facilitates the planning of the welfare budget; (2) provides an objective test of residency; (3) minimizes the opportunity for recipients fraudulently to receive payments from more than one jurisdiction; and (4) encourages early entry of new residents into the labor force.

At the outset, we reject appellants' argument that a mere showing of a rational relationship between the waiting period and these four admittedly permissible state objectives will suffice to justify the classification, [for] in moving from State to State or to the District of Columbia appellees were exercising a constitutional right, and any classification which serves to penalize the exercise of that right, unless shown to be necessary to promote a compelling governmental interest, is unconstitutional. Cf. [Skinner].

[The Court rejects arguments that the waiting period is necessary to facilitate budget predictability, provides an objective test for residency minimizes fraud, or encourages work.]

We conclude therefore that appellants [have] no need to use the one-year requirement for the governmental purposes suggested. Thus, even under traditional equal protection tests a classification of welfare applicants according to whether they have lived in the State for one year would seem irrational and unconstitutional. But, of course, the traditional criteria do not apply in these cases. Since the classification here touches on the fundamental right of interstate movement, its constitutionality must be judged by the stricter standard of whether it promotes a compelling state interest. Under this standard, the waiting-period requirement clearly violates the Equal Protection Clause.²¹

[The Court also rejected the states' argument that Congress had expressly authorized the one-year waiting period and added that, "even if...Congress did approve the imposition of a...waiting period," such an approval "would be unconstitutional," for "Congress may not authorize the States to violate the Equal Protection Clause."]

MR. JUSTICE STEWART, concurring.

The Court today does not "pick out particular human activities, characterize them as 'fundamental,' and give them added protection...." To the contrary, the Court simply recognizes, as it must, an established constitutional right, and gives to that right no less protection than the Constitution itself demands. [As] Mr.

Justice Harlan wrote for the Court more than a decade ago, “[T]o justify the deterrent effect...on the free exercise...of their constitutionally protected right...a ‘...subordinating interest of the State must be compelling.’” [NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958).]...

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, dissenting.

In upholding the equal protection argument, the Court has applied an equal protection doctrine of relatively recent vintage: the rule that statutory classifications which [affect] “fundamental rights” will be held to deny equal protection unless justified by a “compelling” governmental interest.

[I] think this [doctrine] particularly unfortunate [because] it creates an exception which threatens to swallow the standard equal protection rule. Virtually every state statute affects important rights. [The] doctrine is also unnecessary. When the right affected is one assured by the Federal Constitution, any infringement can be dealt with under the Due Process Clause. But when a statute affects only matters not mentioned in the Federal Constitution and is not arbitrary or irrational, I must reiterate that I know of nothing which entitles this Court to pick out particular human activities, characterize them as “fundamental,” and give them added protection under an unusually stringent equal protection test....

[If] the issue is regarded purely as one of equal protection, [this] classification should be judged by ordinary equal protection standards. [And in] light of [the] undeniable relation of residence requirements to valid legislative aims, [I] can find no objection to these residence requirements under the Equal Protection Clause....

The next issue [is] whether a one-year welfare residence requirement amounts to an undue burden upon the right of interstate travel [which I conclude] is a “fundamental” right [which] should be regarded as having its source in the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment....

[The decisive question is] whether the governmental interests served by residence requirements outweigh the burden imposed upon the right to travel. [Taking] all of [the] competing considerations into account, I believe that the balance definitely favors constitutionality. In reaching that conclusion, I do not minimize the importance of the right to travel interstate. However, the impact of residence conditions upon that right is indirect and apparently quite insubstantial. On the other hand, the governmental purposes served by the requirements are legitimate and real, and the residence requirements are clearly suites to their accomplishment. To abolish residence requirements might well discourage highly worthwhile experimentation in the welfare field. The statutes come to us clothed with the authority of Congress and attended by a correspondingly heavy presumption of constitutionality. Moreover, although [it is argued] that the same objectives could have been achieved by less restrictive means, this is an area in which the judiciary should be especially slow to fetter [legislative] judgment....

Residence requirements have advantages, such as administrative simplicity and relative certainty, which are not shared by the alternative solutions....

In these circumstances, I cannot find that the burden imposed by residence requirements upon ability to travel outweighs the governmental interests in their continued employment....

SAENZ v. ROE, 526 U.S. 489 (1999). The Court reaffirmed Shapiro v. Thompson, though on new grounds, and invalidated a California law imposing durational residence requirements by limiting welfare benefits during the recipient's first year of residence. More particularly, California amended its welfare program by limiting new residents to the benefits they would have received in the state of their prior residence—a change approved by the Secretary of Health and Human Services and subsequently by Congress. The Court held that the change violated the privileges or immunities clause of the fourteenth amendment.

The Court began by distinguishing three components of the right to travel: (1) the right to enter and leave another state, an inference from the federal structure without explicit textual support; (2) the right to be treated as “a welcome visitor rather than an unfriendly alien when temporarily present” in a second state, a right rooted in article IV, section 2; and (3) “for those travellers who elect to become permanent residents,” the right to be treated like other citizens of that state. It was the third component of the right that was at issue in Saenz, and the Court squarely rooted that right on the fourteenth amendment ban on “any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.” The discrimination at issue here, against those “who have completed their interstate travel,” was clearly a “penalty” on the exercise of the right to travel.

Adhering to Shapiro, the Court said that it was illegitimate to defend the classifications “by a purpose to deter welfare applicants from migrating to California”; this was an impermissible purpose. Nor was the prospect of saving $10.9 million annually sufficient. The question is “whether the state may accomplish that end by the discriminatory means it has chosen.” The citizenship clause of the fourteenth amendment “does not tolerate a hierarchy of 45 subclasses of similarly situated citizens based on the location of their prior residence.” Nor was federal approval sufficient to save the law, since “Congress may not authorize the States to violate the Fourteenth Amendment,” and since “the protection afforded to the citizen by the Citizenship Clause of that Amendment is a limitation on the powers of the National Government as well as the States.”

Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justice Thomas, dissented. He argued that the right to travel was not implicated, for anyone who has finished his journey is “no longer ‘travelling.’” He also objected to what he saw as a new reading of the privileges or immunities clause, contending that the California provision was a reasonable and “bona fide residence requirement,” akin to durational residence requirements for college eligibility and for divorce. Thus, this was a legitimate effort to ensure that services provided for state residents are enjoyed only by state residents. Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Rehnquist, urged the Court to investigate the original meaning of the privileges or immunities clause, which, he said, was quite limited. Thus the “privileges or immunities of citizens” were understood as “fundamental rights, rather than every public benefit established by positive law.”

Note: The Right to Travel as a “Fundamental Interest”

1. The right to travel. As noted in Shapiro, the Court has long recognized a constitutional right to travel, even though the precise source of the right had been somewhat obscure before Saenz. In Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 35 (1867), for example, the Court invalidated a state law imposing a capitation tax of one dollar on “every person leaving the State by any [vehicle engaged] in the business of transporting passengers for hire.” The Court explained that “[for] all the great purposes for which the Federal Government was formed we are one people, with one common country [and] as members of the same community must have the right to pass and repass through every part of it without interruption.” Similarly, in Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160 (1941), the Court, relying on the commerce clause, invalidated a state statute prohibiting any person from “bringing into the State any indigent person who is not a resident of the State.” Four justices concurred on the ground that the statute violated the privileges or immunities clause of the fourteenth amendment. Recall The Slaughter-House Cases, section B supra, and the Court’s emphasis on the privileges or immunities clause in Saenz.

2. The right to travel versus equal protection. Given the Court’s view that there is an independent constitutional right to travel, why did the Shapiro Court rely on the equal protection clause? Is the alternative approach of the Saenz Court more straightforward? Consider the possibility that the “fundamental interests” strand of equal protection jurisprudence provides the Court a lever with which to encourage the affirmative provision of “positive rights” like welfare. In contrast, substantive provisions of the Constitution have traditionally been limited to the protection of “negative rights” and the elimination of burdens rather than the mandating of benefits.

Do the durational residence requirements at issue in Shapiro violate the substantive right to travel? Abolition of a welfare program would not have violated the Constitution; perhaps this point makes reliance on the equal protection clause necessary for the Shapiro outcome. But if the abolition of a welfare program would be constitutional, and if the program at issue in Shapiro interfered with the right to travel less than that (admittedly permissible) outcome, consider whether reliance on the right to travel might not be misleading and the Shapiro outcome therefore incorrect. Does the rationale in Saenz, emphasizing equal treatment of new permanent residents, clear up the confusion?

Consider the possibility that the result in Shapiro actually discourages states from providing adequate levels of welfare. Without the ability to impose durational residency requirements, states confront a “race to the bottom.” States are deterred from raising welfare levels because if any single state does so, it will be faced with an in-migration of individuals from surrounding states demanding the benefits. Should the federal government be constitutionally permitted to provide a solution to coordination problems of this sort? See the discussion of Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U.S. 548 (1937), and the Social Security Act in Chapter 3, section A, supra.

3. The right to travel and the “necessities of life.” Note the Court’s reference in Shapiro to the “necessities of life.” To what extent does Shapiro turn on this aspect of the case? Do laws that unequally distribute the “necessities of life” infringe a “fundamental” interest? This issue is examined in section E4 infra.

Note: “Penalizing” the Right to Travel

1. Impermissible purposes. The Court in Shapiro distinguished between two types of state purposes—those that are “constitutionally impermissible” and those that are permissible but insufficient to satisfy the “compelling” interest standard. Is it “constitutionally impermissible” for a state (a) to attempt to deter “the in-migration of indigents”; (b) to “attempt to discourage those indigents who would enter the State solely to obtain larger benefits"; and (c) to "attempt to distinguish between new and old residents on the basis of the contribution they have made to the community through the payment of taxes"?

In Zobel v. Williams, 457 U.S. 55 (1982), the Court held that an Alaska statute distributing the income derived from its natural resources to adult citizens in varying amounts depending on length of residence in the state violated the equal protection clause. Citing Shapiro, the Court dismissed the state's objective of rewarding "citizens for past contributions" as "not a legitimate state purpose."

Consider Justice O'Connor's observations in a concurring opinion:

[The] Court misdirects its criticism when it labels Alaska's objective illegitimate. A desire to compensate citizens for their prior contributions is neither inherently invidious nor irrational. [The] difficulty is that plans enacted to further this objective necessarily treat new residents of a State less favorably than the longer-term residents who have past contributions to "reward." This inequality [conflicts] with the constitutional purpose of maintaining a Union rather than a mere "league of States." [The] Court's task, therefore, should be (1) to articulate this constitutional principle, explaining its textual sources, and (2) to test the strength of Alaska's objective against the constitutional imperative. [The] Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV [addresses] just this type of discrimination. [In this case, the statute is invalid, not because the objective is illegitimate, but because] Alaska has not shown that its new residents are the "peculiar source" of any evil [or that there is] a "substantial relationship" between the evil and the discrimination practiced against the noncitizens.

Consider also the views expressed by Justice Brennan in a separate concurring opinion, joined by Justices Marshall, Blackmun, and Powell:

[The] illegitimacy of [the] state purpose [reflects] not the structure of the Federal Union but the idea of constitutionally protected equality. [Even if] the Alaska plan [did not] apply to migrants from sister States [the discrimination would] be constitutionally suspect. [Length] of residence has only the most tenuous relation to the actual service of individuals to the State. Thus, the past contribution rationale proves much too little to provide a rational predicate for discrimination on the basis of length of residence. But it also proves far too much, for "it would permit the State to apportion all benefits and services according to the [past] contributions of its citizens." [Shapiro.] In my view, it is difficult to escape from the recognition that underlying any scheme of classification on the basis of duration of residence, we shall almost invariably find the unstated premise that “some citizens are more equal than others.” We rejected that premise [when] we adopted the Equal Protection Clause.

In Hooper v. Bernalillo County Assessor, 472 U.S. 612 (1985), the Court held that a New Mexico statute granting a special tax exemption to Vietnam veterans who were New Mexico residents before May 8, 1976, violated the equal protection clause. The Court distinguished Shapiro, Dunn v. Blumstein, Memorial Hospital v. Maricopa County, and Sosna v. Iowa, discussed infra, on the ground that they involved waiting periods, whereas the New Mexico statute, like the Alaska law invalidated in Zobel, “creates ‘fixed, permanent distinctions between...classes of concededly bona fide residents’ based on when they arrived in the State.” The Court held that, “stripped of its asserted justifications, the New Mexico statute suffers from the same constitutional flaw as the Alaska statute in Zobel.” See also Attorney General of New York v. Soto-Lopez, 476 U.S. 898 (1986) (invalidating on “right to travel” grounds a New York statute granting an employment preference to resident veterans who resided in New York at the time that they entered military service).

2. Penalties and objectives. In what circumstances may a state burden the right to travel in order to further a constitutionally permissible objective? In Shapiro, the Court invoked strict scrutiny because the durational residence requirements “penalized” the right to travel. Do you accept the “penalty” characterization? Consider the following arguments:

a. In the usual “penalty” case, the existence of a condition on eligibility for a state’s program makes a person worse off with respect to the constitutional right in question than if there were no program at all. For example, if a state grants welfare benefits only to persons who agree not to vote, the right to vote is pressured in a way it would not be if there were no welfare program at all. The situation is different in Shapiro. If state X has a durational residence requirement for the receipt of welfare benefits, a person contemplating a move to state X is no worse off with respect to the right to travel than if state X had no welfare system at all.

b. In the usual “penalty” case, a state withholds an otherwise available benefit from an individual unless she forgoes a constitutional right. For example, if a state grants welfare benefits only to persons who agree not to vote, an individual who exercises her constitutional right to vote will lose a benefit she would otherwise receive. The benefit program thus “penalizes” the exercise of her right. The situation is different in Shapiro. If state X has a durational residence requirement for the receipt of welfare benefits, a person contemplating a move to state X will not receive benefits from state X even if she decides not to travel. If she exercises her right to travel, she does not lose a benefit she would otherwise have received from state X. Thus, insofar as state X is concerned, the individual is no worse off if she moves than if she stays put. State X's residence requirement therefore does not "penalize" her right to travel.

3. Other penalties on the right to travel. Are all durational residency requirements unconstitutional "penalties" on the right to travel? Note footnote 21 in Shapiro, and consider the following cases:

a. Voting. In Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330 (1972), the Court, in a six-to-one decision, held that Tennessee's one-year residence requirement for voting violated the equal protection clause. The Court employed strict equal protection scrutiny both because the requirement interfered with the "fundamental" right to vote, see section E1 supra, and because it "penalized" the "fundamental" right to travel. On the latter issue, the Court explained:

Tennessee seeks to avoid the clear command of Shapiro by arguing that durational residence requirements for voting neither seek to nor actually do deter [travel]. This view represents a fundamental misunderstanding of the law. It is irrelevant whether disenfranchisement or denial of welfare is the more potent deterrent to travel. Shapiro did not rest upon a finding that denial of welfare actually deterred travel. [In] Shapiro we explicitly stated that the compelling-state-interest test would be triggered by "any classification which serves to penalize the exercise of that right...." [Durational] residence laws impermissibly condition and penalize the right to travel by imposing their prohibitions on only those persons who have recently exercised that right. In the present case, such laws force a person [to] choose between travel and the basic right to vote. [Absent] a compelling state interest, a State may not burden the right to travel in this way.

b. Nonemergency medical care. In Memorial Hospital v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250 (1974), the Court held that an Arizona statute requiring a year's residence in a county as a condition to receiving nonemergency medical care at county expense violated the equal protection clause. The Court explained:

Although any durational residence requirement imposes a potential cost on migration, [Shapiro] cautioned that some "waiting-period[s]...may not be penalties." [In Dunn], the Court found that the denial of the franchise, "a fundamental political right," [was] a penalty requiring application of the compelling-state-interest test. In Shapiro, the Court found denial of the basic "necessities of life" to be a penalty. [Whatever] the ultimate parameters of the Shapiro penalty analysis, it is at least clear that medical care is as much “a basic necessity of life” to an indigent as welfare assistance. [It] would be odd, indeed, to find that [Arizona] was required to afford [appellant] welfare assistance to keep him from the discomfort of inadequate housing or the pangs of hunger but could deny him the medical care necessary to relieve him from the wheezing and gasping for breath that attend his illness. [Thus, the challenged requirement] penalizes indigents for exercising their right to migrate [and], “unless shown to be necessary to promote a compelling governmental interest, is unconstitutional.”

The Court held that the state’s justifications for the requirement were not “compelling.”

c. Divorce. In Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393 (1975), the Court upheld a one-year residence requirement for bringing a divorce action against a nonresident. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Rehnquist, explained:

Appellant was not irretrievably foreclosed from obtaining some part of what she sought, as was the case with the welfare recipients in Shapiro, the voters in Dunn, or the indigent patient in Maricopa County. [Iowa’s] requirement delayed her access to the courts, but, by fulfilling it, she could ultimately have obtained the same opportunity for adjudication which she asserts ought to have been hers at an earlier point in time. [Moreover, unlike the residency requirements invalidated in Shapiro, Dunn, and Maricopa County,] Iowa’s residency requirement may reasonably be justified on grounds other than purely budgetary considerations or administrative convenience. [A] decree of divorce [may affect the parties’ marital status, their property rights, and their children]. With consequences of such moment riding on a divorce decree [Iowa] may insist that one seeking to initiate such a proceeding have the modicum of attachment to the State required here. Such a requirement additionally furthers the State’s parallel interests both in avoiding officious intermeddling in matters in which another State has a paramount interest, and in minimizing the susceptibility of its own divorce decrees to collateral attack. [Iowa] may quite reasonably decide that it does not wish to become a divorce mill.

d. Variations. In the light of Shapiro, Dunn, Maricopa County, and Sosna, consider the following: (1) a one-year residency requirement for admittance to the bar, consider Supreme Court of New Hampshire v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274 (1985) (holding that a bona fide residency requirement for admission to the bar violates the privileges and immunities clause of article IV, section 2); (2) a one-year residency requirement for reduced tuition at a state university, consider Vlandis v. Kline, 412 U.S. 441 (1973) (invalidating such a requirement under the due process clause as an unconstitutional “irrebuttable presumption”); (3) a state statute making it a misdemeanor for a parent to abandon a dependent child and a felony for the parent to leave the state after the abandonment, consider Jones v. Helms, 452 U.S. 412 (1981) (upholding such a statute).

4. Bona fide residency requirements. Shapiro dealt with the right to travel in the sense of changing one’s residence from one state to another. After Shapiro, could a state constitutionally deny welfare benefits to nonresidents who are in the state temporarily? Is such a law permissible because it does not implicate the right to travel?

Shapiro dealt with a classification between two groups of residents. After Shapiro, could a state constitutionally deny welfare benefits to former residents who had moved to another state? Consider McCarthy v. Philadelphia Civil Service Commission, 424 U.S. 645 (1976), in which the Court upheld the dismissal of an employee of the fire department who was terminated because he moved to New Jersey in violation of a requirement that city employees be residents of Philadelphia. In a summary per curiam disposition, the Court explained that Shapiro dealt only with durational residence requirements and “did not question ‘the validity [of] bona fide residence requirements.’” Consider also Martinez v. Bynum, 461 U.S. 321 (1983), in which the Court upheld a bona fide residence requirement for attending a state’s public schools. The Court explained: “A bona fide residence requirement [furthers] the substantial state interest in assuring that services provided for its residents are enjoyed only by residents. Such a requirement with respect to attendance in public free schools does not violate the Equal Protection Clause. [It] does not burden or penalize the constitutional right of interstate travel, for any person is free to move to a State and to establish residence there.”

Is the issue in McCarthy and Martinez more sensibly analyzed under the privileges and immunities clause of article IV, section 2? See Supreme Court of New Hampshire v. Piper, supra (bona fide residence requirement for admission to the bar violates article IV, section 2); Supreme Court of Virginia v. Friedman, 487 U.S. 59 (1988) (same); United Building & Construction Trades Council v. Mayor of Camden, 465 U.S. 208 (1984) (ordinance requiring at least 40 percent of employees of contractors working on city projects to be city residents may violate article IV, section 2); Hicklin v. Orbeck, 437 U.S. 518 (1978) (Alaska statute requiring private employers to grant hiring preferences to Alaska residents violates article IV, section 2); Baldwin v. Fish & Game Commission, 436 U.S. 371 (1978) (upholding against article IV, section 2 and equal protection attack a requirement that nonresidents pay higher fees than residents for hunting licenses).

4. Welfare

In Harper, Griffin, and Douglas, the Court emphasized the impact of certain forms of inequality on the poor. In Shapiro, the Court observed that durational residence requirements for welfare affect “the ability [of] families to obtain the very means to subsist—food, shelter, and other necessities of life.” After Shapiro, a number of courts and commentators maintained that welfare constituted a “fundamental” interest for purposes of equal protection review. In fact, this was a distinctive, but evidently short, period in the history of American constitutional thought.

Some people suggested that welfare, like voting and access to the judicial process, is a “fundamental” interest because it is “preservative of all rights.” See, e.g., Michelman, Welfare Rights in a Constitutional Democracy, 1979 Wash. U. L.Q. 659 Michelman, Foreword: On Protecting the Poor through the Fourteenth Amendment, 83 Harv. L. Rev. 7, 9, 14–19 (1969). Many nations, including South Africa, have constitutionalized welfare rights in one or another form. Section 26 of the Constitution of South Africa states, “Everyone has the right to have access to adequate housing.” It adds, “The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realization of this right.” What does this mean? The South Africa Constitutional Court has said that denials of the right to housing are justiciable, but that the state is under no obligation to ensure that everyone has a decent home. For discussion, see C. Sunstein, The Second Bill of Rights (2004).

DANDRIDGE v. WILLIAMS, 397 U.S. 471 (1970). The Court upheld a provision of Maryland’s Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program that granted most eligible families their computed “standard of need,” but imposed a maximum monthly grant of $250 per family regardless of family size or computed need. Justice Stewart delivered the opinion of the Court: “[Here] we deal with state regulation in the social and economic field, not affecting freedoms guaranteed by the Bill of Rights, and claimed to violate the Fourteenth Amendment only because the regulation results in some disparity in grants of welfare payments to the largest AFDC families. For this Court to approve the invalidation of state economic or social regulation [here] would be far too reminiscent of an era when the Court thought the Fourteenth Amendment gave it power to strike down state laws ‘because they may be unwise, improvident, or out of harmony with a particular school of thought' [Lee Optical].

"In the area of economics and social welfare, a State does not violate the Equal Protection Clause merely because the classifications made by its laws are imperfect. If the classification has some 'reasonable basis,' it does not offend the [Constitution]. To be sure, the cases [enunciating] this [standard] have in the main involved state regulation of business or industry. The administration of public welfare assistance, by contrast, involves the most basic economic needs of impoverished human beings. We recognize the dramatically real factual difference between the [business] cases and this one, but we can find no basis for applying a different constitutional standard....

"[The] maximum grant regulation is constitutionally valid. [By] keying the maximum family AFDC grants to the minimum wage a steadily employed head of a household receives, [the regulation encourages employment and avoids discrimination between welfare families and the families of the working poor]. [Although the regulation may be both over- and underinclusive,] the Equal Protection Clause does not require that a State must choose between attacking every aspect of a problem or not attacking the problem at all. [It] is enough that the State's action be rationally based and free from invidious discrimination. The regulation before us meets that test."

Justice Marshall, joined by Justice Brennan, dissented: "The cases [that used] a 'mere rationality' test [involved] the regulation of business interests. [But this] case, involving the literally vital interests of a powerless minority—poor families without breadwinners—is far removed from the area of business regulation. [On the other hand, in] my view, equal protection analysis of this case is not appreciably advanced by the a priori definition of a 'right,' fundamental or otherwise. Rather, concentration must be placed upon the character of the classification in question, the relative importance to individuals in the class discriminated against of the governmental benefits that they do not receive, and the asserted state interests in support of the classification....

"It is the individual interests here at stake [that] most clearly distinguish this case from the 'business regulation' equal protection cases. AFDC support to needy dependent children provides the stuff that sustains those children's lives: food, clothing, shelter. And this Court has already recognized [that] when a benefit [is] necessary to sustain life, stricter constitutional standards, both procedural and substantive, are applied to the deprivation of that benefit. [Citing, e.g., Shapiro v. Thompson, section E3, supra; Goldberg v. Kelly, section G1, infra.]...

"Appellees are not a gas company or an optical dispenser, they are needy dependent children and families who are discriminated against by the State. The basis of that discrimination [is] too arbitrary, [the] impact on those discriminated against [too] great, and the supposed interests served [too] attenuated to meet the requirements of the Constitution.”

Note: Dandridge and the Judicial Role in the Welfare Context

1. Dandridge and positive rights. Should the Court have subjected the regulation at issue in Dandridge to strict scrutiny because it imposed a penalty on the “fundamental” interest in procreation? Would it be constitutional for a state to impose a $250 fine on any poor family that had more than a certain number of children? Is a cap on welfare benefits for families over a certain size functionally different from such a fine? There is a sense in which a welfare claimant is not asking the government to leave him alone but is asking it to give him something. The Constitution is ordinarily thought of as creating limitations on government rather than as establishing affirmative rights. In this sense, constitutional doctrine has a powerful libertarian dimension. Recall the discussion of Lochner in section D supra. Does this fact distinguish welfare from other interests that have been declared “fundamental”? Note that the eminent domain and contracts clauses also have a positive dimension, since private property rights depend on the state’s willingness to have and to enforce trespass laws, and since courts have to be available to vindicate contractual rights.

Note also that spending decisions have a “polycentric” character. If the Court expands the class of beneficiaries, the state may simply reduce the benefits for all recipients. Thus, the effect of declaring welfare to be a fundamental interest may be not to benefit the poor as a class but to benefit some poor persons at the expense of others. On the relevance of this point, see S. Holmes and C. Sunstein, The Cost of Rights (1999).

2. The reach of Dandridge: welfare. Since Dandridge, the Court has generally adhered to the view that rational basis review is the appropriate standard for the evaluation of welfare classifications. See, e.g., Califano v. Boles, 443 U.S. 282 (1979) (upholding a provision of the Social Security Act restricting “mothers’ insurance benefits” to widows and divorced wives of wage earners); Jefferson v. Hackney, 406 U.S. 535 (1972) (upholding a provision of a state welfare program authorizing payment of a lower percentage of need to recipients of AFDC than to recipients of other forms of categorical welfare assistance); Richardson v. Belcher, 404 U.S. 78 (1971) (upholding a provision of the Social Security Act reducing disability benefits for amounts received from workers’ compensation but not for amounts received from private insurance).

3. The reach of Dandridge: housing and health. In Lindsey v. Normet, 405 U.S. 56 (1972), the Court upheld a state's summary "forcible entry and wrongful detainer" procedures for the eviction of tenants after alleged nonpayment of rent. The Court rejected a claim that "the 'need for decent shelter' and the 'right to retain peaceful possession of one's home' are fundamental interests which are particularly important to the poor and which may be trespassed upon only after the State demonstrates some superior interest." Applying rational basis review, the Court found no constitutional defect in the fact that eviction actions are more summary than "other litigation," for the "unique factual and legal characteristics of the landlord-tenant relationship [justify] special statutory treatment." Justices Douglas and Brennan dissented.

The Court rejected a claim to governmental protection in Collins v. Texas, 484 U.S. 924 (1992). Larry Collins, a municipal employee, died of asphyxia after entering a manhole to unstop a sewer line. His widow brought suit, claiming that her husband had a constitutional right to be free from unreasonable risks of harm or at least to be protected from deliberate official indifference to employee safety. The Court concluded that the Constitution had not been violated, at least in the absence of an allegation of deliberate harm or of willful violation of rights: "Neither the text nor the history of the Due Process Clause supports petitioner's claim that the governmental employer's duty to provide its employees with a safe working environment is a substantive component of the Due Process Clause." Relying on the DeShaney case (see Chapter 9, section B1, infra) and the action/inaction distinction, the Court found "unprecedented" the suggestion that there is "a federal constitutional obligation to provide [employees] with certain minimal levels of safety and security." Nor was a duty of training or warning implied by the Constitution. "Decisions concerning the allocation of resources to individual programs, such as sewer maintenance, and to particular aspects of those programs, such as the training and compensation of employees, involve a host of policy choices that must be made by locally elected representatives."

The Collins Court acknowledged that there might be a constitutional claim if the state had coerced a citizen by placing him in hazardous conditions—for example, if a citizen confined in a facility for mental illness is not provided with "minimal custodial standards." What is the difference between such a case and Collins itself?

4. The limits of Dandridge: Moreno. In U.S. Department of Agriculture v. Moreno, 413 U.S. 528 (1973), the Court, in a seven-to-two decision, invalidated a provision of the Food Stamp Act excluding from participation in the program any household containing an individual who is unrelated to any other household member. The government argued that the challenged classification was rationally related to the legitimate government interest in minimizing fraud because “Congress might rationally have thought [that] households with one or more unrelated members are more likely than ‘fully related’ households to contain individuals who abuse the program by fraudulently failing to report sources of income.” In rejecting this argument, the Court maintained that “the challenged classification [does] not operate so as rationally to further the prevention of fraud,” for, “even if we were to accept as rational the Government’s [assumptions] concerning the differences between ‘related’ and ‘unrelated’ households, we still could not agree” that the challenged provision “constitutes a rational effort to deal with” this concern, for “in practical operation,” it “excludes from participation in [the] program, not those persons who are ‘likely to abuse the program’ but, rather, only those persons who are so desperately in need of aid that they cannot even afford to alter their living arrangements so as to retain their eligibility.”

Does Moreno suggest that, despite Dandridge, the Court may apply a more stringent standard where a law involves not a mere relative deprivation of welfare benefits, as in Dandridge, but an absolute deprivation, as in Moreno?

5. Education

San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez

411 U.S. 1 (1973)

[Public school education has long been financed largely by means of property taxes imposed by local school districts. This suit challenged the constitutionality of Texas’s use of this financing system on the ground that it produced substantial interdistrict disparities in per-pupil expenditures. For example, the Edgewood Independent School District, the least affluent of the seven school districts in metropolitan San Antonio, had an assessed property value of $5,960 per student. By imposing a property tax of $1.05 per $100 of assessed property value—the highest rate in the metropolitan area—the district raised $26 per student in local funds. In contrast, the Alamo Heights Independent School District, the most affluent in the area, had an assessed property value per student of more than $49,000 and with a tax rate of only $.85 per $100 was able to raise $333 per student. Although contributions from a state-funded “foundation program” tended to reduce interdistrict disparities, the inclusion of such funds still left a substantial difference—$248 per pupil in Edgewood as compared to $558 in Alamo Heights. A federal district court, applying strict scrutiny, held that the Texas scheme violated the equal protection clause. The Supreme Court reversed.]

MR. JUSTICE POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court....

I

[We] must decide, first, whether the Texas system of financing public education operates to the disadvantage of some suspect class or impinges upon a fundamental right explicitly or implicitly protected by the Constitution, thereby requiring strict judicial scrutiny. If so, the judgment of the District Court should be affirmed. If not, the Texas scheme must still be examined to determine whether it rationally furthers some legitimate, articulated state purpose and therefore does not constitute an invidious discrimination in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

II

[We] find neither the suspect-classification nor the fundamental-interest analysis persuasive.

A

[The Court rejected the claim that strict scrutiny was appropriate because the Texas system discriminated against the “poor.” The issue of wealth discrimination in Rodriguez is addressed more fully in Chapter 5 supra.]

In Brown v. Board of Education, a unanimous Court recognized that “education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments.”...

Nothing this Court holds today in any way detracts from our historic dedication to public education. [But] the importance of a service performed by the State does not determine whether it must be regarded as fundamental for purposes of examination under the Equal Protection Clause.

[It] is not the province of this Court to create substantive constitutional rights in the name of guaranteeing equal protection of the laws. Thus, the key to discovering whether education is “fundamental” is not to be found in comparisons of the relative societal significance of education as opposed to subsistence or housing. Nor is it to be found by weighing whether education is as important as the right to travel. Rather, the answer lies in assessing whether there is a right to education explicitly or implicitly guaranteed by the Constitution.⁷⁶

Education, of course, is not among the rights afforded explicit protection under our Federal Constitution. Nor do we find any basis for saying it is implicitly so protected. [It] is appellees' contention, however, that education is distinguishable from other services and benefits provided by the State because it bears a peculiarly close relationship to other rights and liberties accorded protection under the Constitution. Specifically, they insist that education is itself a fundamental personal right because it is essential to the effective exercise of First Amendment freedoms and to intelligent utilization of the right to vote. In asserting a nexus between speech and education, appellees urge that the right to speak is meaningless unless the speaker is capable of articulating his thoughts intelligently and persuasively....

A similar line of reasoning is pursued with respect to the right to vote.⁷⁸ Exercise of the franchise, it is contended, cannot be divorced from the educational foundation of the voter....

We need not dispute any of these propositions. The Court has long afforded zealous protection against unjustifiable governmental interference with the individual's rights to speak and to vote. Yet we have never presumed to possess either the ability or the authority to guarantee to the citizenry the most effective speech or the most informed electoral choice. That these may be desirable goals [is] not to be doubted. [But] they are not values to be implemented by judicial intrusion into otherwise legitimate state activities.

[Whatever] merit appellees' argument might have if a State's financing system occasioned an absolute denial of educational opportunities to any of its children, that argument provides no basis for finding an interference with fundamental rights where only relative differences in spending levels are involved and where—as is true in the present case—no charge fairly could be made that the system fails to provide each child with an opportunity to acquire the basic minimal skills necessary for the enjoyment of the rights of speech and of full participation in the political process.

Furthermore, the logical limitations on appellees' nexus theory are difficult to perceive. How, for instance, is education to be distinguished from the significant personal interests in the basics of decent food and shelter? Empirical examination might well buttress an assumption that the ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-housed are among the most ineffective participants in the political process, and that they derive the least enjoyment from the benefits of the First Amendment. If so, appellees' thesis would cast serious doubt on the authority of Dandridge v. Williams and Lindsey v. Normet [405 U.S. 56 (1972)]....

[We] have here nothing less than a direct attack on the way in which Texas has chosen to raise and disburse state and local tax revenues. [Appellees] would have the Court intrude in an area in which it has traditionally deferred to state legislatures. [No] scheme of taxation, whether the tax is imposed on property, income, or purchases of goods and services, has yet been devised which is free of all discriminatory impact. In such a complex arena in which no perfect alternatives exist, the Court does well not to impose too rigorous a standard of scrutiny lest all local fiscal schemes become subjects of criticism under the Equal Protection Clause.

[Moreover], this case also involves the most persistent and difficult questions of educational policy, another area in which this Court's lack of specialized knowledge and experience counsels against premature interference with the informed judgments made at the state and local levels. Education, perhaps even more than welfare assistance, presents a myriad of "intractable economic, social, and even philosophical problems."...

III

[While] assuring a basic education for every child in the State, [the Texas system of school financing] permits and encourages a large measure of participation in and control of each district's schools at the local level. In an era that has witnessed a consistent trend toward centralization of the functions of government, local sharing of responsibility for public education has survived. [In] part, local control means [the] freedom to devote more money to the education of one's children. Equally important, however, is the opportunity it offers for participation in the decisionmaking process that determines how those local tax dollars will be spent. Each locality is free to tailor local programs to local needs. Pluralism also affords some opportunity for experimentation, innovation, and a healthy competition for educational [excellence]. Appellees suggest that local control could be preserved and promoted under other financing systems that resulted in more equality in educational expenditures. While it is no doubt true that reliance on local property taxation for school revenues provides less freedom of choice with respect to expenditures for some districts than for others, the existence of "some inequality" in the manner in which the State's rationale is achieved is not alone a sufficient basis for striking down the entire system.

[Nor] must the financing system fail because, as appellees suggest, other methods of satisfying the State's interest, which occasion "less drastic" disparities in expenditures, might be conceived. Only where state action impinges on the exercise of fundamental constitutional rights or liberties must it be found to have chosen the least restrictive alternative. [It] is also well to remember that even those districts that have reduced ability to make free decisions with respect to how much they spend on education still retain under the present system a large measure of authority as to how available funds will be allocated. They further enjoy the power to make numerous other decisions with respect to the operation of the schools. The people of Texas may be justified in believing that other systems of school financing, which place more of the financial responsibility in the hands of the State, will result in a comparable lessening of desired local autonomy....

[The] constitutional standard under the Equal Protection Clause is whether the challenged state action rationally furthers a legitimate state purpose or interest. We hold that the Texas plan abundantly satisfies this standard....

Reversed.

[The concurring opinion of Justice Stewart and the dissenting opinion of Justice Brennan are omitted.]

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, with whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS and MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN join, dissenting.

[This] case would be quite different if it were true that the Texas system, while insuring minimum educational expenditures in every district through state funding, extended a meaningful option to all local districts to increase their per-pupil [expenditures. But for] districts with a low per-pupil real estate tax base [the] Texas system utterly fails to extend a realistic choice to parents because the property tax, which is the only revenue-raising mechanism extended to school districts, is practically and legally unavailable....

In order to equal the highest yield in any other Bexar County district, [Edgewood] would be required to tax at the prohibitive rate of $5.76 per $100. But state law places a $1.50 per $100 ceiling on the maintenance tax rate. [Edgewood] is thus precluded in law, as well as in fact, from achieving a yield even close to that of some other districts. [Requiring] the State to establish only that unequal treatment is in furtherance of a permissible goal, without also requiring the State to show that the means chosen to effectuate that goal are rationally related to its achievement, makes equal protection analysis no more than an empty gesture....

MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL, with whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS concurs,

[The] Court apparently seeks to establish today that equal protection cases fall into one of two neat categories which dictate the appropriate standard of review—strict scrutiny or mere rationality. But this Court's decisions in the field of equal protection defy such easy categorization. A principled reading of what this Court has done reveals that it has applied a spectrum of standards in reviewing discrimination allegedly violative of the Equal Protection Clause. This spectrum clearly comprehends variations in the degree of care with which the Court will scrutinize particular classifications, depending, I believe, on the constitutional and societal importance of the interest adversely affected and the recognized invidiousness of the basis upon which the particular classification is drawn....

[I] would like to know where the Constitution guarantees the right to procreate [Skinner v. Oklahoma], or the right to vote in state elections [Reynolds v. Sims],⁶⁰ or the right to an appeal from a criminal conviction [Griffin.]⁶¹ These are instances in which, due to the importance of the interests at stake, the Court has displayed a strong concern with the existence of discriminatory state treatment. But the Court has never said or indicated that these are interests which independently enjoy full-blown constitutional protection....

The majority is, of course, correct when it suggests that the process of determining which interests are fundamental is a difficult one. But I do not think the problem is insurmountable. [The] determination of which interests are fundamental should be firmly rooted in the text of the Constitution. The task in every case should be to determine the extent to which constitutionally guaranteed rights are dependent on interests not mentioned in the Constitution. As the nexus between the specific constitutional guarantee and the nonconstitutional interest draws closer, the nonconstitutional interest becomes more fundamental and the degree of judicial scrutiny applied when the interest is infringed on a discriminatory basis must be adjusted accordingly. Thus, it cannot be denied that interests such as procreation, the exercise of the state franchise, and access to criminal appellate processes are not fully guaranteed to the citizen by our Constitution. But these interests have nonetheless been afforded special judicial consideration in the face of discrimination because they are, to some extent, interrelated with constitutional guarantees. Procreation is now understood to be important because of its interaction with the established constitutional right of privacy. The exercise of the state franchise is closely tied to basic civil and political rights inherent in the First Amendment. And access to criminal appellate processes enhances the integrity of the range of rights implicit in the [guarantee] of due process of law. Only if we closely protect the related interests from state discrimination do we ultimately ensure the integrity of the constitutional guarantee itself. This is the real lesson that must be taken from our previous decisions involving interests deemed to be fundamental....

[It] is true that this Court has never deemed the provision of free public education to be required by the Constitution. [Nevertheless] the fundamental importance of education is amply indicated by the prior decisions of this Court, by the unique status accorded public education by our society, and by the close relationship between education and some of our most basic constitutional values.

Education directly affects the ability of a child to exercise his First Amendment rights, both as a source and as a receiver of information and ideas. [Of] particular importance is the relationship between education and the political process [and] the demonstrated effect of education on the exercise of the franchise by the electorate. [It] is this very sort of intimate relationship between a particular personal interest and specific constitutional guarantees that has heretofore caused the Court to attach special significance, for purposes of equal protection analysis, to individual interests such as procreation and the exercise of the state franchise.⁷⁴ [These factors] compel us to recognize the fundamentality of education and to scrutinize with appropriate care the bases for state discrimination affecting equality of educational opportunity in Texas' school districts—a conclusion which is only strengthened when we consider the character of the classification in this case....

[The] only justification offered [to] sustain the discrimination in educational opportunity caused by the Texas financing scheme is local educational control. [But] on this record, it is apparent that the State's purported concern with local control is offered primarily as an excuse rather than as a justification for interdistrict inequality.

In Texas, statewide laws regulate [the] most minute details of local public education. [But] even if we accept Texas' general dedication to local control in educational matters, it is difficult to find any evidence of such dedication with respect to fiscal matters. [If] Texas had a system truly dedicated to local fiscal control, one would expect the quality of the educational opportunity provided in each district to vary with the decision of the voters in that district as to the level of sacrifice they wish to make for public education. In fact, the Texas scheme produces precisely the opposite result. Local school districts cannot choose to have the best education in the State by imposing the highest tax rate. Instead, the quality of the educational opportunity offered by any particular district is largely determined by the amount of taxable property located in the district—a factor over which local voters can exercise no control....

In my judgment, any substantial degree of scrutiny of the operation of the Texas financing scheme reveals that the State has selected means wholly inappropriate to secure its purported interest in assuring its school districts local fiscal control. [Appellees] have pointed out a variety of alternative financing schemes which may serve the State's purported interest in local control as well as, if not better than, the present scheme without the current impairment of the educational opportunity of vast numbers of Texas schoolchildren.

I see no need, however, to explore the practical or constitutional merits of those suggested alternatives at this time for, whatever their positive or negative features, experience with the present financing scheme impugns any suggestion that it constitutes a serious effort to provide local fiscal control....

Note: The Rodriguez Formulation

1. Education as a fundamental interest. To what extent does the Court's reiteration that the Texas system did not involve an "absolute deprivation" of education impeach its conclusion that education is not a "fundamental interest"? If the state is under no obligation to provide police services to protect life (as DeShaney, Chapter 9 infra, seems to suggest), how can it be under an obligation to provide some level of educational services?

If education were a "fundamental" interest, note that there would be serious problems in judicial assessment of what kind of education, and how much education, a person is entitled to receive. Would public schools be required to adopt standardized curricula? Would state universities be required to pay the tuition costs of indigents?

2. Territorial discrimination. The school financing scheme upheld in Rodriguez treats individuals differently depending on where they live in the state. How should the Court analyze such inequalities? Can a state constitutionally provide more money for the education of students who live in the northern part of the state? For discussion, see Neuman, Territorial Discrimination, Equal Protection, and Self-Determination, 135 U. Pa. L. Rev. 261 (1987).

Compare Rodriguez to Papasan v. Allain, 478 U.S. 265 (1986). While Mississippi was still a territory, Congress reserved certain plots of land within each township for support of public schools. However, Congress failed to reserve such lands in northern Mississippi, which was then held by the Chickasaw Indian Nation. In 1836, Congress sought to remedy this oversight by vesting certain lands in the state for the use of schools within the Chickasaw Cession, but the state (with the permission of Congress) sold these lands and invested the proceeds in railroads that were destroyed during the Civil War. The result is that today school districts in most of the state receive an average income of $75.34 per pupil from reserved lands located within their borders, while Chickasaw Cession schools receive annual appropriations, designed to compensate for the lost lands, of only $.63 per pupil.

Petitioners filed an action claiming, inter alia, that the disparity in funding violated the equal protection clause. The court of appeals held that in light of Rodriguez, the trial court correctly granted respondent's motion to dismiss, but the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice White, reversed. Because petitioners had not alleged any facts supporting the contention that they were denied a minimally adequate education, the Court found it unnecessary to determine whether such a denial would infringe on a fundamental right and trigger strict scrutiny. Nonetheless, the Court ruled that the lower court had erred in holding that Rodriguez compelled dismissal of the suit:

As we read their complaint, the petitioners do not challenge the overall organization of the Mississippi public school financing program. Instead, their challenge is restricted to one aspect of that program....

This case is [very] different from Rodriguez, where the differential financing available to school districts was traceable to school district funds available from local real estate taxation, not to a state decision to divide state resources unequally among school districts. The rationality of the disparity in Rodriguez, therefore, which rested on the fact that funding disparities based on differing local wealth were a necessary adjunct of allowing meaningful local control over school funding, does not settle the constitutionality of disparities alleged in this case.

The Court remanded the case so that the lower court could consider in the first instance whether, given state title to the lands, the equal protection clause permitted the state to distribute income from them unequally among school districts.

Justice Powell, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Rehnquist, dissented. He pointed out that income from the lands accounted for only 1.5 percent of overall funding for the schools and argued that such de minimis variations in funding were insufficient to establish an equal protection clause violation.

Plyler v. Doe

JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court....

[The Court held unconstitutional a Texas statute that authorized local school districts to deny free public education to children who had not been “legally admitted” into the United States. Pursuant to this statute, the Tyler Independent School District required “undocumented” children to pay a “tuition fee” in order to enroll.]

[In] applying the Equal Protection Clause to most forms of state action, we [seek] only the assurance that the classification at issue bears some fair relationship to a legitimate public purpose.

But we would not be faithful to our obligations under the Fourteenth Amendment if we applied so deferential a standard to every classification. [With] respect to [some] classifications, it is appropriate to enforce the mandate of equal protection by requiring the State to demonstrate that its classification has been precisely tailored to serve a compelling governmental interest. In addition, we have recognized that certain forms of legislative classification, while not facially invidious, nonetheless give rise to recurring constitutional difficulties; in these limited circumstances we have sought the assurance that the classification reflects a reasoned judgment consistent with the ideal of equal protection by inquiring whether it may fairly be viewed as furthering a substantial interest of the State. We turn to a consideration of the standard appropriate for the evaluation of [the challenged law].

Sheer incapability or lax enforcement of the laws barring entry into this country, [has] resulted in the creation of a substantial “shadow population” of illegal migrants—numbering in the millions—within our borders. This situation raises the specter of a permanent caste of undocumented resident aliens, encouraged by some to remain here as a source of cheap labor, but nevertheless denied the benefits that our society makes available to citizens and lawful residents. [The Court rejected the claim that “illegal aliens” are a suspect class on the ground that illegal status is at least partly voluntary and that that status is not irrelevant to legitimate government purposes.]

The children who are plaintiffs in these cases are special members of this underclass. [Adults] who elect to enter our territory by stealth and in violation of our law should be prepared to bear the consequences, including, but not limited to, deportation. But the children [of] illegal entrants are not comparably situated. [They] “can affect neither their parents’ conduct nor their own status.” [Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762 (1977).]

directed against children, and imposes its discriminatory burden on the basis of a legal characteristic over which children can have little control. It is thus difficult to conceive of a rational justification for penalizing these children for their presence within the United States. Yet that appears to be precisely the effect of [the law].

Public education is not a “right” granted to individuals by the Constitution. [Rodriguez.] But neither is it merely some governmental “benefit” indistinguishable from other forms of social welfare legislation. Both the importance of education in maintaining our basic institutions, and the lasting impact of its deprivation on the life of the child, mark the distinction. [“Some] degree of education is necessary to prepare citizens to participate effectively and intelligently in our open political system if we are to preserve freedom and independence.” [In] addition, education provides the basic tools by which individuals might lead economically productive lives to the benefit of us all. In sum, education has a fundamental role in maintaining the fabric of our society. We cannot ignore the significant social costs borne by our Nation when select groups are denied the means to absorb the values and skills upon which our social order rests.

In addition to the pivotal role of education in sustaining our political and cultural heritage, denial of education to some isolated group of children poses an affront to one of the goals of the Equal Protection Clause: the abolition of governmental barriers presenting unreasonable obstacles to advancement on the basis of individual merit. [Illiteracy] is an enduring disability. The inability to read and write will handicap the individual deprived of a basic education each and every day of his life. The inestimable toll of that deprivation on the social, economic, intellectual, and psychological well-being of the individual, and the obstacle it poses to individual achievement, make it most difficult to reconcile [a] status-based denial of basic education with the framework of equality embodied in the Equal Protection Clause.

These well-settled principles allow us to determine the proper level of deference to be afforded [the Texas statute]. Undocumented aliens [are not] a suspect class [and] education [is not] a fundamental [right]. But more is involved in [this case] than the abstract question whether [the Texas statute] discriminates against a suspect class, or whether education is a fundamental right. [The statute] imposes a lifetime hardship on a discrete class of children not accountable for their disabling status. [In] determining the rationality of [the challenged statute], we may appropriately take into account its costs to the Nation and to the innocent children who are its victims. In light of these countervailing costs, the discrimination contained in [the statute] can hardly be considered rational unless it furthers some substantial goal of the State.

It is the State's principal argument [that] the undocumented status of these children vel non establishes a sufficient rational basis for denying them benefits that a State might choose to afford other residents. The State notes that while other aliens are admitted "on an equality of legal privileges with all citizens under non-discriminatory laws," the asserted right of these children to an education can claim no implicit congressional imprimatur. Indeed, in the State's view, Congress' apparent disapproval of the presence of these children within the United States [provides] authority for its decision to impose upon them special disabilities. Faced with an equal protection challenge respecting the treatment of aliens, we agree that the courts must be attentive to congressional policy; [but] we are unable to find in the congressional immigration scheme any statement of policy that might weigh significantly in arriving at an equal protection balance concerning the State's authority to deprive these children of an education.

Congress has developed a complex scheme governing admission to our Nation and status within our borders. The obvious need for delicate policy judgments has counseled the Judicial Branch to avoid intrusion into this field. But this traditional caution does not persuade us that unusual deference must be shown the [challenged classification]. The States enjoy no power with respect to the classification of aliens. This power is "committed to the political branches of the Federal Government." [And although] the States do have some authority to act with respect to illegal aliens, at least where such action mirrors federal objectives and furthers a legitimate state [goal], there is no indication that the disability imposed by [the challenged law] corresponds to any identifiable congressional policy....

To be sure, like all persons who have entered the United States unlawfully, these children are subject to deportation. But there is no assurance that a child subject to deportation will ever be deported. [We] are reluctant to impute to Congress the intention to withhold from these children, for so long as they are present in this country through no fault of their own, access to a basic education. In other contexts, undocumented status, coupled with some articulable federal policy, might enhance state authority with respect to the treatment of undocumented aliens. But in the area of special constitutional sensitivity presented by these cases, and in the absence of any contrary indication fairly discernible in the present legislative record, we perceive no national policy that supports the State in denying these children an elementary education....

[The State argues further] that the classification at issue furthers an interest in the "preservation of the state's limited resources for the education of its lawful residents.” [But the] State must do more than justify its classification with a concise expression of an intention to discriminate. [We] discern three colorable state interests that might support [the classification].

[The Court considers and rejects the state’s arguments that the classification protects the state from an influx of illegal immigrants, that undocumented children pose a special burden on the educational system, and that these children are less likely to remain within the state.]

If the State is to deny a discrete group of innocent children the free public education that it offers to other children residing within its borders, that denial must be justified by a showing that it furthers some substantial state interest. No such showing was made here....

Affirmed.

JUSTICE MARSHALL, concurring.

While I join the Court opinion, I do so without in any way retreating from my opinion in [Rodriguez].

JUSTICE BLACKMUN, concurring.

[This] conclusion is fully consistent with Rodriguez, [for the] Court there reserved judgment on the constitutionality of a state system that “occurred an absolute denial of educational opportunities to any of its children.”...

JUSTICE POWELL, concurring.

I join the opinion of the Court, and write separately to emphasize the unique character of the [case] before us....

Although the analogy is not perfect, our holding today does find support in decisions of this Court with respect to the status of illegitimate. [In this case], Texas effectively denies to the school-age children of illegal aliens the opportunity to attend the free public schools that the State makes available to all residents. They are excluded only because of a status resulting from the violation by parents or guardians of our immigration laws and the fact that they remain in our country unlawfully. The appellee children are innocent in this respect.

[A] legislative classification that threatens the creation of an underclass of future citizens and residents cannot be reconciled with one of the fundamental purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment. In these unique circumstances, the Court properly may require that the State’s interests be substantial and that the means bear a “fair and substantial relation” to these interests.³ ...

CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER, with whom JUSTICE WHITE, JUSTICE REHNQUIST, and JUSTICE O'CONNOR join, dissenting.

[The] Court expressly—and correctly—rejects any suggestion that illegal aliens are a suspect class, or that education is a fundamental right. Yet by patching together bits and pieces of what might be termed quasi-suspect-class and quasi-fundamental-rights analysis, the Court spins out a theory custom-tailored to the facts of [this case]. If ever a court was guilty of an unabashedly result-oriented approach, this case is a prime example....

Note: Plyler and the Equal Protection Clause

1. The rationale and limits of Plyler. What is the rationale of Plyler? Consider the view that the Court cobbled together a set of disparate doctrines in a way that creates decision akin to a “restricted railroad ticket, good for this day and train only.” Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649, 669 (1944) (separate opinion of Roberts, J.). In Martinez v. Bynum, 461 U.S. 321 (1983), the Court upheld a Texas statute that authorized local school districts to deny tuition-free admission to public schools to minors who live apart from their parents or guardians and whose presence in the district is “for the primary purpose of attending the public free schools.” Justice Powell wrote the opinion of the Court:

[The challenged bona fide residence] requirement implicates no “suspect” classification; [it] does not burden or penalize the constitutional right of interstate travel, for any person is free to move to [the] State and to establish residence there; [and] the “service” [denied] to nonresidents is not a fundamental right protected by the Constitution. [Citing Plyler.] [Moreover, as a bona fide residence requirement, the challenged statute furthers] the substantial state interest in assuring that [educational] services provided for its residents are enjoyed only by residents. [The requirement thus] satisfies constitutional standards.

Justice Marshall dissented. Is Martinez consistent with Plyler?

2. More limits of Plyler: Kadrmas. In Kadrmas v. Dickinson Public Schools, 487 U.S. 450 (1988), the Court, in a five-to-four decision, upheld a program whereby North Dakota permitted local school boards to assess a user fee for transporting students to and from public schools. Relying primarily on Plyler, appellants contended that the user fee, which could not exceed the estimated cost to the school district of providing the service, unconstitutionally deprived those who could not “afford to pay it of ‘minimum access to education.’” The Court explained that it had not extended Plyler beyond its “unique circumstances.”

Moreover, Plyler did not govern this case, for the children in this case “had not been penalized by the government for illegal conduct by [their] parents,” and the Court saw no “reason to suppose that this user fee will ‘promot[e] the creation and perpetuation of a sub-class of illiterates.’” The Court emphasized that, because the Constitution does not require the state to provide bus service at all, it surely does not require the state to provide free bus service to anyone.

3. “Fundamental” interests and the equal protection clause: concluding thoughts. What is the justification for special scrutiny of classifications affecting fundamental interests under the equal protection clause? Consider these ideas, which seem to run through the cases. (a) Sometimes the Constitution recognizes that the state need not provide certain things, but it constrains the distribution of those things once the state has provided them. (b) Sometimes the government’s justification for an inequality must become more persuasive as the interest being treated unequally becomes more important. (c) Sometimes there are constitutional constraints on the use of wealth, even the de facto use of wealth, in allocating interests that go to one’s status as a citizen in a democratic nation. (d) Although the Constitution is mostly concerned with the protection of negative rights, sometimes positive rights also deserve protection.

But consider this evaluation:

The relationship of [the] “fundamental personal right” analysis to the constitutional guarantee of equal protection of the law is approximately the same as that of “freedom of contract” to the constitutional guarantee that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. It is an invitation for judicial exegesis over and above the commands of the Constitution, in which values that cannot possibly have their source in that instrument are invoked to either validate or condemn the countless laws enacted by the various States.

Weber v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 406 U.S. 164, 182 (1972) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

F. MODERN SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS: PRIVACY, PERSONHOOD, AND FAMILY

Although the Court employed substantive due process in the Lochner era primarily in the realm of economic regulation and the liberty of contract, not all of its decisions were so limited. In Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), for example, the Court invalidated a state law prohibiting the teaching of any modern language other than English in any public or private grammar school. The Court explained:

[The “liberty” guaranteed by the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment] denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men. [This] liberty may not be interfered with [by] legislative action which is arbitrary or without reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the state to effect. [That] the State may do much [to] improve the quality of its citizens [is] clear; but the individual has certain fundamental rights which must be respected. [Here, no] emergency has arisen which renders knowledge of a child of some language other than English so clearly harmful as to justify [its] infringement of the right long freely enjoyed.

Justice Holmes, joined by Justice Sutherland, dissented. Similarly, in Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), the Court invalidated a state statute requiring students to attend public rather than private schools. The Court held that the statute “unreasonably [interfered] with the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control.”

1. The Right of Privacy

Griswold v. Connecticut

381 U.S. 479 (1965)

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant Griswold is Executive Director of the Planned Parenthood League of Connecticut. Appellant Buxton is a licensed physician and a professor at the Yale Medical School who served as Medical Director for the League....

They gave information, instruction, and medical advice to married persons as to the means of preventing conception. [Fees] were usually charged, although some couples were serviced free.

[A Connecticut statute prohibits any person from using “any drug, medicinal article or instrument for the purpose of preventing conception.”]

The appellants were found guilty as accessories and fined $100 each, against the claim that the accessory statute as so applied violated the Fourteenth Amendment....

We think that appellants have standing to raise the constitutional rights of the married people with whom they had a professional relationship. [Certainly] the accessory should have standing to assert that the offense which he is charged with assisting is not, or cannot constitutionally be, a crime....

Coming to the merits, we are met with a wide range of questions that implicate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Overtones of some arguments suggest that [Lochner] should be our guide. But we decline that invitation as we did in [West Coast Hotel and Lee Optical, section D supra]. We do not sit as a super-legislature to determine the wisdom, need, and propriety of laws that touch economic problems, business affairs, or social conditions. This law, however, operates directly on an intimate relation of husband and wife and their physician's role in one aspect of that relation.

The association of people is not mentioned in the Constitution nor in the Bill of Rights. The right to educate a child in a school of the parents' choice—whether public or private or parochial—is also not mentioned. Nor is the right to study any particular subject or any foreign language. Yet the First Amendment has been construed to include certain of those rights. [As Pierce v. Society of Sisters, Meyer v. Nebraska, and other decisions suggest, the] right of freedom of speech and press includes not only the right to utter or to print, but the right to distribute, the right to receive, the right to read and freedom of inquiry, freedom of thought, and freedom to teach—indeed the freedom of the entire university community. Without those peripheral rights the specific rights would be less secure. And so we reaffirm the principle of the Pierce and the Meyer cases.

In NAACP v. Alabama, [Chapter 7, section E1, infra], we protected the “freedom to associate and privacy in one’s associations,” noting that freedom of association was a peripheral First Amendment right. Disclosure of membership lists of a constitutionally valid association, we held, was invalid. [In] other words, the First Amendment has a penumbra where privacy is protected from governmental intrusion. In like context, we have protected forms of “association” that are not political in the customary sense but pertain to the social, legal, and economic benefit of the members. NAACP v. Button, [Chapter 7, section E5, infra]. [While association] is not expressly included in the First Amendment its existence is necessary in making the express guarantees fully meaningful.

The foregoing cases suggest that specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give them life and substance. See Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 516–522 [Douglas, J., dissenting]. Various guarantees create zones of privacy. The right of association contained in the penumbra of the First Amendment is one, as we have seen. The Third Amendment in its prohibition against the quartering of soldiers "in any house" in time of peace without the consent of the owner is another facet of that privacy. The Fourth Amendment explicitly affirms the "right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures." The Fifth Amendment in its Self-Incrimination Clause enables the citizen to create a zone of privacy which government may not force him to surrender to his detriment. The Ninth Amendment provides: "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."...

We have had many controversies over these penumbral rights of "privacy and repose." [Skinner v. Oklahoma and other] cases bear witness that the right of privacy which presses for recognition here is a legitimate one.

The present case, then, concerns a relationship lying within the zone of privacy created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees. And it concerns a law which, in forbidding the use of contraceptives rather than regulating their manufacture or sale, seeks to achieve its goals by means having a maximum destructive impact upon that relationship. Such a law cannot stand in light of the familiar principle, so often applied by this Court, that a "governmental purpose to control or prevent activities constitutionally subject to state regulation may not be achieved by means which sweep unnecessarily broadly and thereby invade the area of protected freedoms." [NAACP v. Alabama.] Would we allow the police to search the sacred precincts of marital bedrooms for telltale signs of the use of contraceptives? The very idea is repulsive to the notions of privacy surrounding the marriage relationship.

We deal with a right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights. [Marriage] is a coming together for better or for worse, hopefully enduring, and intimate to the degree of being sacred. It is an association that promotes a way of life, not causes; a harmony in living, not political faiths; a bilateral loyalty, not commercial or social projects. Yet it is an association for as noble a purpose as any involved in our prior decisions.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE GOLDBERG, whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN join, concurring.

[My] conclusion that the concept of liberty [embraces] the right of marital privacy though that right is not mentioned explicitly in the Constitution is supported both by numerous decisions of this Court, referred to in the Court's opinion, and by the language and history of the Ninth Amendment [which] reveal that the Framers of the Constitution believed that there are additional fundamental rights, protected from governmental infringement....

The Ninth Amendment [was] proffered to quiet expressed fears that a bill of specifically enumerated rights could not be sufficiently broad to cover all essential rights and that the specific mention of certain rights would be interpreted as a denial that others were protected....

While this Court has had little occasion to interpret the Ninth Amendment, “[i]t cannot be presumed that any clause in the constitution is intended to be without effect.” [To] hold that a right so basic and fundamental and so deep-rooted in our society as the right of privacy in marriage may be infringed because that right is not guaranteed in so many words by the first eight amendments to the Constitution is to ignore the Ninth Amendment and to give it no effect whatsoever....

I do not mean to imply that the Ninth Amendment is applied against the States by the Fourteenth. [Rather,] the Ninth Amendment [simply] lends strong support to the view that the “liberty” protected by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments from infringement by the Federal Government or the States is not restricted to rights specifically mentioned in the first eight amendments....

In determining which rights are fundamental, judges are not left at large to decide cases in light of their personal and private notions. Rather, they must look to the “traditions and [collective] conscience of our people” to determine whether a principle is “so rooted [there]...as to be ranked as fundamental.” The inquiry is whether a right involved “is of such a character that it cannot be denied without violating those ‘fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions.’....”

The entire fabric of the Constitution and the purposes that clearly underlie its specific guarantees demonstrate that the rights to marital privacy and to marry and raise a family are of similar order and magnitude as the fundamental rights specifically protected.

Although the Constitution does not speak in so many words of the right of privacy in marriage, I cannot believe that it offers these fundamental rights no protection. The fact that no particular provision of the Constitution explicitly forbids the State from disrupting the traditional relation of the family—a relation as old and as fundamental as our entire civilization—surely does not show that the Government was meant to have the power to do so....

The logic of the dissents would sanction federal or state legislation that seems to me even more plainly unconstitutional than the statute before us. Surely the Government, absent a showing of a compelling subordinating state interest, could not decree that all husbands and wives must be sterilized after two children have been born to them. Yet by their reasoning such an invasion of marital privacy would not be subject to constitutional challenge because, while it might be “silly,” no provision of the Constitution specifically prevents the Government from curtailing the marital right to bear children and raise a family.

[The] State, at most, argues that there is some rational relation between this statute and what is admittedly a legitimate subject of state concern—the discouraging of extra-marital relations. It says that preventing the use of birth-control devices by married persons helps prevent the indulgence by some in such extra-marital relations. The rationality of this justification is dubious, particularly in light of the admitted widespread availability to all persons [in] Connecticut, unmarried as well as married, of birth-control devices for the prevention of disease, as distinguished from the prevention of conception. But, in any event, it is clear that the state interest in safeguarding marital fidelity can be served by a more discriminately tailored statute, which does not, like the present one, sweep unnecessarily broadly, reaching far beyond the evil sought to be dealt with and intruding upon the privacy of all married couples. [Connecticut] does have statutes, the constitutionality of which is beyond doubt, which prohibit adultery and fornication....

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, concurring in the judgment.

[I] fully agree with the judgment of reversal, but [cannot] join the Court’s opinion [because it evinces the view that] the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not touch this Connecticut statute unless the enactment is found to violate some right assured by the letter or penumbra of the Bill of Rights....

In my view, the proper constitutional inquiry in this case is whether this Connecticut statute infringes the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because the enactment violates basic values “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty,” [Palko v. Connecticut, section C, supra]. For reasons stated at length in my dissenting opinion in Poe v. Ullman, [367 U.S. 497 (1961)], I believe that it does. While the relevant inquiry may be aided by resort to one or more of the provisions of the Bill of Rights, it is not dependent on them or any of their radiations. The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment stands, in my opinion, on its own bottom....

While I could not more heartily agree that judicial “self restraint” is an indispensable ingredient of sound constitutional adjudication, I do submit that the formula suggested [by the dissenters] for achieving it is more hollow than real. “Specific” provisions of the Constitution, no less than “due process,” lend themselves as readily to “personal” interpretations by judges whose constitutional outlook is simply to keep the Constitution in supposed “tune with the times.”...

Judicial self-restraint will not, I suggest, be brought about in the “due process” area by the historically unfounded incorporation formula long advanced by my Brother Black. It will be achieved in this area, as in other constitutional areas, only by continual insistence upon respect for the teachings of history, solid recognition of the basic values that underlie our society, and wise appreciation of the great roles that the doctrines of federalism and separation of powers have played in establishing and preserving American freedoms....

[Justice Harlan dissented in Poe v. Ullman, in which the Court dismissed on justiciability grounds a challenge to the Connecticut statute invalidated in Griswold. Harlan argued:]

[I] believe that a statute making it a criminal offense for married couples to use contraceptives is an intolerable and unjustifiable invasion of privacy in the conduct of the most intimate concerns of an individual’s personal life. [Since this contention draws its] basis from no explicit language of the Constitution, [I] feel it desirable [to] state the framework of Constitutional principles in which I think the issue must be judged.

[Because] it is the Constitution alone which warrants judicial interference in sovereign operations of the State, the basis of judgment as to the Constitutionality of state action must be a rational one, approaching the text [not] in a literalistic way, as if we had a tax statute before us, but as the basic charter of our society, setting out in spare but meaningful terms the principles of government....

Due process has not been reduced to any formula; its content cannot be determined by reference to any code. The best that can be said is that through the course of this Court’s decisions it has represented the balance which our Nation, built upon postulates of respect for the liberty of the individual, has struck between that liberty and the demands of organized society. If the supplying of content to this Constitutional concept has of necessity been a rational process, it certainly has not been one where judges have felt free to roam where unguided speculation might take them. The balance of which I speak is the balance struck by this country, having regard to what history teaches are the traditions from which it developed as well as the traditions from which it broke. That tradition is a living thing....

[The] liberty guaranteed by the Due Process Clause [is] not a series of isolated points [represented by the Bill of Rights]. It is a rational continuum which, broadly speaking, includes a freedom from all substantial arbitrary impositions and purposeless restraints, [citing, e.g., Allgeyer v. Louisiana; Skinner v. Oklahoma], and which also recognizes, what a reasonable and sensitive judgment must, that certain interests require particularly careful scrutiny of the state needs asserted to justify their abridgment....

The State [asserts] that it is acting to protect the moral welfare of its citizenry. [Society] has traditionally concerned itself with the moral soundness of its people. [Certainly,] Connecticut's judgment [here] is no more demonstrably correct or incorrect than are the varieties of judgment, expressed in law, on marriage and divorce, on adult consensual homosexuality, abortion, and sterilization, or euthanasia and suicide. If we had a case before us which required us to decide simply, and in abstraction, whether the moral judgment implicit in the [present statute] was a sound one, the very controversial nature of these questions would, I think, require us to hesitate long before concluding that the Constitution precluded Connecticut from choosing as it has....

But, as might be expected, we are not presented simply with this moral judgment to be passed on as an abstract proposition. The secular state [must] operate in the realm of behavior, [and] where it does so operate, not only the underlying, moral purpose of its operations, but also the choice of means becomes relevant to any Constitutional judgment on what is done....

Precisely what is involved here is this: the State is asserting the right to enforce its moral judgment by intruding upon the most intimate details of the marital relation with the full power of the criminal law. Potentially, this could allow the deployment of all the incidental machinery of the criminal law, arrests, searches and seizures; inevitably, it must mean at the very least the lodging of criminal charges, a public trial, and testimony as the corpus delicti. [The] statute allows the State to enquire into, prove and punish married people for the private use of their marital intimacy.

[This] enactment involves what, by common understanding throughout the English-speaking world, must be granted to be a most fundamental aspect of "liberty," the privacy of the home in its most basic sense, and it is this which requires that the statute be subjected to "strict scrutiny." [Skinner v. Oklahoma.]

That aspect of liberty which embraces the concept of the privacy of the home receives explicit Constitutional protection at two places only. These are the Third [and Fourth Amendments]....

It is clear, of course, that this Connecticut statute does not invade the privacy of the home in the usual sense, since the invasion involved here may [be] accomplished without any physical intrusion [into] the home. [But it] would surely be an extreme instance of sacrificing substance to form were it to be held that the Constitutional principle of privacy against arbitrary official intrusion comprehends only physical invasions by the police. [If] the physical curtilage of the home is protected, it is surely as a result of solicitude to protect the privacies of the life within. Certainly the safeguarding of the home does not follow merely from the sanctity of property rights. The home derives its pre-eminence as the seat of family life. [Of the] whole “private realm of family life” it is difficult to imagine what is more private or more intimate than a husband and wife’s marital relations....

Of course, [there] are countervailing considerations. “[T]he family...is not beyond regulation,” and it would be an absurdity to suggest either that offenses may not be committed in the bosom of the family or that the home can be made a sanctuary for crime. The right of privacy [is] not an absolute. Thus, I would not suggest that adultery, homosexuality, fornication and incest are immune from criminal enquiry, however privately practiced. [But] not to discriminate between what is involved in this case and either the traditional offenses against good morals or crimes which, though they may be committed anywhere, happen to have been committed or concealed in the home, would entirely misconceive the argument that is being made.

[The] intimacy of husband and wife is necessarily an essential and accepted feature of the institution of marriage, an institution which the State not only must allow, but which always and in every age it has fostered and protected. It is one thing when the State exerts its power either to forbid extra-marital sexuality altogether, or to say who may marry, but it is quite another when, having acknowledged a marriage and the intimacies inherent in it, it undertakes to regulate by means of the criminal law the details of that intimacy....

But conclusive, in my view, is the utter novelty of this enactment. Although the Federal Government and many States have at one time or other had on their books statutes forbidding or regulating the distribution of contraceptives, none, so far as I can find, has made the use of contraceptives a crime....

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, concurring in the judgment.

[The] State claims [that] its anti-use statute [serves its] policy against all forms of promiscuous or illicit sexual relationships, be they premarital or extramarital, concededly a permissible and legitimate legislative goal. [But I] fail to see how the ban on the use of contraceptives by married couples in any way reinforces the State’s ban on illicit sexual relationships. [Perhaps] the theory is that the flat ban on use prevents married people from possessing contraceptives and without the ready availability of such devices for use in the marital relationship, there will be no or less temptation to use them in extramarital ones. This reasoning rests on the premise that married people will comply with the ban in regard to their marital relationship, notwithstanding total nonenforcement in this context and apparent nonenforcibility, but will not comply with criminal statutes prohibiting extramarital affairs and the anti-use statute in respect to illicit sexual relationships, a premise whose validity has not been demonstrated and whose intrinsic validity is not very evident. [I] find nothing in this record justifying the sweeping scope of this statute....

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, with whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART joins, dissenting....

The Court talks about a constitutional “right of privacy” as though there is some constitutional [provision] forbidding any law ever to be passed which might abridge the “privacy” of individuals. But there is not. There are, of course, guarantees in certain specific constitutional provisions which are designed in part to protect privacy at certain times and places with respect to certain activities. Such, for example, is the Fourth Amendment’s guarantee against “unreasonable searches and seizures.” But I think it belittles that Amendment to talk about it as though it protects nothing but “privacy.” [The] average man would very likely not have his feelings soothed any more by having his property seized openly than by having it seized privately and by stealth. [I] get nowhere in this case by talk about a constitutional “right of privacy” as an emanation from one or more constitutional provisions.¹ I like my privacy as well as the next one, but I am nevertheless compelled to admit that government has a right to invade it unless prohibited by some specific constitutional provision....

[Of] the cases on which my Brothers White and Goldberg rely so heavily, undoubtedly the reasoning of two of them supports their result here—as would that of a number of others which they do not bother to name, e.g., [Lochner]. The two they do cite and quote from, [Meyer and Pierce], elaborated the same natural law due process philosophy found in [Lochner]. [That was a] philosophy which many later opinions repudiated, and which I cannot accept....

My Brother Goldberg has adopted the recent discovery that the Ninth Amendment as well as the Due Process Clause can be used by this Court as authority to strike down all state legislation which this Court thinks violates “fundamental principles of liberty and justice,” or is contrary to the “traditions and [collective] conscience of our people.” He also states [that] in making decisions on this basis judges will not consider “their personal and private notions.” One may ask how they can avoid considering them. Our Court certainly has no machinery with which to take a Gallup Poll. And the scientific miracles of this age have not yet produced a gadget which the Court can use to determine what traditions are rooted in the “[collective] conscience of our people.” Moreover, one would certainly have to look far beyond the language of the Ninth Amendment to find that the Framers vested in this Court any such awesome veto powers over lawmaking, either by the States or by the Congress. [That] Amendment was passed [to] assure the people that the Constitution in all its provisions was intended to limit the Federal Government to the powers granted expressly or by necessary implication. [This] fact is perhaps responsible for the peculiar phenomenon that for a period of a century and a half no serious suggestion was ever made that the Ninth Amendment [could] be used as a weapon of federal power to prevent state legislatures from passing laws they consider appropriate to govern local affairs....

I realize that many good and able men have eloquently spoken and written [about] the duty of this Court to keep the Constitution in tune with the times. [For] myself, I must with all deference reject that philosophy. The Constitution makers knew the need for change and provided for it. [The] Due Process Clause with an “arbitrary and capricious” or “shocking to the conscience” formula was liberally used by this Court to strike down economic legislation in the early decades of this century, threatening, many people thought, the tranquility and stability of the Nation. That formula, based on subjective considerations of “natural justice,” is no less dangerous when used to enforce this Court’s views about personal rights than those about economic rights....

MR. JUSTICE STEWART, whom MR. JUSTICE BLACK joins, dissenting....

I think this is an uncommonly silly law. [But] we are not asked in this case to say whether we think this law is unwise, or even asinine. We are asked to hold that it violates the United States Constitution. And that I cannot do.

In the course of its opinion the Court refers to no less than six Amendments to the Constitution: the First, the Third, the Fourth, the Fifth, the Ninth, and the Fourteenth. But the Court does not say which of these Amendments, if any, it thinks is infringed by this Connecticut law.

[What] provision of the Constitution, then, does make this state law invalid? The Court says it is the right of privacy “created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees.” With all deference, I can find no such general right of privacy in the Bill of Rights, in any other part of the Constitution, or in any case ever before decided by this Court....

Note: Griswold and the Right of Privacy

1. Griswold. There is no explicit general right to privacy in the Constitution’s text. What, then, grounds the Court’s decision? Is the point that specific constitutional rights imply the existence of other rights necessary to make the specific rights meaningful? Or is it that open-textured provisions invite the Court to invent altogether new rights?

2. The ninth amendment. One such open textured provision is the ninth amendment, which provides that “[the] enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.”

Consider the following views:

a. J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust 34–38 (1980):

The received account of the Ninth Amendment, [offered by Justice Black in Griswold, goes] like this. There was fear that the inclusion of a bill of rights [would] be taken to imply that federal power was [not] limited to the authorities enumerated in Article I, Section 8, [but] extended all the way up to the edge of the rights stated in the first eight amendments. [The] Ninth Amendment, the received version goes, was attached to the Bill of Rights [to] negate that inference. [But the] Tenth Amendment, submitted and ratified at the same time, completely fulfills [that] function. [Moreover, the legislative history of the Ninth Amendment is consistent with Justice Goldberg’s view, and] the conclusion that the Ninth Amendment was intended to signal the existence of federal constitutional rights beyond those specifically enumerated in the Constitution is the only conclusion its language seems comfortably able to support.

b. Berger, The Ninth Amendment, 66 Cornell L. Rev. 1, 23, 20, 14 (1980):

[The ninth and tenth amendments] are complementary: the ninth deals with rights “retained by the people,” the tenth with powers “reserved” to the states or the people. [Madison] made clear that the retained rights [constitute] an area in which the “Government ought not to act.” This means, in my judgment, that the courts have not been empowered to enforce the retained rights. [Rather, in] “retaining” the unenumerated rights, the people reserved to themselves power to add to or subtract from the rights enumerated in the Constitution by the process of amendment. [If] this be deemed supererogatory, be it remembered that according to Madison the ninth amendment itself was “inserted merely for greater caution.”

c. Caplan, The History and Meaning of the Ninth Amendment, 69 Va. L. Rev. 223, 264–265, 227–228 (1983):

[The] ninth amendment was drafted in order to allay concern that the Constitution might abolish rights traditionally guaranteed by state law. [These] “other” rights were understood to refer to the common law, along with the state constitutions and statutes engrafted onto it. [But the] ninth amendment [did] not transform these unenumerated rights into constitutional [rights]. Instead, it simply provides that the individual rights contained in state law are to continue in force under the Constitution until modified or eliminated by state enactment, by federal preemption, or by a judicial determination of unconstitutionality.

d. Barnett, The Ninth Amendment: It Means What It Says, 85 Tex. L. Rev. 1, 1 (2006):

[The] evidence establishes that the Ninth Amendment actually meant at the time of its enactment what it appears now to say: the unenumerated (natural) rights that people possessed prior to the formation of government, and which they retain afterwards, should be treated in the same manner as those (natural) rights that were enumerated in the Bill of Rights. In short, the Amendment is what it appears to be: a meaningful check on federal power and a significant guarantee of individual liberty.

Note that the ninth amendment does not by its own terms create any rights. Instead, it mandates only a rule of construction. It provides that the “enumeration...of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.” Consider the possibility that the framers of the amendment meant to leave open the contested question whether there were any such rights, or at least whether there were any such rights that were judicially enforceable. For an argument along these lines, see Seidman, Our Unsettled Ninth Amendment: An Essay on Unenumerated Rights and the Impossibility of Textualism, 98 Cal. L. Rev. 2129 (2010).

Since Griswold, various justices have alluded to the ninth amendment but without offering a comprehensive theory of precisely what unenumerated rights it protects. See, e.g., Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 579 n.15 (1980) (opinion of Burger, C.J.) (concerning the right of the people to attend criminal trials). For a broad range of views on the ninth amendment, see the Symposium on Interpreting the Ninth Amendment, 64 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 37 (1988).

3. Outdated norms. Was the real problem in Griswold one of desuetude? Consider the view that the law at issue could not be enforced directly against married couples because the Connecticut citizenry would be aghast at any such enforcement action. In this sense, the law was out of step with democratic convictions. Perhaps a law should not be usable at all if the public would not permit it to be enforced in the way that it reads. This view, perhaps involving a genuinely procedural due process claim, would read the so-called privacy cases as involving a judicial insistence that, if laws cannot be enforced directly—through the criminal law prohibiting certain activities—they cannot be enforced through indirect, sporadic, discriminatory routes that escape the same degree of public accountability. See C. Sunstein, One Case at a Time (1999), for a defense of this approach.

4. The right of “privacy.” What is the nature of the right of “privacy” protected in Griswold? Is Griswold about the privacy of the home? The privacy of information concerning intimate matters? The integrity of the marriage relationship? Sexual freedom? Autonomy over decisions relating to childbearing? Autonomy generally?

5. The reach of Griswold: the unmarried. In Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972), the Court, in a six-to-one decision, held that a Massachusetts statute prohibiting the distribution of any drug or device to unmarried persons for the prevention of conception violated the equal protection clause because it provided dissimilar treatment for married and unmarried persons.

Purporting to apply traditional rational basis review, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Brennan, held that none of the interests asserted in defense of the statute was sufficient to justify the challenged classification. First, the Court concluded that the deterrence of premarital sex could not reasonably be regarded as the purpose of the law. This was so because (a) the statute did not prohibit the distribution of contraceptives to prevent the “spread of disease,” and thus was “so riddled with exceptions” that its effect “has at best a marginal relation to the proffered objective”; and (b) in any event, it “would be plainly unreasonable to assume that Massachusetts has prescribed pregnancy and the birth of an unwanted child as punishment for fornication, which is a misdemeanor under Massachusetts [law].”

Second, the Court rejected the contention that the classification was designed to “serve the health needs of the community by regulating the distribution of potentially harmful articles.” This was so because (a) “not all contraceptives are potentially dangerous,” and (b) this rationale does not serve to distinguish between married and unmarried persons.

Finally, the Court rejected the argument that the statute could be sustained on moral grounds “as a prohibition on contraception.” The Court explained:

[Whatever] the rights of the individual to access to contraceptives may be, the rights must be the same for the unmarried and the married alike. If under Griswold the distribution of contraceptives to married persons cannot be prohibited, a ban on distribution to unmarried persons would be equally impermissible. It is true that in Griswold the right of privacy in question inhered in the marital relationship. Yet the marital couple is not an independent entity with a mind and heart of its own, but an association of two individuals each with a separate intellectual and emotional makeup. If the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child. [On] the other hand, if Griswold is no bar to a prohibition on the distribution of contraceptives, the State could not, consistently with the Equal Protection Clause, outlaw distribution to unmarried but not to married persons. In each case the evil, as perceived by the State, would be identical, and the underinclusion would be invidious.

6. The reach of Griswold: access to contraceptives. In Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678 (1977), the Court, in a seven-to-two decision, invalidated a New York law prohibiting any person other than a licensed pharmacist from distributing contraceptives. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Brennan, explained:

Griswold may no longer be read as holding only that a State may not prohibit a married couple's use of contraceptives. Read in light of its progeny, the teaching of Griswold is that the Constitution protects individual decisions in matters of childbearing from unjustified intrusion by the State. Restrictions on the distribution of contraceptives clearly burden the freedom to make such decisions. [Limiting] the distribution of nonprescription contraceptives to licensed pharmacists clearly imposes a significant burden on the right of individuals to use contraceptives if they choose to do so. [Accordingly, the challenged law] "may be justified only by a 'compelling state interest' [and] must be narrowly drawn to express only the legitimate state interests at stake." [None of the interests asserted in defense of this statute is] compelling.

2. Abortion

Roe v. Wade

410 U.S. 113 (1973)

MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court.

This [appeal presents] constitutional challenges to state criminal abortion legislation. The Texas statutes under attack here [make procuring an abortion a crime except "by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother." These statutes] are typical of those that have been in effect in many States for approximately a century....

We forthwith acknowledge our awareness of the sensitive and emotional nature of the abortion controversy, of the vigorous opposing views, even among physicians, and of the deep and seemingly absolute convictions that the subject inspires....

Our task, of course, is to resolve the issue by constitutional measurement, free of emotion and of predilection. We seek earnestly to do this, and, because we do, we have inquired into, and in this opinion place some emphasis upon, medical and medical-legal history and what that history reveals about man's attitudes toward the abortion procedure over the centuries....

[The] restrictive criminal abortion laws in effect in a majority of States today are of relatively recent vintage. [They] derive from statutory changes effected, for the most part, in the latter half of the 19th century....

[In this portion of its opinion, the Court examines the history of abortion regulation.]

Three reasons have been advanced to explain historically the enactment of criminal abortion laws in the 19th century and to justify their continued existence.

It has been argued occasionally that these laws were [designed] to discourage illicit sexual conduct. Texas, however, does not advance this justification in the present case....

A second reason is concerned with abortion as a medical procedure. When most criminal abortion laws were first enacted, the procedure was [hazardous]. [Thus,] it has been argued that a State's real concern in enacting a criminal abortion law was to protect the pregnant woman. [Modern] medical techniques have altered this situation. [Mortality] rates for women undergoing early abortions [appear] to be as low as or lower than the rates for normal childbirth. [Of] course, important state interests in the areas of health and medical standards do remain. The State has a legitimate interest in seeing to it that abortion, like any other medical procedure, is performed under circumstances that insure maximum safety for the patient [and] the State retains a definite interest in protecting the woman's own health and safety when an abortion is proposed at a late stage of pregnancy.

The third reason is the State's interest [in] protecting prenatal life. Some of the argument for this justification rests on the theory that a new human life is present from the moment of conception. [But in] assessing the State's interest, recognition may [also] be given to the less rigid claim that [at] least potential life is involved....

The Constitution does not explicitly mention any right of privacy. [But] the Court has recognized that a right of personal privacy, or a guarantee of certain areas or zones of privacy, does exist under the Constitution. In varying contexts, the Court or individual Justices have, indeed, found at least the roots of that right in the First Amendment, Stanley v. Georgia, [Chapter 7, section D4, infra]; in the Fourth and Fifth Amendments; in the penumbras of the Bill of Rights, [Griswold]; in the Ninth Amendment, id., (Goldberg, J., concurring); or in the concept of liberty guaranteed by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment, see Meyer v. Nebraska. These decisions make it clear that only personal rights that can be deemed "fundamental" or "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty," are included in this guarantee of personal privacy. They also make it clear that the right has some extension to activities relating to marriage, Loving v. Virginia, [Chapter 5, section C3, supra]; procreation, [Skinner]; contraception, [Eisenstadt]; family relationships, Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944); and child rearing and education, [Pierce; Meyer].

This right of privacy, whether it be founded in the Fourteenth Amendment's concept of personal liberty [as] we feel it is, or [in] the Ninth [Amendment], is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. The detriment that the State would impose upon the pregnant woman by denying this choice altogether is apparent. Specific and direct harm medically diagnosable even in early pregnancy may be involved. Maternity, or additional offspring, may force upon the woman a distressful life and future. Psychological harm may be imminent. Mental and physical health may be taxed by child care. There is also the distress, for all concerned, associated with the unwanted child, and there is the problem of bringing a child into a family already unable, psychologically and otherwise, to care for it. In other cases, [the] additional difficulties and continuing stigma of unwed motherhood may be involved. All these are factors the woman and her responsible physician necessarily will consider in consultation.

On the basis of elements such as these, appellant [argues] that the woman's right is absolute and that she is entitled to terminate her pregnancy at whatever time, in whatever way, and for whatever reason she alone chooses. With this we do not agree. [The] Court's decisions recognizing a right of privacy also acknowledge that some state regulation in areas protected by that right is appropriate....

Where certain "fundamental rights" are involved, the Court has held that regulation limiting these rights may be justified only by a “compelling state interest,” and that legislative enactments must be narrowly drawn to express only the legitimate state interests at stake....

The appellee [argues] that the fetus is a “person” within the language and meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. [If] this suggestion of personhood is established, the appellant’s case, of course, collapses, for the fetus’ right to life would then be guaranteed specifically by the Amendment....

The Constitution does not define “person” in so many words. Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment contains three references to “person.” [“Person”] is used in other places in the Constitution. [The Court surveys other uses of the word in the Constitution]. But in nearly all these instances, the use of the word is such that it has application only postnatally. None indicates, with any assurance, that it has any possible pre-natal application.

All this, together with our observation that throughout the major portion of the 19th century prevailing legal abortion practices were far freer than they are today, persuades us that the word “person,” as used in the Fourteenth Amendment, does not include the unborn.

[Thus,] we pass on to other considerations. The pregnant woman cannot be isolated in her privacy. She carries an embryo and, later, a fetus. [The] situation therefore is inherently different from marital intimacy, or bedroom possession of obscene material, or marriage, or procreation, or education, with which Eisenstadt and Griswold, Stanley, Loving, Skinner, and Pierce and Meyer were respectively concerned. [It] is reasonable and appropriate for a State to decide that at some point in time another interest, that of health of the mother or that of potential human life, becomes significantly involved....

Texas urges that, apart from the Fourteenth Amendment, life begins at conception and is present throughout pregnancy, and that, therefore, the State has a compelling interest in protecting that life from and after conception. We need not resolve the difficult question of when life begins. When those trained [in] medicine, philosophy, and theology are unable to arrive at any consensus, the judiciary, at this point in the development of man’s knowledge, is not in a position to speculate as to the answer.

It should be sufficient to note briefly the wide divergence of thinking on [this] question. There has always been strong support for the view that life does not begin until live birth. This was the belief of the Stoics. It appears to be the predominant, though not the unanimous, attitude of the Jewish faith. It may be taken to represent also the position of a large segment of the Protestant community. [The] common law found greater significance in quickening. Physicians and their scientific colleagues have [tended] to focus either upon conception, upon live birth, or upon the interim point at which the fetus becomes “viable,” that is, potentially able to live outside the mother’s womb, albeit with artificial aid. Viability is usually placed at about seven months (28 weeks) but may occur earlier, even at 24 weeks. [The Catholic church recognizes] the existence of life from the moment of conception....

In areas other than criminal abortion [such as torts and inheritance], the law has been reluctant to endorse any theory that life, as we recognize it, begins before live birth or to accord legal rights to the unborn except in narrowly defined situations and except when the rights are contingent upon live birth....

In view of all this, we do not agree that, by adopting one theory of life, Texas may override the rights of the pregnant woman that are at stake. We repeat, however, that the State does have an important and legitimate interest in preserving and protecting the health of the pregnant woman [and] that it has still another important and legitimate interest in protecting the potentiality of human life. These interests are separate and distinct. Each grows in substantiality as the woman approaches term and, at a point during pregnancy, each becomes “compelling.”

With respect to [the] interest in the health of the mother, the “compelling” point, in the light of present medical knowledge, is at approximately the end of the first trimester. This is so because of the now-established medical fact [that] until the end of the first trimester mortality in abortion may be less than mortality in normal childbirth. It follows that, from and after this point, a State may regulate the abortion procedure to the extent that the regulation reasonably relates to the preservation and protection of maternal health. Examples of permissible state regulation in this area are requirements as to the qualifications of the person who is to perform the abortion; [as] to the facility in which the procedure is to be performed; [and] the like.

