in Iraq in the line of duty. The picketing took place on public land approximately one thousand feet from the church where the funeral was held. The picketers peacefully displayed their signs—stating, for example, “Thank God for Dead Soldiers,” “Fags Doom Nations,” “America is Doomed,” and “You’re Going to Hell”—for about thirty minutes before the funeral began.

Matthew Snyder’s father (Snyder) saw the tops of the picketers’ signs when driving to the funeral, but he did not learn what was written on them until he was watching a news broadcast later that night. Snyder filed a civil action against Phelps and Westboro asserting a state tort claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. A jury held Westboro liable for millions of dollars in compensatory and punitive damages. The trial judge reduced the punitive damages award, but left the verdict otherwise intact. The court of appeals reversed, concluding that Westboro’s statements were entitled to first amendment protection. The Supreme Court affirmed.

Chief Justice Roberts delivered the opinion of the Court: “Whether the First Amendment prohibits holding Westboro liable for its speech in this case turns largely on whether that speech is of public or private concern, as determined by all the circumstances of the case. [The] First Amendment reflects ‘a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open.’ That is because ‘speech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government.’ [Accordingly], ‘speech on public issues’ occupies the highest rung of the hierarchy of First Amendment values, and is entitled to special protection.’...

“Speech deals with matters of public concern when it can ‘be fairly considered as relating to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community’ or when it ‘is a subject of legitimate news interest; that is, a subject of general interest and of value and concern to the public.’ [Deciding] whether speech is of public or private concern requires us to examine the ‘content, form, and context’ of that speech, as revealed by the whole record.’ [The] ‘content’ of Westboro’s signs plainly relates to broad issues of interest to society at large, rather than matters of ‘purely private concern.’ [While] these messages may fall short of refined social or political commentary, the issues they highlight—the political and moral conduct of the United States and its citizens, the fate of our Nation, [and] homosexuality in the military [are] matters of public import. The signs certainly convey Westboro’s position on those issues, in a manner designed [to] reach as broad a public audience as possible....

“Snyder goes on to argue that Westboro’s speech should be afforded less than full First Amendment protection [because] the church members exploited the funeral ‘as a platform to bring their message to a broader audience.’ There is no doubt that Westboro chose to stage its picketing at the Naval Academy, the Maryland State House, and Matthew Snyder's funeral to increase publicity for its views and because of the relation between those sites and its views—in the case of the military funeral, because Westboro believes that God is killing American soldiers as punishment for the Nation's sinful policies. [Westboro's] choice of where and when to conduct its picketing is not beyond the Government's regulatory reach—it is 'subject to reasonable time, place, or manner restrictions.' [But the] record confirms that any distress occasioned by Westboro's picketing turned on the content and viewpoint of the message conveyed, rather than any interference with the funeral itself. A group of parishioners standing at the very spot where Westboro stood, holding signs that said 'God Bless America' and 'God Loves You,' would not have been subjected to liability. It was what Westboro said that exposed it to tort damages. [Given] that Westboro's speech was at a public place on a matter of public concern, [it] cannot be restricted simply because it is upsetting or arouses contempt. 'If there is a bedrock principle underlying the First Amendment, it is that the government may not prohibit the expression of an idea simply because society finds the idea itself offensive or disagreeable.'

"The jury here was instructed that it could hold Westboro liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress based on a finding that Westboro's picketing was 'outrageous.' 'Outrageousness,' however, is a highly malleable standard with 'an inherent subjectiveness about it which would allow a jury to impose liability on the basis of the jurors' tastes or views, or perhaps on the basis of their dislike of a particular expression.' In a case such as this, a jury is 'unlikely to be neutral with respect to the content of [the] speech,' posing 'a real danger of becoming an instrument for the suppression of...vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasan[t]' expression. Such a risk is unacceptable; 'in public debate [we] must tolerate insulting, and even outrageous, speech in order to provide adequate "breathing space" to the freedoms protected by the First Amendment.' [For] all these reasons, the jury verdict imposing tort liability on Westboro for intentional infliction of emotional distress must be set aside."

Justice Alito dissented: "Our profound national commitment to free and open debate is not a license for the vicious verbal assault that occurred in this case. [Phelps and Westboro] have strong opinions on certain moral, religious, and political issues, and the First Amendment ensures that they have almost limitless opportunities to express their views. They may write and distribute books, articles, and other texts; they may create and disseminate video and audio recordings; they may circulate petitions; they may speak to individuals and groups in public forums and in any private venue that wishes to accommodate them; they may picket peacefully in countless locations; they may appear on television and speak on the radio; they may post messages on the Internet and send out e-mails. And they may express their views in terms that are ‘uninhibited,’ ‘vehement,’ and ‘caustic.’ It does not follow, however, that they may intentionally inflict severe emotional injury on private persons at a time of intense emotional sensitivity by launching vicious verbal attacks that make no contribution to public debate. [I] think it is clear that the First Amendment does not entirely preclude liability for the intentional infliction of emotional distress by means of speech.”

In the years since Snyder, many states enacted “buffer-zone” laws that prohibit any picketing within a certain distance of a funeral within a certain time before and after the funeral. Are such laws constitutional? See Heyman, To Drink the Cup of Fury: Funeral Picketing, Public Discourse, and the First Amendment, 45 Conn. L. Rev. 101 (2012).