This means, on the other hand, that, for the period of pregnancy prior to this “compelling” point, the attending physician, in consultation with his patient, is free to determine, without regulation by the State, that, in his medical judgment, the patient’s pregnancy should be terminated. If that decision is reached, the judgment may be effectuated by an abortion free of interference by the State.

With respect to [the] interest in potential life, the “compelling” point is at viability. This is so because the fetus then presumably has the capability of meaningful life outside the mother’s womb. State regulation protective of fetal life after viability thus has both logical and biological justifications. If the State is interested in protecting fetal life during that period, it may go so far as to proscribe abortion during that period, except when it is necessary to preserve the life or health of the mother.

Measured against these standards, [the Texas statute] sweeps too broadly [and] therefore, cannot survive the constitutional attack made upon it here....

This holding, we feel, is consistent with the relative weights of the respective interests involved, with the lessons and examples of medical and legal history, with the lenity of the common law, and with the demands of the profound problems of the present day....

MR. JUSTICE STEWART, concurring.

[The] Constitution nowhere mentions a specific right of personal choice in matters of marriage and family life, but the “liberty” protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment covers more than those freedoms explicitly named in the Bill of Rights. [In Eisenstadt], we recognized “the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child.” That right necessarily includes the right of a woman to decide whether or not to terminate her pregnancy....

It is evident that the Texas abortion statute infringes that right directly. [The] question then becomes whether the state interests advanced to justify this abridgment can survive the “particularly careful scrutiny” that the Fourteenth Amendment here requires.

The asserted state interests are protection of the health and safety of the pregnant woman, and protection of the potential future human life within her. These are legitimate objectives, [but as] the Court today has thoroughly demonstrated, [these] state interests cannot constitutionally support the broad abridgment of personal liberty worked by the existing Texas law....

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, concurring.

[The] Ninth Amendment [does] not create federally enforceable rights. [But] a catalogue of [the rights “retained by the people”] includes customary, traditional, and time-honored rights, amenities, privileges, and immunities that come within the sweep of “the Blessings of Liberty” mentioned in the preamble to the Constitution. Many of them, in my view, come within the meaning of the term “liberty” as used in the Fourteenth Amendment.

First is the autonomous control over the development and expression of one’s intellect, interests, tastes, and personality....

Second is freedom of choice in the basic decisions of one’s life respecting marriage, divorce, procreation, contraception, and the education and upbringing of children....

Third is the freedom to care for one’s health and person, freedom from bodily restraint or compulsion, freedom to walk, stroll, or loaf....

[While] childbirth endangers the lives of some women, voluntary abortion at any time and place regardless of medical standards would impinge on a rightful concern of society. The woman's health is part of that concern; as is the life of the fetus after quickening. These concerns justify the State in treating the procedure as a medical one....

[A concurring opinion of Chief Justice Burger, noting that "the Court today rejects any claim that the Constitution requires abortion on demand," is omitted.]

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, with whom MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST joins, dissenting.

[I] find nothing in the language or history of the Constitution to support the Court's judgment. The Court simply fashions and announces a new constitutional right for pregnant mothers and, with scarcely any reason or authority for its action, invests that right with sufficient substance to override most existing state abortion statutes. The upshot is that the people and the legislatures of the 50 States are constitutionally disentitled to weigh the relative importance of the continued existence and development of the fetus, on the one hand, against a spectrum of possible impacts on the mother, on the other hand. As an exercise of raw judicial power, the Court perhaps has authority to do what it does today; but in my view its judgment is an improvident and extravagant exercise of the power of judicial review that the Constitution extends to this Court....

MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST, dissenting....

I have difficulty in concluding [that] the right of "privacy" is involved in this case. Texas [bars] the performance of a medical abortion by a licensed physician on a plaintiff such as Roe. A transaction resulting in an operation such as this is not "private" in the ordinary usage of that word. Nor is the "privacy" that the Court finds here even a distant relative of the freedom from searches and seizures protected by the Fourth Amendment....

If the Court means by the term "privacy" no more than that the claim of a person to be free from unwanted state regulation of consensual transactions may be a form of "liberty" protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, there is no doubt that similar claims have been upheld in our earlier decisions on the basis of that liberty. [The] test traditionally applied in the area of social and economic legislation is whether or not a law such as that challenged has a rational relation to a valid state objective. The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment undoubtedly does place a limit, albeit a broad one, on legislative power to enact laws such as this. If the Texas statute were to prohibit an abortion even where the mother's life is in jeopardy, I have little doubt that such a statute would lack a rational relation to a valid state objective. But the Court's sweeping invalidation of any restrictions on abortion during the first trimester is impossible to justify under that standard, and the conscious weighing of competing factors that the Court's opinion apparently substitutes for the established test is far more appropriate to a legislative judgment than to a judicial one....

The fact that a majority of the States reflecting, after all, the majority sentiment in those States, have had restrictions on abortions for at least a century is a strong indication, it seems to me, that the asserted right to an abortion is not "so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental." Even today, when society's views on abortion are changing, the very existence of the debate is evidence that the "right" to an abortion is not so universally accepted as the appellant would have us believe.

To reach its result, the Court necessarily has had to find within the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment a right that was apparently completely unknown to the drafters of the Amendment. [By] the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868, there were at least 36 laws enacted by state or territorial legislatures limiting abortion. [The] only conclusion possible from this history is that the drafters did not intend to have the Fourteenth Amendment withdraw from the States the power to legislate with respect to this matter....

Note: The Abortion Decision

1. Griswold to Eisenstadt to Roe. A central issue in Roe was whether there was a constitutional basis for the woman's right of "privacy." The Court relied heavily on precedent to establish this right, but critics argue that the precedents did not establish a general right of privacy, let alone a right broad enough to reach abortion. Consider, for example, Ely, The Wages of Crying Wolf: A Comment on Roe v. Wade, 82 Yale L.J. 920, 930 (1973):

[The] Court in Griswold stressed that it was invalidating only that portion of the Connecticut law that proscribed the use, as opposed to the manufacture, sale, or other distribution of contraceptives. That distinction [makes] sense [only] if the case is rationalized on the ground that [enforcement of the challenged provision] would have been virtually impossible without the most outrageous sort of governmental prying into the privacy of the home. [No] such rationalization is [possible in Roe], for whatever else may be involved, it is not a case about governmental snooping.

Defenders of Roe, on the other hand, argue that, taken together, the Meyer/Pierce/Griswold/Eisenstadt line of cases delineates a sphere of interests—which the Court now groups and denominates “privacy”—implicit in the “liberty” protected by the fourteenth amendment:

At the core of this sphere is the right of the individual to make for himself [the] fundamental decisions that shape family life: whom to marry; whether and when to have children; and with what values to rear those children. [Plainly] the right [to an abortion] falls within [this] class of [interests]. The question of constitutionality [in Roe] is a more difficult one than that involved in Griswold and Eisenstadt only because the asserted state interest is more important, not because of any difference in the individual interests involved.

Heymann and Barzelay, The Forest and the Trees: Roe v. Wade and Its Critics, 53 B.U. L. Rev. 765, 772, 775 (1973).

2. In defense of Roe: the question of a prima facie right to reproductive autonomy. Consider the following two arguments:

a. Suppose that the state embarked upon a program of artificially inseminating unwilling women and forcing them to carry the resulting pregnancy to term. Is it conceivable that such a program would be constitutional? (Is it a sufficient answer to this hypothetical question that the circumstances it describes are very unlikely to arise?) Unlike any of the other privacy cases, Roe involved the interest to control over one’s own body, or bodily integrity. This interest is far more tightly connected to the original or core concerns of the due process clause—and the common law itself—than the “privacy” right at issue in Griswold. Whether or not the government’s justification is sufficient, surely the interest at issue is one that can be invaded only with special justification—unless the government can compel sterilization or involuntary medical treatment of multiple kinds.

Does the abortion right imply a right not to be a genetic, as opposed to a gestational parent? Suppose, for example, that a married couple uses in vitro fertilization and freezes some of the resulting preembryos. If the parties then divorce, is it unconstitutional for the state to prohibit one spouse from destroying these preembryos? For an argument that there is no right not to be a genetic parent when genetic parenthood is divorced from gestational and legal parenthood, see Cohen, The Constitution and the Rights Not to Procreate, 60 Stan. L. Rev. 1135 (2008).

b. The problem of abortion raises questions not of privacy, or not mostly of privacy, but instead, or in addition, of sex discrimination. The first point here is that only women become pregnant, and only women need abortions. Because laws prohibiting abortion are targeted at a class consisting exclusively of women, they should be understood as embodying a form of discrimination. On this view, the Court's decisions in Griswold, Eisenstadt, and Roe, and its decisions granting heightened scrutiny to gender classifications under the equal protection clause (see Chapter 5, section D, supra), "present various faces of a single issue: the roles women are to play in our society." It "is simply inconceivable that the majority Justices in Roe were indifferent to this question." Karst, Book Review, 89 Harv. L. Rev. 1028, 1036–1037 (1976).

Consider L. Tribe, Constitutional Choices 243 (1985):

[Although] current law nowhere forces men to sacrifice their bodies and restructure their lives even in those tragic situations (of needed organ transplants, for example) where nothing less will permit their children to survive, those who would outlaw abortion [would] rely [on] physiological circumstances—the supposed dictates of the natural—to conscript women [as] involuntary incubators and thus to usurp a control over sexual activity and its consequences that men [take] for granted. To one who regards this outcome as unjust, a right to end pregnancy might be seen more plausibly as a matter of resisting sexual [domination] than as a matter of shielding from public control "private" transactions.

On this view, the problem with laws forbidding abortion is that they turn a biological difference with no necessary social consequences—women's capacity to bear children—into a social disadvantage. Such laws do not simply let nature run its course; instead, they compel women to be involuntary incubators. See also Regan, Rewriting Roe v. Wade, 77 Mich. L. Rev. 1569 (1979). This view has the advantage of making it unnecessary, or arguably unnecessary, to decide on the moral status of the fetus. A selective cooptation of human bodies for the protection of third parties would be unconstitutional, even if those third parties are human beings. To this it might be added that laws forbidding abortion exist only because of traditional (and constitutionally barred) notions about the naturalness of women's roles as first and foremost childbearers. (In fact, restrictions on abortion rights have often been sought by people also enthusiastic about women's traditional role.) If men could get pregnant, it might be urged, abortion restrictions would not exist.

Is it true that the law forces only women "to sacrifice their bodies and restructure their lives"? Consider the military draft during time of war, which existed for much of the nation's history, and which applied only to men. Do laws that discriminate against persons who are pregnant in fact discriminate against women? See Geduldig v. Aiello, Chapter 5, section D, supra. Perhaps they do; but the point is not obvious. Even if they do, it does not necessarily follow that abortion restrictions are a form of sex discrimination.

For discussion of the abortion problem as one of sex discrimination, see Ginsburg, Some Thoughts on Autonomy and Equality in Relation to Roe v. Wade, 63 N.C. L. Rev. 375 (1985); Law, Rethinking Sex and the Constitution, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 955 (1984). For the view that the conception of the abortion right as one of "privacy" is fundamentally wrong, see MacKinnon, Roe v. Wade: A Study in Male Ideology in Abortion—Moral and Legal Perspectives 45, 49, 51 (J. Garfield ed., 1985):

In feminist terms, [Roe] translates the ideology of the private sphere into the individual woman's legal right to privacy as a means of subordinating women's collective needs to the imperatives of male supremacy. [Under] conditions of gender inequality, [Roe] does not free women, it frees male sexual aggression. The availability of abortion [removes] the one remaining legitimized reason that women have had for refusing sex besides the headache.

On this account, the problem with the privacy notion is that it suggests that the realm of family, sex, and reproduction is essentially voluntary and free from power and politics. Notions of privacy in these arenas tend to confirm, rather than to undermine, the power of men over women.

3. "Compelling state interest." Even if (a) laws forbidding abortion are a form of sex discrimination or (b) there is a constitutional "right of privacy" and that right is "broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy," the question remains whether the prohibition of abortion serves a "compelling state interest." In answering that question, can the Court avoid a decision about when life begins? If protection of potential life is a compelling state interest, doesn't it follow that potential of actual life is such an interest? Perhaps the inability of those trained in "medicine, philosophy, and theology [to] arrive at [a] consensus" means that the Court should simply have deferred to the legislative judgment. Consider, though, the alternative possibility that in the face of this disagreement, the Court should defer to the judgment of individual women. Note that, on this view of the case, the conflict it poses is not between legislative and judicial authority (after all, Roe nowhere suggests that courts should have the power to force women to have abortions) but between collective and individual choice.

4. The fetus as “person” or as otherwise providing a sufficient end for government restrictions: a “dispositive” issue? It is often assumed that, if the fetus is a “person,” or if the interest in protecting it is “compelling,” Roe is necessarily wrong. But consider the following views.

a. L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 931 (1978):

[Prior to Roe, antiabortion laws] were not consistently enforced [either] against the affluent, who could evade them by obtaining lawful abortions outside their own restrictive jurisdictions, or against the poor, untold numbers of whom would unavoidably “subject themselves to the notorious backstreet abortion...fraught with the myriad possibilities of mutilation, infection, sterility and death.” Thus, [in] view of the realities too commonplace to be ignored, the Court might understandably have viewed restrictive abortion laws less as meaningful protections for unborn life than as relatively pointless and economically skewed expressions of outdated worry about the health of the women involved coupled with disapproval of their moral choices.

Consider in this regard these (contestable but frequently agreed-upon) facts: (1) When abortion was unlawful, several thousand women died per year as a result of illegal abortions; (2) several more thousands of women faced serious health impairment, including emergency hospital admissions, as a result of illegal abortions; (3) the abortion rate before Roe was somewhere between 20 percent and 25 percent, whereas after Roe it is somewhere around 27 percent; (4) it is hard to demonstrate that there was a large increase in abortions as a result of Roe. Are any or all of these facts relevant? Consider the view that these contestable claims should play absolutely no role in constitutional law.

b. Thomson, A Defense of Abortion, 1 Phil. & Pub. Aff. 47, 48–49, 55–59 (1971):

I propose [that] we grant [for the sake of argument] that the fetus is a person from the moment of conception....

[Now] let me ask you to imagine this. You wake up in the morning and find yourself back to back in bed with an unconscious violinist. [He] has been found to have a fatal kidney ailment, and the Society of Music Lovers has canvassed all the available medical records and found that you alone have the right blood type to help. They have therefore kidnapped you [and] plugged [the violinist’s circulatory system] into yours. [To] unplug you would be to kill him. But never mind, it’s only for nine months. By then he will have recovered [and] can safely be unplugged. [Is] it morally incumbent on you to accede to this situation?...

[The] right to life consists not in the right not to be killed, but rather in the right not to be killed unjustly. [This enables] us to square the fact that the violinist has a right to life with the fact that you do not act unjustly toward him in unplugging yourself, thereby killing him. For if you do not kill him unjustly, you do not violate his right to life. [But] if this emendation is accepted, the gap in the argument against abortion stares us plainly in the face: it is by no means enough to show that the fetus is a person, and to remind us that all persons have a right to life—we need to be shown also that killing the fetus violates its right to life, i.e., that abortion is unjust killing. And is it?

5. Viability. The Court held that, with “respect to [the] interest in potential life, the ‘compelling’ point is at viability [because] the fetus then presumably has the capability of meaningful life outside the mother’s womb.” Does this conclusion “mistake a definition for a syllogism”? Ely, supra, at 924. Consider Tribe, Foreword: Toward a Model of Roles in the Due Process of Life and Law, 87 Harv. L. Rev. 1 (1973) at 27–28: “Once the fetus can be severed from the woman by a process which enables it to survive, leaving the abortion decision to private choice would confer not only a right to remove an unwanted fetus from one’s body, but also an entirely separate right to ensure its death. [Viability] thus marks a point after which [the] state could properly conclude that permitting abortion would be tantamount to permitting murder.”

a. Shifting viability. Viability is not biologically fixed. It will arrive earlier in gestation as better techniques are developed for sustaining existence outside the womb. Is this a problem? One might see this as a built-in social safety valve. If society really cares about fetal life, it can do something about it by advancing technology. See Tribe, Structural Due Process, 10 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L. Rev. 269 (1975).

Is the right of privacy recognized in Roe about the right not to continue an unwanted pregnancy, or is it about the right not to have unwanted children? If Roe is about the right not to be a mother, shifting viability should not matter. But the viability line itself suggests that Roe is about the right not to be pregnant, not the right not to be a mother.

b. Uncertain viability. The point of viability varies from fetus to fetus, and it is extremely difficult to determine the precise point of viability for any particular fetus. How, then, should viability be defined? At the point at which the average fetus is viable? At the earliest point at which a fetus has been found viable?

6. The attack on Roe. Recent scholarship has thrown doubt on the claim that Roe was strongly countermajoritarian and that the decision itself produced an immediate, large-scale backlash. See generally Greenhouse & Siegel, Before (and After) Roe v. Wade: New Questions About Backlash, 120 Yale L.J. 2028 (2011). Polls showed that a sizable majority of Americans favored legalization of abortion at the time that Roe was decided and that the percentage continued to grow in the immediate wake of the decision. Id. at 2081 n.83.

But whatever the cause, there can be no doubt that Roe became intensely controversial. In 1980, Ronald Reagan made Roe a major campaign issue, and his administration sought to persuade the Court to overrule its decision. The post-Roe cases that follow should be considered in the context of sustained political campaigns designed on the one hand to end, and on the other hand to preserve, the abortion right.

Note: Abortion Regulation between Roe and Casey

1. Abortion Funding. In Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977) the Court, by a vote of six to three, upheld a state regulation granting Medicaid benefits for childbirth but denying such benefits for nontherapeutic abortions (i.e., abortions that are not “medically necessary”). Writing for the Court, Justice Powell emphasized that Roe implied “no limitation on the authority of a State to make a value judgment favoring childbirth over abortion, and to implement that judgment by the allocation of public funds” and that although the state had made childbirth “a more attractive alternative,” it had “imposed no restriction on access to abortions that was not already there.” See also Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980) (extending Maher to uphold the “Hyde Amendment,” which prohibited the use of federal Medicaid funds “to perform abortions except where the life of the mother would be endangered if the fetus were carried to term; or except for such medical procedures necessary for the victims of rape or incest”). Cf. Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991) (upholding the refusal of the government to fund speech that involved abortion in a context where it was subsidizing pregnancy counseling).

2. The early cases. With the exception of cases involving abortion funding, the Court generally resisted state regulation of abortion rights in the years immediately after Roe. Consider the extent to which these cases were influenced by the perception that the states were attempting to undermine the right rather than to regulate it in good faith. Compare the Court’s reaction to the “massive resistance” that followed its decision in Brown v. Board of Education, discussed in Chapter 5, section A, supra.

For examples, see City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983) (invalidating inter alia a requirement that second trimester abortions be performed in a hospital, that the physician inform the woman of the physical and emotional complications that may result from an abortion, and a twenty-four hour waiting period following the woman's signing of a consent form); Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976) (invalidating a statute requiring spousal consent to an abortion unless it was necessary to protect the life of the mother); Thornberg v. American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) (invalidating a statute requiring the use of the abortion technique most protective of the life of the fetus in postviability abortions); Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (invalidating on vagueness grounds a statutory requirement that a physician determine whether a fetus is viable, and if it is determined that fetus "may be viable" to exercise the same care in preserving the life and health of the fetus as would be required "if the fetus were intended to be born alive"). But see Planned Parenthood Association of Kansas City v. Danforth, 462 U.S. 476 (1983) (upholding recordkeeping requirements for abortions); Planned Parenthood Association v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983) (upholding requirement that tissue sample of aborted fetus be submitted to a certified pathologist); H. L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398 (1981) (upholding a requirement that a physician notify a parent or guardian of a minor woman seeking an abortion in circumstances where the woman was living with and dependent on her parents, not emancipated, and made no claim or showing as to her maturity); Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979) (indicating that a parental consent requirement would be permissible if it provided for a judicial bypass).

3. Shifting attitudes on the Court. The vote in Roe was seven to two, but as the composition of the Court gradually changed, it became less clear that a majority of the justices still favored an abortion right. When several provisions of a Missouri statute regulating abortion came before the Court in 1989, many commentators predicted that the Court would overrule Roe. In fact, a plurality of the Court in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989), upheld the Missouri statute and endorsed a significant reformulation of Roe's trimester approach. However, the plurality was unable to attract the votes of a majority to overrule the decision.

The plurality found, first, that a statement in the statute's preamble that "the life of each human being begins at conception" was not in conflict with the statement in Roe that "a State may not adopt one theory of when life begins to justify its regulation of abortions." The preamble simply "express[ed]...[a] value judgment" in the abstract.

Relying on Harris v. McRae and related cases, the Court also upheld a bar on state employees performing abortions and a ban on the use of public facilities for performing abortions—even when the patient paid for the abortion herself.

The final provision at issue in Webster, as interpreted by the Court, required a physician, prior to performing an abortion “on a woman he has reason to believe is carrying an unborn child of twenty or more weeks gestational age,” to perform tests that, in the physician’s reasonable professional judgment, would be useful in determining the viability of the fetus. The plurality, in an opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, said that this statute, which regulated the performance of abortions in the second trimester in the interest not of maternal health, but of protecting potential human life, conflicted with the trimester system articulated in Roe and applied in Colautti. “It undoubtedly does superimpose state regulation on the medical determination of whether a particular fetus is viable.” In addition, the plurality said that, “to the extent that the viability tests increase the cost of what are in fact second-trimester abortions”—in cases where the tests show that the fetus was not viable—“their validity may also be questioned under Akron.”

With respect to this issue, the plurality acknowledged that “[stare] decisis is a cornerstone of our legal system, but it has less power in constitutional cases, where, save for constitutional amendments, this Court is the only body able to make needed changes.” In a key passage, the plurality argued that Roe’s trimester system should be abandoned. “The rigid Roe framework is hardly consistent with the notion of a Constitution cast in general terms, as ours is, and usually speaking in general principles, as ours does.”

However, the crucial fifth vote in the case was provided by Justice O’Connor, who wrote, “Unlike the plurality, I do not understand these viability testing requirements to conflict with any of the Court’s past decisions concerning state regulation of abortion. Therefore, there is no necessity to accept the State’s invitation to reexamine the constitutional validity of Roe v. Wade.”

In an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment, Justice Scalia urged the explicit overruling of Roe:

The outcome of today’s case will doubtless be heralded as a triumph of judicial statesmanship. It is not that, unless it is statesmanlike needlessly to prolong this Court’s self-awarded sovereignty over a field where it has little proper business since the answers to most of the cruel questions posed are political and not juridical—a sovereignty which therefore quite properly, but to the great damage of the Court, makes it the object of the sort of organized public pressure that political institutions in a democracy ought to receive.

In an unusually personal opinion, concurring in part and dissenting in part,

Justice Blackmun, the author of Roe, joined by Justices Brennan and Marshall, wrote:

Today, Roe v. Wade, and the fundamental constitutional right of women to decide whether to terminate a pregnancy, survive but are not secure. Although the Court extricates itself from this case without making a single, even incremental, change in the law of abortion, the plurality and Justice Scalia would overrule Roe (the first silently, the other explicitly) and would return to the States virtually unfettered authority to control the quintessentially intimate, personal, and life-directing decision whether to carry a fetus to term. Although today, no less than yesterday, the Constitution and the decisions of this Court prohibit a State from enacting laws that inhibit women from the meaningful exercise of that right, a plurality of this Court implicitly invites every state legislature to enact more and more restrictive abortion regulations in order to provoke more and more test cases, in the hope that sometime down the line the Court will return the law of procreative freedom to the severe limitations that generally prevailed in this country before January 22, 1973. Never in my memory has a plurality announced a judgment of this Court that so foments disregard for the law and for our standing decisions....

I fear for the future. I fear for the liberty and equality of the millions of women who have lived and come of age in the 16 years since Roe was decided. I fear for the integrity of, and public esteem for, this Court....

For today, at least, the law of abortion stands undisturbed. For today, the women of this Nation still retain the liberty to control their destinies. But the signs are evident and very ominous, and a chill wind blows.

Justice Stevens also filed an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

Shortly after the decisions in Webster, President George H. W. Bush, a public opponent of Roe, appointed two new justices to the Court. The Court thereupon returned to the abortion issue in the case excerpted below. Consider the extent to which the decisions summarized in this Note survive the Court's new formulation of the abortion right.

Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey
505 U.S. 833 (1992)

JUSTICE O'CONNOR, JUSTICE KENNEDY, and JUSTICE SOUTER announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III, V-A, V-C, and VI, an opinion with respect to Part V-E, in which JUSTICE STEVENS joins, and an opinion with respect to Parts IV, V-B, and V-D.

I

Liberty finds no refuge in a jurisprudence of doubt. Yet 19 years after our holding that the Constitution protects a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy in its early stages, that definition of liberty is still questioned. Joining the respondents as amicus curiae, the United States, as it has done in five other cases in the last decade, again asks us to overrule Roe.

At issue in these cases are five provisions of the Pennsylvania Abortion Control Act of 1982 as amended in 1988 and 1989. [The] Act requires that a woman seeking an abortion give her informed consent prior to the abortion procedure, and specifies that she be provided with certain information at least 24 hours before the abortion is performed. For a minor to obtain an abortion, the Act requires the informed consent of one of her parents, but provides for a judicial bypass option if the minor does not wish to or cannot obtain a parent's consent. Another provision of the Act requires that, unless certain exceptions apply, a married woman seeking an abortion must sign a statement indicating that she has notified her husband of her intended abortion. The Act exempts compliance with these three requirements in the event of a "medical emergency." [In] addition to the above provisions regulating the performance of abortions, the Act imposes certain reporting requirements on facilities that provide abortion services.

[After] considering the fundamental constitutional questions resolved by Roe, principles of institutional integrity, and the rule of stare decisis, we are led to conclude this: the essential holding of Roe v. Wade should be retained and once again reaffirmed.

It must be stated at the outset and with clarity that Roe's essential holding, the holding we reaffirm, has three parts. First is a recognition of the right of the woman to choose to have an abortion before viability and to obtain it without undue interference from the State. Before viability, the State's interests are not strong enough to support a prohibition of abortion or the imposition of a substantial obstacle to the woman's effective right to elect the procedure. Second is a confirmation of the State's power to restrict abortions after fetal viability, if the law contains exceptions for pregnancies which endanger a woman's life or health. And third is the principle that the State has legitimate interests from the outset of the pregnancy in protecting the health of the woman and the life of the fetus that may become a child.

II

Constitutional protection of the woman's decision to terminate her pregnancy derives from the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. [Although] a literal reading of the Clause might suggest that it governs only the procedures by which a State may deprive persons of liberty, for at least 105 years, [the] Clause has been understood to contain a substantive component as well.

[It] is also tempting [to] suppose that the Due Process Clause protects only those practices, defined at the most specific level, that were protected against government interference by other rules of law when the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified. See Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110, 127–128, n.6 (1989) (opinion of Scalia, J.). But such a view would be inconsistent with our law. It is a promise of the Constitution that there is a realm of personal liberty which the government may not enter. We have vindicated this principle before. Marriage is mentioned nowhere in the Bill of Rights and interracial marriage was illegal in most States in the 19th century, but the Court was no doubt correct in finding it to be an aspect of liberty protected against state interference by the substantive component of the Due Process Clause in Loving v. Virginia. [Neither] the Bill of Rights nor the specific practices of States at the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment marks the outer limits of the substantive sphere of liberty which the Fourteenth Amendment protects. See U.S. Const., Amend. 9.

[Abortion] is a unique act. It is an act fraught with consequences for others: for the woman who must live with the implications of her decision; for the persons who perform and assist in the procedure; for the spouse, family, and society which must confront the knowledge that these procedures exist, procedures some deem nothing short of an act of violence against innocent human life; and, depending on one's beliefs, for the life or potential life that is aborted. [The] mother who carries a child to full term is subject to anxieties, to physical constraints, to pain that only she must bear. That these sacrifices have from the beginning of the human race been endured by woman with a pride that ennobles her in the eyes of others and gives to the infant a bond of love cannot alone be grounds for the State to insist she make the sacrifice. Her suffering is too intimate and personal for the State to insist, without more, upon its own vision of the woman's role, however dominant that vision has been in the course of our history and our culture. The destiny of the woman must be shaped to a large extent on her own conception of her spiritual imperatives and her place in society.

It should be recognized, moreover, that in some critical respects the abortion decision is of the same character as the decision to use contraception, to which Griswold v. Connecticut, Eisenstadt v. Baird, and Carey v. Population Services International afford constitutional protection. We have no doubt as to the correctness of those decisions. They support the reasoning in Roe relating to the woman's liberty because they involve personal decisions concerning not only the meaning of procreation but also human responsibility and respect for it....

A....

[When] this Court reexamines a prior holding, its judgment is customarily informed by a series of prudential and pragmatic considerations designed to test the consistency of overruling a prior decision with the ideal of the rule of law, and to gauge the respective costs of reaffirming and overruling a prior case. [In] this case we may inquire whether Roe's central rule has been found unworkable; whether the rule's limitation on state power could be removed without serious inequity to those who have relied upon it or significant damage to the stability of the society governed by the rule in question; whether the law's growth in the intervening years has left Roe's central rule a doctrinal anachronism discounted by society; and whether Roe's premises of fact have so far changed in the ensuing two decades as to render its central holding somehow irrelevant or unjustifiable in dealing with the issue it addressed.

Although Roe has engendered opposition, it has in no sense proven "unworkable," representing as it does a simple limitation beyond which a state law is unenforceable. While Roe has, of course, required judicial assessment of state laws affecting the exercise of the choice guaranteed against government infringement, and although the need for such review will remain as a consequence of today's decision, the required determinations fall within judicial competence.

The inquiry into reliance counts the cost of a rule's repudiation as it would fall on those who have relied reasonably on the rule's continued application....

While neither respondents nor their amici in so many words deny that the abortion right invites some reliance prior to its actual exercise, one can readily imagine an argument stressing the dissimilarity of this case to one involving property or contract. Abortion is customarily chosen as an unplanned response to the consequence of unplanned activity or to the failure of conventional birth control, and except on the assumption that no intercourse would have occurred but for Roe's holding, such behavior may appear to justify no reliance claim.

[To] eliminate the issue of reliance that easily, however, one would need to limit cognizable reliance to specific instances of sexual activity. But to do this would be simply to refuse to face the fact that for two decades of economic and social developments, people have organized intimate relationships and made choices that define their views of themselves and their places in society, in reliance on the availability of abortion in the event that contraception should fail. The ability of women to participate equally in the economic and social life of the Nation has been facilitated by their ability to control their reproductive lives. See, e.g., R. Petchesky, Abortion and Woman's Choice 109, 133, n.7 (rev. ed. 1990). The Constitution serves human values, and while the effect of reliance on Roe cannot be exactly measured, neither can the certain cost of overruling Roe for people who have ordered their thinking and living around that case be dismissed.

No evolution of legal principle has left Roe's doctrinal footings weaker than they were in 1973. No development of constitutional law since the case was decided has implicitly or explicitly left Roe behind as a mere survivor of obsolete constitutional thinking.

It will be recognized, of course, that Roe stands at an intersection of two lines of decisions, but in whichever doctrinal category one reads the case, the result for present purposes will be the same. The Roe Court itself placed its holding in the succession of cases most prominently exemplified by Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), see Roe, 410 U.S., at 152–153. [Roe,] however, may be seen not only as an exemplar of Griswold liberty but as a rule (whether or not mistaken) of personal autonomy and bodily integrity, with doctrinal affinity to cases recognizing limits on governmental power to mandate medical treatment or to bar its rejection. If so, our cases since Roe accord with Roe's view that a State's interest in the protection of life falls short of justifying any plenary override of individual liberty claims. Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Dept. of Health [section F4 infra]. Finally, one could classify Roe as sui generis. If the case is so viewed, then there clearly has been no erosion of its central determination.

[The] soundness of this prong of the Roe analysis is apparent from a consideration of the alternative. If indeed the woman's interest in deciding whether to bear and beget a child had not been recognized as in Roe, the State might as readily restrict a woman's right to choose to carry a pregnancy to term as to terminate it, to further asserted state interests in population control, or eugenics, for example. Yet Roe has been sensibly relied upon to counter any such suggestions.

[Time] has overtaken some of Roe's factual assumptions: advances in maternal health care allow for abortions safe to the mother later in pregnancy than was true in 1973. But these facts go only to the scheme of time limits on the realization of competing interests, and the divergences from the factual premises of 1973 have no bearing on the validity of Roe's central holding, that viability marks the earliest point at which the State's interest in fetal life is constitutionally adequate to justify a legislative ban on nontherapeutic abortions.

In a less significant case, stare decisis analysis could, and would, stop at the point we have reached. But the sustained and widespread debate Roe has provoked calls for some comparison between that case and others of comparable dimension that have responded to national controversies and taken on the impress of the controversies addressed. Only two such decisional lines from the past century present themselves for examination, and in each instance the result reached by the Court accorded with the principles we apply today.

The first example is that line of cases identified with Lochner v. New York. [West] Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish signaled the demise of Lochner by overruling Adkins. In the meantime, the Depression had come and, with it, the lesson that seemed unmistakable to most people by 1937, that the interpretation of contractual freedom protected in Adkins rested on fundamentally false factual assumptions about the capacity of a relatively unregulated market to satisfy minimal levels of human welfare. As Justice Jackson wrote of the constitutional crisis of 1937 shortly before he came on the bench, "The older world of laissez faire was recognized everywhere outside the Court to be dead." R. Jackson, The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy 85 (1941). The facts upon which the earlier case had premised a constitutional resolution of social controversy had proved to be untrue, and history's demonstration of their untruth not only justified but required the new choice of constitutional principle that West Coast Hotel announced. Of course, it was true that the Court lost something by its misperception, or its lack of prescience, and the Court-packing crisis only magnified the loss; but the clear demonstration that the facts of economic life were different from those previously assumed warranted the repudiation of the old law.

The second comparison that 20th century history invites is with the cases employing the separate-but-equal rule for applying the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection guarantee. They began with Plessy v. Ferguson. [The] Plessy Court considered "the underlying fallacy of the plaintiff's argument to consist in the assumption that the enforced separation of the two races stamps the colored race with a badge of inferiority. If this be so, it is not by reason of anything found in the act, but solely because the colored race chooses to put that construction upon it." [But] this understanding of the facts and the rule it was stated to justify were repudiated in Brown. As one commentator observed, the question before the Court in Brown was "whether discrimination inheres in that segregation which is imposed by law in the twentieth century in certain specific states in the American Union. And that question has meaning and can find an answer only on the ground of history and of common knowledge about the facts of life in the times and places aforesaid." Black, The Lawfulness of the Segregation Decisions, 69 Yale L.J. 421, 427 (1960).

The Court in Brown addressed these facts of life by observing that whatever may have been the understanding in Plessy's time of the power of segregation to stigmatize those who were segregated with a "badge of inferiority," it was clear by 1954 that legally sanctioned segregation had just such an effect, to the point that racially separate public educational facilities were deemed inherently unequal. Society's understanding of the facts upon which a constitutional ruling was sought in 1954 was thus fundamentally different from the basis claimed for the decision in 1896. While we think Plessy was wrong the day it was decided, see Plessy (Harlan, J., dissenting), we must also recognize that the Plessy Court's explanation for its decision was so clearly at odds with the facts apparent to the Court in 1954 that the decision to reexamine Plessy was on this ground alone not only justified but required.

West Coast Hotel and Brown each rested on facts, or an understanding of facts, changed from those which furnished the claimed justifications for the earlier constitutional resolutions. Each case was comprehensible as the Court's response to facts that the country could understand, or had come to understand already, but which the Court of an earlier day, as its own declarations disclosed, had not been able to perceive. As the decisions were thus comprehensible they were also defensible, not merely as the victories of one doctrinal school over another by dint of numbers (victories though they were), but as applications of constitutional principle to facts as they had not been seen by the Court before. In constitutional adjudication as elsewhere in life, changed circumstances may impose new obligations, and the thoughtful part of the Nation could accept each decision to overrule a prior case as a response to the Court's constitutional duty.

Because the case before us presents no such occasion it could be seen as no such response. Because neither the factual underpinnings of Roe's central holding nor our understanding of it has changed (and because no other indication of weakened precedent has been shown) the Court could not pretend to be reexamining the prior law with any justification beyond a present doctrinal disposition to come out differently from the Court of 1973. To overrule prior law for no other reason than that would run counter to the view repeated in our cases, that a decision to overrule should rest on some special reason over and above the belief that a prior case was wrongly decided....

The examination of the conditions justifying the repudiation of Adkins by West Coast Hotel and Plessy by Brown is enough to suggest the terrible price that would have been paid if the Court had not overruled as it did. In the present case, however, as our analysis to this point makes clear, the terrible price would be paid for overruling. Our analysis would not be complete, however, without explaining why overruling Roe's central holding would not only reach an unjustifiable result under principles of stare decisis, but would seriously weaken the Court's capacity to exercise the judicial power and to function as the Supreme Court of a Nation dedicated to the rule of law....

[The] Court cannot buy support for its decisions by spending money and, except to a minor degree, it cannot independently coerce obedience to its decrees. The Court's power lies, rather, in its legitimacy, a product of substance and perception that shows itself in the people's acceptance of the Judiciary as fit to determine what the Nation's law means and to declare what it demands....

[The] need for principled action to be perceived as such is implicated to some degree whenever this, or any other appellate court, overrules a prior case. [In] two circumstances, however, the Court would almost certainly fail to receive the benefit of the doubt in overruling prior cases. There is, first, a point beyond which frequent overruling would overtax the country's belief in the Court's good faith. [That] first circumstance can be described as hypothetical; the second is to the point here and now. Where, in the performance of its judicial duties, the Court decides a case in such a way as to resolve the sort of intensely divisive controversy reflected in Roe and those rare, comparable cases, its decision has a dimension that the resolution of the normal case does not carry. It is the dimension present whenever the Court's interpretation of the Constitution calls the contending sides of a national controversy to end their national division by accepting a common mandate rooted in the Constitution. [To] overrule under fire in the absence of the most compelling reason to reexamine a watershed decision would subvert the Court's legitimacy beyond any serious question. [A] decision to overrule Roe's essential holding under the existing circumstances would address error, if error there was, at the cost of both profound and unnecessary damage to the Court's legitimacy, and to the Nation's commitment to the rule of law. It is therefore imperative to adhere to the essence of Roe's original decision, and we do so today.

[The] woman's liberty is not so unlimited, however, that from the outset the State cannot show its concern for the life of the unborn, and at a later point in fetal development the State's interest in life has sufficient force so that the right of the woman to terminate the pregnancy can be restricted.

[We] conclude the line should be drawn at viability, so that before that time the woman has a right to choose to terminate her pregnancy. We adhere to this principle for two reasons. First, as we have said, is the doctrine of stare decisis. [The] second reason is that the concept of viability, as we noted in Roe, is the time at which there is a realistic possibility of maintaining and nourishing a life outside the womb, so that the independent existence of the second life can in reason and all fairness be the object of state protection that now overrides the rights of the woman....

On the other side of the equation is the interest of the State in the protection of potential life. [It] must be remembered that Roe v. Wade speaks with clarity in establishing not only the woman's liberty but also the State's "important and legitimate interest in potential life." That portion of the decision in Roe has been given too little acknowledgement and implementation by the Court in its subsequent cases. [We] reject the trimester framework, which we do not consider to be part of the essential holding of Roe. [The] trimester framework suffers from these basic flaws: in its formulation it misconceives the nature of the pregnant woman's interest; and in practice it undervalues the State's interest in potential life, as recognized in Roe....

[These] considerations of the nature of the abortion right illustrate that it is an overstatement to describe it as a right to decide whether to have an abortion "without interference from the State." [Not] all governmental intrusion is of necessity unwarranted; and that brings us to the other basic flaw in the trimester framework: even in Roe's terms, in practice it undervalues the State's interest in the potential life within the woman....

[Not] all burdens on the right to decide whether to terminate a pregnancy will be undue. In our view, the undue burden standard is the appropriate means of reconciling the State's interest with the woman's constitutionally protected liberty....

A finding of an undue burden is a shorthand for the conclusion that a state regulation has the purpose or effect of placing a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion of a nonviable fetus. A statute with this purpose is invalid because the means chosen by the State to further the interest in potential life must be calculated to inform the woman's free choice, not hinder it. And a statute which, while furthering the interest in potential life or some other valid state interest, has the effect of placing a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman's choice cannot be considered a permissible means of serving its legitimate ends. [Understood] another way, we answer the question, left open in previous opinions discussing the undue burden formulation, whether a law designed to further the State's interest in fetal life which imposes an undue burden on the woman's decision before fetal viability could be constitutional. The answer is no.

Some guiding principles should emerge. What is at stake is the woman's right to make the ultimate decision, not a right to be insulated from all others in doing so. Regulations which do no more than create a structural mechanism by which the State, or the parent or guardian of a minor, may express profound respect for the life of the unborn are permitted, if they are not a substantial obstacle to the woman's exercise of the right to choose. Unless it has that effect on her right of choice, a state measure designed to persuade her to choose childbirth over abortion will be upheld if reasonably related to that goal. Regulations designed to foster the health of a woman seeking an abortion are valid if they do not constitute an undue burden.

[We] give this summary:

(a) To protect the central right recognized by Roe v. Wade while at the same time accommodating the State's profound interest in potential life, we will employ the undue burden analysis as explained in this opinion. An undue burden exists, and therefore a provision of law is invalid, if its purpose or effect is to place a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion before the fetus attains viability.

(b) We reject the rigid trimester framework of Roe v. Wade. To promote the State's profound interest in potential life, throughout pregnancy the State may take measures to ensure that the woman's choice is informed, and measures designed to advance this interest will not be invalidated as long as their purpose is to persuade the woman to choose childbirth over abortion. These measures must not be an undue burden on the right.

(c) As with any medical procedure, the State may enact regulations to further the health or safety of a woman seeking an abortion. Unnecessary health regulations that have the purpose or effect of presenting a substantial obstacle to a woman seeking an abortion impose an undue burden on the right.

(d) Our adoption of the undue burden analysis does not disturb the central holding of Roe v. Wade, and we reaffirm that holding. Regardless of whether exceptions are made for particular circumstances, a State may not prohibit any woman from making the ultimate decision to terminate her pregnancy before viability.

(e) We also reaffirm Roe's holding that "subsequent to viability, the State in promoting its interest in the potentiality of human life may, if it chooses, regulate, and even proscribe, abortion except where it is necessary, in appropriate medical judgment, for the preservation of the life or health of the mother."

Because it is central to the operation of various other requirements, we begin with the statute's definition of medical emergency. Under the statute, a medical emergency is that condition which, on the basis of the physician's good faith clinical judgment, so complicates the medical condition of a pregnant woman as to necessitate the immediate abortion of her pregnancy to avert her death or for which a delay will create serious risk of substantial and irreversible impairment of a major bodily function.

[The] District Court found that there were three serious conditions which would not be covered by the statute: preeclampsia, inevitable abortion, and premature ruptured membrane. Yet, as the Court of Appeals observed, it is undisputed that under some circumstances each of these conditions could lead to an illness with substantial and irreversible consequences. While the definition could be interpreted in an unconstitutional manner, the Court of Appeals construed the phrase “serious risk” to include those circumstances. [We] conclude that, as construed by the Court of Appeals, the medical emergency definition imposes no undue burden on a woman’s abortion right.

[Except] in a medical emergency, the statute requires that at least 24 hours before performing an abortion a physician inform the woman of the nature of the procedure, the health risks of the abortion and of childbirth, and the “probable gestational age of the unborn child.” The physician or a qualified nonphysician must inform the woman of the availability of printed materials published by the State describing the fetus and providing information about medical assistance for childbirth, information about child support from the father, and a list of agencies which provide adoption and other services as alternatives to abortion. An abortion may not be performed unless the woman certifies in writing that she has been informed of the availability of these printed materials and has been provided them if she chooses to view them....

To the extent [City of Akron] and Thornburgh find a constitutional violation when the government requires, as it does here, the giving of truthful, nonmisleading information about the nature of the procedure, the attendant health risks and those of childbirth, and the “probable gestational age” of the fetus, those cases go too far, are inconsistent with Roe’s acknowledgment of an important interest in potential life, and are overruled. [In] attempting to ensure that a woman apprehend the full consequences of her decision, the State furthers the legitimate purpose of reducing the risk that a woman may elect an abortion, only to discover later, with devastating psychological consequences, that her decision was not fully informed. If the information the State requires to be made available to the woman is truthful and not misleading, the requirement may be permissible.

We also see no reason why the State may not require doctors to inform a woman seeking an abortion of the availability of materials relating to the consequences to the fetus, even when those consequences have no direct relation to her health....

All that is left of petitioners’ argument is an asserted First Amendment right of a physician not to provide information about the risks of abortion, and childbirth, in a manner mandated by the State. To be sure, the physician’s First Amendment rights not to speak are implicated, but only as part of the practice of medicine, subject to reasonable licensing and regulation by the State. We see no constitutional infirmity in the requirement that the physician provide the information mandated by the State here....

[In] [City of Akron] we said: “Nor are we convinced that the State’s legitimate concern that the woman’s decision be informed is reasonably served by requiring a 24-hour delay as a matter of course.” We consider that conclusion to be wrong. The idea that important decisions will be more informed and deliberate if they follow some period of reflection does not strike us as unreasonable, particularly where the statute directs that important information become part of the background of the decision....

Whether the mandatory 24-hour waiting period is nonetheless invalid because in practice it is a substantial obstacle to a woman’s choice to terminate her pregnancy is a closer question. The findings of fact by the District Court indicate that because of the distances many women must travel to reach an abortion provider, the practical effect will often be a delay of much more than a day because the waiting period requires that a woman seeking an abortion make at least two visits to the doctor. The District Court also found that in many instances this will increase the exposure of women seeking abortions to “the harassment and hostility of anti-abortion protestors demonstrating outside a clinic.” As a result, the District Court found that for those women who have the fewest financial resources, those who must travel long distances, and those who have difficulty explaining their whereabouts to husbands, employers, or others, the 24-hour waiting period will be “particularly burdensome.”

These findings are troubling in some respects, but they do not demonstrate that the waiting period constitutes an undue burden. We do not doubt that, as the District Court held, the waiting period has the effect of “increasing the cost and risk of delay of abortions,” but the District Court did not conclude that the increased costs and potential delays amount to substantial obstacles. Rather, applying the trimester framework’s strict prohibition of all regulation designed to promote the State’s interest in potential life before viability, the District Court concluded that the waiting period does not further the state “interest in maternal health” and “infringes the physician’s discretion to exercise sound medical judgment.” Yet as we have stated, under the undue burden standard a State is permitted to enact persuasive measures which favor childbirth over abortion, even if those measures do not further a health interest. And while the waiting period does limit a physician’s discretion, that is not, standing alone, a reason to invalidate it.

We also disagree with the District Court’s conclusion that the “particularly burdensome” effects of the waiting period on some women require its invalidation....

We are left with the argument that the various aspects of the informed consent requirement are unconstitutional because they place barriers in the way of abortion on demand. Even the broadest reading of Roe, however, has not suggested that there is a constitutional right to abortion on demand. Rather, the right protected by Roe is a right to decide to terminate a pregnancy free of undue interference by the State. Because the informed consent requirement facilitates the wise exercise of that right it cannot be classified as an interference with the right Roe protects. The informed consent requirement is not an undue burden on that right.

Section 3209 of Pennsylvania's abortion law provides, except in cases of medical emergency, that no physician shall perform an abortion on a married woman without receiving a signed statement from the woman that she has notified her spouse that she is about to undergo an abortion. The woman has the option of providing an alternative signed statement certifying that her husband is not the man who impregnated her; that her husband could not be located; that the pregnancy is the result of spousal sexual assault which she has reported; or that the woman believes that notifying her husband will cause him or someone else to inflict bodily injury upon her. A physician who performs an abortion on a married woman without receiving the appropriate signed statement will have his or her license revoked, and is liable to the husband for damages.

The District Court heard the testimony of numerous expert witnesses, and made detailed findings of fact regarding the effect of this statute.

[279.] The "bodily injury" exception could not be invoked by a married woman whose husband, if notified, would, in her reasonable belief, threaten to (a) publicize her intent to have an abortion to family, friends or acquaintances; (b) retaliate against her in future child custody or divorce proceedings; (c) inflict psychological intimidation or emotional harm upon her, her children or other persons; (d) inflict bodily harm on other persons such as children, family members or other loved ones; or (e) use his control over finances to deprive of necessary monies for herself or her children....

281. Studies reveal that family violence occurs in two million families in the United States. This figure, however, is a conservative one that substantially understates (because battering is usually not reported until it reaches life-threatening proportions) the actual number of families affected by domestic violence. In fact, researchers estimate that one of every two women will be battered at some time in their life....

282. A wife may not elect to notify her husband of her intention to have an abortion for a variety of reasons, including the husband's illness, concern about her own health, the imminent failure of the marriage, or the husband's absolute opposition to the abortion....

[286.] Married women, victims of battering, have been killed in Pennsylvania and throughout the United States....

[289.] Mere notification of pregnancy is frequently a flashpoint for battering and violence within the family. The number of battering incidents is high during the pregnancy and often the worst abuse can be associated with pregnancy....

The battering husband may deny parentage and use the pregnancy as an excuse for abuse....

290. Secrecy typically shrouds abusive families. Family members are instructed not to tell anyone, especially police or doctors, about the abuse and violence. Battering husbands often threaten their wives or her children with further abuse if she tells an outsider of the violence and tells her that nobody will believe her. A battered woman, therefore, is highly unlikely to disclose the violence against her for fear of retaliation by the abuser....

[298.] Because of the nature of the battering relationship, battered women are unlikely to avail themselves of the exceptions to section 3209 of the Act, regardless of whether the section applies to them.

These findings are supported by studies of domestic violence. [There] are millions of women in this country who are the victims of regular physical and psychological abuse at the hands of their husbands. Should these women become pregnant, they may have very good reasons for not wishing to inform their husbands of their decision to obtain an abortion....

[Respondents] attempt to avoid the conclusion that §3209 is invalid by pointing out that [the] effects of §3209 are felt by only one percent of the women who obtain abortions. [We] disagree with respondents' basic method of analysis.

The analysis does not end with one percent of women upon whom the statute operates; it begins there. Legislation is measured for consistency with the Constitution by its impact on those whose conduct it affects. [The] unfortunate yet persisting conditions we document above will mean that in a large fraction of the cases in which §3209 is relevant, it will operate as a substantial obstacle to a woman's choice to undergo an abortion. It is an undue burden, and therefore invalid.

This conclusion is in no way inconsistent with our decisions upholding parental notification or consent requirements. Those enactments, and our judgment that they are constitutional, are based on the quite reasonable assumption that minors will benefit from consultation with their parents and that children will often not realize that their parents have their best interests at heart. We cannot adopt a parallel assumption about adult women....

It is an inescapable biological fact that state regulation with respect to the child a woman is carrying will have a far greater impact on the mother's liberty than on the father's. The effect of state regulation on a woman's protected liberty is doubly deserving of scrutiny in such a case, as the State has touched not only upon the private sphere of the family but upon the very bodily integrity of the pregnant woman. The Court has held that "when the wife and the husband disagree on this decision, the view of only one of the two marriage partners can prevail. Inasmuch as it is the woman who physically bears the child and who is the more directly and immediately affected by the pregnancy, as between the two, the balance weighs in her favor." Danforth. [The] Constitution protects individuals, men and women alike, from unjustified state interference, even when that interference is enacted into law for the benefit of their spouses.

[The] husband's interest in the life of the child his wife is carrying does not permit the State to empower him with this troubling degree of authority over his wife. The contrary view leads to consequences reminiscent of the common law. A husband has no enforceable right to require a wife to advise him before she exercises her personal choices. [A] State may not give to a man the kind of dominion over his wife that parents exercise over their children.

Section 3209 embodies a view of marriage consonant with the common-law status of married women but repugnant to our present understanding of marriage and of the nature of the rights secured by the Constitution. Women do not lose their constitutionally protected liberty when they marry....

We next consider the parental consent provision. Except in a medical emergency, an unemancipated young woman under 18 may not obtain an abortion unless she and one of her parents (or guardian) provides informed consent as defined above. If neither a parent nor a guardian provides consent, a court may authorize the performance of an abortion upon a determination that the young woman is mature and capable of giving informed consent and has in fact given her informed consent, or that an abortion would be in her best interests....

The only argument made by petitioners respecting this provision and to which our prior decisions do not speak is the contention that the parental consent requirement is invalid because it requires informed parental consent. For the most part, petitioners' argument is a reprise of their argument with respect to the informed consent requirement in general, and we reject it for the reasons given above....

Under the recordkeeping and reporting requirements of the statute, every facility which performs abortions is required to file a report stating its name and address as well as the name and address of any related entity, such as a controlling or subsidiary organization. In the case of state-funded institutions, the information becomes public....

In Danforth, we held that recordkeeping and reporting provisions "that are reasonably directed to the preservation of maternal health and that properly respect a patient's confidentiality and privacy are permissible." We think that under this standard, all the provisions at issue here except that relating to spousal notice are constitutional. Although they do not relate to the State's interest in informing the woman's choice, they do relate to health. The collection of information with respect to actual patients is a vital element of medical research, and so it cannot be said that the requirements serve no purpose other than to make abortions more difficult. Nor do we find that the requirements impose a substantial obstacle to a woman's choice. At most they might increase the cost of some abortions by a slight amount. While at some point increased cost could become a substantial obstacle, there is no such showing on the record before us.

Our Constitution is a covenant running from the first generation of Americans to us and then to future generations. It is a coherent succession. Each generation must learn anew that the Constitution's written terms embody ideas and aspirations that must survive more ages than one. We accept our responsibility not to retreat from interpreting the full meaning of the covenant in light of all of our precedents. We invoke it once again to define the freedom guaranteed by the Constitution's own promise, the promise of liberty.

JUSTICE BLACKMUN, concurring in part, concurring in the judgment in part, and dissenting in part....

State restrictions on abortion violate a woman's right of privacy in two ways. First, compelled continuation of a pregnancy infringes upon a woman's right to bodily integrity by imposing substantial physical intrusions and significant risks of physical harm. During pregnancy, women experience dramatic physical changes and a wide range of health consequences. Labor and delivery pose additional health risks and physical demands. In short, restrictive abortion laws force women to endure physical invasions far more substantial than those this Court has held to violate the constitutional principle of bodily integrity in other contexts. See, e.g., Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753 (1985) (invalidating surgical removal of bullet from murder suspect); Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952) (invalidating stomach-pumping).

Further, when the State restricts a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy, it deprives a woman of the right to make her own decision about reproduction and family planning—critical life choices that this Court long has deemed central to the right to privacy....

A State's restrictions on a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy also implicate constitutional guarantees of gender equality. State restrictions on abortion compel women to continue pregnancies they otherwise might terminate. By restricting the right to terminate pregnancies, the State conscripts women's bodies into its service, forcing women to continue their pregnancies, suffer the pains of childbirth, and in most instances, provide years of maternal care. The State does not compensate women for their services; instead, it assumes that they owe this duty as a matter of course. This assumption—that women can simply be forced to accept the “natural” status and incidents of motherhood—appears to rest upon a conception of women’s role that has triggered the protection of the Equal Protection Clause. The joint opinion recognizes that these assumptions about women’s place in society “are no longer consistent with our understanding of the family, the individual, or the Constitution.”...

The 24-hour waiting period following the provision of the foregoing information is [clearly] unconstitutional. [The] Pennsylvania statute requires every facility performing abortions to report its activities to the Commonwealth. [The] Commonwealth attempts to justify its required reports on the ground that the public has a right to know how its tax dollars are spent. A regulation designed to inform the public about public expenditures does not further the Commonwealth’s interest in protecting maternal health. Accordingly, such a regulation cannot justify a legally significant burden on a woman’s right to obtain an abortion....

JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring in part and dissenting in part....

My disagreement with the joint opinion begins with its understanding of the trimester framework established in Roe. [It] is not a “contradiction” to recognize that the State may have a legitimate interest in potential human life and, at the same time, to conclude that that interest does not justify the regulation of abortion before viability (although other interests, such as maternal health, may). The fact that the State's interest is legitimate does not tell us when, if ever, that interest outweighs the pregnant woman's interest in personal liberty. It is appropriate, therefore, to consider more carefully the nature of the interests at stake.

[It] is clear that, in order to be legitimate, the State's interest must be secular; consistent with the First Amendment the State may not promote a theological or sectarian interest....

Identifying the State's interests—which the States rarely articulate with any precision—makes clear that the interest in protecting potential life is not grounded in the Constitution. It is, instead, an indirect interest supported by both humanitarian and pragmatic concerns. Many of our citizens believe that any abortion reflects an unacceptable disrespect for potential human life and that the performance of more than a million abortions each year is intolerable; many find third-trimester abortions performed when the fetus is approaching personhood particularly offensive. The State has a legitimate interest in minimizing such offense. The State may also have a broader interest in expanding the population, believing society would benefit from the services of additional productive citizens—or that the potential human lives might include the occasional Mozart or Curie.

[Under] these principles, §§3205(a)(2)(i)-(iii) of the Pennsylvania statute are unconstitutional. Those sections require a physician or counselor to provide the woman with a range of materials clearly designed to persuade her to choose not to undergo the abortion. While the State is free, pursuant to §3208 of the Pennsylvania law, to produce and disseminate such material, the State may not inject such information into the woman's deliberations just as she is weighing such an important choice.

Under this same analysis, §§3205(a)(1)(i) and (iii) of the Pennsylvania statute are constitutional. Those sections, which require the physician to inform a woman of the nature and risks of the abortion procedure and the medical risks of carrying to term, are neutral requirements comparable to those imposed in other medical procedures. Those sections indicate no effort by the State to influence the woman's choice in any way. If anything, such requirements enhance, rather than skew, the woman's decisionmaking.

The 24-hour waiting period required by §§3205(a)(1)-(2) of the Pennsylvania statute raises even more serious concerns....

A burden may be “undue” either because the burden is too severe or because it lacks a legitimate, rational justification.

The 24-hour delay requirement fails both parts of this test....

The counseling provisions are similarly infirm. Whenever government commands private citizens to speak or to listen, careful review of the justification for that command is particularly appropriate. In this case, the Pennsylvania statute directs that counselors provide women seeking abortions with information concerning alternatives to abortion, the availability of medical assistance benefits, and the possibility of child-support payments. The statute requires that this information be given to all women seeking abortions, including those for whom such information is clearly useless, such as those who are married, those who have undergone the procedure in the past and are fully aware of the options, and those who are fully convinced that abortion is their only reasonable option. Moreover, the statute requires physicians to inform all of their patients of "the probable gestational age of the unborn child." This information is of little decisional value in most cases, because 90% of all abortions are performed during the first trimester when fetal age has less relevance than when the fetus nears viability....

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST, with whom JUSTICE WHITE, JUSTICE SCALIA, and JUSTICE THOMAS join, concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part.

The joint opinion, following its newly-minted variation on stare decisis, retains the outer shell of Roe v. Wade, but beats a wholesale retreat from the substance of that case. We believe that Roe was wrongly decided, and that it can and should be overruled consistently with our traditional approach to stare decisis in constitutional cases. We would adopt the approach of the plurality in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, and uphold the challenged provisions of the Pennsylvania statute in their entirety.

I

[Unlike] marriage, procreation and contraception, abortion "involves the purposeful termination of potential life." Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 325 (1980). [One] cannot ignore the fact that a woman is not isolated in her pregnancy, and that the decision to abort necessarily involves the destruction of a fetus.

Nor do the historical traditions of the American people support the view that the right to terminate one's pregnancy is "fundamental." The common law which we inherited from England made abortion after "quickeening" an offense. At the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, statutory prohibitions or restrictions on abortion were commonplace....

[We] think, therefore, both in view of this history and of our decided cases dealing with substantive liberty under the Due Process Clause, that the Court was mistaken in Roe when it classified a woman's decision to terminate her pregnancy as a "fundamental right" that could be abridged only in a manner which withstood "strict scrutiny."

II

[The] joint opinion [cannot] bring itself to say that Roe was correct as an original matter, but the authors are of the view that "the immediate question is not the soundness of Roe's resolution of the issue, but the precedential force that must be accorded to its holding." Instead of claiming that Roe was correct as a matter of original constitutional interpretation, the opinion therefore contains an elaborate discussion of stare decisis. This discussion of the principle of stare decisis appears to be almost entirely dicta, because the joint opinion does not apply that principle in dealing with Roe. Roe decided that a woman had a fundamental right to an abortion. The joint opinion rejects that view. Roe decided that abortion regulations were to be subjected to "strict scrutiny" and could be justified only in the light of "compelling state interests." The joint opinion rejects that view. Roe analyzed abortion regulation under a rigid trimester framework, a framework which has guided this Court's decisionmaking for 19 years. The joint opinion rejects that framework.

[In] our view, authentic principles of stare decisis do not require that any portion of the reasoning in Roe be kept intact. [Erroneous] decisions in such constitutional cases are uniquely durable, because correction through legislative action, save for constitutional amendment, is impossible....

The joint opinion discusses several stare decisis factors which, it asserts, point toward retaining a portion of Roe. Two of these factors are that the main "factual underpinning" of Roe has remained the same, and that its doctrinal foundation is no weaker now than it was in 1973. Of course, what might be called the basic facts which gave rise to Roe have remained the same—women become pregnant, there is a point somewhere, depending on medical technology, where a fetus becomes viable, and women give birth to children. But this is only to say that the same facts which gave rise to Roe will continue to give rise to similar cases. It is not a reason, in and of itself, why those cases must be decided in the same incorrect manner as was the first case to deal with the question....

The joint opinion also points to the reliance interests involved in this context in its effort to explain why precedent must be followed for precedent's sake. Certainly it is true that where reliance is truly at issue, as in the case of judicial decisions that have formed the basis for private decisions, “considerations in favor of stare decisis are at their acme.” But, as the joint opinion apparently agrees, any traditional notion of reliance is not applicable here.

[Apparently] realizing that conventional stare decisis principles do not support its position, the joint opinion advances a belief that retaining a portion of Roe is necessary to protect the “legitimacy” of this Court. Because the Court must take care to render decisions “grounded truly in principle,” and not simply as political and social compromises, the joint opinion properly declares it to be this Court’s duty to ignore the public criticism and protest that may arise as a result of a decision.

[But] the joint opinion goes on to state that when the Court “resolves the sort of intensely divisive controversy reflected in Roe and those rare, comparable cases,” its decision is exempt from reconsideration under established principles of stare decisis in constitutional cases. [The] first difficulty with this principle lies in its assumption that cases which are “intensely divisive” can be readily distinguished from those that are not. The question of whether a particular issue is “intensely divisive” enough to qualify for special protection is entirely subjective and dependent on the individual assumptions of the members of this Court.

[The] joint opinion picks out and discusses two prior Court rulings that it believes are of the “intensely divisive” variety, and concludes that they are of comparable dimension to Roe. It appears to us very odd indeed that the joint opinion chooses as benchmarks two cases in which the Court chose not to adhere to erroneous constitutional precedent, but instead enhanced its stature by acknowledging and correcting its error, apparently in violation of the joint opinion’s “legitimacy” principle....

The joint opinion agrees that the Court’s stature would have been seriously damaged if in Brown and West Coast Hotel it had dug in its heels and refused to apply normal principles of stare decisis to the earlier decisions. But the opinion contends that the Court was entitled to overrule Plessy and Lochner in those cases, despite the existence of opposition to the original decisions, only because both the Nation and the Court had learned new lessons in the interim. This is at best a feebly supported, post hoc rationalization for those decisions.

For example, the opinion asserts that the Court could justifiably overrule its decision in Lochner only because the Depression had convinced “most people” that constitutional protection of contractual freedom contributed to an economy that failed to protect the welfare of all. Surely the joint opinion does not mean to suggest that people saw this Court’s failure to uphold minimum wage statutes as the cause of the Great Depression! In any event, the Lochner Court did not base its rule upon the policy judgment that an unregulated market was fundamental to a stable economy; it simply believed, erroneously, that “liberty” under the Due Process Clause protected the “right to make a contract.” Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S., at 53. Nor is it the case that the people of this Nation only discovered the dangers of extreme laissez-faire economics because of the Depression....

When the Court finally recognized its error in West Coast Hotel, it did not engage in the post hoc rationalization that the joint opinion attributes to it today; it did not state that Lochner had been based on an economic view that had fallen into disfavor, and that it therefore should be overruled. Chief Justice Hughes in his opinion for the Court simply recognized what Justice Holmes had previously recognized in his Lochner dissent, that “the Constitution does not speak of freedom of contract.”

[The] Court in Brown simply recognized, as Justice Harlan had recognized beforehand, that the Fourteenth Amendment does not permit racial segregation. The rule of Brown is not tied to popular opinion about the evils of segregation; it is a judgment that the Equal Protection Clause does not permit racial segregation, no matter whether the public might come to believe that it is beneficial....

JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom [CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST], JUSTICE WHITE, and JUSTICE THOMAS join, concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part....

[The] issue in these cases [is] not whether the power of a woman to abort her unborn child is a “liberty” in the absolute sense; or even whether it is a liberty of great importance to many women. Of course it is both. The issue is whether it is a liberty protected by the Constitution of the United States. I am sure it is not. I reach that conclusion [for] the same reason I reach the conclusion that bigamy is not constitutionally protected—because of two simple facts: (1) the Constitution says absolutely nothing about it, and (2) the longstanding traditions of American society have permitted it to be legally proscribed.

[Applying] the rational basis test, I would uphold the Pennsylvania statute in its entirety. I must, however, respond to a few of the more outrageous arguments in today’s opinion, which it is beyond human nature to leave unanswered.

[The] Court’s description of the place of Roe in the social history of the United States is unrecognizable. Not only did Roe not, as the Court suggests, resolve the deeply divisive issue of abortion; it did more than anything else to nourish it, by elevating it to the national level where it is infinitely more difficult to resolve. National politics were not plagued by abortion protests, national abortion lobbying, or abortion marches on Congress, before Roe v. Wade was decided. Profound disagreement existed among our citizens over the issue—as it does over other issues, such as the death penalty—but that disagreement was being worked out at the state level. As with many other issues, the division of sentiment within each State was not as closely balanced as it was among the population of the Nation as a whole, meaning not only that more people would be satisfied with the results of state-by-state resolution, but also that those results would be more stable. Pre-Roe, moreover, political compromise was possible.

Roe's mandate for abortion-on-demand destroyed the compromises of the past, rendered compromise impossible for the future, and required the entire issue to be resolved uniformly, at the national level. At the same time, Roe created a vast new class of abortion consumers and abortion proponents by eliminating the moral opprobrium that had attached to the act. (“If the Constitution guarantees abortion, how can it be bad?”—not an accurate line of thought, but a natural one.) Many favor all of those developments, and it is not for me to say that they are wrong. But to portray Roe as the statesmanlike “settlement” of a divisive issue, a jurisprudential Peace of Westphalia that is worth preserving, is nothing less than Orwellian. Roe fanned into life an issue that has inflamed our national politics in general, and has obscured with its smoke the selection of Justices to this Court in particular, ever since.

[What] makes all this relevant to the bothersome application of “political pressure” against the Court are the twin facts that the American people love democracy and the American people are not fools. As long as this Court thought (and the people thought) that we Justices were doing essentially lawyers’ work up here—reading text and discerning our society’s traditional understanding of that text—the public pretty much left us alone. Texts and traditions are facts to study, not convictions to demonstrate about.

[There] is a poignant aspect to the Court’s opinion. Its length, and what might be called its epic tone, suggest that its authors believe they are bringing to an end a troublesome era in the history of our Nation and of our Court. “It is the dimension” of authority, they say, to “call the contending sides of national controversy to end their national division by accepting a common mandate rooted in the Constitution.”

There comes vividly to mind a portrait by Emanuel Leutze that hangs in the Harvard Law School: Roger Brooke Taney, painted in 1859, the 82d year of his life, the 24th of his Chief Justiceship, the second after his opinion in Dred Scott. He is all in black, sitting in a shadowed red armchair, left hand resting upon a pad of paper in his lap, right hand hanging limply, almost lifelessly, beside the inner arm of the chair. He sits facing the viewer, and staring straight out. There seems to be on his face, and in his deep-set eyes, an expression of profound sadness and disillusionment. Perhaps he always looked that way, even when dwelling upon the happiest of thoughts. But those of us who know how the lustre of his great Chief Justiceship came to be eclipsed by Dred Scott cannot help believing that he had that case—its already apparent consequences for the Court, and its soon-to-be-played-out consequences for the Nation—burning on his mind. I expect that two years earlier he, too, had thought himself “calling the contending sides of national controversy to end their national division by accepting a common mandate rooted in the Constitution.”

It is no more realistic for us in this case, than it was for him in that, to think that an issue of the sort they both involved—an issue involving life and death, freedom and subjugation—can be “speedily and finally settled” by the Supreme Court, as President James Buchanan in his inaugural address said the issue of slavery in the territories would be. Quite to the contrary, by foreclosing all democratic outlet for the deep passions this issue arouses, by banishing the issue from the political forum that gives all participants, even the losers, the satisfaction of a fair hearing and an honest fight, by continuing the imposition of a rigid national rule instead of allowing for regional differences, the Court merely prolongs and intensifies the anguish.

We should get out of this area, where we have no right to be, and where we do neither ourselves nor the country any good by remaining.

Note: Casey and the Role of the Court

1. Politics and judicial independence. Casey raises a number of important issues about stare decisis, liberty, equality, and the role of the Court in general. Note first that five of the justices on the Casey Court were appointed by Presidents Reagan and Bush, both sharp critics of Roe. Does the decision contain lessons about the power of the President to remake the Court? Does it suggest that law does indeed operate in a way that is independent of politics?

2. Roe and the democratic process. Is it appropriate for the Court to “[call] the contending sides of a national controversy to end their national division by accepting a common mandate rooted in the Constitution”? Is such a call likely to succeed? Might social fragmentation have been produced, not alleviated, by Roe and Casey? If so, is the price worth paying?

Gonzales v. Carhart

550 U.S. 124 (2007)

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases require us to consider the validity of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 (Act), a federal statute regulating abortion procedures. In recitations preceding its operative provisions, the Act refers to the Court's opinion in Stenberg v. Carhart [530 U.S. 914 (2000)] which also addressed the subject of abortion procedures used in the later stages of pregnancy.

[In Stenberg, the Court, in a five-to-four decision written by Justice Breyer, invalidated a Nebraska statute banning "partial birth abortion," which it defined as "an abortion procedure in which the person performing the abortion partially delivers vaginally a living unborn child before killing the unborn child and completing the delivery." The Court invalidated the statute on two separate grounds: that it contained no exception for the preservation of the health of the mother, as required by Casey; and that it imposed an undue burden on the abortion right. The second holding was premised on a finding that the statutory language covered not only the unusual "intact dilation and extraction" procedure, but also "standard dilation and extraction," which is the most commonly used procedure for abortions performed during the second trimester of pregnancy.]

Compared to the state statute at issue in Stenberg, the Act is more specific concerning the instances to which it applies and, in this respect, more precise in its coverage. We conclude the Act should be sustained against the objections lodged by the broad, facial attack brought against it....

The Act proscribes a particular manner of ending fetal life, so it is necessary here, as it was in Stenberg, to discuss abortion procedures in some detail.

Three United States District Courts heard extensive evidence describing the procedures....

[Between] 85 and 90 percent of the approximately 1.3 million abortions performed each year in the United States take place in the first three months of pregnancy, which is to say in the first trimester. The most common first trimester abortion method is vacuum aspiration (otherwise known as suction curettage) in which the physician vacuums out the embryonic tissue. Early in this trimester an alternative is to use medication, such as mifepristone (commonly known as RU-486), to terminate the pregnancy. The Act does not regulate these procedures.

Of the remaining abortions that take place each year, most occur in the second trimester. The surgical procedure referred to as "dilation and evacuation" or "D & E" is the usual abortion method in this trimester. Although individual techniques for performing D & E differ, the general steps are the same.

A doctor must first dilate the cervix at least to the extent needed to insert surgical instruments into the uterus and to maneuver them to evacuate the fetus.

...

After sufficient dilation the surgical operation can commence. The woman is placed under general anesthesia or conscious sedation. The doctor, often guided by ultrasound, inserts grasping forceps through the woman's cervix and into the uterus to grab the fetus. The doctor grips a fetal part with the forceps and pulls it back through the cervix and vagina, continuing to pull even after meeting resistance from the cervix. The friction causes the fetus to tear apart. For example, a leg might be ripped off the fetus as it is pulled through the cervix and out of the woman. The process of evacuating the fetus piece by piece continues until it has been completely removed. A doctor may make 10 to 15 passes with the forceps to evacuate the fetus in its entirety, though sometimes removal is completed with fewer passes. Once the fetus has been evacuated, the placenta and any remaining fetal material are suctioned or scraped out of the uterus. The doctor examines the different parts to ensure the entire fetal body has been removed....

The abortion procedure that was the impetus for the numerous bans on "partial-birth abortion," including the Act, is a variation of this standard D & E. [For] discussion purposes this D & E variation will be referred to as intact D & E. The main difference between the two procedures is that in intact D & E, a doctor extracts the fetus intact or largely intact with only a few passes. There are no comprehensive statistics indicating what percentage of all D & Es are performed in this manner....

In an intact D & E procedure, the doctor extracts the fetus in a way conducive to pulling out its entire body, instead of ripping it apart. One doctor, for example, testified:

"If I know I have good dilation and I reach in and the fetus starts to come out and I think I can accomplish it, the abortion with an intact delivery, then I use my forceps a little bit differently. I don't close them quite so much, and I just gently draw the tissue out attempting to have an intact delivery, if possible."

Rotating the fetus as it is being pulled decreases the odds of dismemberment. A doctor also "may use forceps to grasp a fetal part, pull it down, and re-grasp the fetus at a higher level—'sometimes using both his hand and a forceps'—to exert traction to retrieve the fetus intact until the head is lodged in the [cervix]."

Intact D & E gained public notoriety when, in 1992, Dr. Martin Haskell gave a presentation describing his method of performing the operation. In the usual intact D & E the fetus' head lodges in the cervix, and dilation is insufficient to allow it to pass. Haskell explained the next step as follows:

“At this point, the right-handed surgeon slides the fingers of the left [hand] along the back of the fetus and hooks the shoulders of the fetus with the index and ring fingers (palm down).

“While maintaining this tension, lifting the cervix and applying traction to the shoulders with the fingers of the left hand, the surgeon takes a pair of blunt curved Metzenbaum scissors in the right hand. He carefully advances the tip, curved down, along the spine and under his middle finger until he feels it contact the base of the skull under the tip of his middle finger.

“[T]he surgeon then forces the scissors into the base of the skull or into the foramen magnum. Having safely entered the skull, he spreads the scissors to enlarge the opening.

“The surgeon removes the scissors and introduces a suction catheter into this hole and evacuates the skull contents. With the catheter still in place, he applies traction to the fetus, removing it completely from the patient.”

This is an abortion doctor’s clinical description. Here is another description from a nurse who witnessed the same method performed on a 261/2-week fetus and testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee:

“Dr. Haskell went in with forceps and grabbed the baby’s legs and pulled them down into the birth canal. Then he delivered the baby’s body and the arms —everything but the head. The doctor kept the head right inside the uterus....

“The baby’s little fingers were clasping and unclasping, and his little feet were kicking. Then the doctor stuck the scissors in the back of his head, and the baby’s arms jerked out, like a startle reaction, like a flinch, like a baby does when he thinks he is going to fall.

“The doctor opened up the scissors, stuck a high-powered suction tube into the opening, and sucked the baby’s brains out. Now the baby went completely limp....

“He cut the umbilical cord and delivered the placenta. He threw the baby in a pan, along with the placenta and the instruments he had just used.”

Dr. Haskell’s approach is not the only method of killing the fetus once its head lodges in the cervix, and “the process has evolved” since his presentation.

Another doctor, for example, squeezes the skull after it has been pierced “so that enough brain tissue exudes to allow the head to pass through.” Still other physicians reach into the cervix with their forceps and crush the fetus’ skull.

Others continue to pull the fetus out of the woman until it disarticulates at the neck, in effect decapitating it. These doctors then grasp the head with forceps, crush it, and remove it.

Some doctors performing an intact D & E attempt to remove the fetus without collapsing the skull. Yet one doctor would not allow delivery of a live fetus younger than 24 weeks because “the objective of [his] procedure is to perform an abortion,” not a birth. The doctor thus answered in the affirmative when asked whether he would “hold the fetus’ head on the internal side of the [cervix] in order to collapse the skull” and kill the fetus before it is born.

Another doctor testified he crushes a fetus’ skull not only to reduce its size but also to ensure the fetus is dead before it is removed. For the staff to have to deal with a fetus that has “some viability to it, some movement of limbs,” according to this doctor, “[is] always a difficult situation.”...

In 2003, after this Court’s decision in Stenberg, Congress passed the Act at issue here....

The Act responded to Stenberg in two ways. First, Congress made factual findings. Congress determined that this Court in Stenberg “was required to accept the very questionable findings issued by the district court judge,” but that Congress was “not bound to accept the same factual findings.” Congress found, among other things, that “[a] moral, medical, and ethical consensus exists that the practice of performing a partial-birth abortion...is a gruesome and inhumane procedure that is never medically necessary and should be prohibited.”

Second, and more relevant here, the Act’s language differs from that of the Nebraska statute struck down in Stenberg....

[The act criminalizes the performance of a “partial-birth abortion” except when such an abortion is necessary to save the life of the mother. It defines partial birth abortion as an abortion in which the person performing the abortion—

(A) deliberately and intentionally vaginally delivers a living fetus until, in the case of a head-first presentation, the entire fetal head is outside the body of the mother, or, in the case of breech presentation, any part of the fetal trunk past the navel is outside the body of the mother, for the purpose of performing an overt act that the person knows will kill the partially delivered living fetus; and

(B) performs the overt act, other than completion of delivery, that kills the partially delivered living fetus.

The act provides that a defendant accused of this offense may seek a hearing before a State medical board on whether the abortion was necessary to save the life of the mother and that the board’s findings on that issue are admissible at the trial of the defendant. It further provides that a woman on whom a partial-birth abortion is performed may not be prosecuted under the act.]

II

The principles set forth in the joint opinion in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey did not find support from all those who join the instant opinion. Whatever one's views concerning the Casey joint opinion, it is evident a premise central to its conclusion—that the government has a legitimate and substantial interest in preserving and promoting fetal life—would be repudiated were the Court now to affirm the judgments of the Courts of Appeals [which had invalidated the act]....

We assume the following principles for the purposes of this opinion. Before viability, a State “may not prohibit any woman from making the ultimate decision to terminate her pregnancy.” [Casey, plurality opinion.] It also may not impose upon this right an undue burden, which exists if a regulation’s “purpose or effect is to place a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion before the fetus attains viability.” On the other hand, “[r]egulations which do no more than create a structural mechanism by which the State, or the parent or guardian of a minor, may express profound respect for the life of the unborn are permitted, if they are not a substantial obstacle to the woman’s exercise of the right to choose.” Casey, in short, struck a balance. The balance was central to its holding. We now apply its standard to the cases at bar.

III...

We conclude that the Act is not void for vagueness, does not impose an undue burden from any overbreadth, and is not invalid on its face.

The Act punishes “knowingly perform[ing]” a “partial-birth abortion.”...

First, the person performing the abortion must “vaginally deliver[r] a living fetus.” The Act does not restrict an abortion procedure involving the delivery of an expired fetus. The Act, furthermore, is inapplicable to abortions that do not involve vaginal delivery (for instance, hysterotomy or hysterectomy). The Act does apply both previability and postviability because, by common understanding and scientific terminology, a fetus is a living organism while within the womb, whether or not it is viable outside the womb....

Second, the Act’s definition of partial-birth abortion requires the fetus to be delivered “until, in the case of a head-first presentation, the entire fetal head is outside the body of the mother, or, in the case of breech presentation, any part of the fetal trunk past the navel is outside the body of the mother.” The Attorney General concedes, and we agree, that if an abortion procedure does not involve the delivery of a living fetus to one of these “anatomical ‘landmarks’”—where, depending on the presentation, either the fetal head or the fetal trunk past the navel is outside the body of the mother—the prohibitions of the Act do not apply.

Third, to fall within the Act, a doctor must perform an “overt act, other than completion of delivery, that kills the partially delivered living fetus.” For purposes of criminal liability, the overt act causing the fetus’ death must be separate from delivery, and the overt act must occur after the delivery to an anatomical landmark. This is because the Act proscribes killing “the partially delivered” fetus, which, when read in context, refers to a fetus that has been delivered to an anatomical landmark.

Fourth, the Act contains scienter requirements concerning all the actions involved in the prohibited abortion. To begin with, the physician must have “deliberately and intentionally” delivered the fetus to one of the Act’s anatomical landmarks. If a living fetus is delivered past the critical point by accident or inadvertence, the Act is inapplicable. In addition, the fetus must have been delivered “for the purpose of performing an overt act that the [doctor] knows will kill [it].” If either intent is absent, no crime has occurred. This follows from the general principle that where scienter is required no crime is committed absent the requisite state of mind.

[U]nlike the statutory language in Stenberg that prohibited the delivery of a “substantial portion” of the fetus—where a doctor might question how much of the fetus is a substantial portion—the Act defines the line between potentially criminal conduct on the one hand and lawful abortion on the other.

Doctors performing D & E will know that if they do not deliver a living fetus to an anatomical landmark they will not face criminal liability....

We next determine whether the Act imposes an undue burden, as a facial matter, because its restrictions on second-trimester abortions are too broad. A review of the statutory text discloses the limits of its reach. The Act prohibits intact D & E; and, notwithstanding respondents’ arguments, it does not prohibit the D & E procedure in which the fetus is removed in parts.

The Act prohibits a doctor from intentionally performing an intact D & E. The dual prohibitions of the Act, both of which are necessary for criminal liability, correspond with the steps generally undertaken during this type of procedure. First, a doctor delivers the fetus until its head lodges in the cervix, which is usually past the anatomical landmark for a breech presentation. Second, the doctor proceeds to pierce the fetal skull with scissors or crush it with forceps. This step satisfies the overt-act requirement because it kills the fetus and is distinct from delivery. The Act's intent requirements, however, limit its reach to those physicians who carry out the intact D & E after intending to undertake both steps at the outset.

The Act excludes most D & Es in which the fetus is removed in pieces, not intact. If the doctor intends to remove the fetus in parts from the outset, the doctor will not have the requisite intent to incur criminal liability....

The identification of specific anatomical landmarks to which the fetus must be partially delivered also differentiates the Act from the statute at issue in Stenberg. The Court in Stenberg interpreted ““substantial portion”” of the fetus to include an arm or a leg. The Act's anatomical landmarks, by contrast, clarify that the removal of a small portion of the fetus is not prohibited....

By adding an overt-act requirement Congress sought further to meet the Court's objections to the state statute considered in Stenberg....

The canon of constitutional avoidance, finally, extinguishes any lingering doubt as to whether the Act covers the prototypical D & E procedure....

IV

Under the principles accepted as controlling here, the Act, as we have interpreted it, would be unconstitutional “if its purpose or effect is to place a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion before the fetus attains viability.” Casey, 505 U.S., at 878 (plurality opinion). The abortions affected by the Act's regulations take place both previability and postviability; so the quoted language and the undue burden analysis it relies upon are applicable. The question is whether the Act, measured by its text in this facial attack, imposes a substantial obstacle to late-term, but previability, abortions. The Act does not on its face impose a substantial obstacle, and we reject this further facial challenge to its validity.

The Act's purposes are set forth in recitals preceding its operative provisions. A description of the prohibited abortion procedure demonstrates the rationale for the congressional enactment. The Act proscribes a method of abortion in which a fetus is killed just inches before completion of the birth process....

The Act expresses respect for the dignity of human life.

Congress was concerned, furthermore, with the effects on the medical community and on its reputation caused by the practice of partial-birth abortion.

...

Casey reaffirmed these governmental objectives. The government may use its voice and its regulatory authority to show its profound respect for the life within the woman....

Where it has a rational basis to act, and it does not impose an undue burden, the State may use its regulatory power to bar certain procedures and substitute others, all in furtherance of its legitimate interests in regulating the medical profession in order to promote respect for life, including life of the unborn.

The Act's ban on abortions that involve partial delivery of a living fetus furthers the Government's objectives. No one would dispute that, for many, D & E is a procedure itself laden with the power to devalue human life....

Respect for human life finds an ultimate expression in the bond of love the mother has for her child. The Act recognizes this reality as well. Whether to have an abortion requires a difficult and painful moral decision. While we find no reliable data to measure the phenomenon, it seems unexceptionable to conclude some women come to regret their choice to abort the infant life they once created and sustained. See Brief for Sandra Cano et al. as Amici Curiae in No. 05-380, pp. 22-24. Severe depression and loss of esteem can follow. See ibid.

In a decision so fraught with emotional consequence some doctors may prefer not to disclose precise details of the means that will be used, confining themselves to the required statement of risks the procedure entails. From one standpoint this ought not to be surprising. Any number of patients facing imminent surgical procedures would prefer not to hear all details, lest the usual anxiety preceding invasive medical procedures become the more intense. This is likely the case with the abortion procedures here in issue.

It is, however, precisely this lack of information concerning the way in which the fetus will be killed that is of legitimate concern to the State. The State has an interest in ensuring so grave a choice is well informed. It is self-evident that a mother who comes to regret her choice to abort must struggle with grief more anguished and sorrow more profound when she learns, only after the event, what she once did not know: that she allowed a doctor to pierce the skull and vacuum the fast-developing brain of her unborn child, a child assuming the human form.

It is a reasonable inference that a necessary effect of the regulation and the knowledge it conveys will be to encourage some women to carry the infant to full term, thus reducing the absolute number of late-term abortions. The medical profession, furthermore, may find different and less shocking methods to abort the fetus in the second trimester, thereby accommodating legislative demand. The State's interest in respect for life is advanced by the dialogue that better informs the political and legal systems, the medical profession, expectant mothers, and society as a whole of the consequences that follow from a decision to elect a late-term abortion.

It is objected that the standard D & E is in some respects as brutal, if not more, than the intact D & E, so that the legislation accomplishes little. What we have already said, however, shows ample justification for the regulation. Partial-birth abortion, as defined by the Act, differs from a standard D & E because the former occurs when the fetus is partially outside the mother to the point of one of the Act's anatomical landmarks. It was reasonable for Congress to think that partial-birth abortion, more than standard D & E, "undermines the public's perception of the appropriate role of a physician during the delivery process, and perverts a process during which life is brought into the world." There would be a flaw in this Court's logic, and an irony in its jurisprudence, were we first to conclude a ban on both D & E and intact D & E was overbroad and then to say it is irrational to ban only intact D & E because that does not proscribe both procedures....

The Act's furtherance of legitimate government interests bears upon, but does not resolve, the next question: whether the Act has the effect of imposing an unconstitutional burden on the abortion right because it does not allow use of the barred procedure where "necessary, in appropriate medical judgment, for [the] preservation of the...health of the mother." The prohibition in the Act would be unconstitutional, under precedents we here assume to be controlling, if it "subject[ed] [women] to significant health risks." In Ayotte [v. Planned Parenthood of Northern New England, 546 U.S. 320 (2006),] the parties agreed a health exception to the challenged parental-involvement statute was necessary "to avert serious and often irreversible damage to [a pregnant minor's] health."

Here, by contrast, whether the Act creates significant health risks for women has been a contested factual question. The evidence presented in the trial courts and before Congress demonstrates both sides have medical support for their position.

Respondents presented evidence that intact D & E may be the safest method of abortion, for reasons similar to those adduced in Stenberg. Abortion doctors testified, for example, that intact D & E decreases the risk of cervical laceration or uterine perforation because it requires fewer passes into the uterus with surgical instruments and does not require the removal of bony fragments of the dismembered fetus, fragments that may be sharp. Respondents also presented evidence that intact D & E was safer both because it reduces the risks that fetal parts will remain in the uterus and because it takes less time to complete. Respondents, in addition, proffered evidence that intact D & E was safer for women with certain medical conditions or women with fetuses that had certain anomalies.

These contentions were contradicted by other doctors who testified in the District Courts and before Congress. They concluded that the alleged health advantages were based on speculation without scientific studies to support them. They considered D & E always to be a safe alternative.

There is documented medical disagreement whether the Act's prohibition would ever impose significant health risks on women....

The question becomes whether the Act can stand when this medical uncertainty persists. The Court's precedents instruct that the Act can survive this facial attack. The Court has given state and federal legislatures wide discretion to pass legislation in areas where there is medical and scientific uncertainty.

This traditional rule is consistent with Casey, which confirms the State's interest in promoting respect for human life at all stages in the pregnancy. Physicians are not entitled to ignore regulations that direct them to use reasonable alternative procedures. The law need not give abortion doctors unfettered choice in the course of their medical practice, nor should it elevate their status above other physicians in the medical community....

Medical uncertainty does not foreclose the exercise of legislative power in the abortion context any more than it does in other contexts. The medical uncertainty over whether the Act's prohibition creates significant health risks provides a sufficient basis to conclude in this facial attack that the Act does not impose an undue burden....

In reaching the conclusion that the Act does not require a health exception, we reject certain arguments made by the parties on both sides of these cases. On the one hand, the Attorney General urges us to uphold the Act on the basis of the congressional findings alone. Although we review congressional fact-finding under a deferential standard, we do not in the circumstances here place dispositive weight on Congress' findings. The Court retains an independent constitutional duty to review factual findings where constitutional rights are at stake....

As respondents have noted, and the District Courts recognized, some recitations in the Act are factually incorrect. Whether or not accurate at the time, some of the important findings have been superseded. Two examples suffice. Congress determined no medical schools provide instruction on the prohibited procedure. Congressional Findings. The testimony in the District Courts, however, demonstrated intact D & E is taught at medical schools. Congress also found there existed a medical consensus that the prohibited procedure is never medically necessary. The evidence presented in the District Courts contradicts that conclusion. Uncritical deference to Congress' factual findings in these cases is inappropriate.

On the other hand, relying on the Court's opinion in Stenberg, respondents contend that an abortion regulation must contain a health exception "if 'substantial medical authority supports the proposition that banning a particular procedure could endanger women's health.'" As illustrated by respondents' arguments and the decisions of the Courts of Appeals, Stenberg has been interpreted to leave no margin of error for legislatures to act in the face of medical uncertainty.

A zero tolerance policy would strike down legitimate abortion regulations, like the present one, if some part of the medical community were disinclined to follow the proscription. This is too exacting a standard to impose on the legislative power, exercised in this instance under the Commerce Clause, to regulate the medical profession. Considerations of marginal safety, including the balance of risks, are within the legislative competence when the regulation is rational and in pursuit of legitimate ends....

The considerations we have discussed support our further determination that these facial attacks should not have been entertained in the first instance. In these circumstances the proper means to consider exceptions is by as-applied challenge....

This is the proper manner to protect the health of the woman if it can be shown that in discrete and well-defined instances a particular condition has occurred or is likely to occur in which the procedure prohibited by the Act must be used. In an as-applied challenge the nature of the medical risk can be better quantified and balanced than in a facial attack....

Respondents have not demonstrated that the Act, as a facial matter, is void for vagueness, or that it imposes an undue burden on a woman's right to abortion based on its overbreadth or lack of a health exception. For these reasons the judgments of the Courts of Appeals for the Eighth and Ninth Circuits are reversed.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE GINSBURG, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS, JUSTICE SOUTER, and JUSTICE BREYER join, dissenting....

Today's decision is alarming. It refuses to take Casey and Stenberg seriously. It tolerates, indeed applauds, federal intervention to ban nationwide a procedure found necessary and proper in certain cases by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists (ACOG). It blurs the line, firmly drawn in Casey, between previability and postviability abortions. And, for the first time since Roe, the Court blesses a prohibition with no exception safeguarding a woman's health.

I dissent from the Court's disposition. Retreating from prior rulings that abortion restrictions cannot be imposed absent an exception safeguarding a woman's health, the Court upholds an Act that surely would not survive under the close scrutiny that previously attended state-decreed limitations on a woman's reproductive choices.

In keeping with this comprehension of the right to reproductive choice, the Court has consistently required that laws regulating abortion, at any stage of pregnancy and in all cases, safeguard a woman's health....

In Stenberg, we expressly held that a statute banning intact D & E was unconstitutional in part because it lacked a health exception. We noted that there existed a "division of medical opinion" about the relative safety of intact D & E, but we made clear that as long as "substantial medical authority supports the proposition that banning a particular abortion procedure could endanger women's health," a health exception is required....

[The] congressional findings on which the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act rests do not withstand inspection, as the lower courts have determined and this Court is obliged to concede....

Congress claimed there was a medical consensus that the banned procedure is never necessary. But the evidence “very clearly demonstrate[d] the opposite.”...

c

In contrast to Congress, the District Courts made findings after full trials at which all parties had the opportunity to present their best evidence....

During the District Court trials, “numerous” “extraordinarily accomplished” and “very experienced” medical experts explained that, in certain circumstances and for certain women, intact D & E is safer than alternative procedures and necessary to protect women’s health....

According to the expert testimony plaintiffs introduced, the safety advantages of intact D & E are marked for women with certain medical conditions, for example, uterine scarring, bleeding disorders, heart disease, or compromised immune systems. Further, plaintiffs’ experts testified that intact D & E is significantly safer for women with certain pregnancy-related conditions, such as placenta previa and accreta, and for women carrying fetuses with certain abnormalities, such as severe hydrocephalus....

Based on thoroughgoing review of the trial evidence and the congressional record, each of the District Courts to consider the issue rejected Congress’ findings as unreasonable and not supported by the evidence....

The Court acknowledges some of this evidence, but insists that, because some witnesses disagreed with the ACOG and other experts’ assessment of risk, the Act can stand. In this insistence, the Court brushes under the rug the District Courts’ well-supported findings that the physicians who testified that intact D & E is never necessary to preserve the health of a woman had slim authority for their opinions. They had no training for, or personal experience with, the intact D & E procedure, and many performed abortions only on rare occasions....

The Court offers flimsy and transparent justifications for upholding a nationwide ban on intact D & E sans any exception to safeguard a women’s health. Today’s ruling, the Court declares, advances “a premise central to [Casey’s] conclusion”—i.e., the Government’s “legitimate and substantial interest in preserving and promoting fetal life.” But the Act scarcely furthers that interest: The law saves not a single fetus from destruction, for it targets only a method of performing abortion....

As another reason for upholding the ban, the Court emphasizes that the Act does not proscribe the nonintact D & E procedure. But why not, one might ask. Nonintact D & E could equally be characterized as “brutal,” involving as it does “tear[ing] [a fetus] apart” and “ripp[ing] off” its limbs....

Delivery of an intact, albeit nonviable, fetus warrants special condemnation, the Court maintains, because a fetus that is not dismembered resembles an infant. But so, too, does a fetus delivered intact after it is terminated by injection a day or two before the surgical evacuation, or a fetus delivered through medical induction or cesarean....

Ultimately, the Court admits that “moral concerns” are at work, concerns that could yield prohibitions on any abortion....

By allowing such concerns to carry the day and case, overriding fundamental rights, the Court dishonors our precedent. See, e.g., Casey, 505 U.S., at 850 (“Some of us as individuals find abortion offensive to our most basic principles of morality, but that cannot control our decision. Our obligation is to define the liberty of all, not to mandate our own moral code.”); Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 571 (2003) (Though “[f]or many persons [objections to homosexual conduct] are not trivial concerns but profound and deep convictions accepted as ethical and moral principles,” the power of the State may not be used “to enforce these views on the whole society through operation of the criminal law.”).

Revealing in this regard, the Court invokes an antiabortion shibboleth for which it concededly has no reliable evidence: Women who have abortions come to regret their choices, and consequently suffer from “[s]evere depression and loss of esteem.” Because of women’s fragile emotional state and because of the “bond of love the mother has for her child,” the Court worries, doctors may withhold information about the nature of the intact D & E procedure. The solution the Court approves, then, is not to require doctors to inform women, accurately and adequately, of the different procedures and their attendant risks. Instead, the Court deprives women of the right to make an autonomous choice, even at the expense of their safety.

This way of thinking reflects ancient notions about women’s place in the family and under the Constitution—ideas that have long since been discredited.

Though today’s majority may regard women’s feelings on the matter as “self-evident,” this Court has repeatedly confirmed that “[t]he destiny of the woman must be shaped...on her own conception of her spiritual imperatives and her place in society.”

In cases on a “woman’s liberty to determine whether to [continue] her pregnancy,” this Court has identified viability as a critical consideration. “[T]here is no line [more workable] than viability,” the Court explained in Casey, for viability is “the time at which there is a realistic possibility of maintaining and nourishing a life outside the womb, so that the independent existence of the second life can in reason and all fairness be the object of state protection that now overrides the rights of the woman....In some broad sense it might be said that a woman who fails to act before viability has consented to the State’s intervention on behalf of the developing child.”

Today, the Court blurs that line, maintaining that “[t]he Act [legitimately] appl[ies] both previability and postviability because...a fetus is a living organism while within the womb, whether or not it is viable outside the womb.” Instead of drawing the line at viability, the Court refers to Congress’ purpose to differentiate “abortion and infanticide” based not on whether a fetus can survive outside the womb, but on where a fetus is anatomically located when a particular medical procedure is performed....

The Court further confuses our jurisprudence when it declares that “facial attacks” are not permissible in “these circumstances,” i.e., where medical uncertainty exists. (“In an as-applied challenge the nature of the medical risk can be better quantified and balanced than in a facial attack.”). This holding is perplexing given that, in materially identical circumstances we held that a statute lacking a health exception was unconstitutional on its face....

Though today’s opinion does not go so far as to discard Roe or Casey, the Court, differently composed than it was when we last considered a restrictive abortion regulation, is hardly faithful to our earlier invocations of “the rule of law” and the “principles of stare decisis.” [Between Stenberg and Gonzales, Chief Justice Rehnquist was replaced by Chief Justice Roberts, and Justice O’Connor was replaced by Justice Alito.]...

In sum, the notion that the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act furthers any legitimate governmental interest is, quite simply, irrational. The Court's defense of the statute provides no saving explanation. In candor, the Act, and the Court's defense of it, cannot be understood as anything other than an effort to chip away at a right declared again and again by this Court—and with increasing comprehension of its centrality to women's lives....

Whole Woman's Health v. Hellerstedt

136 S. Ct. 2292 (2016)

JUSTICE BREYER delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Texas House Bill 2 requires physicians performing abortions to “have active admitting privileges at a hospital that...is located not further than 30 miles from the location at which the abortion is performed” and to meet “the minimum standards...for ambulatory surgical centers.” (ASC). These standards include detailed specifications concerning the nursing staff, building dimensions, and other building requirements. For example, the standards included a requirement for “a full surgical suite” with detailed specifications about the operating room and the recovery room, requirements for specific corridor widths and requirements for advanced heating, ventilation, and air conditioning systems.

[Petitioners, a group of abortion providers, filed suit in federal district court, claiming that House Bill 2 imposed an undue burden on the abortion right. After a four-day trial, the district court ruled in their favor and enjoined enforcement of the bill. Among other findings of fact, the district court determined that:

- the number of licensed abortion facilities in Texas dropped almost by half leading up to and in the wake of enforcement of the admitting-privileges requirement;
- if the surgical-center provision were allowed to take effect, the number of abortion facilities would be reduced to seven or eight for the entire state;
- all of these facilities would be in Houston, Austin, San Antonio, and the Dallas/Fort Worth area;
- these providers could not meet the demand of the entire state;
- if the requirements were allowed to go into effect, 2 million women of reproductive age would live more than 50 miles from an abortion provider, 1.3 million would live more than 100 miles from a provider, 900,000 would live more than 150 miles from a provider, and 750,000 would live more than 200 miles from a provider;
- abortion is much safer than many common medical procedures, such as colonoscopies, vasectomies, and plastic surgery, that are not covered by the regulations;

- risks are not appreciably lowered for patients undergoing abortions at ambulatory surgical centers.

[The court of appeals reversed the District Court and, with minor exceptions, found that the provisions were constitutional. It found that both the admitting privileges requirement and the surgical-center requirement were rationally related to the state interest in protecting the health and welfare of women seeking abortions and that the district court had erred by substituting its own judgment about these health effects for that of the legislature. Moreover, the court of appeals held, appellants had failed to show that the provisions imposed an undue burden on “a large fraction of women.”]

[The Supreme Court reversed the Court of Appeals and held that the Texas statute was facially unconstitutional.

[In an omitted section of the Court’s opinion, it rejected appellee’s argument that its claims were barred by res judicata. It then turned to the merits.]

III

UNDUE BURDEN—LEGAL STANDARD

The Court of Appeals’ articulation of the relevant standard is incorrect. The first part of the Court of Appeals’ test may be read to imply that a district court should not consider the existence or nonexistence of medical benefits when considering whether a regulation of abortion constitutes an undue burden. The rule announced in Casey, however, requires that courts consider the burdens a law imposes on abortion access together with the benefits those laws confer. And the second part of the test is wrong to equate the judicial review applicable to the regulation of a constitutionally protected personal liberty with the less strict review applicable where, for example, economic legislation is at issue....

The statement that legislatures, and not courts, must resolve questions of medical uncertainty is also inconsistent with this Court’s case law. Instead, the Court, when determining the constitutionality of laws regulating abortion procedures, has placed considerable weight upon evidence and argument presented in judicial proceedings....

Unlike in Gonzales, the relevant statute here does not set forth any legislative findings. Rather, one is left to infer that the legislature sought to further a constitutionally acceptable objective (namely, protecting women’s health). For a district court to give significant weight to evidence in the judicial record in these circumstances is consistent with this Court's case law....

UNDUE BURDEN—ADMITTING-PRIVILEGES REQUIREMENT...

The evidence upon which the [district] court based this conclusion included, among other things:

- A collection of at least five peer-reviewed studies on abortion complications in the first trimester, showing that the highest rate of major complications—including those complications requiring hospital admission—was less than one-quarter of 1%....
- Expert testimony to the effect that complications rarely require hospital admission, much less immediate transfer to a hospital from an outpatient clinic....

We add that, when directly asked at oral argument whether Texas knew of a single instance in which the new requirement would have helped even one woman obtain better treatment, Texas admitted that there was no evidence in the record of such a case....

At the same time, the record evidence indicates that the admitting-privileges requirement places a “substantial obstacle in the path of a woman’s choice.”...

In our view, the record contains sufficient evidence that the admitting-privileges requirement led to the closure of half of Texas’ clinics, or thereabouts.

Those closures meant fewer doctors, longer waiting times, and increased crowding. Record evidence also supports the finding that after the admitting-privileges provision went into effect, the “number of women of reproductive age living in a county...more than 150 miles from a provider increased from approximately 86,000 to 400,000.”...

[The] dissent suggests that one benefit of H. B. 2’s requirements would be that they might “force un-safe facilities to shut down.” To support that assertion, the dissent points to the Kermit Gosnell scandal. Gosnell, a physician in Pennsylvania, was convicted of first-degree murder and manslaughter. He “staffed his facility with unlicensed and indifferent workers, and then let them practice medicine unsupervised” and had “[d]irty facilities; unsanitary instruments; an absence of functioning monitoring and resuscitation equipment; the use of cheap, but dangerous, drugs; illegal procedures; and inadequate emergency access for when things inevitably went wrong.” Gosnell’s behavior was terribly wrong. But there is no reason to believe that an extra layer of regulation would have affected that behavior. Determined wrongdoers, already ignoring existing statutes and safety measures, are unlikely to be convinced to adopt safe practices by a new overlay of regulations. Regardless, Gosnell’s deplorable crimes could escape detection only because his facility went uninspected for more than 15 years. Pre-existing Texas law already contained numerous detailed regulations covering abortion facilities, including a requirement that facilities be inspected at least annually. The record contains nothing to suggest that H. B. 2 would be more effective than pre-existing Texas law at deterring wrongdoers like Gosnell from criminal behavior.

UNDUE BURDEN—SURGICAL-CENTER REQUIREMENT...

There is considerable evidence in the record supporting the District Court’s findings indicating that the statutory provision requiring all abortion facilities to meet all surgical-center standards does not benefit patients and is not necessary. The District Court found that “risks are not appreciably lowered for patients who undergo abortions at ambulatory surgical centers as compared to nonsurgical-center facilities.” The court added that women “will not obtain better care or experience more frequent positive outcomes at an ambulatory surgical center as compared to a previously licensed facility.” And these findings are well supported.

The record makes clear that the surgical-center requirement provides no benefit when complications arise in the context of an abortion produced through medication. That is because, in such a case, complications would almost always arise only after the patient has left the facility. The record also contains evidence indicating that abortions taking place in an abortion facility are safe—indeed, safer than numerous procedures that take place outside hospitals and to which Texas does not apply its surgical-center requirements. [Nationwide], childbirth is 14 times more likely than abortion to result in death, but Texas law allows a midwife to oversee childbirth in the patient’s own home. [Medical] treatment after an incomplete miscarriage often involves a procedure identical to that involved in a nonmedical abortion, but it often takes place outside a hospital or surgical center. And Texas partly or wholly grandfathered (or waives in whole or in part the surgical-center requirement for) about two-thirds of the facilities to which the surgical-center standards apply. But it neither grandfathers nor provides waivers for any of the facilities that perform abortions....

[In] the face of no threat to women's health, Texas seeks to force women to travel long distances to get abortions in crammed-to-capacity superfacilities. [Another] commonsense inference that the District Court made is that these effects would be harmful to, not supportive of, women's health....

Finally, the District Court found that the costs that a currently licensed abortion facility would have to incur to meet the surgical-center requirements were considerable, ranging from $1 million per facility (for facilities with adequate space) to $3 million per facility (where additional land must be purchased). This evidence supports the conclusion that more surgical centers will not soon fill the gap when licensed facilities are forced to close....

VI...

[Texas] claims that the provisions at issue here do not impose a substantial obstacle because the women affected by those laws are not a "large fraction" of Texan women "of reproductive age," which Texas reads Casey to have required. But Casey used the language "large fraction" to refer to "a large fraction of cases in which [the provision at issue] is relevant," a class narrower than "all women," "pregnant women," or even "the class of women seeking abortions identified by the State." Here, as in Casey, the relevant denominator is "those [women] for whom [the provision] is an actual rather than an irrelevant restriction."...

JUSTICE GINSBURG, concurring....

When a State severely limits access to safe and legal procedures, women in desperate circumstances may resort to unlicensed rogue practitioners, faute de mieux, at great risk to their health and safety. Targeted Regulation of Abortion Providers laws like H. B. 2 that "do little or nothing for health, but rather strew impediments to abortion," cannot survive judicial inspection.

JUSTICE THOMAS, dissenting....

I

[In this section of his opinion, Justice Thomas criticizes the Court for granting third-party standing to abortion providers whose own constitutional rights are not invaded by the statute.]

II...

I remain fundamentally opposed to the Court’s abortion jurisprudence. Even taking Casey as the baseline, however, the majority radically rewrites the undue-burden test in three ways. First, today’s decision requires courts to “consider the burdens a law imposes on abortion access together with the benefits those laws confer.” Second, today’s opinion tells the courts that, when the law’s justifications are medically uncertain, they need not defer to the legislature, and must instead assess medical justifications for abortion restrictions by scrutinizing the record themselves. Finally, even if a law imposes no “substantial obstacle” to women’s access to abortions, the law now must have more than a “reasonabl[e] relat[ion] to...a legitimate state interest.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) These precepts are nowhere to be found in Casey or its successors, and transform the undue-burden test to something much more akin to strict scrutiny....

III

The majority’s furtive reconfiguration of the standard of scrutiny applicable to abortion restrictions also points to a deeper problem. The undue-burden standard is just one variant of the Court’s tiers-of-scrutiny approach to constitutional adjudication. And the label the Court affixes to its level of scrutiny in assessing whether the government can restrict a given right—be it “rational basis,” intermediate, strict, or something else—is increasingly a meaningless formalism. As the Court applies whatever standard it likes to any given case, nothing but empty words separates our constitutional decisions from judicial fiat....

[If] our recent cases illustrate anything, it is how easily the Court tinkers with levels of scrutiny to achieve its desired result. This Term, it is easier for a State to survive strict scrutiny despite discriminating on the basis of race in college admissions than it is for the same State to regulate how abortion doctors and clinics operate under the putatively less stringent undue-burden test. [Justice Thomas cites Fisher v. University of Tex. at Austin, discussed in Chapter 5, section C.] Yet the same State gets no deference under the undue-burden test, despite producing evidence that abortion safety, one rationale for Texas’ law, is medically debated.

These more recent decisions reflect the Court’s tendency to relax purportedly higher standards of review for less-preferred rights....

The Court should abandon the pretense that anything other than policy preferences underlies its balancing of constitutional rights and interests in any given case.

IV

It is tempting to identify the Court’s invention of a constitutional right to abortion in Roe v. Wade as the tipping point that transformed third-party standing doctrine and the tiers of scrutiny into an unworkable morass of special exceptions and arbitrary applications. But those roots run deeper, to the very notion that some constitutional rights demand preferential treatment. During the Lochner era, the Court considered the right to contract and other economic liberties to be fundamental requirements of due process of law. The Court in 1937 repudiated Lochner’s foundations. But the Court then created a new taxonomy of preferred rights.

In 1938, seven Justices heard a constitutional challenge to a federal ban on shipping adulterated milk in interstate commerce. Without economic substantive due process, the ban clearly invaded no constitutional right. See United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 152-153 (1938). Within Justice Stone’s opinion for the Court, however, was a footnote that just three other Justices joined—the famous Carolene Products Footnote 4....

Though the footnote was pure dicta, the Court seized upon it to justify its special treatment of certain personal liberties like the First Amendment and the right against discrimination on the basis of race—but also rights not enumerated in the Constitution. As the Court identified which rights deserved special protection, it developed the tiers of scrutiny as part of its equal protection (and, later, due process) jurisprudence as a way to demand extra justifications for encroachments on these rights. And, having created a new category of fundamental rights, the Court loosened the reins to recognize even putative rights like abortion, which hardly implicate “discrete and insular minorities.”...

Eighty years on, the Court has come full circle. The Court has simultaneously transformed judicially created rights like the right to abortion into preferred constitutional rights, while disfavoring many of the rights actually enumerated in the Constitution. But our Constitution renounces the notion that some constitutional rights are more equal than others. A plaintiff either possesses the constitutional right he is asserting, or not—and if not, the judiciary has no business creating ad hoc exceptions so that others can assert rights that seem especially important to vindicate. A law either infringes a constitutional right, or not; there is no room for the judiciary to invent tolerable degrees of encroachment. Unless the Court abides by one set of rules to adjudicate constitutional rights, it will continue reducing constitutional law to policy-driven value judgments until the last shreds of its legitimacy disappear.

Today's decision will prompt some to claim victory, just as it will stiffen opponents' will to object. But the entire Nation has lost something essential. The majority's embrace of a jurisprudence of rights-specific exceptions and balancing tests is "a regrettable concession of defeat—an acknowledgement that we have passed the point where 'law,' properly speaking, has any further application." Scalia, The Rule of Law as a Law of Rules, 56 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1175, 1189 (1989). I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE ALITO, with whom [CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS] and JUSTICE THOMAS join, dissenting.

I

[In this section, and in section II of his opinion, Justice Alito argues that res judicata bars petitioners' claim.]

III...

Under our cases, petitioners must show that the admitting privileges and ASC requirements impose an "undue burden" on women seeking abortions. And in order to obtain the sweeping relief they seek—facial invalidation of those provisions—they must show, at a minimum, that these provisions have an unconstitutional impact on at least a "large fraction" of Texas women of reproductive age. Such a situation could result if the clinics able to comply with the new requirements either lacked the requisite overall capacity or were located too far away to serve a "large fraction" of the women in question.

Petitioners did not make that showing. Instead of offering direct evidence, they relied on two crude inferences. First, they pointed to the number of abortion clinics that closed after the enactment of H. B. 2, and asked that it be inferred that all these closures resulted from the two challenged provisions. They made little effort to show why particular clinics closed. Second, they pointed to the number of abortions performed annually at ASCs before H. B. 2 took effect and, because this figure is well below the total number of abortions performed each year in the State, they asked that it be inferred that ASC-compliant clinics could not meet the demands of women in the State. See App. 237-238. Petitioners failed to provide any evidence of the actual capacity of the facilities that would be available to perform abortions in compliance with the new law....

I do not dispute the fact that H. B. 2 caused the closure of some clinics. Indeed, it seems clear that H. B. 2 was intended to force unsafe facilities to shut down. The law was one of many enacted by States in the wake of the Kermit Gosnell scandal, in which a physician who ran an abortion clinic in Philadelphia was convicted for the first-degree murder of three infants who were born alive and for the manslaughter of a patient. Gosnell had not been actively supervised by state or local authorities or by his peers, and the Philadelphia grand jury that investigated the case recommended that the Commonwealth adopt a law requiring abortion clinics to comply with the same regulations as ASCs. If Pennsylvania had had such a requirement in force, the Gosnell facility may have been shut down before his crimes. And if there were any similarly un-safe facilities in Texas, H. B. 2 was clearly intended to put them out of business.

While there can be no doubt that H. B. 2 caused some clinics to cease operation, the absence of proof regarding the reasons for particular closures is a [problem]. [Justice Alito outlines other reasons why some clinics might have closed.]

Even if the District Court had properly filtered out immaterial closures, its analysis would have been incomplete for a second reason. Petitioners offered scant evidence on the capacity of the clinics that are able to comply with the admitting privileges and ASC requirements, or on those clinics' geographic distribution. Reviewing the evidence in the record, it is far from clear that there has been a material impact on access to abortion....

Faced with increased demand, ASCs could potentially increase the number of abortions performed without prohibitively expensive changes....

So much for capacity. The other potential obstacle to abortion access is the distribution of facilities throughout the State. This might occur if the two challenged H. B. 2 requirements, by causing the closure of clinics in some rural areas, led to a situation in which a "large fraction" of women of reproductive age live too far away from any open clinic. Based on the Court's holding in [Casey] it appears that the need to travel up to 150 miles is not an undue burden, and the evidence in this case shows that if the only clinics in the State were those that would have remained open if the judgment of the Fifth Circuit had not been enjoined, roughly 95% of the women of reproductive age in the State would live within 150 miles of an open facility (or lived outside that range before H. B. 2). Because the record does not show why particular facilities closed, the real figure may be even higher than 95%.

We should decline to hold that these statistics justify the facial invalidation of the H. B. 2 requirements. The possibility that the admitting privileges requirement might have caused a closure in Lubbock is no reason to issue a facial injunction exempting Houston clinics from that requirement. I do not dismiss the situation of those women who would no longer live within 150 miles of a clinic as a result of H. B. 2. But under current doctrine such localized problems can be addressed by narrow as-applied challenges....

Note: The Future of Abortion Rights

1. Gonzales and the government's interest. Does the Court identify a legitimate government interest advanced by the Partial Birth Abortion Act? How does the Act “[express] respect for the dignity of human life” when it regulates only the method by which abortions are performed, not whether they are performed? Is it legitimate for the government to ban an abortion procedure because of speculation that “some women come to regret their choice to abort the infant life they once created and sustained”?

2. Gonzales and undue burden. In her dissenting opinion, Justice Ginsburg claims that “[the] law saves not a single fetus from destruction.” If she is correct, how can it be that the statute unduly burdens the abortion right? Notice that the Court leaves open the possibility that individual women can challenge the statute as applied to them on the ground that a standard D & E would risk their health. Is this holding meaningfully different from reading a health exception into the statute? If the statute had had such an exception, would there be any question as to its constitutionality?

3. Hellerstedt and the government's interest. Under Casey an abortion statute is unconstitutional if it has the “purpose or effect” of placing a “substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion.” In Hellerstedt, the Court assumes that the statute’s purpose was constitutional but invalidates the statute because of its effect. The focus on effect, in turn, leads to a detailed analysis of the reasons why abortion clinics closed and the medical necessity for various regulatory procedures. Might this analysis have been avoided if the Court were more skeptical of the legislature’s purpose? If one took seriously the claim that the legislature was in fact concerned about women’s health, would the Court’s careful scrutiny of the factual bases for the legislative decision be appropriate?

4. Hellerstedt and Undue Burden. The Court seems to acknowledge that an abortion regulation poses an undue burden only if it affects a “large fraction” of women seeking abortions. Is this test consistent with the status of abortion as an individual right? Perhaps it is, because the Court also claims that the denominator of the fraction is “those [women] for whom [the provision] is an actual rather than an irrelevant restriction.” Doesn’t this make the denominator the same as the numerator? If a single woman is unable to get an abortion because of a general regulatory scheme, does the scheme pose an undue burden?

5. The law and politics of abortion. Who are the long-term winners and losers in Gonzales and Hellerstedt? Consider the following possibilities:

a. Despite outward appearances, Gonzales aids the defenders of Roe. The decision itself has very little impact on the availability of abortions. It does, however, change the political dynamics of the abortion debate. On the one hand, it eliminates the most emotionally charged and problematic form of abortion, the existence of which was used effectively to mobilize “pro-life” forces. On the other hand, the decision produces anxiety among “pro-choice” forces that the basic abortion right is at risk, thereby promoting political mobilization on their side.

b. Despite outward appearances, Hellerstedt aids opponents of Roe. Instead of recognizing that most abortion regulation is impermissibly motivated by a desire to restrict the right, the Court has gotten itself bogged down in a fact-intensive analysis of the minutiae of abortion regulation. This approach leaves it unable to effectively control persistent local efforts to make abortion practically unattainable.

c. Both Gonzales and Hellerstedt are all about symbolism and will have very little real impact of any kind. The long-term future of the abortion right will be determined by cultural, political, economic, and technological developments rather than by constitutional doctrine.

3. Same-Sex Intimacy

In Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), the Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision written by Justice White, refused to invalidate a statute prohibiting sodomy, defined as “any sexual act involving the sex organs of one person and the mouth or anus of another” as applied to two adult males who had sex in a private bedroom. The Court argued that “no connection between family, marriage, or procreation on the one hand and homosexual activity on the other has been demonstrated” and that “to claim that a right to engage in such conduct is ‘deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition’ or ‘implicit on the concept of ordered liberty’ is, at best, facetious.” In response to the argument that objections to the immorality of homosexual conduct do not provide a rational basis for the law, the Court noted that “[the] law [is] constantly based on notions of morality, and if all laws representing essentially moral choices are to be invalidated under the Due Process Clause, the courts will be very busy indeed.”

In a concurring opinion, Chief Justice Burger wrote that “to hold that the act of homosexual sodomy is somehow protected as a fundamental right would be to cast aside millennia of moral teaching.”

Less than two decades later, the Court came to a very different conclusion.

Lawrence v. Texas

539 U.S. 558 (2003)

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

Liberty protects the person from unwarranted government intrusions into a dwelling or other private places. In our tradition the State is not omnipresent in the home. And there are other spheres of our lives and existence, outside the home, where the State should not be a dominant presence. Freedom extends beyond spatial bounds. Liberty presumes an autonomy of self that includes freedom of thought, belief, expression, and certain intimate conduct. The instant case involves liberty of the person both in its spatial and more transcendent dimensions.

I

The question before the Court is the validity of a Texas statute making it a crime for two persons of the same sex to engage in certain intimate sexual conduct.

In Houston, Texas, officers of the Harris County Police Department were dispatched to a private residence in response to a reported weapons disturbance. They entered an apartment where one of the petitioners, John Geddes Lawrence, resided. The right of the police to enter does not seem to have been questioned. The officers observed Lawrence and another man, Tyron Garner, engaging in a sexual act. The two petitioners were arrested, held in custody overnight, and charged and convicted before a Justice of the Peace.

[Lawrence was charged under a statute that provides:] “A person commits an offense if he engages in deviate sexual intercourse with another individual of the same sex.” The statute defines “[d]eviate sexual intercourse” as follows:

“(A) any contact between any part of the genitals of one person and the mouth or anus of another person; or

“(B) the penetration of the genitals or the anus of another person with an object.” §21.01(1)....

II

We conclude the case should be resolved by determining whether the petitioners were free as adults to engage in the private conduct in the exercise of their liberty under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. For this inquiry we deem it necessary to reconsider the Court's holding in Bowers....

The Court began its substantive discussion in Bowers as follows: "The issue presented is whether the Federal Constitution confers a fundamental right upon homosexuals to engage in sodomy and hence invalidates the laws of the many States that still make such conduct illegal and have done so for a very long time." That statement, we now conclude, discloses the Court's own failure to appreciate the extent of the liberty at stake. To say that the issue in Bowers was simply the right to engage in certain sexual conduct demeans the claim the individual put forward, just as it would demean a married couple were it to be said marriage is simply about the right to have sexual intercourse. The laws involved in Bowers and here purport to do no more than prohibit a particular sexual act. Their penalties and purposes have more far-reaching consequences, touching upon the most private human conduct, sexual behavior, and in the most private of places, the home. They seek to control a personal relationship that, whether or not entitled to formal recognition in the law, is within the liberty of persons to choose without being punished as criminals. The liberty protected by the Constitution allows homosexual persons the right to choose to enter upon relationships in the confines of their homes and their own private lives and still retain their dignity as free persons....

This, as a general rule, should counsel against attempts by the State, or a court, to define the meaning of the relationship or to set its boundaries absent injury to a person or abuse of an institution the law protects. It suffices for us to acknowledge that adults may choose to enter upon this relationship in the confines of their homes and their own private lives and still retain their dignity as free persons. When sexuality finds overt expression in intimate conduct with another person, the conduct can be but one element in a personal bond that is more enduring. The liberty protected by the Constitution allows homosexual persons the right to make this choice.

Having misapprehended the claim of liberty there presented to it, and thus stating the claim to be whether there is a fundamental right to engage in consensual sodomy, the Bowers Court said: "Proscriptions against that conduct have ancient roots." In academic writings, and in many of the scholarly amicus briefs filed to assist the Court in this case, there are fundamental criticisms of [this statement]. We need not enter this debate in the attempt to reach a definitive historical judgment, but the following considerations counsel against adopting the definitive conclusions upon which Bowers placed such reliance.

At the outset it should be noted that there is no longstanding history in this country of laws directed at homosexual conduct as a distinct matter....

The absence of legal prohibitions focusing on homosexual conduct may be explained in part by noting that according to some scholars the concept of the homosexual as a distinct category of person did not emerge until the late 19th century. Thus early American sodomy laws were not directed at homosexuals as such but instead sought to prohibit nonprocreative sexual activity more generally. This does not suggest approval of homosexual conduct. It does tend to show that this particular form of conduct was not thought of as a separate category from like conduct between heterosexual persons.

Laws prohibiting sodomy do not seem to have been enforced against consenting adults acting in private...

In all events [the infrequency of prosecution] makes it difficult to say that society approved of a rigorous and systematic punishment of the consensual acts committed in private and by adults. The longstanding criminal prohibition of homosexual sodomy upon which the Bowers decision placed such reliance is as consistent with a general condemnation of nonprocreative sex as it is with an established tradition of prosecuting acts because of their homosexual character.

[Far] from possessing “ancient roots,” American laws targeting same-sex couples did not develop until the last third of the 20th century. The reported decisions concerning the prosecution of consensual, homosexual sodomy between adults for the years 1880–1995 are not always clear in the details, but a significant number involved conduct in a public place.

It was not until the 1970’s that any State singled out same-sex relations for criminal prosecution, and only nine States have done so. Post-Bowers even some of these States did not adhere to the policy of suppressing homosexual conduct. Over the course of the last decades, States with same-sex prohibitions have moved toward abolishing them.

In summary, the historical grounds relied upon in Bowers are more complex than the majority opinion and the concurring opinion by Chief Justice Burger indicate. Their historical premises are not without doubt and, at the very least, are overstated.

It must be acknowledged, of course, that the Court in Bowers was making the broader point that for centuries there have been powerful voices to condemn homosexual conduct as immoral. The condemnation has been shaped by religious beliefs, conceptions of right and acceptable behavior, and respect for the traditional family. For many persons these are not trivial concerns but profound and deep convictions accepted as ethical and moral principles to which they aspire and which thus determine the course of their lives. These considerations do not answer the question before us, however. The issue is whether the majority may use the power of the State to enforce these views on the whole society through operation of the criminal law....

[We] think that our laws and traditions in the past half century are of most relevance here. These references show an emerging awareness that liberty gives substantial protection to adult persons in deciding how to conduct their private lives in matters pertaining to sex....

This emerging recognition should have been apparent when Bowers was decided. In 1955 the American Law Institute promulgated the Model Penal Code and made clear that it did not recommend or provide for "criminal penalties for consensual sexual relations conducted in private." [In] 1961 Illinois changed its laws to conform to the Model Penal Code. Other States soon followed....

The sweeping references by Chief Justice Burger to the history of Western civilization and to Judeo-Christian moral and ethical standards did not take account of other authorities pointing in an opposite direction. A committee advising the British Parliament recommended in 1957 repeal of laws punishing homosexual conduct. The Wolfenden Report: Report of the Committee on Homosexual Offenses and Prostitution (1963). Parliament enacted the substance of those recommendations 10 years later. Sexual Offences Act 1967, §1.

Of even more importance, almost five years before Bowers was decided the European Court of Human Rights considered a case with parallels to Bowers and to today's case. [The] court held that the laws proscribing the conduct were invalid under the European Convention on Human Rights. Dudgeon v. United Kingdom, 45 Eur. Ct. H. R. (1981) 152. Authoritative in all countries that are members of the Council of Europe (21 nations then, 45 nations now), the decision is at odds with the premise in Bowers that the claim put forward was insubstantial in our Western civilization.

In our own constitutional system the deficiencies in Bowers became even more apparent in the years following its announcement. The 25 States with laws prohibiting the relevant conduct referenced in the Bowers decision are reduced now to 13, of which 4 enforce their laws only against homosexual conduct. In those States where sodomy is still proscribed, whether for same-sex or heterosexual conduct, there is a pattern of nonenforcement with respect to consenting adults acting in private. The State of Texas admitted in 1994 that as of that date it had not prosecuted anyone under those circumstances.

Two principal cases decided after Bowers cast its holding into even more doubt. In [Casey], the Court reaffirmed the substantive force of the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause. The Casey decision again confirmed that our laws and tradition afford constitutional protection to personal decisions relating to marriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships, child rearing, and education....

In explaining the respect the Constitution demands for the autonomy of the person in making these choices, we stated as follows:

“These matters, involving the most intimate and personal choices a person may make in a lifetime, choices central to personal dignity and autonomy, are central to the liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. At the heart of liberty is the right to define one’s own concept of existence, of meaning, of the universe, and of the mystery of human life. Beliefs about these matters could not define the attributes of personhood were they formed under compulsion of the State.”

Persons in a homosexual relationship may seek autonomy for these purposes, just as heterosexual persons do. The decision in Bowers would deny them this right.

The second post-Bowers case of principal relevance is [Romer v. Evans, discussed in Chapter 5, section B]. There the Court struck down class-based legislation directed at homosexuals as a violation of the Equal Protection Clause.

As an alternative argument in this case, counsel for the petitioners and some amici contend that Romer provides the basis for declaring the Texas statute invalid under the Equal Protection Clause. That is a tenable argument, but we conclude the instant case requires us to address whether Bowers itself has continuing validity. Were we to hold the statute invalid under the Equal Protection Clause some might question whether a prohibition would be valid if drawn differently, say, to prohibit the conduct both between same-sex and different-sex participants.

Equality of treatment and the due process right to demand respect for conduct protected by the substantive guarantee of liberty are linked in important respects, and a decision on the latter point advances both interests. If protected conduct is made criminal and the law which does so remains unexamined for its substantive validity, its stigma might remain even if it were not enforceable as drawn for equal protection reasons. When homosexual conduct is made criminal by the law of the State, that declaration in and of itself is an invitation to subject homosexual persons to discrimination both in the public and in the private spheres. The central holding of Bowers has been brought in question by this case, and it should be addressed. Its continuance as precedent demeans the lives of homosexual persons.

The stigma this criminal statute imposes, moreover, is not trivial. The offense, to be sure, is but a class C misdemeanor, a minor offense in the Texas legal system. Still, it remains a criminal offense with all that imports for the dignity of the persons charged. The petitioners will bear on their record the history of their criminal convictions....

We are advised that if Texas convicted an adult for private, consensual homosexual conduct under the statute here in question the convicted person would come within the registration laws of at least four States were he or she to be subject to their jurisdiction. This underscores the consequential nature of the punishment and the state-sponsored condemnation attendant to the criminal prohibition. Furthermore, the Texas criminal conviction carries with it the other collateral consequences always following a conviction, such as notations on job application forms, to mention but one example.

The foundations of Bowers have sustained serious erosion from our recent decisions in Casey and Romer. When our precedent has been thus weakened, criticism from other sources is of greater significance. In the United States criticism of Bowers has been substantial and continuing, disapproving of its reasoning in all respects, not just as to its historical assumptions. The courts of five different States have declined to follow it in interpreting provisions in their own state constitutions parallel to the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

To the extent Bowers relied on values we share with a wider civilization, it should be noted that the reasoning and holding in Bowers have been rejected elsewhere. The European Court of Human Rights has followed not Bowers but its own decision in Dudgeon v. United Kingdom. Other nations, too, have taken action consistent with an affirmation of the protected right of homosexual adults to engage in intimate, consensual conduct. The right the petitioners seek in this case has been accepted as an integral part of human freedom in many other countries. There has been no showing that in this country the governmental interest in circumscribing personal choice is somehow more legitimate or urgent.

The doctrine of stare decisis is essential to the respect accorded to the judgments of the Court and to the stability of the law. It is not, however, an inexorable command. In Casey we noted that when a Court is asked to overrule a precedent recognizing a constitutional liberty interest, individual or societal reliance on the existence of that liberty cautions with particular strength against reversing course. The holding in Bowers, however, has not induced detrimental reliance comparable to some instances where recognized individual rights are involved. Indeed, there has been no individual or societal reliance on Bowers of the sort that could counsel against overturning its holding once there are compelling reasons to do so. Bowers itself causes uncertainty, for the precedents before and after its issuance contradict its central holding.

[In] his dissenting opinion in Bowers Justice Stevens came to these conclusions:

Our prior cases make two propositions abundantly clear. First, the fact that the governing majority in a State has traditionally viewed a particular practice as immoral is not a sufficient reason for upholding a law prohibiting the practice; neither history nor tradition could save a law prohibiting miscegenation from constitutional attack. Second, individual decisions by married persons, concerning the intimacies of their physical relationship, even when not intended to produce offspring, are a form of “liberty” protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Moreover, this protection extends to intimate choices by unmarried as well as married persons.

Justice Stevens’ analysis, in our view, should have been controlling in Bowers and it should control here.

Bowers was not correct when it was decided, and it is not correct today. It ought not to remain binding precedent. Bowers v. Hardwick should be and now is overruled.

The present case does not involve minors. It does not involve persons who might be injured or coerced or who are situated in relationships where consent might not easily be refused. It does not involve public conduct or prostitution. It does not involve whether the government must give formal recognition to any relationship that homosexual persons seek to enter. The case does involve two adults who, with full and mutual consent from each other, engaged in sexual practices common to a homosexual lifestyle. The petitioners are entitled to respect for their private lives. The State cannot demean their existence or control their destiny by making their private sexual conduct a crime. Their right to liberty under the Due Process Clause gives them the full right to engage in their conduct without intervention of the government. The Texas statute furthers no legitimate state interest which can justify its intrusion into the personal and private life of the individual.

Had those who drew and ratified the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment known the components of liberty in its manifold possibilities, they might have been more specific. They did not presume to have this insight. They knew times can blind us to certain truths and later generations can see that laws once thought necessary and proper in fact serve only to oppress. As the Constitution endures, persons in every generation can invoke its principles in their own search for greater freedom....

JUSTICE O'CONNOR, concurring in the judgment.

[I] joined Bowers, and do not join the Court in overruling it. Nevertheless, I agree with the Court that Texas' statute banning same-sex sodomy is unconstitutional. Rather than relying on the substantive component of the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, as the Court does, I base my conclusion on the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause.

This case raises a different issue than Bowers: whether, under the Equal Protection Clause, moral disapproval is a legitimate state interest to justify by itself a statute that bans homosexual sodomy, but not heterosexual sodomy. It is not. Moral disapproval of this group, like a bare desire to harm the group, is an interest that is insufficient to satisfy rational basis review under the Equal Protection Clause. Indeed, we have never held that moral disapproval, without any other asserted state interest, is a sufficient rationale under the Equal Protection Clause to justify a law that discriminates among groups of persons....

Texas' invocation of moral disapproval as a legitimate state interest proves nothing more than Texas' desire to criminalize homosexual sodomy. But the Equal Protection Clause prevents a State from creating "a classification of persons undertaken for its own sake." And because Texas so rarely enforces its sodomy law as applied to private, consensual acts, the law serves more as a statement of dislike and disapproval against homosexuals than as a tool to stop criminal behavior....

A State can of course assign certain consequences to a violation of its criminal law. But the State cannot single out one identifiable class of citizens for punishment that does not apply to everyone else, with moral disapproval as the only asserted state interest for the law. The Texas sodomy statute subjects homosexuals to "a lifelong penalty and stigma."...

JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom [CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS] and JUSTICE THOMAS join, dissenting....

I.

I begin with the Court's surprising readiness to reconsider a decision rendered a mere 17 years ago in Bowers v. Hardwick. I do not myself believe in rigid adherence to stare decisis in constitutional cases; but I do believe that we should be consistent rather than manipulative in invoking the doctrine. Today's opinions in support of reversal do not bother to distinguish—or indeed, even bother to mention—the paean to stare decisis coauthored by three Members of today’s majority in Planned Parenthood v. Casey....

Today’s approach to stare decisis invites us to overrule an erroneously decided precedent (including an “intensely divisive” decision) if: (1) its foundations have been “eroded” by subsequent decisions; (2) it has been subject to “substantial and continuing” criticism; and (3) it has not induced “individual or societal reliance” that counsels against overturning. The problem is that Roe itself—which today’s majority surely has no disposition to overrule—satisfies these conditions to at least the same degree as Bowers....

I do not quarrel with the Court’s claim that [Romer] “eroded” the “foundations” of Bowers’ rational-basis holding. But Roe and Casey have been equally “eroded” by [Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 707 (1997), discussed later in this chapter] which held that only fundamental rights which are “‘deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition’” qualify for anything other than rational basis scrutiny under the doctrine of “substantive due process.” Roe and Casey, of course, subjected the restriction of abortion to heightened scrutiny without even attempting to establish that the freedom to abort was rooted in this Nation’s tradition.

Bowers, the Court says, has been subject to “substantial and continuing [criticism], disapproving of its reasoning in all respects, not just as to its historical assumptions.” [Of] course, Roe too (and by extension Casey) had been (and still is) subject to unrelenting criticism....

That leaves, to distinguish the rock-solid, unamendable disposition of Roe from the readily overrulable Bowers, only the third factor. “[T]here has been,” the Court says, “no individual or societal reliance on Bowers of the sort that could counsel against overturning its holding....” It seems to me that the “societal reliance” on the principles confirmed in Bowers and discarded today has been overwhelming. Countless judicial decisions and legislative enactments have relied on the ancient proposition that a governing majority’s belief that certain sexual behavior is “immoral and unacceptable” constitutes a rational basis for regulation.... State laws against bigamy, same-sex marriage, adult incest, prostitution, masturbation, adultery, fornication, bestiality, and obscenity are likewise sustainable only in light of Bowers’ validation of laws based on moral choices. Every single one of these laws is called into question by today’s decision; the Court makes no effort to cabin the scope of its decision to exclude them from its holding. The impossibility of distinguishing homosexuality from other traditional “morals” offenses is precisely why Bowers rejected the rational-basis challenge....

What a massive disruption of the current social order, therefore, the overruling of Bowers entails. Not so the overruling of Roe, which would simply have restored the regime that existed for centuries before 1973, in which the permissibility of and restrictions upon abortion were determined legislatively State-by-State.

To tell the truth, it does not surprise me, and should surprise no one, that the Court has chosen today to revise the standards of stare decisis set forth in Casey. It has thereby exposed Casey's extraordinary deference to precedent for the result-oriented expedient that it is....

II...

Our opinions applying the doctrine known as “substantive due process” hold that the Due Process Clause prohibits States from infringing fundamental liberty interests, unless the infringement is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest. We have held repeatedly, in cases the Court today does not overrule, that only fundamental rights qualify for this so-called “heightened scrutiny” protection—that is, rights which are “deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition.”...All other liberty interests may be abridged or abrogated pursuant to a validly enacted state law if that law is rationally related to a legitimate state interest.

Bowers held, first, that criminal prohibitions of homosexual sodomy are not subject to heightened scrutiny because they do not implicate a “fundamental right” under the Due Process Clause....Noting that “[p]roscriptions against that conduct have ancient roots,” that “[s]odomy was a criminal offense at common law and was forbidden by the laws of the original 13 States when they ratified the Bill of Rights,” ibid., and that many States had retained their bans on sodomy, Bowers concluded that a right to engage in homosexual sodomy was not “deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition.””...

The Court today does not overrule this holding. Not once does it describe homosexual sodomy as a “fundamental right” or a “fundamental liberty interest,” nor does it subject the Texas statute to strict scrutiny. Instead, having failed to establish that the right to homosexual sodomy is “deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition,” the Court concludes that the application of Texas’s statute to petitioners’ conduct fails the rational-basis test, and overrules Bowers’ holding to the contrary....

IV.

[The Texas sodomy statute] undoubtedly imposes constraints on liberty. So do laws prohibiting prostitution, recreational use of heroin, and, for that matter, working more than 60 hours per week in a bakery. But there is no right to “liberty” under the Due Process Clause, though today’s opinion repeatedly makes that claim. The Fourteenth Amendment expressly allows States to deprive their citizens of “liberty,” so long as “due process of law” is provided....

It is (as Bowers recognized) entirely irrelevant whether the laws in our long national tradition criminalizing homosexual sodomy were “directed at homosexual conduct as a distinct matter.” Whether homosexual sodomy was prohibited by a law targeted at same-sex sexual relations or by a more general law prohibiting both homosexual and heterosexual sodomy, the only relevant point is that it was criminalized—which suffices to establish that homosexual sodomy is not a right “deeply rooted in our Nation’s history and tradition.” The Court today agrees that homosexual sodomy was criminalized and thus does not dispute the facts on which Bowers actually relied....

Bowers’ conclusion that homosexual sodomy is not a fundamental right “deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition” is utterly unassailable.

Realizing that fact, the Court instead says: “[W]e think that our laws and traditions in the past half century are of most relevance here. These references show an emerging awareness that liberty gives substantial protection to adult persons in deciding how to conduct their private lives in matters pertaining to sex.” Apart from the fact that such an “emerging awareness” does not establish a “fundamental right,” the statement is factually false. States continue to prosecute all sorts of crimes by adults “in matters pertaining to sex”: prostitution, adult incest, adultery, obscenity, and child pornography. Sodomy laws, too, have been enforced “in the past half century,” in which there have been 134 reported cases involving prosecutions for consensual, adult, homosexual sodomy....

I turn now to the ground on which the Court squarely rests its holding: the contention that there is no rational basis for the law here under attack. This proposition is so out of accord with our jurisprudence—indeed, with the jurisprudence of any society we know—that it requires little discussion.

The Texas statute undeniably seeks to further the belief of its citizens that certain forms of sexual behavior are “immoral and unacceptable”—the same interest furthered by criminal laws against fornication, bigamy, adultery, adult incest, bestiality, and obscenity. Bowers held that this was a legitimate state interest. The Court today reaches the opposite conclusion. [This] effectively decrees the end of all morals legislation. If, as the Court asserts, the promotion of majoritarian sexual morality is not even a legitimate state interest, none of the above-mentioned laws can survive rational-basis review....

Today's opinion is the product of a Court, which is the product of a law-profession culture, that has largely signed on to the so-called homosexual agenda, by which I mean the agenda promoted by some homosexual activists directed at eliminating the moral opprobrium that has traditionally attached to homosexual conduct....

One of the most revealing statements in today's opinion is the Court's grim warning that the criminalization of homosexual conduct is "an invitation to subject homosexual persons to discrimination both in the public and in the private spheres." It is clear from this that the Court has taken sides in the culture war, departing from its role of assuring, as neutral observer, that the democratic rules of engagement are observed. Many Americans do not want persons who openly engage in homosexual conduct as partners in their business, as scoutmasters for their children, as teachers in their children's schools, or as boarders in their home. They view this as protecting themselves and their families from a lifestyle that they believe to be immoral and destructive. The Court views it as "discrimination" which it is the function of our judgments to deter. So imbued is the Court with the law profession's anti-anti-homosexual culture, that it is seemingly unaware that the attitudes of that culture are not obviously "mainstream"; that in most States what the Court calls "discrimination" against those who engage in homosexual acts is perfectly legal; that proposals to ban such "discrimination" under Title VII have repeatedly been rejected by Congress; that in some cases such "discrimination" is mandated by federal statute, see 10 U.S.C. §654(b)(1) (mandating discharge from the armed forces of any service member who engages in or intends to engage in homosexual acts); and that in some cases such "discrimination" is a constitutional right, see Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000).

Let me be clear that I have nothing against homosexuals, or any other group, promoting their agenda through normal democratic means. Social perceptions of sexual and other morality change over time, and every group has the right to persuade its fellow citizens that its view of such matters is the best. That homosexuals have achieved some success in that enterprise is attested to by the fact that Texas is one of the few remaining States that criminalize private, consensual homosexual acts. But persuading one's fellow citizens is one thing, and imposing one's views in absence of democratic majority will is something else. I would no more require a State to criminalize homosexual acts—or, for that matter, display any moral disapprobation of them—than I would forbid it to do so. What Texas has chosen to do is well within the range of traditional democratic action, and its hand should not be stayed through the invention of a brand-new "constitutional right" by a Court that is impatient of democratic change....

One of the benefits of leaving regulation of this matter to the people rather than to the courts is that the people, unlike judges, need not carry things to their logical conclusion. The people may feel that their disapprobation of homosexual conduct is strong enough to disallow homosexual marriage, but not strong enough to criminalize private homosexual acts—and may legislate accordingly. The Court today pretends that it possesses a similar freedom of action, so that we need not fear judicial imposition of homosexual marriage, as has recently occurred in Canada (in a decision that the Canadian Government has chosen not to appeal). At the end of its opinion—after having laid waste the foundations of our rational-basis jurisprudence—the Court says that the present case “does not involve whether the government must give formal recognition to any relationship that homosexual persons seek to enter.” Do not believe it. More illuminating than this bald, unreasoned disclaimer is the progression of thought displayed by an earlier passage in the Court’s opinion, which notes the constitutional protections afforded to “personal decisions relating to marriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships, child rearing, and education,” and then declares that “[p]ersons in a homosexual relationship may seek autonomy for these purposes, just as heterosexual persons do.” Today’s opinion dismantles the structure of constitutional law that has permitted a distinction to be made between heterosexual and homosexual unions, insofar as formal recognition in marriage is concerned. If moral disapprobation of homosexual conduct is “no legitimate state interest” for purposes of proscribing that conduct and if, as the Court coos (casting aside all pretense of neutrality), “[w]hen sexuality finds overt expression in intimate conduct with another person, the conduct can be but one element in a personal bond that is more enduring”; what justification could there possibly be for denying the benefits of marriage to homosexual couples exercising “[t]he liberty protected by the Constitution.” Surely not the encouragement of procreation, since the sterile and the elderly are allowed to marry. This case “does not involve” the issue of homosexual marriage only if one entertains the belief that principle and logic have nothing to do with the decisions of this Court....

JUSTICE THOMAS, dissenting.

I join Justice Scalia’s dissenting opinion. I write separately to note that the law before the Court today “is...uncommonly silly.” Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 527 (1965) (Stewart, J., dissenting). If I were a member of the Texas Legislature, I would vote to repeal it. Punishing someone for expressing his sexual preference through noncommercial consensual conduct with another adult does not appear to be a worthy way to expend valuable law enforcement resources.

Notwithstanding this, I recognize that as a member of this Court I am not empowered to help petitioners and others similarly situated. My duty, rather, is to “decide cases ‘agreeably to the Constitution and laws of the United States.’” And, just like Justice Stewart, I “can find [neither in the bill of rights nor in any other part of the Constitution a] general right of privacy,” or as the Court terms it today, the “liberty of the person both in its spatial and more transcendent dimensions.”

Note: The Legal and Political Landscape on the Eve of Obergefell

1. Sex and Marriage. The Lawrence Court noted that the case did “not involve whether the government must give formal recognition to any relationship that homosexual persons seek to enter.” Does it make sense to hold that there is a constitutional right to casual sex, but not to sex within a committed, marital relationship?

At the time that Lawrence was decided, cases involving heterosexual relationships had already established that there was a fundamental right to marriage. For example, in Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), the Court, in a nine-to-zero decision written by Justice Warren, invalidated a state prohibition on interracial marriage in part because “[the] freedom to marry has long been recognized as one of the vital personal rights essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men.” See also Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978) (invalidating a Wisconsin statute providing any resident “having minor issue not in his custody and which he is under an obligation to support by court order” may not marry without a prior judicial determination that the support obligation has been met, and that the children “are not then and are not likely thereafter to become public charges”); Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987) (invalidating a prison regulation that permitted inmates to marry only when the superintendent found compelling reasons to grant permission). But see Califano v. Jobst, 434 U.S. 47 (1977) (upholding a statute providing that social security benefits received by a disabled dependent child of a covered wage earner terminate when the child marries an individual who is not independently entitled to benefits under the act, even though the individual is also disabled).

2. Changes in public attitudes. Consider the implications, if any, of the following public opinion data as reported by Gallup at <http://www.gallup.com/poll/1651/gay-lesbian-rights.aspx>:

“Do you think gay and lesbian relations between consenting adults should be legal?”

July 1986 (around the time that Bowers was decided): Yes 35%, No 57%, No Opinion 11%.

July 2003 (around the time that Lawrence was decided): Yes 48%, No 46%, No Opinion 6%.

July 2015 (around the time that Obergefell, discussed infra, upheld the constitutional right to same-sex marriage): Yes 68%, No 28%, No opinion 4%.

May 2017: Yes 72%, No 23%, No opinion 5%.

“Do you think that marriages between same-sex couples should or should not be recognized by law as valid with the same rights as traditional marriages?”

January 2000: Valid 34%, Not Valid 62%, No Opinion 4%.

July 2015: Valid 58%, Not Valid 40%, No Opinion 2%.

May 2017: Valid 64%, Not Valid 34%, No Opinion 2%.

Which of the following conclusions do you find persuasive?

a. The polling data demonstrates that the Supreme Court’s decisions in this area are broadly in line with public opinion and are, therefore, unproblematic.

b. The polling data demonstrates that the gay community is not a powerless minority and that, therefore, Supreme Court intervention was unnecessary and unjustified.

c. The polling data demonstrates that the Supreme Court has some power to shape public opinion.

d. Polls should have nothing to do with constitutional law.

3. Legal Developments. Consider the implications of the following legal developments that occurred between Lawrence and Obergefell:

a. Developments on the state level. In the wake of Lawrence, judicial decisions in a number of states, including Massachusetts, California, and Iowa, established a state constitutional right to same-sex marriage. In New York, Maryland, and the District of Columbia local legislatures enacted measures providing for same-sex marriages. On the other hand, a large number of states adopted state constitutional amendments prohibiting same-sex marriages, often by referenda, and sometimes overturning state court decisions establishing them.

b. A federal constitutional amendment. Congress considered a series of federal constitutional amendments which would have provided that marriage consisted only of the union of a man and a woman. In a test vote held on June 6, 2006, a version of the amendment failed to achieve the necessary two-thirds majority in the Senate, with forty-nine Senators voting in favor of the amendment and forty-eight against.

c. The end of “Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell.” In December of 2010, President Obama signed into law the “Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell Repeal Act,” Pub. L. 111-321, which set in motion the repeal of the military’s “don’t ask, don’t tell” policy regarding gay and lesbian servicemen and permitted these individuals to serve openly in the armed forces.

d. Windsor. In 2013, the Supreme Court decided United States v. Windsor, 133 S. Ct. 2675, invalidating the “Defense of Marriage Act,” 1 U.S.C. §7 (DOMA). The Act provided that, for purposes of federal law, the word “marriage” meant “only a legal union between one man and one woman as husband and wife.” In a six-to-three decision, written by Justice Kennedy, the Court stated:

[A] State’s decision to give [same-sex couples] the right to marry conferred upon them a dignity and status of immense import. When the State used its historic and essential authority to define the marital relation in this way, its role and its power in making the decision enhanced the recognition, dignity, and protection of the class in their own community. DOMA, because of its reach and extent, departs from this history and tradition of reliance on state law to define marriage.

DOMA seeks to injure the very class [the state] seeks to protect. By doing so it violates basic due process and equal protection principles applicable to the Federal Government.

At the conclusion of its opinion, the Court noted that “By seeking to displace this protection and treating those persons as living in marriages less respected than others, the federal statute is in violation of the Fifth Amendment. This opinion and its holding are confined to those lawful marriages.”

In a dissenting opinion, Justice Roberts stated that while he “[disagreed] with the result to which the majority’s analysis leads it in this case, I think it more important to point out that its analysis leads no further. The Court does not have before it, and the logic of its opinion does not decide, the distinct question whether the States, in the exercise of their ‘historic and essential authority to define the marital relation,’ may continue to utilize the traditional definition of marriage.” Consider Justice Scalia’s views in a separate dissenting opinion joined in this respect by Justice Thomas:

The penultimate sentence of the majority’s opinion is a naked declaration that “[t]his opinion and its holding are confined” to those couples “joined in same-sex marriages made lawful by the State.” I have heard such “bald, unreasoned disclaimer[s]” before. [Lawrence.] [It] takes real cheek for today’s majority to assure us, as it is going out the door, that a constitutional requirement to give formal recognition to same-sex marriage is not at issue here—when what has preceded that assurance is a lecture on how superior the majority’s moral judgment in favor of same-sex marriage is to the Congress’s hateful moral judgment against it. I promise you this: The only thing that will “confine” the Court’s holding is its sense of what it can get away with.

I do not mean to suggest disagreement with The Chief Justice’s view, that lower federal courts and state courts can distinguish today’s case when the issue before them is state denial of marital status to same-sex couples—or even that this Court could theoretically do so. Lord, an opinion with such scatter-shot rationales as this one (federalism noises among them) can be distinguished in many ways. And deserves to be. State and lower federal courts should take the Court at its word and distinguish away.

In my opinion, however, the view that this Court will take of state prohibition of same-sex marriage is indicated beyond mistaking by today’s opinion....

As far as this Court is concerned, no one should be fooled; it is just a matter of listening and waiting for the other shoe.

e. The lower courts respond. Many lower courts apparently thought that Justice Scalia was the better prognosticator. Beginning in 2013, many courts invalidated state bans on same-sex marriages. See, e.g., Baskin v. Bogan, 766 F.3d 648 (7th Cir. 2014); Latta v. Otter, 771 F.3d 456 (9th Cir. 2014); Bishop v. Barton, 760 F.3d 1070 (10th Cir. 2014).

Were any of these developments relevant to the Court’s ultimate decision concerning same-sex marriage?

Obergefell v. Hodges

135 S. Ct. 2584 (2015)

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Constitution promises liberty to all within its reach, a liberty that includes certain specific rights that allow persons, within a lawful realm, to define and express their identity. The petitioners in these cases seek to find that liberty by marrying someone of the same sex and having their marriages deemed lawful on the same terms and conditions as marriages between persons of the opposite sex....

II

Before addressing the principles and precedents that govern these cases, it is appropriate to note the history of the subject now before the Court.

A

From their beginning to their most recent page, the annals of human history reveal the transcendent importance of marriage. The lifelong union of a man and a woman always has promised nobility and dignity to all persons, without regard to their station in life. Marriage is sacred to those who live by their religions and offers unique fulfillment to those who find meaning in the secular realm. Its dynamic allows two people to find a life that could not be found alone, for a marriage becomes greater than just the two persons. Rising from the most basic human needs, marriage is essential to our most profound hopes and aspirations.

The centrality of marriage to the human condition makes it unsurprising that the institution has existed for millennia and across civilizations....

That history is the beginning of these cases. The respondents say it should be the end as well. To them, it would demean a timeless institution if the concept and lawful status of marriage were extended to two persons of the same sex. Marriage, in their view, is by its nature a gender-differentiated union of man and woman. This view long has been held—and continues to be held—in good faith by reasonable and sincere people here and throughout the world.

The petitioners acknowledge this history but contend that these cases cannot end there. Were their intent to demean the revered idea and reality of marriage, the petitioners' claims would be of a different order. But that is neither their purpose nor their submission. To the contrary, it is the enduring importance of marriage that underlies the petitioners' contentions. This, they say, is their whole point. Far from seeking to devalue marriage, the petitioners seek it for themselves because of their respect—and need—for its privileges and responsibilities. And their immutable nature dictates that same-sex marriage is their only real path to this profound commitment.

Recounting the circumstances of three of these cases illustrates the urgency of the petitioners' cause from their perspective. Petitioner James Obergefell, [met] John Arthur over two decades ago. They fell in love and started a life together, establishing a lasting, committed relation. In 2011, however, Arthur was diagnosed with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or ALS. This debilitating disease is progressive, with no known cure. Two years ago, Obergefell and Arthur decided to commit to one another, resolving to marry before Arthur died. To fulfill their mutual promise, they traveled from Ohio to Maryland, where same-sex marriage was legal. It was difficult for Arthur to move, and so the couple were wed inside a medical transport plane as it remained on the tarmac in Baltimore. Three months later, Arthur died. Ohio law does not permit Obergefell to be listed as the surviving spouse on Arthur's death certificate. By statute, they must remain strangers even in death, a state-imposed separation Obergefell deems "hurtful for the rest of time." He brought suit to be shown as the surviving spouse on Arthur's death certificate....

[The Court recounts the facts of two of the other cases before it.]

The cases now before the Court involve other petitioners as well, each with their own experiences. Their stories reveal that they seek not to denigrate marriage but rather to live their lives, or honor their spouses' memory, joined by its bond.

The ancient origins of marriage confirm its centrality, but it has not stood in isolation from developments in law and society. The history of marriage is one of both continuity and change. That institution—even as confined to opposite-sex relations—has evolved over time.

For example, marriage was once viewed as an arrangement by the couple's parents based on political, religious, and financial concerns; but by the time of the Nation's founding it was understood to be a voluntary contract between a man and a woman. As the role and status of women changed, the institution further evolved. Under the centuries-old doctrine of coverture, a married man and woman were treated by the State as a single, male-dominated legal entity. See 1 W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 430 (1765). As women gained legal, political, and property rights, and as society began to understand that women have their own equal dignity, the law of coverture was abandoned. These and other developments in the institution of marriage over the past centuries were not mere superficial changes. Rather, they worked deep transformations in its structure, affecting aspects of marriage long viewed by many as essential.

These new insights have strengthened, not weakened, the institution of marriage. Indeed, changed understandings of marriage are characteristic of a Nation where new dimensions of freedom become apparent to new generations, often through perspectives that begin in pleas or protests and then are considered in the political sphere and the judicial process.

This dynamic can be seen in the Nation's experiences with the rights of gays and lesbians. Until the mid-20th century, same-sex intimacy long had been condemned as immoral by the state itself in most Western nations, a belief often embodied in the criminal law. For this reason, among others, many persons did not deem homosexuals to have dignity in their own distinct identity. A truthful declaration by same-sex couples of what was in their hearts had to remain unspoken. Even when a greater awareness of the humanity and integrity of homosexual persons came in the period after World War II, the argument that gays and lesbians had a just claim to dignity was in conflict with both law and widespread social conventions. Same-sex intimacy remained a crime in many States. Gays and lesbians were prohibited from most government employment, barred from military service, excluded under immigration laws, targeted by police, and burdened in their rights to associate....

[The Court recounts the history of judicial involvement with issues of homosexuality and same-sex marriage and notes that most federal courts of appeals and many state courts had upheld a right to same-sex marriage.]

After years of litigation, legislation, referenda, and the discussions that attended these public acts, the States are now divided on the issue of same-sex marriage.

III

Under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, no State shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The fundamental liberties protected by this Clause include most of the rights enumerated in the Bill of Rights. In addition these liberties extend to certain personal choices central to individual dignity and autonomy, including intimate choices that define personal identity and beliefs.

The identification and protection of fundamental rights is an enduring part of the judicial duty to interpret the Constitution. That responsibility, however, "has not been reduced to any formula." Rather, it requires courts to exercise reasoned judgment in identifying interests of the person so fundamental that the State must accord them its respect. That process is guided by many of the same considerations relevant to analysis of other constitutional provisions that set forth broad principles rather than specific requirements. History and tradition guide and discipline this inquiry but do not set its outer boundaries. That method respects our history and learns from it without allowing the past alone to rule the present.

The nature of injustice is that we may not always see it in our own times.

The generations that wrote and ratified the Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment did not presume to know the extent of freedom in all of its dimensions, and so they entrusted to future generations a charter protecting the right of all persons to enjoy liberty as we learn its meaning. When new insight reveals discord between the Constitution's central protections and a received legal stricture, a claim to liberty must be addressed.

Applying these established tenets, the Court has long held the right to marry is protected by the Constitution....

It cannot be denied that this Court's cases describing the right to marry presumed a relationship involving opposite-sex partners. The Court, like many institutions, has made assumptions defined by the world and time of which it is a part. This was evident in Baker v. Nelson, a one-line summary decision issued in 1972, holding the exclusion of same-sex couples from marriage did not present a substantial federal question.

Still, there are other, more instructive precedents. This Court's cases have expressed constitutional principles of broader reach. In defining the right to marry these cases have identified essential attributes of that right based in history, tradition, and other constitutional liberties inherent in this intimate bond. And in assessing whether the force and rationale of its cases apply to same-sex couples, the Court must respect the basic reasons why the right to marry has been long protected.

This analysis compels the conclusion that same-sex couples may exercise the right to marry. The four principles and traditions to be discussed demonstrate that the reasons marriage is fundamental under the Constitution apply with equal force to same-sex couples.

A first premise of the Court's relevant precedents is that the right to personal choice regarding marriage is inherent in the concept of individual autonomy....

Choices about marriage shape an individual's destiny....

The nature of marriage is that, through its enduring bond, two persons together can find other freedoms, such as expression, intimacy, and spirituality. This is true for all persons, whatever their sexual orientation. There is dignity in the bond between two men or two women who seek to marry and in their autonomy to make such profound choices.

A second principle in this Court's jurisprudence is that the right to marry is fundamental because it supports a two-person union unlike any other in its importance to the committed individuals....

The right to marry thus dignifies couples who "wish to define themselves by their commitment to each other." [Windsor.] Marriage responds to the universal fear that a lonely person might call out only to find no one there. It offers the hope of companionship and understanding and assurance that while both still live there will be someone to care for the other....

A third basis for protecting the right to marry is that it safeguards children and families and thus draws meaning from related rights of childrearing, procreation, and education. [By] giving recognition and legal structure to their parents' relationship, marriage allows children "to understand the integrity and closeness of their own family and its concord with other families in their community and in their daily lives." [Windsor.] Marriage also affords the permanency and stability important to children's best interests.

As all parties agree, many same-sex couples provide loving and nurturing homes to their children, whether biological or adopted. And hundreds of thousands of children are presently being raised by such couples....

Excluding same-sex couples from marriage thus conflicts with a central premise of the right to marry. Without the recognition, stability, and predictability marriage offers, their children suffer the stigma of knowing their families are somehow lesser. They also suffer the significant material costs of being raised by unmarried parents, relegated through no fault of their own to a more difficult and uncertain family life. The marriage laws at issue here thus harm and humiliate the children of same-sex couples.

That is not to say the right to marry is less meaningful for those who do not or cannot have children. An ability, desire, or promise to procreate is not and has not been a prerequisite for a valid marriage in any State. In light of precedent protecting the right of a married couple not to procreate, it cannot be said the Court or the States have conditioned the right to marry on the capacity or commitment to procreate. The constitutional marriage right has many aspects, of which childbearing is only one.

Fourth and finally, this Court's cases and the Nation's traditions make clear that marriage is a keystone of our social order....

For that reason, just as a couple vows to support each other, so does society pledge to support the couple, offering symbolic recognition and material benefits to protect and nourish the union. Indeed, while the States are in general free to vary the benefits they confer on all married couples, they have throughout our history made marriage the basis for an expanding list of governmental rights, benefits, and responsibilities. These aspects of marital status include: taxation; inheritance and property rights; rules of intestate succession; spousal privilege in the law of evidence; hospital access; medical decisionmaking authority; adoption rights; the rights and benefits of survivors; birth and death certificates; professional ethics rules; campaign finance restrictions; workers' compensation benefits; health insurance; and child custody, support, and visitation rules. Valid marriage under state law is also a significant status for over a thousand provisions of federal law. The States have contributed to the fundamental character of the marriage right by placing that institution at the center of so many facets of the legal and social order.

There is no difference between same- and opposite-sex couples with respect to this principle. Yet by virtue of their exclusion from that institution, same-sex couples are denied the constellation of benefits that the States have linked to marriage. This harm results in more than just material burdens. Same-sex couples are consigned to an instability many opposite-sex couples would deem intolerable in their own lives. As the State itself makes marriage all the more precious by the significance it attaches to it, exclusion from that status has the effect of teaching that gays and lesbians are unequal in important respects. It demeans gays and lesbians for the State to lock them out of a central institution of the Nation's society. Same-sex couples, too, may aspire to the transcendent purposes of marriage and seek fulfillment in its highest meaning....

Objecting that this does not reflect an appropriate framing of the issue, the respondents refer to Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 701, 721 (1997), which called for a “careful description” of fundamental rights. They assert the petitioners do not seek to exercise the right to marry but rather a new and nonexistent “right to same-sex marriage.” [Washington v. Glucksberg, upholding a statute that prohibited the causing or aiding of a suicide, and discussed infra] did insist that liberty under the Due Process Clause must be defined in a most circumscribed manner, with central reference to specific historical practices. Yet while that approach may have been appropriate for the asserted right there involved (physician-assisted suicide), it is inconsistent with the approach this Court has used in discussing other fundamental rights, including marriage and intimacy. Loving v. Virginia did not ask about a “right to interracial marriage”; Turner did not ask about a “right of inmates to marry”; and Zablocki did not ask about a “right of fathers with unpaid child support duties to marry.” Rather, each case inquired about the right to marry in its comprehensive sense, asking if there was a sufficient justification for excluding the relevant class from the right.

That principle applies here. If rights were defined by who exercised them in the past, then received practices could serve as their own continued justification and new groups could not invoke rights once denied. This Court has rejected that approach, both with respect to the right to marry and the rights of gays and lesbians.

The right to marry is fundamental as a matter of history and tradition, but rights come not from ancient sources alone. They rise, too, from a better informed understanding of how constitutional imperatives define a liberty that remains urgent in our own era. Many who deem same-sex marriage to be wrong reach that conclusion based on decent and honorable religious or philosophical premises, and neither they nor their beliefs are disparaged here. But when that sincere, personal opposition becomes enacted law and public policy, the necessary consequence is to put the imprimatur of the State itself on an exclusion that soon demeans or stigmatizes those whose own liberty is then denied. Under the Constitution, same-sex couples seek in marriage the same legal treatment as opposite-sex couples, and it would disparage their choices and diminish their personhood to deny them this right.

The right of same-sex couples to marry that is part of the liberty promised by the Fourteenth Amendment is derived, too, from that Amendment's guarantee of the equal protection of the laws. The Due Process Clause and the Equal Protection Clause are connected in a profound way, though they set forth independent principles. Rights implicit in liberty and rights secured by equal protection may rest on different precepts and are not always co-extensive, yet in some instances each may be instructive as to the meaning and reach of the other. In any particular case one Clause may be thought to capture the essence of the right in a more accurate and comprehensive way, even as the two Clauses may converge in the identification and definition of the right....

This dynamic also applies to same-sex marriage. It is now clear that the challenged laws burden the liberty of same-sex couples, and it must be further acknowledged that they abridge central precepts of equality. Here the marriage laws enforced by the respondents are in essence unequal: same-sex couples are denied all the benefits afforded to opposite-sex couples and are barred from exercising a fundamental right. Especially against a long history of disapproval of their relationships, this denial to same-sex couples of the right to marry works a grave and continuing harm. The imposition of this disability on gays and lesbians serves to disrespect and subordinate them. And the Equal Protection Clause, like the Due Process Clause, prohibits this unjustified infringement of the fundamental right to marry.

[The] Court now holds that same-sex couples may exercise the fundamental right to marry. No longer may this liberty be denied to them. Baker v. Nelson must be and now is overruled, and the State laws challenged by Petitioners in these cases are now held invalid to the extent they exclude same-sex couples from civil marriage on the same terms and conditions as opposite-sex couples.

There may be an initial inclination in these cases to proceed with caution—to await further legislation, litigation, and debate. The respondents warn there has been insufficient democratic discourse before deciding an issue so basic as the definition of marriage...

Yet there has been far more deliberation than this argument acknowledges. There have been referenda, legislative debates, and grassroots campaigns, as well as countless studies, papers, books, and other popular and scholarly writings. There has been extensive litigation in state and federal courts. Judicial opinions addressing the issue have been informed by the contentions of parties and counsel, which, in turn, reflect the more general, societal discussion of same-sex marriage and its meaning that has occurred over the past decades. As more than 100 amici make clear in their filings, many of the central institutions in American life—state and local governments, the military, large and small businesses, labor unions, religious organizations, law enforcement, civic groups, professional organizations, and universities—have devoted substantial attention to the question. This has led to an enhanced understanding of the issue—an understanding reflected in the arguments now presented for resolution as a matter of constitutional law.

Of course, the Constitution contemplates that democracy is the appropriate process for change, so long as that process does not abridge fundamental rights. [But] when the rights of persons are violated, “the Constitution requires redress by the courts,” notwithstanding the more general value of democratic decisionmaking. This holds true even when protecting individual rights affects issues of the utmost importance and sensitivity....

This is not the first time the Court has been asked to adopt a cautious approach to recognizing and protecting fundamental rights. In Bowers, a bare majority upheld a law criminalizing same-sex intimacy. That approach might have been viewed as a cautious endorsement of the democratic process, which had only just begun to consider the rights of gays and lesbians. Yet, in effect, Bowers upheld state action that denied gays and lesbians a fundamental right and caused them pain and humiliation. As evidenced by the dissents in that case, the facts and principles necessary to a correct holding were known to the Bowers Court. That is why Lawrence held Bowers was “not correct when it was decided.” Although Bowers was eventually repudiated in Lawrence, men and women were harmed in the interim, and the substantial effects of these injuries no doubt lingered long after Bowers was overruled. Dignitary wounds cannot always be healed with the stroke of a pen.

A ruling against same-sex couples would have the same effect—and, like Bowers, would be unjustified under the Fourteenth Amendment. The petitioners’ stories make clear the urgency of the issue they present to the Court. [Properly] presented with the petitioners’ cases, the Court has a duty to address these claims and answer these questions....

Were the Court to uphold the challenged laws as constitutional, it would teach the Nation that these laws are in accord with our society's most basic compact. Were the Court to stay its hand to allow slower, case-by-case determination of the required availability of specific public benefits to same-sex couples, it still would deny gays and lesbians many rights and responsibilities intertwined with marriage.

The respondents also argue allowing same-sex couples to wed will harm marriage as an institution by leading to fewer opposite-sex marriages. This may occur, the respondents contend, because licensing same-sex marriage severs the connection between natural procreation and marriage. That argument, however, rests on a counterintuitive view of opposite-sex couple's decisionmaking processes regarding marriage and parenthood. Decisions about whether to marry and raise children are based on many personal, romantic, and practical considerations; and it is unrealistic to conclude that an opposite-sex couple would choose not to marry simply because same-sex couples may do so. The respondents have not shown a foundation for the conclusion that allowing same-sex marriage will cause the harmful outcomes they describe. Indeed, with respect to this asserted basis for excluding same-sex couples from the right to marry, it is appropriate to observe these cases involve only the rights of two consenting adults whose marriages would pose no risk of harm to themselves or third parties.

Finally, it must be emphasized that religions, and those who adhere to religious doctrines, may continue to advocate with utmost, sincere conviction that, by divine precepts, same-sex marriage should not be condoned. The First Amendment ensures that religious organizations and persons are given proper protection as they seek to teach the principles that are so fulfilling and so central to their lives and faiths, and to their own deep aspirations to continue the family structure they have long revered. The same is true of those who oppose same-sex marriage for other reasons. In turn, those who believe allowing same-sex marriage is proper or indeed essential, whether as a matter of religious conviction or secular belief, may engage those who disagree with their view in an open and searching debate. The Constitution, however, does not permit the State to bar same-sex couples from marriage on the same terms as accorded to couples of the opposite sex....

No union is more profound than marriage, for it embodies the highest ideals of love, fidelity, devotion, sacrifice, and family. In forming a marital union, two people become something greater than once they were. As some of the petitioners in these cases demonstrate, marriage embodies a love that may endure even past death. It would misunderstand these men and women to say they disrespect the idea of marriage. Their plea is that they do respect it, respect it so deeply that they seek to find its fulfillment for themselves. Their hope is not to be condemned to live in loneliness, excluded from one of civilization's oldest institutions. They ask for equal dignity in the eyes of the law. The Constitution grants them that right....

CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS, with whom JUSTICE SCALIA and JUSTICE THOMAS join, dissenting.

Petitioners make strong arguments rooted in social policy and considerations of fairness. They contend that same-sex couples should be allowed to affirm their love and commitment through marriage, just like opposite-sex couples. That position has undeniable appeal; over the past six years, voters and legislators in eleven States and the District of Columbia have revised their laws to allow marriage between two people of the same sex.

But this Court is not a legislature. Whether same-sex marriage is a good idea should be of no concern to us. Under the Constitution, judges have power to say what the law is, not what it should be....

Although the policy arguments for extending marriage to same-sex couples may be compelling, the legal arguments for requiring such an extension are not. The fundamental right to marry does not include a right to make a State change its definition of marriage. And a State's decision to maintain the meaning of marriage that has persisted in every culture throughout human history can hardly be called irrational. In short, our Constitution does not enact any one theory of marriage. The people of a State are free to expand marriage to include same-sex couples, or to retain the historic definition.

Today, however, the Court takes the extraordinary step of ordering every State to license and recognize same-sex marriage. Many people will rejoice at this decision, and I begrudge none their celebration. But for those who believe in a government of laws, not of men, the majority's approach is deeply disheartening. Supporters of same-sex marriage have achieved considerable success persuading their fellow citizens—through the democratic process—to adopt their view. That ends today. Five lawyers have closed the debate and enacted their own vision of marriage as a matter of constitutional law. Stealing this issue from the people will for many cast a cloud over same-sex marriage, making a dramatic social change that much more difficult to accept.

The majority's decision is an act of will, not legal judgment. The right it announces has no basis in the Constitution or this Court's precedent. The majority expressly disclaims judicial "caution" and omits even a pretense of humility, openly relying on its desire to remake society according to its own “new insight” into the “nature of injustice.” As a result, the Court invalidates the marriage laws of more than half the States and orders the transformation of a social institution that has formed the basis of human society for millennia, for the Kalahari Bushmen and the Han Chinese, the Carthaginians and the Aztecs. Just who do we think we are?...

Understand well what this dissent is about: It is not about whether, in my judgment, the institution of marriage should be changed to include same-sex couples. It is instead about whether, in our democratic republic, that decision should rest with the people acting through their elected representatives, or with five lawyers who happen to hold commissions authorizing them to resolve legal disputes according to law. The Constitution leaves no doubt about the answer.

A...

The premises supporting [the] concept of marriage [as supporting procreation] are so fundamental that they rarely require articulation. The human race must procreate to survive. Procreation occurs through sexual relations between a man and a woman. When sexual relations result in the conception of a child, that child’s prospects are generally better if the mother and father stay together rather than going their separate ways. Therefore, for the good of children and society, sexual relations that can lead to procreation should occur only between a man and a woman committed to a lasting bond.

Society has recognized that bond as marriage. And by bestowing a respected status and material benefits on married couples, society encourages men and women to conduct sexual relations within marriage rather than without....

This singular understanding of marriage has prevailed in the United States throughout our history....

The Constitution itself says nothing about marriage, and the Framers thereby entrusted the States with “[t]he whole subject of the domestic relations of husband and wife.” Windsor. There is no dispute that every State at the founding—and every State throughout our history until a dozen years ago—defined marriage in the traditional, biologically rooted way....

As the majority notes, some aspects of marriage have changed over time....

[The changes] did not, however, work any transformation in the core structure of marriage as the union between a man and a woman. If you had asked a person on the street how marriage was defined, no one would ever have said, “Marriage is the union of a man and a woman, where the woman is subject to coverture.” The majority may be right that the “history of marriage is one of both continuity and change,” but the core meaning of marriage has endured....

II

Petitioners first contend that the marriage laws of their States violate the Due Process Clause....

The majority purports to identify four “principles and traditions” in this Court’s due process precedents that support a fundamental right for same-sex couples to marry. In reality, however, the majority’s approach has no basis in principle or tradition, except for the unprincipled tradition of judicial policymaking that characterized discredited decisions such as Lochner v. New York. Stripped of its shiny rhetorical gloss, the majority’s argument is that the Due Process Clause gives same-sex couples a fundamental right to marry because it will be good for them and for society. If I were a legislator, I would certainly consider that view as a matter of social policy. But as a judge, I find the majority’s position indefensible as a matter of constitutional law....

Allowing unelected federal judges to select which unenumerated rights rank as “fundamental”—and to strike down state laws on the basis of that determination—raises obvious concerns about the judicial role. Our precedents have accordingly insisted that judges “exercise the utmost care” in identifying implied fundamental rights, “lest the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause be subtly transformed into the policy preferences of the Members of this Court.”...

The need for restraint in administering the strong medicine of substantive due process is a lesson this Court has learned the hard way. The Court first applied substantive due process to strike down a statute in Dred Scott v. Sandford. There the Court invalidated the Missouri Compromise on the ground that legislation restricting the institution of slavery violated the implied rights of slaveholders....

Dred Scott’s holding was overruled on the battlefields of the Civil War and by constitutional amendment after Appomattox, but its approach to the Due Process Clause reappeared. In a series of early 20th-century cases, most prominently Lochner v. New York, this Court invalidated state statutes that presented “meddlesome interferences with the rights of the individual,” and “undue interference with liberty of person and freedom of contract.”...

Eventually, the Court recognized its error and vowed not to repeat it....

Rejecting Lochner does not require disavowing the doctrine of implied fundamental rights, and this Court has not done so. But to avoid repeating Lochner's error of converting personal preferences into constitutional mandates, our modern substantive due process cases have stressed the need for "judicial self-restraint." Our precedents have required that implied fundamental rights be "objectively, deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition," and "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty, such that neither liberty nor justice would exist if they were sacrificed." Glucksberg.

B

The majority acknowledges none of this doctrinal background, and it is easy to see why: Its aggressive application of substantive due process breaks sharply with decades of precedent and returns the Court to the unprincipled approach of Lochner.

1

The majority's driving themes are that marriage is desirable and petitioners desire it. [The] "right to marry" cases stand for the important but limited proposition that particular restrictions on access to marriage as traditionally defined violate due process. These precedents say nothing at all about a right to make a State change its definition of marriage, which is the right petitioners actually seek here. Neither petitioners nor the majority cites a single case or other legal source providing any basis for such a constitutional right. None exists, and that is enough to foreclose their claim.

Neither Lawrence nor any other precedent in the privacy line of cases supports the right that petitioners assert here. Unlike criminal laws banning contraceptives and sodomy, the marriage laws at issue here involve no government intrusion. They create no crime and impose no punishment. Same-sex couples remain free to live together, to engage in intimate conduct, and to raise their families as they see fit. No one is "condemned to live in loneliness" by the laws challenged in these cases—no one. At the same time, the laws in no way interfere with the "right to be let alone."...

[The] privacy cases provide no support for the majority's position, because petitioners do not seek privacy. Quite the opposite, they seek public recognition of their relationships, along with corresponding government benefits. Our cases have consistently refused to allow litigants to convert the shield provided by constitutional liberties into a sword to demand positive entitlements from the State....

To be fair, the majority does not suggest that its individual autonomy right is entirely unconstrained. The constraints it sets are precisely those that accord with its own “reasoned judgment,” informed by its “new insight” into the “nature of injustice,” which was invisible to all who came before but has become clear “as we learn [the] meaning” of liberty....

One immediate question invited by the majority’s position is whether States may retain the definition of marriage as a union of two people. Although the majority randomly inserts the adjective “two” in various places, it offers no reason at all why the two-person element of the core definition of marriage may be preserved while the man-woman element may not. Indeed, from the standpoint of history and tradition, a leap from opposite-sex marriage to same-sex marriage is much greater than one from a two-person union to plural unions, which have deep roots in some cultures around the world. If the majority is willing to take the big leap, it is hard to see how it can say no to the shorter one.

I do not mean to equate marriage between same-sex couples with plural marriages in all respects. There may well be relevant differences that compel different legal analysis. But if there are, petitioners have not pointed to any.....

Near the end of its opinion, the majority offers perhaps the clearest insight into its decision. Expanding marriage to include same-sex couples, the majority insists, would “pose no risk of harm to themselves or third parties.” This argument again echoes Lochner, which relied on its assessment that “we think that a law like the one before us involves neither the safety, the morals nor the welfare of the public, and that the interest of the public is not in the slightest degree affected by such an act.”

Then and now, this assertion of the “harm principle” sounds more in philosophy than law. The elevation of the fullest individual self-realization over the constraints that society has expressed in law may or may not be attractive moral philosophy. But a Justice’s commission does not confer any special moral, philosophical, or social insight sufficient to justify imposing those perceptions on fellow citizens under the pretense of “due process.”...

III

In addition to their due process argument, petitioners contend that the Equal Protection Clause requires their States to license and recognize same-sex marriages. The majority does not seriously engage with this claim. Its discussion is, quite frankly, difficult to follow. The central point seems to be that there is a “synergy between” the Equal Protection Clause and the Due Process Clause, and that some precedents relying on one Clause have also relied on the other....

[The majority] fails to provide even a single sentence explaining how the Equal Protection Clause supplies independent weight for its position, nor does it attempt to justify its gratuitous violation of the canon against unnecessarily resolving constitutional questions. In any event, the marriage laws at issue here do not violate the Equal Protection Clause, because distinguishing between opposite-sex and same-sex couples is rationally related to the States’ “legitimate state interest” in “preserving the traditional institution of marriage.”

It is important to note with precision which laws petitioners have challenged. Although they discuss some of the ancillary legal benefits that accompany marriage, such as hospital visitation rights and recognition of spousal status on official documents, petitioners’ lawsuits target the laws defining marriage generally rather than those allocating benefits specifically. The equal protection analysis might be different, in my view, if we were confronted with a more focused challenge to the denial of certain tangible benefits. Of course, those more selective claims will not arise now that the Court has taken the drastic step of requiring every State to license and recognize marriages between same-sex couples.

The legitimacy of this Court ultimately rests “upon the respect accorded to its judgments.” That respect flows from the perception—and reality—that we exercise humility and restraint in deciding cases according to the Constitution and law. The role of the Court envisioned by the majority today, however, is anything but humble or restrained. Over and over, the majority exalts the role of the judiciary in delivering social change....

Those who founded our country would not recognize the majority’s conception of the judicial role. They after all risked their lives and fortunes for the precious right to govern themselves. They would never have imagined yielding that right on a question of social policy to unaccountable and unelected judges. And they certainly would not have been satisfied by a system empowering judges to override policy judgments so long as they do so after “a quite extensive discussion.” In our democracy, debate about the content of the law is not an exhaustion requirement to be checked off before courts can impose their will....

When decisions are reached through democratic means, some people will inevitably be disappointed with the results. But those whose views do not prevail at least know that they have had their say, and accordingly are—in the tradition of our political culture—reconciled to the result of a fair and honest debate. In addition, they can gear up to raise the issue later, hoping to persuade enough on the winning side to think again.