3. Classified Information

New York Times Co. v. United States; United States v. Washington Post Co. 403 U.S. 713 (1971)

[On June 12–14, 1971, the New York Times and, on June 18, the Washington Post published excerpts from a top secret Defense Department study of the Vietnam War. The study, which was commissioned by Robert McNamara in 1967, filled forty-seven volumes and reviewed in great detail the formulation of U.S. policy toward Indochina, including military operations and secret diplomatic negotiations. The newspapers obtained the study, known popularly as the Pentagon Papers, from Daniel Ellsberg, a former Pentagon official. The government filed suit in federal district courts in New York and Washington, D.C., seeking to enjoin further publication of the materials, claiming that such publication would interfere with national security and would lead to the death of soldiers, the undermining of our alliances, the inability of our diplomats to negotiate, and the prolongation of the war. Between June 15 and June 23, the cases worked their way through the federal courts, and on June 26 the Supreme Court heard argument. On June 30 the Court issued its decision. Restraining orders remained in effect throughout the Court’s deliberations.]

PER CURIAM.

We granted certiorari in these cases in which the United States seeks to enjoin the New York Times and the Washington Post from publishing the contents of a classified study entitled "History of U.S. Decision-Making Process on Viet Nam Policy."

"Any system of prior restraints of expression comes to this Court bearing a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity." [The] Government "thus carries a heavy burden of showing justification for the imposition of such a restraint." [The] District Court for the Southern District of New York in the New York Times case and the District Court for the District of Columbia and the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in the Washington Post case held that the Government had not met that burden. We agree.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit is therefore affirmed. The order of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is reversed and the case is remanded with directions to enter a judgment affirming the judgment of the District Court for the Southern District of New York. The stays entered June 25, 1971, by the Court are vacated. The judgments shall issue forthwith.

So ordered.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, with whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS joins, concurring....

[Every] moment's continuance of the injunctions against these newspapers amounts to a flagrant, indefensible, and continuing violation of the First Amendment. [For] the first time in the 182 years since the founding of the Republic, the federal courts are asked to hold that the First Amendment does not mean what it says, but rather means that the Government can halt the publication of current news of vital importance to the people of this country....

In the First Amendment the Founding Fathers gave the free press the protection it must have to fulfill its essential role in our democracy. The press was to serve the governed, not the governors. The Government's power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the Government. The press was protected so that it could bare the secrets of government and inform the people. Only a free and unrestrained press can effectively expose deception in government....

[We] are asked to hold that despite the First Amendment's emphatic command, the Executive Branch, the Congress, and the Judiciary can make laws enjoining publication of current news and abridging freedom of the press in the name of "national security."...

The word "security" is a broad, vague generality whose contours should not be invoked to abrogate the fundamental law embodied in the First Amendment. The guarding of military and diplomatic secrets at the expense of informed representative government provides no real security for our Republic.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, with whom MR. JUSTICE BLACK joins, concurring....

These disclosures may have a serious impact. But that is no basis for sanctioning a previous restraint on the press. [The] dominant purpose of the First Amendment was to prohibit the widespread practice of governmental suppression of embarrassing information. It is common knowledge that the First Amendment was adopted against the widespread use of the common law of seditious libel to punish the dissemination of material that is embarrassing to the powers-that-be. [A] debate of large proportions goes on in the Nation over our posture in Vietnam. That debate antedated the disclosure of the contents of the present documents. The latter are highly relevant to the debate in progress.

Secrecy in government is fundamentally anti-democratic, perpetuating bureaucratic errors. Open debate and discussion of public issues are vital to our national health. On public questions there should be “uninhibited, robust, and wide-open” debate....

The stays in these cases that have been in effect for more than a week constitute a flouting of the principles of the First Amendment....

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN, concurring.

The error that has pervaded these cases from the outset was the granting of any injunctive relief whatsoever, interim or otherwise. The entire thrust of the Government’s claim throughout these cases has been that publication of the material sought to be enjoined “could,” or “might,” or “may” prejudice the national interest in various ways. But the First Amendment tolerates absolutely no prior judicial restraints of the press predicated upon surmise or conjecture that untoward consequences may result.* Our cases, it is true, have indicated that there is a single, extremely narrow class of cases in which the First Amendment’s ban on prior judicial restraint may be overridden. Our cases have thus far indicated that such cases may arise only when the Nation “is at war,” [Schenck], during which times “[n]o one would question but that a government might prevent actual obstruction to its recruiting service or the publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops.” Near v. Minnesota, [section C2 infra]. Even if the present world situation were assumed to be tantamount to a time of war, or if the power of presently available armaments would justify even in peacetime the suppression of information that would set in motion a nuclear holocaust, in neither of these actions has the Government presented or even alleged that publication of items from or based upon the material at issue would cause the happening of an event of that nature. “[T]he chief purpose of [the First Amendment’s] guaranty [is] to prevent previous restraints upon publication." [Near.] Thus, only governmental allegation and proof that publication must inevitably, directly, and immediately cause the occurrence of an event kindred to imperiling the safety of a transport already at sea can support even the issuance of an interim restraining order. [Every] restraint issued in this case, whatever its form, has violated the First Amendment—and not less so because that restraint was justified as necessary to afford the courts an opportunity to examine the claim more thoroughly. Unless and until the Government has clearly made out its case, the First Amendment commands that no injunction may issue.

MR. JUSTICE STEWART, with whom MR. JUSTICE WHITE joins, concurring.

In the governmental structure created by our Constitution, the Executive is endowed with enormous power in the two related areas of national defense and international relations. This power, largely unchecked by the Legislative and Judicial branches, has been pressed to the very hilt since the advent of the nuclear missile age....

In the absence of the governmental checks and balances present in other areas of our national life, the only effective restraint upon executive policy and power in the areas of national defense and international affairs may lie in an enlightened citizenry—in an informed and critical public opinion which alone can here protect the values of democratic government....

Yet it is elementary that the successful conduct of international diplomacy and the maintenance of an effective national defense require both confidentiality and secrecy. Other nations can hardly deal with this Nation in an atmosphere of mutual trust unless they can be assured that their confidences will be kept. And within our own executive departments, the development of considered and intelligent international policies would be impossible if those charged with their formulation could not communicate with each other freely, frankly, and in confidence. In the area of basic national defense the frequent need for absolute secrecy is, of course, self-evident.

I think there can be but one answer to this dilemma, if dilemma it be. The responsibility must be where the power is. If the Constitution gives the Executive a large degree of unshared power in the conduct of foreign affairs and the maintenance of our national defense, then under the Constitution the Executive must have the largely unshared duty to determine and preserve the degree of internal security necessary to exercise that power successfully. [It] is clear to me that it is the constitutional duty of the Executive—as a matter of sovereign prerogative and not as a matter of law as the courts know law—through the promulgation and enforcement of executive regulations, to protect the confidentiality necessary to carry out its responsibilities in the fields of international relations and national defense.

This is not to say that Congress and the courts have no role to play. Undoubtedly Congress has the power to enact specific and appropriate criminal laws to protect government property and preserve government secrets....

But in the cases before us we are asked neither to construe specific regulations nor to apply specific laws. We are asked, instead, to perform a function that the Constitution gave to the Executive, not the Judiciary. We are asked, quite simply, to prevent the publication by two newspapers of material that the Executive Branch insists should not, in the national interest, be published. I am convinced that the Executive is correct with respect to some of the documents involved. But I cannot say that disclosure of any of them will surely result in direct, immediate, and irreparable damage to our Nation or its people. That being so, there can under the First Amendment be but one judicial resolution of the issues before us. I join the judgments of the Court.

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, with whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART joins, concurring.

I concur in today's judgments, but only because of the concededly extraordinary protection against prior restraints enjoyed by the press under our constitutional system. I do not say that in no circumstances would the First Amendment permit an injunction against publishing information about government plans or operations. Nor, after examining the materials the Government characterizes as the most sensitive and destructive, can I deny that revelation of these documents will do substantial damage to public interests. Indeed, I am confident that their disclosure will have that result. But I nevertheless agree that the United States has not satisfied the very heavy burden that it must meet to warrant an injunction against publication in these cases, at least in the absence of express and appropriately limited congressional authorization for prior restraints in circumstances such as these....

[Prior] restraints require an unusually heavy justification under the First Amendment; but failure by the Government to justify prior restraints does not measure its constitutional entitlement to a conviction for criminal publication. That the Government mistakenly chose to proceed by injunction does not mean that it could not successfully proceed in another way....

The Criminal Code contains numerous provisions potentially relevant to these cases. [Section] 793(e)⁸ makes it a criminal act for any unauthorized possessor of a document "relating to the national defense" either (1) willfully to communicate or cause to be communicated that document to any person not entitled to receive it or (2) willfully to retain the document and fail to deliver it to an officer of the United States entitled to receive it....

It is thus clear that Congress has addressed itself to the problems of protecting the security of the country and the national defense from unauthorized disclosure of potentially damaging information. [It] has not, however, authorized the injunctive remedy against threatened publication. It has apparently been satisfied to rely on criminal sanctions and their deterrent effect on the responsible as well as the irresponsible press. I am not, of course, saying that either of these newspapers has yet committed a crime or that either would commit a crime if it published all the material now in its possession. That matter must await resolution in the context of a criminal proceeding if one is instituted by the United States....

MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL, concurring.

I believe the ultimate issue in these cases [is] whether this Court or the Congress has the power to make law....

The problem here is whether in these particular cases the Executive Branch has authority to invoke the equity jurisdiction of the courts to protect what it believes to be the national interest. [In] some situations it may be that under whatever inherent powers the Government may have, as well as the implicit authority derived from the President's mandate to conduct foreign affairs and to act as Commander in Chief, there is a basis for the invocation of the equity jurisdiction of this Court as an aid to prevent the publication of material damaging to "national security," however that term may be defined.

It would, however, be utterly inconsistent with the concept of separation of powers for this Court to use its power of contempt to prevent behavior that Congress has specifically declined to prohibit. [The] Constitution provides that Congress shall make laws, the President execute laws, and courts interpret laws. [It] did not provide for government by injunction in which the courts and the Executive Branch can "make law" without regard to the action of Congress. [It] is clear that Congress has specifically rejected passing legislation that would have clearly given the President the power he seeks here and made the current activity of the newspapers unlawful. When Congress specifically declines to make conduct unlawful it is not for this Court to redecide those issues—to overrule Congress....

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER, dissenting.

[In] these cases, the imperative of a free and unfettered press comes into collision with another imperative, the effective functioning of a complex modern government and specifically the effective exercise of certain constitutional powers of the Executive. Only those who view the First Amendment as an absolute in all circumstances—a view I respect, but reject—can find such cases as these to be simple or easy.

These cases are not simple for another and more immediate reason. We do not know the facts of the cases. No District Judge knew all the facts. No Court of Appeals judge knew all the facts. No member of this Court knows all the facts.

I suggest we are in this posture because these cases have been conducted in unseemly haste. [It] seems reasonably clear now that the haste precluded reasonable and deliberate judicial treatment of these cases and was not warranted. The precipitate action of this Court aborting trials not yet completed is not the kind of judicial conduct that ought to attend the disposition of a great issue....