But today the Court puts a stop to all that. By deciding this question under the Constitution, the Court removes it from the realm of democratic decision. There will be consequences to shutting down the political process on an issue of such profound public significance. Closing debate tends to close minds. People denied a voice are less likely to accept the ruling of a court on an issue that does not seem to be the sort of thing courts usually decide. As a thoughtful commentator observed about another issue, “The political process was moving..., not swiftly enough for advocates of quick, complete change, but majoritarian institutions were listening and acting. Heavy-handed judicial intervention was difficult to justify and appears to have provoked, not resolved, conflict.” Ginsburg, Some Thoughts on Autonomy and Equality in Relation to Roe v. Wade, 63 N.C. L. Rev. 375, 385–386 (1985) (footnote omitted). Indeed, however heartened the proponents of same-sex marriage might be on this day, it is worth acknowledging what they have lost, and lost forever: the opportunity to win the true acceptance that comes from persuading their fellow citizens of the justice of their cause. And they lose this just when the winds of change were freshening at their backs....

Respect for sincere religious conviction has led voters and legislators in every State that has adopted same-sex marriage democratically to include accommodations for religious practice. The majority’s decision imposing same-sex marriage cannot, of course, create any such accommodations. The majority graciously suggests that religious believers may continue to “advocate” and “teach” their views of marriage. The First Amendment guarantees, however, the freedom to “exercise” religion. Ominously, that is not a word the majority uses.

Hard questions arise when people of faith exercise religion in ways that may be seen to conflict with the new right to same-sex marriage—when, for example, a religious college provides married student housing only to opposite-sex married couples, or a religious adoption agency declines to place children with same-sex married couples. Indeed, the Solicitor General candidly acknowledged that the tax exemptions of some religious institutions would be in question if they opposed same-sex marriage. There is little doubt that these and similar questions will soon be before this Court. Unfortunately, people of faith can take no comfort in the treatment they receive from the majority today.

Perhaps the most discouraging aspect of today's decision is the extent to which the majority feels compelled to sully those on the other side of the debate. The majority offers a cursory assurance that it does not intend to disparage people who, as a matter of conscience, cannot accept same-sex marriage. That disclaimer is hard to square with the very next sentence, in which the majority explains that "the necessary consequence" of laws codifying the traditional definition of marriage is to "demea[n] or stigmatiz[e]" same-sex couples....

If you are among the many Americans—of whatever sexual orientation—who favor expanding same-sex marriage, by all means celebrate today's decision. Celebrate the achievement of a desired goal. Celebrate the opportunity for a new expression of commitment to a partner. Celebrate the availability of new benefits. But do not celebrate the Constitution. It had nothing to do with it.

I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom JUSTICE THOMAS joins, dissenting....

[It] is not of special importance to me what the law says about marriage. It is of overwhelming importance, however, who it is that rules me. Today's decree says that my Ruler, and the Ruler of 320 million Americans coast-to-coast, is a majority of the nine lawyers on the Supreme Court. The opinion in these cases is the furthest extension in fact—and the furthest extension one can even imagine—of the Court's claimed power to create "liberties" that the Constitution and its Amendments neglect to mention. This practice of constitutional revision by an unelected committee of nine, always accompanied (as it is today) by extravagant praise of liberty, robs the People of the most important liberty they asserted in the Declaration of Independence and won in the Revolution of 1776: the freedom to govern themselves.

I

Until the courts put a stop to it, public debate over same-sex marriage displayed American democracy at its best. Individuals on both sides of the issue passionately, but respectfully, attempted to persuade their fellow citizens to accept their views....

The Constitution places some constraints on self-rule—constraints adopted by the People themselves when they ratified the Constitution and its Amendments. [These] cases ask us to decide whether the Fourteenth Amendment contains a limitation that requires the States to license and recognize marriages between two people of the same sex. Does it remove that issue from the political process?

Of course not....

[When] the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified in 1868, every State limited marriage to one man and one woman, and no one doubted the constitutionality of doing so. That resolves these cases....

But the Court ends this debate, in an opinion lacking even a thin veneer of law. Buried beneath the mummeries and straining-to-be-memorable passages of the opinion is a candid and startling assertion: No matter what it was the People ratified, the Fourteenth Amendment protects those rights that the Judiciary, in its “reasoned judgment,” thinks the Fourteenth Amendment ought to protect....

Judges are selected precisely for their skill as lawyers; whether they reflect the policy views of a particular constituency is not (or should not be) relevant. Not surprisingly then, the Federal Judiciary is hardly a cross-section of America. Take, for example, this Court, which consists of only nine men and women, all of them successful lawyers who studied at Harvard or Yale Law School. Four of the nine are natives of New York City. Eight of them grew up in east- and west-coast States. Only one hails from the vast expanse in-between. Not a single Southwesterner or even, to tell the truth, a genuine Westerner (California does not count). Not a single evangelical Christian (a group that comprises about one quarter of Americans), or even a Protestant of any denomination. The strikingly unrepresentative character of the body voting on today’s social upheaval would be irrelevant if they were functioning as judges, answering the legal question whether the American people had ever ratified a constitutional provision that was understood to proscribe the traditional definition of marriage. But of course the Justices in today’s majority are not voting on that basis; they say they are not. And to allow the policy question of same-sex marriage to be considered and resolved by a select, patrician, highly unrepresentative panel of nine is to violate a principle even more fundamental than no taxation without representation: no social transformation without representation.

II

But what really astounds is the hubris reflected in today’s judicial Putsch. The five Justices who compose today’s majority are entirely comfortable concluding that every State violated the Constitution for all of the 135 years between the Fourteenth Amendment's ratification and Massachusetts' permitting of same-sex marriages in 2003. They have discovered in the Fourteenth Amendment a "fundamental right" overlooked by every person alive at the time of ratification, and almost everyone else in the time since. They see what lesser legal minds—minds like Thomas Cooley, John Marshall Harlan, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., Learned Hand, Louis Brandeis, William Howard Taft, Benjamin Cardozo, Hugo Black, Felix Frankfurter, Robert Jackson, and Henry Friendly—could not. They are certain that the People ratified the Fourteenth Amendment to bestow on them the power to remove questions from the democratic process when that is called for by their "reasoned judgment." These Justices know that limiting marriage to one man and one woman is contrary to reason; they know that an institution as old as government itself, and accepted by every nation in history until 15 years ago, cannot possibly be supported by anything other than ignorance or bigotry. And they are willing to say that any citizen who does not agree with that, who adheres to what was, until 15 years ago, the unanimous judgment of all generations and all societies, stands against the Constitution....

* * *

Hubris is sometimes defined as o'erweening pride; and pride, we know, goeth before a fall. The Judiciary is the "least dangerous" of the federal branches because it has "neither Force nor Will, but merely judgment; and must ultimately depend upon the aid of the executive arm" and the States, "even for the efficacy of its judgments." With each decision of ours that takes from the People a question properly left to them—with each decision that is unabashedly based not on law, but on the "reasoned judgment" of a bare majority of this Court—we move one step closer to being reminded of our impotence.

JUSTICE THOMAS, with whom JUSTICE SCALIA joins, dissenting....

II

Even if the doctrine of substantive due process were somehow defensible—it is not—petitioners still would not have a claim. To invoke the protection of the Due Process Clause at all—whether under a theory of "substantive" or "procedural" due process—a party must first identify a deprivation of "life, liberty, or property." The majority claims these state laws deprive petitioners of "liberty," but the concept of "liberty" it conjures up bears no resemblance to any plausible meaning of that word as it is used in the Due Process Clauses....

Even assuming that the "liberty" in those Clauses encompasses something more than freedom from physical restraint, it would not include the types of rights claimed by the majority. In the American legal tradition, liberty has long been understood as individual freedom from governmental action, not as a right to a particular governmental entitlement....

III...

Aside from undermining the political processes that protect our liberty, the majority's decision threatens the religious liberty our Nation has long sought to protect....

In our society, marriage is not simply a governmental institution; it is a religious institution as well. Today's decision might change the former, but it cannot change the latter. It appears all but inevitable that the two will come into conflict, particularly as individuals and churches are confronted with demands to participate in and endorse civil marriages between same-sex couples....

JUSTICE ALITO, with whom JUSTICE SCALIA and JUSTICE THOMAS join, dissenting....

II

Attempting to circumvent the problem presented by the newness of the right found in these cases, the majority claims that the issue is the right to equal treatment. Noting that marriage is a fundamental right, the majority argues that a State has no valid reason for denying that right to same-sex couples. This reasoning is dependent upon a particular understanding of the purpose of civil marriage. Although the Court expresses the point in loftier terms, its argument is that the fundamental purpose of marriage is to promote the well-being of those who choose to marry. Marriage provides emotional fulfillment and the promise of support in times of need. And by benefiting persons who choose to wed, marriage indirectly benefits society because persons who live in stable, fulfilling, and supportive relationships make better citizens. It is for these reasons, the argument goes, that States encourage and formalize marriage, confer special benefits on married persons, and also impose some special obligations. This understanding of the States' reasons for recognizing marriage enables the majority to argue that same-sex marriage serves the States' objectives in the same way as opposite-sex marriage.

This understanding of marriage, which focuses almost entirely on the happiness of persons who choose to marry, is shared by many people today, but it is not the traditional one. For millennia, marriage was inextricably linked to the one thing that only an opposite-sex couple can do: procreate....

If this traditional understanding of the purpose of marriage does not ring true to all ears today, that is probably because the tie between marriage and procreation has frayed. Today, for instance, more than 40% of all children in this country are born to unmarried women. This development undoubtedly is both a cause and a result of changes in our society's understanding of marriage.

While, for many, the attributes of marriage in 21st-century America have changed, those States that do not want to recognize same-sex marriage have not yet given up on the traditional understanding. They worry that by officially abandoning the older understanding, they may contribute to marriage's further decay. It is far beyond the outer reaches of this Court's authority to say that a State may not adhere to the understanding of marriage that has long prevailed, not just in this country and others with similar cultural roots, but also in a great variety of countries and cultures all around the globe....

III...

[Today's decision] will be used to vilify Americans who are unwilling to assent to the new orthodoxy. In the course of its opinion, the majority compares traditional marriage laws to laws that denied equal treatment for African-Americans and women. The implications of this analogy will be exploited by those who are determined to stamp out every vestige of dissent.

Perhaps recognizing how its reasoning may be used, the majority attempts, toward the end of its opinion, to reassure those who oppose same-sex marriage that their rights of conscience will be protected. We will soon see whether this proves to be true. I assume that those who cling to old beliefs will be able to whisper their thoughts in the recesses of their homes, but if they repeat those views in public, they will risk being labeled as bigots and treated as such by governments, employers, and schools.

The system of federalism established by our Constitution provides a way for people with different beliefs to live together in a single nation. If the issue of same-sex marriage had been left to the people of the States, it is likely that some States would recognize same-sex marriage and others would not. It is also possible that some States would tie recognition to protection for conscience rights. The majority today makes that impossible. By imposing its own views on the entire country, the majority facilitates the marginalization of the many Americans who have traditional ideas. Recalling the harsh treatment of gays and lesbians in the past, some may think that turnabout is fair play. But if that sentiment prevails, the Nation will experience bitter and lasting wounds.

Today's decision will also have a fundamental effect on this Court and its ability to uphold the rule of law. If a bare majority of Justices can invent a new right and impose that right on the rest of the country, the only real limit on what future majorities will be able to do is their own sense of what those with political power and cultural influence are willing to tolerate. Even enthusiastic supporters of same-sex marriage should worry about the scope of the power that today's majority claims.

Today's decision shows that decades of attempts to restrain this Court's abuse of its authority have failed. A lesson that some will take from today's decision is that preaching about the proper method of interpreting the Constitution or the virtues of judicial self-restraint and humility cannot compete with the temptation to achieve what is viewed as a noble end by any practicable means. I do not doubt that my colleagues in the majority sincerely see in the Constitution a vision of liberty that happens to coincide with their own. But this sincerity is cause for concern, not comfort. What it evidences is the deep and perhaps irremediable corruption of our legal culture's conception of constitutional interpretation.

Most Americans—understandably—will cheer or lament today's decision because of their views on the issue of same-sex marriage. But all Americans, whatever their thinking on that issue, should worry about what the majority's claim of power portends.

Note: A Right to Same-Sex Marriage

1. Pavan. In Pavan v. Smith, 137 S. Ct. 2075 (2017), the Court in a per curiam opinion summarily reversed a state court decision upholding a statute that prohibited a same-sex couple from listing the nonbiological parent on a child's birth certificate in circumstances where the parent would have been listed if the spouse had been of the opposite sex. Justice Gorsuch, joined by Justices Thomas and Alito, filed a dissenting opinion.

2. The argument from democracy. Chief Justice Roberts accuses the majority of "stealing this issue from the people." Is this criticism fair? Note the polling data summarized above indicating that large majorities of Americans believe that same-sex marriage should be permitted. Note as well that constitutional provisions outlawing same-sex marriage in many states prevented majorities from legalizing same-sex marriages. Is it a sufficient answer to the latter point that these amendments were put in place by majorities or supermajorities?

3. The argument from moral disagreement. Justice Alito claims that by accepting the plaintiffs' equal protection argument, the Court is necessarily endorsing one view of marriage and rejecting another. This is so because if the purpose of marriage is procreation, same-sex and opposite-sex couples are not relevantly similar. But doesn't Justice Alito's rejection of the argument also entail the endorsement of a particular view of marriage? If the purpose of marriage is "self-fulfillment," then how are same-sex and opposite-sex marriages relevantly different?

Justice Alito also argues that if the Court had left the issue to the political process "some States would tie recognition [of same-sex marriage] to protection for conscience rights" and that "the majority today makes that impossible." Does anything in the Court's opinion require states to enact measures forcing private individuals to recognize same-sex marriages or prevent states from establishing "conscience rights" as an exception to antidiscrimination statutes?

4. Plural marriages. Does the Court have an answer to Chief Justice Roberts's contention that its argument entails constitutional protection for plural marriages? Note that the Court's opinion is focused on the individual right to marry. If it focused instead on the status of gay men and lesbians as a relevant social group, could the problem of plural marriages be distinguished?

5. Dignity for the unmarried. According to the Court, a failure to recognize same-sex marriage causes gay men and lesbians "pain and humiliation" and denies them "equal dignity in the eyes of the law." Does the Court's own glorification of marriage as "a keystone of our social order" denigrate the gay men and lesbians as well as straight people who reject or are unable to take advantage of the institution of marriage? For criticisms of same-sex marriage from within the gay community, see M. Warner, The Trouble with Normal: Sex, Politics, and the Ethics of Queer Life 81–141 (1999); Polikoff, We Will Get What We Ask For: Why Legalizing Gay and Lesbian Marriage Will Not "Dismantle the Legal Structure of Gender in Every Marriage," 79 Va. L. Rev. 1535 (1993).

4. Other Family and Privacy Interests

The modern substantive due process decisions examined above—Griswold, Eisenstadt, Roe, and Obergefell, for example—have all involved the freedom to decide whether to marry or have a child. But modern substantive due process is not so limited.

MOORE v. CITY OF EAST CLEVELAND, 431 U.S. 494 (1977). In Moore, the Court invalidated a city ordinance limiting occupancy of any dwelling unit to members of the same “family,” where the ordinance narrowly defined “family” as including only “a few categories of related individuals.” Appellant lived with her son, Dale, and her two grandsons, Dale, Jr., and John. Under the ordinance, John could not live in the home because he was not “sufficiently related” to his uncle, Dale, and his cousin, Dale, Jr., to constitute a “family” within the meaning of the ordinance. In a plurality opinion, Justice Powell, joined by Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun, concluded that the ordinance violated the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment:

“The city argues that our decision in Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas, 416 U.S. 1 (1974), requires us to sustain the ordinance attacked here. Belle Terre, like East Cleveland, imposed limits on the types of groups that could occupy a single dwelling unit. [We] sustained the Belle Terre ordinance on the ground that it bore a rational relationship to permissible state objectives. But one overriding factor sets this case apart from Belle Terre. The ordinance there affected only unrelated individuals. It expressly allowed all who were related by ‘blood, adoption, or marriage’ to live [together]. East Cleveland, in contrast, has chosen to regulate the occupancy of its housing by slicing deeply into the family itself. [The ordinance] selects certain categories of relatives who may live together and declares that others may not. In particular, it makes a crime of a grandmother’s choice to live with her grandson in circumstances like those presented here....

“Our decisions establish that the Constitution protects the sanctity of the family precisely because the institution of the family is deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition. It is through the family that we inculcate and pass down many of our most cherished values, moral and cultural. [And ours] is by no means a tradition limited to respect for [the] nuclear family. The tradition of uncles, aunts, cousins, and especially grandparents sharing a household along with parents has roots equally venerable and equally deserving of constitutional recognition. [Out] of choice, necessity, or a sense of family responsibility, it has been common for close relatives to draw [together]. Especially in times of adversity [the] broader family has tended to come together for mutual [sustenance]. [The] choice of relatives in this degree of kinship to live together may not lightly be denied by the State. [The] Constitution prevents East Cleveland from standardizing its children—and its adults—by forcing all to live in certain narrowly defined family patterns.”

Justice Stevens concurred in the result on the ground that the challenged ordinance “constitutes a taking of property without due process and without just compensation.”

Justice Stewart, joined by Justice Rehnquist, Justice White, and Chief Justice Burger each filed dissenting opinions.

Note: Nontraditional Association

1. Distinguishing Belle Terre and Moore. Consider whether Belle Terre is distinguishable from Moore because the ordinance upheld in Belle Terre “allowed all who were related by ‘blood, adoption, or marriage’ to live [together].” If this distinction holds, it must be because the Court embraces a traditional definition of “family.” Is its position consistent with its insistence on a nontraditional definition of “marriage” in Obergefell? After Belle Terre and Moore, could a city constitutionally prohibit “significant others” from living together?

2. The Level of Generality. Whether a relationship is “traditional” depends in part on the level of generality at which tradition is defined. If the tradition is defined very narrowly, the legislation at issue will almost always simply illustrate the tradition, thereby depriving the appeal to tradition of any power to check legislative action. But if the tradition is defined very broadly, judges will be able to appeal to it to invalidate whatever legislation they choose to characterize as inconsistent with tradition.

3. Michael H. The problem was the subject of an important exchange between Justices Scalia and Brennan in Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110 (1989). A California statute provided that a child born to a married woman living with her husband is conclusively presumed to be a child of the marriage; this presumption has consequences for the visitation rights of the genetic father of such a child. A majority of the Court held that this statute did not violate the Constitution.

A plurality opinion by Justice Scalia said that, for the genetic father to have a liberty interest in establishing his paternity, that interest had to be both “fundamental” and “an interest traditionally protected by our society.” To the plurality, the relevant tradition involved “the historic respect—indeed, sanctity would not be too strong a term—traditionally accorded to the relationships that develop within the unitary family.” Because Michael H. was not part of such a unitary family, he had no interest of the necessary sort.

In a long footnote, Justice Scalia defended his reliance on “historical traditions specifically relating to the rights of an adulterous natural father, rather than [as Justice Brennan urged] inquiring more generally ‘whether parenthood is an interest that historically has received our attention and protection.’” He asked,

Why should the relevant category not be even more general—perhaps “family relationships”; or “personal relationships”; or even “emotional attachments in general”? Though [Justice Brennan] has no basis for the level of generality [he] would select, we do: We refer to the most specific level at which a relevant tradition protecting, or denying protection to, the asserted right can be identified. If [there] were no societal tradition, either way, regarding the rights of the natural father or a child adulterously conceived, we would have to consult and if possible reason from, the traditions regarding natural fathers in general. But there is such a more specific tradition, and it unqualifiedly denies protection to such a parent. Because [general] traditions provide such imprecise guidance, they permit judges to dictate rather than discern the society's views. [Although] assuredly having the virtue (if it be that) of leaving judges free to decide as they think best when the unanticipated occurs, a rule of law that binds neither by text nor by any particular, identifiable tradition, is no rule of law at all.

Although Justices O'Connor and Kennedy joined most of the plurality opinion, they specifically declined to join this footnote. Justice Brennan responded:

If we had looked to tradition with such specificity in past cases, many a decision would have reached a different result. [Eisenstadt; Griswold; Stanley v. Illinois, infra.] [The] plurality's interpretative method [ignores] the good reasons for limiting the role of "tradition" in interpreting the Constitution's deliberately capacious language. [By] suggesting that our sole function is to "discern the society's views," the plurality acts as if the only purpose of the Due Process Clause is to confirm the importance of interests already protected by a majority of the States. [In] construing the Fourteenth Amendment to offer shelter only to those interests specifically protected by historical practice, [the] plurality ignores the kind of society in which our Constitution exists. We are not an assimilative, homogeneous society, but a facilitative, pluralistic one, in which we must be willing to abide someone else's unfamiliar or even repellent practice because the same tolerant impulse protects our own idiosyncrasies. Even if we can agree [that] "family" and "parenthood" are part of the good life, it is absurd to assume that we can agree on the content of those terms and destructive to pretend that we do. In a community such as ours, "liberty" must include the freedom not to conform. The plurality today squashes this freedom by requiring specific approval from history before protecting anything in the name of liberty.

To Justice Brennan, the case merely involved the protection of "the interest of a parent and child in their relationship with each other."

Justice Stevens, who contributed the fifth vote to support the constitutionality of the California statute, agreed that Michael H. had a liberty interest but argued that the California statutes recognized that interest to the extent required by the due process clause.

Does Obergefell settle the dispute between Justices Scalia and Brennan?

4. Troxel. Compare Michael H. to Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000). Troxel involved a Washington statute that allowed any person to petition a court for visitation rights “at any time” and authorized the court to grant visitation rights whenever “visitation may serve the best interest of the child.” The Troxels had petitioned a court for the right to visit their grandchildren; the mother, a single parent, sought a limitation on visitation rights, which the court overrode, ordering significantly more visitation than the mother wanted. The Supreme Court held that the statute was unconstitutional as applied. The Court reaffirmed Meyer and Pierce, suggesting that the due process clause has a substantive component encompassing “the fundamental right of parents to make decisions concerning the care, custody, and control of their children.” The law at issue here infringed on this right, partly because it “is breathtakingly broad.” There is “no requirement that a court accord a parent’s decision that visitation would not be in the child’s best interest a presumption of validity or any weight whatever.” The decision to reject the mother’s judgment here “was based on precisely the type of mere disagreement we have just described and nothing more.” There was no finding that the parent was unfit, and thus the court’s framework “directly contravened the traditional presumption that a fit parent will act in the best interest of his or her child.” The Constitution required “at least some special weight to the parent’s own determination.” Nor did the mother ever seek “to cut off visitation entirely.” Justice Thomas concurred on the ground that neither party had argued “that our substantive due process cases were wrongly decided and that the original understanding of the Due Process Clause precludes judicial enforcement of unenumerated rights under that constitutional provision.”

Justice Stevens dissented on the ground that the statute was constitutional on its face. He emphasized that “there may be circumstances in which a child has a stronger interest at stake than mere protection from serious harm caused by the termination of visitation by a ‘person’ other than a parent.” Justice Scalia dissented on the ground that the Constitution does not protect the “unenumerated right” at issue in the case. Justice Kennedy also dissented, objecting to the Court’s “concept that the conventional nuclear family ought to establish the visitation standard for every domestic relations case.”

5. Reno and Stanley. In Reno v. Flores, 507 U.S. 292 (1993), the Court upheld against substantive due process challenge an Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) regulation authorizing the arrest and holding of alien juveniles unaccompanied by parents or other related adults. The juveniles claimed a right to be released to “responsible adults,” even if they were not family members. The Court doubted that “a child has a constitutional right not to be placed in a decent and humane custodial institution if there is available a responsible person unwilling to become the child’s legal guardian but willing to undertake temporary legal custody.” Because no fundamental right was involved —merely “the lesser” interest in being released into the custody of strangers—the Court required only a reasonable fit between the government purposes and the restriction in question. The Court said that the purpose of protecting juveniles was adequately advanced by the regulation in question, especially in light of the INS’s lack of child-placement expertise and the fact that aliens were involved.

Justice O’Connor, joined by Justice Souter, wrote a lengthy concurring opinion, stressing that children have a “core liberty interest in remaining free from institutional confinement,” that this freedom “is no narrower than an adult’s,” but that in this case “normal forms of custody,” such as parents, close relatives, or legal guardians, have been unavailable, and therefore the INS program survives constitutional scrutiny. Justice Stevens, joined by Justice Blackmun, dissented on the ground that the “interest in minimizing administrative costs is a patently inadequate justification for the detention of harmless children.”

In Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645 (1972), the Court described the facts in this way: “Joan Stanley lived with Peter Stanley intermittently for 18 years, during which time they had three children. [Then Joan Stanley died.] Under Illinois law, the children of unwed fathers [automatically] become wards of the State upon the death of the mother. [Stanley maintained] that he had never been shown to be an unfit parent and that since married fathers [could] not be deprived of their children without such a showing, he had been deprived of the equal protection of the laws.” The Court agreed. Justice White wrote:

[The] interest of a parent in the companionship, care, custody, and management of his or her children “come[s] to this Court with a momentum for respect lacking when appeal is made to liberties which derive merely from shifting economic arrangements.” The Court has frequently emphasized the importance of the family. [Nor] has the law refused to recognize those family relationships unlegitimized by a marriage ceremony. [“To] say that the test of equal protection should be the ‘legal’ rather than the biological relationship is to avoid the issue. For the Equal Protection Clause necessarily limits the authority of a State to draw such ‘legal’ lines as it chooses.”...

It may be [that] most unmarried fathers are unsuitable and neglectful parents. [But] all unmarried fathers are not in this category. [Given] the opportunity to make his case, Stanley may have been seen to be deserving of custody of his offspring. [Procedure] by presumption is always cheaper and easier than individualized determination. But when, as here, the procedure [needlessly] risks running roughshod over the important interests of both parent and child [it] cannot stand.

Justices Powell and Rehnquist did not participate.

5. The Right to Die

CRUZAN V. DIRECTOR, MISSOURI DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, 497 U.S. 261 (1991). Nancy Cruzan suffered a severe brain injury in a traffic accident and remained in a “persistent vegetative state”—a condition in which a person has motor reflexes but no significant cognitive functions. Doctors concluded that she had virtually no chance of regaining her mental faculties. Her parents asked state hospital officials to discontinue artificial nutrition and hydration procedures, an action that would cause death, but the officials refused without a court order. The Missouri Supreme Court held that because there was no clear and convincing evidence of Nancy’s desire to have life-sustaining treatment withdrawn under such circumstances, such an order would violate state law. The Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide whether the Constitution required the hospital to withdraw life-sustaining treatment under these circumstances

Chief Justice Rehnquist delivered the opinion of the Court: “[The] principle that a competent person has a constitutionally protected liberty interest in refusing unwanted medical treatment may be inferred from our prior decisions.

“Although we think the logic of [these] cases would embrace such a liberty interest, the dramatic consequences involved in refusal of such treatment would inform the inquiry as to whether the deprivation of that interest is constitutionally permissible. But for purposes of this case, we assume that the United States Constitution would grant a competent person a constitutionally protected right to refuse lifesaving hydration and nutrition.

“Petitioners go on to assert that an incompetent person should possess the same right in this respect as is possessed by a competent person. [The] difficulty with petitioners’ claim is that in a sense it begs the question: an incompetent person is not able to make an informed and voluntary choice to exercise a hypothetical right to refuse treatment or any other right. [Here], Missouri has in effect recognized that under certain circumstances a surrogate may act for the patient in electing to have hydration and nutrition withdrawn in such a way as to cause death, but it has established a procedural safeguard to assure that the action of the surrogate conforms as best it may to the wishes expressed by the patient while competent. Missouri requires that evidence of the incompetent's wishes as to withdrawal of treatment be proved by clear and convincing evidence. The question, then, is whether the United States Constitution forbids the establishment of this procedural requirement by the State. We hold that it does not.

"[Missouri] relies on its interest in the protection and preservation of human life, and there can be no gainsaying this interest. [The] majority of States in this country have laws imposing criminal penalties on one who assists another to commit suicide. We do not think a State is required to remain neutral in the face of an informed and voluntary decision by a physically-able adult to starve to death.

"But in the context presented here, a State has more particular interests at stake. The choice between life and death is a deeply personal decision of obvious and overwhelming finality. We believe Missouri may legitimately seek to safeguard the personal element of this choice through the imposition of heightened evidentiary requirements....

"No doubt is engendered by anything in this record but that Nancy Cruzan's mother and father are loving and caring parents. If the State is required by the United States Constitution to repose a right of "substituted judgment" with anyone, the Cruzans would surely qualify. But we do not think the Due Process Clause requires the State to repose judgment on these matters with anyone but the patient herself."

Justice O'Connor wrote a concurring opinion: "[As] the Court notes the liberty interest in refusing medical treatment flows from decisions involving the State's invasions into the body. Because our notions of liberty are inextricably entwined with our idea of physical freedom and self-determination, the Court has often deemed state incursions into the body repugnant to the interests protected by the Due Process Clause....

"[The] State's imposition of medical treatment on an unwilling competent adult necessarily involves some form of restraint and intrusion. [Artificial] feeding cannot readily be distinguished from other forms of medical treatment.

"[I] also write separately to emphasize that the Court does not today decide the issue whether a State must also give effect to the decisions of a surrogate decisionmaker. In my view, such a duty may well be constitutionally required to protect the patient's liberty interest in refusing medical treatment."

Justice Scalia also wrote a concurring opinion. Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall and Blackmun, and Justice Stevens wrote dissenting opinions.

Washington v. Glucksberg

521 U.S. 707 (1997)

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented in this case is whether Washington's prohibition against "caus[ing]" or "aid[ing]" a suicide offends the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. We hold that it does not....

I

We begin, as we do in all due-process cases, by examining our Nation's history, legal traditions, and practices. In almost every State—indeed, in almost every western democracy—it is a crime to assist a suicide. The States' assisted-suicide bans are not innovations. Rather, they are longstanding expressions of the States' commitment to the protection and preservation of all human life. [Indeed], opposition to and condemnation of suicide—and, therefore, of assisting suicide—are consistent and enduring themes of our philosophical, legal, and cultural heritages....

More specifically, for over 700 years, the Anglo-American common-law tradition has punished or otherwise disapproved of both suicide and assisting suicide....

Though deeply rooted, the States' assisted-suicide bans have in recent years been reexamined and, generally, reaffirmed. Because of advances in medicine and technology, Americans today are increasingly likely to die in institutions, from chronic illnesses. Public concern and democratic action are therefore sharply focused on how best to protect dignity and independence at the end of life, with the result that there have been many significant changes in state laws and in the attitudes these laws reflect. Many States, for example, now permit "living wills," surrogate health-care decisionmaking, and the withdrawal or refusal of life-sustaining medical treatment. [At] the same time, however, voters and legislators continue for the most part to reaffirm their States' prohibitions on assisting suicide....

Thus, the States are currently engaged in serious, thoughtful examinations of physician-assisted suicide and other similar issues....

II

[Our] established method of substantive-due-process analysis has two primary features: First, we have regularly observed that the Due Process Clause specially protects those fundamental rights and liberties which are, objectively, “deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition,” and “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty,” such that “neither liberty nor justice would exist if they were sacrificed,” Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319, 325, 326 (1937). Second, we have required in substantive-due-process cases a “careful description” of the asserted fundamental liberty interest. Our Nation’s history, legal traditions, and practices thus provide the crucial “guideposts for responsible decisionmaking,” that direct and restrain our exposition of the Due Process Clause....

[This] Court’s substantive-due-process jurisprudence, has been a process whereby the outlines of the “liberty” specially protected by the Fourteenth Amendment—never fully clarified, to be sure, and perhaps not capable of being fully clarified—have at least been carefully refined by concrete examples involving fundamental rights found to be deeply rooted in our legal tradition. This approach tends to rein in the subjective elements that are necessarily present in due-process judicial review. In addition, by establishing a threshold requirement—that a challenged state action implicate a fundamental right—before requiring more than a reasonable relation to a legitimate state interest to justify the action, it avoids the need for complex balancing of competing interests in every case.

[We] now inquire whether this asserted right has any place in our Nation’s traditions. Here, as discussed above, we are confronted with a consistent and almost universal tradition that has long rejected the asserted right, and continues explicitly to reject it today, even for terminally ill, mentally competent adults. To hold for respondents, we would have to reverse centuries of legal doctrine and practice, and strike down the considered policy choice of almost every State. [Respondents] contend, however, that the liberty interest they assert is consistent with this Court’s substantive-due-process line of cases, if not with this Nation’s history and practice. Pointing to Casey and Cruzan, respondents read our jurisprudence in this area as reflecting a general tradition of “self-sovereignty,” and as teaching that the “liberty” protected by the Due Process Clause includes “basic and intimate exercises of personal autonomy.” According to respondents, our liberty jurisprudence, and the broad, individualistic principles it reflects, protects the “liberty of competent, terminally ill adults to make end-of-life decisions free of undue government interference.”...

[The] right assumed in Cruzan [was] not simply deduced from abstract concepts of personal autonomy. Given the common-law rule that forced medication was a battery, and the long legal tradition protecting the decision to refuse unwanted medical treatment, our assumption was entirely consistent with this Nation's history and constitutional traditions. The decision to commit suicide with the assistance of another may be just as personal and profound as the decision to refuse unwanted medical treatment, but it has never enjoyed similar legal protection. Indeed, the two acts are widely and reasonably regarded as quite distinct.

[Respondents] also rely on Casey. [The] opinion moved from the recognition that liberty necessarily includes freedom of conscience and belief about ultimate considerations to the observation that "though the abortion decision may originate within the zone of conscience and belief, it is more than a philosophic exercise." That many of the rights and liberties protected by the Due Process Clause sound in personal autonomy does not warrant the sweeping conclusion that any and all important, intimate, and personal decisions are so protected.

[The] history of the law's treatment of assisted suicide in this country has been and continues to be one of the rejection of nearly all efforts to permit it. That being the case, our decisions lead us to conclude that the asserted "right" to assistance in committing suicide is not a fundamental liberty interest protected by the Due Process Clause. The Constitution also requires, however, that Washington's assisted-suicide ban be rationally related to legitimate government interests. This requirement is unquestionably met here.

[The Court holds that Washington has a legitimate interest in the preservation of human life, in dealing with suicide as a public health problem, in protecting the ethics and integrity of the medical profession, in protecting vulnerable groups against subtle coercion, and in preventing a slide toward voluntary or involuntary euthanasia.]

JUSTICE O'CONNOR, concurring.

[I] join the Court's opinions because I agree that there is no generalized right to "commit suicide." But respondents urge us to address the narrower question whether a mentally competent person who is experiencing great suffering has a constitutionally cognizable interest in controlling the circumstances of his or her imminent death. I see no need to reach that question in the context of the facial challenges to the New York and Washington laws at issue here. [There] is no dispute that dying patients in Washington and New York can obtain palliative care, even when doing so would hasten their deaths. The difficulty in defining terminal illness and the risk that a dying patient's request for assistance in ending his or her life might not be truly voluntary justifies the prohibitions on assisted suicide we uphold here.

JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring in the judgments.

[Today], the Court decides that Washington's statute prohibiting assisted suicide is not invalid "on its face," that is to say, in all or most cases in which it might be applied. That holding, however, does not foreclose the possibility that some applications of the statute might well be invalid....

[Although] as a general matter the State's interest in the contributions each person may make to society outweighs the person's interest in ending her life, this interest does not have the same force for a terminally ill patient faced not with the choice of whether to live, only of how to die. Allowing the individual, rather than the State, to make judgments "about the 'quality' of life that a particular individual may enjoy" does not mean that the lives of terminally-ill, disabled people have less value than the lives of those who are healthy. Rather, it gives proper recognition to the individual's interest in choosing a final chapter that accords with her life story, rather than one that demeans her values and poisons memories of her.

[Similarly,] the State's legitimate interests in preventing suicide, protecting the vulnerable from coercion and abuse, and preventing euthanasia are less significant in this context. I agree that the State has a compelling interest in preventing persons from committing suicide because of depression, or coercion by third parties. But the State's legitimate interest in preventing abuse does not apply to an individual who is not victimized by abuse, who is not suffering from depression, and who makes a rational and voluntary decision to seek assistance in dying....

JUSTICE SOUTER, concurring in the judgments....

[Justice Souter discusses the state's interest in "protecting terminally ill patients from involuntary suicide and euthanasia, both voluntary and nonvoluntary." He worries that the line between the patient's exercise of "responsible capacity" and her surrender to outside pressure might be difficult to enforce and that physicians might not fully respect the distinction.]

Respondents propose an answer to all this, the answer of state regulation with teeth. Legislation proposed in several States, for example, would authorize physician-assisted suicide but require two qualified physicians to confirm the patient's diagnosis, prognosis, and competence; and would mandate that the patient make repeated requests witnessed by at least two others over a specified time span; and would impose reporting requirements and criminal penalties for various acts of coercion.

But at least at this moment there are reasons for caution in predicting the effectiveness of the teeth proposed. Respondents' proposals, as it turns out, sound much like the guidelines now in place in the Netherlands, the only place where experience with physician-assisted suicide and euthanasia has yielded empirical evidence about how such regulations might affect actual practice. [There] is [a] substantial dispute today about what the Dutch experience shows.

[The] experimentation that should be out of the question in constitutional adjudication displacing legislative judgments is entirely proper, as well as highly desirable, when the legislative power addresses an emerging issue like assisted suicide. The Court should accordingly stay its hand to allow reasonable legislative consideration. While I do not decide for all time that respondents' claim should not be recognized, I acknowledge the legislative institutional competence as the better one to deal with that claim at this time.

JUSTICE GINSBURG, concurring in the judgments.

I concur in the Court's judgments in these cases substantially for the reasons stated by Justice O'Connor in her concurring opinion.

JUSTICE BREYER, concurring in the judgments.

[I] would not reject the respondents' claim without considering a different formulation, for which our legal tradition may provide greater support. That formulation would use words roughly like a "right to die with dignity." But irrespective of the exact words used, at its core would lie personal control over the manner of death, professional medical assistance, and the avoidance of unnecessary and severe physical suffering—combined.

[I] do not believe, however, that this Court need or now should decide whether or a not such a right is "fundamental." That is because, in my view, the avoidance of severe physical pain (connected with death) would have to comprise an essential part of any successful claim and because, as Justice O'Connor points out, the laws before us do not force a dying person to undergo that kind of pain.

[Were] the legal circumstances different—for example, were state law to prevent the provision of palliative care, including the administration of drugs as needed to avoid pain at the end of life—then the law's impact upon serious and otherwise unavoidable physical pain (accompanying death) would be more directly at issue. And as Justice O'Connor suggests, the Court might have to revisit its conclusions in these cases.

Note: The Right to Die

1. The distinction between active and passive. In Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 798 (1997), a companion case to Glucksberg, the Court rejected an equal protection challenge to the distinction made by New York law between doctor-assisted suicide (prohibited) and the patient's refusal of life-saving treatment (permitted). Is the distinction sensible?

2. What is the precise holding of Cruzan? The Court's opinion states that “[The] principle that a competent person has a constitutionally protected liberty interest in refusing unwanted medical treatment may be inferred from our prior decisions” and that “[the] choice between life and death is a deeply personal decision.” But the opinion also states that “there can be no gainsaying” the state’s interest “in the protection and preservation of human life” and that “[a] State is required [not] to remain neutral in the face of an informed and voluntary decision by a physically-able adult to starve to death.” Which way is it? Note also Justice O’Connor’s concurring opinion and the fact that her vote was necessary to achieve a majority. If Cruzan had been competent, or if she had clearly indicated her preference for the termination of treatment before she became incompetent, would she have a constitutional right to terminate treatment? On the facts of Cruzan is there a plausible case that it would be unconstitutional to terminate treatment?

3. What is the precise holding of Glucksberg? Suppose that you were a lawyer representing a terminally ill patient in uncontrolled pain. After Glucksberg, what argument could you make for a right to palliative care that hastened death? What argument could you make for a right to suicide that was not doctor-assisted?

4. Glucksberg and Obergefell. Recall the Court’s treatment of Glucksberg in Obergefell: “[Glucksberg] did insist that liberty under the Due Process Clause must be defined in a most circumscribed manner, with central reference to specific historical practices. Yet while that approach may have been appropriate for the asserted right there involved (physician-assisted suicide), it is inconsistent with the approach this Court has used in discussing other fundamental rights, including marriage and intimacy.” Is there a good reason why “specific historical practices” should play a different role with respect to different liberties? If not, does Obergefell implicitly overrule Glucksberg?

G. PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS

The text of the due process clause—“nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law”—suggests that the clause is concerned above all with procedure. This section explores the question when the clause requires procedural safeguards to accompany substantive choices. That question is an important aspect of the problem of identifying “implied” fundamental rights. As the preceding materials suggest, the terms “liberty” and “property” are not self-defining. In exploring the materials that follow, consider how and why the procedural and substantive contexts might differ.

1. Liberty and Property Interests

Before Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970), the Court defined liberty and property interests by reference to the common law. If government took someone’s property, or invaded his bodily integrity, the due process clause would require some kind of hearing. But the clause was inapplicable if government denied an individual some public benefit—employment, welfare, or some other advantageous opportunity. See, e.g., Bailey v. Richardson, 182 F.2d 46 (D.C. Cir. 1950), aff’d by an equally divided Court, 341 U.S. 918 (1951) (no hearing required for dismissal from government employment). This conclusion was a form of the traditional right/privilege distinction. “[Advantageous] relations with the government were mere ‘privileges’ or ‘gratuities,’ not legally protected rights. [But] with the expansion of the governmental role, it became less and less tolerable that the government should wield the degree of potentially arbitrary power over the lives of individuals implied by this doctrine.” Stewart, The Reformation of American Administrative Law, 88 Harv. L. Rev. 1667, 1717–1718 (1975).

Reich, The New Property, 73 Yale L.J. 733 (1963), was an important critique of the original framework. According to Reich, that framework was anachronistic in a period in which individual security frequently depended on advantageous relationships with the government—insurance, Social Security benefits, employment, licenses, welfare, and so forth. In Reich’s view, it was necessary to create a “new property” that would attach the traditional procedural safeguards to these benefits in order to furnish in the modern era the same kind of security promoted by “old property” under a common law regime. The idea was that without such safeguards, those dependent on governmental benefits would be subject to the arbitrary will of public officials.

The Supreme Court accepted Reich’s approach in Goldberg v. Kelly, supra. The Court held that a welfare recipient’s interest in continued receipt of welfare benefits was a “statutory entitlement” that amounted to “property” within the meaning of the due process clause. The Court referred to the “brutal need” of welfare recipients and held that a fairly elaborate hearing was required before benefits could be terminated. But what interests amount to “liberty” or “property” once it is concluded that at least some statutory benefits amount to rights?

BOARD OF REGENTS OF STATE COLLEGES v. ROTH, 408 U.S. 564 (1972). Roth was hired for a one-year term as assistant professor at Wisconsin State University. Under state law, he did not have tenure. The president of the university informed Roth that he would not be rehired; no explanation was given for the decision, and there was no opportunity to challenge it. Roth alleged that the failure to hold a hearing violated the due process clause. In an opinion by Justice Stewart, the Court rejected Roth’s claim:

“The requirements of procedural due process apply only to the deprivation of interests encompassed by the Fourteenth Amendment’s protection of liberty and property. [The] range of interests protected by procedural due process is not infinite.

“The District Court decided that procedural due process guarantees apply in this case by assessing and balancing the weights of the particular interests involved. [Undeniably,] the respondent’s re-employment prospects were of major concern to him—concern that we surely cannot say was insignificant. And a weighing process has long been a part of any determination of the form of hearing required in particular situations by procedural due process. But, to determine whether due process requirements apply in the first place, we must look not to the weight, but to the nature of the interest at stake.

“‘Liberty’ and ‘property’ are broad and majestic terms. They are among the ‘[g]reat [constitutional] concepts...purposely left to gather meaning from experience....[T]hey relate to the whole domain of social and economic fact, and the statesmen who founded this Nation knew too well that only a stagnant society remains unchanged.’ For that reason, the Court has fully and finally rejected the wooden distinction between ‘rights’ and ‘privileges’ that once seemed to govern the applicability of procedural due process rights. The Court has also made clear that the property interests protected by procedural due process extend well beyond actual ownership of real estate, chattels, or money.

“While this Court has not attempted to define with exactness the liberty [guaranteed] [by the fourteenth amendment], the term [denotes] not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized...as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men. In a Constitution for a free people, there can be no doubt that the meaning of ‘liberty’ must be broad indeed.

“The Fourteenth Amendment’s procedural protection of property is a safeguard of the security of interests that a person has already acquired in specific benefits. These interests—property interests—may take many forms.

“Thus, the Court has held that a person receiving welfare benefits under statutory and administrative standards defining eligibility for them has an interest in continued receipt of those benefits that is safeguarded by procedural due process. [Goldberg.] [To] have a property interest in a benefit, a person clearly must have more than an abstract need or desire for it. He must have more than a unilateral expectation of it. He must, instead, have a legitimate claim of entitlement to it. It is a purpose of the ancient institution of property to protect those claims upon which people rely in their daily lives, reliance that must not be arbitrarily undermined. It is a purpose of the constitutional right to a hearing to provide an opportunity for a person to vindicate those claims.

“Property interests, of course, are not created by the Constitution. Rather, they are created and their dimensions are defined by existing rules or understandings that stem from an independent source such as state law—rules or understandings that secure certain benefits and that support claims of entitlement to those benefits.

“Just as [in Goldberg] the welfare recipient’s ‘property’ interest in welfare payments was created and defined by statutory terms, so the respondent’s ‘property’ interest in employment at Wisconsin State University-Oshkosh was created and defined by the terms of his appointment. [The] important fact in this case is that they specifically provided that the respondent’s employment was to terminate on June 30. They did not provide for contract renewal absent ‘sufficient cause.’ Indeed, they made no provision for renewal whatsoever.

“Thus, the terms of the respondent’s appointment secured absolutely no interest in re-employment for the next year. They supported absolutely no possible claim of entitlement to re-employment. Nor, significantly, was there any state statute or University rule or policy that secured his interest in re-employment or that created any legitimate claim to it. In these circumstances, the respondent surely had an abstract concern in being rehired, but he did not have a property interest sufficient to require the University authorities to give him a hearing when they declined to renew his contract of employment.”

Justice Marshall dissented: “In my view, every citizen who applies for a government job is entitled to it unless the government can establish some reason for denying the employment. This is the ‘property’ right that I believe is protected by the Fourteenth Amendment and that cannot be denied ‘without due process of law.' And it is also liberty—liberty to work—which is the ‘very essence of the personal freedom and opportunity’ secured by the Fourteenth Amendment....”

PERRY v. SINDERMANN, 408 U.S. 593 (1972). This was a companion case to Roth. Sindermann was a professor at Odessa Junior College whose contract, like Roth’s, was not renewed. Sindermann claimed that Odessa had a de facto tenure program. The college had stated in a faculty guide that, despite the absence of an actual tenure system, it “wishes each faculty member to feel that he has permanent tenure so long as his teaching services are satisfactory and as long as he displays a cooperative attitude.” According to Sindermann, there was a mutual expectation that he would be renewed each year. Justice Stewart wrote the opinion of the Court:

“The respondent’s lack of formal contractual or tenure security in continued employment at Odessa Junior College [may] not be entirely dispositive.

“[The] respondent’s allegations [raise] a genuine issue as to his interest in continued employment at Odessa Junior College. He alleged that this interest, though not secured by a formal contractual tenure provision, was secured by a no less binding understanding fostered by the college administration....

“[A] written contract with an explicit tenure provision clearly is evidence of a formal understanding that supports a teacher’s claim of entitlement to continued employment unless sufficient ‘cause’ is shown. Yet absence of such an explicit contractual provision may not always foreclose the possibility that a teacher has a ‘property’ interest in re-employment....

“A teacher, like the respondent, who has held his position for a number of years, might be able to show from the circumstances of this service—and from other relevant facts—that he has a legitimate claim of entitlement to job tenure.”

Cleveland Board of Education v. Loudermill

470 U.S. 532 (1985)

JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

In these cases we consider what pretermination process must be accorded a public employee who can be discharged only for cause.

In 1979 the Cleveland Board of Education [hired] respondent James Loudermill as a security guard. On his job application, Loudermill stated that he had never been convicted of a felony. Eleven months later, as part of a routine examination of his employment records, the Board discovered that in fact Loudermill had been convicted of grand larceny in 1968. By letter dated November 3, 1980, the Board's Business Manager informed Loudermill that he had been dismissed because of his dishonesty in filling out the employment application. Loudermill was not afforded an opportunity to respond to the charge of dishonesty or to challenge his dismissal. On November 13, the Board adopted a resolution officially approving the discharge.

Under Ohio law, Loudermill was a "classified civil servant." [Such] employees can be terminated only for cause, and may obtain administrative review if discharged. [Plaintiff's] federal constitutional claim depends on his having had a property right in continued employment. [If he did,] the State could not deprive [him] of this property without due process.

Property interests are not created by the Constitution, "they are created and their dimensions are defined by existing rules or understandings that stem from an independent source such as state law...." [Roth.] [The] Ohio statute plainly creates such an interest. Respondents were "classified civil service employees," Ohio Rev. Code Ann. §124.11 (1984), entitled to retain their positions "during good behavior and efficient service," who could not be dismissed "except... for...misfeasance, malfeasance, or nonfeasance in office." The statute plainly supports the conclusion, reached by both lower courts, that respondents possessed property rights in continued employment. [The lower court thus required a hearing.]

The [Board] argues, however, that the property right is defined by, and conditioned on, the legislature's choice of procedures for its deprivation. [The] Board stresses that in addition to specifying the grounds for termination, the statute sets out procedures by which termination may take place. The procedures were adhered to in these cases. According to petitioner, "[t]o require additional procedures would in effect expand the scope of the property interest itself." This argument, which was accepted by the District Court, has its genesis in the plurality opinion in Arnett v. Kennedy, 416 U.S. 134 (1974). Arnett involved a challenge by a former federal employee to the procedures by which he was dismissed. The plurality reasoned that where the legislation conferring the substantive right also sets out the procedural mechanism for enforcing that right, the two cannot be separated:

The employee's statutorily defined right is not a guarantee against removal without cause in the abstract, but such a guarantee as enforced by the procedures which Congress has designated for the determination of cause.

...[W]here the grant of a substantive right is inextricably intertwined with the limitations on the procedures which are to be employed in determining that right, a litigant in the position of appellee must take the bitter with the sweet.

This view garnered three votes in Arnett, but was specifically rejected by the other six Justices. [It] is [now] settled that the “bitter with the sweet” approach misconceives the constitutional guarantee. [The] point is straightforward: the Due Process Clause provides that certain substantive rights—life, liberty, and property—cannot be deprived except pursuant to constitutionally adequate procedures. The categories of substance and procedure are distinct. Were the rule otherwise, the Clause would be reduced to a mere tautology. “Property” cannot be defined by the procedures provided for its deprivation any more than can life or liberty. The right to due process “is conferred, not by legislative grace, but by constitutional guarantee. While the legislature may elect not to confer a property interest in [public] employment, it may not constitutionally authorize the deprivation of such an interest, once conferred, without appropriate procedural safeguards.”

[Affirmed.]

Justice Powell concurred in part and concurred in the result in part.]

JUSTICE REHNQUIST, dissenting.

In [Arnett] six Members of this Court agreed that a public employee could be dismissed for misconduct without a full hearing prior to termination. A plurality of Justices agreed that the employee was entitled to exactly what Congress gave him, and no more. The Chief Justice, Justice Stewart, and I said:

Here appellee did have a statutory expectancy that he not be removed other than for “such cause as will promote the efficiency of [the] service.” But the very section of the statute which granted him that right, a right which had previously existed, only by virtue of administrative regulation, expressly provided also for the procedure by which “cause” was to be determined, and expressly omitted the procedural guarantees which appellee insists are mandated by the Constitution. Only by bifurcating the very sentence of the Act of Congress which conferred upon appellee the right not to be removed save for cause could it be said that he had an expectancy of that substantive right without the procedural limitations which Congress attached to it....

In this case, the relevant Ohio statute provides in its first paragraph that “[t]he tenure of every officer or employee in the classified service [shall] be during good behavior and efficient service.” The very next paragraph of this section [provides] that in the event of suspension of more than three days or removal the appointing authority shall furnish the employee with the stated reasons for his removal. The next paragraph provides that within ten days following the receipt of such a statement, the employee may appeal in writing to the State Personnel Board of Review or the Commission, such appeal shall be heard within 30 days from the time of its filing, and the Board may affirm, disaffirm, or modify the judgment of the appointing authority.

[Here,] as in Arnett, “[t]he employee’s statutorily defined right is not a guarantee against removal without cause in the abstract, but such a guarantee as enforced by the procedures which [the Ohio legislature] has designated for the determination of cause.” (Opinion of Rehnquist, J.)

Note: Defining “Liberty” and “Property”

1. The purposes of hearings. What goals are promoted by requiring a hearing before government deprives someone of a liberty or property interest?

a. Obtaining more accurate factual determinations. Suppose a welfare agency seeks to take away welfare benefits because the recipient’s relatively high earnings disqualify her under the governing statute, but she disputes the government’s claim that her earnings do in fact disqualify her. A hearing before an impartial arbiter might produce a more accurate resolution of the disputed factual issue than a unilateral decision by the administrator. (Note that the issue here is a dispute over the facts; hearings are generally not required on questions of law. Why?)

b. Recognizing and promoting the dignity of those whose interests are at stake by allowing them to participate in the decision. Consider Michelman, Formal and Associational Aims in Procedural Due Process, in NOMOS: Due Process 126, 127–128 (J. R. Pennock and J. Chapman eds., 1977):

[Participatory] opportunity may [be] psychologically important to the individual: to have played a part in, to have made one’s apt contribution to, decisions which are about oneself may be counted important even though the decision, as it turns out, is the most unfavorable one imaginable and one’s efforts have not proved influential.

Hearings have costs as well. If government must spend money on procedural safeguards, it will have fewer resources at its command, and the result may be that welfare benefits or salaries are correspondingly diminished. Hearing requirements may therefore not prove beneficial for the class of intended beneficiaries as a whole. Fewer employees may be hired, fewer people may be allowed on the welfare rolls, and benefit levels and salaries may be decreased.

Consider also the extent to which, for the very reasons that Michelman outlines above, hearings may lead to acceptance of outcomes that, in justice, should be rejected. What is the relevance of these possibilities?

2. Statutory entitlements. Under Roth, interests are defined by reference to positive law. The test for deciding whether a “property” interest has been created is to examine positive law to see whether the government’s discretion has been confined by existing “rules or understandings.” In Perry, the tenure system, if there was one, meant that professors could be discharged only “for cause.” In Roth, there was no such “for cause” limitation of the discretion of the administrator as to renewal.

If the Court had ordered a hearing in Roth, what issue would be the subject of the hearing? Suppose Roth claimed that he had been discharged because of his exercise of first amendment rights or for some other reason that was unconstitutional? In a portion of the opinion not produced above, the Roth Court noted that “the respondent has alleged that the nonrenewal of his contract was based on his exercise of his right to freedom of speech. But this allegation is not now before us.” If Roth lacked a property interest in his job, why would this case be different? Is the point that Roth’s liberty interest created by the first amendment might be at stake?

In Loudermill, in contrast to Roth, the statute itself made concrete issues relevant to the decision. But if the due process clause does not require the government to create a “for cause” system at all, why does it bar the government from taking the intermediate step of providing a “for cause” system without procedural safeguards?

Note: Statutory Entitlements, Property, and Natural Liberty

1. Liberty interests apart from positive law. The Supreme Court has generally been reluctant to define “property” or “liberty” interests by reference to the importance of the interest at issue; even a “grievous loss” may not be enough. In some cases, however, the Court has concluded that a “liberty” interest is at issue even though there is no positive protection of the sort required in Roth. See, e.g., Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651 (1977) (child’s interest in bodily integrity, at stake because of practice of paddling children, is a liberty interest); Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480 (1980) (inmates’ interest in preventing transfer from prison to mental institution is a liberty interest); Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 662 (1980) (the right to reputation when combined with dismissal from at-will employment is a liberty interest).

2. Doubts about natural liberty. In more recent years, some justices have expressed doubt about the recognition of nonstatutory liberty interests. Consider, for example, Kerry v. Din, 135 S. Ct. 2128 (2015). Petitioner, a United States citizen, challenged the refusal of the United States to grant an immigrant visa to her husband, a resident of Afghanistan. Under the applicable statute, a citizen may seek to have a noncitizen classified as an immediate relative. If the noncitizen is so classified, he may apply for a visa, but the visa cannot be granted if the statute makes him ineligible. The government classified petitioner's husband as an immediate relative, but then found him ineligible under a section of the statute that prohibited the granting of visas to individuals who had engaged in "terrorist activities." Petitioner then filed suit, claiming that she had been deprived of liberty without due process of law. She claimed a liberty interest in living with her husband in the United States and asserted that due process was denied with respect to that interest because the government failed to provide her with a further explanation of the denial. The Court of Appeals ruled in her favor, but the Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision, reversed.

No single opinion gained majority support. Announcing the judgment of the Court, but writing only for himself, Chief Justice Roberts, and Justice Alito, Justice Scalia found that petitioner had failed to identify a constitutionally protected liberty interest. He began his analysis by noting that the due process clause "had its origin in Magna Carta," and that Edward Coke, writing at the close of the eighteenth century, had interpreted Magna Carta liberty protections to include guarantees like the right not to be subject to imprisonment, exile, or torture except under the law of the land. "[Petitioner] of course, could not conceivably claim that the denial of [her husband's] visa application deprived her—or for that matter even [her husband]—of life or property; and under the above described historical understanding, a claim that it deprived her of liberty is equally absurd."

Justice Scalia acknowledged that "the Court has seen fit on several occasions to expand the meaning of 'liberty' under the Due Process Clause to include certain implied 'fundamental rights.' (The reasoning presumably goes like this: If you have a right to do something, you are free to do it, and deprivation of freedom is a deprivation of 'liberty'—never mind the original meaning of that word in the Due Process Clause.)" These rights, Justice Scalia explained, were protected by substantive due process and could not be denied at all even if procedural protections were provided. But even if one were to accept "the textually unsupportable doctrine of implied fundamental rights," petitioner's argument would fail.

[Before] conferring constitutional status upon previously unrecognized “liberty,” we have required “a careful description of the asserted fundamental liberty interest,” as well as a demonstration that the interest is “objectively, deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition, and implicit in the concept of ordered liberty.” [Citing Washington v. Glucksberg, supra.]

Petitioner relied upon her liberty interest in marriage or in being free from arbitrary restrictions on the right to live with a spouse.

To be sure, this Court has at times indulged a propensity for grandiloquence when reviewing the sweep of implied rights, describing them so broadly that they would include not only the interests [petitioner] asserts but many others as well. [Citing Meyer v. Nebraska, supra.] But this Court is not bound by dicta, especially dicta that have been repudiated by the holdings of our subsequent cases. And the actual holdings of the cases [petitioner] relies upon hardly establish the capacious right she now asserts....

Nothing in the cases [petitioner] cites establishes a free-floating and categorical liberty interest in marriage (or any other formulation [petitioner] offers) sufficient to trigger constitutional protection whenever a regulation in any way touches an aspect of the marital relationship. Even if our cases could be construed so broadly, the relevant question is not whether the asserted interest “is consistent with this Court’s substantive-due-process line of cases,” but whether it is supported by “this Nation’s history and practice.”

Justice Scalia also rejected the assertion that there were procedural due process rights that attached to non-fundamental liberty interests. He characterized this notion as a “dangerous doctrine” that “vastly expands the scope of our implied-rights jurisprudence by setting it free from the requirement that the liberty interest be ‘objectively, deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition, and implicit in the concept of ordered liberty.’”

Because Justice Scalia found no liberty interest, he thought that it was unnecessary to decide whether the process afforded petitioner would have been adequate if there had been a liberty interest.

Justice Kennedy, in an opinion joined by Justice Alito, concurred in the judgment. He would have found that even if petitioner had identified a protected liberty interest, the process afforded her was sufficient to satisfy the due process clause. (This aspect of the case is discussed at pages 945, infra.)

Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Ginsburg, Sotomayor, and Kagan, wrote a dissenting opinion:

Our cases make clear that the Due Process Clause entitles [petitioner] to [procedural] rights as long as (1) she seeks protection for a liberty interest sufficiently important for procedural protection to flow “implicit[ly]” from the design, object, and nature of the Due Process Clause, or (2) nonconstitutional law (a statute, for example) creates “an expectation” that a person will not be deprived of that kind of liberty without fair procedures.

The liberty for which [petitioner] seeks protection easily satisfies both standards. As this Court has long recognized, the institution of marriage, which encompasses the right of spouses to live together and to raise a family, is central to human life, requires and enjoys community support, and plays a central role in most individuals’ “orderly pursuit of happiness.”...

At the same time, the law, including visa law, surrounds marriage with a host of legal protections to the point that it creates a strong expectation that government will not deprive married individuals of their freedom to live together without strong reasons and (in individual cases) without fair procedure.

Notice that only four justices supported the plurality opinion. On Justice Scalia’s view, would the government be required to provide a hearing before it issued an order prohibiting a husband and wife from having contact with each other?

3. Pre-Din cases. In light of Din, consider the status of these older cases:

a. Reputation. Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693 (1976), involved a person arrested on a charge of shoplifting; Davis’s name was placed on a flyer sent to eight hundred merchants in Louisville, designating him as an active shoplifter. The charges were dismissed, and Davis brought suit, claiming that the action had deprived him of his constitutional interest in reputation. The Court concluded that reputation, standing alone, was not a constitutionally protected liberty interest. The Court acknowledged that in conjunction with some other injury—such as a failure to rehire or a deprivation of a right to purchase liquor, see Wisconsin v. Constantineau, 400 U.S. 433 (1971) (injury to reputation by “posting” is a liberty interest when accompanied by ban on purchase of liquor)—an injury to reputation would trigger the due process clause. The Court expressed concern that a contrary holding would allow the Constitution to swallow up state tort law, making it enforceable in the federal courts. Is it odd that under Paul v. Davis, zero (discharge of a probationary employee) plus zero (injury to reputation) equals one? For a sharply critical view of the decision, see Monaghan, Of “Liberty” and “Property,” 62 Cornell L. Rev. 405 (1977).

b. School suspension. Compare Paul with Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565 (1975), where the Court found a liberty interest, as well as a property interest, in freedom from arbitrary suspension from a public school. “School authorities here suspended appellees from school for periods of up to 10 days based on charges of misconduct. If sustained and recorded, those charges could seriously damage the students' standing with their fellow students and their teachers as well as interfere with later opportunities for higher education and employment."

c. Prisoners' rights. Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215 (1976), found no constitutionally protected interest in a transfer of prisoners from a medium-security prison to a maximum-security prison on the basis of the prisoners' alleged responsibility for committing arson. The Court said:

We reject at the outset the suggestion that any grievous loss visited upon a person by the State is sufficient to invoke the procedural protections of the Due Process Clause. [The] determining factor is the nature of the interest involved rather than its weight. [Given] a valid conviction, the criminal defendant has been constitutionally deprived of his liberty, to the extent that the State may confine him and subject him to the rules of its prison system so long as the conditions of confinement do not otherwise violate the Constitution. [Confinement] in any of the State's institutions is within the normal limits or range of custody which the conviction has authorized the State to impose. That life in one prison is much more disagreeable than in another does not in itself signify that a Fourteenth Amendment liberty interest is implicated.

Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Brennan and Marshall, dissented on the ground that the Court's conception of liberty was fundamentally incorrect. [If] a man were a creature of the state, the analysis would be correct. But neither the Bill of Rights nor the laws of sovereign states create the liberty which the Due Process Clause protects. [I] had thought it self-evident that all men were endowed by their Creator with liberty, as one of the cardinal unalienable rights. It is that basic freedom which the Due Process Clause protects, rather than the particular rights or privileges conferred by specific laws or regulations.

Compare Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480 (1980), which involved a transfer of a prisoner to a state mental hospital for treatment. The Court held that the due process clause was triggered, distinguishing Meachum in two ways. First, the state statute at issue allowed transfer only upon a finding by a designated physician or psychologist that the prisoner "suffers from a mental disease or defect" and "cannot be given treatment in that facility." The prisoner therefore had a liberty interest under Arnett v. Kennedy. Second, the Court held that the prisoner “retained a residuum of liberty that would be infringed by a transfer to a mental hospital.” The Court pointed to the stigmatic consequences of involuntary commitment to a mental hospital, the possibility of compelled treatment in the form of mandatory behavior modification programs, and the increased limitations on freedom of action. Assume there was no statutory entitlement in Vitek. If there is a constitutionally protected liberty interest, does it follow that there is a substantive constitutional right not to be transferred to a mental institution without just cause?

Greenholtz v. Inmates, 442 U.S. 1 (1979), held that without a statutory entitlement, there is no constitutionally protected interest in receiving parole. The Court acknowledged that a revocation of parole would trigger the due process clause but found a distinction between rescinding a benefit already conferred and refusing to grant a benefit in the first instance. In Board of Pardons v. Allen, 482 U.S. 369 (1987), the Court held that Montana’s parole statute established a sufficient expectancy of release to create a liberty interest. Although acknowledging the subjective nature of the parole board’s decision and the broad discretion vested in it, the Court held that the mandatory language of the parole statute created an expectancy of release. Justice O’Connor, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Scalia, dissented.

In Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472 (1995), the Court held that there was no due process violation when a prisoner was not permitted to present witnesses during a disciplinary hearing in which he was sentenced to disciplinary segregation for misconduct. The Court emphasized that judges should avoid involvement in “the ordinary incidents of prison life.” It concluded that even if discipline was punitive, and even if state law appeared to create a statutory entitlement not to be disciplined except for “high misconduct,” the due process clause would not be triggered unless it presented “a dramatic departure from the basic conditions” of the sentence. In the Court’s view, the shift to segregated confinement was not such a dramatic departure, since disciplinary segregation involved conditions similar to those faced by inmates in administrative segregation and protective custody.

Finally, in Wilkinson v. Austin, 544 U.S. 209 (2005), the Court distinguished Meachum and Sandin and held that a prison inmate had a constitutionally protected liberty interest in avoiding transfer to a “Supermax” facility. Prisoners confined to this facility are held in cells measuring seven by fourteen feet for twenty-three hours per day for an indefinite period limited only by the length of the inmate’s sentence. A light remains on in the cell at all times, although it is sometimes dimmed. The cells have solid metal doors with metal strips along the sides and bottoms designed to prevent any conversation or communication with other inmates. All meals are taken within the cells rather than in a common eating area.

Speaking for a unanimous court, Justice Kennedy noted that although the Constitution itself does not create a liberty interest in avoiding transfer to more adverse conditions of confinement, such an interest may arise from state policies and regulations. According to the Court, “the touchstone of the inquiry into the existence of [such] a protected, state-created liberty interest [is] not the language of regulations regarding those conditions but the nature of the conditions themselves ‘in relation to ordinary incidents of prison life’” [quoting from Sandin]. The Court noted the difficulty under this test in “locating the appropriate baseline” against which to measure atypical hardships, but held that it “need not resolve the issue here, [for] we are satisfied that assignment to the [Supermax] imposes an atypical and significant hardship under any plausible baseline.”

d. DNA testing. In District Attorney’s Office for the Third Judicial District v. Osborne, 557 U.S. 52 (2009), the Court, in a five-to-four decision written by Chief Justice Roberts, held that there was no liberty interest in access to DNA evidence. Osborne had been convicted sixteen years earlier of kidnapping, assault, and sexual assault. He claimed that DNA evidence, in the possession of the state, would exonerate him. In the course of rejecting his claim, the Court acknowledged that Osborne had a liberty interest in demonstrating his innocence with new evidence under state law. It did not follow, however, that “the Due Process Clause requires that certain familiar preconviction trial rights be extended to protect Osborne’s postconviction liberty interest. [A] criminal defendant proved guilty after a fair trial does not have the same liberty interests as a free man.”

According to the Court, the standard was “whether consideration of Osborne’s claim within the framework of the State’s procedures for postconviction relief ‘offends some principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental,’ or ‘transgresses any recognized principle of fundamental fairness in operation.’” The Court found Alaska’s procedures adequate under this standard.

4. Property. In contrast to the liberty cases, the Court has generally found a property interest only in circumstances where there is a state-created right.

a. Police enforcement of a restraining order. In Town of Castle Rock, Colorado v. Gonzales, 545 U.S. 748 (2005), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Scalia, held that an individual who had obtained a state-law restraining order did not have a constitutionally protected property interest in having the police enforce the order. The order in question, issued by a Colorado court, directed Gonzales's husband to stay away from her and her children and ordered the police to "use every reasonable means to enforce [the] order." The order was issued in conformance with a Colorado statute that required peace officers to "use every reasonable means to enforce a restraining order." When the husband violated the order by taking Gonzales's three daughters from their home, Gonzales repeatedly asked the police to respond, but they failed to do so. Ultimately, the husband killed the children.

The Court stated that Gonzales failed to identify a property interest in enforcement of the order because "Colorado law [did not] truly [make] enforcement of restraining orders mandatory. A well established tradition of police discretion has long coexisted with apparently mandatory arrest statutes." Moreover, even if the statute were mandatory, it is by no means clear that an individual entitlement to enforcement of a restraining order could constitute a "property" interest for purposes of the Due Process Clause. Such a right would not, of course, resemble any traditional conception of property. Although that alone does not disqualify it from due process protection, [the] right to have a restraining order enforced does not "have some ascertainable monetary value." [Perhaps] most radically, the alleged property interest here arises incidentally, not out of some new species of government benefit or service, but out of a function that government actors have always [performed].

b. Failure to convene a hearing. Compare the failure of the police to enforce the law in Castle Rock with the failure of an administrative agency to do so in Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., 455 U.S. 422 (1982). The case involved a state statute prohibiting discrimination on the basis of handicap and providing that within 120 days of the filing of a charge of unlawful discrimination, the state fair employment practices commission "shall convene a factfinding conference." In the Logan case, the commission failed through negligence to hold the hearing within the requisite time, and the plaintiff's claim was extinguished by state law. The Court held that the state-created right to redress of unlawful discrimination amounted to a property interest, and that under state law, that right was to be "assessed under what is, in essence, a 'for cause' standard, based upon the substantiality of the evidence." The plaintiff was therefore entitled to a hearing. Is Logan distinguishable from Castle Rock? For a fuller discussion of government inaction that allegedly violates constitutional interests, see Chapter 9 infra.

c. Return of fees, court costs, and restitution. In Nelson v. Colorado, 137 S.

Ct. 1249 (2017), the Court, in a seven-to-one decision written by Justice Ginsburg, invalidated a Colorado statute that limited the ability of convicted criminal defendants to secure the return of fees, court costs, and restitution after their convictions were reversed on appeal and in circumstances where there would be no retrial. Under the state's Exoneration Act, these defendants could secure a refund only by filing a separate civil action and then only if they demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence that they were innocent.

Consider Justice Thomas's dissenting opinion:

The Court assumes, without reference to either state or federal law, that defendants whose convictions have been reversed have a substantive right to any money exacted on the basis of [their] convictions. By doing so, the Court assumes away the real [issue]....

"Because the Constitution protects rather than creates property interests, the existence of a property interest is determined by reference to 'existing rules or understandings that stem from an independent source such as state law.'" Phillips v. Washington Legal Foundation, 524 U.S. 156, 164 (1998) (quoting [Board of Regents of State Colleges v. Roth]). [To] succeed on their procedural due process claim, petitioners must first point to a recognized property interest in that money, under state or federal law, within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Justice Thomas concluded that petitioners had not demonstrated that they had such an interest and that, therefore, their claim should fail.

2. What Process Is Due

Mathews v. Eldridge

424 U.S. 319 (1976)

[Eldridge had received disability benefits since 1968. After considering Eldridge's response to a questionnaire about his condition, reports from Eldridge's physician and a psychiatric consultant, and Eldridge's files, the relevant state agency made a tentative determination that Eldridge's disability had ceased. Eldridge was so informed, given a statement of reasons, and offered an opportunity to submit a written response. He did so, disputing the agency's decision, but benefits were nonetheless terminated. Eldridge claimed that this procedure violated the due process clause. The Court below agreed.]

MR. JUSTICE POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court....

This Court consistently has held that some form of hearing is required before an individual is finally deprived of a property interest. [Eldridge] agrees that the review procedures available to a claimant before the initial determination of ineligibility becomes final would be adequate if disability benefits were not terminated until after the evidentiary hearing stage of the administrative process. The dispute centers upon what process is due prior to the initial termination of benefits, pending review.

In recent years this Court increasingly has had occasion to consider the extent to which due process requires an evidentiary hearing prior to the deprivation of some type of property interest even if such a hearing is provided thereafter. In only one case, [Goldberg], has the Court held that a hearing closely approximating a judicial trial is necessary. In other cases requiring some type of pretermination hearing as a matter of constitutional right the Court has spoken sparingly about the requisite procedures....

[Our] decisions underscore the truism that “[d]ue process,’ unlike some legal rules, is not a technical conception with a fixed content unrelated to time, place and circumstances.” “[D]ue process is flexible and calls for such procedural protections as the particular situation demands.” [Accordingly,] resolution of the issue whether the administrative procedures provided here are constitutionally sufficient requires analysis of the governmental and private interests that are affected. [Arnett.] More precisely, our prior decisions indicate that identification of the specific dictates of due process generally requires consideration of three distinct factors: First, the private interest that will be affected by the official action; second, the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards; and finally, the Government’s interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirement would entail.

[The Court described the relevant procedures. It noted that the worker bears a continuing burden of showing that he suffers from a medically determinable physical or mental impairment; that a state agency conducts continuing eligibility investigations, in which there is communication with the disabled worker; that when an agency’s tentative assessment differs from the worker’s, the worker is informed that benefits may be terminated and is offered an opportunity to respond in writing and to furnish new evidence; that there is review by a federal official of any state decision to terminate; that after termination, there is a right to an evidentiary hearing, in which the claimant may be represented by counsel; and that the worker may recover retroactive payments

if the termination is later found erroneous.]

[Despite] the elaborate character of the administrative procedures provided by the Secretary, the courts below held them to be constitutionally inadequate, concluding that due process requires an evidentiary hearing prior to termination. In light of the private and governmental interests at stake here and the nature of the existing procedures, we think this was error.

Since a recipient whose benefits are terminated is awarded full retroactive relief if he ultimately prevails, his sole interest is in the uninterrupted receipt of this source of income pending final administrative decision on his claim.

[Only] in Goldberg has the Court held that due process requires an evidentiary hearing prior to a temporary deprivation. It was emphasized there that welfare assistance is given to persons on the very margin of [subsistence. Eligibility] for disability benefits, in contrast, is not based upon financial need....

As Goldberg illustrates, the degree of potential deprivation that may be created by a particular decision is a factor to be considered in assessing the validity of any administrative decisionmaking process. The potential deprivation here is generally likely to be less than in Goldberg, although the degree of difference can be overstated. As the District Court emphasized, to remain eligible for benefits a recipient must be “unable to engage in substantial gainful activity.” Thus, in contrast to the discharged federal employee in Arnett, there is little possibility that the terminated recipient will be able to find even temporary employment to ameliorate the interim loss. [Further,] “the possible length of wrongful deprivation of...benefits [also] is an important factor in assessing the impact of official action on the private interests.” The Secretary concedes that the delay between a request for a hearing before an administrative law judge and a decision on the claim is currently between 10 and 11 months. Since a terminated recipient must first obtain a reconsideration decision as a prerequisite to invoking his right to an evidentiary hearing, the delay between the actual cutoff of benefits and final decision after a hearing exceeds one year.

In view of the torpidity of this administrative review process, and the typically modest resources of the family unit of the physically disabled worker,²⁶ the hardship imposed upon the erroneously terminated disability recipient may be significant. Still, the disabled worker’s need is likely to be less than that of a welfare recipient. In addition to the possibility of access to private resources, other forms of government assistance will become available where the termination of disability benefits places a worker or his family below the subsistence level.

In view of these potential sources of temporary income, there is less reason here than in Goldberg to depart from the ordinary principle, [that] something less than an evidentiary hearing is sufficient prior to adverse administrative action.

An additional factor to be considered here is the fairness and reliability of the existing pretermination procedures, and the probable value, if any, of additional procedural safeguards. Central to the evaluation of any administrative process is the nature of the relevant inquiry. In order to remain eligible for benefits the disabled worker must demonstrate by means of "medically acceptable clinical and laboratory diagnostic techniques," that he is unable "to engage in any substantial gainful activity by reason of any medically determinable physical or mental impairment...."

In short, a medical assessment of the worker's physical or mental condition is required. This is a more sharply focused and easily documented decision than the typical determination of welfare entitlement....

[A] further safeguard against mistake is the policy of allowing the disability recipient's representative full access to all information relied upon by the state agency. In addition, prior to the cutoff of benefits the agency informs the recipient of its tentative assessment, the reasons therefor, and provides a summary of the evidence that it considers most relevant. Opportunity is then afforded the recipient to submit additional evidence or arguments, enabling him to challenge directly the accuracy of information in his file as well as the correctness of the agency's tentative conclusions.

Despite these carefully structured procedures, amici point to the significant reversal rate for appealed cases as clear evidence that the current process is inadequate. Depending upon the base selected and the line of analysis followed, the relevant reversal rates urged by the contending parties vary from a high of 58.6% for appealed reconsideration decisions to an overall reversal rate of only 3.3%. Bare statistics rarely provide a satisfactory measure of the fairness of a decisionmaking process. Their adequacy is especially suspect here since the administrative review system is operated on an open-file basis. A recipient may always submit new evidence, and such submissions may result in additional medical examinations....

In striking the appropriate due process balance the final factor to be assessed is the public interest. This includes the administrative burden and other societal costs that would be associated with requiring, as a matter of constitutional right, an evidentiary hearing upon demand in all cases prior to the termination of disability benefits. The most visible burden would be the incremental cost resulting from the increased number of hearings and the expense of providing benefits to ineligible recipients pending decision. [The] parties submit widely varying estimates of the probable additional financial cost. We only need say that experience with the constitutionalizing of government procedures suggests that the ultimate additional cost in terms of money and administrative burden would not be insubstantial.

Financial cost alone is not a controlling weight in determining whether due process requires a particular procedural safeguard prior to some administrative decision. But the Government's interest, and hence that of the public, in conserving scarce fiscal and administrative resources is a factor that must be weighed. At some point the benefit of an additional safeguard to the individual affected by the administrative action and to society in terms of increased assurance that the action is just, may be outweighed by the cost. Significantly, the cost of protecting those whom the preliminary administrative process has identified as likely to be found undeserving may in the end come out of the pockets of the deserving since resources available for any particular program of social welfare are not unlimited....

[In] assessing what process is due in this case, substantial weight must be given to the good-faith judgments of the individuals charged by Congress with the administration of social welfare programs that the procedures they have provided assure fair consideration of the entitlement claims of individuals....

We conclude that an evidentiary hearing is not required prior to the termination of disability benefits and that the present administrative procedures fully comport with due process.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed.

Mr. Justice Stevens took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL concurs, dissenting.

[The] Court's consideration that a discontinuance of disability benefits may cause the recipient to suffer only a limited deprivation is no argument. It is speculative. Moreover, the very legislative determination to provide disability benefits, without any prerequisite determination of need in fact, presumes a need by the recipient which is not this Court's function to denigrate. Indeed, in the present case, [because] disability benefits were terminated there was a foreclosure upon the Eldridge home and the family's furniture was repossessed, forcing Eldridge, his wife, and their children to sleep in one bed. Finally, it is also no argument that a worker, who has been placed in the untenable position of having been denied disability benefits, may still seek other forms of public assistance.

Note: Balancing Tests and the Due Process Clause

1. The Mathews test in general. In Mathews, the Court adopted a three-part “test,” sometimes called one of balancing or “cost-benefit” analysis, that has played an important role in constitutional law. In almost all cases raising questions of procedural regularity, the Court refers to the Mathews test. On what grounds might the test be criticized?

a. Ignoring nonutilitarian variables. Perhaps the Mathews approach ignores participatory and dignitary concerns. Consider Mashaw, The Supreme Court’s Due Process Calculus for Administrative Adjudication in Mathews v. Eldridge: Three Factors in Search of a Theory of Value, 44 U. Chi. L. Rev. 28, 49–51 (1976):

The Supreme Court’s analysis in Eldridge is not informed by systematic attention to any theory of the values underlying due process review. The approach is implicitly utilitarian but incomplete, and the Court overlooks alternative theories that might have yielded fruitful inquiry. [The] increasingly secular, scientific, and collectivist character of the modern American state reinforces our propensity to define fairness in the formal, and apparently neutral language of social utility. [Yet] the popular moral presupposition of individual dignity, and its political counterpart, self-determination, persist. State coercion must be legitimized, not only by acceptable substantive policies, but also by political processes that respond to a democratic morality’s demand for participation in decisions affecting individual and group interests. [A] dignitary theory of due process might have contributed significantly to the Eldridge analysis. [A] disability decision is a judgment of considerable social significance, and one that the claimant should rightly perceive as having a substantive moral content.

See also J. Mashaw, Due Process in the Administrative State (1985).

b. Vagueness. Perhaps the three-part analysis is not useful, or perhaps it fails to constrain judicial discretion in a helpful way. Note that in economics, cost-benefit analysis is usually based on the criterion of private willingness to pay. The benefit is measured by how much people would be willing to pay for the good in question; the cost is measured similarly. But how does one assess the benefits and costs in a case like Mathews? Might the various factors be thought incommensurable, in the sense that there is no metric along which they could be aligned? See Sunstein, Incommensurability and Valuation in Law, 92 Mich. L. Rev. 779 (1994).

c. Susceptibility to misapplication. Perhaps a utilitarian assessment of the three factors requires courts to duplicate legislative processes. That assessment, calling for ad hoc judgments of policy, may not be readily within judicial competence. What in the text of the due process clause or in acceptable conceptions of the judicial role authorizes such an approach?

This critique might be buttressed by reference to Mathews itself. Mashaw, The Supreme Court's Due Process Calculus for Administrative Adjudication, supra, argues that the Court misconceived the character of the disability determination. According to Mashaw, that determination is based much less on purely medical factors and much more on subjective impressions raising issues of credibility than the Court suggested. In these circumstances, oral rather than written testimony becomes more valuable. Note also the Court's confessed inability to evaluate the costs of additional safeguards, captured in its statement that it could not say that they would be "insubstantial."

Is there an alternative to the Mathews approach that would avoid these various critiques and at the same time provide a sensible approach for making decisions about the extent of procedural safeguards? Would bright-line rules—requiring, for example, trial-type hearings absent a special governmental showing or deference to the legislative determination absent special individual circumstances—be preferable? Consider also that (1) it is possible that detailed procedures may be requested only by the most educated and aggressive claimants, (2) the costs of such procedures may be taken out of the claimants' benefits elsewhere, and (3) formal procedures may increase the adversarial quality of relations that should be conducted in a more informal way.

See in this connection Walters v. National Association of Radiation Survivors, 473 U.S. 305 (1985), where the Court cited Mathews in upholding a statute providing that $10 is the maximum fee that may be paid to an attorney who represents a veteran seeking Veterans Administration benefits for service-related injuries. In a concurring opinion, Justice O'Connor, joined by Justice Blackmun, suggested that under the due process clause, courts should look at the individual claim to evaluate whether the statutory maximum is unconstitutional in particular applications. Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Brennan and Marshall, dissented, arguing in favor of a bright-line rule in favor of counsel.

Justice Stevens renewed his call for a bright-line rule in a dissenting opinion in Brock v. Roadway Express, Inc., 481 U.S. 252 (1987):

The Court's willingness to sacrifice due process to the Government's obscure suggestion of necessity reveals the serious flaws in its due process analysis. It is wrong to approach the due process analysis in each case by asking anew what procedures seem worthwhile and not too costly. Unless a case falls within a recognized exception, we should adhere to the strongest presumption that the Government may not take away life, liberty, or property before making a meaningful hearing available.

Compare Turner v. Rogers, 564 U.S. 431 (2011), where the Court, in an opinion by Justice Breyer, held that the due process clause did not automatically require the state to provide counsel to an indigent person confronting civil contempt for failure to pay child support, even if the individual faces incarceration. The Court nonetheless held that Turner's incarceration violated the due process clause because the state had failed to provide him with "alternative safeguards."

Using the Mathews balancing test, the Court conceded that the importance of the private interest at stake—loss of personal liberty through imprisonment—"argues strongly for the right to counsel." The Court nonetheless thought that three other considerations made counsel unnecessary. First, the critical issue in cases of nonsupport is ability to pay, but this issue would have to be resolved without counsel in any event to determine whether the defendant was indigent and therefore eligible for state-provided counsel. Second, the private individual opposing the nonpaying parent is often without counsel. Finally, alternative safeguards could reduce the risk of error without providing counsel. These safeguards included notice to the defendant that ability to pay was a critical issue, the use of a form to elicit relevant financial information, opportunity for the defendant to respond to statements and questions about his financial status at the hearing, and an express finding by the court that the defendant had the ability to pay. Because Turner had not been afforded these alternative safeguards, the Court held that his incarceration violated the due process clause.

In a dissenting opinion joined by Justice Scalia and joined in part by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito, Justice Thomas agreed that the due process clause did not guarantee a right to counsel. However, because the issue was not raised by the parties, the dissenters would not have decided whether alternative procedural safeguards were required.

Compare Turner to Kerry v. Din, 135 S. Ct. 2128 (2015). Petitioner was a resident United States citizen. Her husband, a noncitizen, was denied a visa to enter the United States on the ground that he had engaged in "terrorist activities." The government refused to provide any additional information to support the denial. The Supreme Court rejected Petitioner's claim that this refusal denied her right to procedural due process, but no opinion gained majority support. Justice Scalia, in an opinion announcing the judgment of the Court and joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Thomas, asserted that petitioner had failed to allege that a constitutionally protected liberty interest had been infringed. (This portion of the opinion is discussed at page 935, supra.) Justice Kennedy, in an opinion joined by Justice Alito, assumed arguendo that a liberty interest was implicated, but asserted that petitioner had received all the process that was due. He based this conclusion on “due consideration of the congressional power to make rules for the exclusion of aliens, and the ensuing power to delegate authority to the Attorney General to exercise substantial discretion in that field.”

Absent an affirmative showing of bad faith on the part of the consular officer who denied [petitioner’s husband] a visa—which [petitioner] has not plausibly alleged with sufficient particularity—[we should not] “look behind” the government’s exclusion of [petitioner’s husband] for additional factual details beyond what its express reliance on [the statute excluding those engaged in terrorist activity] encompasses....

The government, furthermore, was not required [to] point to a more specific provision within [the statute even though] the statutory provision the consular officer cited covers a broad range of conduct....

Congress evaluated the benefits and burdens of notice in this sensitive area and assigned discretion to the Executive to decide when more detailed disclosure is appropriate. This considered judgment gives additional support to the independent conclusion that the notice given was constitutionally adequate, particularly in light of the national security concerns that the terrorism bar addresses.

Justice Breyer, in an opinion joined by Justices Ginsburg, Sotomayor, and Kagan, dissented. He concluded that, at a minimum, the petitioner was entitled to “a statement of reasons, some kind of explanation, as to why the State Department denied her husband a visa.”

[A] statement of reasons, even one provided after a visa denial, serves much the same function as a “notice” of a proposed action. It allows [petitioner], who suffered a “serious loss,” a fair “opportunity to meet” “the case” that has produced separation from her husband....

I recognize that our due process cases often determine the constitutional insistence upon a particular procedure by balancing, with respect to that procedure, the “private interest” at stake, “the risk of an erroneous deprivation” absent the sought-after protection, and the Government’s interest in not providing additional procedure. Here “balancing” would not change the result. The “private interest” is important, the risk of an “erroneous deprivation” is significant, and the Government's interest in not providing a reason is normally small, at least administratively speaking.

2. The problem of timing. Must hearings be held before or after adverse action is taken? The traditional rule has been that a postdeprivation remedy is insufficient. In general, government must afford procedural safeguards before it harms someone. But in North American Cold Storage Co. v. Chicago, 211 U.S. 306 (1908), the Court held that a prior hearing was not required before state officers destroyed stored food deemed by health officials to be unfit for human consumption. The Court noted that the existence of the food posed a threat to public health, and that a subsequent tort action would provide sufficient protection to the owner. Would the Mathews approach support this outcome?

How far should the North American Cold Storage reasoning be taken? Consider whether it should apply to cases of termination of welfare benefits or of employment. In Arnett v. Kennedy, 416 U.S. 134 (1974), a majority of the Court held that a trial-type hearing was not required before termination of a federal employee accused of bribery. Justice Powell, undertaking a balancing approach, contended that the government "must have wide discretion and control over the management of its personnel and internal affairs. This includes the prerogative to remove employees whose conduct hinders efficient operation and to do so with dispatch. [The employee's] actual injury would consist of a temporary interruption of his income during the interim. [The] possible deprivation is considerably less severe than that involved in Goldberg." Note, however, that in Arnett, there was some predeprivation procedure as well.

In Loudermill, supra, the Court held that the Constitution did not permit discharge of state employees without any prior procedural safeguards. The Court said: "In Arnett six Justices found constitutional minima satisfied where the employee had access to the material upon which the charge was based and could respond orally or in writing and present rebuttal affidavits. [The] need for some form of pretermination hearing [is] evident from a balancing of the competing interests at stake." The Court emphasized that the "private interest in retaining employment" was significant; that "some opportunity for the employee to present his side of the case is recurringly of obvious value in reaching an accurate decision," especially in light of the fact the discharge may involve a factual dispute; and that "affording the employee an opportunity to respond would impose neither a significant administrative burden nor intolerable delays."

The Court added that, even when the dispute was not factual, a hearing might allow an examination of the appropriateness or necessity of discharge, and that a hearing could serve governmental interests in retaining qualified employees. The Court said, however, that an employee's pretermination hearing need not be elaborate and could consist of "oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence, and an opportunity to present his side of the story."