It is not disputed that the Times has had unauthorized possession of the documents for three to four months, during which it has had its expert analysts studying them, presumably digesting them and preparing the material for publication. During all of this time, the Times, presumably in its capacity as trustee of the public's "right to know," has held up publication for purposes it considered proper and thus public knowledge was delayed. No doubt this was for a good reason; the analysis of 7,000 pages of complex material drawn from a vastly greater volume of material would inevitably take time and the writing of good news stories takes time. But why should the United States Government, from whom this information was illegally acquired by someone, along with all the counsel, trial judges, and appellate judges be placed under needless pressure? After these months of deferral, the alleged "right to know" has somehow and suddenly become a right that must be vindicated instanter....

I would affirm the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and allow the District Court to complete the trial aborted by our grant of certiorari, meanwhile preserving the status quo in the Post case. I would direct that the District Court on remand give priority to the Times case to the exclusion of all other business of that court but I would not set arbitrary deadlines....

We all crave speedier judicial processes but when judges are pressured as in these cases the result is a parody of the judicial function.

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN join, dissenting....

With all respect, I consider that the Court has been almost irresponsibly feverish in dealing with these cases.

Both the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit rendered judgment on June 23. The New York Times' petition for certiorari, its motion for accelerated consideration thereof, and its application for interim relief were filed in this Court on June 24 at about 11 A.M. The application of the United States for interim relief in the Post case was also filed here on June 24 at about 7:15 P.M. This Court's order setting a hearing before us on June 26 at 11 A.M., a course which I joined only to avoid the possibility of even more peremptory action by the Court, was issued less than 24 hours before. The record in the Post case was filed with the Clerk shortly before 1 P.M. on June 25; the record in the Times case did not arrive until 7 or 8 o'clock that same night. The briefs of the parties were received less than two hours before argument on June 26.

This frenzied train of events took place in the name of the presumption against prior restraints created by the First Amendment. Due regard for the extraordinarily important and difficult questions involved in these litigations should have led the Court to shun such a precipitate timetable....

Forced as I am to reach the merits of these cases, I dissent from the opinion and judgments of the Court. [It] is plain to me that the scope of the judicial function in passing upon the activities of the Executive Branch of the Government in the field of foreign affairs is very narrowly restricted. This view is, I think, dictated by the concept of separation of powers upon which our constitutional system rests....

The power to evaluate the "pernicious influence" of premature disclosure is not, however, lodged in the Executive alone. I agree that, in performance of its duty to protect the values of the First Amendment against political pressures, the judiciary must review the initial Executive determination to the point of satisfying itself that the subject matter of the dispute does lie within the proper compass of the President's foreign relations power. Constitutional considerations forbid "a complete abandonment of judicial control." [Moreover], the judiciary may properly insist that the determination that disclosure of the subject matter would irreparably impair the national security be made by the head of the Executive Department concerned—here the Secretary of State or the Secretary of Defense—after actual personal consideration by that officer....

But in my judgment the judiciary may not properly go beyond these two inquiries and redetermine for itself the probable impact of disclosure on the national security. [Even] if there is some room for the judiciary to override the executive determination, it is plain that the scope of review must be exceedingly narrow. I can see no indication in the opinions of either the District Court or the Court of Appeals in the Post litigation that the conclusions of the Executive were given even the deference owing to an administrative agency, much less that owing to a co-equal branch of the Government operating within the field of its constitutional prerogative....

Pending further hearings in each case conducted under the appropriate ground rules, I would continue the restraints on publication. I cannot believe that the doctrine prohibiting prior restraints reaches to the point of preventing courts from maintaining the status quo long enough to act responsibly in matters of such national importance as those involved here.

MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN, dissenting.

The First Amendment, after all, is only one part of an entire Constitution. Article II of the great document vests in the Executive Branch primary power over the conduct of foreign affairs and places in that branch the responsibility for the Nation's safety. Each provision of the Constitution is important, and I cannot subscribe to a doctrine of unlimited absolutism for the First Amendment at the cost of downgrading other provisions. First Amendment absolutism has never commanded a majority of this Court. [What] is needed here is a weighing, upon properly developed standards, of the broad right of the press to print and of the very narrow right of the Government to prevent. Such standards are not yet developed. The parties here are in disagreement as to what those standards should be. But even the newspapers concede that there are situations where restraint is in order and is constitutional....

I therefore would remand these cases to be developed expeditiously, of course, but on a schedule permitting the orderly presentation of evidence from both sides....

Note: The Pentagon Papers Controversy

1. Prior restraint. The Court emphasized repeatedly that the injunction in New York Times was a “prior restraint,” and that a prior restraint bears a special “presumption against its constitutional validity.” Why is an injunction more threatening to the values underlying the first amendment than a criminal prosecution for publication of the same material? For analysis of the doctrine of prior restraint, see section C2 infra.

2. The Pentagon Papers: too much haste? Publication of the Pentagon Papers offered the public valuable insights into the processes of government decisionmaking involving the Vietnam War. Moreover, by disclosing that the Eisenhower administration’s attempt to undermine the new communist regime in North Vietnam directly involved the United States in the breakdown of the 1954 Geneva settlement, that the Johnson administration took steps toward waging an overt war against North Vietnam a full year before it disclosed the depth of its involvement to the American public, and that the infiltration of men and arms from North Vietnam into South Vietnam was more important as a means of publicly justifying our involvement than for its military effects, publication of the Papers sharpened the public's understanding of the war and altered public attitudes toward a central issue of American policy.

At the same time, however, one must ask whether, as the dissenters charged, the Court acted with "unseemly haste" in permitting publication of the documents. In light of the extraordinary seriousness of the government's contentions and the almost overwhelming length of the study, should the Court have permitted the injunctions to remain in effect pending a more thorough judicial determination of the risks? Was the Court, in other words, playing fast and loose with the national security? Consider in this regard Justice Brennan's argument that the very notion of an injunction against expression pending final resolution of the controversy is inherently incompatible with the first amendment.

3. The Pentagon Papers: injunctions and the national security. Note that the per curiam opinion did not define the precise circumstances in which a court may enjoin the publication of information relating to the national security. Does the standard enunciated by Justice Stewart, that there must be proof that the disclosure will "surely result in direct, immediate, and irreparable damage to our Nation or its people," come closest to representing the view of the Court? Why was that standard not satisfied in the Pentagon Papers case?

4. The Pentagon Papers: criminal prosecution? Suppose the New York Times and the Washington Post had been criminally prosecuted for their publication of the Pentagon Papers. What standard should govern? Is section 793(e) of the Federal Code, reproduced in footnote 8 of Justice White's opinion, constitutional? Should disclosure of historical information be absolutely protected? For such an argument, see Volokh, Freedom of Speech, Permissible Tailoring and Transcending Strict Scrutiny, 144 U. Pa. L. Rev. 2417, 2425–2431 (1996).

Suppose the government claimed in this hypothetical criminal prosecution that the newspapers' disclosure of some of the historical information weakened our alliances, increased the difficulty of negotiating with other nations, prolonged the war, and delayed the release of American prisoners of war. Could the newspapers constitutionally be convicted? Are these sorts of issues, as Justice Harlan suggested, beyond the competence of courts? Consider the following arguments: (a) The executive may consciously or unconsciously err on the side of suppression in order to prevent the revelation of potentially embarrassing information. (b) Newspapers, eager to boost sales, may undervalue the interest in national security.

In considering the Pentagon Papers controversy, recall the problem of the true cry of “fire.” Even though the true cry may create a clear and present danger that some persons will be injured in the dash for the exit, the benefits of the speech may outweigh the harm. Do the decisions examined in this section, taken together, “leave little doubt that, except in cases involving imminent national military catastrophe, the Court will not permit previous restraints upon, or subsequent punishment for, publication in a mass medium of accurate information that the publisher has lawfully acquired”? Cox, Foreword: Freedom of Expression in the Burger Court, 94 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 17 (1980).

5. Disclosure of the NSA surveillance program. In January 2006, the New York Times publicly disclosed that President George W. Bush had secretly authorized the National Security Agency to intercept international telephone calls and emails between individuals inside the United States and individuals outside the United States whenever the NSA had “a reasonable basis to conclude that one party to the communication is a member of al Qaeda, affiliated with al Qaeda, or a member of an organization affiliated with al Qaeda, or working in support of al Qaeda.” Critics of the program charged that it violated the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which prohibits such surveillance in the absence of probable cause and a warrant. Defenders of the program argued that FISA violates the inherent authority of the “President as commander in chief of the Army and Navy.”

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales raised the possibility that the United States might prosecute the New York Times for violating the Espionage Act of 1917. Gonzales maintained that the disclosure of the program seriously undermined the national security by alerting terrorists to its existence. Suppose the United States had indicted the New York Times under section 793(e). What standard would apply in deciding whether the publication was protected by the first amendment? Note that the United States has never criminally prosecuted the press for publishing secret government information.

Suppose that in 2005 the NSA secretly broke the al Qaeda code, enabling the United States to thwart several terrorist attacks. Suppose further that in 2008 a newspaper published this information, with the result that the terrorists changed their cipher. In such circumstances, could the newspaper be punished for publishing this information?

Consider Stone, Government Secrecy v. Freedom of the Press, 1 Harv. L. & Pol. Rev. 185, 203–204 (2007):

[The] reason for protecting the publication of the Pentagon Papers was not only that the disclosure would not “surely result in direct, immediate, and irreparable damage” to the nation, but also that the Pentagon Papers made a meaningful contribution to informed public discourse. Suppose a newspaper accurately reports that American troops in Iraq recently murdered twenty insurgents in cold blood. As a result of this publication, insurgents quite predictably kidnap and murder twenty Americans. Could the newspaper constitutionally be punished for disclosing the initial massacre? I would argue that it could not. Even if there were a clear and present danger that the retaliation would follow, the information is simply too important to the American people to punish its publication.

What this suggests is that to justify the criminal punishment of the press for publishing classified information, the government must prove that the publisher knew that (a) it was publishing classified information, (b) the publication of which would result in likely, imminent, and serious harm to the national security, and (c) the publication of which would not meaningfully contribute to public debate.

6. Restricting speech because it was obtained illegally. Suppose a reporter gains access to confidential government information through an unlawful wiretap of a senator. Can the reporter be criminally punished for the wiretap? Can her newspaper be prohibited from publishing the information? Suppose the newspaper learns of the information as the result of a third party’s unlawful act, such as theft of a document or an unlawful wiretap. Can the newspaper be enjoined, criminally punished, or held civilly liable for invasion of privacy for publishing the information? See Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514 (2001), in which the Court held that federal and state anti-wiretap statutes cannot constitutionally be applied to a radio station that broadcasts the tape of an unlawfully intercepted telephone call, where the subject of the call was a matter of public concern and the broadcaster did not participate directly in the unlawful wiretap, even though the broadcaster knew that the material had been obtained unlawfully. Does this make any sense?

7. Public employees. The Court suggested in both Nebraska Press and Pentagon Papers that the state may keep information from the press by prohibiting government employees from disclosing that information. Suppose the government had prosecuted Daniel Ellsberg for releasing the Pentagon Papers. Should the government have greater authority to prohibit its employees from disclosing confidential information to the press than to prohibit the press from publishing such information once it comes into its hands? If an ultimate concern of the first amendment is the “public’s right to know,” isn’t that right undermined just as much by restrictions on the press's ability to obtain information as by restrictions on its ability to publish?