In Brock v. Roadway Express, Inc., supra, the Court considered the converse of the problem posed by Arnett and Loudermill—that is, the kind of process that is due before an employer can be forced to reinstate a discharged worker. A federal statute protects employees in the transportation industry from discharge in retaliation for refusing to operate a motor vehicle that does not comply with state and federal safety regulations. The statute provides that, if the Secretary of Labor finds reasonable cause to believe that an employee has been discharged in violation of the act, he can issue an order reinstating the employee. An employer is entitled to a full evidentiary hearing only after the reinstatement.

In an opinion written by Justice Marshall, a plurality of the Court held that the Constitution did not require an evidentiary hearing and an opportunity to cross-examine witnesses before the government ordered temporary reinstatement. Although acknowledging the employer's substantial interest in controlling the makeup of its workforce, the plurality emphasized the government's countervailing interest in promoting highway safety and the employee's interest in retaining his job.

The plurality went on to hold, however, that the procedures would satisfy this reliability standard only if the employer received notice of the employee's allegations, notice of the substance of the relevant supporting evidence, an opportunity to submit a written response, and an opportunity to meet with the investigator and present statements from rebuttal witnesses.

In separate opinions, Justices Brennan and Stevens each argued that the due process clause required a full evidentiary hearing prior to a reinstatement order. Justice White, in an opinion joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Scalia, argued that due process did not require that the employer be provided with information on which the reinstatement order is based, including names of witnesses, prior to reinstatement.

3. How formal? Goldberg v. Kelly required a trial-type hearing before termination of welfare benefits, including a number of features: a right to present oral evidence, a right to confront and cross-examine witnesses, a right to counsel, a statement by the arbiter of reasons and of the evidence relied on, and a right to an impartial decisionmaker. In recent cases, however, the Court has shown some reluctance to formalize the administrative process with such requirements.

At the opposite pole from Goldberg, for example, is Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S.

565 (1975), in which the Court found that due process required only a conversation before temporary suspension of students. This included oral or written notice of the charges against them, an explanation of the evidence the authorities have, and a chance to provide the students' side of the story. The Court said:

Even truncated trial-type procedures might well overwhelm administrative facilities in many places and, in diverting resources, cost more than it would save in educational effectiveness. Moreover, further formalizing the suspension process and escalating its formality and adversary nature may not only make it too costly as a regular disciplinary tool but also destroy its effectiveness as part of the teaching process. On the other hand, requiring effective notice and informal hearing permitting the student to give his version of the events will provide a meaningful hedge against erroneous action.

See also Board of Curators of University of Missouri v. Horowitz, 435 U.S. 78 (1978), declining to require elaborate procedures for discharge of a woman from medical school in part because of reluctance to "formalize the academic dismissal process." And note the various conclusions on the issue of formality in Mathews, Arnett, and Loudermill.

In Greenholtz v. Inmates, 442 U.S. 1 (1979), the Court held that in parole decisions, based on a subjective assessment of the whole person, an oral hearing was not required. A review of the prisoner's files, the Court said, was sufficient to satisfy due process. Compare Wilkinson v. Austin, 544 U.S. 209 (2005), where the Court upheld procedures under which, prior to transfer to a Supermax facility, inmates were provided with a written notice of reasons and a hearing at which they could offer explanations or objections but could not call witnesses.

For a discussion of the type of hearing that must be afforded an individual accused of being an enemy combatant, see Chapter 4, supra.

4. State remedies as due process. The Court has held that state tort remedies may sometimes provide all the process that is constitutionally "due." Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651 (1977), involved a claim that the due process clause required some sort of procedural safeguard before teachers "paddled" students for asserted misconduct. The Court held that the interest in avoiding "paddling" was a constitutionally protected liberty but concluded that an after-the-fact state tort remedy provided sufficient procedural safeguards. "Because paddlings are usually inflicted in response to conduct directly observed by teachers in their presence, the risk that a child will be paddled without cause is typically insignificant. [In] those cases where severe punishment is contemplated, the available civil and criminal sanctions for abuse—considered in light of the openness of the school environment—afford significant protection against unjustified corporal punishment.” Justice White, in a dissent joined by Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens, complained that state law was inadequate in cases of a good faith mistake in school discipline, and that the “infliction of physical pain is final and irreparable.”

Compare Memphis Light, Gas, & Water Division v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1 (1978), requiring a hearing in advance of termination of electricity service for nonpayment of a disputed bill. “The factors that have justified exceptions to the requirements of some prior process are not present here. Although utility service may be restored ultimately, the cessation of essential services for any appreciable time works a uniquely final deprivation. [Moreover], the probability of error in utility cut-off decisions is not so insubstantial as to warrant dispensing with all process prior to termination.”

Ingraham was extended in Parratt v. Taylor, 451 U.S. 527 (1981), which involved a negligent loss of a prisoner’s hobby kit. The Court held that state tort law provided a constitutionally adequate remedy. The Court noted that the case involved a “tortious loss of [property] as a result of a random and unauthorized act by a state employee [not] as a result of some established state procedure.” A state tort remedy was therefore sufficient “process.” See also Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517 (1984), extending Parratt to intentional deprivations of property in the context of destruction of a prisoner’s property during the search of his cell. Should it matter that property, rather than liberty, was at stake? That a prior hearing would seem impracticable?

In Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Co., section G1, supra, it was argued that Parratt was controlling, and that the state tort remedy provided sufficient procedural protection for the state’s failure to hold a hearing on the plaintiff’s claim of discrimination. The Court rejected that argument, reasserting the general principle requiring predeprivation hearings. Unlike in Parratt, moreover, “it is the state system itself that destroys a complainant’s property interests, by operation of law, whenever the Commission fails to convene a timely conference.”

In Daniels v. Williams, 474 U.S. 327 (1986), the Court overruled Parratt insofar as that case had suggested that a negligently inflicted loss could amount to a deprivation of due process in the absence of a state tort remedy. Although all nine justices joined the result in Daniels, a second case, also involving negligence by a state official and decided on the same day, evoked more controversy. In Davidson v. Cannon, 474 U.S. 344 (1986), the Court rejected the due process claim of a state prisoner who alleged that he was seriously injured when prison officials negligently failed to protect him from another inmate. Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote the Court's opinion: "[Where] a government official is merely negligent in causing the injury, no procedure for compensation is constitutionally required. [The] guarantee of due process has never been understood to mean that the State must guarantee due care on the part of its officials."

Justice Stevens wrote an opinion concurring in the results in both Daniels and Davidson, but solely on the ground that in neither case were state remedies for the deprivations constitutionally inadequate. In an extended opinion, Justice Blackmun, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented. Justice Brennan dissented separately.

In Nelson v. Colorado, 137 S. Ct. 1249 (2017), the Court, in a seven-to-one decision written by Justice Ginsburg, invalidated a Colorado statute that limited the ability of convicted criminal defendants to secure the return of fees, court costs, and restitution after their convictions were reversed on appeal and in circumstances where there would be no retrial. Under the state's Exoneration Act, these defendants could secure a refund only by filing a separate civil action and then only if they demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence that they were innocent. Applying the Mathews v. Eldridge test, the Court found that these limitations violated procedural due process. The Court reasoned that because their convictions had been reversed, the defendants must be presumed innocent and therefore should not have to establish their innocence. Moreover, even apart from this requirement, the Exoneration Act provided an inadequate remedy because "when amounts a defendant seeks to recoup are not large [the] cost of mounting a claim [and] retaining a lawyer to pursue it would be prohibitive." Accordingly, "a State may not impose anything more than minimal procedures on the refund of exactions dependent upon a conviction subsequently invalidated."

Does the Court's holding imply that an exonerated defendant is constitutionally entitled to compensation for the period during which the defendant was imprisoned? The Court stated that "the comparison is inapt" because petitioners "seek restoration of funds they paid to the State, not compensation for temporary deprivation of those funds. [Just] as the restoration of liberty on reversal of a conviction is not compensation, neither is the return of money taken by the State on account of the conviction."

Justice Alito wrote an opinion concurring in the judgment. Justice Thomas's dissenting opinion is discussed, supra.

5. Bias. Does the due process clause guarantee an unbiased decisionmaker? What does "bias" mean in this context?

Consider Caperton v. A. T. Massey Coal Co., 556 U.S. 868 (2009). A West Virginia jury found that defendant Massey was guilty of fraudulent misrepresentation, concealment, and tortious interference with existing contractual relations and awarded plaintiff Caperton $50 million in damages. Knowing that the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia would consider an appeal in the case, Blankenship, Massey's chairman and chief executive officer, spent more than $3 million directly and indirectly supporting the election of Benjamin to a seat on the court. This was more than the total amount spent by all other Benjamin supporters, three times the amount spent by Benjamin's own committee, and, apparently, $1 million more than the total amount spent by the campaign committees of both candidates combined. Benjamin won the election. Despite repeated requests that he recuse himself, Benjamin sat on the appeal in the Massey case and cast the deciding vote in a three-to-two decision to reverse the result below.

In a five-to-four decision, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, held that the due process clause required Benjamin's recusal. The Court noted that “[n]ot every campaign contribution by a litigant or attorney creates a probability of bias that requires a judge's recusal, but this is an exceptional case.”

[There] is a serious risk of actual bias—based on objective and reasonable perceptions—when a person with a personal stake in a particular case had a significant and disproportionate influence in placing the judge on the case by raising funds or directing the judge's election campaign when the case was pending or imminent. The inquiry centers on the contribution's relative size in comparison to the total amount of money contributed to the campaign, the total amount spent in the election, and the apparent effect such contribution had on the outcome of the election....

Just as no man is allowed to be a judge in his own cause, similar fears of bias can arise when—without the consent of the other parties—a man chooses the judge in his own cause. And applying this principle to the judicial election process, there was here a serious, objective risk of actual bias that required Justice Benjamin's recusal.

Chief Justice Roberts, joined by Justices Scalia, Thomas, and Alito, dissented:

I, of course, share the majority's sincere concerns about the need to maintain a fair, independent, and impartial judiciary—and one that appears to be such. But I fear that the Court's decision will undermine rather than promote these values....

Unlike the established grounds for disqualification, a “probability of bias” cannot be defined in any limited way. The Court’s new “rule” provides no guidance to judges and litigants about when recusal will be constitutionally required. This will inevitably lead to an increase in allegations that judges are biased, however groundless those charges may be. The end result will do far more to erode public confidence in judicial impartiality than an isolated failure to recuse in a particular case.

Justice Scalia also wrote a dissenting opinion.

Compare Rippo v. Baker, 580 U.S. ____ (2017). Petitioner was charged with first-degree murder and unsuccessfully moved to recuse the trial judge on the ground that the District Attorney’s Office was participating in a federal bribery probe of the trial judge. The Nevada Supreme Court held that petitioner was not entitled to discovery or an evidentiary hearing on his claim because his allegations “[did] not support the assertion that the trial judge was actually biased in this case.” In a per curiam opinion, a unanimous Supreme Court vacated the state court’s judgement because the state court had applied the wrong legal standard. “The Nevada Supreme Court did not ask the question our precedents require: whether, considering all the circumstances alleged, the risk of bias was too high to be constitutionally tolerable.” Does this standard ask the right question, or does it merely beg the question?

Note: Procedural Due Process and “Legislative” Determinations

Congress and state legislatures may pass laws without affording procedural safeguards beyond those specifically required by the Constitution. The due process clause does not mean that, before passing laws, Congress must hear those who will be affected. Congress may, for example, reduce the welfare benefits of a class of people without offering anything in the way of procedure. Why? Does the same reasoning apply when administrative agencies make rules governing private conduct?

Some answers were spelled out in Bi-Metallic Investment Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 239 U.S. 441 (1915). Bi-Metallic involved an attempt to prevent the Denver Board of Equalization and the Colorado Tax Commission from increasing the valuation of all taxable property in Denver without affording a hearing. The Court held that no hearing was required:

Where a rule of conduct applies to more than a few people it is impracticable that every one should have a direct voice in its adoption. The Constitution does not require all public acts to be done in town meeting or an assembly of the whole. General statutes within the state power are passed that affect the person or property of individuals, sometimes to the point of ruin, without giving them a chance to be heard. Their rights are protected in the only way that they can be in a complex society, by their power, immediate or remote, over those who make the rule.

This reasoning contains two points: Processes of representation are a sufficient guarantee of legitimacy, thus serving the same ends as a hearing; and it would be impracticable to require a hearing for determinations that affect large numbers of people. Kenneth Culp Davis has added that trial-type processes are best suited for “adjudicative” facts—facts “about the parties and their activities, business, and properties. Adjudicative facts usually answer the questions of who said what, where, when, how, why, with what motive or intent.” K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise §7.02 (1958). “Legislative” facts, by contrast, raise questions of policy that are better suited to a legislative forum.

How might one challenge these claims? Are representative processes a reliable safeguard when administrative agencies are making rules?

H. THE CONTRACTS AND TAKINGS CLAUSES

This section explores the contracts clause and the eminent domain clause. The two clauses do not create “implied fundamental rights” in the sense that we have been discussing thus far, but they have a close association with decisions under the due process clause, and they therefore deserve treatment here.

The two clauses have been united by a single, quite general idea: Government ought not to be permitted to redistribute resources by “taking” resources from one person for the benefit of another. The contracts clause bars state government from disrupting voluntary agreements simply because government wants to help one or another side. The eminent domain clause bars the federal government (and, after incorporation, the states as well) from taking property from one person and giving it to someone else. Both clauses require the public as a whole, rather than distinct groups, to pay out funds to benefit people perceived to be in need of protection. Both clauses are in this sense allied by a fear of the power of “factions”—powerful private interests—over government and an associated belief that at least certain forms of redistribution should be banned.

Redistribution, particularly to the disadvantaged, has become an important part of the activity of the national and state governments in the aftermath of the New Deal. There has therefore been considerable pressure to limit the force of the contracts and the takings clauses. And when redistribution, to the disadvantaged or to anyone else, is perceived as inefficient or unjust, it should be unsurprising to see efforts to reinvigorate both clauses.

1. The Contracts Clause

The contracts clause provides, “No State shall [pass] any [Law] impairing the Obligation of Contracts.” U.S. Const. art. I, §10, cl. 1.

Note: Early Interpretive Problems

The contracts clause is one of the few “rights-protecting” provisions in the original Constitution. It is also one of the few such provisions that was directly applicable to the states before the adoption of the fourteenth amendment. Moreover, for a long period the contracts clause was among the most important provisions in the Constitution, at least if the structural provisions are excluded. Indeed, in the nineteenth century the clause “was the constitutional justification for more cases involving the validity of state law than all of the other clauses of the Constitution together.” B. Wright, The Contract Clause of the Constitution 1 (1938). Some also highly valued the clause for its protection of a form of liberty. Sir Henry Maine claimed that the clause “is the bulwark of American individualism against democratic impatience and socialistic fantasy.” H. Maine, Popular Government 247–248 (1885). Why did the framers of the Constitution single out contractual freedom as one of the only rights entitled to protection against abridgment by state governments?

A partial answer lies in the history of the clause. Between the Revolution and the drafting of the Constitution, many states had enacted “debtor relief” laws—provisions that, among other things, postponed the time for payment of private debts, allowed for issuance and required acceptance of paper money, and allowed for payments in installments or at some percentage of the appraised value of commodities. Creditors, well-to-do or otherwise, regarded these measures as an indefensible intrusion on private ordering. Many debtors found such measures to be an indispensable protection against surprise or unfair dealing. Many observers, including some of the framers, saw such measures as general, long-term obstacles to trade and commercial development—obstacles that would ultimately harm everyone, including possible debtors themselves, by discouraging contractual arrangements.

Recall here that the contracts clause was applicable only to the states, and not to the federal government—unlike the eminent domain clause, which was at its inception applicable only to the federal government. Is this an accident of history, or might it reflect a broader set of structural concerns? See McConnell, Contract Rights and Property Rights: A Case Study in the Relationship between Individual Liberties and the Constitutional Structure, 76 Cal. L. Rev. 267 (1988).

The contracts clause was designed above all to prevent states from enacting debtor relief and similar laws. See Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 122 (1819) (invalidating a New York law discharging debtors of their obligations upon surrender of their property); Green v. Biddle, 21 U.S. (8 Wheat.) 1 (1823) (invalidating a Kentucky law designed to make it harder for landowners to eject good-faith squatters). The first controversies over the clause involved three principal issues.

1. Prospective or retrospective only? What if a state does not reallocate rights under an existing contract but merely prohibits people from entering into certain sorts of contracts? In Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 213 (1827), the Court was confronted with the critical question whether the prohibition of contractual impairments applies only to contracts made before the passage of the allegedly “impairing” law. The case involved a state bankruptcy law passed before the parties had entered into the relevant contract. According to the Court, the law in effect at the time a contract is formed is “the law of the contract,” or a part of the contract, and therefore not an impairment at all within the meaning of the clause.

Chief Justice Marshall was in the minority—for the only time, in constitutional cases, during his thirty-four-year tenure as Chief Justice. He emphasized two points. First, in his view the text of the clause did not allow for a distinction between prospective and retrospective impairments. Second, Chief Justice Marshall stressed that the right to contractual freedom was a product of natural law. He said that the Court had forgotten that point by allowing positive law to dictate in advance the conditions under which contracts could go forward.

2. Interference with contracts under the police power. What if a state declares unenforceable existing contractual obligations through the exercise of its police power—as, for example, by prohibiting agreements calling for the sale of heroin, or for murder, or for a certain level of pollution? To what extent does the state’s reserved authority operate as an implicit qualification of the contracts clause?

In early cases, the Court ruled that the clause does not prohibit even retroactive contractual impairments if the state is operating pursuant to the police power. In Manigault v. Springs, 199 U.S. 473 (1905), neighboring landowners quarreled over a dam that one of them had built. After negotiations, the landowners agreed that the obstruction might continue for four more months, after which it would be removed, so that there would be a clear passage through the creek. The dam was accordingly removed. Several years later a statute was enacted that authorized one of the landowners to build a dam on the same creek. The statute, of course, destroyed the contractual obligation not to build a dam on the creek.

The Court upheld the statute, stating that the police power “is an exercise of the sovereign right of the government to protect the lives, health, morals, comfort, and general welfare of the people, and is paramount to any rights under contracts between individuals.” Thus, “parties by entering into contracts may not estop the legislature from enacting laws intended for the public good.” See also Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U.S. 814 (1880), where the Court said that no “legislature can bargain away the public health or the public morals.” (Should the state be required to give compensation in cases like Manigault and Stone? This question is explored in section H2 infra.)

In a sense, the police power exception is a direct outgrowth of the position that the contract clause does not prohibit prospective regulation. The police power itself is in place at the time that the contract is entered. Notice, though, that a police power “exception” might swallow the contract clause. If any effort that might be described as an attempt to protect the “general welfare” can justify a retroactive interference with rights acquired by contract, the clause furnishes little or no barrier to contractual impairments. Even debtor-relief legislation would be upheld, so long as the police power were understood to be sufficiently broad. For many years after Manigault, however, this risk did not materialize. The reason is that the police power comprehended a relatively narrow category of permissible government ends and certainly did not include the various forms of redistributive regulation characteristic of modern government.

3. Regulation versus impairment. In a number of early cases, the Court struggled with the issue of whether particular measures were “regulations” interfering with remedies or genuine impairments of contractual obligations. In this view, delays in time for performance might not interfere with “substantial rights”; they merely affected the remedy. But the distinction between rights and remedies might well be thought artificial. The line here was an “obscure” one, Worthen Co. v. Kavanaugh, 295 U.S. 56 (1935), but it did allow for some flexibility on the part of the legislature. See, e.g., Honeyman v. Jacobs, 306 U.S. 539 (1939) (upholding statute designed to prevent creditor from getting more by remedy than he would have obtained had contract been performed); Richmond Mortgage & Loan Corp. v. Wachovia Bank & Trust Co., 300 U.S. 124 (1937) (same); Curtis v. Whitney, 13 Wall. 68 (1872) (upholding statute providing that a deed may not issue unless a written notice had been served on any previous owner or occupant at least three months before; statute interfered with rights received by plaintiff who had received certificate entitling her to deed before statute had been passed); Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. 311 (1843) (noting that state may shorten the statute of limitations period or provide what articles may be liable to execution on judgment). See generally Hale, The Supreme Court and the Contract Clause, 57 Harv. L. Rev. 512, 621, 852 (1944); B. Wright, supra.

The following case is the starting point for modern contracts clause law.

Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell

290 U.S. 398 (1934)

[In the midst of the Great Depression, Minnesota passed a mortgage moratorium law to provide relief for homeowners threatened with foreclosure. The law, passed in 1933, declared an emergency and said that during the emergency period, courts could postpone mortgage sales and periods of redemption. Its provisions were to apply “only during the continuance of the emergency and in no event beyond May 1, 1935.” Pursuant to the statute, Blaisdell’s period of redemption was extended to May 1, 1935, subject in general to the payment by Blaisdell of $40 a month through the extended period. There was no dispute that the extension modified the lenders’ contractual rights of foreclosure. The lower court upheld the statute.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES delivered the opinion of the Court.

In determining whether the provision for this temporary and conditional relief exceeds the power of the State by reason of the clause in the Federal Constitution prohibiting impairment of the obligations of contracts, we must consider the relation of emergency to constitutional power, the historical setting of the contract clause, the development of the jurisprudence of this Court in the construction of that clause, and the principles of construction which we may consider to be established.

Emergency does not create power. Emergency does not increase granted power or remove or diminish the restrictions imposed upon power granted or reserved. The Constitution was adopted in a period of grave emergency. Its grants of power to the Federal Government and its limitations of the power of the States were determined in the light of emergency and they are not altered by emergency....

[In] the construction of the contract clause, the debates in the Constitutional Convention are of little aid. But the reasons which led to the adoption of that clause [are] not left in doubt. [The] widespread distress following the revolutionary period, and the plight of debtors, had called forth in the States an ignoble array of legislative schemes for the defeat of creditors and the invasion of contractual obligations. Legislative interferences had been so numerous and extreme that the confidence essential to prosperous trade had been undermined and the utter destruction of credit was threatened....

[The] constitutional provision [is] qualified by the measure of control which the State [retains] to safeguard the vital interests of its people. [Not] only are existing laws read into contracts in order to fix obligations as between the parties, but the reservation of essential attributes of sovereign power is also read into contracts as a postulate of the legal order. The policy of protecting contracts against impairment presupposes the maintenance of a government by virtue of which contractual relations are worth while,—a government which retains adequate authority to secure the peace and good order of society. This principle of harmonizing the constitutional prohibition with the necessary residuum of state power has had progressive recognition in the decisions of this Court....

The legislature cannot “bargain away the public health or the public morals.” [The] question is not whether the legislative action affects contracts incidentally, or directly or indirectly, but whether the legislation is addressed to a legitimate end and the measures taken are reasonable and appropriate to that end. [It is argued] that the state power may be addressed directly to the prevention of the enforcement of contracts only when these are of a sort which the legislature in its discretion may denounce as being in themselves hostile to public morals, or public health, safety or welfare, or where the prohibition is merely of injurious practices; that interference with the enforcement of other and valid contracts according to appropriate legal procedure, although the interference is temporary and for a public purpose, is not permissible....

Undoubtedly, whatever is reserved of state power must be consistent with the fair intent of the constitutional limitation of that power. The reserved power cannot be construed so as to destroy the limitation, nor is the limitation to be construed to destroy the reserved power in its essential aspects. They must be construed in harmony with each other. This principle precludes a construction which would permit the State to adopt as its policy the repudiation of debts or the destruction of contracts or the denial of means to enforce them. But it does not follow that conditions may not arise in which a temporary restraint of enforcement may be [constitutional]....

[There] has been a growing appreciation of public needs and of the necessity of finding ground for a rational compromise between individual rights and public welfare. The settlement and consequent contraction of the public domain, the pressure of a constantly increasing density of population, the interrelation of the activities of our people and the complexity of our economic interests, have inevitably led to an increased use of the organization of society in order to protect the very bases of individual opportunity. Where, in earlier days, it was thought that only the concerns of individuals or of classes were involved, and that those of the State itself were touched only remotely, it has later been found that the fundamental interests of the State are directly affected; and that the question is no longer merely that of one party to a contract as against another, but of the use of reasonable means to safeguard the economic structure upon which the good of all depends.

It is no answer to say that this public need was not apprehended a century ago, or to insist that what the provision of the Constitution meant to the vision of that day it must mean to the vision of our time. If by the statement that what the Constitution meant at the time of its adoption it means today, it is intended to say that the great clauses of the Constitution must be confined to the interpretation which the framers, with the conditions and outlook of their time, would have placed upon them, the statement carries its own refutation. It was to guard against such a narrow conception that Chief Justice Marshall uttered the memorable warning—"We must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding" [McCulloch v. Maryland]—"a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs." When we are dealing with the words of the Constitution, "we must realize that they have called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters....The case before us must be considered in the light of our whole experience and not merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago."

Nor is it helpful to attempt to draw a fine distinction between the intended meaning of the words of the Constitution and their intended application. When we consider the contract clause and the decisions which have expounded it in harmony with the essential reserved power of the States to protect the security of their peoples, we find no warrant for the conclusion that the clause has been warped by these decisions from its proper significance or that the founders of our Government would have interpreted the clause differently had they had occasion to assume that responsibility in the conditions of the later day. The vast body of law which has been developed was unknown to the fathers, but it is believed to have preserved the essential content and the spirit of the Constitution. With a growing recognition of public needs and the relation of individual right to public security, the court has sought to prevent the perversion of the clause through its use as an instrument to throttle the capacity of the States to protect their fundamental interests. This development is a growth from the seeds which the fathers planted. [The] principle of this development is, as we have seen, that the reservation of the reasonable exercise of the protective power of the State is read into all contracts....

Applying the criteria established by our decisions we conclude:

1. An emergency existed in Minnesota which furnished a proper occasion for the exercise of the reserved power of the State to protect the vital interests of the community. [The] finding of the legislature and state court has support in the facts of which we take judicial notice....

2. The legislation was addressed to a legitimate end, that is, the legislation was not for the mere advantage of particular individuals but for the protection of a basic interest of society.

3. In view of the nature of the contracts in question—mortgages of unquestionable validity—the relief afforded and justified by the emergency, in order not to contravene the constitutional provision, could only be of a character appropriate to that emergency and could be granted only upon reasonable conditions.

4. The conditions upon which the period of redemption is extended do not appear to be unreasonable....

5. The legislation is temporary in operation. It is limited to the exigency which called it forth.

We are of the opinion that the Minnesota statute as here applied does not violate the contract clause of the Federal Constitution. Whether the legislation is wise or unwise as a matter of policy is a question with which we are not concerned....

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Minnesota is affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND, dissenting.

[A] provision of the Constitution, it is hardly necessary to say, does not admit of two distinctly opposite interpretations. It does not mean one thing at one time and an entirely different thing at another time. If the contract impairment clause, when framed and adopted, meant that the terms of a contract for the payment of money could not be altered [by] a state statute enacted for the relief of hardly pressed debtors to the end and with the effect of postponing payment or enforcement during and because of an economic or financial emergency, it is but to state the obvious to say that it means the same now....

Following the Revolution, and prior to the adoption of the Constitution, the American people found themselves in a greatly impoverished condition. Their commerce had been well-nigh annihilated. They were not only without luxuries, but in great degree were destitute of the ordinary comforts and necessities of life.

In these circumstances they incurred indebtedness in the purchase of imported goods and otherwise, far beyond their capacity to pay. [The] circulation of depreciated currency became common. [This] state of things alarmed all thoughtful men, and led them to seek some effective remedy....

The defense of the Minnesota law is made upon grounds which were discountenanced by the makers of the Constitution. [That] defense should not now succeed, because it constitutes an effort to overthrow the constitutional provision by an appeal to facts and circumstances identical with those which brought it into existence. With due regard for the processes of logical thinking, it legitimately cannot be urged that conditions which produced the rule may now be invoked to destroy it....

It is quite true also that [general] statutes to put an end to lotteries, the sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquors, the maintenance of nuisances, to protect the public safety, etc., although they have the indirect effect of absolutely destroying private contracts previously made in contemplation of a continuance of the state of affairs then in existence but subsequently prohibited, have been uniformly upheld as not violating the contract impairment clause. The distinction between legislation of that character and the Minnesota statute, however, is readily observable....

[The Minnesota] statute denies appellant for a period of two years the ownership and possession of the property—an asset which [is] of substantial character, and which possibly may turn out to be of great value. The statute, therefore, is not merely a modification of the remedy; it effects a material and injurious change in the obligation....

If the provisions of the Constitution be not upheld when they pinch as well as when they comfort, they may as well be abandoned. Being unable to reach any other conclusion than that the Minnesota statute infringes the constitutional restriction under review, I have no choice but to say so.

[Justices Van Devanter, McReynolds, and Butler joined in this dissent.]

Note: Market Ordering and Constitutional Interpretation

1. The changing scope of the police power. The Court had long held that the contracts clause did not forbid states from impairing the obligations of contract if the impairment resulted from an exercise of the “police power,” the state’s traditional authority to protect its citizens from public harms. Why, then, was Blaisdell such an important case? The real shift came in the novel understanding of what the police power allowed, an understanding that resulted in a dramatic expansion of the permissible ends of government that would support a contractual impairment. That shift was part of the New Deal reformulation of the constitutional structure; it contemplated a large role for government in readjusting the benefits and burdens of social life. Was the Court correct to broaden the police power? Didn't the Minnesota statute implicate precisely the evil at which the clause was originally aimed?

Compare the Court's narrow interpretation of the contracts clause to its broad interpretation of free speech protection in the first amendment. See generally Chapter 7 infra. Is the Court justified in using the contracts clause to invalidate far less than its drafters intended, while using the first amendment to invalidate far more? Note in particular that the state's "police power" may be used only in very narrow circumstances to justify infringements on freedom of expression.

2. Blaisdell and constitutional interpretation. The Court suggests that the framers' own expected application of the contracts clause is not controlling. Indeed, it says that the notion that "what the Constitution meant at the time of its adoption it means today [carries] its own refutation." This is one of the most candid statements by the Court that a constitutional decision is not based on the framers' original expected application. Is the statement consistent with the "new originalism?" See section A, supra. Is this merely another way of saying that "it is a Constitution we are expounding," or might it go far beyond what Chief Justice Marshall had in mind?

3. The contracts clause after Blaisdell. After Blaisdell, what does the contracts clause prohibit? The answer appears to be very little. Consider, for example, El Paso v. Simmons, 379 U.S. 497 (1965). The case grew out of a 1910 sale by the state of Texas, by contract, of public land. State law provided for the termination of the contract and forfeiture of the land for nonpayment of interest, and in such a case, the purchaser could reinstate his claim on request and with payment of delinquent interest. In 1941, the state amended the law, limiting reinstatement rights to claims asserted five years from the date of forfeiture. The 1941 law operated to impair rights acquired under the 1910 contract.

The Court upheld the law, referring to its purpose "to restore confidence in the stability and integrity of land titles" and to end "the imbroglio over land titles in Texas." Justice Black, in dissent, compared the Court's decision to "balancing away the First Amendment's unequivocally guaranteed rights." See also East New York Bank v. Hahn, 326 U.S. 230 (1945) (upholding an extension of mortgage moratorium legislation); Veix v. Sixth Ward, 310 U.S. 32 (1940) (upholding right of states to restrict right of certificate holders to withdraw or recover amounts of certificates).

UNITED STATES TRUST CO. v. NEW JERSEY, 431 U.S. 1 (1977). A New Jersey statute, in conjunction with a parallel New York provision, repealed a statutory covenant, made by the two states in 1962, that limited the ability of the Port Authority of New Jersey and New York to subsidize rail passenger transportation from revenues and reserves. The covenant had been adopted in order to provide special security for the bondholders against competition from rail transportation. But New Jersey and New York later concluded that subsidization was necessary to improve conservation and to advance rail transit. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Blackmun, invalidated the repeal of the covenant:

“The trial court concluded that repeal of the 1962 covenant was a valid exercise of New Jersey’s police power because repeal served important public interests in mass transportation, energy conservation, and environmental protection. [Yet] the Contract Clause limits otherwise legitimate exercises of state legislative authority, and the existence of an important public interest is not always sufficient to overcome that limitation....

“[In] applying this standard, [complete] deference to a legislative assessment of reasonableness and necessity is not appropriate [when] the State’s self-interest is at stake. A governmental entity can always find a use for extra money, especially when taxes do not have to be raised. If a State could reduce its financial obligations whenever it wanted to spend the money for what it regarded as an important public purpose, the Contract Clause would provide no protection at all....

“Mass transportation, energy conservation, and environmental protection are goals that are important and of legitimate public concern. Appellees contend that these goals are so important that any harm to bondholders from repeal of the 1962 covenant is greatly outweighed by the public benefit. We do not accept this invitation to engage in a utilitarian comparison of public benefit and private loss. Contrary to Mr. Justice Black’s fear, expressed in sole dissent in [El Paso], the Court has not ‘balanced away’ the limitation on state action imposed by the Contract Clause. Thus a State cannot refuse to meet its legitimate financial obligations simply because it would prefer to spend the money to promote the public good rather than the private welfare of its creditors. We can only sustain the repeal of the 1962 covenant if that impairment was both reasonable and necessary to serve the admittedly important purposes claimed by the State.

“The more specific justification offered for the repeal of the 1962 covenant was the States’ plan for encouraging users of private automobiles to shift to public transportation. The States intended to discourage private automobile use by raising bridge and tunnel tolls and to use the extra revenue from those tolls to subsidize improved commuter railroad service. Appellees contend that repeal of the 1962 covenant was necessary to implement this plan because the new mass transit facilities could not possibly be self-supporting and the covenant's 'permitted deficits' level had already been exceeded. We reject this justification because the repeal was neither necessary to achievement of the plan nor reasonable in light of the circumstances.

"The determination of necessity can be considered on two levels. First, it cannot be said that total repeal of the covenant was essential; a less drastic modification would have permitted the contemplated plan without entirely removing the covenant's limitations on the use of Port Authority revenues and reserves to subsidize commuter railroads. Second, without modifying the covenant at all, the States could have adopted alternative means of achieving their twin goals of discouraging automobile use and improving mass transit....

"During the 12-year period between adoption of the covenant and its repeal, public perception of the importance of mass transit undoubtedly grew because of increased general concern with environmental protection and energy conservation. But these concerns were not unknown in 1962, and the subsequent changes were of degree and not of kind. We cannot say that these changes caused the covenant to have a substantially different impact in 1974 than when it was adopted in 1962. And we cannot conclude that the repeal was reasonable in the light of changed circumstances."

Justice Brennan, joined by Justices White and Marshall, dissented:

"One of the fundamental premises of our popular democracy is that each generation of representatives can and will remain responsive to the needs and desires of those whom they represent. Crucial to this end is the assurance that new legislators will not automatically be bound by the policies and undertakings of earlier days. In accordance with this philosophy, the Framers of our Constitution conceived of the Contract Clause primarily as protection for economic transactions entered into by purely private parties, rather than obligations involving the State itself. The Framers fully recognized that nothing would so jeopardize the legitimacy of a system of government that relies upon the ebbs and flows of politics to 'clean out the rascals' than the possibility that those same rascals might perpetuate their policies simply by locking them into binding contracts. [But Contract] Clause challenges [are] to be resolved by according unusual deference to the lawmaking authority of state and local governments....

"I would not want to be read as suggesting that the States should blithely proceed down the path of repudiating their obligations, financial or otherwise. Their credibility in the credit market obviously is highly dependent on exercising their vast lawmaking powers with self-restraint and [discipline]. [But the] role to be played by the Constitution is at most a limited one. [For] this Court should have learned long ago that the Constitution—be it through the Contract or Due Process Clause—can actively intrude into such economic and policy matters only if my Brethren are prepared to bear enormous institutional and social costs. Because I consider the potential dangers of such judicial interference to be intolerable, I dissent.”

ALLIED STRUCTURAL STEEL CO. v. SPANNAUS, 438 U.S. 234 (1978). Allied Structural Steel Co. maintained an office in Illinois with thirty employees. The company operated a general pension plan under which it retained unrestricted rights (1) to amend the plan in whole or in part and (2) to terminate the plan and to distribute the assets at any time and for any reason. Employees were thus entitled to benefits if they worked until reaching age sixty-five and if the company remained in business and elected to continue the plan. The Minnesota legislature enacted a Private Pension Benefits Protection Act, under which employers would be subject to a “pension funding charge” if they terminated the plan or closed a Minnesota office. The charge was assessed if pension funds did not cover full pensions for at least ten years. Under the act, employers must satisfy the deficiency by purchasing deferred annuities, payable to employees at their normal retirement age. Periods of employment prior to the effective date of the act were to be included in the ten-year employment criterion. Allied Structural Steel attempted to terminate its operation in Minnesota; the state informed the company that it owed a pension funding charge of $185,000; and the company brought suit, claiming that the act unconstitutionally impaired its contractual obligations.

The Court, in an opinion by Justice Stewart, responded:

“There can be no question of the impact of the Minnesota Private Pension Benefits Protection Act upon the company’s contractual relationships with its employees. [The] Contract Clause remains part of the Constitution. It is not a dead letter....

“[If] the Contract Clause is to retain any meaning at all, [it] must be understood to impose some limits upon the power of a State to abridge existing contractual relationships, even in the exercise of its otherwise legitimate police power....

“In applying these principles to the present case, the first inquiry must be whether the state law has, in fact, operated as a substantial impairment of a contractual relationship. [Minimal] alteration of contractual obligations may end the inquiry at its first stage. Severe impairment, on the other hand, will push the inquiry to a careful examination of the nature and purpose of the state legislation....

“Here, the company’s contracts of employment with its employees included as a fringe benefit or additional form of compensation, the pension plan. The company’s maximum obligation was to set aside each year an amount based on the plan’s requirements for vesting. [The] company [had] no reason to anticipate that its employees’ pension rights could become vested except in accordance with the terms of the plan. It relied heavily, and reasonably, on this legitimate contractual expectation in calculating its annual contributions to the pension fund.

“The effect of Minnesota’s Private Pension Benefits Protection Act on this contractual obligation was severe. The company was required in 1974 to have made its contributions throughout the pre-1974 life of its plan as if employees’ pension rights had vested after 10 years, instead of vesting in accord with the terms of the plan. Thus a basic term of the pension contract—one on which the company had relied for 10 years—was substantially modified. [The] Act thus forced a current recalculation of the past 10 years’ contributions based on the new, unanticipated 10-year vesting requirement.

“[Moreover,] the retroactive state-imposed vesting requirement was applied only to those employers who terminated their pension plans or who, like the company, closed their Minnesota offices. The company was thus forced to make all the retroactive changes in its contractual obligations at one time. By simply proceeding to close its office in Minnesota, a move that had been planned before the passage of the Act, the company was assessed an immediate pension funding charge of approximately $185,000.

“[Yet] there is no showing in the record before us that this severe disruption of contractual expectations was necessary to meet an important general social problem....

“[The statute] clearly has an extremely narrow focus. It applies only to private employers who have at least 100 employees, at least one of whom works in Minnesota, and who have established voluntary private pension plans, qualified under §401 of the Internal Revenue Code. And it applies only when such an employer closes his Minnesota office or terminates his pension plan. Thus, this law can hardly be characterized, like the law at issue in the Blaisdell case, as one enacted to protect a broad societal interest rather than a narrow class. [This] legislation, imposing a sudden, totally unanticipated, and substantial retroactive obligation upon the company to its employees, was not enacted to deal with a situation remotely approaching the broad and desperate emergency economic conditions of the early 1930’s—conditions of which the Court in Blaisdell took judicial notice.

"[If] the Contract Clause means anything at all, it means that Minnesota could not constitutionally do what it tried to do to the company in this case."

Justice Brennan, joined by Justices White and Marshall, dissented:

"The Act does not relieve either the employer or his employees of any existing contract obligation. Rather, the Act simply creates an additional, supplemental duty of the employer, no different in kind from myriad duties created by a wide variety of legislative measures which defeat settled expectations but which have nonetheless been sustained by this Court. For this reason, the Minnesota Act, in my view, does not implicate the Contract Clause in any way...."

"[Under] the Court's opinion, any law that may be characterized as 'superimposing' new obligations on those provided for by contract is to be regarded as creating 'sudden, substantial, and unanticipated burdens' and then to be subjected to the most exacting scrutiny. The validity of such a law will turn upon whether judges see it as a law that deals with a generalized social problem, whether it is temporary (as few will be) or permanent, whether it operates in an area previously subject to regulation, and, finally, whether its duties apply to a broad class of persons. [The] necessary consequence of the extreme malleability of these rather vague criteria is to vest judges with broad subjective discretion to protect property interests that happen to appeal to them."

"To permit this level of scrutiny of laws that interfere with contract-based expectations is an anomaly. There is nothing sacrosanct about expectations rooted in contract that justify according them a constitutional immunity denied other property rights."

Note: United States Trust, Spannaus, and the Nonrevival of the Contracts Clause

1. "Heightened scrutiny" for a state's abrogation of its own contracts. Two features of United States Trust are noteworthy: first, the willingness to adopt "heightened scrutiny" for a state's abrogation of its own contracts; second, the willingness to invalidate a state law under the contracts clause. The first element is in one sense familiar in constitutional law. The Court frequently adopts "heightened scrutiny"—in the form of a careful examination of means/ends connections and a search for less restrictive alternatives—when there is special reason for suspicion that an impermissible motivation is at work.

But which way does the state's involvement cut? Might not heightened scrutiny be appropriate when a state decides to bargain away its sovereign powers in a contract with a private party? One the other hand, one might think that the fact that a state abrogates a contract to which it is a party gives reason to believe that a state's self-interest, rather than some public good, is at stake. Is there a difference between a state's interest and some public good? If so, what is the impermissible end that the Court thought might be at work when a state abrogates its own contract? Note also the possibility that the Court was concerned with effects as well as purpose—the special obligation of government not to break its own promises.

2. The police power and means/ends connections under the contracts clause. In United States Trust, why did the Court conclude that the means/ends connection was too weak? Was Spannaus a stronger or weaker case in this regard?

3. Subsequent developments. United States Trust and Spannaus suggested that the Court might revive the contracts clause as a substantive constraint on legislation. But shortly thereafter the Court returned to its previous, more deferential approach. Consider in this regard Energy Reserves Group v. Kansas Power & Light, 459 U.S. 400 (1983). The contract at issue contained a price escalator clause that provided that, if a governmental authority fixes a price for natural gas that is higher than the price specified in the contract, the contract price would be increased to that level. A Kansas statute provided that the increase produced by a federal statute could not be taken into account in determining the contract price. The Energy Reserves Group attacked the statute on the ground that it impaired the contractual obligation by allowing for an increase in the price. In an opinion by Justice Blackmun, the Court responded:

The threshold inquiry is “whether the state law has, in fact, operated as a substantial impairment of contractual relationship.” The severity of the impairment is said to increase the level of scrutiny to which the legislation will be subjected. [In] determining the extent of the impairment, we are to consider whether the industry the complaining party has entered has been regulated in the past.

If the state regulation constitutes a substantial impairment, the State, in justification, must have a significant and legitimate public purpose behind the regulation, such as the remedying of a broad and general social or economic problem. Furthermore, since Blaisdell, the Court has indicated that the public purpose need not be addressed to an emergency or temporary situation. One legitimate state interest is the elimination of unforeseen windfall profits. The requirement of a legitimate public purpose guarantees that the State is exercising its police power, rather than providing a benefit to special interests.

Once a legitimate public purpose has been identified, the next inquiry is whether the adjustment of the rights and responsibilities of contracting parties is based upon reasonable conditions and is of a character appropriate to the public purpose justifying the legislation's adoption. Unless the state is itself a contracting party, "as is customary in reviewing economic and social regulation," [courts] properly defer to legislative judgment as to the necessity and reasonableness of a particular measure.

The Court upheld the statute. First, it suggested that there was no substantial impairment: "Significant here is the fact that the parties are operating in a heavily regulated industry." Thus, "ERG knew its contractual rights were subject to alteration by state price regulation. Price regulation existed and was foreseeable as the type of law that would alter contract obligations."

The Court also concluded that any contractual impairment "rests on, and is prompted by, significant and legitimate state interests." The Court referred to two such interests. The first was the protection of consumers from the escalation of prices caused by deregulation. "The State could reasonably find that higher gas prices have caused and will cause hardship among those who use gas heat but must exist on limited fixed incomes." The second interest was "correcting the imbalance between the interstate and intrastate markets by permitting intrastate prices to rise only to the [interstate] level." Justice Powell, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Rehnquist, concurred, agreeing that there had been no substantial impairment but refusing to reach the question whether any impairment had in the circumstances been justified.

Consider also Exxon Corp. v. Eagerton, 462 U.S. 176 (1983), which involved a state statute prohibiting producers of oil and gas from passing on to consumers the costs of any increase in a state's severance tax. The Court replied that the contracts clause did not prohibit "a generally applicable rule of conduct designed to advance 'broad social interest,' protecting consumers from excessive prices." Do Energy Reserves and Exxon implicitly overrule Spannaus?

The Court adopted a similarly deferential stance in the face of a contract clause claim in Keystone Bituminous Coal Association v. DeBenedictis, 480 U.S. 470 (1987). A Pennsylvania statute had the effect of voiding damage waivers that coal companies had obtained from surface owners for damage to surface property caused by mining. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Stevens, upheld the statute. In the Court's view, the state had a strong public interest in preventing the environmental harm caused by the mining. Moreover, in cases where the state itself is not a contracting party, courts should defer to the legislative judgment as to the necessity and reasonableness of the contractual abrogation.

In General Motors Corp. v. Romein, 503 U.S. 181 (1992), the Court upheld a substantial change in a workers' compensation program. In 1980, Michigan had raised the level of maximum benefits; in 1981, it allowed employers to decrease the level of the relevant benefits to disabled employees who could receive compensation from other employer-funded sources. The Michigan Supreme Court ruled that under the 1981 law employers could reduce benefits to all workers, including those injured before the statute's effective date. In 1987, the legislature repudiated this ruling and said that employers must make refunds to the previously disabled workers. According to the United States Supreme Court, there was no problem under the contracts clause because the allegedly impaired contracts contained "no contractual agreement regarding the specific workers' compensation terms allegedly at issue." The Court rejected the claim that their statutory right to rely on past payment periods as "closed" was incorporated by law into employment contracts. "[W]e have not held that all state regulations are implied terms of every contract entered into while they are effective."

The Court added:

The 1987 statute did not change the legal enforceability of the employment contracts here. Moreover, petitioners' suggestion that we should read every workplace regulation into the private arrangements of employers and employees would expand the definition of contract so far that the constitutional provision would lose its anchoring purpose, i.e., "[enabling] individuals to order their personal and business affairs according to their particular needs and interests." Instead, the Clause would protect against all changes in legislation.

4. Concluding thoughts. Consider the following evaluation: Modern review under the contract clause is substantially identical to modern rationality review under the due process and equal protection clauses. In all three contexts, the Court engages in the same inquiry, identifying the legitimate state interests and requiring a rough relation between the legitimate state interests and the measure under review. But the class of legitimate state interests is extremely broad; the Court has permitted any justification other than raw political power (the "special interest" problem referred to in the Energy Reserves case). This idea seems to follow from an understanding, prominent in the post-New Deal period, that existing distributions are never prepolitical and often unjust, and therefore a matter for democratic control. Moreover, the fit between the legitimate interest and the measure under review need not be close.

Is it troublesome that the Court has adopted the same test in all three areas, even though the contracts clause looks like an explicit limitation on contractual impairment?

2. The Eminent Domain Clause

The eminent domain clause provides, “[N]or shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.” The clause has two requirements: (1) All takings must be for public use, and (2) even takings that are for public use must be accompanied by compensation. Consider here, as with the contracts clause, whether and how interpretation of the eminent domain clause differs from interpretation of the first amendment on the one hand, and treatment of “implied” fundamental rights on the other. Consider also how the clause interacts with competing notions about the role of government in redistributing wealth.

What is the evil at which the eminent domain clause is aimed? The history of the clause is quite sparse, but the answer involves at least some sorts of redistribution of resources. The clause reflects a judgment that, if government is seeking to produce some public benefit (the public use requirement), it is appropriate that the payment come from the public at large—taxpayers—rather than from identifiable individuals. The compensation requirement operates as insurance to that effect. Note, in addition, that compensation tends to reduce the likelihood that a transfer has occurred merely to benefit A at the expense of B. Public willingness to pay for the transfer suggests that some general public good is at work. We begin with the logically prior public use requirement.

In Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff, 467 U.S. 229 (1984), a unanimous Court, in an opinion by Justice O’Connor upheld a Hawaii statute that authorized Hawaii Housing Authority (HHA) to condemn the property on behalf of tenants when it found that acquisition by the state effectuated the public purposes of the Act. The Court held that the land condemnation was for a “public use.” It quoted from its earlier decision, Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26 (1954), where it had upheld a District of Columbia urban renewal plan:

We deal [with] what traditionally has been known as the police power. An attempt to define its reach or trace its outer limits is fruitless, for each case must turn on its own facts. The definition is essentially the product of legislative determinations addressed to the purposes of government, purposes neither abstractly nor historically capable of complete definition. Subject to specific constitutional limitations, when the legislature has spoken, the public interest has been declared in terms well-nigh conclusive. In such cases the legislature, not the judiciary, is the main guardian of the public needs to be served by social legislation.

The Midkiff Court characterized its role as “extremely narrow.”

To be sure, the Court’s cases have repeatedly stated that “one person’s property may not be taken for the benefit of another private person without a justifying public purpose, even though compensation be paid.” [But] where the exercise of the eminent domain power is rationally related to a conceivable public purpose, the Court has never held a compensated taking to be proscribed by the [clause].

In this case, the Court found that the statute was rationally related to the legitimate public purpose of reducing “the perceived social and economic evils of a land [oligopoly]” in Hawaii and that the condemnation was therefore constitutionally permissible.

KELO V. CITY OF NEW LONDON, 545 U.S. 469 (2005). Decades of decline in New London, Connecticut, caused state and city officials to target the city for economic revitalization. In 1998, Pfizer Inc. announced that it would build a $300 million research facility in the city. In an effort to capitalize on the new Pfizer facility, the city council approved a redevelopment plan requiring the acquisition of a ninety-acre area adjoining the facility. The plan called for the creation of a waterfront conference hotel, a marina, restaurants, retail stores, and offices. Petitioners, including Wilhelmina Dery, who had been born in her house in 1918 and lived there all her life, challenged the condemnation of their property pursuant to the plan on the ground that it violated the public use requirement.

Justice Stevens delivered the opinion of the Court:

“[Petitioners] urge us to adopt a new bright-line rule that economic development does not qualify as a public use. Putting aside the unpersuasive suggestion that the City’s plan will provide only purely economic benefits, neither precedent nor logic supports petitioners’ proposal. Promoting economic development is a traditional and long-accepted function of government. There is, moreover, no principled way of distinguishing economic development from the other public purposes that we have recognized....

“It is further argued that without a bright-line rule nothing would stop a city from transferring citizen A’s property to citizen B for the sole reason that citizen B will put the property to a more productive use and thus pay more taxes. Such a one-to-one transfer of property, executed outside the confines of an integrated development plan, is not presented in this case. While such an unusual exercise of government power would certainly raise a suspicion that a private purpose was afoot, the hypothetical cases posited by petitioners can be confronted if and when they arise. They do not warrant the crafting of an artificial restriction on the concept of public use.

“Alternatively, petitioners maintain that for takings of this kind we should require a ‘reasonable certainty’ that the expected public benefits will actually accrue. Such a rule, however, would represent an even greater departure from our precedent. ‘When the legislature’s purpose is legitimate and its means are not irrational, our cases make clear that empirical debates over the wisdom of takings—no less than debates over the wisdom of other kinds of socioeconomic legislation—are not to be carried out in the federal courts.’ [Midkiff.]”

Justice Kennedy filed a concurring opinion. While agreeing with the majority that a rational basis approach was the appropriate level of review in public use cases, he emphasized that deferential review “does not [alter] the fact that transfers intended to confer benefits on particular, favored private entities, and with only incidental or pretextual public benefits, are forbidden by the Public Use Clause.” According to Justice Kennedy, “[a] court applying rational-basis review under the Public Use Clause should strike down a taking that, by a clear showing, is intended to favor a particular private party, with only incidental or pretextual public benefits, just as a court applying rational-basis review under the Equal Protection Clause must strike down a government classification that is clearly intended to injure a particular class of private parties, with only incidental or pretextual public justifications.” In addition, Justice Kennedy observed that a more stringent standard of review [might] be appropriate for a more narrowly drawn category of takings. There may be private transfers in which the risk of undetected impermissible favoritism of private parties is so acute that a presumption (rebuttable or otherwise) of invalidity is warranted under the Public Use Clause. This demanding level of scrutiny, however, is not required simply because the purpose of the taking is economic development.

Justice O’Connor dissented in an opinion joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Thomas:

“Today, the Court abandons [a] long-held, basic limitation on government power. Under the banner of economic development, all private property is now vulnerable to being taken and transferred to another private owner, so long as it might be upgraded—i.e., given to an owner who will use it in a way that the legislature deems more beneficial to the public—in the process. To reason, as the Court does, that the incidental public benefits resulting from the subsequent ordinary use of private property render economic development takings ‘for public use’ is to wash out any distinction between private and public use of property—and thereby effectively to delete the words ‘for public use’ from the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment.”

Justice O’Connor distinguished Midkiff and Berman v. Parker on the ground that these cases had involved condemnation of property that was imposing an “affirmative harm on society—in Berman through blight resulting from extreme poverty and in Midkiff through oligopoly resulting from extreme wealth.”

Justice Thomas filed a separate dissent in which he argued that the public use clause, as originally understood, allowed to government to take property only if after the condemnation the government owned the property or the public had a legal right to use the property. Consider also the following observations at the end of Justice Thomas’s opinion:

“Allowing the government to take property solely for public purposes is bad enough, but extending the concept of public purpose to encompass any economically beneficial goal guarantees that these losses will fall disproportionately on poor communities. Those communities are not only systematically less likely to put their lands to the highest and best social use, but are also the least politically powerful. If ever there were justification for intrusive judicial review of constitutional provisions that protect ‘discrete and insular minorities,’ surely that principle would apply with great force to the powerless groups and individuals the Public Use Clause protects....

“[The] legacy of this Court’s ‘public purpose’ test [is] an unhappy one. In the 1950’s, no doubt emboldened in part by the expansive understanding of ‘public use’ this Court adopted in Berman, cities ‘rushed to draw plans’ for downtown development. ‘Of all the families displaced by urban renewal from 1949 through 1963, 63 percent of those whose race was known were nonwhite, and of these families, 56 percent of nonwhites and 38 percent of whites had incomes low enough to qualify for public housing, which, however, was seldom available to them.’ Public works projects in the 1950’s and 1960’s destroyed predominantly minority communities in St. Paul, Minnesota, and Baltimore, Maryland. In 1981, urban planners in Detroit, Michigan, uprooted the largely ‘lower-income and elderly’ Poletown neighborhood for the benefit of the General Motors Corporation. Urban renewal projects have long been associated with the displacement of blacks; ‘[i]n cities across the country, urban renewal came to be known as “Negro removal.”’ Over 97 percent of the individuals forcibly removed from their homes by the ‘slum-clearance’ project upheld by this Court in Berman were black. Regrettably, the predictable consequence of the Court's decision will be to exacerbate these effects."

Note: The Public Use Requirement and the Takings Clause

1. Public use after Midkiff and Kelo. The public use requirement is designed to ensure against what might be called "naked" wealth transfers—takings from A in order to benefit B, supported by no "public" end, and only by a preference for B, or by B's political power. Compare Justice Chase's position in Calder v. Bull, Chapter 1 supra, also complaining about a taking from A to benefit B. Note that the requirement assumes that there are "public" ends that differ from the mere exercise of political power. Is the assumption warranted?

Assuming that it is, does the Court's deferential standard of review adequately protect against the evil it identifies?

2. Poletown. Consider Poletown Neighborhood Council v. City of Detroit, 410 Mich. 616, 304 N.W.2d 455 (1981), referred to in Justice Thomas's Kelo dissent, in which the city of Detroit condemned a neighborhood in order to permit General Motors to build a plant on the land. Was the taking for public use? Suppose the plant would employ a large number of people now on welfare or without jobs. If a General Motors plant was condemned and transferred for use by the community, would there also be a public use? Is it troublesome if the answer to both questions is yes? See also Rubenfeld, Usings, 102 Yale L.J. 1077 (1993), which argues that the takings clause is directed only against governmental "usings" of private property, that is, against situations in which government officials actually use the property that has been taken.

3. Public use, compensation, and "takings." Notice that even if a taking is for a public use, the owner is still entitled to "just compensation." But the compensation right applies only if "property" is "taken." What should count as a government "taking?" Consider the following:

Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon

260 U.S. 393 (1922)

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a bill in equity brought by the [plaintiffs] to prevent the Pennsylvania Coal Company from mining under their property in such way as to remove the supports and cause a subsidence of the surface and of their house. The bill sets out a deed executed by the Coal Company in 1878, under which the plaintiffs claim. The deed conveys the surface, but in express terms reserves the right to remove all the coal under the same, and the grantee takes the premises with the risk, and waives all claim for damages that may arise from mining out the coal. But the plaintiffs say that whatever may have been the Coal Company's rights, they were taken away by an Act of Pennsylvania, [commonly] known there as the Kohler Act....

The statute forbids the mining of anthracite coal in such way as to cause the subsidence of, among other things, any structure used as a human habitation, with certain exceptions, including among them land where the surface is owned by the owner of the underlying coal and is distant more than one hundred and fifty feet from any improved property belonging to any other person. As applied to this case the statute is admitted to destroy previously existing rights of property and contract. The question is whether the police power can be stretched so far.

Government hardly could go on if to some extent values incident to property could not be diminished without paying for every such change in the general law. As long recognized, some values are enjoyed under an implied limitation and must yield to the police power. But obviously the implied limitation must have its limits, or the contract and due process clauses are gone. One fact for consideration in determining such limits is the extent of the diminution. When it reaches a certain magnitude, in most if not in all cases there must be an exercise of eminent domain and compensation to sustain the act. So the question depends upon the particular facts. The greatest weight is given to the judgment of the legislature, but it always is open to interested parties to contend that the legislature has gone beyond its constitutional power....

[It] is our opinion that the act cannot be sustained as an exercise of the police power, so far as it affects the mining of coal under streets or cities in places where the right to mine such coal has been reserved. [What] makes the right to mine coal valuable is that it can be exercised with profit. To make it commercially impracticable to mine certain coal has very nearly the same effect for constitutional purposes as appropriating or destroying it. This we think that we are warranted in assuming that the statute does....

The rights of the public in a street purchased or laid out by eminent domain are those that it has paid for. If in any case its representatives have been so short sighted as to acquire only surface rights without the right of support, we see no more authority for supplying the latter without compensation than there was for taking the right of way in the first place and refusing to pay for it because the public wanted it very much. The protection of private property in the Fifth Amendment presupposes that it is wanted for public use, but provides that it shall not be taken for such use without compensation. [When] this seemingly absolute protection is found to be qualified by the police power, the natural tendency of human nature is to extend the qualification more and more until at last private property disappears. But that cannot be accomplished in this way under the Constitution of the United States.

The general rule at least is, that while property may be regulated to a certain extent, if regulation goes too far it will be recognized as a taking. [In] general it is not plain that a man's misfortunes or necessities will justify his shifting the damages to his neighbor's shoulders. We are in danger of forgetting that a strong public desire to improve the public condition is not enough to warrant achieving the desire by a shorter cut than the constitutional way of paying for the change. As we already have said, this is a question of degree—and therefore cannot be disposed of by general propositions.

[We] assume, of course, that the statute was passed upon the conviction that an exigency existed that would warrant it, and we assume that an exigency exists that would warrant the exercise of eminent domain. But the question at bottom is upon whom the loss of the changes desired should fall. So far as private persons or communities have seen fit to take the risk of acquiring only surface rights, we cannot see that the fact that their risk has become a danger warrants the giving to them greater rights than they bought....

Decree reversed.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS, dissenting....

[Coal] in place is land; and the right of the owner to use his land is not absolute. He may not so use it as to create a public nuisance; and uses, once harmless, may, owing to changed conditions, seriously threaten the public welfare. Whenever they do, the legislature has power to prohibit such uses without paying compensation; and the power to prohibit extends alike to the manner, the character and the purpose of the use. Are we justified in declaring that the Legislature of Pennsylvania has, in restricting the right to mine anthracite, exercised this power so arbitrarily as to violate the Fourteenth Amendment?

Every restriction upon the use of property imposed in the exercise of the police power deprives the owner of some right theretofore enjoyed, and is, in that sense, an abridgment by the State of rights in property without making compensation. But restriction imposed to protect the public health, safety or morals from dangers threatened is not a taking. The restriction here in question is merely the prohibition of a noxious use. The property so restricted remains in the possession of its owner. The state does not appropriate it or make any use of it. The State merely prevents the owner from making a use which interferes with paramount rights of the public. Whenever the use prohibited ceases to be noxious,—as it may because of further change in local or social conditions,—the restriction will have to be removed and the owner will again be free to enjoy his property as heretofore.

The restriction upon the use of this property cannot, of course, be lawfully imposed, unless its purpose is to protect the public. But the purpose of a restriction does not cease to be public, because incidentally some private persons may thereby receive gratuitously valuable special benefits. [Restriction] upon use does not become inappropriate as a means, merely because it deprives the owner of the only use to which the property can then be profitably put. [Nor] is a restriction imposed through exercise of the police power inappropriate as a means, merely because the same end might be effected through exercise of the power of eminent domain, or otherwise at public expense. Every restriction upon the height of buildings might be secured through acquiring by eminent domain the right of each owner to build above the limiting height; but it is settled that the State need not resort to that power....

[If] by mining anthracite coal the owner would necessarily unloose poisonous gasses, I suppose no one would doubt the power of the State to prevent the mining, without buying his coal fields. And why may not the State, likewise, without paying compensation, prohibit one from digging so deep or excavating so near the surface, as to expose the community to like dangers?...

It is said that one fact for consideration in determining whether the limits of the police power have been exceeded is the extent of the resulting diminution in value; and that here the restriction destroys existing rights of property and contract. But values are relative. [For] aught that appears the value of the coal kept in place by the restriction may be negligible as compared with the value of the whole property, or even as compared with that part of it which is represented by the coal remaining in place and which may be extracted despite the statute.

[A] prohibition of mining which causes subsidence of [structures] and facilities is obviously enacted for a public purpose. [Yet] it is said that these provisions of the act cannot be sustained as an exercise of the police power where the right to mine such coal has been reserved. The conclusion seems to rest upon the assumption that in order to justify such exercise of the police power there must be “an average reciprocity of advantage” as between the owner of the property restricted and the rest of the community; and that here such reciprocity is absent. Reciprocity of advantage is an important consideration, and may even be an essential, where the State’s power is exercised for the purpose of conferring benefits upon the property of a neighborhood. [But] where the police power is exercised, not to confer benefits upon property owners, but to protect the public from detriment and danger, there is, in my opinion, no room for considering reciprocity of advantage.

Miller v. Schoene

276 U.S. 272 (1928)

MR. JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

Acting under the Cedar Rust Act of Virginia, [the] state entomologist ordered the plaintiffs in error to cut down a large number of ornamental red cedar trees growing on their property, as a means of preventing the communication of a rust or plant disease with which they were infected to the apple orchards in the vicinity. The plaintiffs in error appealed from the order to the circuit court of Shenandoah county which, after a hearing and a consideration of evidence, affirmed the order and allowed to plaintiffs in error $100 to cover the expense of removal of the cedars. Neither the judgment of the court nor the statute as interpreted allows compensation for the value of the standing cedars or the decrease in the market value of the realty caused by their destruction whether considered as ornamental trees or otherwise....

[Cedar] rust is an infectious plant disease in the form of a fungoid organism which is destructive of the fruit and foliage of the apple, but without effect on the value of the cedar. Its life cycle has two phases which are passed alternately as a growth on red cedar and on apple trees. It is communicated by spores from one to the other over a radius of at least two miles. It appears not to be communicable between trees of the same species but only from one species to the other, and other plants seem not to be appreciably affected by it. The only practicable method of controlling the disease and protecting apple trees from its ravages is the destruction of all red cedar trees, subject to the infection, located within two miles of apple orchards.

The red cedar, aside from its ornamental use, has occasional use and value as lumber. It is indigenous to Virginia, is not cultivated or dealt in commercially on any substantial scale, and its value throughout the state is shown to be small as compared with that of the apple orchards of the state. Apple growing is one of the principal agricultural pursuits in Virginia. The apple is used there and exported in large quantities. Many millions of dollars are invested in the orchards, which furnish employment for a large portion of the population, and have induced the development of attendant railroad and cold storage facilities.

On the evidence we may accept the conclusion of the Supreme Court of Appeals that the state was under the necessity of making a choice between the preservation of one class of property and that of the other wherever both existed in dangerous proximity. It would have been none the less a choice if, instead of enacting the present statute, the state, by doing nothing, had permitted serious injury to the apple orchards within its borders to go on unchecked. When forced to such a choice the state does not exceed its constitutional powers by deciding upon the destruction of one class of property in order to save another which, in the judgment of the legislature, is of greater value to the public. It will not do to say that the case is merely one of a conflict of two private interests and that the misfortune of apple growers may not be shifted to cedar owners by ordering the destruction of their property; for it is obvious that there may be, and that here there is, a preponderant public concern in the preservation of the one interest over the other. [Where] the public interest is involved preferment of that interest over the property interest of the individual, to the extent even of its destruction, is one of the distinguishing characteristics of every exercise of the police power which affects property....

We need not weigh with nicety the question whether the infected cedars constitute a nuisance according to the common law; or whether they may be so declared by statute. For where, as here, the choice is unavoidable, we cannot say that its exercise, controlled by considerations of social policy which are not unreasonable, involves any denial of due process.

[Reversed.]

Penn Central Transportation Co. v. New York City

438 U.S. 104 (1978)

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented is whether a city may, as part of a comprehensive program to preserve historical landmarks and historic districts, place restrictions on the development of individual historic landmarks—in addition to those imposed by applicable zoning ordinances—without effecting a “taking” requiring the payment of “just compensation.” Specifically, we must decide whether the application of New York City’s Landmarks Preservation Law to the parcel of land occupied by Grand Central Terminal has “taken” its owners’ property in violation of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments.

Over the past 50 years, all 50 States and over 500 municipalities have enacted laws to encourage or require the preservation of buildings and areas with historic or aesthetic importance. These nationwide legislative efforts have been precipitated by two concerns. The first is recognition that, in recent years, large numbers of historic structures, landmarks, and areas have been destroyed without adequate consideration of either the values represented therein or the possibility of preserving the destroyed properties for use in economically productive ways. The second is a widely shared belief that structures with special historic, cultural, or architectural significance enhance the quality of life for all. Not only do these buildings and their workmanship represent the lessons of the past and embody precious features of our heritage, they serve as examples of quality for today....

New York City [adopted] its Landmarks Preservation Law in 1965. The city acted from the conviction that “the standing of [New York City] as a worldwide tourist center and world capital of business, culture and government” would be threatened if legislation were not enacted to protect historic landmarks and neighborhoods from precipitate decisions to destroy or fundamentally alter their character....

The New York City law is typical of many urban landmark laws in that its primary method of achieving its goals is not by acquisitions of historical properties, but rather by involving public entities in land-use decisions affecting these properties and providing services, standards, controls, and incentives that will encourage preservation by private owners and users. While the law does place special restrictions on landmark properties as a necessary feature to the attainment of its larger objectives, the major theme of the law is to ensure the owners of any such properties both a “reasonable return” on their investments and maximum latitude to use their parcels for purposes not inconsistent with the preservation goals.

[The Court noted that the law was administered by the Landmarks Preservation Commission, which identified especially important properties as designated “landmarks” and “historic districts.”]

[Final] designation as a landmark results in restrictions upon the property owner’s options concerning use of the landmark site. First, the law imposes a duty upon the owner to keep the exterior features of the building “in good repair” to assure that the law’s objectives not be defeated by the landmark’s falling into a state of irremediable disrepair. [Second,] the Commission must approve in advance any proposal to alter the exterior architectural features of the landmark or to construct any exterior improvement on the landmark site, thus ensuring that decisions concerning construction on the landmark site are made with due consideration of both the public interest in the maintenance of the structure and the landowner’s interest in use of the property....

In the event an owner wishes to alter a landmark site, [procedures] are available through which administrative approval may be obtained....

Although the designation of a landmark and landmark site restricts the owner’s control over the parcel, designation also enhances the economic position of the landmark owner in one significant respect. Under New York City's zoning laws, owners of real property who have not developed their property to the full extent permitted by the applicable zoning laws are allowed to transfer development rights to contiguous parcels on the same city block....

This case involves the application of New York City's Landmarks Preservation Law to Grand Central Terminal (Terminal). [The Court noted that the terminal is one of New York City's most famous buildings and that it had been designated as occupying a landmark site. Penn Central submitted two plans to the Commission for construction of an office building atop the terminal. One plan called for a fifty-five-story office building; another called for tearing down some of its facade and constructing a fifty-three-story office building. The Commission denied permission to go forward with the plans. With respect to the second plan, the Commission observed, "To protect a Landmark, one does not tear it down." With respect to the first plan, the Commission referred primarily to the adverse effect of the proposed tower on the dramatic view of the terminal from Park Avenue South. "To balance a 55-story office tower above a flamboyant Beaux-Arts facade seems nothing more than an aesthetic joke. Quite simply, the tower would overwhelm the Terminal by its sheer mass."]

The [issue is whether] the restrictions imposed by New York City's law upon appellants' exploitation of the Terminal site effect a "taking" of appellants' property for a public use within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment. While this Court has recognized that the "Fifth Amendment's guarantee...[is] designed to bar Government from forcing some people alone to bear public burdens which, in all fairness and justice, should be borne by the public as a whole," Armstrong v. United States, 364 U.S. 40, 49 (1960), this Court, quite simply, has been unable to develop any "set formula" for determining when "justice and fairness" require that economic injuries caused by public action be compensated by the government, rather than remain disproportionately concentrated on a few persons.

In engaging in [essentially] ad hoc, factual inquiries, the Court's decisions have identified several factors that have particular significance. The economic impact of the regulation on the claimant and, particularly, the extent to which the regulation has interfered with distinct investment-backed expectations are, of course, relevant considerations. [So,] too, is the character of the governmental action. A "taking" may more readily be found when the interference with property can be characterized as a physical invasion by government, see, e.g., United States v. Causby, 328 U.S. 256 (1946), than when interference arises from some public program adjusting the benefits and burdens of economic life to promote the common good.

“Government hardly could go on if to some extent values incident to property could not be diminished without paying for every such change in the general law,” [Mahon], and this Court has accordingly recognized, in a wide variety of contexts, that government may execute laws or programs that adversely affect recognized economic values. Exercises of the taxing power are one obvious example. A second are the decisions in which this Court has dismissed “taking” challenges on the ground that, while the challenged government action caused economic harm, it did not interfere with interests that were sufficiently bound up with the reasonable expectations of the claimant to constitute “property” for Fifth Amendment purposes....

More importantly for the present case, in instances in which a state tribunal reasonably concluded that “the health, safety, morals, or general welfare” would be promoted by prohibiting particular contemplated uses of land, this Court has upheld land-use regulations that destroyed or adversely affected recognized real property interests. [Zoning] laws are, of course, the classic example, see Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U.S. 365 (1926) (prohibition of industrial use)....

Zoning laws generally do not affect existing uses of real property, but “taking” challenges have also been held to be without merit in a wide variety of situations when the challenged governmental actions prohibited a beneficial use to which individual parcels had previously been devoted and thus caused substantial individualized harm....

[We] emphasize what is not in dispute. Because this Court has recognized, in a number of settings, that States and cities may enact land-use restrictions or controls to enhance the quality of life by preserving the character and desirable aesthetic features of a city, [appellants] do not contest that [the] restrictions imposed on its parcel are appropriate means of securing the purposes of the New York City law. [Appellants also] accept for present purposes both that the parcel of land occupied by Grand Central Terminal must, in its present state, be regarded as capable of earning a reasonable return, and that the transferable development rights [TDRs] afforded appellants by virtue of the Terminal’s designation as a landmark are valuable, even if not as valuable as the rights to construct above the Terminal....

[Appellants] first observe that the airspace above the Terminal is a valuable property interest. [They] urge that the Landmarks Law has deprived them of any gainful use of their “air rights” above the Terminal and that, irrespective of the value of the remainder of their parcel, the city has “taken” their right to this superjacent airspace, thus entitling them to “just compensation” measured by the fair market value of these air rights.

[The] submission that appellants may establish a “taking” simply by showing that they have been denied the ability to exploit a property interest that they heretofore had believed was available for development is quite simply untenable. [Our] jurisprudence does not divide a single parcel into discrete segments and attempt to determine whether rights in a particular segment have been entirely abrogated. In deciding whether a particular governmental action has effected a taking, this Court focuses rather both on the character of the action and on the nature and extent of the interference with rights in the parcel as a whole—here, the city tax block designated as the “landmark site.”

Secondly, appellants [argue] that [the law] effects a “taking” because its operation has significantly diminished the value of the Terminal site. [Appellants] argue that New York City’s regulation of individual landmarks is fundamentally different from zoning or from historic-district legislation because the controls imposed by New York City’s law apply only to individuals who own selected properties.

Stated baldly, appellants’ position appears to be that the only means of ensuring that selected owners are not singled out to endure financial hardship for no reason is to hold that any restriction imposed on individual landmarks pursuant to the New York City scheme is a “taking” requiring the payment of “just compensation.” [Contrary] to appellants’ suggestions, landmark laws are not like discriminatory [zoning:] that is, a land-use decision which arbitrarily singles out a particular parcel for different, less favorable treatment than the neighboring ones. [In] contrast to discriminatory zoning, [the] New York City law embodies a comprehensive plan to preserve structures of historic or aesthetic interest wherever they might be found in the city, and [over] 400 landmarks and 31 historic districts have been designated pursuant to this plan.

Equally without merit is the related argument that the decision to designate a structure as a landmark “is inevitably arbitrary or at least subjective, because it is basically a matter of taste,” [thus] unavoidably singling out individual landowners for disparate and unfair treatment. [A] landmark owner has a right to judicial review of any Commission decision, and, [there] is no basis whatsoever for a conclusion that courts will have any greater difficulty identifying arbitrary or discriminatory action in the context of landmark regulation than in the context of classic zoning or indeed in any other context.

Next, appellants observe that New York City’s law differs from zoning laws and historic-district ordinances in that the Landmarks Law does not impose identical or similar restrictions on all structures located in particular physical communities. It follows, they argue, that New York City’s law is inherently incapable of producing the fair and equitable distribution of benefits and burdens of governmental action [which] they maintain is a constitutional requirement if “just compensation” is not to be afforded. It is, of course, true that the Landmarks Law has a more severe impact on some landowners than on others, but that in itself does not mean that the law effects a “taking.” Legislation designed to promote the general welfare commonly burdens some more than others.

In any event, appellants’ repeated suggestions that they are solely burdened and unbefited is factually inaccurate. This contention overlooks the fact that the New York City law applies to vast numbers of structures in the city in addition to the Terminal—all the structures contained in the 31 historic districts and over 400 individual landmarks, many of which are close to the Terminal....

Appellants’ final broad-based attack would have us treat the law as an instance, like that in United States v. Causby, in which government, acting in an enterprise capacity, has appropriated part of their property for some strictly governmental purpose. [But the] Landmarks Law neither exploits appellants’ parcel for city purposes nor facilitates nor arises from any entrepreneurial operations of the city.

[The] Landmarks Law’s effect is simply to prohibit appellants or anyone else from occupying portions of the airspace above the Terminal, while permitting appellants to use the remainder of the parcel in a gainful fashion....

[We] now must consider whether the interference with appellants’ property is of such a magnitude that “there must be an exercise of eminent domain and compensation to sustain [it].” [Mahon.] [That] inquiry may be narrowed to the question of the severity of the impact of the law on appellants’ parcel, and its resolution in turn requires a careful assessment of the impact of the regulation on the Terminal site. [The] New York City law does not interfere in any way with the present uses of the Terminal. Its designation as a landmark [contemplates] that appellants may continue to use the property precisely as it has been used for the past 65 years; as a railroad terminal containing office space and concessions. So the law does not interfere with what must be regarded as Penn Central’s primary expectation concerning the use of the parcel [or its ability] to obtain a “reasonable return” on its investment.

Appellants, moreover, exaggerate the effect of the law on their ability to make use of the air rights above the Terminal. [First, nothing] the Commission has said or done suggests an intention to prohibit any construction above the Terminal.

[Second,] it is not literally accurate to say that they have been denied all use of even [preexisting] air rights. [The] New York courts here supportably found that [the transferable development] rights afforded are valuable. While these rights may well not have constituted “just compensation” if a “taking” had occurred, the rights nevertheless undoubtedly mitigate whatever financial burdens the law has imposed on appellants and, for that reason, are to be taken into account in considering the impact of regulation.

On this record, we conclude that the application of New York City's Landmarks Law has not effected a "taking" of appellants' property. The restrictions imposed are substantially related to the promotion of the general welfare and not only permit reasonable beneficial use of the landmark site but also afford appellants opportunities further to enhance not only the Terminal site proper but also other properties.

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST, with whom [CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER] and MR. JUSTICE STEVENS join, dissenting.

Only in the most superficial sense of the word can this case be said to involve "zoning." Typical zoning restrictions may, it is true, so limit the prospective uses of a piece of property as to diminish the value of that property in the abstract because it may not be used for the forbidden purposes. But any such abstract decrease in value will more than likely be at least partially offset by an increase in value which flows from similar restrictions as to use on neighboring properties. All property owners in a designated area are placed under the same restrictions, not only for the benefit of the municipality as a whole but also for the common benefit of one another. In the words of Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for the Court in [Mahon,] there is "an average reciprocity of advantage."

Where a relatively few individual buildings, all separated from one another, are singled out and treated differently from surrounding buildings, no such reciprocity exists. [And] the cost associated with landmark legislation is likely to be of a completely different order of magnitude than that which results from the imposition of normal zoning restrictions. [Under] the historic-landmark preservation scheme adopted by New York, the property owner is under an affirmative duty to preserve his property as a landmark at his own expense....

[Before] the city of New York declared Grand Central Terminal to be a landmark, Penn Central could have used its "air rights" over the Terminal to build a multistory office building, at an apparent value of several million dollars per year. Today, the Terminal cannot be modified in any form, including the erection of additional stories, without the permission of the Landmark Preservation Commission, a permission which appellants, despite good-faith attempts, have so far been unable to obtain....

The nuisance exception to the taking guarantee is not coterminous with the police power itself. The question is whether the forbidden use is dangerous to the safety, health, or welfare of others....

Appellees are not prohibiting a nuisance. The record is clear that the proposed addition to the Grand Central Terminal would be in full compliance with zoning, height limitations, and other health and safety requirements. Instead, appellees are seeking to preserve what they believe to be an outstanding example of beaux arts architecture. [The] city of New York, because of its unadorned admiration for the design, has decided that the owners of the building must preserve it unchanged for the benefit of sightseeing New Yorkers and tourists.

[Even] where the government prohibits a noninjurious use, the Court has ruled that a taking does not take place if the prohibition applies over a broad cross section of land and thereby “secure[s] an average reciprocity of advantage.” [Mahon.] [While] zoning at times reduces individual property values, the burden is shared relatively evenly and it is reasonable to conclude that on the whole an individual who is harmed by one aspect of the zoning will be benefited by another.

Here, however, a multimillion dollar loss has been imposed on appellants; it is uniquely felt and is not offset by any benefits flowing from the preservation of some 400 other “landmarks” in New York City. Appellees have imposed a substantial cost on less than one one-tenth of one percent of the buildings in New York City for the general benefit of all its people. It is exactly this imposition of general costs on a few individuals at which the “taking” protection is directed....

[A] taking does not become a noncompensable exercise of police power simply because the government in its grace allows the owner to make some “reasonable” use of his property. [Appellees] contend that, even if they have “taken” appellants’ property, TDK’s constitute “just compensation.” [Because] the record on appeal is relatively slim, I would remand to the Court of Appeals for a determination of whether TDK’s constitute a “full and perfect equivalent for the property taken.”

KEYSTONE BITUMINOUS COAL ASSOCIATION v. DEBENEDICTIS, 480 U.S. 470 (1987). In this case, the Court upheld a modern-day analogue of the Kohler Act, invalidated in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, supra. A Pennsylvania statute enacted in 1966 prohibited mining that caused subsidence damage to public buildings, dwellings used for human habitation, and cemeteries. The administrative agency charged with enforcing the statute generally required 50 percent of the coal beneath such structures to be kept in place as a means of providing surface support. Moreover, the agency was authorized to revoke mining permits if removal of coal caused damage to such structures and the operator had not repaired or paid for the damage.

Justice Stevens delivered the Court's opinion: "Petitioners assert that disposition of their takings claim calls for no more than a straightforward application of the Court's decision in [Pennsylvania Coal]. Although there are some obvious similarities between the cases, we agree with the [court below] that the similarities are far less significant than the [differences]....

"The two factors that the [Pennsylvania Coal] Court considered relevant have become integral parts of our takings analysis. We have held that land use regulation can effect a taking if it 'does not substantially advance legitimate state interests,...or denies an owner economically viable use of his land.' Agins v. Tiburon, 447 U.S. 255, 260 (1980).

"Application of these tests to petitioners' challenge demonstrates that they have not satisfied their burden of showing that the Subsidence Act constitutes a taking. First, unlike the Kohler Act, the character of the governmental action involved here leans heavily against finding a taking; the [state] has acted to arrest what it perceives to be a significant threat to the common welfare. Second, there is no record in this case to support a finding, similar to the one the Court made in Pennsylvania Coal, that the Subsidence Act makes it impossible for petitioners to profitably engage in their business, or that there has been undue interference with their investment-backed expectations....

"Unlike the Kohler Act, [the] Subsidence Act does not merely involve a balancing of the private economic interests of coal companies against the private interests of the surface owners. The Pennsylvania Legislature specifically found that important public interests are served by enforcing a policy that is designed to minimize subsidence in certain areas....

"The second factor that distinguishes this case from Pennsylvania Coal is the finding in that case that the Kohler Act made mining of 'certain coal' commercially impracticable. In this case, by contrast, petitioners have not shown any deprivation significant enough to satisfy the heavy burden placed upon one alleging a regulatory taking....

"The parties have stipulated that enforcement of the [50%] rule will require petitioners to leave approximately 27 million tons of coal in place. Because they own that coal but cannot mine it, they contend that Pennsylvania has appropriated it for the public purposes described in the Subsidence Act.

"[But the] 27 million tons of coal do not constitute a separate segment of property for takings law purposes....

"We do not consider Justice Holmes' statement that the Kohler Act made mining of 'certain coal' commercially impracticable as requiring us to focus on the individual pillars of coal that must be left in place....

“When the coal that must remain beneath the ground is viewed in the context of any reasonable unit of petitioners’ coal mining operations and financial-backed expectations, it is plain that the petitioners have not come close to satisfying their burden of proving that they have been denied the economically viable use of that property.”

Chief Justice Rehnquist, in an opinion joined by Justices Powell, O’Connor, and Scalia, dissented.

Note: “Takings” and the Police Power

1. In general. To what does one look to decide whether there has been a “taking” of private property? Almost all government action—to take familiar examples: zoning, minimum wage and maximum hour legislation, the relocation of a highway, or other land use regulation—diminishes the value of some people’s property and increases the value of the property of other people. Redistribution in this sense is almost always the result, and often the purpose, of government action. If compensation was required in all such cases, there would, of course, be far less redistribution. The need to calculate and hand out compensation (costs independent of compensation “itself”) would often prevent its occurrence. There is an additional problem: Many people are “winners” from regulation, and they are not taxed accordingly; if government must compensate, but does not tax, its own incentives may be skewed against beneficial activities. Where one sets the line between taking and regulation will to a large degree determine how much redistribution (some of it perhaps efficient and just, some of it perhaps neither) will be permitted through the regulatory process.

2. Distinguishing takings from regulation. How does one tell whether there has been regulation or a taking? Some candidates for a test include the following.

a. The extent of the intrusion. Under this view, compensation will be required if, in Justice Holmes’s words, regulation “goes too far.” The compensation requirement is triggered by a significant invasion. But this approach raises the issue why the extent of the intrusion is relevant to the question whether compensation need be paid at all rather than to the question of the extent of compensation.

b. The nature of the intrusion. Under this approach, a court could take the notion of “taking” literally by examining whether property has “actually” been taken. Has there been, for example, a physical invasion? In fact, the Court has come close to holding that a physical invasion is a sufficient condition to find a taking. But compensation may not be required if the diminution in value produced by a regulatory measure does not actually “touch” the property in question—for example, occupational safety and health regulation, relocation of a highway, minimum wage legislation, or a zoning ordinance. Also relevant may be whether government has actually appropriated the property for its own or another’s use rather than simply destroyed it.

Under this view, physical invasions present a stronger case for requiring compensation than government action that diminishes value without such an invasion. The theme of physical invasion is a prominent one in the law of eminent domain. But it is not easy to explain why government action that actually “invades” in a physical sense should be treated differently from government action that in some other way diminishes value. One response is that, where there has been a physical invasion, it is easy to identify those adversely affected, and one need not worry that the costs of identifying those people entitled to compensation will prevent necessary measures from going forward. Consider the zoning example, where the number of properties adversely affected may be extremely large and the costs of identifying them, calculating their losses, and compensating them may deter socially desirable measures. Cf. R. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law 40–48 (2d ed. 1977). Note, too, that there is no “givings” clause in the Constitution, allowing government to receive resources for the benefits that it grants to property owners.

c. Balancing. One might approach the takings versus regulation issue by asking: How important is the state’s interest? How does it compare with the private interest? But consider, with respect to this approach, the view that “use of the balancing test for such a purpose seems to be a mistake, at best reflecting a careless confusion of two quite distinct questions. These are, first, whether a given measure would be in order assuming it was accompanied by compensation payments; and, second, whether the same measure, conceding that it would be proper under conditions of full compensation, ought to be enforced without payment of any compensation. The balancing test may have something to do with the first question, but cannot have anything to do with the second.” Michelman, Property, Utility, and Fairness: Comments on the Ethical Foundations of “Just Compensation” Law, 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1165, 1193–1194 (1967). But note also a possible defense of a balancing approach as a means of testing whether the measure in question is “so obviously efficient as to quiet the potential outrage of persons ‘unavoidably’ sacrificed in its interest.” Id. at 1235.

d. The legitimacy of the state’s interest: restraining harmful conduct, “mere” redistribution, and public benefit. One might decide the takings question by asking, as the Keystone Court did, whether the state is attempting “merely” to redistribute property from one person to another or attempting instead to promote a more general good. In Lingle v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., 544 U.S. 528 (2005), the Court repudiated the Keystone Court's statement that regulation can amount to a taking if it "does not substantially advance legitimate state interests." The court of appeals had struck down a Hawaii statute limiting the rent that oil companies could charge to dealers who leased service stations from the companies. The court of appeals reasoned that this measure did not "substantially advance" the state's interest in preventing concentration of the retail gasoline market and high prices for consumers, and that the statute therefore amounted to an uncompensated taking. The Supreme Court, in a unanimous decision written by Justice O'Connor, reversed. The Court held that, as an analytic matter, the "substantially advances" standard "prescribes an inquiry in the nature of a due process, not a takings, test, and that it has no proper place in our takings jurisprudence." The Court left open the possibility that a regulation that failed the "substantially advances" test might violate due process. It warned, however:

The [formula] can be read to demand heightened means-ends review of virtually any regulation of private property. If so interpreted, it would require courts to scrutinize the efficacy of a vast array of state and federal regulations—a task for which courts are not well suited. Moreover, it would empower—and might often require—courts to substitute their predictive judgments for those of elected legislatures and expert agencies....

We have long eschewed such heightened scrutiny when addressing substantive due process challenges to government regulation.

3. Action and inaction. In Miller, the Court stated that, if government had failed to act, "it would have been none the less a choice. [When] forced to such a choice the state does not exceed its constitutional powers by deciding upon the destruction of one class of property in order to save another." The implication is that government inaction is itself a form of regulation.

What consequences does this insight have for the eminent domain clause and the underlying principle of private property? Consider Sunstein, Naked Preferences and the Constitution, 84 Colum. L. Rev. 1689, 1776 (1984):

The new conception of the market status quo as neither natural nor inviolate led the way toward a dramatically expanded understanding of the police power. [Indeed], the seeds of a destruction of the eminent domain clause may lie within the Miller Court's statement. If government inaction can be understood as government action—if a decision not to act is understood as an intrusion in the same way as “affirmative” regulation—then the traditional notion of private property [loses] much of its coherence.

Compare Arkansas Game & Fish Commission v. United States, 133 S. Ct. 511 (2012). The Commission owned a wildlife management area along the banks of the Black River and regularly harvested timber in the reserve as part of its forest management efforts. One hundred fifteen miles upstream from the management area is the Clearwater Dam (the Dam), constructed by the United States Corps of Engineers in 1948. Shortly after constructing the Dam, the Corps adopted a Water Control Manual, which determined the rates at which water would be released from the Dam. In 1993, the Corps approved a planned deviation from the release rate in response to requests from farmers to provide for a longer harvest period. To reduce accumulation of water in the lake behind the Dam, the Corps extended the period in which a high amount of water would be released, resulting in flooding in the management area above historical norms. The flooding resulted in the destruction of timber in the management area and necessitated costly reclamation measures. Had the Corps released the water at a lower rate, the farmers would have had a shorter harvest season, but the timber would not have been damaged. The Court, in a unanimous decision written by Justice Ginsburg, held that government-induced flooding can amount to a taking even if it is temporary in duration.

If the Corps had not released the water, the farmers would have had a shorter harvest season. Why wouldn’t this have been a taking? Suppose that the management area would have been flooded if the Dam had not been built in the first place. Would release of the extra water still be a taking? Would the result be different if the Corps built the Dam but then tore it down? If the initial Water Control Manual had provided for release of water at the higher rate?