Consider Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980), in which Snepp, a former CIA agent, published a book about certain CIA activities in South Vietnam in violation of an express condition of his employment contract with the CIA in which he promised not to publish "any information or material relating to the Agency, its activities or intelligence activities generally, either during or after the term of [his] employment, [without] specific prior approval by the Agency." The Court, in a six-to-three decision, held that Snepp "breached a fiduciary obligation and that the proceeds of his breach are impressed with a constructive trust." The Court explained that the "Government has a compelling interest in protecting both the secrecy of information important to our national security and the appearance of confidentiality so essential to the effective operation of our foreign intelligence service." The Court concluded that the "agreement that Snepp signed is a reasonable means for protecting this vital interest."

Consider the following views:

a. The public employee gains access to confidential government information only by virtue of her employment. Thus, for government to prohibit her disclosure of such information does not limit any first amendment right the employee would have but for such employment.

b. Easterbrook, Insider Trading, Secret Agents, Evidentiary Privileges, and the Production of Information, 1981 Sup. Ct. Rev. 309, 345–347:

Snepp [struck] a bargain. He learned of the CIA's activities by agreeing to limit his speech about them. [So] long as he enters into the agreement without fraud or coercion, he has made a judgment that he is better off with the agreement (and its restraints) than without; he can hardly complain that his rights have been reduced. [Constitutional] rights are waived every day.

c. Sunstein, Government Control of Information, 74 Cal. L. Rev. 889, 915 (1986):

[The] first amendment is largely a structural provision. [Its] purpose is not only to protect private autonomy, but also to preserve a certain form of government. Citizens may often find it in their interest to give up rights of free speech in exchange for benefits from government. For many, these rights are not extremely valuable as individual possessions. But if government is permitted to obtain enforceable waivers, the aggregate effect may be considerable, and the deliberative processes of the public will be skewed. [Waivers] of first amendment rights thus affect people other than government employees, and effects on third parties are a classic reason to proscribe waivers. The analogy [is] to government purchases of voting rights, which are impermissible even if voters willingly assent.

In deciding whether government may constitutionally prohibit an employee's disclosure of particular "confidential" information, should courts consider not only the potential danger but also the potential value of the disclosure? For example, may an employee disclose "classified" information if it reveals a substantial abuse of power?

8. Snowden. If Edward Snowden returns to the United States, could he be prosecuted and convicted, consistent with the first amendment, for disclosing to journalists and thus to the world massive amounts of classified information about previously secret NSA surveillance programs? Consider the following positions:

a. Snowden accepted a position of trust in his relation to the government. He did not have to accept his job, but he did. A clear condition of that job was his voluntary agreement not to disclose any classified information. That agreement is binding. Period.

b. An individual government employee should never have the authority, on his own say, to override the judgments of the elected representatives of the American people and to decide for the nation that classified information should be disclosed to friends and foes alike. The question is who gets to decide when classified information should be made public. It should not be any tom-dick-and-harry government employee or private contractor with a security clearance who thinks he knows better than the President, the Congress, and the courts about how best to protect the nation's security.

c. Suppose the disclosure of the previously secret programs renders them ineffective in the future, thus seriously damaging the nation's ability to ferret out possible terrorist plots. Should Snowden nonetheless have a first amendment defense if, upon learning about the previously secret programs, the public opposes them as a matter of policy? If the programs are found to have been illegal? If some of the programs he disclosed were illegal and others were legal?

d. Does your view on any of these positions change if the prosecution is directed against the newspaper publishing Snowden's revelations rather than against Snowden himself?

e. Should Snowden's intent matter? Suppose he intended to aid the enemy? He intended to promote democratic review of secret decisions? He thought the disclosures wouldn't be harmful, but they were? For an analysis of the intent question, see Papandrea, National Security Information Disclosures and the Role of Intent, 56 Wm. & M. L. Rev. 1381 (2015).

For an historical analysis of government secrecy and an argument that "by seeking to keep secret so much for so long, the secrecy system cheapens and undermines our vital secrets," see F. Schwarz, Jr., Democracy in the Dark: The Seduction of Government Secrecy (2015). See also H. Kitrosser, Reclaiming Accountability: Transparency, Executive Power, and the U.S. Constitution (2015); Posen, The Leaky Leviathan: Why the Government Condemns and Condones Unlawful Disclosures of Information, 127 Harv. L. Rev. 512, 515 (2013).

9. "Technical" information. Suppose, in addition to general historical information, the Pentagon Papers had disclosed blueprints of secret military weapons, the identity of covert agents abroad, or secret codes? Is the disclosure of such information more readily subject to restriction? See Symposium, National Security and the First Amendment, 26 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 715 (1985). Do you agree that "the law need not treat differently the crime of one man who sells a bomb to terrorists and that of another who publishes an instructional manual for terrorists on how to build their own bombs out of old Volkswagen parts"? Tribe, supra, at 837. For analysis of the constitutional status of technical data, see Sunstein, supra, at 905–912.

10. Facts and the first amendment. Note that in many cases the government is attempting to restrict the dissemination of facts rather than opinions. The seminal conception of the first amendment was about the "marketplace of ideas." How do facts fit into this marketplace? Should government efforts to restrict the dissemination of facts be treated the same way as government efforts to restrict the dissemination of ideas? In addition to the cases in this section, consider also the following: (a) an anti-abortion group publishes on its website the names and addresses of abortion providers; (b) a newspaper publishes the name of a rape victim; (c) a reporter discloses the names of covert American agents in Iran; (d) a terrorist posts on the internet instructions on how to make out of common household materials a bomb that is sufficiently powerful to destroy a large building; (e) a newspaper publishes classified information on how to make a nuclear bomb. See Bhagwat, Details: Specific Facts and the First Amendment, 86 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1 (2012); United States v. The Progressive, Inc., 467 F. Supp. 990 (W.D. Wis. 1979); Powe, The H-Bomb Injunction, 61 U. Colo. L. Rev. 55 (1990).

Consider Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280 (1981), in which the Court upheld the revocation of Agee's passport because he engaged in activities abroad that caused “serious damage to the national security.” Specifically, Agee, a former employee of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), engaged in a campaign “to expose CIA officers and agents and to take the measures necessary to drive them out of the countries where they are operating.” Although Agee did not expressly incite “anyone to commit murder,” there was evidence that his disclosures resulted in “episodes of violence against the persons and organizations identified.”

The Court rejected Agee’s claim that the passport revocation violated his rights under the first amendment: “Long ago, [this] Court recognized that ‘No one would question but that a government might prevent actual obstruction to its recruiting service or the publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops.’ [Near, section C2, infra.] Agee’s disclosures [have] the declared purpose of obstructing intelligence operations and the recruiting of personnel. They are clearly not protected by the Constitution.”

Is Agee consistent with the Pentagon Papers decision? Are Agee’s disclosures “not protected” because they consisted of “technical,” rather than “historical,” information? Because they were designed to effect change not through the political process but by directly obstructing the operations of government? Consider the constitutionality of the Intelligence Identities Protection Act, 50 U.S.C. §421 (1982), which prohibits any person “with reason to believe that such activities would impair or impede the foreign intelligence activities of the United States, [to disclose] any information that identifies an individual as a covert agent, [if the disclosure is part of a] pattern of activities intended to identify or expose covert action.”

Note: Dangerous Ideas and Information—Final Thoughts

In what circumstances, if any, may government, consonant with the first amendment, restrict speech of “high” first amendment value because, if left unchecked, it might cause some harm to government, private individuals, or society in general? As the foregoing materials illustrate, the Court’s efforts to define the perimeters of government power in this regard have focused primarily on the clear and present danger standard. Has that standard served well? In a different context, Justice Holmes, the author of the clear and present danger standard, warned of “the need of scrutinizing the reasons for the rules which we follow, and of not being contented with hollow forms of words merely because they have been used very [often]. We must think things not words, or at least we must constantly translate our words into the facts for which they stand, if we are to keep to the real and the true.” O. Holmes, Collected Legal Papers 238 (1920).

Has the Court been sensitive to this admonition, or has it “tended to seek [solutions] for problems of freedom of speech by invocation of magic phrases rather than hard rationalizations, if not by way of resolving the issues then by way of covering them up”? Kurland, The Irrelevance of the Constitution: The First Amendment’s Freedom of Speech and Freedom of Press Clauses, 29 Drake L. Rev. 1, 5 (1979–1980).

Has the Court, in its results, been underprotective of free speech? Has it been overprotective? A canvass of what the Court has done may be more illuminating than an emphasis on what it has said. The Court has not upheld a direct prohibition of speech because it might induce readers or listeners to engage in criminal activity since Dennis (1951), and it has not upheld a direct prohibition of speech for this reason in the absence of express advocacy of crime since the Espionage Act cases following World War I. The Court has not upheld a restriction on speech because it might provoke a hostile audience response since Feiner (1951). With the exception of Agee, it has never upheld a restriction on the publication of truthful information because the government would prefer to keep it confidential. Has clear and present danger come to mean essentially absolute protection?

C. OVERBREADTH, VAGUENESS, AND PRIOR RESTRAINT

This section represents a brief interlude in our analysis of content-based restrictions. It focuses not on what speech government may restrict but rather on how government may restrict speech. The doctrines examined in this section may be explored either as a distinct unit or as they naturally arise in the course of the preceding and succeeding material.

In interpreting the first amendment, courts have often focused not only on what speech is “protected,” but also on what means of restriction are constitutionally permissible. Indeed, “courts have [come] to realize that procedural guarantees play [a] large role in protecting freedom of speech; [for like] the substantive rules themselves, insensitive procedures can ‘chill’ the right of free expression. Accordingly, wherever first amendment claims are involved, sensitive procedural devices are necessary.” Monaghan, First Amendment “Due Process,” 83 Harv. L. Rev. 518, 518–519 (1970).

The overbreadth, vagueness, and prior restraint doctrines have played an especially important role in this aspect of first amendment jurisprudence. Under each of these doctrines, courts may invalidate restrictions on expression because the means of suppression are impermissible, even though the particular speech at issue might constitutionally be restricted by some other means.

1. Overbreadth and Vagueness

Gooding v. Wilson

405 U.S. 518 (1972)

[During an antiwar demonstration at an army induction center, police attempted to move appellee and his companions away from the door of the center. A scuffle ensued, and appellee said to several of the officers, “You son of a bitch, I’ll choke you to death”; “White son of a bitch, I’ll kill you”; and “You son of a bitch, if you ever put your hands on me again, I’ll cut you all to pieces.” Appellee was thereafter convicted of using opprobrious words and abusive language in violation of Georgia Code Ann. §26-6303, which provided: “Any person who shall, without provocation, use to or of another, and in his presence [opprobrious] words or abusive language, tending to cause a breach of the peace [shall] be guilty of a misdemeanor.” The Supreme Court affirmed a decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals granting appellee’s petition for federal habeas corpus relief.]

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court....