For an argument that the takings clause might make the government liable for regulatory inaction and that therefore “property owners could be constitutionally entitled either to governmental intervention on their behalf or to compensation if the government fails to act,” see Serkin, Passive Takings: The State’s Affirmative Duty to Protect Property, 113 Mich. L. Rev. 345 (2014). For a more general discussion of constitutional problems posed by government nonfeasance, see Chapter 9.

4. Assorted cases. Probably the best way to get a sense of eminent domain doctrine is to compare the holdings in different factual settings.

a. Andrus v. Allard, 444 U.S. 51 (1979). The Eagle Protection Act banned the sale of bald or golden eagle parts taken before the effective date of the statute.

The act did not ban the possession or transportation of such parts. The Court upheld the statute, saying that government regulation often curtails some potential for the use or economic exploitation of private property. To require compensation in all such circumstances would effectively compel the government to regulate by purchase. [The] regulations challenged here do not compel the surrender of the artifacts, and there is no physical invasion or restraint upon them. Rather, a significant restriction has been imposed on one means of disposing of the artifacts. But the denial of one traditional property right does not always amount to a taking. At least where an owner possesses a full “bundle” of property rights, the destruction of one “strand” of the bundle is not a taking, because the aggregation must be viewed in its entirety. [It] is, to be sure, undeniable that the regulations here prevent the most profitable use of appellees’ property. Again, however, that is not dispositive. When we review regulation, a reduction in the value of the property is not necessarily equated with a taking.

b. Compare Andrus to Hodel v. Irving, 481 U.S. 704 (1987). In the nineteenth century, Congress enacted a law that divided the communal property on the reservation of the Sioux Nation into individual allotments. The allotted lands were held in trust for the Indians by the United States, and after 1910 the allottees were permitted to dispose of their interests by will in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior. As successive generations came to hold the allotted lands, ownership became fractionated into extremely small, undivided interests, with the result that it became impractical to make productive use of the lands. To deal with this problem, Congress enacted the Indian Land Consolidation Act in 1983, which provided that undivided, fractional interests in trust land could not be devised, but instead would escheat to the tribe if the interest represented 2 percent or less of the total acreage of the tract and had earned its owner less than $100 in the previous year.

The Court, in an opinion by Justice O’Connor, held this escheat provision unconstitutional. “[The] regulation here amounts to virtually the abrogation of the right to pass on a certain type of property [to] one’s heirs. In one form or another, the right to pass on property—to one’s family in particular—has been part of the Anglo-American legal system since feudal times.” The Court noted, however, that it would “surely” be permissible for the government to prevent owners from further subdividing the land among future heirs on pain of escheat and to abolish descent of such interest by rules of intestacy.

Justice Scalia, in a concurring opinion joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Powell, noted that “the present statute, insofar as concerns the balance between rights taken and rights left untouched[, is] indistinguishable from the statute that was at issue in [Allard]” and that “in finding a taking today our decision effectively limits Allard to its facts.” In another concurring opinion, Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall and Blackmun, found “nothing in today’s opinion that would limit [Allard]. Indeed, [I] am of the view that the unique negotiations giving rise to the property rights and expectations at issue here make this case the unusual one.”

c. Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U.S. 365 (1926). Euclid involved a zoning ordinance. The tract at issue had been vacant and was held for purpose of sale and development for industrial uses; for such uses, it had a market value of about $10,000 per acre. The zoning ordinance would limit it to residential purposes, thus reducing its market value to $2,500 per acre.

The Court upheld the ordinance. It acknowledged that the exclusion is in general terms of all industrial establishments, and it may thereby happen that not only offensive or dangerous industries will be excluded, but those which are neither offensive nor dangerous will share the same fate. But this is no more than happens in respect of many practice-forbidding laws which this Court has upheld although drawn in general terms so as to include individual cases that may turn out to be innocuous in themselves.

The Court went on to point to the various benefits of the zoning ordinance:

the segregation of residential, business, and industrial buildings will make it easier to provide fire apparatus suitable for the character and intensity of the development in each section; that it will increase the safety and security of home life; greatly tend to prevent street accidents, especially to children, by reducing the traffic and resulting confusion in residential sections; decrease noise and other conditions which produce or intensify nervous disorders; preserve a more favorable environment in which to rear children, etc.

In the Court’s view, these factors were “sufficiently cogent to preclude us from saying, as it must be said before the ordinance can be declared unconstitutional, that such provisions are clearly arbitrary and unreasonable, having no substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare.”

d. Compare Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 444 U.S. 164 (1979), to United States v. Riverside Bayview Homes, 474 U.S. 121 (1985), and PruneYard

Shopping Center v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74 (1980). In Kaiser Aetna, the Army Corps of Engineers attempted to grant public access to Kuapa Pond, a lagoon in Hawaii that was contiguous to a navigable bay. Kaiser Aetna had obtained rights to use the lagoon and had dredged and filled parts of it, erected retaining walls, and built bridges. It also created accommodations for pleasure boats. Eventually there were about 1,500 marina waterfront lot lessees. Kaiser Aetna controlled access to and use of the marina and generally did not permit commercial use. The Army Corps of Engineers contended that Kaiser Aetna was required to allow public access to the lagoon, and that no compensation need be paid, since there was a federal navigational servitude on the property.

The Court concluded that “the Government’s attempt to create a public right to access [goes] so far beyond ordinary regulation or improvement for navigation as to amount to a taking.” The Court emphasized that (1) before Kaiser Aetna’s improvements, the pond could not be used for navigation in interstate commerce; (2) the body of water was private property under Hawaiian law; (3) the intrusion at issue was on the right to exclude, “universally held to be a fundamental element of the property right”; and (4) there was an actual physical invasion.

In Riverside Bayview Homes, the Army Corps of Engineers issued regulations requiring landowners to secure permits before discharging fill material into wetlands adjacent to navigable bodies of water and their tributaries. The corps then brought this action against a landowner to enjoin respondents from placing fill material in adjacent wetlands. The district court granted the injunction, but the court of appeals reversed, holding that a narrow construction of the regulations was necessary in order to avoid a taking of private property without just compensation. The Court, in an opinion by Justice White, reversed the court of appeals. Although acknowledging that governmental land-use regulation may “under extreme circumstances” constitute a taking, the Court held that the mere assertion of regulatory jurisdiction does not amount to a taking: “A requirement that a person obtain a permit before engaging in a certain use of his or her property does not itself ‘take’ the property in any sense: after all, the very existence of a permit system implies that permission may be granted, leaving the landowner free to use the property as desired. Moreover, even if the permit is denied, there may be other viable uses available to the owner. Only when a permit is denied and the effect of the denial is to prevent ‘economically viable’ use of the land in question can it be said that a taking has occurred.”

In PruneYard, the California Supreme Court had held that the state constitutional right of free speech compelled shopping center owners to allow protesters to exercise rights of free speech on shopping center property. The owners contended that there was a “taking” of their property. The Court said:

Here the requirement that appellants permit appellees to exercise state-protected rights of free expression and petition on shopping center property clearly does not amount to an unconstitutional infringement of appellant’s property rights under the Takings Clause. There is nothing to suggest that preventing appellants from prohibiting this sort of activity will unreasonably impair the value or use of their property as a shopping center. [The] decision of the California Supreme Court makes it clear that the PruneYard may restrict expressive activity by adopting time, place, and manner regulations. [Appellees] were orderly, and they limited their activity to the common areas of the shopping center.

What is the relevance of the last two sentences in this passage?

e. Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp, 458 U.S. 419 (1982). In Loretto, the issue was the constitutionality of a New York law providing that a landlord must permit a cable television company to install cable facilities on her property. The cable installation in the relevant case occupied portions of the plaintiff’s roof and the side of her building. The Court concluded that the “permanent physical occupation authorized by government is a taking without regard to the public interests that it may serve.” The Court added: “An owner suffers a special kind of injury when a stranger directly invades and occupies the owner’s property. [The] traditional rule also avoids otherwise difficult line-drawing problems. [Whether] a permanent physical occupation has occurred presents relatively few problems of proof.”

Is Loretto distinguishable from PruneYard?

The Court distinguished Loretto in FCC v. Florida Power Corp., 480 U.S. 245 (1987), and upheld a federal statute authorizing the Federal Communications Commission to regulate the rates utility companies charge cable operators for the use of utility poles. In a unanimous opinion written by Justice Marshall, the Court held that Loretto was inapplicable to these facts:

[While] the statute we considered in Loretto specifically required landlords to permit permanent occupation of their property by cable companies, nothing in [this act gives] cable companies any right to occupy space on utility poles, or prohibits utility companies from refusing to enter into attachment agreements with cable operators. The Act authorizes the FCC [to] review the rents charged by public utility landlords who have voluntarily entered into leases with cable company tenants renting space on utility poles.

Compare Connolly v. Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., 475 U.S. 211 (1986), upholding a statute requiring an employer withdrawing from a multiemployer pension plan to pay its proportionate share of the plan's unfunded vested benefits.

The Court relied on Loretto in Horne v. Dept. of Agriculture, 135 S. Ct. 1039 (2015), to invalidate a marketing order issued by the Department of Agriculture that required raisin growers to physically set aside a certain percentage of their crops for the government to dispose of in a way best suited to maintaining an orderly market. The order, issued under the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, gave the Raisin Administrative Committee, a government entity composed largely of growers appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, the authority to determine the allocation. The Committee then disposed of the raisins, with raisin growers retaining an interest in any net proceeds from sales after deductions for export subsidies and the Committee's administrative expenses.

Petitioners refused to set aside raisins for the government, whereupon the government assessed a fine against them. Petitioners claimed that the assessment constituted a per se taking under Loretto. In an eight-to-one decision, the Court, per Chief Justice Roberts, agreed. The Court began its analysis by holding that the per se rule applied to the taking of personal, as well as real property. Although the Court had previously noted that regulation of personal property might make the property economically useless without constituting a taking, the same rule did not apply to the sort of direct appropriation that occurred in this case. Here, the actual raisins were transferred from the growers to the government and the growers lost "the entire 'bundle' of property rights in the appropriated raisins."

The Government thinks it "strange" and the dissent "baffling" that the Hornes object to the reserve requirement, when they nonetheless concede that "the government may prohibit sale of raisins without effecting a per se taking." But that distinction flows naturally from the settled difference in our takings jurisprudence between appropriation and regulation. A physical taking of raisins and a regulatory limit on production may have the same economic impact on a grower. The Constitution, however, is concerned with means as well as ends.

This conclusion was not affected by the fact that the Government reserved to the growers a contingent interest in a portion of the value of the property. "[Once] there is a taking, as in the case of a physical appropriation, any payment from the Government in connection with that action goes, at most, to the question of just compensation.”

The Court also concluded that the requirement that growers relinquish some of the raisins could not be justified as a condition on permission to sell the remaining raisins in interstate commerce. (This portion of the opinion is discussed at page 990.)

Finally, the Court rejected the government’s contention that the amount of compensation due should be reduced by the increased value of the raisins petitioner was able to sell due to the price support and other benefits from the regulatory program. (This portion of the opinion is discussed at page 993, supra.)

f. United States v. Causby, 328 U.S. 256 (1946). Causby raised the question whether frequent flights immediately above a landowner’s property constituted a taking. The Court concluded that it did: “If, by reason of the frequency and altitude of the flights, respondents could not use this land for any purpose, their loss would be complete. It would be as complete as if the United States had entered upon the surface of the land and taken exclusive possession of it.” See also Griggs v. Allegheny County, 369 U.S. 84 (1962).

g. Is the takings clause violated when the government conditions the grant of a discretionary benefit on the recipient’s willingness to give up property rights that could not be taken from him without compensation?

In Bowen v. Gilliard, 483 U.S. 587 (1987), the Court considered a takings clause attack on an amendment to the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program that required recipient families to assign to the government child support payments received from a noncustodial parent for a child living in the covered household. The effect of the assignment was to reduce the level of support payments received by the household. Appellees argued that this reduction constituted a taking from the child because the child support payments could be legally used only for the individual child, while the compensating AFDC payments were available for the entire family. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Stevens, rejected the argument:

Congress is not, by virtue of having instituted a social welfare program, bound to continue it at all, much less at the same benefit level. Thus, notwithstanding the technical legal arguments that have been advanced, it is imperative to recognize that the amendments at issue merely incorporate a definitional element into an entitlement program. It would be quite strange indeed if, by virtue of an offer to provide benefits to needy families through the entirely voluntary AFDC program, Congress or the States were deemed to have taken some of those very family members’ property.

Compare Bowen to the following case.

NOLLAN v. CALIFORNIA COASTAL COMMISSION, 483 U.S. 825 (1987). The California Coastal Commission conditioned the grant of a permit to rebuild appellants' house on their transfer to the public of an easement across their beachfront property. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Scalia, held that the attempt to impose this condition was a taking:

"Had California simply required the [appellants] to make an easement across their beachfront available to the public on a permanent [basis] we have no doubt there would have been a taking. [We] think a 'permanent physical occupation' has occurred, for purposes of [Loretto], where individuals are given a permanent and continuous right to pass to and fro, so that the real property may continuously be traversed, even though no particular individual is permitted to station himself permanently upon the premises...."²

"Given, then, that requiring uncompensated conveyance of the easement outright would violate the Fourteenth Amendment, the question becomes whether requiring it to be conveyed as a condition for issuing a land use permit alters the outcome....

"[If] the Commission attached to the permit some condition that would have protected the public's ability to see the beach notwithstanding construction of the new house—for example, a height limitation, a width restriction, or a ban on fences—so long as the Commission could have exercised its police power (as we [assume] it could) to forbid construction of the house altogether, imposition of the condition would also be constitutional. Moreover, [the] condition would be constitutional even if it consisted of the requirement that the [appellants] provide a viewing spot on their property for passersby with whose sighting of the ocean their new house would interfere. Although such a requirement [would] have to be considered a taking if it were not attached to a development permit, the Commission's assumed power to forbid construction of the house in order to protect the public's view of the beach must surely include the power to condition construction upon some concession by the owner, even a concession of property rights, that serves the same end....

"The evident constitutional propriety disappears, however, if the condition substituted for the prohibition utterly fails to further the end advanced as the justification for the prohibition. When that essential nexus is eliminated, the situation becomes the same as if California law forbade shouting fire in a crowded theater, but granted dispensations to those willing to contribute $100 to the state treasury. [In] short, unless the permit condition serves the same governmental purpose as the development ban, the building restriction is not a valid regulation of land use but ‘an out-and-out plan of extortion.’...

“Justice Brennan argues that imposition of the access requirement is not irrational. In his version of the Commission’s argument, the reason for the requirement is that in its absence, a person looking toward the beach from the road will see a street of residential structures including the Nollans’ new home and conclude that there is no public beach nearby. If, however, that person sees people passing and repassing along the dry sand behind the Nollans’ home, he will realize that there is a public beach somewhere in the vicinity. The Commission’s action, however, was based on the opposite factual finding that the wall of houses completely blocked the view of the beach and that a person looking from the road would not be able to see it at all.

“Even if the Commission had made the finding that Justice Brennan proposes, however, it is not certain that it would suffice. [We] view the Fifth Amendment’s property clause to be more than a pleading requirement, and compliance with it to be more than an exercise of cleverness and imagination. [Our] cases describe the condition for abridgement of property rights through the police power as ‘substantially advancing’ a legitimate State interest. We are inclined to be particularly careful about the adjective where the actual conveyance of property is made a condition to the lifting of a land use restriction, since in that context there is heightened risk that the purpose is avoidance of the compensation requirement, rather than the stated police power objective.”

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, wrote a dissenting opinion:

“[The] Court imposes a standard of precision for the exercise of a State’s police power that has been discredited for the better part of this century....

“It is [by] now commonplace that this Court’s review of the rationality of a State’s exercise of its police power demands only that the State ‘could rationally have decided’ that the measure adopted might achieve the State’s objective. [Minnesota v. Clover Leaf Creamery Co.]

“The Court finds fault with [the Commission’s conduct] because it regards the condition as insufficiently tailored to address the precise type of reduction in access produced by the new development. The Nollans’ development blocks visual access, the Court tells us, while the Commission seeks to preserve lateral access along the coastline. Such a narrow conception of rationality, however, has long since been discredited as a judicial arrogation of legislative authority....

“Even if we accept the Court’s unusual demand for a precise match between the condition imposed and the specific type of burden on access created by the appellants, the State’s action easily satisfies this requirement. First, the lateral access condition serves to dissipate the impression that the beach that lies behind the wall of homes along the shore is for private use only. It requires no exceptional imaginative powers to find plausible the Commission's point that the average person passing along the road in front of a phalanx of imposing permanent residences [is] likely to conclude that this particular portion of the shore is not open to the public. If, however, that person can see that numerous people are passing and repassing along the dry sand, this conveys the message that the beach is in fact open for use by the public....

"The second flaw in the Court's analysis [is] more fundamental. The Court assumes that the only burden with which the Coastal Commission was concerned was blockage of visual access to the beach. This is incorrect. The Commission specifically stated in its report [that] '[t]he Commission finds that the applicants' proposed development would present an increase in view blockage, an increase in private use of the storefront, and that this impact would burden the public's ability to traverse to and along the storefront.'

"[Moreover,] appellants were clearly on notice when requesting a new development permit that a condition of approval would be a provision ensuring [the easement]. [In] this respect, this case is quite similar to Ruckelshaus v. Monsanto Co., 467 U.S. 986 (1984). In Monsanto, the respondent had submitted trade data to the Environmental Protection Agency for the purpose of obtaining registration of certain pesticides. [The] Court conceded that the data in question constituted property under state law. It also found, however, that certain of the data had been submitted to the agency after Congress had made clear that only limited confidentiality would be given data submitted for registration purposes. [The] Court rejected respondent's argument that the requirement that it relinquish some confidentiality imposed an unconstitutional condition upon receipt of a Government benefit."¹⁰

Justices Blackmun and Stevens also filed dissenting opinions.

Note: Nollan, Unconstitutional Conditions, and Other Problems

1. Unconstitutional conditions. Nollan might well be seen as an unconstitutional conditions case. On this view, Nollan raises the question whether government might condition the receipt of a benefit—here, permission to build—on the grant of an easement. Nollan treats this condition as impermissible partly on the theory that the right to build on one's own property is not a government "benefit," like welfare. But what is the difference between the two kinds of interests? Is one more "natural" than the other?

The Court also emphasized that the condition imposed by the state had no relation to the state's legitimate interest in preserving the view. The Court implied that a concession of property rights that involved a viewing spot rather than an easement might have been upheld. Here, however, the easement had no connection to the aesthetic goals at stake. As the Court had it, the problem was thus one of "extortion." See Epstein, Foreword: Unconstitutional Conditions, State Power, and the Limits of Consent, 102 Harv. L. Rev. 4, 62–63 (1988): "The doctrine of unconstitutional conditions limits the abuse of government discretion by severing the denial of the construction permit from the taking of the lateral easement. [The] 'relatedness' requirement [has] powerful functional roots, for it [reduces] the state's ability to extract concessions from individual owners by coordinating separate types of government initiatives."

But see Sullivan, Unconstitutional Conditions, 102 Harv. L. Rev. 1413, 1474 (1989): "Germaneness to the purpose of a benefit depends crucially on how broadly or how narrowly that purpose is defined. [The] condition invalidated in Nollan may be interpreted either as nongermane to the provision of visual access to the sea [or] as germane to a more general state interest in facilitating public use and enjoyment of the beach." How might a court resolve this problem?

For general discussion of this and related issues, see Symposium, The Jurisprudence of Takings, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 1581 (1988).

Compare Koontz v. St. Johns River Water Management District, 133 S. Ct. 2586 (2013). Petitioner owned a parcel of land that required state permits in order to develop. Petitioner suggested certain limitations on the development to mitigate the environmental damage, but the state Water Management District found these insufficient. Instead, the District proposed that petitioner either take further measures to mitigate the damage on his own property or that he hire contractors to make improvements on other property owned by the District. Petitioner refused to take these measures, and the District denied petitioner's application. Relying upon Nollan, Petitioner then filed suit in state court, but the Florida Supreme Court held that Nollan was distinguishable because there the state had approved an application on the condition that the land owner acceded to the state's demands, whereas here, the state had denied the application because he refused to make the concessions.

The United States Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision, rejected this distinction and reversed the judgment below. Writing for the Court, Justice Alito stated that the principles undergirding Nollan "do not change depending on whether the government approves a permit on the condition that the applicant turn over property or denies a permit because the applicant refuses to do so. We have often concluded that denials of governmental benefits were impermissible under the unconstitutional conditions doctrine."

Neither party disputed the proposition that the District could have simply refused to grant the permit. How was petitioner made worse off by the District's suggestion of actions petitioner could take that would lead it to grant the permit? Consider in this regard Justice Alito's observation that "land-use permit applicants are especially vulnerable to the type of coercion that the unconstitutional conditions doctrine prohibits because the government often has broad discretion to deny a permit that is worth far more than property it would like to take." Compare the following observations in Justice Kagan's dissenting opinion:

Consider the matter from the standpoint of the District's lawyer. The District, she learns, has found that [petitioner's] permit applications do not satisfy legal requirements. It can deny the permits on that basis; or it can suggest ways for [petitioner] to bring his application into compliance. If every suggestion could become the subject of a lawsuit under Nollan, [the] lawyer can give but one recommendation: Deny the permits without giving [petitioner] any advice—even if he asks for guidance. [Nothing] in the Takings Clause requires that folly.

In Horne v. Department of Agriculture, 135 S. Ct. 1039 (2015), the Court rejected the argument that the government's taking of raisins from private producers as part of a program designed to regulate the raisin market could be justified as a condition on permission granted to the raisin owners to sell their product in interstate markets. The government relied on Monsanto (discussed at page 989), where the Court held that the Environmental Protection Agency could require companies manufacturing pesticides to disclose health and safety information as a condition to receiving a permit to sell their products. The Monsanto Court held that even though the manufacturers had a property interest in these trade secrets, the disclosure was not a taking because the manufacturers received a "valuable Government benefit" in exchange—namely, permission to sell the chemicals. The Horne Court rejected this analogy:

Selling produce in interstate commerce, although certainly subject to reasonable government regulation, is [not] a special governmental benefit that the Government may hold hostage, to be ransomed by the waiver of constitutional protection. Raisins are not dangerous pesticides; they are a healthy snack.

Justice Sotomayor wrote an opinion dissenting on this and other points. (Horne is discussed in greater detail at page 985.)

2. Proportionality. Compare Nollan to Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 U.S. 374

(1994). Dolan sought permission from the City to expand her store and pave her parking lot. The City conditioned its permission on her willingness to dedicate a portion of her land to a public greenway along a creek, so as to minimize flooding, and a bicycle path designed to relieve vehicular congestion. In an opinion for written by Chief Justice Rehnquist, the Court held that the imposition of the condition was unconstitutional. Here, unlike in Nollan, the Court found that there was a nexus between the conditions imposed and the development sought by the landowner. Dolan's proposed parking lot would increase the amount of storm water runoff from the creek, and the bicycle path might reduce congestion caused by the expanded store. The Court nonetheless thought that the condition was improper because the extent of the deprivation was disproportionate to the harm caused by the development. "We think a term such as 'rough proportionality' best encapsulates what we hold to be the requirement of the Fifth Amendment. No precise mathematical calculation is required, but the city must make some sort of individualized determination that the required dedication is related both in nature and extent to the impact of the proposed development."

Justice Stevens wrote a dissenting opinion in which Justices Blackmun and Ginsburg joined. Justice Souter also dissented.

Suppose instead of demanding a property interest to which it was otherwise not entitled, the state simply demands cash in return for a permit application. As noted above, in Koontz v. St. Johns River Water Management District, supra, the District offered to allow petitioner to proceed with development if petitioner paid for improvements on a different parcel owned by the District. The Florida Supreme Court held that this situation was not governed by Nollan and Dolan because the requirement of a monetary payment did not constitute a "taking."

In his opinion for a five-to-four majority, Justice Alito rejected this reasoning: "[If] we accepted this argument it would be very easy for land-use permitting officials to evade the limitations of Nollan and Dolan. Because the government need only provide a permit applicant with one alternative that satisfies the nexus and rough proportionality standards, a permitting authority wishing to exact an easement could simply give the owner a choice of either surrendering an easement or making a payment equal to the easement's value."

The Court recognized that the takings clause does not apply to government-imposed financial obligations that do not operate upon or alter an identified property interest. Here, however, it found that the demand for money did operate upon such an interest "by directing the owner of a particular piece of property to make a monetary payment." The monetary obligation therefore "burdened petitioner's ownership of a specific parcel of land."

The Court acknowledged that neither a requirement that petitioner pay money to the state when not associated with a permit application nor the outright denial of a permit application would constitute a taking. How, then, can putting petitioner to a choice between these two options be a taking? Compare Rumsfeld v. FAIR, 547 U.S. 47 (2006). A federal statute provided that if a university denied access to military recruiters it would lose access to federal funds. The Court, in a unanimous opinion written by Chief Justice Roberts, upheld the amendment on the ground that universities did not have a constitutional right either to the federal funds or to exclude the military. Are Rumsfeld and Koontz consistent?

3. Rent control. In Pennell v. City of San Jose, 485 U.S. 1 (1988), the Supreme Court upheld an unusual rent control ordinance. The ordinance contained a mechanism for automatically increasing annual rents by as much as 8 percent. If a tenant objects to an increase greater than 8 percent, a hearing is provided, in which a mediation hearing officer decides whether the proposed increase is “reasonable under the circumstances.” The decision about reasonableness is to include consideration of the economic and financial hardship imposed on the present tenant or tenants of the unit or units to which such increases apply. If, on balance, the Hearing Officer determinates that the proposed increase constitutes an unreasonably severe financial or economic hardship on a particular tenant, he may order that the excess of the increase [be] disallowed. Any tenant whose household income and monthly housing expense meets [certain income requirements] shall be deemed to be suffering under financial and economic hardship which must be weighed.

The Court responded:

We think it would be premature to consider [the contention that the ordinance amounted to an unconstitutional taking] on the present record. As things stand, there simply is no evidence that the “tenant hardship clause” has in fact ever been relied upon by a Hearing Officer to reduce a rent below the figure it would have been set at on the basis of the other factors set forth in the Ordinance. In addition, there is nothing in the Ordinance requiring that a Hearing Officer in fact reduce a proposed rent increase on grounds of tenant hardship....Given the “essentially ad hoc, factual inquir[y]” involved in the takings analysis, Kaiser Aetna v. United States, we have found it particularly important in takings cases to adhere to our admonition that “the constitutionality of statutes ought not be decided except in an actual factual setting that makes such a decision necessary.”...

Petitioners argue, however, that it is “arbitrary, discriminatory, or demonstrably irrelevant,” for appellees to attempt to accomplish the additional goal of reducing the burden of housing costs on low-income tenants by requiring that “hardship to a tenant” be considered in determining the amount of excess rent increase that is “reasonable under the circumstances.” As appellants put it, “The objective of alleviating individual tenant hardship is...not a ‘policy the legislature is free to adopt’ in a rent control ordinance.”

[But] the Ordinance establishes a scheme in which a Hearing Officer considers a number of factors in determining the reasonableness of a proposed rent increase which exceeds eight percent and which exceeds the amount deemed reasonable....The first six factors [focus] on the individual landlord—the Hearing Officer examines the history of the premises, the landlord’s costs, and the market for comparable housing. Section 5703.28(c)(5) also allows the landlord to bring forth any other financial evidence—including presumably evidence regarding his own financial status—to be taken into account by the Hearing Officer. It is in only this context that the Ordinance allows tenant hardship to be considered and...“balance[d]” with the other factors within this scheme. [The Ordinance] represents a rational attempt to accommodate the conflicting interests of protecting tenants from burdensome rent increases while at the same time ensuring that landlords are guaranteed a fair return on their investment....

We accordingly find that the Ordinance, which so carefully considers both the individual circumstances of the landlord and the tenant before determining whether to allow an additional increase in rent over and above certain amounts that are deemed reasonable, does not on its face violate the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause....

Compare Yee v. Escondido, 503 U.S. 519 (1992). At issue was a local rent control ordinance, applied to mobile home owners and in particular to owners of mobile home “parks.” The ordinance set rents at a 1986 level, prohibited unapproved rent increases, and specified the factors that must be considered for any increases. Mobile home park owners contended that under this system they could no longer set rents or decide who their tenants would be, and that as a result the mobile home owner became an effective perpetual tenant of the park, indefinitely enabled to occupy the home’s “pad.” Thus, an interest in land—the right to occupy it at submarket rent—has been transferred from the park owner to the mobile home owner. According to the park owners, there was in this sense a physical invasion of their property.

The Court disagreed. It said that “government effects a physical taking only where it requires the landowner to submit to the physical occupation of the land.” Here, however, “[p]etitioners voluntarily rented their land to mobile home owners....[Neither] the City nor the State compels petitioners, once they have rented their property to tenants, to continue doing so.” In the Court’s view, “[No] government has required any physical invasions of petitioners’ property. Petitioners’ tenants were invited by petitioners, not forced upon them by the government.” Thus, the laws at issue “merely regulate petitioners’ use of their land by regulating the relationship between landlord and tenant.”

The fact that there was a transfer of wealth from park owners to incumbent mobile home owners was not decisive, since many forms of land use regulation “can also be said to transfer wealth from the one who is regulated to another.” But the Court noted that a “different case would be presented” if the statute compelled “a landowner over objection to rent his property or to refrain in perpetuity from terminating a tenancy.”

4. Remedies for takings. When government regulation is sufficiently intrusive to constitute a taking, what remedy does the Constitution require? In First English Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. County of Los Angeles, 482 U.S. 304 (1987), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Rehnquist, held that the mere invalidation of the ordinance restricting use of the property in question was constitutionally insufficient. Although the state was free to end the taking by not enforcing the ordinance, it was also required to pay damages for the temporary taking effected during the period before the ordinance was invalidated. Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Blackmun and O’Connor, filed a dissenting opinion.

Compare Arkansas Game & Fish Commission v. United States, 133 S. Ct. 511 (2012), where the Court, in a unanimous decision by Justice Ginsburg, held that government action producing temporary flooding of property can constitute a compensable taking. Although the Court held that there was “no automatic exemption from Takings Clause inspection,” it also noted that whether there was in fact a taking depended on factors like the length of time that the area was flooded, the degree to which the invasion was intended or foreseeable, the character of the land, and the owner’s reasonable investment-backed expectations regarding the land’s use.

In Horne v. Department of Agriculture, supra, the Court held that the government could not reduce the compensation due to growers whose product the government had taken by the value of the regulatory program to the growers.

[The] Government cites no support for [its] notion that general regulatory activity [can] constitute just compensation for a specific physical taking. Instead, our cases have set forth a clear and administrable rule for just compensation: “The Court has repeatedly held that just compensation normally is to be measured by ‘the market value of the property at the time of the taking.’”

The Court distinguished cases “where the condemning authority may deduct special benefits—such as new access to a waterway or highway, or filling in of swampland—for the amount of compensation it seeks to pay a landowner suffering a partial taking. [Cases] of that sort can raise complicated questions involving the exercise of the eminent domain power, but they do not create a generally applicable exception to the usual compensation rule, based on asserted regulatory benefits of the sort at issue here.”

In an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part, Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Ginsburg and Kagan, disagreed:

When the Government takes [a] percentage of the annual crop, the raisin owners retain the remaining [raisins]. The reserve requirement is intended [to] enhance the price that [the remaining] raisins will fetch on the open market. And any such enhancement matters. The Court’s precedents indicate that, when calculating [just compensation] a court should deduct from the value of the taken [raisins] any enhancement caused by the taking to the value of the remaining [raisins].

Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council

505 U.S. 1003 (1992)

JUSTICE SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

In 1986, petitioner David H. Lucas paid $975,000 for two residential lots on the Isle of Palms in Charleston County, South Carolina, on which he intended to build single-family homes. In 1988, however, the South Carolina Legislature enacted the Beachfront Management Act, which had the direct effect of barring petitioner from erecting any permanent habitable structures on his two parcels. A state trial court found that this prohibition rendered Lucas’s parcels “valueless.” This case requires us to decide whether the Act’s dramatic effect on the economic value of Lucas’s lots accomplished a taking of private property under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments requiring the payment of “just compensation.”

South Carolina's expressed interest in intensively managing development activities in the so-called "coastal zone" dates from 1977 when, in the aftermath of Congress's passage of the federal Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972, the legislature enacted a Coastal Zone Management Act of its own....

In the late 1970's, Lucas and others began extensive residential development of the Isle of Palms, a barrier island situated eastward of the City of Charleston. Toward the close of the development cycle for one residential subdivision known as "Beachwood East," Lucas in 1986 purchased the two lots at issue in this litigation for his own account. [At] the time Lucas acquired these parcels, he was not legally obliged to obtain a permit from the Council in advance of any development activity. His intention with respect to the lots was to do what the owners of the immediately adjacent parcels had already done: erect single-family residences. He commissioned architectural drawings for this purpose.

The Beachfront Management Act brought Lucas's plans to an abrupt end. Under that 1988 legislation, the Council was directed to establish a "baseline" connecting the landward-most "points of erosion...during the past forty years" in the region of the Isle of Palms that includes Lucas's lots. In action not challenged here, the Council fixed this baseline landward of Lucas's parcels. That was significant, for under the Act construction of occupiable improvements was flatly prohibited seaward of a line drawn 20 feet landward of, and parallel to, the baseline. The Act provided no exceptions.

Lucas promptly filed suit in the South Carolina Court of Common Pleas, contending that the Beachfront Management Act's construction bar effected a taking of his property without just compensation. Lucas did not take issue with the validity of the Act as a lawful exercise of South Carolina's police power, but contended that the Act's complete extinguishment of his property's value entitled him to compensation regardless of whether the legislature had acted in furtherance of legitimate police power objectives. Following a bench trial, the court agreed. Among its factual determinations was the finding that "at the time Lucas purchased the two lots, both were zoned for single-family residential construction and...there were no restrictions imposed upon such use of the property by either the State of South Carolina, the County of Charleston, or the Town of the Isle of Palms." The trial court further found that the Beachfront Management Act decreed a permanent ban on construction insofar as Lucas's lots were concerned, and that this prohibition "deprived Lucas of any reasonable economic use of the lots,...eliminated the unrestricted right of use, and rendered them valueless.” The court thus concluded that Lucas’s properties had been “taken” by operation of the Act, and it ordered respondent to pay “just compensation” in the amount of $1,232,387.50....

Prior to Justice Holmes’ exposition in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393 (1922), it was generally thought that the Takings Clause reached only a “direct appropriation” of property, Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 457, 551 (1871), or the functional equivalent of a “practical ouster of [the owner’s] possession.” Transportation Co. v. Chicago, 99 U.S. 635, 642 (1879). Justice Holmes recognized in Mahon, however, that if the protection against physical appropriations of private property was to be meaningfully enforced, the government’s power to redefine the range of interests included in the ownership of property was necessarily constrained by constitutional limits....

Nevertheless, our decision in Mahon offered little insight into when, and under what circumstances, a given regulation would be seen as going “too far” for purposes of the Fifth Amendment. In 70-odd years of succeeding “regulatory takings” jurisprudence, we have generally eschewed any “set formula” for determining how far is too far, preferring to “engage in...essentially ad hoc, factual inquiries,” Penn Central Transportation Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104, 124 (1978) (quoting Goldblatt v. Hempstead, 369 U.S. 590, 594 (1962)). See Epstein, Takings: Descent and Resurrection, 1987 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1, 4. We have, however, described at least two discrete categories of regulatory action as compensable without case-specific inquiry into the public interest advanced in support of the restraint. The first encompasses regulations that compel the property owner to suffer a physical “invasion” of his property. In general (at least with regard to permanent invasions), no matter how minute the intrusion, and no matter how weighty the public purpose behind it, we have required compensation....

The second situation in which we have found categorical treatment appropriate is where regulation denies all economically beneficial or productive use of land....⁷

We have never set forth the justification for this rule. Perhaps it is simply, as Justice Brennan suggested, that total deprivation of beneficial use is, from the landowner’s point of view, the equivalent of a physical appropriation. Surely, at least, in the extraordinary circumstance when no productive or economically beneficial use of land is permitted, it is less realistic to indulge our usual assumption that the legislature is simply “adjusting the benefits and burdens of economic life,” Penn Central Transportation Co., in a manner that secures an “average reciprocity of advantage” to everyone concerned. Mahon. And the functional basis for permitting the government, by regulation, to affect property values without compensation—that “Government hardly could go on if to some extent values incident to property could not be diminished without paying for every such change in the general law”—does not apply to the relatively rare situations where the government has deprived a landowner of all economically beneficial uses.

On the other side of the balance, affirmatively supporting a compensation requirement, is the fact that regulations that leave the owner of land without economically beneficial or productive options for its use—typically, as here, by requiring land to be left substantially in its natural state—carry with them a heightened risk that private property is being pressed into some form of public service under the guise of mitigating serious public harm....

We think, in short, that there are good reasons for our frequently expressed belief that when the owner of real property has been called upon to sacrifice all economically beneficial uses in the name of the common good, that is, to leave his property economically idle, he has suffered a taking.⁸

The trial court found Lucas’s two beachfront lots to have been rendered valueless by respondent’s enforcement of the coastal-zone construction ban....

It is correct that many of our prior opinions have suggested that “harmful or noxious uses” of property may be proscribed by government regulation without the requirement of compensation. For a number of reasons, however, we think the South Carolina Supreme Court was too quick to conclude that that principle decides the present case....

When it is understood that “prevention of harmful use” was merely our early formulation of the police power justification necessary to sustain (without compensation) any regulatory diminution in value; and that the distinction between regulation that “prevents harmful use” and that which “confers benefits” is difficult, if not impossible, to discern on an objective, value-free basis; it becomes self-evident that noxious-use logic cannot serve as a touchstone to distinguish regulatory “takings”—which require compensation—from regulatory deprivations that do not require compensation. A fortiori the legislature’s recitation of a noxious-use justification cannot be the basis for departing from our categorical rule that total regulatory takings must be compensated. If it were, departure would virtually always be allowed. The South Carolina Supreme Court’s approach would essentially nullify Mahon’s affirmation of limits to the noncompensable exercise of the police power....

Where the State seeks to sustain regulation that deprives land of all economically beneficial use, we think it may resist compensation only if the logically antecedent inquiry into the nature of the owner’s estate shows that the proscribed use interests were not part of his title to begin with. This accords, we think, with our “takings” jurisprudence, which has traditionally been guided by the understandings of our citizens regarding the content of, and the State’s power over, the “bundle of rights” that they acquire when they obtain title to property. [We] think the notion pressed by the Council that title is somehow held subject to the “implied limitation” that the State may subsequently eliminate all economically valuable use is inconsistent with the historical compact recorded in the Takings Clause that has become part of our constitutional culture.

Where “permanent physical occupation” of land is concerned, we have refused to allow the government to decree it anew (without compensation), no matter how weighty the asserted “public interests” involved, though we assuredly would permit the government to assert a permanent easement that was a preexisting limitation upon the landowner’s title. We believe similar treatment must be accorded confiscatory regulations, i.e., regulations that prohibit all economically beneficial use of land: Any limitation so severe cannot be newly legislated or decreed (without compensation), but must inhere in the title itself, in the restrictions that background principles of the State’s law of property and nuisance already place upon land ownership. A law or decree with such an effect must, in other words, do no more than duplicate the result that could have been achieved in the courts—by adjacent landowners (or other uniquely affected persons) under the State’s law of private nuisance, or by the State under its complementary power to abate nuisances that affect the public generally, or otherwise.

On this analysis, the owner of a lake bed, for example, would not be entitled to compensation when he is denied the requisite permit to engage in a landfilling operation that would have the effect of flooding others’ land. Nor the corporate owner of a nuclear generating plant, when it is directed to remove all improvements from its land upon discovery that the plant sits astride an earthquake fault. Such regulatory action may well have the effect of eliminating the land’s only economically productive use, but it does not proscribe a productive use that was previously permissible under relevant property and nuisance principles. The use of these properties for what are now expressly prohibited purposes was always unlawful, and (subject to other constitutional limitations) it was open to the State at any point to make the implication of those background principles of nuisance and property law explicit....

The “total taking” inquiry we require today will ordinarily entail (as the application of state nuisance law ordinarily entails) analysis of, among other things, the degree of harm to public lands and resources, or adjacent private property, posed by the claimant’s proposed activities, the social value of the claimant's activities and their suitability to the locality in question, and the relative ease with which the alleged harm can be avoided through measures taken by the claimant and the government (or adjacent private landowners) alike. The fact that a particular use has long been engaged in by similarly situated owners ordinarily imports a lack of any common-law prohibition (though changed circumstances or new knowledge may make what was previously permissible no longer so). So also does the fact that other landowners, similarly situated, are permitted to continue the use denied to the claimant.

It seems unlikely that common-law principles would have prevented the erection of any habitable or productive improvements on petitioner's land; they rarely support prohibition of the "essential use" of land, Curtin v. Benson, 222 U.S. 78, 86 (1911). The question, however, is one of state law to be dealt with on remand. We emphasize that to win its case South Carolina must do more than proffer the legislature's declaration that the uses Lucas desires are inconsistent with the public interest, or the conclusory assertion that they violate a common-law maxim such as sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. As we have said, a "State, by ipse dixit, may not transform private property into public property without compensation...." Webb's Fabulous Pharmacies, Inc. v. Beckwith, 449 U.S. 155, 164 (1980). Instead, as it would be required to do if it sought to restrain Lucas in a common-law action for public nuisance, South Carolina must identify background principles of nuisance and property law that prohibit the uses he now intends in the circumstances in which the property is presently found. Only on this showing can the State fairly claim that, in proscribing all such beneficial uses, the Beachfront Management Act is taking nothing....

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

[Justice Souter would dismiss the writ of certiorari in this case as having been granted improvidently.]

JUSTICE KENNEDY, concurring in the judgment....

In my view, reasonable expectations must be understood in light of the whole of our legal tradition. The common law of nuisance is too narrow a confine for the exercise of regulatory power in a complex and interdependent society. The State should not be prevented from enacting new regulatory initiatives in response to changing conditions, and courts must consider all reasonable expectations whatever their source. The Takings Clause does not require a static body of state property law; it protects private expectations to ensure private investment. I agree with the Court that nuisance prevention accords with the most common expectations of property owners who face regulation, but I do not believe this can be the sole source of state authority to impose severe restrictions. Coastal property may present such unique concerns for a fragile land system that the State can go further in regulating its development and use than the common law of nuisance might otherwise permit.

The Supreme Court of South Carolina erred, in my view, by reciting the general purposes for which the state regulations were enacted without a determination that they were in accord with the owner's reasonable expectations and therefore sufficient to support a severe restriction on specific parcels of property. The promotion of tourism, for instance, ought not to suffice to deprive specific property of all value without a corresponding duty to compensate. Furthermore, the means as well as the ends of regulation must accord with the owner's reasonable expectations. Here, the State did not act until after the property had been zoned for individual lot development and most other parcels had been improved, throwing the whole burden of the regulation on the remaining lots. This too must be measured in the balance.

With these observations, I concur in the judgment of the Court.

JUSTICE BLACKMUN, dissenting....

I first question the Court's rationale in creating a category that obviates a "case-specific inquiry into the public interest advanced," if all economic value has been lost. If one fact about the Court's taking jurisprudence can be stated without contradiction, it is that "the particular circumstances of each case" determine whether a specific restriction will be rendered invalid by the government's failure to pay compensation....

This Court repeatedly has recognized the ability of government, in certain circumstances, to regulate property without compensation no matter how adverse the financial effect on the owner may be....

These cases rest on the principle that the State has full power to prohibit an owner's use of property if it is harmful to the public. "Since no individual has a right to use his property so as to create a nuisance or otherwise harm others, the State has not 'taken' anything when it asserts its power to enjoin the nuisance-like activity." Keystone Bituminous Coal....

Ultimately even the Court cannot embrace the full implications of its per se rule: it eventually agrees that there cannot be a categorical rule for a taking based on economic value that wholly disregards the public need asserted. Instead, the Court decides that it will permit a State to regulate all economic value only if the State prohibits uses that would not be permitted under "background principles of nuisance and property law."

Until today, the Court explicitly had rejected the contention that the government's power to act without paying compensation turns on whether the prohibited activity is a common-law nuisance....

[Common law] public and private nuisance law is simply a determination whether a particular use causes harm. There is nothing magical in the reasoning of judges long dead. They determined a harm in the same way as state judges and legislatures do today. If judges in the 18th and 19th centuries can distinguish a harm from a benefit, why not judges in the 20th century, and if judges can, why not legislators? There simply is no reason to believe that new interpretations of the hoary common law nuisance doctrine will be particularly "objective" or "value-free."...

The Court makes sweeping and, in my view, misguided and unsupported changes in our taking doctrine. While it limits these changes to the most narrow subset of government regulation—those that eliminate all economic value from land—these changes go far beyond what is necessary to secure petitioner Lucas' private benefit. One hopes they do not go beyond the narrow confines the Court assigns them to today.

I dissent.

JUSTICE STEVENS, dissenting....

In addition to lacking support in past decisions, the Court's new rule is wholly arbitrary. A landowner whose property is diminished in value 95% recovers nothing, while an owner whose property is diminished 100% recovers the land's full value....

Moreover, because of the elastic nature of property rights, the Court's new rule will also prove unsound in practice. In response to the rule, courts may define "property" broadly and only rarely find regulations to effect total takings.

The Court's holding today effectively freezes the State's common law, denying the legislature much of its traditional power to revise the law governing the rights and uses of property. Until today, I had thought that we had long abandoned this approach to constitutional law. More than a century ago we recognized that "the great office of statutes is to remedy defects in the common law as they are developed, and to adapt it to the changes of time and circumstances." Munn v. Illinois, 94 U.S. 113, 134 (1877). As Justice Marshall observed about a position similar to that adopted by the Court today: "If accepted, that claim would represent a return to the era of Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), when common-law rights were also found immune from revision by State or Federal Government. Such an approach would freeze the common law as it has been constructed by the courts, perhaps at its 19th-century state of development. It would allow no room for change in response to changes in circumstance. The Due Process Clause does not require such a result.” PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 93 (1980) (concurring opinion).

Arresting the development of the common law is not only a departure from our prior decisions; it is also profoundly unwise. The human condition is one of constant learning and evolution—both moral and practical. Legislatures implement that new learning; in doing so they must often revise the definition of property and the rights of property owners. Thus, when the Nation came to understand that slavery was morally wrong and mandated the emancipation of all slaves, it, in effect, redefined “property.” On a lesser scale, our ongoing self-education produces similar changes in the rights of property owners: New appreciation of the significance of endangered species, the importance of wetlands, and the vulnerability of coastal lands, shapes our evolving understandings of property rights.

Of course, some legislative redefinitions of property will effect a taking and must be compensated—but it certainly cannot be the case that every movement away from common law does so. There is no reason, and less sense, in such an absolute rule. We live in a world in which changes in the economy and the environment occur with increasing frequency and importance. If it was wise a century ago to allow Government “the largest legislative discretion” to deal with “the special exigencies of the moment,” it is imperative to do so today. The rule that should govern a decision in a case of this kind should focus on the future, not the past....

The Court’s categorical approach rule will, I fear, greatly hamper the efforts of local officials and planners who must deal with increasingly complex problems in land-use and environmental regulation....

[Even] assuming that petitioner’s property was rendered valueless, the risk inherent in investments of the sort made by petitioner, the generality of the Act, and the compelling purpose motivating the South Carolina Legislature persuade me that the Act did not effect a taking of petitioner’s property.

Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.

Note: Lucas, the Environment, and Regulatory Takings

1. Lucas’s importance. Lucas appears to be one of the most important recent cases in the law of takings. But how could anyone object to the idea that compensation is due when government has rendered property completely “valueless”?

2. The denominator problem. Suppose Lucas had owned an additional, contiguous parcel of land that was not controlled by the regulation, so that the regulation did not render his property (consisting of both parcels) completely valueless. What result? What result if the second parcel was not contiguous?

Compare Murr v. Wisconsin, 137 S. Ct. 1933 (2017). Petitioners’ family purchased adjoining Lots E and F along the St. Croix River in 1960 and 1961 and built a small, recreational cabin on Lot F. The lots were conveyed to petitioners in 1994 and 1995 and are now under common ownership. Petitioners wished to sell Lot E, but Wisconsin rules, designed to “guarantee the protection of the wild, scenic and recreational qualities of the river” prohibited the sale or development of adjacent lots under common ownership as separate lots. Petitioners claimed that this provision constituted a taking because it deprived them of all or practically all use of Lot E. In a five-to-three decision, written by Justice Kennedy, the Court rejected this claim.

The Court framed the case as posing a question about “the proper unit of property against which to assess the effect of the challenged governmental regulation.” In answering that question, the Court rejected two approaches which it characterized as “unduly narrow.”

First, the Court has declined to limit the parcel in an artificial manner to the portion of property targeted by the challenged regulation. That is because “defining the property interest taken in terms of the very regulation being challenged is circular.” [Tahoe-Sierra Preservation Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 322, 331 (2002)].…

The second concept about which the Court has expressed caution is the view that property rights under the Takings Clause should be coextensive with those under state law. States do not have the unfettered authority to “shape and define property rights and reasonable investment-backed expectations” leaving landowners without recourse against unreasonable regulations.

It followed that “no single consideration can supply the exclusive test for determining the denominator.” Instead, the Court pointed to a number of factors including “the treatment of the land under state and local law; the physical characteristics of the land; and the prospective value of the regulated land.”

The endeavor should determine whether reasonable expectations about property ownership would lead a landowner to anticipate that his holdings would be treated as one parcel, or, instead, as separate tracts. The inquiry is objective, and the reasonable expectations at issue derive from background customs and the whole of our legal tradition.

With regard to the first factor, “courts should give substantial weight to the treatment of the land [under] state and local law,” and “[a] reasonable restriction that predates a landowner’s acquisition, [can] be one of the objective factors that most landowners would reasonably consider in forming fair expectations about their property.” On the other hand, “a use restriction which is triggered only after, or because of, a change in ownership should also guide a court’s assessment of reasonable private expectations.”

With regard to the second factor, “it may be relevant that the property is located in an area that is subject to, or likely to become subject to, environmental or other regulation.”

Finally, with regard to the prospective value of the land, “[though] a use restriction may decrease the market value of the property, the effect may be tempered if the regulated land adds value to the remaining property, such as by increasing privacy, expanding recreational space, or preserving surrounding natural beauty.”

Applying this test to the facts before it, the Court held that petitioners’ property should be treated as a single parcel. Under state law, the lots were treated as a single unit, and the lots were subject to this provision because of petitioners “voluntary conduct in bringing the lots under common ownership after the regulations were enacted.” The lots were contiguous, and because the Lower St. Croix River was regulated before they purchased the property, petitioners “could have anticipated public regulation that might affect their enjoyment of their property.” Finally, although petitioners were “prohibited from selling Lots E and F separately or from building separate residential structures on each, [this] restriction [was] mitigated by the benefits of using the property as an integrated whole, allowing increased privacy and recreational space, plus the optimal location of any improvements.”

When the two lots were considered as a single unit, the use regulation was insufficient to constitute a regulatory taking because the property had not lost all its economic value and the economic effect of the regulation was not severe.

Chief Justice Roberts, joined by Justices Thomas and Alito, dissented:

[The Court’s] bottom-line conclusion does not trouble me; the majority presents a fair case that the Murrs can still make good use of both lots and that the ordinance is a commonplace tool to preserve scenic areas....

Where the majority goes astray, however, is in concluding that the definition of the “private property” at issue [turns] on an elaborate test looking not only to state and local law. [Our] decisions have, time and again, declared that the Takings Clause protects property rights as state law creates and defines them....

I would therefore vacate the judgment below and remand for the court to identify the relevant property using ordinary principles of Wisconsin property law.

Justice Thomas filed a separate dissent, urging the Court “to take a fresh look at our regulatory takings jurisprudence, to see whether it can be grounded in the original public meaning of the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment or the Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.”

3. Takings and the common law. Does the Lucas test depend on the common law background or instead on the legal background in general? Suppose the state had said by statute, before Lucas purchased the property, that certain lands must not be developed in order to promote tourism and protect flora and fauna. Would the result be different? If it would be different, has the takings clause allowed the government to do basically whatever it wants through the simple redefinition of property rights?

4. Sources of property rights. There is a large question in the background: Where do property rights come from? Sometimes it is said that property rights come from “the state,” which defines them; people who say this say that government can define property rights however it wishes. Such people might acknowledge that the takings clause requires compensation, but only if the state has changed the law after the time of purchase. Other people think that there are limits on how the state can define property rights, and that states cannot, for example, limit ownership in ways that go very far beyond the law of nuisance. How would this debate be resolved? Compare the debate over the source of property rights with respect to procedural due process discussed in section G, supra. Is there an explanation for the Court’s different treatment of the issue in these two contexts?

5. Temporary takings? Is the government permitted to impose a moratorium on economic development? What if the moratorium deprives the property owner of all valuable use of the property? In Tahoe-Sierra Preservation Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 535 U.S. 302 (2002), the Court held that a moratorium, imposed during a period for studying the impact of development on Lake Tahoe, would not be treated as a categorical taking, subject to a per se requirement of compensation. The Court stressed that the case did not involve a physical taking, and it concluded that the rules for physical takings should not be used for “regulatory takings.” Hence the Penn Central test, involving balancing, would be appropriate. The Court emphasized that Lucas involved a permanent taking, not a taking for a mere thirty-two months. The Court refused to accept the view “that we can effectively sever a 32-month segment from the remainder of each landowner’s fee simple estate and then ask whether that segment has been taken in its entirety” by the moratorium. Hence the Court concluded that it was appropriate to rely on “the familiar Penn Central approach when deciding cases like this, rather than by attempting to craft a new categorical rule.” Chief Justice Rehnquist dissented, in an opinion joined by Justices Scalia and Thomas.

6. Judicial takings. Can a judicial shift in common law property rules constitute an unconstitutional taking? The Court sharply divided on this question in Stop the Beach Renourishment v. Florida Department of Environmental Protection, 560 U.S. 702 (2010). At issue was a Florida program to repair beach erosion by depositing sand on eroded beaches. The program had the effect of turning previously submerged land into beachfront. The Florida Supreme Court held that under Florida common law property principles, this land belonged to the government rather than the private property owners whose land had previously extended to the shore line. A unanimous Court, in an opinion written by Justice Scalia, held that the Florida court’s holding did not constitute a change in the common law and, therefore, was not an uncompensated taking. Writing for only four of the eight Justices participating, Justice Scalia, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Thomas and Alito, went on to state that

[the] Takings Clause [is] not addressed to the action of a specific branch or branches. It is concerned simply with the act, and not with the governmental actor. [It] would be absurd to allow a State to do by judicial decree what the Takings Clause forbids it to do by legislative fiat....

If a legislature or a court declares that what was once an established right of private property no longer exists, it has taken that property, no less than if the State had physically appropriated it or destroyed its value by regulation.

Justice Scalia conceded that the framers did not envision that the takings clause would apply to judicial action:

They doubtless did not, since the Constitution was adopted in an era when courts had no power to “change” the common law. [Where] the text they adopted is clear, however, [what] counts is not what they envisioned but what they wrote.

Writing for himself and Justice Sotomayor, Justice Kennedy argued that the case did not require the Court to determine when or whether a judicial decision determining the rights of property owners violated the takings clause and pointed to “certain difficulties that should be considered before accepting [such a] theory.” Justice Kennedy suggested that the due process clause might better serve the function of protecting settled property expectations in this situation.

Justice Breyer, joined by Justice Ginsburg, agreed that “[there] is no need now to decide more than [that] the Florida Supreme Court’s decision in this case did not amount to a ‘judicial taking.’” He argued that Justice Scalia’s approach “would invite a host of federal takings claims without the mature consideration of potential procedural or substantive legal principles that might limit federal interference in matters that are primarily the subject of state law” and that the Court therefore should not resolve the issue in this case.

Justice Stevens did not participate.

Under Justice Scalia’s approach, suppose that a state court overrules a prior decision, holding that the prior decision had misinterpreted the common law and that the new decision returned to common law principles. If the new decision diminishes property rights protected by the prior decision, is it a taking?

Palazzolo v. Rhode Island

533 U.S. 606 (2001)

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

Petitioner Anthony Palazzolo owns a waterfront parcel of land in the town of Westerly, Rhode Island. Almost all of the property is designated as coastal wetlands under Rhode Island law. After petitioner’s development proposals were rejected by respondent Rhode Island Coastal Resources Management Council (Council), he sued in state court, asserting the Council’s application of its wetlands regulations took the property without compensation in violation of the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment, binding upon the State through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment....

I....

In 1959 petitioner, a lifelong Westerly resident, decided to invest in three undeveloped, adjoining parcels along this eastern stretch of Atlantic Avenue. [To] purchase and hold the property, petitioner and associates formed Shore Gardens, Inc. (SGI). After SGI purchased the property petitioner bought out his associates and became the sole shareholder.

[During the first decade of SGI’s ownership, several applications to develop the property were denied.]

No further attempts to develop the property were made for over a decade. Two intervening events, however, become important to the issues presented. First, in 1971, Rhode Island enacted legislation creating the Council, an agency charged with the duty of protecting the State’s coastal properties. Regulations promulgated by the Council designated salt marshes like those on SGFs property as protected “coastal wetlands,” on which development is limited to a great extent. Second, in 1978 SGFs corporate charter was revoked for failure to pay corporate income taxes; and title to the property passed, by operation of state law, to petitioner as the corporation’s sole shareholder.

In 1983 petitioner, now the owner, renewed the efforts to develop the property. [Petitioner’s applications to fill the marsh area and to establish a beach club were denied by the Council. He then filed this action, claiming that his property had been taken without just compensation.]

[We] hold [that] the owner is not deprived of all economic use of his property because the value of upland portions is substantial. We remand for further consideration of the claim under the principles set forth in Penn Central.

II

[Respondent argues that petitioner’s claim should be denied because at the time the wetlands regulations were promulgated, the parcel was owned not by petitioner but by a corporation of which he was the sole shareholder.]

The theory underlying the argument that postenactment purchasers cannot challenge a regulation under the Takings Clause seems to run on these lines: Property rights are created by the State. So, the argument goes, by prospective legislation the State can shape and define property rights and reasonable investment-backed expectations, and subsequent owners cannot claim any injury from lost value. After all, they purchased or took title with notice of the limitation.

The State may not put so potent a Hobbesian stick into the Lockean bundle. [Were] we to accept the State’s rule, the postenactment transfer of title would absolve the State of its obligation to defend any action restricting land use, no matter how extreme or unreasonable. A State would be allowed, in effect, to put an expiration date on the Takings Clause. This ought not to be the rule. Future generations, too, have a right to challenge unreasonable limitations on the use and value of land.

Nor does the justification of notice take into account the effect on owners at the time of enactment, who are prejudiced as well. Should an owner attempt to challenge a new regulation, but not survive the process of ripening his or her claim (which, as this case demonstrates, will often take years), under the proposed rule the right to compensation may not be asserted by an heir or successor, and so may not be asserted at all. The State’s rule would work a critical alteration to the nature of property, as the newly regulated landowner is stripped of the ability to transfer the interest which was possessed prior to the regulation. The State may not by this means secure a windfall for itself. The proposed rule is, furthermore, capricious in effect. The young owner contrasted with the older owner, the owner with the resources to hold contrasted with the owner with the need to sell, would be in different positions. The Takings Clause is not so quixotic. A blanket rule that purchasers with notice have no compensation right when a claim becomes ripe is too blunt an instrument to accord with the duty to compensate for what is taken.

Direct condemnation, by invocation of the State's power of eminent domain, presents different considerations than cases alleging a taking based on a burdensome regulation. In a direct condemnation action, or when a State has physically invaded the property without filing suit, the fact and extent of the taking are known. In such an instance, it is a general rule of the law of eminent domain that any award goes to the owner at the time of the taking, and that the right to compensation is not passed to a subsequent purchaser....

We have no occasion to consider the precise circumstances when a legislative enactment can be deemed a background principle of state law or whether those circumstances are present here. It suffices to say that a regulation that otherwise would be unconstitutional absent compensation is not transformed into a background principle of the State's law by mere virtue of the passage of title....

III

[Petitioner] accepts the Council's contention and the state trial court's finding that his parcel retains $200,000 in development value under the State's wetlands regulations. He asserts, nonetheless, that he has suffered a total taking and contends the Council cannot sidestep the holding in Lucas "by the simple expedient of leaving a landowner a few crumbs of value."

Assuming a taking is otherwise established, a State may not evade the duty to compensate on the premise that the landowner is left with a token interest. This is not the situation of the landowner in this case, however. A regulation permitting a landowner to build a substantial residence on an 18-acre parcel does not leave the property "economically idle." Lucas....

JUSTICE O'CONNOR, concurring.

I join the opinion of the Court but with my understanding of how the issues discussed in Part II of the opinion must be considered on remand.

Part II of the Court's opinion addresses the circumstance, present in this case, where a takings claimant has acquired title to the regulated property after the enactment of the regulation at issue. As the Court holds, the Rhode Island Supreme Court erred in effectively adopting the sweeping rule that the preacquisition enactment of the use restriction ipso facto defeats any takings claim based on that use restriction. Accordingly, the Court holds that petitioner's claim under Penn Central Transp. Co. v. New York City "is not barred by the mere fact that title was acquired after the effective date of the state-imposed restriction."

The more difficult question is what role the temporal relationship between regulatory enactment and title acquisition plays in a proper Penn Central analysis. Today's holding does not mean that the timing of the regulation's enactment relative to the acquisition of title is immaterial to the Penn Central analysis. Indeed, it would be just as much error to expunge this consideration from the takings inquiry as it would be to accord it exclusive significance. Our polestar instead remains the principles set forth in Penn Central itself and our other cases that govern partial regulatory takings. Under these cases, interference with investment-backed expectations is one of a number of factors that a court must examine. Further, the regulatory regime in place at the time the claimant acquires the property at issue helps to shape the reasonableness of those expectations.

If investment-backed expectations are given exclusive significance in the Penn Central analysis and existing regulations dictate the reasonableness of those expectations in every instance, then the State wields far too much power to redefine property rights upon passage of title. On the other hand, if existing regulations do nothing to inform the analysis, then some property owners may reap windfalls and an important indicium of fairness is lost. As I understand it, our decision today does not remove the regulatory backdrop against which an owner takes title to property from the purview of the Penn Central inquiry. It simply restores balance to that inquiry. Courts properly consider the effect of existing regulations under the rubric of investment-backed expectations in determining whether a compensable taking has occurred. As before, the salience of these facts cannot be reduced to any "set formula." Penn Central (internal quotation marks omitted). The temptation to adopt what amount to per se rules in either direction must be resisted. The Takings Clause requires careful examination and weighing of all the relevant circumstances in this context. The court below therefore must consider on remand the array of relevant factors under Penn Central before deciding whether any compensation is due.

JUSTICE SCALIA, concurring.

I write separately to make clear that my understanding of how the issues discussed in Part II of the Court's opinion must be considered on remand is not Justice O'Connor's.

The principle that underlies her separate concurrence is that it may in some (unspecified) circumstances be “[un]fai[r],” and produce unacceptable “windfalls,” to allow a subsequent purchaser to nullify an unconstitutional partial taking (though, inexplicably, not an unconstitutional total taking) by the government. The polar horrible, presumably, is the situation in which a sharp real estate developer, realizing (or indeed, simply gambling on) the unconstitutional excessiveness of a development restriction that a naive landowner assumes to be valid, purchases property at what it would be worth subject to the restriction, and then develops it to its full value (or resells it at its full value) after getting the unconstitutional restriction invalidated.

This can, I suppose, be called a windfall—though it is not much different from the windfalls that occur every day at stock exchanges or antique auctions, where the knowledgeable (or the venturesome) profit at the expense of the ignorant (or the risk averse). There is something to be said (though in my view not much) for pursuing abstract “fairness” by requiring part or all of that windfall to be returned to the naive original owner, who presumably is the “rightful” owner of it. But there is nothing to be said for giving it instead to the government—which not only did not lose something it owned, but is both the cause of the miscarriage of “fairness” and the only one of the three parties involved in the miscarriage (government, naive original owner, and sharp real estate developer) which acted unlawfully—indeed unconstitutionally. Justice O'Connor would eliminate the windfall by giving the malefactor the benefit of its malfeasance. It is rather like eliminating the windfall that accrued to a purchaser who bought property at a bargain rate from a thief clothed with the indicia of title, by making him turn over the “unjust” profit to the thief.

In my view, the fact that a restriction existed at the time the purchaser took title (other than a restriction forming part of the “background principles of the State's law of property and nuisance,” Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council), should have no bearing upon the determination of whether the restriction is so substantial as to constitute a taking. The “investment-backed expectations” that the law will take into account do not include the assumed validity of a restriction that in fact deprives property of so much of its value as to be unconstitutional. Which is to say that a Penn Central taking, see Penn Central Transp. Co. v. New York City, no less than a total taking, is not absolved by the transfer of title.

[Justices Ginsburg and Breyer wrote separate opinions, dissenting on ripeness grounds.]

JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

[I] have no doubt that [a property owner] has standing to challenge the restriction's validity whether she acquired title to the property before or after the regulation was adopted. For, as the Court correctly observes, even future generations "have a right to challenge unreasonable limitations on the use and value of land."

It by no means follows, however, that, as the Court assumes, a succeeding owner may obtain compensation for a taking of property from her predecessor in interest. A taking is a discrete event, a governmental acquisition of private property for which the state is required to provide just compensation. Like other transfers of property, it occurs at a particular time, that time being the moment when the relevant property interest is alienated from its owner....

[To] the extent that the adoption of the regulations constitute the challenged taking, petitioner is simply the wrong party to be bringing this action. If the regulations imposed a compensable injury on anyone, it was on the owner of the property at the moment the regulations were adopted. Given the trial court's finding that petitioner did not own the property at that time, in my judgment it is pellucidly clear that he has no standing to claim that the promulgation of the regulations constituted a taking of any part of the property that he subsequently acquired....

Note: Palazzolo—Final Thoughts

Question: What, exactly, is the "Lockean" bundle involved in this case? How can we know what the property right is at the time of acquisition without knowing what the state's law says at that time?

24 That one eschews a comprehensive theory of liberty does not, pace Justice Scalia, mean that one lacks "a coherent theory of the Due Process Clause." It means that one lacks the hubris to adopt a rigid, context-independent definition of a constitutional guarantee that was deliberately framed in open-ended terms.

22 The dissenting opinion seeks to disclaim this description of its theory by suggesting that a claim of vote dilution may require, in addition to proof of electoral defeat, some evidence of "historical and social factors" indicating that the group in question is without political influence. [Putting] to the side the evident fact that these gauzy sociological considerations have no constitutional basis, it remains far from certain that they could, in any principled manner, exclude the claims of any discrete political group that happens, for whatever reason, to elect fewer of its candidates than arithmetic indicates it might. Indeed, the putative limits are bound to prove illusory if the express purpose informing their application would be, as the dissent assumes, to redress the “inequitable distribution of political influence.”

26 It is difficult to perceive how the implications of the dissenting opinion’s theory of group representation could rationally be cabined. Indeed, certain preliminary practical questions immediately come to mind: Can only members of a minority of the voting population in a particular municipality be members of a “political group”? How large must a “group” be to be a “political group”? Can any “group” call itself a “political group”? If not, who is to say which “groups” are “political groups”? Can a qualified voter belong to more than one “political group”? Can there be more than one “political group” among white voters (e.g., Irish-American, Italian-American, Polish-American, Jews, Catholics, Protestants)? Can there be more than one “political group” among nonwhite voters? Do the answers to any of these questions depend upon the particular demographic composition of a given city? Upon the total size of its voting population? Upon the size of its governing body? Upon its form of government? Upon its history? Its geographic location? The fact that even these preliminary questions may be largely unanswerable suggests some of the conceptual and practical fallacies in the constitutional theory espoused by the dissenting opinion, putting to one side the total absence of support for that theory in the Constitution itself.

10 We are not dealing here with state insurance programs which may legitimately tie the amount of benefits to the individual’s contributions.

21 We imply no view of the validity of waiting-period or residence requirements determining eligibility to vote, eligibility for tuition-free education, to obtain a license to practice a profession, to hunt or fish, and so forth. Such requirements may promote compelling state interests on the one hand, or, on the other, may not be penalties upon the exercise of the constitutional right of interstate travel.

76 [Skinner, for example,] applied the standard of close scrutiny to a state law permitting forced sterilization of “habitual criminals.” Implicit in the Count’s opinion is the recognition that the right of procreation is among the rights of personal privacy protected under the Constitution. See Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 152 (1973). [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

78 Since the right to vote, per se, is not a constitutionally protected right, we assume that appellees’ references to that right are simply shorthand references to the protected right, implicit in our constitutional system, to participate in state elections on an equal basis with other qualified voters whenever the State has adopted an elective process for determining who will represent any segment of the State’s population.

60 It is interesting that in its effort to reconcile the state voting rights cases with its theory of fundamentality the majority can muster nothing more than the contention that “[t]he constitutional underpinnings of the right to equal treatment in the voting process can no longer be doubted....” If, by this, the Court intends to recognize a substantive constitutional “right to equal treatment in the voting process” independent of the Equal Protection Clause, the source of such a right is certainly a mystery to me.

61 It is true that Griffin [also] involved discrimination against indigents, that is, wealth discrimination. But, as the majority points out, the Court has never deemed wealth discrimination alone to be sufficient to require strict judicial scrutiny; rather, such review of wealth classifications has been applied only where the discrimination affects an important individual interest, see, e.g., [Harper]. Thus, I believe Griffin [can] only be understood as premised on a recognition of the fundamental importance of the criminal appellate process.

74 I believe that the close nexus between education and our established constitutional values with respect to freedom of speech and participation in the political process makes this a different case from our prior decisions concerning discrimination affecting public welfare, see, e.g., [Dandridge] or housing, see, e.g., [Lindsey v. Normet]. There can be no question that, as the majority suggests, constitutional rights may be less meaningful for someone without enough to eat or without decent housing. But the crucial difference lies in the closeness of the relationship. Whatever the severity of the impact of insufficient food or inadequate housing on a person's life, they have never been considered to bear the same direct and immediate relationship to constitutional concerns for free speech and for our political processes as education has long been recognized to bear. Perhaps, the best evidence of this fact is the unique status which has been accorded public education as the single public service nearly unanimously guaranteed in the constitutions of our States. Education, in terms of constitutional values, is much more analogous, in my judgment, to the right to vote in state elections than to public welfare or public housing. Indeed, it is not without significance that we have long recognized education as an essential step in providing the disadvantaged with the tools necessary to achieve economic self-sufficiency.

3 The Chief Justice argues [that] this heightened standard of review is inconsistent with [Rodriguez]. But in Rodriguez no group of children was singled out by the State and then penalized because of their parents' status. Rather, funding for education varied across the State because of the tradition of local control. Nor, in that case, was any group of children totally deprived of all education as in these cases.

1 The phrase "right to privacy" appears first to have gained currency from an article written by Messrs. Warren and (later Mr. Justice) Brandeis in 1890 which urged that States should give some form of tort relief to persons whose private affairs were exploited by others. The Right to Privacy, 4 Harv. L. Rev. 193. [Today] this Court, which I did not understand to have power to sit as a court of common law, now appears to be exalting a phrase which Warren and Brandeis used in discussing grounds for tort relief, to the level of a constitutional rule which prevents state legislatures from passing any law deemed by this Court to interfere with "privacy."

26 Amici cite statistics compiled by the Secretary which indicate that in 1965 the mean income of the family unit of a disabled worker was $3,803, while the medial income for the unit was $2,836. The mean liquid assets—i.e., cash, stocks, bonds—of these family units was $4,862; the median was $940. These statistics do not take into account the family unit's nonliquid assets—i.e., automobile, real estate, and the like.

2 "Justice Brennan [suggests] that the Commission's public announcement of its intention to condition the rebuilding of houses on the transfer of easements of access caused the Nollans to have 'no reasonable claim to any expectation of being able to exclude members of the public' from walking across their beach....But the right to build on one's own property—even though its exercise can be subjected to legitimate permitting requirements—cannot remotely be described as a 'government benefit.' [Nor] are the Nollans' rights altered because they acquired the land well after the Commission had begun to implement its policy. So long as the Commission could not have deprived the prior owners of the easement without compensating them, the prior owners must be understood to have transferred their full property rights in conveying the lot." [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

of property in that case was a condition on receipt of a ‘government benefit,’ while here regulation takes the form of a restriction on ‘the right to build on one’s own property.’ This proffered distinction is not persuasive. Both Monsanto and the Nollans hold property whose use is subject to regulation; Monsanto may not sell its property without obtaining government approval and the Nollans may not build a new development on their property without government approval. Obtaining such approval is as much a ‘government benefit’ for the Nollans as it is for Monsanto. If the Court is somehow suggesting that ‘the right to build on one’s own property’ has some privileged natural rights status, the argument is a curious one. By any traditional labor theory of value justification for property rights, for instance, see, e.g., J. Locke, The Second Treatise of Civil Government, Monsanto would have a superior claim, for the chemical formulae which constitute its property only came into being by virtue of Monsanto’s efforts.” [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

7 Regrettably, the rhetorical force of our “deprivation of all economically feasible use” rule is greater than its precision, since the rule does not make clear the “property interest” against which the loss of value is to be measured. When, for example, a regulation requires a developer to leave 90% of a rural tract in its natural state, it is unclear whether we would analyze the situation as one in which the owner has been deprived of all economically beneficial use of the burdened portion if the tract, or as one in which the owner has suffered a mere diminution in value of the tract as a whole. [Unsurprisingly,] this uncertainty regarding the composition of the denominator in our “deprivation” fraction has produced inconsistent pronouncements by the Court. The answer to this difficult question may lie in how the owner’s reasonably expectations have been shaped by the State’s law of property—i.e., whether and to what degree the State’s law has accorded legal recognition and protection to the particular interest in land with respect to which the takings claimant alleges a diminution in (or elimination of) value. In any event, we avoid this difficulty in the present case, since the “interest in land” that Lucas has pleaded (a fee simple interest) is an estate with a rich tradition of protection at common law, and since the South Carolina Court of Common Pleas found that the Beachfront Management Act left each of Lucas’s beachfront lots without economic value. [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

8 Justice Stevens criticizes the “deprivation of all economically beneficial use” rule as “wholly arbitrary,” in that “[the] landowner whose property is diminished in value 95% recovers nothing,” while the landowner who suffers a complete elimination of value “recovers the land’s full value.” This analysis errs in its assumption that the landowner whose deprivation is one step short of complete is not entitled to compensation. Such an owner might not be able to claim the benefit of our categorical formulation, but, as we have acknowledged time and again, “the economic impact of the regulation on the claimant and...the extent to which the regulation has interfered with distinct investment-backed expectations” are keenly relevant to takings analysis generally. Penn Central Transportation Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104, 124 (1978)....

Freedom of Expression

A. INTRODUCTION

The first amendment provides that “Congress shall make no law [abridging] the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.” Consider Justice Black’s position: “The phrase ‘Congress shall make no law’ is composed of plain words, easily understood. [The] language [is] absolute. [Of] course the decision to provide a constitutional safeguard for [free speech] involves a balancing of conflicting interests. [But] the Framers themselves did this balancing when they wrote the [Constitution]. Courts have neither the right nor the power [to] make a different [evaluation].” Black, The Bill of Rights, 35 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 865, 874, 879 (1960).

The Court has never accepted Black’s view. Rather, it has consistently held that “abridging” and “the freedom of speech” require interpretation, and that restraints on free expression may be “permitted for appropriate reasons.” Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347, 360 (1976). This section examines two sources that might aid interpretation: the history and philosophy underlying the first amendment.

Note: The History of Free Expression

1. The English background. The notion that government “shall make no law [abridging] the freedom of speech, or of the press” received only gradual acceptance in Anglo-American law. Indeed, throughout much of English history the crown and Parliament attempted vigorously to suppress opinions deemed pernicious. Three forms of restraint were most commonly employed: the licensing of the press; the doctrine of constructive treason; and the law of seditious libel.

a. Licensing. The invention of printing greatly magnified the danger posed by “undesirable” opinions, and shortly after the first book was printed in England in 1476, the crown claimed an authority to control printing presses as a right of prerogative. The manuscript of any work intended for publication had to be submitted to crown officials empowered to censor objectionable passages and to approve or deny a license for the printing of the work. Anything published without an imprimatur was criminal. This system of “prior restraint” remained in effect until 1694, when the authorizing legislation expired and was not renewed. The decision not to renew licensing resulted not from any commitment to free expression but rather from considerations of expediency, for licensing had proved ineffective, difficult to enforce, and conducive to bribery. See generally L. Levy, Emergence of a Free Press ch. 1 (1985); F. Siebert, Freedom of the Press in England, 1476–1776 chs. 2–3, 6–12 (1952).

b. Constructive treason. The law of treason in England derived from the statute 25 Edward III (1352), which defined the crime as (1) compassing or imagining the king’s death, (2) levying war against the king, or (3) adhering to his enemies. During the latter part of the seventeenth century, the English judges ruled that mere written or printed matter, as well as overt acts, could constitute treason. John Twyn was the first printer to suffer under this extension of the law of treason. Government officers searched Twyn’s home and seized the proofs of a book suggesting that the king was accountable to the people, and that the people were entitled to self-governance. Twyn was convicted of constructive treason, hanged, drawn, and quartered.

Although constructive treason was invoked in only a few cases, the doctrine posed a serious threat to freedom of expression, for the few instances in which conviction and execution occurred served to remind potential publishers of the fate that awaited those who violated the law. The doctrine was abandoned after 1720 because juries were often reluctant to convict, the death penalty was in many cases considered too drastic, and the procedure was too detailed. See generally Siebert, supra, at 265–269.

c. Seditious libel. The doctrine of seditious libel first entered Anglo-American jurisprudence in a 1275 statute outlawing “any false news or tales whereby discord or occasion of discord or slander may grow between the king and his people.” Violations were punished by the king’s council sitting in the “starred chamber.” The point of departure for the modern law of seditious libel was Sir Edward Coke’s report of a Star Chamber case of 1606, which stated three central propositions: (1) A libel against a private person may be punished criminally because it may provoke revenge and thus cause a breach of the peace; (2) A libel against a government official is an even greater offense, “for it concerns not only the breach of the peace, but also the scandal of government.”

(3) Although the essence of the crime as fixed by the statute of 1275 was the falsity of the libel, even a true libel may be criminally punished.

The theory underlying seditious libel was explained by Chief Justice Holt in 1704: “If people should not be called to account for possessing the people with an ill opinion of the government, no government can subsist. For it is very necessary for all governments that the people should have a good opinion of it.”

Rex v. Tutchin, 14 Howell’s State Trials 1095, 1128 (1704). Thus, a true libel is especially dangerous, for unlike a false libel, the dangers of truthful criticism cannot be defused by disproof. It was thus an oft-quoted maxim after 1606 that “the greater the truth the greater the libel.”

In practice, then, seventeenth-century judges punished as seditious libel any “written censure upon any public man whatever for any conduct whatever, or upon any law or institution whatever.” 2 J. Stephen, A History of the Criminal Law of England 350 (1883). As one commentator has observed, “no single method of restricting the press was as effective as the law of seditious libel as it was developed and applied by the common-law courts in the latter part of the seventeenth century.” Siebert, supra, at 269. For general discussion, see Hamburger, The Development of the Law of Seditious Libel and the Control of the Press, 37 Stan. L. Rev. 661 (1985).

In 1769, Blackstone summarized the law as follows:

The liberty of the press [consists] in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. [To] subject the press to the restrictive power of a licenser [is] to subject all freedom of sentiment to the prejudices of one man, and make him the arbitrary and infallible judge of all controverted points in learning, religion, and government. But to punish (as the law does at present) any dangerous or offensive writings, which, when published, shall on a fair and impartial trial be adjudged of a pernicious tendency, is necessary for the preservation of peace and good order, of government and religion, the only solid foundations of civil liberty.

4 W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England *151–152.

2. The colonial background. The image of colonial America as a society in which freedom of expression was cherished seems largely inaccurate. Although colonial America was the scene of extraordinary diversity of opinion on religion, politics, social structure, and other subjects, each community “tended to be a tight little island clutching its own respective orthodoxy and [eager] to banish or extralegally punish unwelcome dissidents.” Levy, supra, at 16.

Formal legal restraints on expression, however, were relatively rare. Licensing expired in 1725, and although there were hundreds of trials for seditious libel in England during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, there were not more than half a dozen such cases in colonial America. The most famous of these trials involved the prosecution of John Peter Zenger in New York in 1735. Zenger, publisher of the New York Weekly Journal, was charged with seditious libel by the Governor General of New York, whom he had criticized. Zenger argued unsuccessfully to the judge that the truth of the libel should be an absolute defense. The jury, responding to the popularity of Zenger's cause, disregarded the judge's instructions and returned a verdict of not guilty.

Although common law prosecutions for seditious libel were rare, the popularly elected colonial assemblies, imitating Parliament, assumed and vigorously exercised the power to punish "seditious" expression. Any criticism of an assembly or its members was likely to be regarded as a seditious scandal against the government punishable as a "breach of privilege." Levy, supra, at 14. To cite just one example, James Franklin, the older brother of Ben, ran a brief notice in his New England Courant that the government was preparing a ship to pursue coastal pirates "sometime this month, wind and weather permitting." The insinuation that the government was not dealing effectively with the pirates angered Massachusetts's popularly elected assembly. Franklin was arrested, and after a pro forma hearing, the assembly resolved that he had committed "a High affront to this Government." Franklin was imprisoned for the remainder of the session. For a lively account of the founding generation's understanding of freedom of speech and of the press, see S. Solomon, Revolutionary Dissent (2016).

3. The first amendment. Scholars have long puzzled over the actual intentions of the framers of the first amendment. The primary dispute is over whether the framers intended to adopt the Blackstonian view—that freedom of speech consists entirely in the freedom from prior restraints—or whether they intended some broader meaning. Consider the following views.

a. Z. Chafee, Free Speech in the United States 18–20 (1941):

If we [consider] what mischief in the existing law the [framers] wished to [remedy], we can be sure that it was not [licensing]. This had expired in England in 1695, and in the colonies by 1725. [There] was no need to go to all the trouble of pushing through a constitutional amendment just to settle an issue that had been dead for decades. What the framers did have plenty of reason to fear was an entirely different danger to political writers and speakers. For years the government here and in England had substituted for [licensing] rigorous and repeated prosecutions for seditious libel [and] for years these prosecutions were opposed by liberal opinion and popular agitation. [Two] different views of the relation of rulers and people were in conflict. According to one view, the rulers were the superiors of the people, and therefore must not be subjected to any censure that would tend to diminish their authority. [According] to the other view, the rulers were agents and servants of the people, who might therefore find fault with their servants and discuss questions of their punishment or dismissal, and of governmental policy. [In] the United States the people and not the government possess the absolute sovereignty, and [government is thus not free to punish seditious libel. Indeed, one] “of the objects of the Revolution was to get rid of the English common law on liberty of speech and of the press.”

b. Levy, supra, at xii–xv:

[The proposition has been conventionally accepted] that it was the intent of the American Revolution or the Framers of the First Amendment to abolish the common law of seditious libel. [The] evidence suggests that the proposition is supposititious and unprovable. [We] may even have to confront the possibility that the intentions of the Framers were not the most [libertarian]. But this should be expected because the Framers were nurtured on the crabbed historicism of Coke and the narrow conservatism of Blackstone, as well as Zenger’s case. The ways of thought of a lifetime are not easily broken. The Declaration of Independence severed the political connection with England but the American states continued the English common-law system except as explicitly rejected by statute. If the Revolution produced any radical libertarians on the meaning of freedom of speech and press, they were not present at the Constitutional Convention or the First Congress, which drafted the Bill of Rights. Scholars and judges have betrayed a penchant for what John P. Roche called “retrospective symmetry,” by giving to present convictions a patriotic lineage and tradition—in this case, the fatherhood of the “Framers.”

For critical analyses of this view, see D. Rabban, Free Speech in Its Forgotten Years (1997); Rabban, An Ahistorical Historian: Leonard Levy on Freedom of Expression in Early American History, 37 Stan. L. Rev. 795 (1985); Mayton, From a Legacy of Suppression to the “Metaphor of the Fourth Estate,” 39 Stan. L. Rev. 139 (1986).

The framers themselves were unsure what a constitutional guarantee of “freedom of the speech or of the press” would mean. Benjamin Franklin observed, for example, that “Few of us, I believe, have distinct ideas of its nature and extent,” and Alexander Hamilton asked “Who can give it any definition which would not leave the utmost latitude for evasion?” See Meyerson, The Neglected History of the Prior Restraint Doctrine, 34 Ind. L. Rev. 295, 320 (2001).

4. The relevance of history. To what extent, if any, is the preceding history relevant to interpretation of the first amendment? Is the English common law important because it was what the framers rejected or because it was what they accepted? Is it plausible that states that themselves punished seditious libel intended to prohibit Congress from punishing it? And given the enormous changes in the media and politics since the adoption of the first amendment, to what extent, if any, should the intent of the framers control the contemporary resolution of first amendment issues?

5. The Sedition Act of 1798. The first serious challenge to freedom of expression in the United States came with the Sedition Act of 1798. Act of July 14, 1798, 1 Stat. 596. The United States was on the verge of war with France, and many of the ideas generated by the French Revolution aroused fear and hostility in segments of the U.S. population. A bitter political and philosophical debate raged between the Federalists, then in power, and the Republicans.

Against this backdrop, the Federalists enacted the Sedition Act of 1798. The act prohibited the publication of false, scandalous, and malicious [writings] against the government of the United States, or either house of the Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States, with intent to defame [them]; or to bring them [into] contempt or disrepute; or to excite against them [the] hatred of the good people of the United States....

The act provided further that truth would be a defense and that malicious intent was an element of the crime. Thus, as the Federalists emphasized, the act eliminated those aspects of the English common law that had been the focus of attack during the eighteenth century. See Levy, supra, at xi.

The Sedition Act was vigorously enforced, but only against members or supporters of the Republican Party. Prosecutions were brought against the four leading Republican newspapers. The cases, often tried before openly hostile Federalist judges, resulted in ten convictions and no acquittals. Moreover, in the hands of these judges, the procedural reforms of the act proved largely illusory.

Consider, for example, the plight of Matthew Lyon, a Republican congressman from Vermont. During his reelection campaign, Lyon published an article in which he attacked the Adams administration, asserting that under President Adams “every consideration of the public welfare [was] swallowed up in a continual grasp for power, in an unbounded thirst for ridiculous pomp, foolish adulation, and selfish avarice.” At Lyon’s trial, the judge instructed the jury to find malicious intent unless the statement “could have been uttered with any other intent than that of making odious or contemptible the President and the government, and bringing them both into disrepute.” Although Lyon was technically free to prove the “truth” of his statement in his defense, this was hardly possible, given the nature of the statement. Lyon was convicted and sentenced to a fine of $1,000 and four months in prison. The Federalist press rejoiced, but Lyon became an instant martyr and was reelected while in jail. See Trial of Matthew Lyon, in F. Wharton, State Trials 333 (1849).

The Supreme Court did not rule on the constitutionality of the Sedition Act, but it was upheld without dissent by the lower federal courts and by three Supreme Court justices sitting on circuit. The act expired of its own force on March 3, 1801. President Jefferson thereafter pardoned all those who had been convicted under the act, and Congress eventually repaid most of the fines. It is generally agreed that the act was a factor in the defeat of the Federalists in the election of 1800. Significant cases under the Sedition Act are printed in Wharton, supra. The story of the enforcement of the act is told in G. Stone, Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime 15–78 (2004). What is the significance of the fact that the Sedition Act was approved by many of the same people who had earlier approved the first amendment?

6. From the Sedition Act of 1798 to the Espionage Act of 1917. The Supreme Court did not directly consider the first amendment’s guarantee of free expression until Congress enacted the Espionage Act of 1917 at the outset of World War I. See section B1 infra. This is not to say, however, that controversies over free speech did not arise in the years between the Sedition Act of 1798 and the Espionage Act of 1917. See G. Stone, supra, 79–134 (free speech during the Civil War); M. Curtis, Free Speech: The People’s Darling Privilege (2000) (abolitionist speech and free speech during the Civil War); D. Rabban, Free Speech in Its Forgotten Years (1997) (free speech between 1870 and 1920).

Note: The Philosophy of Free Expression

“Intuition at first may suggest that an individual ought to have more freedom to speak than he has liberty in other areas. There would seem to be some truth in the adage, ‘sticks and stones can break my bones, but words will never hurt me.’

Yet speech often hurts. It can offend, injure reputation, fan prejudice or passion, and ignite the world. Moreover, a great deal of other conduct that the state regulates has less harmful potential.” Wellington, On Freedom of Expression, 88 Yale L.J. 1105, 1106–1107 (1979). Why, then, should expression have greater immunity from government regulation than most other forms of human conduct? Why should society prohibit the making of any law “abridging the freedom of speech”?

1. Search for truth: the “marketplace of ideas.” The search for truth rationale for the protection of free expression rests on the premise that “when men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market, and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out.” Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616, 630 (1919) (Holmes, J., dissenting).

The search for truth rationale was first fully enunciated by John Stuart Mill in On Liberty (1859):

[The] peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is, that it is robbing the human race; posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion, still more than those who hold it....First: the opinion which it is attempted to suppress [may] be true. Those who desire to suppress it [are] not infallible. They have no authority to decide the question for all mankind, and exclude every other person from the means of judging. [Of course, it is not the case] that truth always triumphs over persecution. [But the] real advantage which truth has [is] that when an opinion is true, it may be extinguished once, twice, or many times, but in the course of ages there will generally be found persons to rediscover it, until [eventually] it has made such head as to withstand all subsequent attempts to suppress it....

[Second: the received opinion may be true.] But however true an opinion may be, if it is not fully, frequently, and fearlessly discussed, it will be held as a dead dogma, not a living truth. [He] who knows only his own side of the case, knows little of that. [Even if] the received opinion [is] true, a conflict with the opposite error is essential to a clear apprehension and deep feeling of its truth....

[Finally:] the conflicting doctrines, instead of being one true and the other false, [may] share the truth between them; and the nonconforming opinion [may be] needed to supply the remainder of the truth, of which the received doctrine embodies only a part. [Every] opinion which embodies somewhat of the portion of truth which the common opinion omits, ought to be considered precious.

Consider the following observations.

a. Baker, Scope of the First Amendment Freedom of Speech, 25 UCLA L. Rev. 964, 974–978 (1978):

[The] hope that the marketplace leads to truth, or even to the best or most desirable decision, [is] implausible. [First, experience as well as discussion contributes to understanding. Thus,] restrictions on experience-generating conduct are as likely as restrictions on [debate] to stunt the progressive development of understanding, [but the marketplace theory gives no] constitutional protection [to] experience-producing conduct. [Second, the marketplace theory assumes] that people [use] their rational capacities to eliminate distortion caused by the form and frequency of message presentation. [This] assumption cannot be accepted. Emotional or “irrational” appeals have great [impact]. [Finally, in practice,] the marketplace of ideas appears improperly biased in favor of presently dominant groups.

b. Greenawalt, Free Speech Justifications, 89 Colum. L. Rev. 119, 135–136 (1989):

The critical question is not how well truth will advance absolutely in conditions of freedom, but how well it will advance in conditions of freedom as compared with some alternative set of conditions. Suppose one were highly pessimistic about the capacity of people to ascertain important kinds of truths, but believed that governments that suppress ideas almost always manage to promote [falsehoods]. One might then support freedom of speech as less damaging to truth than an alternative social practice. One’s overall judgment on this subject must depend on a delicate judgment about people’s responses to claimed truth, about the effects of inequality of private power over what is communicated, and about the soundness of government determinations about valid ideas.

c. Wellington, supra, at 1130–1132:

In the long run, true ideas do tend to drive out false ones. The problem is that the short run may be very long, that one short run follows hard upon another, and that we may become overwhelmed by the inexhaustible supply of freshly minted, often very seductive, false ideas. [Moreover,] most of us do believe that the book is closed on some issues. Genocide is an example. [Truth] may win, and in the long run it may almost always win, but millions of Jews were deliberately and systematically murdered in a very short period of time. [Before] those murders occurred, many individuals must have come “to have false beliefs.”

2. Self-governance. The self-governance rationale is most closely identified with the work of Alexander Meiklejohn:

[The] Constitution [ordains] that all authority [to] determine common action, belongs to “We, the People.” [Under this system, free men are governed] by themselves. [What,] then, does the First Amendment forbid? [The] town meeting suggests an answer. That meeting is called to discuss [and] to decide matters of public policy. [The] voters, therefore, must be made as wise as possible. [And] this, in turn, requires that so far as time allows, all facts and interests relevant to the problem shall be fully and fairly presented....

The First Amendment, then, is not the guardian of unregulated talkativeness. It does not require that, on every occasion, every citizen shall take part in public debate. [Rather,] the vital point [is] that no suggestion of policy shall be denied a hearing because it is on one side of the issue rather than another. [Citizens] may not be barred [from speaking] because their views are thought to be false or dangerous. [The] reason for this equality of status in the field of ideas lies deep in the very foundation of the self-governing process. When men govern themselves, it is they—and no one else—who must pass judgment upon unwisdom and unfairness and danger. [Just] so far as, at any point, the citizens who are to decide an issue are denied acquaintance with information or opinion [which] is relevant to that issue, just so far the result must be ill-considered. [It] is that mutilation of the thinking process of the community against which the First Amendment [is] directed. The principle of the freedom of speech [is] not a Law of Nature or of Reason in the abstract. It is a deduction from the basic American agreement that public issues shall be decided by universal suffrage.

A. Meiklejohn, Free Speech and Its Relation to Self-Government 15–16, 24–27, 39 (1948).

Consider the following observations.

a. Chafee, Book Review, 62 Harv. L. Rev. 891, 899–900 (1949):

The most serious weakness in Mr. Meiklejohn’s argument is that it rests on his supposed boundary between public speech and private speech. That line is extremely blurred. [The] truth is that there are public aspects to practically every subject. [Moreover, if Mr. Meiklejohn's public speech excludes scholarship,] art and literature, it is shocking to deprive these vital matters of the protection of [the] First Amendment. [Valuable] as self-government is, it is in itself only a small part of our lives. That a philosopher should subordinate all other activities to it is indeed surprising.

b. Meiklejohn's response:

The First Amendment [protects] the freedom of those activities of thought and communication by which we "govern." [But] voting is merely the external expression of a wide and diverse number of activities by means of which citizens attempt to meet the responsibilities of making judgments, which that freedom to govern lays upon them. [Self-government] can exist only insofar as the voters acquire the intelligence, integrity, sensitivity, and generous devotion to the general welfare that, in theory, casting a ballot is assumed to express. [Thus,] there are many forms of thought and expression within the range of human communications from which the voter derives the [necessary] knowledge, intelligence, [and] sensitivity to human values. [These], too, must suffer no abridgment of their freedom. [These include:] 1. Education, in all its phases. [2.] The achievements of philosophy and the sciences. [3.] Literature and the arts. [4.] Public discussions of public issues.

Meiklejohn, The First Amendment Is an Absolute, 1961 Sup. Ct. Rev. 245, 255–257.

c. Bork, Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems, 47 Ind. L.J. 1, 26–28 (1971):

Professor Alexander Meiklejohn seems correct when he says: "The First Amendment [protects] the freedom of those activities of thought and communication by which we 'govern.'" [But Meiklejohn goes] further and would extend the protection of the first amendment beyond speech that is explicitly political. [I disagree.] [There is, of course,] an analogy between criticism of official behavior and the publication of a novel like Ulysses, for the latter may form attitudes that ultimately affect politics. But it is an analogy, not an identity. Other human activities and experiences also form personality, teach and create attitudes just as much as does the novel, but no one would on that account [suggest] that the first amendment strikes down regulations of economic activity, control of entry into trade, laws about sexual behavior, marriage and the like. Yet these activities, in their capacity to create attitudes that ultimately impinge upon the political process, are more like literature and science than literature and science are like political speech. If the dialectical progression is not to become an analogical stampede, the protection of the first amendment must be cut off when it reaches the outer limits of political speech. [The] notion that all valuable types of speech must be protected by the first amendment confuses the constitutionality of laws with their wisdom. Freedom of nonpolitical speech rests, as does freedom for other valuable forms of behavior, upon the enlightenment of society and its elected representatives.

d. Sunstein, Free Speech Now, 59 U. Chi. L. Rev. 255, 301, 304–306 (1992):

[The] First Amendment is principally about political deliberation. [We should] treat speech as political when it is both intended and received as a contribution to public deliberation about some issue. [An] approach that affords special protection to political speech, thus defined, is justified on numerous grounds. [It] receives firm support from history—not only from the Framers' theory of free expression, but also from the development of that principle through the history of American law. [In] addition, an insistence that government's burden is greatest when political speech is at issue responds well to the fact that here government is most likely to be biased. [Finally], this approach protects speech when regulation is most likely to be harmful. Restrictions on political speech have the distinctive feature of impairing the ordinary channels for political [change]. If there are controls on commercial advertising [or artistic and scientific expression], it always remains possible to argue that such controls should be lifted. [But] if the government forecloses political argument, the democratic corrective is unavailable. [Taken] in concert, these considerations suggest that government should be under a special burden of justification when it seeks to control speech intended and received as a contribution to public deliberation.

Rev. 477, 482-483, 486 (2011); Volokh, The Trouble with “Public Discourse” as a Limitation on Free Speech Rights, 97 Va. L. Rev. 567 (2011); M. Redish, The Adversary First Amendment 1–5 (2013).

3. Self-fulfillment. Consider the following views:

a. Richards, Free Speech and Obscenity Law: Toward a Moral Theory of the First Amendment, 123 U. Pa. L. Rev. 45, 62 (1974):

[People] are not to be constrained to communicate or not to communicate, to believe or not to believe, to associate or not to associate. The value placed on this cluster of ideas derives from the notion of self-respect that comes from a mature person's full and untrammeled exercise of capacities central to human rationality. Thus, the significance of free expression rests on the central human capacity to create and express symbolic systems, such as speech, writing, pictures, and [music]. Freedom of expression permits and encourages the exercise of these [capacities]. In so doing, it nurtures and sustains the self-respect of the mature person. [The] value of free expression, in this view, rests on its deep relation to self-respect arising from autonomous self-determination without which the life of the spirit is meager and slavish.

b. Bork, supra, at 25:

[The self-fulfillment/autonomy rationale does] not distinguish speech from any other human activity. An individual may develop his faculties or derive pleasure from trading on the stock market, [working] as a barmaid, engaging in sexual activity, [or] in any of thousands of other endeavors. Speech [can] be preferred to other activities [on the basis of this rationale] only by ranking forms of personal gratification. [One] cannot, on neutral grounds, choose to protect speech [on this basis] more than [one] protects any other claimed freedom.

4. Other rationales. Although courts and commentators have focused primarily on the search for truth, self-governance, and self-fulfillment/autonomy rationales for the protection of free expression, three further rationales merit note.

a. The checking value. Consider Blasi, The Checking Value in First Amendment Theory, 1977 Am. B. Found. Res. J. 521, 527–542:

[Another rationale for the protection of free expression] is the value that free speech [can] serve in checking the abuse of power by public officials. [The] central premise of the checking value is that the abuse of official power is an especially serious evil [because of government's unique] capacity to employ legitimized violence. [The] government's monopoly of legitimized violence means [that the] check on government must come from the power of public opinion. [Thus,] the checking value grows out of democratic theory, but it is the democratic theory of John Locke [and] not that of Alexander Meiklejohn. Under [this] view of democracy, the role of the ordinary citizen is not so much to contribute on a continuing basis to the formation of public policy as to retain a veto power to be employed when the decisions of officials pass certain bounds.

b. Free speech and the development of character. Consider Blasi, Free Speech and Good Character: From Milton to Brandeis to the Present, in L. Bollinger and G. Stone, Eternal Vigilance: Free Speech in the Modern Era 61, 62, 84–85 (2002):

[A] culture that prizes and protects expressive liberty nurtures in its members certain character traits such as inquisitiveness, distrust of authority, willingness to take initiative, and the courage to confront evil. Such character traits are valuable [for] their instrumental contribution to the collective well-being, social as well as political. [The] most important [consequence] of protecting free speech is the intellectual and moral pluralism, and thus disorder in a sense, thereby engendered. In matters of belief, conventional structures of authority are weakened, rebellion is facilitated, closure is impaired. Persons who live in a free-speech regime are forced to cope with persistent, and frequently intractable, differences of understanding. For most of us that is a painful challenge....Being made to take account of such differences shapes our character.

(c) Free speech and cultural democracy. Consider Balkin, Cultural Democracy and the First Amendment, 110 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1053 (2016):

Freedom of speech does more than protect democracy; it also promotes a democratic culture. [Although] the right to participate in culture [helps] to legitimate political self-governance, it transcends that purpose. Cultural democracy, and therefore cultural freedom, is a necessary component of a free society, even in countries that are not fully democratic or democratic at all. Moreover, a cultural theory of free speech offers a much more convincing explanation of why a great deal of expression that seems to have little to do with political self-government enjoys full First Amendment protection.

[By] the end of the twentieth century, the political economy of communication had changed radically. In the age of the Internet, many of the assumptions that grounded Meiklejohn's model have fallen away. Vastly more people can communicate to others: not merely to small groups, but to the general public; and not merely within the United States, but around the globe. [A] theory of free expression for the digital age [has] to make sense of—and value—the explosion of popular appropriation, combination, and creativity in popular discussion, art, and culture. Culture, which had often taken a backseat to politics in twentieth-century discussions of the foundations of the First Amendment, came to the forefront in the early twenty-first century. [By] protecting the right to participate in culture, freedom of speech also promotes the growth and spread of mores, opinions, values, art, and knowledge.

5. Philosophy and the first amendment. To what extent, if any, are these rationales for the protection of free expression relevant to interpretation of the first amendment? Consider Bloustein, The Origin, Validity, and Interrelationships of the Political Values Served by Freedom of Expression, 33 Rutgers L. Rev. 372, 381 (1981): “[There] is no evidence [that these rationales were] discussed or debated during the period of the drafting and adoption of the [first] amendment [and we may thus conclude] that whatever validity and authority they may have do not derive directly from the intentions of the drafters.” Whence, then, do the validity and authority of these rationales derive?

To what extent do these rationales, if relevant to interpretation of the first amendment, provide a coherent and workable basis for the decision of actual cases? Note that in some instances it may be necessary to choose among the competing rationales. For example, the self-fulfillment/autonomy rationale does not support a distinction between political and nonpolitical expression, whereas the self-governance theory seems to compel that distinction. Despite such potential conflicts, most commentators agree that any “adequate conception of freedom of speech must [draw] upon several strands of theory in order to protect a rich variety of expressional modes.” L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 789 (2d ed. 1988). As one commentator has observed, in the “democratic state,” which “is founded on a tradition of free inquiry,” the “attainment of knowledge,” the “consensual participation in government,” and the “dignity of self-expression” are “so interdependent that they really represent three aspects [of] a single value; their relationships define a kind of culture, embracing the individual, the state, and the system of knowledge, art and other such values that we call liberal.” Bloustein, supra, at 395.

In light of all this, how would you address the question whether Jackson Pollock’s paintings, Arnold Schoenberg’s music, and Lewis Carroll’s poem Jabberwocky are within the “freedom of speech” protected by the First Amendment? The Supreme Court has declared that all of these forms of expression are “unquestionably shielded” by the First Amendment. Does it make sense to conclude that “nonrepresentational art, instrumental music, and nonsense” are protected by the freedom of speech, “even though none involves what we typically think of as speech—the use of words to convey meaning”? M. Tushnet, A. Chen, and J. Blocher, Free Speech Beyond Words 1 (2017). See Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc., 515

U.S. 557, 568-69 (1969) infra section VII-E-5.

Note: Organization

The remaining sections in this chapter explore the Supreme Court's interpretation of the first amendment's guarantee of free speech, press, assembly, and petition. These sections are structured in accord with two distinctions that have played a central role in the Court's analysis. First, there is the distinction between content-based and content-neutral restrictions. Content-based restrictions restrict communication because of the message conveyed. Laws prohibiting the publication of "confidential" information, forbidding the hiring of teachers who advocate the violent overthrow of government, or banning the display of the swastika in certain neighborhoods illustrate this type of restriction. Content-neutral restrictions, on the other hand, restrict communication without regard to the message conveyed. Laws prohibiting noisy speeches near a hospital, banning the erection of billboards in residential communities, or requiring the disclosure of the names of all leafleteers are examples. The Court has generally employed different standards to test the constitutionality of these two types of restrictions.

Second, there is the distinction within the realm of content-based restrictions between "high"- and "low"-value expression. The Court has long adhered to the view that there are certain categories of expression that do not appreciably further the values underlying the first amendment. Examples are obscenity, commercial advertising, and false statements of fact. The Court has traditionally held that such categories of expression are either unprotected or only marginally protected by the first amendment.

In line with these distinctions, sections B and C focus primarily on government efforts to suppress "high" value speech; section D explores "low"-value expression; section E examines content-neutral restrictions and the issue of content-neutrality; and section F explores the "freedom of the press." The point of this structure is not to insulate these distinctions from challenge. It is rather to illuminate the Court's jurisprudence while at the same time facilitating critical scrutiny of the Court's analysis.

B. CONTENT-BASED RESTRICTIONS: DANGEROUS IDEAS AND INFORMATION

In what circumstances, if any, may government, consonant with the first amendment, restrict speech because the expression of particular ideas or items of information might cause some harm to government, to private individuals, or to society in general? In addressing this question, this section examines four separate, but related, problems: speech that may induce hearers or listeners to engage in unlawful conduct; speech that “threatens” harm to others; speech that provokes a hostile audience response; and speech that discloses confidential information. In its effort to deal with these problems, the Court has struggled to identify the relevant considerations. The task is not easy. How serious must the harm be before speech may be suppressed? How likely must the harm be? How imminent must it be? Should it matter whether the speaker intended to cause the harm? Can these and other considerations be integrated into a single, coherent standard?

1. Speech That “Causes” Unlawful Conduct

The question whether government may constitutionally restrict expression because it might persuade, incite, or otherwise “cause” readers or listeners to engage in unlawful conduct has long absorbed the Court’s attention. This was the first issue of first amendment interpretation to capture the Court’s sustained interest, and the debate within the Court over this question has produced some of the most powerful and most eloquent opinions in the Court’s history. That the question has played so central a role in the evolution of first amendment theory is not surprising, for it focuses on government efforts to restrict advocacy in many respects similar to the traditional concept of seditious libel and thus implicates values at the very core of the first amendment.

The Supreme Court first confronted this issue in a series of cases concerning agitation against the war and the draft during World War I. Such agitation was not uncommon:

[When] the U.S. first entered the war, [many] influential groups of people were apathetic if not actually hostile to fighting. [Organizations] which identified themselves as against the war, [such as the Socialist Party of America], made strong gains during 1917 [and] over three hundred thirty thousand draft evaders or delinquents were reported during the war. [Antiwar] sentiment did not pose a threat of revolution or violence, but it did pose a threat of spreading disaffection which could paralyze the war effort. [Attorney] General Thomas Gregory, referring to war opponents in November, 1917, stated, “May God have mercy on them, for they need expect none from an outraged people and an avenging government.”

R. Goldstein, Political Repression in Modern America 105–108 (1978).

Two months after our entry into the First World War, Congress enacted the Espionage Act of 1917. Although the act was directed primarily toward such matters as espionage and the protection of military secrets, the third section of title I of the act made it a crime when the nation is at war for any person (1) willfully to “make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere” with the military success of the United States or “to promote the success of its enemies”; (2) willfully to “cause or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty, in the military or naval forces of the United States”; or (3) willfully to “obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States.” Violations were punishable by fines of up to $10,000, prison sentences of up to twenty years, or both. Act of June 15, 1917, ch. 30, tit. I, §3, 40 Stat. 219.

Eleven months later, Congress enacted the Sedition Act of 1918. The 1918 act, which was repealed in 1921, made it criminal, among other things, for any person to say anything with intent to obstruct the sale of war bonds; to utter, print, write, or publish any disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive language intended to cause contempt or scorn for the form of government of the United States, the Constitution, or the flag; to urge the curtailment of production of war materials with the intent of hindering the war effort; or to utter any words supporting the cause of any country at war with the United States or opposing the cause of the United States. Act of May 16, 1918, ch. 75, §1, 40 Stat. 553.

During the war years, federal authorities initiated approximately two thousand prosecutions under these acts. Most of these prosecutions were brought under the 1917 statute. The opinions that follow represent three distinct analyses of the issue.

SHAFFER v. UNITED STATES, 255 F. 886 (9th Cir. 1919). Shaffer was convicted of violating the Espionage Act of 1917. The indictment alleged that Shaffer had mailed a book, The Finished Mystery, which contained several “treasonable, disloyal, and seditious utterances,” specifying the following passages in particular:

Standing opposite to these Satan has placed [a] certain delusion which is best described by the word patriotism, but which in reality is murder, the spirit of the very devil. [If] you say it is a war of defense against wanton and intolerable aggression, I must reply that [it] has yet to be proved that Germany has any intention or desire of attacking us. [The] war itself is wrong. Its prosecution will be a crime. There is not a question raised, an issue involved, a cause at stake, which is worth the life of one blue-jacket on the sea or one khaki-coat in the trenches.

The Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction: "It is true that disapproval of war and the advocacy of peace are not crimes under the Espionage Act; but the question here [is] whether the natural and probable tendency and effect of [the publication] are such as are calculated to produce the result condemned by the statute. [It cannot] be said, as a matter of law, that the reasonable and natural effect of [the] publication was not to obstruct [the] recruiting or enlistment service, and thus to injure the service of the United States. Printed matter may tend to obstruct [the] service, even if it contains no mention of recruiting or enlistment, and no reference to the military service of the United States. [The] service may be obstructed by attacking the justice of the cause for which the war is waged, and by undermining the spirit of loyalty which inspires men to enlist or to register for conscription in the service of their country. [To] teach that patriotism is murder and the spirit of the devil, and that the war against Germany was wrong and its prosecution a crime, is to weaken patriotism and the purpose to enlist or to render military service in the war....

"It is argued that the evidence fails to show that [Shaffer] committed the act willfully and intentionally. But there is enough in the evidence to show the hostile attitude of his mind against the prosecution of the war by the United States, and that the books were intentionally concealed on his premises. He must be presumed to have intended the natural and probable consequences of what he knowingly did."

Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten

244 F. 535 (S.D.N.Y. 1917)

[In July 1917, the postmaster of New York, acting on the direction of the Postmaster General, advised the plaintiff, a publishing company engaged in the production of a monthly revolutionary journal called The Masses, that the August issue of the journal would be denied access to the mails under the Espionage Act of 1917. The Masses regularly featured a remarkable collection of writers, poets, playwrights, and philosophers, including Max Eastman, John Reed, Vachel Lindsay, Emma Goldman, Carl Sandburg, Bertrand Russell, Louis Untermeyer, and Sherwood Anderson. Iconoclastic, impertinent, and confrontational, it was filled with sparkling social satire, intellectual commentary, and political criticism. Plaintiff applied for a preliminary injunction to forbid the postmaster to refuse to accept the August issue for mailing. While objecting generally that the whole purport of the issue was in violation of the law, on the ground that it tended to produce a violation of the law, to encourage the enemies of the United States, and to hamper the government in the conduct of the war, the postmaster specified four cartoons and four pieces of text as especially falling within the act.]

LEARNED HAND, DISTRICT JUDGE [after stating the facts as above]....

It must be remembered at the outset, and the distinction is of critical consequence throughout, that no question arises touching the war powers of Congress. It may be that Congress may forbid the mails to any matter which tends to discourage the successful prosecution of the war. It may be that the fundamental personal rights of the individual must stand in abeyance, even including the right of the freedom of the press, though that is not here in question....

[The postmaster's] position is that to arouse discontent and disaffection among the people with the prosecution of the war and with the draft tends to promote a mutinous and insubordinate temper among the troops. This [is] true; men who become satisfied that they are engaged in an enterprise dictated by the unconscionable selfishness of the rich, and effectuated by a tyrannous disregard for the will of those who must suffer and die, will be more prone to insubordination than those who have faith in the cause and acquiesce in the means. Yet to interpret the word "cause" so broadly would [involve] necessarily as a consequence the suppression of all hostile criticism, and of all opinion except what encouraged and supported the existing policies, or which fell within the range of temperate argument. It would contradict the normal assumption of democratic government that the suppression of hostile criticism does not turn upon the justice of its substance or the decency and propriety of its temper. Assuming that the power to repress such opinion may rest in Congress in the throes of a struggle for the very existence of the state, its exercise is so contrary to the use and wont of our people that only the clearest expression of such a power justifies the conclusion that it was intended.

The [postmaster's] position, therefore, in so far as it involves the suppression of the free utterance of abuse and criticism of the existing law, or of the policies of the war, is not, in my judgment, supported by the language of the statute. Yet there has always been a recognized limit to such expressions. [One] may not counsel or advise others to violate the law as it stands. Words are not only the keys of persuasion, but the triggers of action, and those which have no purport but to counsel the violation of law cannot by any latitude of interpretation be a part of that public opinion which is the final source of government in a democratic state. [To] counsel or advise a man to an act is to urge upon him either that it is his interest or his duty to do it. While, of course, this may be accomplished as well by indirection as expressly, since words carry the meaning that they impart, the definition is exhaustive, I think, and I shall use it. Political agitation, by the passions it arouses or the convictions it engenders, may in fact stimulate men to the violation of law. Detestation of existing policies is easily transformed into forcible resistance of the authority which puts them in execution, and it would be folly to disregard the causal relation between the two. Yet to assimilate agitation, legitimate as such, with direct incitement to violent resistance, is to disregard the tolerance of all methods of political agitation which in normal times is a safeguard of free government. The distinction is not a scholastic subterfuge, but a hard-bought acquisition in the fight for freedom, and the purpose to disregard it must be evident when the power exists. If one stops short of urging upon others that it is their duty or their interest to resist the law, it seems to me one should not be held to have attempted to cause its violation. If that be not the test, I can see no escape from the conclusion that under this section every political agitation which can be shown to be apt to create a seditious temper is illegal. I am confident that by such language Congress had no such revolutionary purpose in view.

It seems to me, however, quite plain that none of the language and none of the cartoons in this paper can be thought directly to counsel or advise insubordination or mutiny, without a violation of their meaning quite beyond any tolerable understanding. I come, therefore, to the third phrase of the section, which forbids any one from willfully obstructing the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States. I am not prepared to assent to the plaintiff's position that this only refers to acts other than words, nor that the act thus defined must be shown to have been successful. One may obstruct without preventing, and the mere obstruction is an injury to the service; for it throws impediments in its way. Here again, however, since the question is of the expression of opinion, I construe the sentence, so far as it restrains public utterance, as [limited] to the direct advocacy of resistance to the recruiting and enlistment service. If so, the inquiry is narrowed to the question whether any of the challenged matter may be said to advocate resistance to the draft, taking the meaning of the words with the utmost latitude which they can bear.

As to the cartoons it seems to me quite clear that they do not fall within such a test. Certainly the nearest is that entitled "Conscription," and the most that can be said of that is that it may breed such animosity to the draft as will promote resistance and strengthen the determination of those disposed to be recalcitrant. There is no intimation that, however hateful the draft may be, one is in duty bound to resist it, certainly none that such resistance is to one's interest. I cannot, therefore, [assent] to the assertion that any of the cartoons violate the act.

The text offers more embarrassment. The poem to Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, at most, goes no further than to say that they are martyrs in the cause of love among nations. Such a sentiment holds them up to admiration, and hence their conduct to possible emulation. The paragraph in which the editor offers to receive funds for their appeal also expresses admiration for them, but goes no further. The paragraphs upon conscientious objectors are of the same kind. They go no further than to express high admiration for those who have held and are holding out for their convictions even to the extent of resisting the law. [That] such comments have a tendency to arouse emulation in others is clear enough, but that they counsel others to follow these examples is not so plain. Literally at least they do not, and while, as I have said, the words are to be taken, not literally, but according to their full import, the literal meaning is the starting point for interpretation. One may admire and approve the course of a hero without feeling any duty to follow him. There is not the least implied intimation in these words that others are under a duty to follow. The most that can be said is that, if others do follow, they will get the same admiration and the same approval. Now, there is surely an appreciable distance between esteem and emulation; and unless there is here some advocacy of such emulation, I cannot see how the passages can be said to fall within the law. [The] question before me is quite the same as what would arise upon a motion to dismiss an indictment at the close of the proof: Could any reasonable man say, not that the indirect result of the language might be to arouse a seditious disposition, for that would not be enough, but that the language directly advocated resistance to the draft? I cannot think that upon such language any verdict would stand....

It follows that the plaintiff is entitled to the usual preliminary injunction.

Schenck v. United States

249 U.S. 47 (1919)

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the court....

[The defendants were convicted of conspiracy to violate section 3 of the Espionage Act of 1917 by circulating "to men who had been called and accepted for military service" a document "alleged to be calculated" to obstruct the recruiting and enlistment service.]

The document in question, upon its first printed side, recited the 1st section of the Thirteenth Amendment, said that the idea embodied in it was violated by the Conscription Act, and that a conscript is little better than a convict. In impassioned language it intimated that conscription was despotism in its worst form and a monstrous wrong against humanity, in the interest of Wall Street's chosen few. It said: "Do not submit to intimidation"; but in form at least confined itself to peaceful measures, such as a petition for the repeal of the act. The other and later printed side of the sheet was headed, "Assert Your Rights." It stated reasons for alleging that anyone violated the Constitution when he refused to recognize "your right to assert your opposition to the draft," and went on: "If you do not assert and support your rights, you are helping to deny or disparage rights which it is the solemn duty of all citizens and residents of the United States to retain." It described the arguments on the other side as coming from cunning politicians and a mercenary capitalist press, and even silent consent to the Conscription Law as helping to support an infamous conspiracy. It denied the power to send our citizens away to foreign shores to shoot up the people of other lands, and added that words could not express the condemnation such cold-blooded ruthlessness deserves, etc., etc., winding up, "You must do your share to maintain, support, and uphold the rights of the people of this country." Of course the document would not have been sent unless it had been intended to have some effect, and we do not see what effect it could be expected to have upon persons subject to the draft except to influence them to obstruct the carrying of it out. The defendants do not deny that the jury might find against them on this point.

But it is said, suppose that that was the tendency of this circular, it is protected by the First Amendment to the Constitution. Two of the strongest expressions are said to be quoted respectively from well-known public men. It well may be that the prohibition of laws abridging the freedom of speech is not confined to previous restraints, although to prevent them may have been the main purpose, as intimated in Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454, 462. We admit that in many places and in ordinary times the defendants, in saying all that was said in the circular, would have been within their constitutional rights. But the character of every act depends upon the circumstances in which it is done. The most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theater, and causing a panic. It does not even protect a man from an injunction against uttering words that may have all the effect of force. The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. It is a question of proximity and degree. When a nation is at war many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight, and that no Court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right. It seems to be admitted that if an actual obstruction of the recruiting service were proved, liability for words that produced that effect might be enforced. The Statute of 1917, in §4, punishes conspiracies to obstruct as well as actual obstruction. If the act, (speaking, or circulating a paper,) its tendency and the intent with which it is done, are the same, we perceive no ground for saying that success alone warrants making the act a crime. Goldman v. United States, 245 U.S. 474, 477. Indeed, that case might be said to dispose of the present contention if the precedent covers all media concludendi. But as the right to free speech was not referred to specially we have thought fit to add a few words....

Judgments affirmed.

Note: Shaffer, Masses, and Schenck

1. The facts of Masses. The following is one of the poems in the August 17 issues of The Masses magazine that led to the postmaster's action (Goldman and Berkman were in prison for obstructing the draft):

“A TRIBUTE”
JOSEPHINE BELL

...

Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman
Are in prison tonight,
But they have made themselves elemental forces,
Like the water that climbs down the rocks:
Like the wind in the leaves:
Like the gentle night that holds us:
They are working on our destinies:
They are forging the love of the nations:....
Tonight they lie in prison.

2. Bad tendency. Shaffer reflects the then-prevailing view of the lower federal courts—that speech could constitutionally be punished as an attempt to cause some forbidden or otherwise undesirable conduct if the natural and reasonable tendency of the expression might be to bring about the conduct, and if the speaker intended such a result. Under this view, intent could be inferred from the tendency of the speech itself, on the theory that one intends the natural and foreseeable consequences of one's acts. Through the twin doctrines of bad tendency and constructive intent, decisions like Shaffer routinely converted criticism of the war and the draft into criminal attempts to cause insubordination or obstruct recruiting. The relatively modest provisions of the 1917 act were thus converted into essentially open-ended restrictions on seditious expression. For detailed accounts of this era, see G. Stone, Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime 135–234 (2004); Z. Chafee, Free Speech in the United States 36–108 (1941); Rabban, The Emergence of Modern First Amendment Theory, 50 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1205 (1983).

3. Express incitement. Although Judge Hand technically limited himself in Masses to a mere interpretation of the Espionage Act, the opinion has clear constitutional overtones, and, as Hand himself made clear in private correspondence, Masses was “a distinctive, carefully considered alternative to the prevalent analyses of free speech issues.” Gunther, Learned Hand and the Origins of Modern First Amendment Doctrine: Some Fragments of History, 27 Stan. L. Rev. 719, 720 (1975). In effect, Hand attempted in Masses to articulate a categorical, per se rule that would be “hard, conventional, difficult to evade.” Id. at 749. Unlike the Shaffer and Schenck analyses, Judge Hand focused on the content of the speech rather than on the intent of the speaker or the consequences of the communication. Under Judge Hand’s formula, the dispositive factor was whether the speaker employed express words of incitement. As Judge Hand intimated in his opinion and made explicit in correspondence, if the effect of such speech “upon the hearers is only to counsel them to violate the law, it is unconditionally illegal.” Id. at 765. But if the speaker refrains from such incitement, the speech may not be restrained. Consider the following propositions.

a. Hand’s analysis of express incitement is underprotective of free speech. Judge Hand’s analysis accords little, if any, constitutional protection to express advocacy of criminal conduct. Is this defensible on the ground, urged by Judge Hand, that “words [which] have no purport but to counsel the violation of law cannot by any latitude of interpretation be a part of that public opinion which is the final source of government in a democratic state”? Consider Bork, Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems, 47 Ind. L. Rev. 1, 31 (1971):

Advocacy of law violation is a call to set aside the results that political speech has produced. The process of the “discovery and spread of political truth” is damaged or destroyed if the outcome is defeated by a minority that makes law enforcement, and hence the putting of political truth into practice, impossible or less effective. There should, therefore, be no constitutional protection for any speech advocating the violation of the law.

See also Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931) (“The maintenance of the opportunity for free political discussion to the end that government may be responsible to the will of the people and that changes may be obtained by lawful means is a fundamental principle of our constitutional system.”).

Even if express incitement is constitutionally “valueless,” might there nonetheless be practical or institutional reasons to protect it? Consider T. Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression 51–53 (1970):

Groups which [would] abolish democratic institutions [do] not operate in a political vacuum. They advance other ideas that may be valid [and] groups [expressing] the prohibited views usually represent real grievances, which should be heard. [Moreover, suppression] of any group in a society destroys the atmosphere of freedom essential to the life and progress of a healthy community.

Should the rhetorical or hyperbolic use of express incitement (“Kill the umpire!”) be constitutionally protected?

b. The Hand formula is overprotective of the “clever” inciter. Judge Hand’s theory distinguishes between the speaker who uses express words of incitement and the speaker who specifically intends to incite but is clever enough to avoid the use of such language. Is this sensible? Consider the following arguments: (1) The express inciter is more dangerous because he is more likely to be effective. (2) Case-by-case inquiries into actual subjective intent are too slippery to provide adequate protection to innocent speakers. As Zechariah Chafee observed, “It is only in times of popular panic and indignation that freedom of speech becomes important as an institution, and it is precisely in those times that the protection of the jury proves [illusory]. ‘Men believed during [the period of the Espionage Act prosecutions] that the only verdict in a war case, which could show loyalty, was a verdict of guilty.’” Chafee, supra, at 70. Thus, to avoid the dangers of “erroneous” fact-finding, and protect the rights of innocent dissenters, it is necessary to focus on more objective considerations than intent. (3) What really matters under the first amendment is not the intent of the speaker but the value of the expression. Since the clever inciter has not used “words [which] have no purport but to counsel the violation of law,” the value of his speech is indistinguishable from that of the speaker who utters the same words with a more honorable intent.

c. The Hand formula is overprotective of the dangerous speaker. Suppose during a famine that a speaker angrily asserts “to an excited mob assembled before the house of a corn-dealer” that “corn-dealers are starvers of the poor,” thus inflaming the mob to burn down the corn-dealer’s house. J. S. Mill, On Liberty ch. 3 (1859). Is it sensible to accord absolute protection to such a speaker, without regard to the potential dangers of his speech, merely because he does not use express language of incitement? Consider the following arguments: (1) It is the actor, and not the speaker, who ultimately brings about the harm. Government should thus direct its punishment and deterrence toward actors, not speakers. (2) A central premise of the first amendment is that government may not restrict expression because it does not trust citizens to make wise decisions if they are exposed to the expression. Such “paternalism” is fundamentally at odds with the very notion of free expression. (3) As Judge Hand argued, “If that be not the test, I can see no escape from the conclusion that [every] political agitation which can be shown to be apt to create a seditious temper is illegal.”

4. The fate of Masses. Judge Hand’s opinion was reversed on appeal, Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten, 246 F. 24 (2d Cir. 1917). The court of appeals flatly rejected Judge Hand’s construction of the act: “If the natural and reasonable effect of what is said is to encourage resistance to a law, and the words are used in an endeavor to persuade to resistance, it is immaterial that the duty to resist is not mentioned, or the interest of the persons addressed in resistance is not suggested.” Other reactions to Judge Hand’s formulation were equally unsupportive, and after 1921 Judge Hand himself abandoned his advocacy of the Masses approach. Parts of the formula, however, have reappeared in contemporary tests of subversive advocacy. See Yates and Brandenburg, infra, this section. The Masses itself was soon driven out of business, and its editors were prosecuted under the Espionage Act of 1917.

5. Clear and present danger. Whence does Justice Holmes derive the clear and present danger standard? Is Justice Holmes’s famous reference to the false shout of fire helpful? Such speech, Justice Holmes implies, may be restricted because it creates a clear and present danger of panic. But suppose the shout is true. Would that change the analysis?

Was there a clear and present danger in Schenck? Of what? That the war effort would be jeopardized? That the recruiting and enlistment service would grind to a halt? That a single person might be influenced to refuse induction or not enlist? How should we deal with the possibility that there may be many Schencks?

Was Holmes’s clear and present danger standard designed to supplant the prevailing bad tendency/constructive intent test? Note that the jury instructions in Schenck could not have embodied the clear and present danger standard, which did not yet exist. Why, then, didn’t the Court remand for a new trial?

Consider the Court’s decisions in Frohwerk and Debs, handed down on the same day in the spring of 1919, exactly one week after Schenck. Consider also the Court’s decision, and Justice Holmes’s dissent, in Abrams, handed down the following fall.

FROHWERK v. UNITED STATES, 249 U.S. 204 (1919). As a result of his participation in the preparation and publication of a series of articles in the Missouri Staats Zeitung, a German language newspaper, Frohwerk was convicted under the Espionage Act of 1917 of conspiring to cause disloyalty, mutiny, and refusal of duty in the military and naval forces of the United States. Frohwerk was sentenced to a fine and to ten years' imprisonment. The Court, speaking through Justice Holmes, unanimously rejected Frohwerk's contention that his conviction violated the first amendment. Illustrative of the articles was one that declared "it a monumental and inexcusable mistake to send our soldiers to France" and described our participation in the war as "outright murder."

Justice Holmes began his analysis by observing that the first amendment "cannot have been, and obviously was not, intended to give immunity for every possible use of language. Neither Hamilton nor Madison, nor any other competent person then or later ever supposed that to make criminal the counseling of murder within the jurisdiction of Congress would be an unconstitutional interference with free speech." Justice Holmes then turned to the crux of the issue: "It may be that all this may be said or written even in time of war in circumstances that would not make it a crime. [But] we must take the case on the record as it is, and on the record it is impossible to say that it might not have been found that the circulation of the paper was in quarters where a little breath would be enough to kindle a flame [and that that] fact was known and relied upon by those who sent the paper out." Justice Holmes therefore concluded that "we find ourselves unable to say that the articles could not furnish a basis for a conviction."

DEBS v. UNITED STATES, 249 U.S. 211 (1919). As a result of a speech delivered to a public assembly in Canton, Ohio, in July of 1918, Eugene V. Debs, national leader of the Socialist Party, was convicted under the Espionage Act of 1917 of attempting to obstruct the recruiting and enlistment service of the United States. Debs was sentenced to a prison term of ten years. The Supreme Court, speaking once again through Justice Holmes, unanimously rejected Debs's claim that the conviction violated the first amendment. Justice Holmes noted at the outset that "[the] main theme of the speech was socialism, its growth, and a prophecy of its ultimate success. With that we have nothing to do, but [if] one purpose of the speech, whether incidental or not does not matter, was to oppose [the] war, and if, in all the circumstances, that would be its probable effect, it would not be protected."

Turning to the speech itself, Justice Holmes observed that Debs had specifically praised several persons who previously had been convicted of aiding or encouraging others to refuse induction, and that toward the end of his address Debs had told his audience that “you need to know that you are fit for something better than slavery and cannon fodder.” In such circumstances, Justice Holmes concluded that Debs’s first amendment claim had in practical effect been “disposed of in [Schenck].” Justice Holmes emphasized that the jury in Debs had been “most carefully instructed that they could not find the defendant guilty for advocacy of any of his opinions unless the words used had as their natural tendency and reasonably probable effect to obstruct the recruiting service [and] unless the defendant had the specific intent to do so in his mind.” As in Frohwerk, Justice Holmes made no reference in Debs to “clear and present danger.”

In 1920, while in prison, Debs was the Socialist candidate for President. He again received almost a million votes. President Harding released him from prison in 1921.

Other representative prosecutions under the Espionage Act include the following:

(a) Rose Pastor Stokes was convicted for saying, “I am for the people and the government is for the profiteers,” during an antiwar talk to the Women’s Dining Club of Kansas City. Although there were no soldiers—indeed, no men—in her intended audience, the government successfully argued that she had violated the act because “our armies...can operate and succeed only so far as they are supported and maintained by the folks at home,” and Stokes’s statement had the tendency to “chill enthusiasm, extinguish confidence, and retard cooperation” of mothers, sisters, and sweethearts. She was sentenced to ten years in prison.

(b) The Reverend Clarence H. Waldron was convicted for distributing a pamphlet stating that “if Christians [are] forbidden to fight to preserve the Person of their Lord and Master, they may not fight to preserve themselves, or any city they should happen to dwell in.” The government charged that in distributing this pamphlet Waldron had obstructed the recruiting service. He was sentenced to fifteen years in prison.

(c) Robert Goldstein was convicted for producing and exhibiting a motion picture about the American Revolution. The Spirit of ’76 depicted Paul Revere’s ride, the signing of the Declaration of Independence, and Washington at Valley Forge. But it also included a scene accurately portraying the Wyoming Valley Massacre, in which British soldiers bayoneted women and children. The government charged that this could promote insubordination because it negatively portrayed America’s ally in the war against Germany. Goldstein was sentenced to ten years in prison. See G. Stone, Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime 170–173 (2004).

Abrams v. United States

250 U.S. 616 (1919)

[Although Czarist Russia, like the United States, had declared war on Germany, the Bolsheviks, on seizing power, signed a peace treaty with Germany. In the summer of 1918, the United States sent a contingent of marines to Vladivostok and Murmansk. The defendants in Abrams, a group of Russian immigrants who were self-proclaimed socialists and anarchists, perceived the expedition as an attempt to “crush the Russian Revolution.” In protest, they distributed several thousand copies of each of two leaflets, one of which was written in English, the other in Yiddish. The leaflets, which were thrown from a window and circulated secretly, called for a general strike. The defendants were arrested by the military police, and after a controversial trial, they were convicted of conspiring to violate various provisions of the 1918 amendments to the Espionage Act of 1917. The overall flavor of the trial is captured in the trial judge’s remarks just prior to sentencing:

These defendants took the stand. They talked about capitalists and producers, and I tried to figure out what a capitalist and what a producer is as contemplated by them. After listening carefully to all they had to say, I came to the conclusion that a capitalist is a man with a decent set of clothes, a minimum of $1.25 in his pocket, and a good character. And when I tried to find out what the prisoners had produced, I was unable to find out anything at all. So far as I can learn, not one of them ever produced so much as a single potato. The only thing they know how to raise is hell, and to direct it against the government of the United States. [But] we are not going to help carry out the plans mapped out by the Imperial German Government, and which are being carried out by Lenin and Trotsky. I have heard of the reported fate of the poor little daughters of the Czar, but I won’t talk about that now. I might get mad. I will now sentence the prisoners.

The defendants were sentenced to prison terms ranging from three to twenty years. The Supreme Court affirmed the convictions on two counts: one charging a violation of the provision prohibiting conspiracy “to incite, provoke or encourage resistance to the United States” (count 3); the other charging a violation of the provision prohibiting conspiracy to urge curtailment of the production of war materials “with intent [to] cripple or hinder the United States in the prosecution of the war" (count 4). Speaking for the Court, Justice Clarke summarily rejected the defendants' first amendment argument, noting simply that "[this] contention is sufficiently discussed and is definitely negated in [Schenck] and [Frohwerk]."]

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES dissenting....

The first of these leaflets says that the President's cowardly silence about the intervention in Russia reveals the hypocrisy of the plutocratic gang in Washington. It intimates that "German militarism combined with allied capitalism to crush the Russian revolution." [It] says that there is only one enemy of the workers of the world and that is capitalism; that it is a crime for workers of America, &c., to fight the workers' republic of Russia, and ends "Awake! Awake, you Workers of the World! Revolutionists." A note adds "It is absurd to call us pro-German. We hate and despise German militarism more than do you hypocritical tyrants. We have more reasons for denouncing German militarism than has the coward of the White House."

The other leaflet, headed "Workers—Wake Up," with abusive language says that [the] hypocrites shall not fool the Russian emigrants and friends of Russia in America. It tells the Russian emigrants that they now must spit in the face of the false military propaganda by which their sympathy and help to the prosecution of the war have been called forth and says that with the money they have lent or are going to lend "they will make bullets not only for the Germans but also for the Workers Soviets of Russia," and further, "Workers in the ammunition factories, you are producing bullets, bayonets, cannon, to murder not only the Germans, but also your dearest, best, who are in Russia and are fighting for freedom." It then appeals to the same Russian emigrants at some length not to consent to the "inquisitorial expedition to Russia," and says that the destruction of the Russian revolution is "the politics of the march to Russia." The leaflet winds up by saying "Workers, our reply to this barbarous intervention has to be a general strike!," and after a few words on the spirit of revolution, exhortations not to be afraid, and some usual tall talk ends "Woe unto those who will be in the way of progress. Let solidarity live! The Rebels."

[After describing the leaflets, Justice Holmes argued that the conviction under the fourth count was invalid because the defendants did not have the intent, required by the act, "to cripple or hinder the United States in the prosecution of the war." The defendants' specific intent, Justice Holmes maintained, was to help Russia, with whom we were not at war. Although conceding that "the word intent as vaguely used in ordinary legal discussion means no more than knowledge at the time of the act that the consequences said to be intended will ensue," Justice Holmes insisted that "this statute must be taken to use its words in a strict and accurate sense." Otherwise, Justice Holmes reasoned, the act would "be absurd," for it would make it criminal for one who thought "we were wasting money on aeroplanes" successfully to advocate curtailment if such curtailment later turned out "to hinder the United States in the prosecution of the war." Justice Holmes then passed to what he referred to as "a more important aspect of the case"—the first amendment.]

I never have seen any reason to doubt that the questions of law that alone were before this Court in the cases of Schenck, Frohwerk and Debs were rightly decided. I do not doubt for a moment that by the same reasoning that would justify punishing persuasion to murder, the United States constitutionally may punish speech that produces or is intended to produce a clear and imminent danger that it will bring about forthwith certain substantive evils that the United States constitutionally may seek to prevent. The power undoubtedly is greater in time of war than in time of peace because war opens dangers that do not exist at other times.

But as against dangers peculiar to war, as against others, the principle of the right to free speech is always the same. It is only the present danger of immediate evil or an intent to bring it about that warrants Congress in setting a limit to the expression of opinion where private rights are not concerned. Congress certainly cannot forbid all effort to change the mind of the country. Now nobody can suppose that the surreptitious publishing of a silly leaflet by an unknown man, without more, would present any immediate danger that its opinions would hinder the success of the government arms or have any appreciable tendency to do so. Publishing those opinions for the very purpose of obstructing, however, might indicate a greater danger and at any rate would have the quality of an attempt. So I assume that the second leaflet if published for the purposes alleged in the fourth count might be punishable. But [I] do not see how anyone can find the intent required by the statute in any of the defendants' words. The second leaflet is the only one that affords even a foundation for the charge, and there, without invoking the hatred of German militarism expressed in the former one, it is evident from the beginning to the end that the only object of the paper is to help Russia and stop American intervention there against the popular government—not to impede the United States in the war that it was carrying on. To say that two phrases taken literally might import a suggestion of conduct that would have interference with the war as an indirect and probably undesired effect seems to me by no means enough to show an attempt to produce that effect.

In this case sentences of twenty years imprisonment have been imposed for the publishing of two leaflets that I believe the defendants had as much right to publish as the Government has to publish the Constitution of the United States now vainly invoked by them. Even if I am technically wrong and enough can be squeezed from these poor and puny anonymities to turn the color of legal litmus paper; I will add, even if what I think the necessary intent were shown; the most nominal punishment seems to me all that possibly could be inflicted, unless the defendants are to be made to suffer not for what the indictment alleges but for the creed that they avow—a creed that I believe to be the creed of ignorance and immaturity when honestly held, as I see no reason to doubt that it was held here, but which, although made the subject of examination at the trial, no one has a right even to consider in dealing with the charges before the Court.

Persecution for the expression of opinions seems to me perfectly logical. If you have no doubt of your premises or your power and want a certain result with all your heart you naturally express your wishes in law and sweep away all opposition. To allow opposition by speech seems to indicate that you think the speech impotent, as when a man says that he has squared the circle, or that you do not care whole-heartedly for the result, or that you doubt either your power or your premises. But when men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market, and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That at any rate is the theory of our Constitution. It is an experiment, as all life is an experiment. Every year if not every day we have to wager our salvation upon some prophecy based upon imperfect knowledge. While that experiment is part of our system I think that we should be eternally vigilant against attempts to check the expression of opinions that we loathe and believe to be fraught with death, unless they so imminently threaten immediate interference with the lawful and pressing purposes of the law that an immediate check is required to save the country. I wholly disagree with the argument of the Government that the First Amendment left the common law as to seditious libel in force. History seems to me against the notion. I had conceived that the United States through many years had shown its repentance for the Sedition Act of 1798, by repaying fines that it imposed. Only the emergency that makes it immediately dangerous to leave the correction of evil counsels to time warrants making any exception to the sweeping command, "Congress shall make no law...abridging the freedom of speech." Of course I am speaking only of expressions of opinion and exhortations, which were all that were uttered here, but I regret that I cannot put into more impressive words my belief that in their conviction upon this indictment the defendants were deprived of their rights under the Constitution of the United States.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS concurs with the foregoing opinion.

Note: Abrams and the Emergence of the Holmes/Brandeis Tradition

1. Historical context. For a lively telling of the full story of the Abrams case, see R. Polenberg, Fighting Faiths (1987). The defendants in Abrams were a fascinating group. One of Abrams's co-defendants, Mollie Steimer, arrived at Ellis Island in 1913 with her parents and her five brothers and sisters, part of the flood of immigrants fleeing poverty and anti-Semitism in tsarist Russia. Two days after her arrival, the fifteen-year-old Steimer went to work in a grimy garment factory amid the crowded tenements of New York's Lower East Side. Faced with continuing hardship and bleak prospects for the future, she began to explore radical literature and soon became a committed anarchist.

At the time of her trial, she was only twenty years old. At four feet nine inches and less than ninety pounds she was tiny, but she was tough as nails. After her conviction, she was sentenced to fifteen years in prison. In 1922, she was ordered deported to the Soviet Union. When she was informed of this action, she refused to leave the federal penitentiary, because there was a threatened railroad strike and she would not ride on a train run by strikebreakers. After the strike was resolved, she was shipped back to Russia.

Once there, she immediately began protesting the injustices of Soviet society. In 1923, the Soviets deported Steimer to Germany. Few other people have the distinction of having been deported by both the United States and the Soviet Union. In 1933, when Hitler came to power, Steimer fled to Paris. Her Jewish and anarchist identities caught up with her, however, and after the Nazis occupied France she escaped to Mexico. Steimer died in Cuernavaca in 1980 at the age of eighty-two. See G. Stone, Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime 138–140, 232–233 (2004).

2. The Holmes transformation. Most commentators have concluded that Justice Holmes moved from a narrow construction of the first amendment in Schenck, Frohwerk, and Debs to a more civil libertarian position in his dissent in Abrams. Holmes apparently was influenced during the summer of 1919 by a lively set of exchanges about free speech with Learned Hand, Zechariah Chafee, and Harold Laski. In 1922, Holmes confessed in a letter to Chafee that before the summer of 1919, when it came to issues of free speech and tolerance, "I was simply ignorant." See G. Stone, Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime 198–

211 (2004); Rabban, The Emergence of Modern First Amendment Doctrine, 50 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1207, 1208–1209, 1311–1317 (1983). For a full account of Holmes's transformation, see T. Healy, The Great Dissent: How Oliver Wendell Holmes Changed His Mind—and Changed the History of Free Speech in America 201, 343 (2013).

3. The administrability of clear and present danger. Is Justice Holmes's formulation of clear and present danger in Abrams administratively workable? Judge Hand was largely unimpressed with Justice Holmes's effort. As he wrote to Chafee,

I am not wholly in love with Holmesey's test, [for once] you admit that the matter is one of degree, [you] give to Tomdickandharry, D.J., so much latitude that the jig is at once up. Besides [the] Nine Elder Statesmen have not shown themselves wholly immune from the "herd instinct" and what seems "immediate and direct" to-day may seem very remote next year even though the circumstances surrounding the utterance be unchanged. I own I should prefer a qualitative formula, hard, conventional, difficult to evade.

In short, Judge Hand preferred "a test based upon the nature of the utterance itself." Gunther, Learned Hand and the Origins of Modern First Amendment Doctrine: Some Fragments of History, 27 Stan. L. Rev. 719, 749 (1975).

4. Was there a clear and present danger in Abrams? Consider Wigmore's criticism:

[The Abrams dissent] is dallying with the facts and the law. [If] these [individuals] could, without the law's restraint, urge munition workers to a general strike and armed violence, then others could lawfully do so; and a thousand disaffected undesirables, aliens and natives alike, were ready and waiting to do so. [If] such urgings were lawful, every munitions factory in the country could be stopped by them. The relevant amount of harm that one criminal act can effect is no measure of its criminality, and no measure of the danger of its criminality.

Wigmore, Abrams v. United States: Freedom of Speech and Freedom of Thuggery in War-Time and Peace-Time, 14 Ill. L. Rev. 539, 549–550 (1920).

5. The rationale of clear and present danger. Consider the following rationales for the clear and present danger standard: (a) The test balances competing speech and societal interests—speech is important, so government can restrict it only when there is an "emergency"; an "emergency" exists only if the danger is “clear” and “present.” (b) The test marks off a broad area of protected expression to avoid Judge Hand’s concern in Masses that government not be permitted to render unlawful “every political agitation which can be shown to be apt to create a seditious temper.” (c) The test is designed to reduce the risk that government, in the guise of preventing “danger,” will in fact suppress expression because it disapproves of the substantive message.

6. “Sentences of twenty years imprisonment.” Holmes is clearly appalled that the defendants in Abrams were sentenced to terms “of twenty years imprisonment.” He implies that the only plausible explanation for such severe punishment is that the defendants were being “made to suffer” not for any actual harm they might have caused to the nation (which he regards as trivial), but because of the government’s hostility to their ideas (which he regards as impermissible). Suppose, then, that the defendants had been sentenced to a fine of $100 instead of to twenty years in prison. Should that have changed Holmes’s analysis or the result? Should the nature or severity of the penalty be relevant to the constitutionality of a restriction of speech? See Coenen, Of Speech and Sanctions: Toward a Penalty-Sensitive Approach to the First Amendment, 112 Colum. L. Rev. 991 (2012).

7. Other Espionage Act decisions. In several post-Abrams decisions, the Court, over the dissents of Justices Holmes and Brandeis, upheld further convictions under the Espionage Act. See Pierce v. United States, 252 U.S. 239 (1920); Schaefer v. United States, 251 U.S. 466 (1920). See also Gilbert v. Minnesota, 254 U.S. 325 (1920).

Consider L. Weinrib, The Taming of Free Speech 123-24 (2016):

The Holmes and Brandeis dissents in [Abrams] and the remaining wartime speech cases galvanized liberal support for free speech. [But there] were details to be worked out. [Many] of the strongest advocates for expressive freedom continued to harbor deep reservations about advancing their agenda in the courts. [Felix Frankfurter, for example,] worried about expanding judicial oversight of the political branches [and University of Chicago law professor Ernst Freund [criticized] the Supreme Court’s Espionage Act decisions for swapping an “arbitrary executive” with “arbitrary judicial power.” [As] a correspondent complained to [Harvard law professor Zechariah] Chafee in 1921, “It seems the hardest thing in the world to straighten out the honest conservative mind on this question of free speech.”

8. The “Red Scare.” After World War I and the Russian Revolution, the United States entered a period of intense antiradicalism. In the years 1919 and 1920, an era known as the “Red Scare,” two-thirds of the states enacted laws prohibiting the advocacy of criminal syndicalism and criminal anarchy. In addition, two-thirds of the states adopted “red flag” laws, which made it a crime to display a red flag with a seditious intent. On the Red Scare, see G. Stone, supra, at 220–226; Z. Chafee, Free Speech in the United States 141–168 (1941). It was not long before the Court had to rule on the constitutionality of such legislation.

9. Free Speech and Labor Agitation. A central feature in the early battles over free speech in the United States involved disputes over labor agitation. In the early decades of the twentieth century, labor sympathizers turned bitterly against the courts for their refusal to recognize the free speech rights of labor. For an insightful telling of this story, see L. Weinrib, The Taming of Free Speech (2016).

Gitlow v. New York

268 U.S. 652 (1925)

MR. JUSTICE SANFORD delivered the opinion of the Court.

Benjamin Gitlow was indicted in the Supreme Court of New York, with three others, for the statutory crime of criminal anarchy. [He] was separately tried, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment....

The contention here is that the statute, by its terms and as applied in this case, is repugnant to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Its material provisions are:...

§161. Advocacy of criminal anarchy. Any person [who] advocates, advises, or teaches the duty, necessity or propriety of overthrowing [organized] government by force or violence, or by assassination of [any] of the executive officials of government, or by any unlawful means; [is] guilty of a felony....

[The] defendant is a member of the Left Wing Section of the Socialist Party, a dissenting branch or faction of that party formed in opposition to its dominant policy of “moderate Socialism.” [The] Left Wing Section was organized nationally at a conference in New York City in June, 1919, attended by ninety delegates from twenty different States. The conference elected a National Council, of which the defendant was a member, and left to it the adoption of a “manifesto.” This was published in The Revolutionary Age, the official organ of the Left Wing. The defendant [arranged] for the printing [and publication of the first issue of the paper, which contained the Left Wing Manifesto].

[The indictment charged that, as a result of his involvement in the publication of the manifesto, he “had advocated, advised and taught the duty, necessity and propriety of overthrowing and overturning organized government by force, violence and unlawful means.”] The Court conceded that there “was no evidence of any effect resulting from the publication and circulation of the Manifesto.”]

The statute does not penalize the utterance or publication of abstract “doctrine” or academic discussion having no quality of incitement to any concrete action. It is not aimed against mere historical or philosophical essays. It does not restrain the advocacy of changes in the form of government by constitutional and lawful means. What it prohibits is language advocating, advising or teaching the overthrow of organized government by unlawful means. These words imply urging to action....

The Manifesto, plainly, is neither the statement of abstract doctrine nor, as suggested by counsel, mere prediction that industrial disturbances and revolutionary mass strikes will result spontaneously in an inevitable process of evolution in the economic system. It advocates and urges in fervent language mass action which shall progressively foment industrial disturbances and through political mass strikes and revolutionary mass action overthrow and destroy organized parliamentary government. It concludes with a call to action in these words: “The proletariat revolution and the Communist reconstruction of society—the struggle for these—is now indispensable....The Communist International calls the proletariat of the world to the final struggle!” This [is] the language of direct incitement. [That] the jury were warranted in finding that the Manifesto advocated not merely the abstract doctrine of overthrowing organized government by force, violence and unlawful means, but action to that end, is clear.

For present purposes we may and do assume that freedom of speech and of the press—which are protected by the First Amendment from abridgment by Congress—are among the fundamental personal rights and “liberties” protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from impairment by the States....

It is a fundamental principle, long established, that the freedom of speech and of the press which is secured by the Constitution, does not confer an absolute right to speak or publish, without responsibility, whatever one may choose, or an unrestricted and unbridled license that gives immunity for every possible use of language and prevents the punishment of those who abuse this freedom. [A] State may punish utterances endangering the foundations of organized government and threatening its overthrow by unlawful means. These imperil its own existence as a constitutional State. Freedom of speech and press [does] not deprive a State of the primary and essential right of self preservation.

By enacting the present statute the State has determined, through its legislative body, that utterances advocating the overthrow of organized government by force, violence and unlawful means, are so inimical to the general welfare and involve such danger of substantive evil that they may be penalized in the exercise of its police power. That determination must be given great weight. Every presumption is to be indulged in favor of the validity of the statute. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U.S. 623, 661. [That] utterances inciting to the overthrow of organized government by unlawful means, present a sufficient danger of substantive evil to bring their punishment within the range of legislative discretion, is clear. Such utterances, by their very nature, involve danger to the public peace and to the security of the State. They threaten breaches of the peace and ultimate revolution. And the immediate danger is none the less real and substantial, because the effect of a given utterance cannot be accurately foreseen. The State cannot reasonably be required to measure the danger from every such utterance in the nice balance of a jeweler's scale. A single revolutionary spark may kindle a fire that, smouldering for a time, may burst into a sweeping and destructive conflagration. It cannot be said that the State is acting arbitrarily or unreasonably when in the exercise of its judgment as to the measures necessary to protect the public peace and safety, it seeks to extinguish the spark without waiting until it has enkindled the flame or blazed into the conflagration. It cannot reasonably be required to defer the adoption of measures for its own peace and safety until the revolutionary utterances lead to actual disturbances of the public peace or imminent and immediate danger of its own destruction; but it may, in the exercise of its judgment, suppress the threatened danger in its incipiency....

We cannot hold that the present statute is an arbitrary or unreasonable exercise of the police power of the State unwarrantably infringing the freedom of speech or press; and we must and do sustain its constitutionality.

This being so it may be applied to every utterance—not too trivial to be beneath the notice of the law—which is of such a character and used with such intent and purpose as to bring it within the prohibition of the statute. [In] other words, when the legislative body has determined generally, in the constitutional exercise of its discretion, that utterances of a certain kind involve such danger of substantive evil that they may be punished, the question whether any specific utterance coming within the prohibited class is likely, in and of itself, to bring about the substantive evil, is not open to consideration. It is sufficient that the statute itself be constitutional and that the use of the language comes within its prohibition....

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES dissenting.

Mr. Justice Brandeis and I are of opinion that this judgment should be reversed. The general principle of free speech, it seems to me, must be taken to be included in the Fourteenth Amendment, in view of the scope that has been given to the word "liberty" as there used, although perhaps it may be accepted with a somewhat larger latitude of interpretation than is allowed to Congress by the sweeping language that governs, or ought to govern, the laws of the United States. If I am right, then I think that the criterion sanctioned by the full court in [Schenck] applies: "The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that [the state] has a right to prevent." It is true that in my opinion this criterion was departed from in [Abrams], but the convictions that I expressed in that case are too deep for it to be possible for me as yet to believe that it [has] settled the law. If what I think the correct test is applied, it is manifest that there was no present danger of an attempt to overthrow the government by force on the part of the admittedly small minority who shared the defendant's views. It is said that this Manifesto was more than a theory, that it was an incitement. Every idea is an incitement. It offers itself for belief, and, if believed, it is acted on unless some other belief outweighs it, or some failure of energy stifles the movement at its birth. The only difference between the expression of an opinion and an incitement in the narrower sense is the speaker's enthusiasm for the result. Eloquence may set fire to reason. But whatever may be thought of the redundant discourse before us, it had no chance of starting a present conflagration. If, in the long run, the beliefs expressed in proletarian dictatorship are destined to be accepted by the dominant forces of the community, the only meaning of free speech is that they should be given their chance and have their way.

If the publication of this document had been laid as an attempt to induce an uprising against government at once, and not at some indefinite time in the future, it would have presented a different question. The object would have been one with which the law might deal, subject to the doubt whether there was any danger that the publication could produce any result; or, in other words, whether it was not futile and too remote from possible consequences. But the indictment alleges the publication and nothing more.

Note: “Abstract Doctrine” versus “Urging to Action”

1. Incitement. Justice Sanford emphasized repeatedly in Gitlow that the New York statute was not directed against “abstract doctrine,” “academic discussion,” “historical or philosophical essays,” or “advocacy of changes in the form of government by constitutional and lawful means.” Rather, it restricted only “urging to action,” “incitement to [concrete] action,” and “the language of direct incitement.” Justice Sanford thus seemed to be suggesting an analysis reminiscent of that of Judge Hand in Masses, arguing implicitly that whatever protection might be appropriate for “abstract doctrine” or for general political discussion, express “incitement” of unlawful conduct is an entirely different matter. Is Justice Holmes’s reply to this argument that “every idea is an incitement” a satisfactory response?

2. The marketplace of ideas. In Abrams, Justice Holmes maintained that as an “experiment” our Constitution embraced the “theory” that “the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market.” The market, however, is not perfect and in Gitlow Justice Holmes conceded that, “if, in the long run, the beliefs expressed in proletarian dictatorship are destined to be accepted by the dominant forces of the community, the only meaning of free speech is that they should be given their chance and have their way.” What about ideas that, if accepted, would refuse to permit other ideas to compete in the “market”? Are some evils so grave that we cannot afford to “experiment”?

Consider Stone, Reflections on the First Amendment: The Evolution of the American Jurisprudence of Free Expression, 131 Proc. of the J. Am. Phil. Socy. 251, 253 (1987):

[The central principle of first amendment jurisprudence is that] the Government may never restrict the expression of particular ideas because it fears that citizens may adopt those ideas in the political process. As Alexander Meiklejohn explained, this principle is rooted “in the very foundations of the self-governing process,” for when individuals “govern themselves it is they—and no one else—who must pass judgment upon unwisdom, unfairness and danger.” Under this view, “no suggestion of policy” may be denied a hearing “because someone in control thinks it unwise.”

Now, there is an anomaly in this principle, [for] if the essential goal is to preserve self-governance, why can’t citizens, acting in their capacity as self-governors, decide that certain policies are simply out-of-bounds and thus prohibit further debate on such issues? Under this view, it is not the Government, as some independent entity, that is closing off debate, but citizens themselves, and they are doing so through the very self-governing process that the First Amendment is designed to promote.

The answer, I think, is that the First Amendment [places] out of bounds any law that attempts to freeze public debate at a particular moment in time. Under this view, a majority at any moment has the power to decide an issue of policy for itself, but it has no power irrevocably to decide that issue for future citizens by preventing them from continuing to debate the issue. This is [what] Justice Holmes described as the great First Amendment “experiment.”

Is there a difference under the marketplace theory between advocacy of change through political processes and advocacy of change through criminal conduct? Must those who seek to implement their ideas by the use of force or violence “be given their chance” to “have their way”?

Whitney v. California

274 U.S. 357 (1927)

MR. JUSTICE SANFORD delivered the opinion of the Court.

[In 1919, Anita Whitney attended the national convention of the Socialist Party in Chicago as a delegate of the local Oakland branch of the party. At this convention, the party split between the “radicals” and the old-line Socialists. The radicals, supported by the Oakland branch delegates, formed the Communist Labor Party and promulgated a platform similar in style and substance to the Left Wing Manifesto at issue in Gitlow. Shortly thereafter, Whitney attended a convention held in Oakland for the purpose of organizing a California branch of the Communist Labor Party. At this convention, she sponsored a moderate resolution calling for the achievement of the party’s goals through the political process. This resolution was defeated, however, and the convention adopted the more militant national platform. Whitney remained at the convention until it adjourned and remained a member of the party. As a result of her activities at the Oakland convention, she was charged with violating the California Criminal Syndicalism Act, which prohibited any person to knowingly become a member of any organization that advocates “the commission of crime, sabotage, or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change.” For an excellent account of Ms. Whitney’s life and of the trial and appellate proceedings in the case, see Blasi, The First Amendment and the Ideal of Civic Courage: The Brandeis Opinion in Whitney v. California, 29 Wm.

The first count of the information, on which the conviction was had, charged that [at the Oakland convention] the defendant, in violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, "did then and there [knowingly] become a member of [a group] organized [to advocate] criminal syndicalism."...

[At her trial, Whitney] testified that it was not her intention that the Communist Labor Party of California should be an instrument of terrorism or violence. [But by] enacting the provisions of the Syndicalism Act the State has declared, [for an individual] to knowingly be or become a member of [an organization that advocates criminal syndicalism] involves such danger to the public peace and the security of the State [that] these acts should be penalized in the exercise of its police power. That determination must be given great weight.

The essence of the offense denounced by the Act [partakes] of the nature of a criminal conspiracy. [That] such united and joint action involves even greater danger to the public peace and security than the isolated utterances and acts of individuals, is clear. We cannot hold that, as here applied, the Act is an unreasonable or arbitrary exercise of the police power of the State....

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS, concurring....

[Although] the rights of free speech and assembly are fundamental, they are not in their nature absolute. Their exercise is subject to restriction, if the particular restriction proposed is required in order to protect the state from destruction or from serious injury, political, economic or moral. That the necessity which is essential to a valid restriction does not exist unless speech would produce, or is intended to produce, a clear and imminent danger of some substantive evil which the state constitutionally may seek to prevent has been settled. See [Schenck].

It is said to be the function of the legislature to determine whether at a particular time and under the particular circumstances the formation of, or assembly with, a society organized to advocate criminal syndicalism constitutes a clear and present danger of substantive evil; and that by enacting the law here in question the legislature of California determined that question in the affirmative. [The] legislature must obviously decide, in the first instance, whether a danger exists which calls for a particular protective measure. But where a statute is valid only in case certain conditions exist, the enactment of the statute cannot alone establish the facts which are essential to its validity....

This court has not yet fixed the standard by which to determine when a danger shall be deemed clear; how remote the danger may be and yet be deemed present; and what degree of evil shall be deemed sufficiently substantial to justify resort to abridgment of free speech and assembly as the means of protection. To reach sound conclusions on these matters, we must bear in mind why a state is, ordinarily, denied the power to prohibit dissemination of social, economic and political doctrine which a vast majority of its citizens believes to be false and fraught with evil consequence.

Those who won our independence believed that the final end of the state was to make men free to develop their faculties; and that in its government the deliberative forces should prevail over the arbitrary. They valued liberty both as an end and as a means. They believed liberty to be the secret of happiness and courage to be the secret of liberty. They believed that freedom to think as you will and to speak as you think are means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth; that without free speech and assembly discussion would be futile; that with them, discussion affords ordinarily adequate protection against the dissemination of noxious doctrine; that the greatest menace to freedom is an inert people; that public discussion is a political duty; and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American government. They recognized the risks to which all human institutions are subject. But they knew that order cannot be secured merely through fear of punishment for its infraction; that it is hazardous to discourage thought, hope and imagination; that fear breeds repression; that repression breeds hate; that hate menaces stable government; that the path of safety lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies; and that the fitting remedy for evil counsels is good ones. Believing in the power of reason as applied through public discussion, they eschewed silence coerced by law—the argument of force in its worst form. Recognizing the occasional tyrannies of governing majorities, they amended the Constitution so that free speech and assembly should be guaranteed.

Fear of serious injury cannot alone justify suppression of free speech and assembly. Men feared witches and burned women. It is the function of speech to free men from the bondage of irrational fears. To justify suppression of free speech there must be reasonable ground to fear that serious evil will result if free speech is practiced. There must be reasonable ground to believe that the danger apprehended is imminent. There must be reasonable ground to believe that the evil to be prevented is a serious one. Every denunciation of existing law tends in some measure to increase the probability that there will be violation of it. Condonation of a breach enhances the probability. Expressions of approval add to the probability. Propagation of the criminal state of mind by teaching syndicalism increases it. Advocacy of lawbreaking heightens it still further. But even advocacy of violation, however reprehensible morally, is not a justification for denying free speech where the advocacy falls short of incitement and there is nothing to indicate that the advocacy would be immediately acted on. The wide difference between advocacy and incitement, between preparation and attempt, between assembling and conspiracy, must be borne in mind. In order to support a finding of clear and present danger it must be shown either that immediate serious violence was to be expected or was advocated, or that the past conduct furnished reason to believe that such advocacy was then contemplated.

Those who won our independence by revolution were not cowards. They did not fear political change. They did not exalt order at the cost of liberty. To courageous, self-reliant men, with confidence in the power of free and fearless reasoning applied through the processes of popular government, no danger flowing from speech can be deemed clear and present, unless the incidence of the evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for full discussion. If there be time to expose through discussion the falsehood and fallacies, to avert the evil by the processes of education, the remedy to be applied is more speech, not enforced silence. Only an emergency can justify repression. Such must be the rule if authority is to be reconciled with freedom. Such, in my opinion, is the command of the Constitution. It is, therefore, always open to Americans to challenge a law abridging free speech and assembly by showing that there was no emergency justifying it.

Moreover, even imminent danger cannot justify resort to prohibition of these functions essential to effective democracy, unless the evil apprehended is relatively serious. Prohibition of free speech and assembly is a measure so stringent that it would be inappropriate as the means for averting a relatively trivial harm to society. A police measure may be unconstitutional merely because the remedy, although effective as means of protection, is unduly harsh or oppressive. Thus, a state might, in the exercise of its police power, make any trespass upon the land of another a crime, regardless of the results or of the intent or purpose of the trespasser. It might, also, punish an attempt, a conspiracy, or an incitement to commit the trespass. But it is hardly conceivable that this court would hold constitutional a statute which punished as a felony the mere voluntary assembly with a society formed to teach that pedestrians had the moral right to cross unenclosed, unposted, waste lands and to advocate their doing so, even if there was imminent danger that advocacy would lead to a trespass. The fact that speech is likely to result in some violence or in destruction of property is not enough to justify its suppression. There must be the probability of serious injury to the state. Among freemen, the deterrents ordinarily to be applied to prevent crime are education and punishment for violations of the law, not abridgment of the rights of free speech and assembly.

The California Syndicalism Act recites, in §4:

[This] act concerns and is necessary to the immediate preservation of the public peace and safety, for the reason that at the present time large numbers of persons are going from place to place in this state advocating, teaching and practicing criminal syndicalism....

This legislative declaration satisfies the requirement of the Constitution of the state concerning emergency legislation. [But] it does not preclude inquiry into the question whether, at the time and under the circumstances, the conditions existed which are essential to validity under the Federal Constitution. As a statute, even if not void on its face, may be challenged because invalid as applied, [the] result of such an inquiry may depend upon the specific facts of the particular case. Whenever the fundamental rights of free speech and assembly are alleged to have been invaded, it must remain open to a defendant to present the issue whether there actually did exist at the time a clear danger; whether the danger, if any, was imminent; and whether the evil apprehended was one so substantial as to justify the stringent restriction interposed by the legislature. The legislative declaration, like the fact that the statute was passed and was sustained by the highest court of the state, creates merely a rebuttable presumption that these conditions have been satisfied. [For technical reasons, Justice Brandeis ultimately voted to uphold the conviction.]

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES joins in this opinion.

Note: The Brandeis Concurrence and the Road to Dennis

1. Clear and present danger. Justice Brandeis attempted in Whitney to explicate the underlying rationale of the clear and present danger standard. Was his reliance on the intent of the framers historically sound? Note that Justice Brandeis's conception of the function of free speech differs markedly from that of Justice Holmes. Whereas Justice Holmes speaks of "free trade in ideas," Justice Brandeis emphasizes the "development of the faculties" and the "deliberative" process, and suggests that "public discussion is a political duty" and that "the greatest menace to freedom is an inert people." See Blasi, The First Amendment and the Ideal of Civic Courage: The Brandeis Opinion in Whitney v. California, 29 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 653 (1988). For a historical analysis of the Brandeis concurrence, see Collins and Skover, Curious Concurrence: Justice Brandeis's Vote in Whitney v. California, 2005 Sup. Ct. Rev. 333.

2. The persuasion principle. Justice Brandeis emphasized that, if the danger is not imminent, “the remedy to be applied is more speech, not enforced silence.” Is the opportunity for counterspeech an adequate explanation of the imminence requirement? Consider Strauss, Persuasion, Autonomy, and Freedom of Expression, 91 Colum. L. Rev. 334–336, 346–347, 353–356 (1991):

The government may not suppress speech on the ground that it is too persuasive. Except, perhaps, in extraordinary circumstances, the government may not restrict speech because it fears, however justifiably, that the speech will persuade those who hear it to do something of which the government disapproves. [This] principle [unifies] much of first amendment law.

[T]he persuasion principle can[not] be justified on consequentialist grounds. [Justice Brandeis's] opinion in Whitney [argues that “good counsels”] are a “remedy” for “evil counsels.” [The] suggestion is that “more” speech can accomplish practically everything that suppression could accomplish. [If] this were true, the persuasion principle would be easy to justify. [But] there will be many occasions on which this optimistic view is an illusion. The problem with the “more speech” approach is that it is not unusual for people to be persuaded to do bad things, and it will not always be possible to talk them out of it....

Brandeis's opinion in Whitney, in addition to suggesting a consequentialist argument, uses terms that we would today say reflect a conception of human autonomy: “the final end of the State” is to make people “free to develop their faculties,” and liberty is valuable “both as an end and as a means.” [The] persuasion principle can be defended on autonomy grounds in the following way: Violations of the persuasion principle are similar in kind [to] lies that are told for the purpose of influencing behavior. Violating the persuasion principle is wrong for some of the same reasons that lies of this kind are wrong: both involve a denial of autonomy in the sense that they interfere with a person’s control over her own reasoning processes. [When] the government violates the persuasion principle, it has determined that people [will] pursue [the government’s] objectives, instead of their own.

For the proposition that in some circumstances more speech does not help to correct falsehoods, but only adds to polarization, see Glaeser and Sunstein, Does More Speech Correct Falsehoods?, 43 J. Legal Stud. 65 (2014).

3. The limits of judicial dissent. Consider H. Kalven, A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America 158 (1988):

Although Whitney marks the sixth consecutive decision in which the majority has either ignored the clear and present danger test or found it inapplicable, Justice Brandeis [continues to assert that it “has been settled” that clear and present danger is the test for restrictions of speech]. The stamina and tactics of these classic dissents are remarkable. In professional lawyering terms, the performance of Justices Holmes and Brandeis is outrageous. They keep insisting that they are adhering to the Court’s true rule adopted in Schenck [even though they] have been told [repeatedly] by the majority that clear and present danger is not now and never was the general [test]. Yet we are all deeply in their debt for their outrageous behavior. They have kept alive a counter-tension in the tradition, and their towering prestige has invested the slogan with almost mesmerizing force. Like twin Moses come down from Mount Sinai bearing the true Commandment, they see little need to argue that the formula is rightly derived from the First Amendment, merely that it is.

4. Association. In the pre-Whitney cases, the various defendants were prosecuted for engaging personally in prohibited expression. The California Criminal Syndicalism Act, however, declared it unlawful for any person knowingly to be a member of any organization that engages in unlawful advocacy. Whitney thus posed, but did not necessarily answer, three new questions: First, is the act of associating with others for expression-related purposes in itself protected by the first amendment? Second, assuming association is a protected first amendment activity, in what circumstances, if any, can the state constitutionally punish membership in an organization that engages in unlawful advocacy? The Court in Whitney held “knowing” membership unprotected. Is that the appropriate line? Third, how does the Holmes-Brandeis conception of clear and present danger apply to association? Recall the argument of Wigmore that the legislature should be permitted to consider the cumulative danger posed by many individually harmless speakers in deciding whether there is sufficient danger to warrant the suppression of speech. On the “right to associate” as a distinct first amendment right, see Bhagwat, Associational Speech, 120 Yale L.J. 978 (2011).

5. A new direction? In the decade following Whitney, the Court handed down three decisions concerning subversive advocacy and the right of association. Although the Court did not expressly reconsider its earlier decisions in these cases, in each case the Court found a technical way to invalidate the conviction. Thus, after an era of nine consecutive affirmances of convictions for subversive advocacy, the Court in the next decade offered three consecutive reversals. See Fiske v. Kansas, 274 U.S. 380 (1927); De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353 (1937); Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U.S. 242 (1937).

6. Clear and present danger from Whitney to Dennis. In the quarter-century between Whitney and Dennis, the Court embraced clear and present danger as the appropriate test for a wide range of first amendment issues. See, e.g., Schneider v. State, section E1, infra (leafleting); Cantwell v. Connecticut, section B2 infra (hostile audience); Bridges v. California, section D3 infra (contempt by publication); Terminiello v. Chicago, section B2 infra (breach of peace). See also Strong, Fifty Years of “Clear and Present Danger”: From Schenck to Brandenburg—and Beyond, 1969 Sup. Ct. Rev. 41.

Although there were no major Supreme Court decisions concerning subversive advocacy during World War II, there were several prosecutions of individuals under both the Espionage Act of 1917 and the Smith Act of 1940. Most often, these were prosecutions of individuals who were leaders of fascist organizations in the United States. See R. Steele, Free Speech in the Good War (1999); M. St. George and L. Dennis, The Great Sedition Trial of 1944 (1946); G. Stone, Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime 252–283 (2004).

7. The war on communism. With its 1951 decision in Dennis, the Court continued its quest for a satisfactory solution to the problem of subversive advocacy. During the post–World War II “cold war” era, fears over national security once again generated wide-ranging federal and state restrictions on “radical” speech. These restrictions included extensive loyalty programs, emergency detention plans, attempts to “outlaw” the Communist Party, requirements that all so-called communist-front and communist-action organizations register with the government, and extensive legislative investigations of suspected “subversives.” Dennis, which involved the prosecution under the Smith Act of the national leaders of the Communist Party of the United States, represents but one facet of this era.

Dennis v. United States

341 U.S. 494 (1951)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE VINSON announced the judgment of the Court and an opinion in which MR. JUSTICE REED, MR. JUSTICE BURTON and MR. JUSTICE MINTON join.

Petitioners were indicted for violation of the conspiracy provisions of the Smith Act during the period of April 1945 to July 1948. [A] verdict of guilty as to all the petitioners was returned by the jury. [The] Court of Appeals affirmed.

Sections 2 and 3 of the Smith Act provide as follows:

Sec. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person to knowingly or willfully advocate, abet, advise, or teach the duty, necessity, desirability, or propriety of overthrowing or destroying any government in the United States by force or violence, or by the assassination of any officer of such government....

Sec. 3. It shall be unlawful for any person to attempt to commit, or to conspire to commit, any of the acts prohibited by the provisions of...this title.

The indictment charged the petitioners with willfully and knowingly conspiring (1) to organize as the Communist Party of the United States of America a society, group and assembly of persons who teach and advocate the overthrow and destruction of the Government of the United States by force and violence, and (2) knowingly and willfully conspiring to advocate and teach the duty and necessity of overthrowing and destroying the Government of the United States by force and violence....

The trial of the case extended over nine months, six of which were devoted to the taking of evidence, resulting in a record of 16,000 pages. Our limited grant of the writ of certiorari has removed from our consideration any question as to the sufficiency of the [evidence]. Whether on this record petitioners did in fact advocate the overthrow of the Government by force and violence is not before us, and we must base any discussion of this point upon the conclusion [of] the Court of Appeals, which [held] that the record in this case amply supports the necessary finding of the jury that petitioners, the leaders of the Communist Party in this country, [intended] to initiate a violent revolution whenever the propitious occasion appeared....

[The petitioners attack] the statute on the grounds that by its terms it prohibits academic discussion of the merits of Marxism-Leninism, that it stifles ideas and is contrary to all concepts of a free speech and a free press. [But the] very language of the Smith Act [demonstrates that it] is directed at advocacy, not discussion. Thus, the trial judge properly charged the jury that they could not convict if they found that petitioners did "no more than pursue peaceful studies and discussions or teaching and advocacy in the realm of ideas."...

[In Gitlow and Whitney, the] legislature had found that a certain kind of speech was, itself, harmful and unlawful. [In such circumstances, the Court held that the test was] whether the statute was "reasonable." [Although] no case subsequent to Whitney and Gitlow has expressly overruled the majority opinions in those cases, there is little doubt that subsequent opinions have inclined toward the Holmes-Brandeis rationale....

In this case we are [thus] squarely presented with the application of the “clear and present danger” test, and must decide what that phrase imports. We first note that [overthrow] of the Government by force and violence is certainly a substantial enough interest for the Government to limit speech. [If], then, this interest may be protected, the literal problem which is presented is what has been meant by the use of the phrase “clear and present danger.”...

Obviously, the words cannot mean that before the Government may act, it must wait until the putsch is about to be executed, the plans have been laid and the signal is awaited. If Government is aware that a group aiming at its overthrow is attempting to indoctrinate its members and to commit them to a course whereby they will strike when the leaders feel the circumstances permit, action by the Government is required. The argument that there is no need for Government to concern itself, for Government is strong, it possesses ample powers to put down a rebellion, it may defeat the revolution with ease needs no answer. For that is not the question. Certainly an attempt to overthrow the Government by force, even though doomed from the outset because of inadequate numbers or power of the revolutionists, is a sufficient evil for Congress to prevent. The damage which such attempts create both physically and politically to a nation makes it impossible to measure the validity in terms of the probability of success, or the immediacy of a successful attempt....

Chief Judge Learned Hand, writing for the majority below, interpreted the phrase as follows: “In each case [courts] must ask whether the gravity of the ‘evil,’ discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger.” [We] adopt this statement of the rule. As articulated by Chief Judge Hand, it is as succinct and inclusive as any other we might devise at this time. It takes into consideration those factors which we deem relevant, and relates their significances. More we cannot expect from words.

Likewise, we are in accord with the court below, which affirmed the trial court’s finding that the requisite danger existed. The mere fact that from the period 1945 to 1948 petitioners’ activities did not result in an attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence is of course no answer to the fact that there was a group that was ready to make the attempt. The formation by petitioners of such a highly organized conspiracy, with rigidly disciplined members subject to call when the leaders, these petitioners, felt that the time had come for action, coupled with the inflammable nature of world conditions, similar uprisings in other countries, and the touch-and-go nature of our relations with countries with whom petitioners were in the very least ideologically attuned, convince us that their convictions were justified on this score. And this analysis disposes of the contention that a conspiracy to advocate, as distinguished from the advocacy itself, cannot be constitutionally restrained, because it comprises only the preparation. It is the existence of the conspiracy which creates the danger....

[Affirmed.]

MR. JUSTICE CLARK took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, concurring....

Primary responsibility for adjusting the interests which compete in the situation before us of necessity belongs to the Congress. [We] are to set aside the judgment of those whose duty it is to legislate only if there is no reasonable basis for it. [After canvassing the entire corpus of the Court's first amendment jurisprudence, Justice Frankfurter set forth the following conclusions.]

First. Free-speech cases are not an exception to the principle that we are not legislators, that direct policy-making is not our province. [Second.] A survey of the relevant decisions indicates that the results which we have reached are on the whole those that would ensue from careful weighing of conflicting interests. [Third.] Not every type of speech occupies the same position on the scale of values. [On] any scale of values, [speech advocating the overthrow of the government by force and violence] ranks low. Throughout our decisions there has recurred a distinction between the statement of an idea which may prompt its hearers to take unlawful action, and advocacy that such action be taken....

These general considerations underlie decision of the case before us. On the one hand is the interest in security. [In] determining whether application of the statute to the defendants is within the constitutional powers of Congress, we [must consider] whatever is relevant to a legislative judgment. [We] may take account of evidence brought forward at this trial and elsewhere, much of which has long been common knowledge, [that] would amply justify a legislature in concluding that recruitment of additional members of the Party would create a substantial danger to national security.

On the other hand is the interest in free speech. The right to exert all governmental powers in aid of maintaining our institutions and resisting their physical overthrow does not include intolerance of opinions and speech that cannot do harm although opposed and perhaps alien to dominant, traditional opinion. [Moreover, a] public interest is not wanting in granting freedom to speak their minds even to those who advocate the overthrow of the Government by force. For, as the evidence in this case abundantly illustrates, coupled with such advocacy is criticism of defects in our society. [We must also recognize that suppressing] advocates of overthrow inevitably will also silence critics who do not advocate overthrow but fear that their criticism may be so construed. [It] is self-delusion to think that we can punish [the defendants] for their advocacy without adding to the risks run by loyal citizens who honestly believe in some of the reforms these defendants advance. It is a sobering fact that in sustaining the convictions before us we can hardly escape restriction on the interchange of ideas....

It is not for us to decide how we would adjust the clash of interests which this case presents were the primary responsibility for reconciling it ours. Congress has determined that the danger created by advocacy of overthrow justifies the ensuing restriction on freedom of speech. [To] make validity of legislation depend on judicial reading of events still in the womb of time [is] to charge the judiciary with duties beyond its equipment....

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON, concurring....

I would save [the clear and present danger standard], unmodified, for application as a “rule of reason” in the kind of case for which it was devised. When the issue is criminality of a hot-headed speech on a street corner, or circulation of a few incendiary pamphlets, or parading by some zealots behind a red flag, [it] is not beyond the capacity of the judicial process to gather, comprehend, and weigh the necessary materials for decision whether it is a clear and present danger of substantive evil or a harmless letting off of steam. [But] unless we are to hold our government captive in a judge-made verbal trap, we must approach the problem of a well-organized, nation-wide conspiracy [as] realistically as our predecessors faced the trivialities that were being prosecuted until they were checked with a rule of reason....

The highest degree of constitutional protection is due to the [individual]. But even an individual cannot claim that the Constitution protects him in advocating or teaching overthrow of government by force or violence. [I] think direct incitement by speech or writing can be made a crime, and I think there can be a conviction without also proving that the odds favored its success by 99 to 1, or some other extremely high ratio....

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, dissenting....

[The] other opinions in this case show that the only way to affirm these convictions is to repudiate directly or indirectly the established “clear and present danger” rule. This the Court does in a way which greatly restricts the protections afforded by the First Amendment. The opinions for affirmation indicate that the chief reason for jettisoning the rule is the expressed fear that advocacy of Communist doctrine endangers the safety of the Republic.

Undoubtedly, a governmental policy of unfettered communication of ideas does entail dangers. To the Founders of this Nation, however, the benefits derived from free expression were worth the risk....

Public opinion being what it now is, few will protest the conviction of these Communist petitioners. There is hope, however, that in calmer times, when present pressures, passions and fears subside, this or some later Court will restore the First Amendment liberties to the high preferred place where they belong in a free society.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, dissenting.

If this were a case where those who claimed protection under the First Amendment were teaching the techniques of sabotage, the assassination of the President, the filching of documents from public files, the planting of bombs, the art of street warfare, and the like, I would have no doubts. The freedom to speak is not absolute; the teaching of methods of terror and other seditious conduct should be beyond the pale. [This] case was argued as if those were the facts. [But] the fact is that no such evidence was introduced at the trial....

So far as the present record is concerned, what petitioners did was to organize people to teach and themselves teach the Marxist-Leninist doctrine contained chiefly in four books: Stalin, Foundations of Leninism (1924); Marx and Engels, Manifesto of the Communist Party (1848); Lenin, The State and Revolution (1917); History of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (B.) (1939)....

The opinion of the Court does not outlaw these texts nor condemn them to the fire, as the Communists do literature offensive to their creed. But if the books themselves are not outlawed, if they can lawfully remain on library shelves, by what reasoning does their [use] become a crime? [The] Act, as construed, requires the element of intent—that those who teach the creed believe in it. The crime then depends not on what is taught but on who the teacher is. That is to make freedom of speech turn not on what is said, but on the intent with which it is said. Once we start down that road we enter territory dangerous to the liberties of every citizen....

There comes a time when even speech loses its constitutional immunity. Speech innocuous one year may at another time fan such destructive flames that it must be halted in the interests of the safety of the Republic. That is the meaning of the clear and present danger test. When conditions are so critical that there will be no time to avoid the evil that the speech threatens, it is time to call a halt....

[If] we are to take judicial notice of the threat of Communists within the nation, it should not be difficult to conclude that as a political party they are of little consequence. [Communism] in the world scene is no bogeyman; but Communism as a political faction or party in this country plainly is. Communism has been so thoroughly exposed in this country that it has been crippled as a political force. Free speech has destroyed it as an effective political party....

How it can be said that there is a clear and present danger that this advocacy will succeed is, therefore, a mystery. [In] America, [the Communists] are miserable merchants of unwanted ideas; their wares remain unsold. The fact that their ideas are abhorrent does not make them powerful. [Thus], if we are to proceed on the basis of judicial notice, it is impossible for me to say that the Communists in this country are so potent or so strategically deployed that they must be suppressed for their speech....

Note: Dennis and the Communist “Conspiracy”

1. Clear and present danger: the Holmes/Brandeis formulation. Could the Holmes/Brandeis formulation of clear and present danger sensibly be applied in Dennis? What “substantive evil” must be clear and present? Actual overthrow? Attempted overthrow? Conspiracy to overthrow? Conspiracy to advocate overthrow?

2. Clear and present danger: the Dennis formulation. Note that Judge Learned Hand, the author of Masses, also wrote the opinion for the court of appeals in Dennis. By the time of Dennis, Judge Hand had come to accept that Masses had found “little professional support.” As he put it, he had “bid a long farewell to my little toy ship which set out quite bravely on the shortest voyage ever made.” As a lower court judge “who took seriously his obligation to follow Supreme Court precedents,” Judge Hand did his best to make sense of “an array of rulings on ‘clear and present danger’—a standard he disliked from the outset.” Although upholding the convictions under his reformulated version of the standard, Judge Hand “insisted repeatedly” that the prosecution was “a mistake.” As he wrote a friend shortly after the decision, we “should never have prosecuted those birds....So far as all this will do anything, it will encourage the faithful and maybe help the [Party’s] Committee on Propaganda.” G. Gunther, Learned Hand: The Man and the Judge 600–603 (1994). Was Hand’s opinion in Dennis a betrayal of the position he had staked out in Masses? Note that the Smith Act prohibited only the express advocacy of unlawful conduct. Consider G. Stone, Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime 402 (2004):

In June 1951, [Hand] wrote Frankfurter, “[S]o far as the constitution goes, I cannot see why it should protect any speech which contains ‘aid[ing], abetting, counsel[ing]’ etc., to violate any law.” Six months later he wrote [that] “every society which promulgates a law means that it shall be obeyed until it is changed, and any society which lays down means by which its laws can be changed makes those means exclusive....If [this be] so, how in God’s name can an incitement to do what will be unlawful if done, be itself lawful?” In this sense, then, not only was Learned Hand faithfully following Supreme Court precedents rather than his own inclinations in Dennis, but his own inclinations would have led him to the very same outcome, though for quite different reasons.

Is the Dennis version of clear and present danger “simply the remote bad tendency test dressed up in modern style”? M. Shapiro, Freedom of Speech: The Supreme Court and Judicial Review 65 (1966). In his concurring opinion in Whitney, Justice Brandeis first introduced the “seriousness” element as a means of intensifying the clear and present danger standard. The Dennis formulation, however, uses “gravity” to dilute the standard. Is this dilution unreasonable? If government may restrict speech that creates an immediate 70 percent chance of a relatively modest evil (such as persuading a few persons to refuse induction), shouldn’t it also be permitted to restrict speech that creates a less immediate 30 percent chance of a very serious evil (such as attempted overthrow of government)? See Posner, The Speech Market and the Legacy of Schenck, in L. Bollinger and G. Stone, Eternal Vigilance: Free Speech in the Modern Era 121, 125–126 (2002).

3. Deference. In Gitlow and Whitney the Court held that when a legislature expressly prohibits a certain category of expression, the judiciary must defer to the legislative judgment so long as it is reasonable. Is this the “correct” approach to judicial review? The Court’s present position on the deference issue is set out in Landmark Communications, Inc. v. Virginia, 435 U.S. 829 (1978):

Deference to a legislative finding cannot limit judicial inquiry when First Amendment rights are at stake. “[A legislative declaration] does not preclude enquiry into the question whether, at the time and under the circumstances, the conditions existed which are essential to validity under the Federal Constitution.” [A] legislature appropriately inquiries into and may declare the reasons impelling legislative action but the judicial function commands analysis of whether the specific conduct charged falls within the reach of the statute and if so whether the legislation is consonant with the Constitution. Were it otherwise, the scope of freedom of speech and of the press would be subject to legislative definition and the function of the First Amendment as a check on legislative power would be nullified.

4. The Smith Act in context—other anticommunist activity. As noted earlier, in the post–World War II “cold war” era the federal government launched an intensive campaign against the Communist Party and its adherents that reached far beyond the Smith Act. Consider the following:

a. Because of a fear that communist officers of labor organizations might misuse their influence by calling strikes as a means of disrupting commerce and industry, section 9(h) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 prohibited the enforcement of employee representation rights of any labor union whose officers failed to execute affidavits that they were not members of the Communist Party. See American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382 (1950) (upholding section 9(h)).

b. The Internal Security Act of 1950 created a complex regulatory scheme requiring all “Communist-action organizations” to register with the Attorney General and to disclose a wide range of information, including membership lists. The act also established the Subversive Activities Control Board to administer the scheme and provided that, once a board order to register became final, various sanctions would automatically be imposed on the organization and its members. See Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 367 U.S. 1 (1961) (upholding the registration requirement).

c. Both the state and federal governments created extensive loyalty programs for government employees, and at both the state and federal levels legislative committees were used extensively to investigate communist “infiltration.” See Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959) (upholding a contempt citation of a witness before a congressional investigating committee who refused to answer questions about his past and present membership in the Communist Party); Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigating Committee, 372 U.S. 539 (1963) (invalidating a contempt citation of a witness before a state legislative investigating committee who refused to answer questions about whether certain identified members of the Communist Party were members of the NAACP).

d. There were also efforts during this era to prevent the importation of communist doctrine from abroad. See Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301 (1965) (invalidating restrictions on the mailing of foreign “communist political propaganda”); Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753 (1972) (upholding a law declaring foreign communists ineligible to visit the United States).

e. During this period, the FBI launched a wide-ranging campaign of anticommunist activities, including a program designed extra-legally to “expose, disrupt, and otherwise neutralize” the domestic communist movement. Consider the 1976 findings of a Senate committee:

The Government has often undertaken the secret surveillance of citizens on the basis of their political beliefs, even when those beliefs posed no threat of violence or illegal acts. [The] Government, operating primarily through secret informants, [has] swept in vast amounts of information about the personal lives, views, and associations of American citizens. Investigations of groups deemed potentially dangerous—and even of groups suspected of associating with potentially dangerous organizations—have continued for decades, despite the fact that those groups did not engage in unlawful activity. [FBI] headquarters alone has developed over 500,000 domestic intelligence files. [The] targets of intelligence activity have included political adherents of the right and the left, ranging from activists to casual supporters.

Senate Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities, Final Report, Intelligence Activities and the Rights of Americans, Book II, S. Doc. No. 13133–4, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 5–9 (1976). See also F. Donner, The Age of Surveillance (1980); A. Theoharis, Spying on Americans (1978).

5. Understanding Dennis. Consider Wiecek, The Legal Foundations of Domestic Anticommunism: The Background of Dennis v. United States, 2001 Sup. Ct. Rev. 375, 377–379, 417, 428–429:

The [anticommunist] crusade after World War II [demonized] Communists, endowing them with extraordinary powers and malignity, making them both covert and ubiquitous. [Communists] became The Other. Popular culture, in movies like On the Waterfront [and] Invasion of the Body Snatchers effectively delivered this image to a mass audience. [The] manufactured image of the domestic Communist, cultivated and propagated by J. Edgar Hoover, the Catholic Church, the American Legion, and political opportunists, made of Communists something less than full humans, full [citizens]. [To] resist the ideological and emotional pressures of the Cold War era would have required superhuman wisdom and equanimity. Whatever else might be said of the Justices of the Dennis Court, the majority of them did not have those qualities.

Consider also Wells, Fear and Loathing in Constitutional Decision-Making, 2005 Wis. L. Rev. 115, 117–119:

The [argument] that courts ought to protect civil liberties in times of crisis is an attractive one. [But courts] remain subject to the same passions, fears, and prejudices that sweep the rest of the nation. [Nowhere] is this more evident than in [Dennis]. [The evidence against the defendants] was weak, as there was no proof that they agreed to overthrow or advocate overthrow of the government.... Conventional wisdom roundly condemns Dennis, attributing the result to a Cold War hysteria that gripped the country and infected the judges' reasoning. [Conventional] wisdom, however, provides few answers regarding how to guard against Dennis's failings in the future. We cannot simply assume that judges armed with an understanding of past errors will act courageously. [What] we need, then, is a doctrine that can counteract the effects of fear and prejudice that lead to such action....

Note: The Road to Brandenburg

1. Revising the Dennis approach: advocacy of doctrine versus advocacy of action. Following Dennis, federal authorities initiated Smith Act prosecutions against more than 120 individuals constituting the secondary leadership of the Communist Party. By 1957, the government had secured convictions in almost all of these prosecutions. In Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957), however, the Court, in a six-to-one decision, adopted a narrow interpretation of the Smith Act to avoid constitutional doubts and overturned the convictions of several members of the Communist Party for conspiracy to violate the act. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion:

[We are] faced with the question whether the Smith Act prohibits advocacy [of] forcible overthrow as an abstract principle, divorced from any effort to instigate action to that end, so long as such advocacy [is] engaged in with evil intent. We hold that it does not.

The distinction between advocacy of abstract doctrine and advocacy directed at promoting unlawful action is one that has been consistently recognized in the opinions of this Court, [and] was heavily underscored in [Gitlow]. [We] need not, however, decide the issue before us in terms of constitutional compulsion, for our first duty is to construe this statute. In doing so we should not assume that Congress chose to disregard a constitutional danger zone so clearly marked.

[We reject the proposition] that mere doctrinal justification of forcible overthrow, if engaged in with the intent to accomplish overthrow, is punishable [under] the Smith Act. That sort of advocacy, even though uttered with the hope that it may ultimately lead to violent revolution, is too remote from concrete action to be regarded as the kind of indoctrination preparatory to action which was condemned in Dennis. [The] essential distinction is that those to whom the advocacy is addressed must be urged to do something, now or in the future, rather than merely to believe in something.

Harlan's opinion in Yates was greeted with puzzlement. Nonetheless, "the Justice Department, faced with Yates's insistence upon proof of advocacy to 'do something, now or in the future, rather than merely to believe in something,' soon admitted that 'we cannot satisfy the evidentiary requirements laid down by the Supreme Court' and dismissed" all remaining Smith Act conspiracy cases then pending. R. Lichtman, The Supreme Court and McCarthy Era Repression: One Hundred Decisions 95–96 (2012).

What is the basis of Justice Harlan's distinction between advocacy of action and advocacy of belief? Is it premised on the relative dangerousness of the expression? On the relative "value" of the speech? Consider Gunther, Learned Hand and the Origins of Modern First Amendment Doctrine: Some Fragments of History, 27 Stan. L. Rev. 719, 753 (1975):

Harlan found a way to curtail prosecutions under the Smith Act even though the constitutionality of the Act had been sustained in Dennis. He did it by [reading] the statute in terms of constitutional presuppositions; and he strove to find standards "manageable" by judges and capable of curbing jury discretion. He insisted on strict statutory standards of proof emphasizing the actual speech of the [defendants]. Harlan claimed to be interpreting Dennis. In fact, [Yates] represented doctrinal evolution in a new direction.

2. Understanding Yates. A dominant theme of Justice Harlan's opinion in Yates was that the Court had historically recognized an "essential distinction" between express advocacy of unlawful action on the one hand, and advocacy of "abstract doctrine" or general discussion of policies and ideas on the other. If the Court tests restrictions on express advocacy of unlawful action with the Dennis version of clear and present danger, what standard should it use to test restrictions on general discussion of policies and ideas? In reflecting on Yates, consider the Court's post-Yates decisions in Kingsley Pictures and Bond.

3. Advocacy of immorality. In Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents of New York, 360 U.S. 684 (1959), the Court held unconstitutional a

New York statute prohibiting the issuance of a license to exhibit non-obscene motion pictures that “portray ‘acts of sexual immorality [as] desirable, acceptable, or proper patterns of behavior.’” The state applied the statute to deny a license to the film Lady Chatterley’s Lover because its “theme” was that adultery was “proper behavior.”

The Court observed that the state was attempting “to prevent the exhibition of a motion picture because that picture advocates an idea—that adultery under certain circumstances may be proper behavior. Yet the First Amendment’s basic guarantee is of freedom to advocate ideas. The state, quite simply, has thus struck at the heart of constitutionally protected liberty.” In response to the state’s argument that its “action was justified because the motion picture attractively portrays a relationship which is contrary to [the] legal code of its citizenry,” the Court maintained that the state “misconceives what it is that the Constitution protects.” The first amendment, the Court declared, “protects advocacy of the opinion that adultery may sometimes be proper, no less than advocacy of socialism or the single tax.” Indeed, quoting Justice Brandeis’s opinion in Whitney, the Court explained that “advocacy of conduct proscribed by law is [not] ‘a justification for denying free speech where the advocacy falls short of incitement and there is nothing to indicate that the advocacy would be immediately acted on.’”

4. Support for war resisters. In Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116 (1966), the Court held that the Georgia House of Representatives could not constitutionally refuse to seat Julian Bond, a duly elected representative, because of his statements, and statements to which he subscribed, criticizing the policy of the federal government in Vietnam and the operation of the selective service system. Four days before Bond was scheduled to be sworn in, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), a civil rights organization of which Bond was the communications director, issued a statement declaring its “opposition to United States’ involvement in Viet Nam.” The statement concluded by announcing: “We are in sympathy with, and support, the men in this country who are unwilling to respond to a military draft.”

In a unanimous opinion, the Court observed that “Bond could not have been constitutionally convicted under [the federal statute] which punishes any person who ‘counsels, aids, or abets another to refuse or evade registration.’” The Court explained that, although the SNCC statement expressed sympathy with, and support for, those who refused to respond to a military draft, that statement “alone cannot be interpreted as a call to unlawful refusal to be drafted.” The Court thus concluded that “Bond could not have been convicted for these statements consistently with the First Amendment. [Citing Yates.]”

5. Freedom of association. In Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961), the Court revisited the constitutional status of membership in “subversive” organizations. In Whitney, the Court had concluded that mere “knowing” membership was sufficient to remove constitutional protection. In Scales, however, following up on Yates, the Court maintained that a “blanket prohibition” of knowing membership in organizations “having both legal and illegal aims” might pose “a real danger that legitimate political expression or association would be impaired.” To avoid this danger, the Court interpreted the Smith Act as making membership unlawful only if the individual was an “active” member and not merely a “nominal, passive, inactive or purely technical” member, with knowledge of the organization’s illegal advocacy, and with the “specific intent” to further the organization’s illegal ends. Thus, a member could be punished under the act only if he was an “active” member who specifically intended “to bring about the overthrow of government as speedily as circumstances would permit.”

Brandenburg v. Ohio

395 U.S. 444 (1969)

PER CURIAM.

The appellant, a leader of a Ku Klux Klan group, was convicted under the Ohio Criminal Syndicalism statute of “advocat[ing]...the duty, necessity, or propriety of crime, sabotage, violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing industrial or political reform” and of “voluntarily assembl[ing] with any society, group or assemblage of persons formed to teach or advocate the doctrines of criminal syndicalism.” He was fined $1,000 and sentenced to one to 10 years’ imprisonment....

The record shows that a man, identified at trial as the appellant, telephoned an announcer-reporter on the staff of a Cincinnati television station and invited him to come to a Ku Klux Klan “rally” to be held at a farm in Hamilton County. With the cooperation of the organizers, the reporter and a cameraman attended the meeting and filmed the events. Portions of the films were later broadcast on the local station and on a national network.

The prosecution’s case rested on the films and on testimony identifying the appellant as the person who communicated with the reporter and who spoke at the rally. The State also introduced into evidence several articles appearing in the film, including a pistol, a rifle, a shotgun, ammunition, a Bible, and a red hood worn by the speaker in the films.

One film showed 12 hooded figures, some of whom carried firearms. They were gathered around a large wooden cross, which they burned. No one was present other than the participants and the newsman who made the film. Most of the words uttered during the scene were incomprehensible when the film was projected, but scattered phrases could be understood that were derogatory of Negroes and, in one instance, of Jews. Another scene on the same film showed the appellant, in Klan regalia, making a speech. The speech, in full, was as follows:

This is an organizers' meeting. We have had quite a few members here today which are—we have hundreds, hundreds of members throughout the State of Ohio. I can quote from a newspaper clipping from the Columbus Ohio Dispatch, five weeks ago Sunday morning. The Klan has more members in the State of Ohio than does any other organization. We're not a revengent organization, but if our President, our Congress, our Supreme Court, continues to suppress the white, Caucasian race, it's possible that there might have to be some revengence taken. We are marching on Congress July the Fourth, four hundred thousand strong. From there we are dividing into two groups, one group to march on St. Augustine, Florida, the other group to march into Mississippi. Thank you.

The second film showed six hooded figures one of whom, later identified as the appellant, repeated a speech very similar to that recorded on the first film. The reference to the possibility of "revengence" was omitted, and one sentence was added: "Personally, I believe the nigger should be returned to Africa, the Jew returned to Israel." Though some of the figures in the films carried weapons, the speaker did not.

The Ohio Criminal Syndicalism Statute was enacted in 1919. From 1917 to 1920, identical or quite similar laws were adopted by 20 States and two territories....In 1927, this Court sustained the constitutionality of California's Criminal Syndicalism Act, [the] text of which is quite similar to that of the laws of Ohio. [Whitney.] The Court upheld the statute on the ground that, without more, "advocating violent means to effect political and economic change involves such danger to the security of the State that the State may outlaw it." [But] Whitney has been thoroughly discredited by later decisions. See [Dennis]. These later decisions have fashioned the principle that the constitutional guarantees of free speech and free press do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action.¹ As we [have said], "the mere abstract teaching [of] the moral propriety or even moral necessity for a resort to force and violence, is not the same as preparing a group for violent action and steeling it to such action." See also [Bond]. A statute which fails to draw this distinction impermissibly intrudes upon the freedoms guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. It sweeps within its condemnation speech which our Constitution has immunized from governmental control. Cf. [Yates]....

Measured by this test, Ohio's Criminal Syndicalism Act cannot be sustained. [Neither] the indictment nor the trial judge's instructions to the jury in any way refined the statute's bald definition of the crime in terms of mere advocacy not distinguished from incitement to imminent lawless action.

Accordingly, we are here confronted with a statute which, by its own words and as applied, purports to punish mere advocacy and to forbid, on pain of criminal punishment, assembly with others merely to advocate the described type of action. Such a statute falls within the condemnation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The contrary teaching of [Whitney] cannot be supported, and that decision is therefore overruled.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, concurring.

I agree with the views expressed by Mr. Justice Douglas in his concurring opinion in this case that the "clear and present danger" doctrine should have no place in the interpretation of the First Amendment. I join the Court's opinion, which, as I understand it, simply cites [Dennis] but does not indicate any agreement on the Court's part with the "clear and present danger" doctrine on which Dennis purported to rely.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, concurring....

I see no place in the regime of the First Amendment for any "clear and present danger" test, whether strict and tight as some would make it, or free-wheeling as the Court in Dennis rephrased it. When one reads the opinions closely and sees when and how the "clear and present danger" test has been applied, great misgivings are aroused. First, the threats were often loud but always puny and made serious only by judges so wedded to the status quo that critical analysis made them nervous. Second, the test was so twisted and perverted in Dennis as to make the trial of those teachers of Marxism an all-out political trial which was part and parcel of the cold war that has eroded substantial parts of the First Amendment....

The line between what is permissible and not subject to control and what may be made impermissible and subject to regulation is the line between ideas and overt acts. The example usually given by those who would punish speech is the case of one who falsely shouts fire in a crowded theatre. This is, however, a classic case where speech is brigaded with action. [They] are indeed inseparable and a prosecution can be launched for the overt acts actually caused. Apart from rare instances of that kind, speech is, I think, immune from prosecution....

Note: The Brandenburg Formulation

1. The meaning of Brandenburg. Although the Court maintained that the pre-Brandenburg “decisions [fashioned] the principle” adopted in Brandenburg, Brandenburg seems to have gone far beyond settled law. Indeed, it has been said that the Brandenburg formulation would “have demanded the contrary result in [both] the early Espionage Act cases and the later Communist cases,” J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust 115 (1980), and that Brandenburg combined “the most [speech] protective ingredients of the Masses emphasis with the most useful elements of the clear and present danger heritage” to produce “the most speech-protective standard yet evolved by the Supreme Court.” Gunther, Learned Hand and the Origins of Modern First Amendment Doctrine: Some Fragments of History, 27 Stan. L. Rev. 719, 754, 755 (1975). More specifically, Brandenburg has been interpreted as requiring “three things: (1) express advocacy of law violation; (2) the advocacy must call for immediate law violation; and (3) the immediate law violation must be likely to occur.” Schwartz, Holmes versus Hand: Clear and Present Danger or Advocacy of Unlawful Action?, 1994 Sup. Ct. Rev. 209, 240–241.

Thus interpreted, and particularly when viewed in the light of Yates and Bond, Brandenburg appears by implication to accord absolute protection to the speaker so long as he does not use express words of incitement. If this is so, does Brandenburg suggest that, as a general first amendment principle, expression should be absolutely protected against direct criminal prohibition, regardless of dangerousness and intent, so long as it is not of “low” first amendment value?

2. The lessons of history. Consider Stone, Free Speech in the Twenty-First Century: Ten Lessons from the Twentieth Century, 36 Pepp. L. Rev. 273 (2008):

As a result of its experience in the Schenck-Brandenburg line of decisions, the Court learned three very practical lessons about the workings of “the system of free expression”—lessons that have come to play a critical role in shaping contemporary First Amendment jurisprudence.

First, the Court learned about the chilling effect. That is, the Court learned that people are easily deterred from exercising their freedom of speech. This is so because individual speakers usually gain very little personally from signing a petition, marching in a demonstration, handing out leaflets, or posting on a blog. [Thus,] if they know they might go to jail for speaking, they will often forego their right to speak. This makes perfect sense for each individual. But if many individuals make this same decision, the net effect may be to mutilate the thought process of the community. The Court's gradual recognition of this "chilling effect," and of the consequent power of government to use intimidation to silence its critics, was a critical insight in shaping twentieth-century free speech doctrine.

Second, the Court learned about the pretext effect. That is, the Court learned that government officials will often defend their restrictions of speech on grounds quite different from their real motivations for the suppression, which will often be [to] silence their critics, [insulate] themselves from criticism, and preserve their own authority....

Third, the Court learned about the crisis effect. That is, the Court learned that in times of crisis, real or imagined, citizens and public officials tend to panic [and] to rush headlong to suppress speech that they demonize as dangerous, subversive, disloyal, or treasonable. Painful experience with this "crisis effect," especially during World War I and the Cold War, led the Court to embrace what Professor Vincent Blasi has termed a "pathological perspective" in crafting First Amendment doctrine. That is, the Court attempts to structure First Amendment doctrine to anticipate and to guard against the worst of times.

On the pathological perspective, see Blasi, The Pathological Perspective and the First Amendment, 85 Colum. L. Rev. 449, 449–500 (1985). On cost-benefit analysis and the problem of analyzing low-probability, high-magnitude harms (such as violent revolution), see Masur, Probability Thresholds, 92 Iowa L. Rev. 1293, 1296–1298 (2007).

3. Subsequent decisions. The Court has adhered to Brandenburg. In Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105 (1973), for example, the Court reversed the conviction for disorderly conduct of an individual who shouted, "We'll take the fucking street later [or again]," during an antiwar demonstration. The Court explained that at worst the statement "amounted to nothing more than advocacy of illegal action at some indefinite future time." Since there was no evidence that the "words were intended to produce, and likely to produce, imminent disorder," they could not constitutionally be punished "on the ground that they had a 'tendency to lead to violence.'"

NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886 (1982), involved an NAACP-sponsored boycott of racially discriminatory merchants in Claiborne County, Mississippi. During the course of the boycott, an NAACP official stated in a public speech to several hundred people that “[if] we catch any of you going in any of them racist stores, we’re gonna break your damn neck.” The Court held that this speech was protected by the First Amendment because the “mere advocacy of the use of force or violence does not remove speech from the protection of the First Amendment.” The Court emphasized that “in this case, the acts of violence” that later occurred did not take place until “weeks or months after the speech.” The Court concluded that “when such appeals do not incite [immediate] lawless action, they must be regarded as protected speech,” for “to rule otherwise would ignore the ‘profound national commitment’ that ‘debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open.’”

4. Additional variations. Consider the following:

- a. In Herceg v. Hustler Magazine, Inc., 814 F.2d 1017 (5th Cir. 1987), a fourteen-year-old boy was found hanging in his closet with a copy of Hustler on the floor beneath his feet, opened to an article entitled “Orgasms of Death,” which detailed the procedures for autoerotic asphyxiation. The court invalidated a civil jury verdict against Hustler because Brandenburg was not satisfied.
- b. In Olivia N. v. National Broadcasting Co., 178 Cal. Rptr. 888 (Ct. App. 1981), the court held that, even though the television movie Born Innocent, which described a rape using a “plumber’s helper,” had caused just such a rape of a nine-year-old girl by a group of teenage boys who had just seen Born Innocent shortly before, the rule in Brandenburg immunized NBC because no intent to injure could be shown.
- c. In Rice v. The Paladin Enterprises, 128 F.3d 233 (4th Cir. 1997), a publisher distributed a book, entitled Hit Man, that extolled the lifestyle of contract murderers and offered detailed instructions on how to commit a contract murder. Following these instructions precisely, X killed Y in a contract murder, and Y’s survivors thereafter sued the publisher for damages. The court held that Brandenburg does not control this situation and that the publisher could be held liable because the publisher “had intended...that the publication would be used by criminals to execute the crime of murder for hire.”
- d. Encouraging a suicide. Michelle Carter, a seventeen-year-old girl, sent a barrage of text messages to her boyfriend, eighteen-year-old Conrad Roy, urging him to commit suicide. She wrote him, for example: “If this is the only way you think you’re gonna be happy, heaven will welcome you with open arms. You just need to do it.” And he did. Can Carter constitutionally be convicted of involuntary manslaughter? See Michelle Carter Is Guilty of Manslaughter in Texting Suicide Case, New York Times (June 16, 2017).

- e. Crime-facilitating speech. Note that these cases all involved “crime-facilitating speech.” In what circumstances may the government prohibit such speech? See Volokh, Crime-Facilitating Speech, 57 Stan. L. Rev. 1095, 1105–1106 (2005).

5. From Schenck to Brandenburg, and beyond. Consider Bollinger, Epilogue, in L. Bollinger and G. Stone, Eternal Vigilance: Free Speech in the Modern Era 1, 312–313 (2002):

The question for the future [is] whether the scope of First Amendment rights articulated in the Brandenburg era reflects the distilled wisdom of historical experience, which makes it more likely to survive in future periods of social upheaval, or whether the Brandenburg era will turn out to be just one era among many, in which the freedom of speech varies widely and more or less according to the sense of security and tolerance prevailing in the nation at the time. The fact that the last thirty years since Brandenburg have been remarkably peaceful and prosperous means that the understandings we now have about the meaning of free speech have not really been tested. By the standards we now apply (that is, through the eyes of Brandenburg), just about every time the country has felt seriously threatened the First Amendment has retreated.

6. Terrorism online.

a. Consider C. Sunstein, #republic 236–251 (2017):

Terrorists and hate groups have long been communicating online, sometimes about conspiracies [and] formulas for making bombs. Members of such groups tend to communicate largely or mostly with one another, feeding various predilections. [According] to the FBI “[social] media is a critical tool for terror groups to exploit. [The] foreign terrorist now has direct access into the United States like never before.” [Terrorists’] uses of the Internet and social media for recruitment, inspiration, and radicalization have put increasing pressure on [governments] to disrupt their online activities. [Other] democratic countries have enacted legislation to control access to online content that promotes terrorism. Under French law, for example, the government can block Internet sites that incite terrorist attacks or publicly glorify them....

There is no question that terrorist uses of social media will continue to adapt and evolve, and that it will endanger human lives. [Frequently] what is involved is meeting dangerous speech with counterspeech, correcting the record or putting people on new paths. When the government uses counterspeech, it creates no constitutional issue. But the intensifying international focus on terrorism, and al-Qaeda and ISIL in particular, poses a fresh challenge to the greatest American contribution to the theory and practice of free speech: the clear and present danger test. [It] is at least worth asking whether that test may be ripe for reconsideration....

One of the greatest and most influential judges in US history, with the unlikely name of Learned Hand, rejected the clear and present danger test [because] he believed that the free speech principle simply did not protect explicit or direct incitement to violence, even if no harm was imminent. [For] decades, the Supreme Court has shown zero interest in Hand's formula. [Brandeis] offered the best reason: "Only an emergency can justify repression." It is an appealing thought, and it is usually right. But is it convincing as applied to the recruitment and propaganda efforts of terrorist organizations? [In] free societies, it is almost always wrong to punish speech. But at the very least, the argument for the clear and present danger test is not quite as clear as it once was —and it might not be so well suited to the present.

b. Consider T. Ash, Free Speech: Ten Principles for a Connected World 133–34 (2016):

The American scholar Cass Sunstein was among the first to suggest that in practice the internet can contribute to what he calls group polarization. Far from being confronted with a diversity of viewpoints, as in an ideal liberal public sphere, people seek out and commune online with a like-minded minority. Jihadists read only jihadi websites, which link to each other; far-right extremists listen only to far-right extremists, atheists to atheists, flat-earthers to flat-earthers. [Unlike] in the physical world, the internet makes it easy for the conspiracy theorist to find the 957 other people across the planet who share his or her particular poisoned fantasy.

[This problem] clearly affects the analysis of speech and violence. Thus, for example, the Norwegian mass murderer Anders Behring Breivik was reinforced in his paranoid views by obsessive reading of anti-Islamic [websites], from which he quoted in his online "crusader" manifesto. Does that mean that such sites should be blocked and their content censored? Surely not. The yardstick for what speech is allowed [cannot] be its potential impact on a single unbalanced mind anywhere in the world.

7. Material support. A federal statute declares it unlawful for any person knowingly to provide "material support" to a designated foreign terrorist organization. "Material support" includes, among other things, "training, expert advice or assistance." Plaintiffs wanted to train two designated foreign terrorist organizations, which engaged in political and humanitarian as well as violent terrorist activities, how to use international law to resolve disputes peacefully and to engage in political advocacy on behalf of these organizations and their causes. Plaintiffs asserted that the statute violates the first amendment because it does not require the government to prove that, in assisting these organizations, they specifically intended to further the organizations' unlawful activities. Plaintiffs relied on Scales, in which the Court held that an individual could not constitutionally be punished for being a "knowing" member of the Communist Party, which had "both legal and illegal aims," unless the government proved that he specifically intended to promote the Party's illegal aims (that is, in the context of Scales, "to bring about the overthrow of government as speedily as circumstances would permit").

In Holder v. Humanitarian Law Project, 561 U.S. 1 (2010), the Court, in a six-to-three decision, upheld the material support provision. Writing for the Court, Chief Justice Roberts distinguished Scales on the ground that it dealt with mere membership, rather than with the provision of "material support." Roberts observed that "[e]veryone agrees that the Government's interest in combating terrorism is an urgent objective of the highest order." The plaintiffs maintained, however, that their speech was intended to "advance only the legitimate activities of the designated terrorist organizations, not their terrorism." Roberts responded that Congress had made specific findings that "any form of material support furnished 'to' a foreign terrorist organization" will have "harmful effects," regardless of the intent of the speaker. For example, such "support frees up other resources within the organization that may be put to violent ends" and "helps lend legitimacy to foreign terrorist groups—legitimacy that makes it easier for those groups to persist, to recruit members, and to raise funds—all of which facilitate more terrorist attacks."

Roberts insisted that the conclusions of Congress and the Executive about the dangers of such support were "entitled to deference" because the statute "implicates sensitive and weighty interests of national security and foreign affairs." Although "we do not defer to the Government's reading of the First Amendment, even when such interests are at stake," it is also the case that in these circumstances "conclusions must often be based on informed judgment rather than concrete evidence, and that reality affects what we may reasonably insist on from the Government" in terms of proof of danger. "Given the sensitive interests in national security and foreign affairs at stake, the political branches have adequately substantiated their determination that, to serve the Government's interest in preventing terrorism, it was necessary to prohibit providing material support in the form of training [and] expert advice [to] foreign terrorist groups, even if the supporters meant to promote only the groups' nonviolent ends."

Finally, Roberts made clear that "we in no way suggest that a regulation of independent speech would pass constitutional muster, even if the Government were to show that such speech benefits foreign terrorist organizations," and we "do not suggest that Congress could extend the same prohibition on material support [to] domestic organizations."

Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Ginsburg and Sotomayor, dissented: "'Coordination' with a group that engages in unlawful activity [does] not deprive the plaintiffs of the First Amendment's [protection]. [The] First Amendment protects advocacy of even unlawful action so long as that advocacy is not 'directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and...likely to incite or produce such action.' [Quoting Brandenburg.] Here the plaintiffs seek to advocate peaceful, lawful action to secure political ends; and they seek to teach others how to do the same...."

"[W]here, as here, a statute applies criminal penalties [for such speech], I should think we would scrutinize the statute and justifications 'strictly'—to determine whether the prohibition is justified by a 'compelling' need that cannot be 'less restrictively' accommodated. [I] doubt that the statute [can] survive any reasonably applicable First Amendment standard. [I] would read the statute as criminalizing First-Amendment protected pure speech [only] when the defendant knows or intends that those activities will assist the organization's unlawful terrorist actions. Under this reading, the Government would have to show, at a minimum, that such defendants provided support that they knew was significantly likely to help the organization pursue its unlawful terrorist aims."

Under the Court's approach, could a lawyer be convicted for filing a brief on behalf of an alleged terrorist asserting that his constitutional rights had been violated? See Tarkington, A First Amendment Theory for Protecting Attorney Speech, 45 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 27 (2011); Cole, The First Amendment's Borders: The Place of Holder v. Humanitarian Law Project in First Amendment Doctrine, 6 Harv. L. & Pol. Rev. 147, 149 (2012).

Note: Abridgment of Speech Other Than by Direct Criminal Prohibition

1. Disclosure. Up to now, we have focused on direct criminal prohibitions of speech or association. But there are other forms of regulation that may "abridge" the freedom of expression. In some circumstances, for example, government may "chill" the exercise of free expression merely by disclosing it. This is especially likely where the individual's speech or association is unpopular. Should such an "indirect" abridgment of speech trigger the same standards of constitutional review as direct criminal prohibition? Consider the following decisions:

- a. In Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959), an instructor at Vassar College was subpoenaed to appear as a witness before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Un-American Activities during an inquiry into alleged communist infiltration into the field of education. He was held in contempt of Congress for refusing to answer questions about his past and present membership in the Communist Party. The Court, in a five-to-four decision, held that this did not violate the first amendment.
- b. In Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigating Committee, 372 U.S. 539 (1963), the Florida legislature created a committee to investigate the infiltration of communists into various organizations. Gibson, who was president of the Miami branch of the NAACP, was adjudged in contempt for refusing to disclose whether fourteen individuals previously identified as communists were members of the NAACP. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Goldberg, distinguished Barenblatt and held that Gibson's conviction violated the first amendment:

In Barenblatt, [it] was a refusal to answer [questions] concerning [membership] in the Communist Party which supported [the] conviction. [Here, however,] the entire thrust of the demands on the petitioner was that he disclose whether [certain] persons were members of the NAACP, itself a concededly legitimate and nonsubversive organization. [Such organizations do not] automatically forfeit their rights to privacy of association simply because the general subject matter of the legislative inquiry is Communist subversion or infiltration. [The] record in this case is insufficient to show a substantial connection between the Miami branch of the NAACP and Communist activities which [is] an essential prerequisite to demonstrating the immediate, substantial, and subordinating state interest necessary to sustain [the committee's] right of inquiry into the membership lists of the association.

After Brandenburg and Scales, what showing must the government make before "infiltrating" an allegedly organization with informers? Can the government investigate an organization because its advocacy raises concerns about possible future violence even if its speech does not meet the requirements of Brandenburg? See Rosenthal, First Amendment Investigations and the Inescapable Pragmatism of the Common Law of Free Speech, 86 Ind. L.J. 1 (2011).

2. Public employees. Does firing a public employee for her speech pose the same constitutional issue as criminally punishing a citizen for her speech?

Suppose the government refuses to hire an applicant for a position with the police department because she was once a member of an organization that advocates terrorism as a means of political change. Do Brandenburg and Scales govern these situations? Consider the following views:

a. McAuliffe v. Mayor of New Bedford, 155 Mass. 216, 29 N.E. 517 (1892) (in which Justice Holmes, speaking for the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, upheld a rule prohibiting police officers to “solicit money [for] any political purpose whatever”):

The petitioner may have a constitutional right to talk politics, but he has no constitutional right to be a policeman. There are few employments for hire in which the servant does not agree to suspend his constitutional rights of free speech, as well as of idleness, by the implied terms of his contract. The servant cannot complain, as he takes the employment on the terms which are offered him.

b. Frost & Frost Trucking Co. v. Railroad Commission, 271 U.S. 583, 593–594 (1926):

It would be a palpable incongruity to strike down an act of state legislation which [strips] the citizen of rights guaranteed by the federal Constitution, but to uphold an act by which the same result is accomplished under the guise of a surrender of a right in exchange for a valuable privilege which the State threatens otherwise to withhold. [It] is inconceivable that guarantees embedded in the Constitution [may] thus be manipulated out of existence.

The Court has generally followed Frost rather than McAuliffe. In Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597 (1972), for example, the Court announced that, “even though a person has no ‘right’ to a valuable government benefit and even though the government may deny him the benefit for any number of reasons, [it may not do so] on a basis that infringes his constitutionally protected interests—especially, his interest in freedom of speech.”

Does the rejection of McAuliffe suggest that the first amendment rights of government employees are coextensive with those of private individuals? Consider Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563, 568 (1968):

[The] State has interests as an employer in regulating the speech of its employees that differ significantly from those it possesses in [regulating] the speech of the citizenry in general. The problem in any case is to arrive at a balance between the interests of the [employee], as a citizen, in commenting upon matters of public concern, and the interests of the State, as an employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public services it performs through its employees.

3. Subversive advocacy and the rights of public employees. At the height of the post–World War II communist scare, more than one-sixth of the total civilian labor force was subject to some sort of loyalty qualification, and the federal government and most of the states excluded from many areas of public employment individuals who had been members of a “subversive” organization. What interests are served by the government’s refusal to employ such individuals? Consider Israel, Elfbrandt v. Russell: The Demise of the Oath?, 1966 Sup. Ct. Rev. 193, 219:

[At] least three different state interests are commonly advanced to justify disqualification of individuals from public employment on the basis of membership in organizations advocating the violent overthrow of government: (1) The elimination of persons who present a potential for sabotage, espionage, or other activities directly injurious to national security. (2) The elimination of persons who are likely to be either incompetent or untrustworthy in the performance of their duties. (3) The elimination of persons who, aside from any question of danger or fitness, simply are not considered deserving of a government position because they oppose the basic principles on which the government is founded.

In what circumstances are these interests sufficient to justify a restriction on the subversive advocacy or associations of public employees?

4. A first answer. In Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 485 (1952), the Court upheld a New York law providing that no person who becomes a member of any organization that advocates the violent overthrow of government, with knowledge of the organization’s proscribed advocacy, “shall be appointed to any [position] in a public school”:

A teacher works in a sensitive area in a schoolroom. There he shapes the attitude of young minds towards the society in which they live. [That] the school authorities have the right and the duty to screen [teachers] as to their fitness to maintain the integrity of the schools [cannot] be doubted. One’s associates, past and present, as well as one’s conduct, may properly be considered in determining [fitness]. If, under [the] New York law, a person is found to be unfit and is disqualified from employment in the public school system because of membership in a [subversive] organization, he is not thereby denied the right of free speech and assembly. His freedom of choice between membership in the organization and employment in the school system might be limited, but [such] limitation is not one the State may not make in the exercise of its police power to protect the schools from pollution and thereby to defend its own existence.

5. A second answer. In Elfbrandt v. Russell, 384 U.S. 11 (1966), the Court invalidated an Arizona statute requiring all state employees to take an oath that they are not “knowingly” a member of the Communist Party or of “any other organization” having for “one of its purposes” the overthrow of the government of Arizona:

We recognized in Scales that [a] “blanket prohibition of association with a group having both legal and illegal aims” would pose “a real danger that legitimate political expression or association would be impaired.” [Those] who join an organization but do not share its unlawful purposes and who do not participate in its unlawful activities surely pose no threat, either as citizens or as public employees. [A] law which applies to membership without the “specific intent” to further the illegal aims of the organization infringes unnecessarily on protected freedoms. It rests on the doctrine of “guilt by association” which has no place here. [Such] a law cannot stand.

Is Elfbrandt’s extension of Scales to the public employment context warranted? Does Elfbrandt suggest that the government may not refuse to employ an individual because of her advocacy or associations unless such advocacy or associations could constitutionally be declared unlawful?

6. The reach of Elfbrandt: Robel. In United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258 (1967), appellee, a member of the Communist Party who had worked at a shipyard for ten years “without incident,” was charged with violating section 5(a)(1)(D) of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, which prohibited any “knowing” member of a communist-action organization “to engage in any employment in any defense facility.” The Court held that section 5(a)(1)(D) was an “unconstitutional abridgment of the right of association protected by the First Amendment”:

The Government [emphasizes] that the purpose of §5(a)(1)(D) is to reduce the threat of sabotage and espionage in the Nation’s defense plants. The Government’s interest in such a prophylactic measure is not insubstantial. But

[the] means chosen to implement that governmental purpose in this instance cut deeply into the right of association. Section 5(a)(1)(D) [casts] its net across a broad range of associational activities, indiscriminately trapping membership which can be constitutionally punished [see Scales] and membership which cannot be so proscribed. [See Elfbrandt.] It is made irrelevant to the statute's operation that an individual may be a passive or inactive [member], that he may be unaware of the organization's unlawful aims, or that he may disagree with those unlawful aims. It is also made irrelevant that [the individual] may occupy a nonsensitive position in a defense facility. Thus, §5(a)(1)(D) contains the fatal defect of overbreadth because it seeks to bar employment both for association which may be proscribed and for association which may not be proscribed. [This] the Constitution will not tolerate.

After Robel, in what circumstances, if any, may the government refuse to employ an individual in a defense facility because of that individual's membership in a "terrorist" organization, where the individual's membership does not meet the requirements of Scales?

7. Brandenburg and public employees. Suppose a public school teacher publicly advocates the use of cocaine. Can she be fired even though such advocacy would not meet the requirements of Brandenburg? Does it matter whether the expression occurs on school premises? During class? Can a public school require a public school teacher to answer whether she has ever been a member of an organization that supports terrorism? For a comparative perspective, see Attis v. Board of School Trustees, 35 C.R.R.2d 1 (1996) (Canadian court upholding a rule prohibiting a public school teacher from making anti-Semitic statements and distributing anti-Semitic materials even during off-duty hours).

8. The first amendment rights of students. May a public university deny official recognition to a student group because it advocates the use of violence to effect change? Consider Healy v. James, 408 U.S. 169 (1972):

[In] 1969–70, [a] climate of unrest prevailed on many college campuses in this country. There had been widespread civil disobedience on some college campuses, accompanied by the seizure of buildings, vandalism, and arson. Some colleges had been shut down altogether, while at others files were looted and manuscripts destroyed. SDS chapters on some of those campuses had been a catalytic force during this period....

[The College argues that its denial of recognition to SDS was justified because SDS adheres to] a philosophy of violence and disruption. [But as] repugnant as these views may [be], the mere expression of them would not justify the denial of First Amendment rights. Whether petitioners did in fact advocate a philosophy of “destruction” thus becomes immaterial. The College, acting here as the instrumentality of the State, may not restrict speech or association simply because it finds the views expressed by any group to be abhorrent. [The] critical line [is] the line between mere advocacy and advocacy “directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and...likely to incite or produce such action.” [Brandenburg.]

See also Papish v. Board of Curators of the University of Missouri, 410 U.S. 667 (1973) (a state university may not expel a student for distributing on campus a newspaper containing a political cartoon depicting policemen raping the Statue of Liberty); Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969) (a public school may not discipline students for wearing black armbands to school to publicize their objections to the war in Vietnam in the absence of a showing that the “forbidden conduct would ‘materially and substantially interfere with the requirements of appropriate discipline in the operation of the school’”).

On the other hand, in Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393 (2007) the Court upheld the suspension of a high school student for displaying at a school-sponsored event a fourteen-foot long banner bearing the phrase “BONG Hits 4 JESUS,” on the theory that Tinker does not apply when a student’s speech does not contribute to political debate and “can reasonably be regarded as encouraging illegal drug use.”

9. The first amendment rights of soldiers. Does a soldier have a constitutional right to attempt to persuade other soldiers not to obey orders? Should Brandenburg govern? Consider Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733 (1974), in which a captain in the army told enlisted personnel that “[the] United States is wrong in being involved in the Viet Nam War. I would refuse to go to Viet Nam if ordered to do so. I don’t see why any colored soldier would go to Viet Nam; they should refuse to go [and] if sent should refuse to fight because they are discriminated against [in] the United States, and they are sacrificed and discriminated against in Viet Nam by being given all the hazardous duty.” As a consequence of such statements, appellee was court-martialed for “conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman.” The Court, in a five-to-three decision, upheld the conviction:

[The] military is, by necessity, a specialized society separate from civilian society. [It has] developed laws and traditions of its [own]. “An army is not a deliberative body. [No] question can be left open as to the right to command in the officer, or the duty of obedience in the soldier.” [While] members of the military are not excluded from the protection granted by the First Amendment, the different character of the military community and of the military mission requires a different application of those protections. The fundamental necessity for obedience [may] render permissible within the military that which would be constitutionally impermissible outside it. [Appellee’s] conduct, that of a commissioned officer publicly urging enlisted personnel to refuse to obey orders which might send them into combat, was unprotected under the most expansive notions of the First Amendment.

10. The first amendment rights of government licensees. To what extent can the government constitutionally regulate the speech of doctors, lawyers, psychologists, and other licensed professionals? In what circumstances, for example, can the government discipline a doctor for recommending sexual-orientation conversion therapy to gay patients? In what circumstances can the government compel a doctor to counsel her patients against abortion? For discussion of these issues, see Haupt, Professional Speech, 125 Yale L.J. 1238 (2016); Zick, Professional Rights Speech, 47 Ariz. St. L.J. 1289 (2015).

2. Speech That Provokes a Hostile Audience Reaction

This section examines the circumstances, if any, in which government may restrict speech because the ideas expressed might provoke a hostile audience response. To what extent does the first amendment protect the speaker whose expression provokes a “breach of the peace”? Must society tolerate speech that leads to fistfights, riots, or even mob violence? Is there a danger that, in attempting to maintain order, we may invite a “heckler’s veto”?

TERMINIELLO v. CHICAGO, 337 U.S. 1 (1949). Terminiello was convicted of disorderly conduct based on a speech he delivered under the following circumstances: “The auditorium was filled to capacity with over eight hundred persons present. [Outside] a crowd of about one thousand persons gathered to protest against the meeting. A cordon of policemen was assigned to maintain order; but they were not able to prevent several disturbances. The crowd outside was angry and turbulent.” Members of the crowd threw stink bombs and broke windows. Terminiello goaded his opponents, referring to them as “slimy scum,” “snakes,” and “bedbugs.” In his condemnation of various political and racial groups, Terminiello “followed, with fidelity that [was] more than coincidental, the pattern of European fascist leaders.” The Court found it unnecessary to decide the case on its facts. At Terminiello's trial, the jury was instructed that it could convict if it found that his speech included expression that "stirs the public to anger, invites dispute, brings about a condition of unrest, or creates a disturbance." The Court held that this instruction violated the first amendment:

A function of free speech under our system of government is to invite dispute. It may indeed best serve its high purpose when it induces a condition of unrest, creates dissatisfaction with conditions as they are, or even stirs people to anger. [That] is why freedom of speech, though not absolute, [is] nevertheless protected against censorship or punishment, unless shown likely to produce a clear and present danger of a serious substantive evil that rises far above public inconvenience, annoyance, or unrest.

Terminiello stands for the proposition that speech may not be restricted because the ideas expressed offend the audience. Is that defensible? Because there is no clear and present danger? Because the harm is too insubstantial? Because the justification for suppression is fundamentally at odds with basic first amendment principles? Are no ideas sufficiently offensive to justify suppression on this basis?

Cantwell v. Connecticut

310 U.S. 296 (1940)

MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

[In an effort to proselytize and solicit contributions, Jesse Cantwell, a Jehovah's Witness, played a phonograph record that sharply attacked the Roman Catholic religion to persons he encountered on the street. As a result of these activities, Cantwell was charged with inciting a breach of the peace.]

...When clear and present danger of riot, disorder, interference with traffic upon the public streets, or other immediate threat to public safety, peace, or order, appears, the power of the State to prevent or punish is obvious. Equally obvious is it that a State may not unduly suppress free communication of views, religious or other, under the guise of conserving desirable conditions....

Having these considerations in mind, we note that Jesse Cantwell, on April 26, 1938, was upon a public street, where he had a right to be, and where he had a right peacefully to impart his views to others. There is no showing that his deportment was noisy, truculent, overbearing or offensive. He requested of two pedestrians permission to play to them a phonograph record. The permission was granted. It is not claimed that he intended to insult or affront the hearers by playing the record. It is plain that he wished only to interest them in his propaganda. The sound of the phonograph is not shown to have disturbed residents of the street, to have drawn a crowd, or to have impeded traffic. Thus far he had invaded no right or interest of the public or of the men accosted.

The record [embodies] a general attack on all organized religious systems as instruments of Satan and injurious to man; it then singles out the Roman Catholic Church for strictures couched in terms which naturally would offend not only persons of that persuasion, but all others who respect the honestly held religious faith of their fellows. The hearers were in fact highly offended. One of them said he felt like hitting Cantwell and the other that he was tempted to throw Cantwell off the street. The one who testified he felt like hitting Cantwell said, in answer to the question "Did you do anything else or have any other reaction?" "No, sir, because he said he would take the victrola and he went." ...

Cantwell's conduct, in the view of the court below, considered apart from the effect of his communication upon his hearers, did not amount to a breach of the peace. One may, however, be guilty of the offense if he commit acts or make statements likely to provoke violence and disturbance of good order, even though no such eventuality be intended. Decisions to this effect are many, but examination discloses that, in practically all, the provocative language which was held to amount to a breach of the peace consisted of profane, indecent, or abusive remarks directed to the person of the hearer.

We find in the instant case no assault or threatening of bodily harm, no truculent bearing, no intentional courtesy, no personal abuse. On the contrary, we find only an effort to persuade a willing listener to buy a book or to contribute money in the interest of what Cantwell, however misguided others may think him, conceived to be true religion.

In the realm of religious faith, and in that of political belief, sharp differences arise. In both fields the tenets of one man may seem the rankest error to his neighbor. To persuade others to his own point of view, the pleader, as we know, at times, resorts to exaggeration, to vilification of men who have been, or are, prominent in church or state, and even to false statement. But the people of this nation have ordained in the light of history, that, in spite of the probability of excesses and abuses, these liberties are, in the long view, essential to enlightened opinion and right conduct on the part of the citizens of a democracy....

Although the contents of the record not unnaturally aroused animosity, we think that, in the absence of a statute narrowly drawn to define and punish specific conduct as constituting a clear and present danger to a substantial interest of the State, the petitioner's communication, considered in the light of the constitutional guarantees, raised no such clear and present menace to public peace and order as to render him liable to conviction of the common law offense in question....

Reversed.

Feiner v. New York

340 U.S. 315 (1951)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE VINSON delivered the opinion of the Court.

Petitioner was convicted of the offense of disorderly conduct....

On the evening of March 8, 1949, petitioner [was] addressing [a street-corner] meeting [in] the City of Syracuse. [The] police received a telephone complaint concerning the meeting, and two officers were detailed to investigate. [They] found a crowd of about seventy-five or eighty people, both Negro and white, filling the sidewalk and spreading out into the street. Petitioner, standing on a large wooden box on the sidewalk, was addressing the crowd through a loud-speaker system attached to an automobile. Although the purpose of his speech was to urge his listeners to attend a meeting to be held that night in the Syracuse Hotel, in its course he was making derogatory remarks concerning President Truman, the American Legion, the Mayor of Syracuse, and other local political officials. [Feiner referred to Truman as a "bum," to the mayor as a "champagne-sipping bum" who "does not speak for the Negro people," and to the American Legion as "a Nazi Gestapo."]

The police officers made no effort to interfere with petitioner's speech, but were first concerned with the effect of the crowd on both pedestrian and vehicular traffic. [The] crowd was restless and there was some pushing, shoving and milling around....

At this time, petitioner was speaking in a "loud, high-pitched voice." He gave the impression that he was endeavoring to arouse the Negro people against the whites, urging that they rise up in arms and fight for equal rights. The statements before such a mixed audience "stirred up a little excitement." Some of the onlookers made remarks to the police about their inability to handle the crowd and at least one threatened violence if the police did not act. There were others who appeared to be favoring petitioner's arguments. Because of the feeling that existed in the crowd both for and against the speaker, the officers finally "stepped in to prevent it from resulting in a fight." One of the officers approached the petitioner, not for the purpose of arresting him, but to get him to break up the crowd. He asked petitioner to get down off the box, but the latter refused to accede to his request and continued talking. The officer waited for a minute and then demanded that he cease talking. Although the officer had thus twice requested petitioner to stop over the course of several minutes, petitioner not only ignored him but continued talking. During all this time, the crowd was pressing closer around petitioner and the officer. Finally, the officer told petitioner he was under arrest and ordered him to get down from the box, reaching up to grab him. Petitioner stepped down, announcing over the microphone that "the law has arrived, and I suppose they will take over now." In all, the officer had asked petitioner to get down off the box three times over a space of four or five minutes. Petitioner had been speaking for over a half hour.

On these facts, petitioner was specifically charged with violation of §722 of the Penal Law of New York, the pertinent part of which is set out in the margin.¹

We are not faced here with blind condonation by a state court of arbitrary police action. [The] courts below recognized petitioner's right to hold a street meeting at this locality, to make use of loud-speaking equipment in giving his speech, and to make derogatory remarks concerning public officials and the American Legion. They found that the officers in making the arrest were motivated solely by a proper concern for the preservation of order and protection of the general welfare, and that there was no evidence which could lend color to a claim that the acts of the police were a cover for suppression of petitioner's views and opinions. Petitioner was thus neither arrested nor convicted for the making or the content of his speech. Rather, it was the reaction which it actually engendered.

The language of [Cantwell] is appropriate here. "...When clear and present danger of riot, disorder, interference with traffic upon the public streets, or other immediate threat to public safety, peace, or order, appears, the power of the State to prevent or punish is obvious."...

We are well aware that the ordinary murmurings and objections of a hostile audience cannot be allowed to silence a speaker, and also mindful of the possible danger of giving overzealous police officials complete discretion to break up otherwise lawful public meetings. [But] we are not faced here with such a situation. It is one thing to say that the police cannot be used as an instrument for the suppression of unpopular views, and another to say that, when as here the speaker passes the bounds of argument or persuasion and undertakes incitement to riot, they are powerless to prevent a breach of the peace....

Affirmed.

[A concurring opinion of Justice Frankfurter and a dissenting opinion of Justice Douglas, in which Justice Minton concurred, are omitted.]

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, dissenting.

The record before us convinces me that petitioner, a young college student, has been sentenced to the penitentiary for the unpopular views he expressed on matters of public interest while lawfully making a street-corner speech....

The Court's opinion apparently rests on this reasoning: The policeman, under the circumstances detailed, could reasonably conclude that serious fighting or even riot was imminent; therefore he could stop petitioner's speech to prevent a breach of peace; accordingly, it was "disorderly conduct" for petitioner to continue speaking in disobedience of the officer's request. As to the existence of a dangerous situation on the street corner, it seems far-fetched to suggest that the "facts" show any imminent threat of riot or uncontrollable disorder. It is neither unusual nor unexpected that some people at public street meetings mutter, mill about, push, shove, or disagree, even violently, with the speaker. Indeed, it is rare where controversial topics are discussed that an outdoor crowd does not do some or all of these things. Nor does one isolated threat to assault the speaker forebode disorder. Especially should the danger be discounted where, as here, the person threatening was a man whose wife and two small children accompanied him and who, so far as the record shows, was never close enough to petitioner to carry out the threat.

Moreover, assuming that the "facts" did indicate a critical situation, I reject the implication of the Court's opinion that the police had no obligation to protect petitioner's constitutional right to talk. The police of course have power to prevent breaches of the peace. But if, in the name of preserving order, they ever can interfere with a lawful public speaker, they first must make all reasonable efforts to protect him. Here the policeman did not even pretend to try to protect petitioner. According to the officers' testimony, the crowd was restless but there is no showing of any attempt to quiet it; pedestrians were forced to walk into the street, but there was no effort to clear a path on the sidewalk; one person threatened to assault petitioner but the officers did nothing to discourage this when even a word might have sufficed. Their duty was to protect petitioner's right to talk, even to the extent of arresting the man who threatened to interfere. Instead, they shirked that duty and acted only to suppress the right to speak.

Finally, I cannot agree with the Court's statement that petitioner's disregard of the policeman's unexplained request amounted to such "deliberate defiance" as would justify an arrest or conviction for disorderly conduct. On the contrary, I think that the policeman's action was a "deliberate defiance" of ordinary official duty as well as of the constitutional right of free speech. For at least where time allows, courtesy and explanation of commands are basic elements of good official conduct in a democratic society. Here petitioner was "asked" then "told"

then “commanded” to stop speaking, but a man making a lawful address is certainly not required to be silent merely because an officer directs it. Petitioner was entitled to know why he should cease doing a lawful act. Not once was he told. I understand that people in authoritarian countries must obey arbitrary orders. I had hoped that there was no such duty in the United States....

Note: The Search for Mechanisms of Control

1. Incitement to riot. Is Feiner consistent with Cantwell? Because Feiner triggered a clear and present danger? Because he passed “the bounds of argument or persuasion” and undertook “incitement to riot”? In what sense did Feiner “incite to riot”? Does “incitement” mean the same thing here as in the subversive advocacy context?

2. Police orders. Note that Feiner, unlike Cantwell, disobeyed a specific police order to stop speaking. What is the appropriate role of the police? Does the first amendment require the police to arrest the hostile members of the audience rather than to stop the speaker? Suppose the officers on the scene need support. Must they call in additional officers rather than stop the speaker? May an individual who is prosecuted for refusing to obey a police order to stop speaking assert the unconstitutionality of the order in his defense?

3. Licensing. Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290 (1951), decided on the same day as Feiner, concerned the constitutionality of a city ordinance declaring it unlawful to hold public worship meetings on the streets without first obtaining a permit from the police commissioner. Kunz, an ordained Baptist minister, was issued a permit in 1946, but the permit was revoked after a hearing at which it was determined that Kunz had ridiculed and denounced other religious beliefs in such a way as to cause disorder. Thereafter, the city denied Kunz’s permit applications, and in 1948 he was convicted for holding a meeting without a permit in violation of the ordinance. The Court did not decide whether a permit could constitutionally be denied on the ground that the speaker had previously caused disorder, holding instead that the permit scheme was invalid on its face because it failed to provide clear standards to guide the discretion of the official charged with administering the scheme. On standardless licensing, see section C2 infra.

4. Permit fees and the hostile audience. In Forsyth County, Georgia v. The Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123 (1992), the Court invalidated a municipal ordinance that authorized permit fees for parades, demonstrations, marches, and similar activities, up to a maximum of $1,000, based in part on the anticipated expense necessary to maintain the public order. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Blackmun, explained:

The county envisions that the administrator [will] assess a fee to cover “the cost of necessary and reasonable protection of persons participating or observing [said] activity.” [To perform this function, the administrator] “must necessarily examine the content of the message that is conveyed,” [estimate] the response of others to that content, and judge the number of police necessary to meet that response. The fee assessed will depend on the administrator’s measure of the amount of hostility likely to be created by the speech based on its content. Those wishing to express views unpopular with bottle throwers, for example, may have to pay more for their permit. [Speech] cannot be financially burdened, any more than it can be punished or banned, simply because it might offend a hostile mob. “[Regulations] which permit the Government to discriminate on the basis of the content of the message cannot be tolerated under the First Amendment.” [The county] contends that the $1,000 cap on the fee [saves] its constitutionality. [But neither] the $1,000 cap [nor] even some lower nominal cap [could] save the ordinance because in this context the level of the fee is irrelevant. A tax based on the content of speech does not become more constitutional because it is a small tax.

5. A “far cry” from Feiner. In Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (1963), petitioners, 187 black high school and college students, walked to the South Carolina State House grounds, an area open to the general public, to protest discrimination. About thirty law enforcement officers, who had advance knowledge of the demonstration, were present. Petitioners walked in an orderly manner through the grounds carrying placards bearing such messages as “I am proud to be a Negro” and “Down with segregation.” A crowd of about two hundred to three hundred onlookers gathered; although some were identified as “possible trouble makers,” there were no threatening remarks, hostile gestures, or offensive comments. There was no significant interference with either vehicular or pedestrian traffic. After thirty to forty-five minutes, police authorities informed petitioners that they would be arrested if they did not disperse within fifteen minutes. One of the demonstrators then delivered a “religious harangue,” inspiring petitioners to sing several patriotic songs while loudly clapping their hands and stamping their feet. After fifteen minutes, petitioners were arrested. They were convicted of the common law crime of breach of the peace.

The Court, in an opinion by Justice Stewart, held that the convictions “infringed the petitioners’ constitutionally protected rights of free speech, free assembly, and freedom to petition for redress of their grievances.” Edwards, the Court explained, “was a far cry” from Feiner. Here, “there was no violence or threat of violence on [the part of the petitioners], or on the part of any member of the crowd watching them.” Moreover, “police protection at the scene was at all times sufficient to meet any foreseeable possibility of disorder.” In the Court’s view, then, petitioners had been convicted because “the opinions which they were peaceably expressing were sufficiently opposed to the views of the majority of the community to attract a crowd and necessitate police protection.” The Constitution, however, “does not permit a State to make criminal the peaceful expression of unpopular views.” The Court thus concluded that, “as in [Terminiello], the Courts of South Carolina have defined a criminal offense so as to permit conviction of the petitioners if their speech ‘stirred people to anger, invited public dispute, or brought about a condition of unrest. A conviction resting on any of those grounds may not stand.’”

6. A “far cry” from Feiner II. In Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965), Cox, an ordained minister, led a demonstration of approximately two thousand black students to protest the arrest the previous day of twenty-three black students who had picketed stores that maintained segregated lunch counters. The demonstration was to take place at the local courthouse, which contained the parish jail in which the twenty-three students were confined. The demonstrators walked to the courthouse in an orderly manner, two or three abreast. As they neared the courthouse, the police chief stopped the procession and inquired as to their purpose. Cox stated that they would sing the national anthem and a freedom song and recite the Lord’s Prayer and the pledge of allegiance, and that he would deliver a short speech. The police chief instructed Cox to confine the demonstration to the west side of the street, across the street from the courthouse. The demonstrators lined up on the west sidewalk about five deep, spread along almost the entire length of the block. A group of about one hundred to three hundred whites, mostly courthouse personnel, gathered across the street on the steps of the courthouse. Seventy-five to eighty policemen, several members of the fire department, and a fire truck were stationed in the street between the two groups.

The demonstration proceeded according to plan until Cox, in the course of his speech, said: “It’s lunch time. Let’s go eat. There are twelve stores we are protesting. [These stores won’t accept your money at one of their counters.] This is an act of racial discrimination. These stores are open to the public. You are members of the public.” These remarks caused some “muttering” and “grumbling” among the white onlookers. The sheriff, deeming Cox’s appeal to the students to sit in at the lunch counters to be “inflammatory,” ordered the demonstrators to disperse. When Cox and the students ignored the sheriff, the police fired tear gas, causing the demonstrators to flee. The following day, Cox was arrested. He was thereafter convicted of breach of the peace.

In a unanimous decision, the Court overturned Cox's conviction. Justice Goldberg, speaking for the Court, found "no conduct which the State had a right to prohibit as a breach of the peace." The Court rejected the state's contention that the conviction could be sustained because "violence was about to erupt." The demonstrators themselves "were not violent and threatened no violence." Indeed, there was "no indication that the mood of the students was ever hostile, aggressive, or unfriendly." The fear of violence was thus "based upon the reaction of the group of white citizens looking on from across the street." Although there were some "mutterings," there was no evidence "that any member of the white group threatened violence." In any event, the police and other personnel present "could have handled the crowd." The Court thus concluded that the facts of Cox "are strikingly similar" to Edwards and, like Edwards, "a far cry" from Feiner.

7. A "far cry" from Feiner III. In Gregory v. City of Chicago, 394 U.S. 111 (1969), Gregory led a march of about eighty-five protesters to the home of Chicago Mayor Richard Daley to protest segregation in the city's public schools. The protesters, accompanied by about one hundred police, arrived at the mayor's home at 8:00 P.M. and began marching continuously around the block. For the first thirty minutes, they sang civil rights songs and chanted slogans criticizing the mayor and referring to him as a "snake." After 8:30, the protesters marched quietly but continued to carry sharply critical placards. In the next hour, the crowd of white onlookers grew rapidly to more than one thousand, and, as the evening wore on, they became increasingly unruly. In several instances, spectators attempted physically to block the march. There were threatening shouts such as "Get out of here niggers—go back where you belong or we will get you out of here," and rocks and eggs were thrown at the marchers. At about 9:30, the police officer in charge informed Gregory that "the situation was dangerous and becoming riotous" and asked Gregory to lead the marchers out of the area. When Gregory refused, he and the other protesters were arrested. They were thereafter convicted under Chicago's disorderly conduct ordinance, which declared it unlawful for any person to make "any improper noise, riot, disturbance, breach of the peace, or diversion tending to a breach of the peace."

The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Warren, unanimously overturned the convictions. The Court announced that "this is a simple case." Noting that "there is no evidence in this record that petitioners' conduct was disorderly," the Court concluded that "convictions so totally devoid of evidentiary support violate due process.”

8. Evaluation. Why were these cases “a far cry” from Feiner? Consider the following possibilities: (a) The demonstrators in these cases did not pass “the bounds of argument or persuasion and undertake incitement to riot”; (b) there was less likelihood in these cases of an imminent violent response; (c) the police were better able to handle the situations in Edwards, Cox, and Gregory. Were these cases really “a far cry” from Feiner, or do they limit its precedential force? Do the results in Edwards, Cox, and Gregory suggest that the Court has implicitly embraced a set of principles for dealing with the hostile audience problem analogous to those articulated at approximately the same time for dealing with the problem of subversive advocacy? Should the state ever be allowed to stop or punish a speaker because of a hostile audience response? Consider the argument that even allowing for that possibility will only invite threats of violence and discriminatory law enforcement against unpopular speakers. Might it be best simply to say: “Never”?

9. The Heckler’s Veto on Campus. Consider the situation of a public university. Suppose a student group invites a highly controversial speaker to campus. If other students and community members threaten violence if the individual is permitted to speak, should the university disinvite the speaker and cancel the event? Would such action be consistent with the first amendment? Should it matter whether the speaker is controversial because she denounces affirmative action as a form of “black privilege,” reviles evangelical Christians for their “ignorant and immoral” positions on abortion and homosexuality, denounces Muslims as “terrorists,” or advocates violence against the police? Suppose the university allows the speaker to come to campus and protesters, including both students and community members, enter the hall and keep chanting “Get Her Out! Get Her Out!” in an effort to prevent her from speaking. What should the university do? What is the role of the first amendment in this situation? See Papandrea, The Free Speech Rights of University Students, 101 Minn. L. Rev. 1801 (2017); Tsesis, Campus Speech and Harassment, 101 Minn. L. Rev. 1863 (2017).

In April 2017, Richard B. Spencer, a white nationalist and one of the leaders of America’s so-called alt-right movement, announced that he would be giving a speech on the campus of Auburn University in Alabama. Auburn, a public university, has a policy of permitting anyone who wants to rent meeting space to do so. Spencer is a controversial and divisive figure who has been decried as racist, anti-Semitic, un-American, and hateful. Knowing that his presence would upset many members of the university community, Auburn issued a statement: “We strongly deplore his views, which run counter to those of this institution.

While his event isn't affiliated with the university, Auburn supports the constitutional right to free speech. We encourage the campus community to respond to speech they find objectionable with their own views in civil discourse and to do so with respect and inclusion."

Several days later, though, Auburn changed its tune. The university announced that it had decided to cancel the event because of "credible evidence that it will jeopardize the safety of students, faculty, staff and visitors." Was that justification for canceling the speech constitutionally permissible?

10. Is there such a thing as "low"-value speech in this context? The difficulties of defining "incitement" in cases like Cantwell, Feiner, Edwards, and Cox have already been noted. Consider also Chaplinsky and the "fighting words" doctrine.

Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire

315 U.S. 568 (1942)

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant, a member of the sect known as Jehovah's Witnesses, was convicted in the municipal court of Rochester, New Hampshire, for violation of Chapter 378, §2, of the Public Laws of New Hampshire:

No person shall address any offensive, derisive or annoying word to any other person who is lawfully in any street or other public place, nor call him by an offensive or derisive name, nor make any noise or exclamation in his presence and hearing with intent to deride, offend or annoy him, or to prevent him from pursuing his lawful business or occupation.

The complaint charged that appellant, with force and arms, in a certain public place in said city of Rochester, to wit, on the public sidewalk on the easterly side of Wakefield Street, near unto the entrance of the City Hall, did unlawfully repeat, the words following, addressed to the complainant, that is to say, "You are a God damned racketeer" and "a damned Fascist and the whole government of Rochester are Fascists or agents of Fascists," the same being offensive, derisive and annoying words and names....

There is no substantial dispute over the facts. Chaplinsky was distributing the literature of his sect on the streets of Rochester on a busy Saturday afternoon. Members of the local citizenry complained to the City Marshal, Bowering, that Chaplinsky was denouncing all religion as a “racket.” Bowering told them that Chaplinsky was lawfully engaged, and then warned Chaplinsky that the crowd was getting restless. Some time later, a disturbance occurred and the traffic officer on duty at the busy intersection started with Chaplinsky for the police station, but did not inform him that he was under arrest or that he was going to be arrested. On the way, they encountered Marshal Bowering, who had been advised that a riot was under way and was therefore hurrying to the scene. Bowering repeated his earlier warning to Chaplinsky, who then addressed to Bowering the words set forth in the complaint.

Chaplinsky’s version of the affair was slightly different. He testified that, when he met Bowering, he asked him to arrest the ones responsible for the disturbance. In reply, Bowering cursed him and told him to come along. Appellant admitted that he said the words charged in the complaint, with the exception of the name of the Deity.

Over appellant’s objection the trial court excluded, as immaterial, testimony relating to appellant’s mission “to preach the true facts of the Bible,” his treatment at the hands of the crowd, and the alleged neglect of duty on the part of the police. This action was approved by the court below, which held that neither provocation nor the truth of the utterance would constitute a defense to the charge....

Allowing the broadest scope to the language and purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment, it is well understood that the right of free speech is not absolute at all times and under all circumstances. There are certain well-defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any Constitutional problem. These include the lewd and obscene, the profane, the libelous, and the insulting or “fighting” words—those which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace. It has been well observed that such utterances are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality. “Resort to epithets or personal abuse is not in any proper sense communication of information or opinion safeguarded by the Constitution, and its punishment as a criminal act would raise no question under that instrument.” [Cantwell.]...

On the authority of its earlier decisions, the state court declared that the statute’s purpose was to preserve the public peace, no words being “forbidden except such as have a direct tendency to cause acts of violence by the persons to whom, individually, the remark is addressed.” It was further said:

The word "offensive" is not to be defined in terms of what a particular addressee thinks....The test is what men of common intelligence would understand would be words likely to cause an average addressee to fight....The English language has a number of words and expressions which by general consent are "fighting words" when said without a disarming smile....Such words, as ordinary men know, are likely to cause a fight. So are threatening, profane or obscene revilings. Derisive and annoying words can be taken as coming within the purview of the statute as heretofore interpreted only when they have this characteristic of plainly tending to excite the addressee to a breach of the peace. ...The statute, as construed, does no more than prohibit the face-to-face words plainly likely to cause a breach of the peace by the addressee, words whose speaking constitutes a breach of the peace by the speaker—including "classical fighting words," words in current use less "classical" but equally likely to cause violence, and other disorderly words, including profanity, obscenity and threats.

We are unable to say that the limited scope of the statute as thus construed contravenes the Constitutional right of free expression. It is a statute narrowly drawn and limited to define and punish specific conduct lying within the domain of state power, the use in a public place of words likely to cause a breach of the peace....

Nor can we say that the application of the statute to the facts disclosed by the record substantially or unreasonably impinges upon the privilege of free speech. Argument is unnecessary to demonstrate that the appellations "damned racketeer" and "damned Fascist" are epithets likely to provoke the average person to retaliation, and thereby cause a breach of the peace.

The refusal of the state court to admit evidence of provocation and evidence bearing on the truth or falsity of the utterances, is open to no Constitutional objection. Whether the facts sought to be proved by such evidence constitute a defense to the charge, or may be shown in mitigation, are questions for the state court to determine. Our function is fulfilled by a determination that the challenged statute, on its face and as applied, does not contravene the Fourteenth Amendment.

Affirmed.

Note: Fighting Words

1. The actual facts of Chaplinsky. Consider Blasi and Shiffrin, The Real Story of West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, in Dorf, ed., Constitutional Law Stories 433 (2004):

In April of 1940, Walter Chaplinsky, a vociferous Jehovah's Witness preaching in Rochester, New Hampshire, was surrounded by a group of men who scornfully invited him to salute the flag. While one veteran attempted to pummel Chaplinsky, the town marshal looked on, warned the Witness that things were turning ugly, but refused to arrest the assailant. After the marshal left, the assailant returned with a flag and attempted to impale Chaplinsky on the flagpole, eventually pinning him onto a car while other members of the crowd began to beat him. A police officer then arrived, not to detain or disperse members of the mob but to escort Chaplinsky to the police station. En route, the officer and others who joined the escort directed epithets at the hapless Witness. When Chaplinsky responded in kind, calling the marshal who had reappeared "a damn fascist and a racketeer," he was arrested for, and later convicted of, using offensive language in public.

2. The two-level theory. Building on dictum in Cantwell, the Court in Chaplinsky first fully enunciated what Professor Harry Kalven later termed the "two-level" theory of speech, under which speech is either "protected" or "unprotected" by the first amendment according to the Court's assessment of its relative "value." Kalven, The Metaphysics of the Law of Obscenity, 1960 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1, 10. The analytical underpinnings and historical evolution of this theory, and the other varieties of "unprotected" speech mentioned in Chaplinsky, such as the "obscene" and the "libelous," are examined more fully in section D infra.

3. Fighting words as "low"-value speech. Why was Chaplinsky's expression unprotected by the first amendment? Because it consisted of "epithets or personal abuse"? What distinguishes an "epithet" from bona fide criticism? The following arguments might be advanced for the proposition that fighting words are of only "low" first amendment value:

a. Fighting words are unprotected because, as "epithets or personal abuse," they are intended to inflict harm rather than to communicate ideas, and thus are not really "speech" at all. They are "verbal assaults," more akin to a "punch in the mouth" than to constitutionally protected expression of opinion. See Greenawalt, Insults and Epithets: Are They Protected Speech?, 42 Rutgers L. Rev. 287, 291–298 (1990). If Chaplinsky had actually punched Bowering, could he successfully claim that this was a constitutionally protected expression of his evaluation of Bowering's performance of his duties?

b. Fighting words are unprotected because they are "likely to provoke the average person to retaliation, and thereby cause a breach of the peace." On this view, the doctrine is merely an application of the Holmes/Brandeis version of clear and present danger. But is name-calling really likely to cause the average addressee to fight? Is the focus on the average, rather than the actual, addressee consistent with the Holmes/Brandeis formulation? How should we deal with the possibility that men may be more prone than women to respond with violence?

c. Fighting words are unprotected because they are “no essential part of any exposition of ideas.” Does the Court undervalue the use of personal insults to dramatize one’s point? Is the emotive impact worth protecting? Even if fighting words are not “essential” to the exposition of ideas, is this in itself a basis for holding them unprotected? Is it, in conjunction with other factors, a relevant consideration?

4. Fighting words? Consider whether the following constitute “fighting words”: (1) Cantwell’s phonograph record, which charged that Roman Catholicism “has by means of fraud and deception brought untold sorrow and suffering upon the people” and “operates the greatest racket ever employed amongst men and robs the people of their money,” when played, as it was, to Roman Catholics. (2) Terminiello’s speech, in which he called his opponents, who were outside the hall, “slimy scum,” “snakes,” and “bedbugs.” (3) Kunz’s public prayer meetings, in which he labeled Catholicism “a religion of the devil,” declared that the Pope is “the anti-Christ,” and described Jews as “Christ-killers” and “garbage that [should] have been burnt in the incinerators [of Nazi Germany].” (4) Gregory’s repeated references to Mayor Daley as a “snake.” Consider also the Court’s post-Chaplinsky decisions:

a. In Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576 (1969), Street, on learning that James Meredith, a civil rights leader, had been shot, burned an American flag in public. A small crowd gathered, and Street said, “We don’t need no damn flag. [If] they let that happen to Meredith we don’t need an American flag.” The state argued, among other things, that Street could constitutionally be convicted for this speech because of “the possible tendency of [his] words to provoke violent retaliation.” The Court disagreed: “Though it is conceivable that some listeners might have been moved to retaliate upon hearing [Street’s] disrespectful words, we cannot say that [his] remarks were so inherently inflammatory as to come within that small class of ‘fighting words’ which are ‘likely to provoke the average person to retaliation, and thereby cause a breach of the peace.’ [Citing Chaplinsky.]”

b. In Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971), Cohen wore a jacket bearing the words “Fuck the Draft” in a corridor of a courthouse. As a consequence, he was convicted under a California statute prohibiting any person “maliciously and willfully [to disturb] the peace or quiet of any neighborhood or person [by] offensive conduct.” The state courts interpreted the phrase “offensive conduct” as “behavior which has a tendency to provoke others to acts of violence.” In overturning the conviction, the Court rejected the state’s argument that Cohen’s speech constituted fighting words: “While the four-letter word displayed by Cohen in relation to the draft is not uncommonly employed in a personally provocative fashion, in this instance it was clearly not ‘directed to the person of the hearer.’ [Citing Cantwell.] No individual actually or likely to be present could reasonably have regarded the words on appellant’s jacket as a direct personal insult.”

c. In Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518 (1972), Gooding said to a police officer attempting to restore access to an army induction center during an antiwar demonstration, “White son of a bitch, I’ll kill you” and “You son of a bitch, I’ll choke you to death.” He was thereafter convicted under a Georgia statute prohibiting any person to “use to or of another, and in his [presence] opprobrious words or abusive language, tending to cause a breach of the peace.” The Court found it unnecessary to decide whether Gooding’s speech could constitutionally be punished under a properly drawn statute, holding instead that the Georgia law was overbroad and hence unconstitutional on its face because the state courts had repeatedly interpreted it as reaching clearly protected expression. As examples of this overbreadth, the Court noted that the state courts had failed to construe the statute as “limited in application, as in Chaplinsky, to words that ‘have a direct tendency to cause acts of violence by the person to whom, individually, the remark is addressed.’” On the overbreadth doctrine, see section C1 infra.

d. Rosenfeld v. New Jersey, 408 U.S. 901 (1972); Lewis v. New Orleans, 408 U.S. 913 (1972); and Brown v. Oklahoma, 408 U.S. 914 (1972), were decided as companion cases. In Rosenfeld, the appellant, in the course of a public school board meeting attended by approximately 150 people, about forty of whom were children, used the noun “mother-fucker” on four occasions to describe the teachers, the school board, the town, and the country. In Lewis, while the police were engaged in arresting appellant’s son, she called them “god-damn-mother-fucker police.” In Brown, appellant, a member of the Black Panthers, spoke by invitation to a large audience at the University of Tulsa’s chapel. During the question-and-answer period, he referred to some police officers as “mother-fucking fascist pig cops” and to one officer in particular as a “black mother-fucking pig.” Each appellant was convicted under a state law prohibiting, in varying forms, the use of profanity in public. In each case, the Court summarily vacated the judgment and reversed for reconsideration in light of Gooding.

e. In Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989), the Court invalidated a Texas statute that prohibited any person to “desecrate” the American flag “in a way that the actor knows will seriously offend [others] likely to observe or discover his action,” as applied to an individual who publicly burned the flag in symbolic protest of national policy. The Court held that this “expressive conduct” did not fall within the fighting words doctrine because “no reasonable onlooker would have regarded [the defendant’s] generalized expression of dissatisfaction with the policies of the Federal Government as a direct personal insult or an invitation to exchange fisticuffs.”

5. Fighting words reconsidered. It has been suggested that the post-Chaplinsky decisions establish that the doctrine applies only to the use of insulting and provocative epithets that describe a particular individual and are addressed specifically to that individual in a face-to-face encounter. See Gard, Fighting Words as Free Speech, 58 Wash. U. L.Q. 531 (1980). Are these limitations defensible? Should the doctrine apply when an insult descriptive of a group is directed to an individual member of that group? Are insults descriptive of a group less likely to provoke a violent response? Are they, because of their generality, more likely to be of “high” first amendment value?

The Court has not upheld a conviction on the basis of the fighting words doctrine since Chaplinsky. It has been argued that the Court’s post-Chaplinsky decisions have so narrowed the doctrine as to render it meaningless, and that the doctrine is “nothing more than a quaint remnant of an earlier morality that has no place in a democratic society dedicated to the principle of free expression.” Gard, supra, at 536. Do you agree?

6. The problem of underinclusion. Suppose a law restricts only a subset of fighting words, such as (a) fighting words directed against blacks, (b) fighting words concerning religion, or (c) fighting words uttered in bars. Are such restrictions necessarily constitutional because the category of fighting words is itself “unprotected” by the first amendment? Are such restrictions subject to scrutiny, even though the category is “unprotected,” because of the inequalities created by the decision to restrict less than the entire category? This issue is addressed in R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, section D8, infra.

Note: The Skokie Controversy

In 1977, the Village of Skokie, a northern Chicago suburb, had a population of about seventy thousand persons, forty thousand of whom were Jewish. Approximately five thousand of the Jewish residents were survivors of Nazi concentration camps during World War II. In March 1977, Frank Collin, leader of the National Socialist Party of America, informed village officials that the party intended to hold a peaceable public assembly in Skokie on May 1 to protest the village's requirement that a $350,000 insurance bond be posted before the village's parks could be used for purposes of assembly. Collin explained that the demonstration would last twenty to thirty minutes and would consist of thirty to fifty demonstrators marching in single file in front of the village hall. The marchers would wear uniforms reminiscent of those worn by members of the Nazi Party in Germany under Hitler, and they would wear swastika emblems or armbands. The marchers would carry a party banner containing a swastika emblem and signs bearing such messages as "White Free Speech" and "Free Speech for the White Man."

Village officials filed suit, seeking to enjoin the marchers from wearing their uniforms, displaying the swastika, or distributing or displaying any materials "which incite or promote hatred against persons of Jewish faith or ancestry." The complaint alleged that the march, as planned, was a "deliberate and willful attempt to exacerbate the sensitivities of the Jewish population in Skokie and to incite racial and religious hatred" and that the display of the swastika in Skokie "constitutes a symbolic assault against large numbers of the residents of the plaintiff village and an incitation to violence and retaliation."

At a hearing before the trial court, the village presented evidence that some fifteen to eighteen Jewish organizations, along with various other anti-Nazi organizations, planned to hold a counterdemonstration to protest the march. Between twelve thousand and fifteen thousand persons were expected to participate in the counterdemonstration. The village also presented evidence that there had already been many threats of violence, and that, if the party was permitted to demonstrate, "an uncontrollably violent situation would develop" and "bloodshed would occur." Finally, the village presented the testimony of a survivor of a Nazi concentration camp to the effect that for him and other survivors, "the swastika is a symbol that his closest family was killed by the Nazis, and that the lives of him and his children are not presently safe." The village maintained that the display of the swastika in such circumstances amounted to the intentional infliction of emotional harm. The witness testified further that, although he did not "intend to use violence against" the marchers, he did "not know if he [could] control himself." On April 29, the trial judge granted the injunction. The National Socialist Party appealed.

After the issuance of the injunction, the Illinois appellate courts refused to stay the injunction pending appeal, and the Illinois Supreme Court denied a petition for direct, expedited appeal. The party then sought a stay in the Supreme Court of the United States, which treated the petition as a petition for certiorari, granted the writ, and summarily reversed the state court's denial of the stay. In a five-to-four decision, the Court characterized the denial of the stay as a "final judgment for purposes of our jurisdiction" because it finally determined the merits of petitioners' claim that the outstanding injunction will deprive them of rights protected by the First Amendment during the period of appellate review which, in the normal course, may take a year or more to complete. If a State seeks to impose a restraint of this kind, it must provide strict procedural safeguards, [including] immediate appellate review. [Absent] such review, the State [must] allow a stay.

On remand, the Illinois appellate court in July modified the injunction, so as to enjoin the party only from displaying the swastika. Skokie v. Nationalist Socialist Party of America, 366 N.E.2d 347 (1977). The following January the Illinois Supreme Court held the entire injunction invalid. Skokie v. National Socialist Party of America, 373 N.E.2d 21 (1978).

During the course of the injunction litigation, Skokie enacted a series of ordinances designed to block the march. These ordinances (1) required applicants for parade permits to procure $300,000 in public liability insurance and $50,000 in property damage insurance; (2) prohibited the "dissemination of any material [including signs and clothing of symbolic significance] which promotes and incites hatred against persons by reason of their race, national origin, or religion, and is intended to do so"; and (3) prohibited anyone to demonstrate "on behalf of any political party while wearing a military-style uniform." All three ordinances were held to violate the first amendment. Collin v. Smith, 578 F.2d 1197 (7th Cir.), aff'd 477 F. Supp. 676 (N.D. Ill. 1978). With the march scheduled for June 25, 1978, the village requested the Supreme Court to stay the ruling of the court of appeals. The Court denied the stay, Justices Blackmun and Rehnquist dissenting. Smith v. Collin, 436 U.S. 953 (1978).

On June 22, Collin cancelled the march. He explained that he had used the threat of a march in Skokie as a means to win the right to demonstrate in Chicago, a right he had won while the Skokie litigation was proceeding. On July 9, 1978, the party held an hour-long rally in Chicago at which four hundred riot-helmeted policemen protected the twenty-five Nazi demonstrators. There were seventy-two arrests and some rock and bottle throwing, but no serious violence.

Consider Douglas-Scott, The Hatefulness of Protected Speech: A Comparison of the American and European Approaches, 7 Wm. & Mary Bill Rts. J. 305, 309, 317, 343–345 (1999):

[Controls] on free speech long have been permitted in many European countries to curb incitement to race hatred. [For] example, in the United Kingdom, Part III of the Public Order Act of 1986 prohibits behavior intended to or likely to have the result of stirring up racial hatred. [The European approach to free speech emphasizes] particular values—dignity, protection of personal identity, and equality. [This] approach recognizes a different sort of harm caused by the abuse of freedom than the danger of imminent lawless action required under American law. The Brandenburg requirement that violence be imminent before hateful speech may be proscribed is objectionable....

European case law looks not only to the harm caused by such expression, but also proceeds from a particular conception of individual personality and psychology. [European] case law rejects a conception of individuals as beings who merely should be left to their own devices to make up their own minds about the value of expression in the public domain, to be free to ignore it, or to counter it with more speech. Such an approach isolates human beings by forcing them to take the consequences of painful conduct and ignores the particular susceptibility of certain groups to injury, especially when the offense of the speech seems to be targeted at such groups because of their identity. [Surely] it is not enough for societies that claim to be committed to the ideals of social and political equality and respect for individual dignity to remain neutral and passive when threats to these values exist. Sometimes the state must act to show its solidarity with vulnerable minority groups and its commitment to equality.

On the hate speech issue, see section D8, infra. Suppose a student group at a public university invites Frank Collin to speak. Can the university constitutionally veto the invitation? Suppose students and other protesters threaten to disrupt the event? Can a police officer be fired for marching in a Nazi Party demonstration?

SNYDER v. PHELPS, 562 U.S. 443 (2011). Suppose the Nazis had just marched in Skokie. Could individual residents who were shocked and outraged by their conduct have sued them for damages for the intentional infliction of emotional distress? Consider Snyder.

For at least 20 years, the congregation of the Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka, Kansas, picketed hundreds of military funerals to communicate its belief that God hates the United States for its tolerance of homosexuality, particularly in America's military. As part of this campaign, Fred Phelps, who founded the church, and six Westboro Baptist parishioners traveled to Maryland to picket the funeral of Marine Lance Corporal Matthew Snyder, who was killed