Section 26-6303 punishes only spoken words. It can therefore withstand appellee’s attack upon its facial constitutionality only if, as authoritatively construed by the Georgia courts, it is not susceptible of application to speech, although vulgar or offensive, that is protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. [Only] the Georgia courts can supply the requisite construction, since of course “we lack jurisdiction authoritatively to construe state legislation.” [It] matters not that the words appellee used might have been constitutionally prohibited under a narrowly and precisely drawn statute. At least when statutes regulate or proscribe speech and when “no readily apparent construction suggests itself as a vehicle for rehabilitating the statutes in a single prosecution,” [the] transcendent value to all society of constitutionally protected expression is deemed to justify allowing “attacks on overly broad statutes with no requirement that the person making the attack demonstrate that his own conduct could not be regulated by a statute drawn with the requisite narrow specificity.” [This] is deemed necessary because persons whose expression is constitutionally protected may well refrain from exercising their rights for fear of criminal sanctions provided by a statute susceptible of application to protected expression....

The constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech forbid the States to punish the use of words or language not within “narrowly limited classes of speech.” [Chaplinsky.] [Statutes] must be carefully drawn or be authoritatively construed to punish only unprotected speech and not be susceptible of application to protected expression. “Because First Amendment freedoms need breathing space to survive, government may regulate in the area only with narrow specificity.”...

Appellant does not challenge these principles but contends that the Georgia statute is narrowly drawn to apply only to a constitutionally unprotected class of words—“fighting” words—“those which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace.” [Chaplinsky.] In Chaplinsky, we sustained a conviction under [a statute] which provided: “No person shall address any offensive, derisive or annoying word to any other person who is lawfully in any street or other public place, nor call him by any offensive or derisive name....” Chaplinsky was convicted for addressing to another on a public sidewalk the words, “You are a God damned racketeer,” and “a damned Fascist and the whole government of Rochester are Fascists or agents of Fascists.” Chaplinsky challenged the constitutionality of the statute as inhibiting freedom of expression because it was vague and indefinite. The Supreme Court of New Hampshire, however, “long before the words for which Chaplinsky was convicted,” sharply limited the statutory language “offensive, derisive or annoying word” to “fighting” words....

In view of that authoritative construction, this Court held: “We are unable to say that the limited scope of the statute as thus construed contravenes the Constitutional right of free expression. It is a statute narrowly drawn and limited to define and punish specific conduct lying within the domain of state power, the use in a public place of words likely to cause a breach of the peace.”...

Appellant argues that the Georgia appellate courts have by construction limited the prescription of §26-6303 to “fighting” words, as the New Hampshire Supreme Court limited the New Hampshire statute. [We] have, however, made our own examination of the Georgia cases, both those cited and others discovered in research. That examination brings us to the conclusion, in agreement with the courts below, that the Georgia appellate decisions have not construed §26-6303 to be limited in application, as in Chaplinsky, to words that “have a direct tendency to cause acts of violence by the person to whom, individually, the remark is addressed.”...

Moreover, [because Georgia has consistently] applied §26-6303 to utterances where there was no likelihood that the person addressed would make an immediate violent response, it is clear that the standard allowing juries to determine guilt [does] not limit the application of §26-6303 to “fighting” words defined by Chaplinsky....

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE POWELL and MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER, dissenting.

I fully join in Mr. Justice Blackmun's dissent against the bizarre result reached by the Court. [The] Court apparently acknowledges that the conduct of the defendant in this case is not protected by the First Amendment, and does not contend that the Georgia statute is so ambiguous that he did not have fair notice that his conduct was prohibited. Nor does the Court deny that under normal principles of constitutional adjudication, appellee would not be permitted to attack his own conviction on the ground that the statute in question might in some hypothetical situation be unconstitutionally applied to the conduct of some party not before the Court....

[Justice Blackmun also dissented.]

Note: Overbreadth

1. The nature of overbreadth. The traditional “as applied” mode of judicial review tests the constitutionality of legislation as it is applied to particular facts on a case-by-case basis. Suppose, for example, a state law prohibits any person to “advocate criminal conduct.” Under “as applied” review, this law could constitutionally be applied to any expression that satisfies the requirements of Brandenburg. That the law fails “on its face” to comport with the strictures of Brandenburg is, under this approach, irrelevant.

The first amendment overbreadth doctrine, on the other hand, tests the constitutionality of legislation in terms of its potential applications. Under this approach, a state law prohibiting any person to “advocate unlawful conduct” is unconstitutional “on its face” because the law purports to forbid expression that the state may not constitutionally prohibit. That an individual defendant’s own speech could constitutionally be restricted under a more narrowly drawn statute is irrelevant.

In effect, then, the overbreadth doctrine is an exception both to the traditional “as applied” mode of judicial review and to the general rule that an individual has no standing to litigate the rights of third persons. See United States v. Raines, 362 U.S. 17 (1960); Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249 (1953); see also Note, Standing to Assert Constitutional Jus Tertii, 88 Harv. L. Rev. 423 (1974).

2. Justifications and criticisms of overbreadth. The overbreadth doctrine is “highly protective of first amendment interests, not only because it sometimes prescribes invalidation of an entire provision but also because of the alacrity with which it can accomplish that result.” Note, The First Amendment Overbreadth Doctrine, 83 Harv. L. Rev. 844, 846 (1970). Are you persuaded by Justice Brennan’s explanation in Gooding that this exception to ordinary standing rules is “necessary because persons whose expression is constitutionally protected may well refrain from exercising their rights for fear of criminal sanctions provided by a statute susceptible of application to protected expression”? Are you persuaded that “one of the evils of an overly broad statute is its potential for selective enforcement” and that the doctrine is thus justified because “it can minimize [this] danger by restricting the occasions for enforcement”? Karst, Equality as a Central Principle in the First Amendment, 43 U. Chi. L. Rev. 20, 38 (1975).

What are the costs of the overbreadth doctrine? Consider the following objections: (a) Because the doctrine permits an individual whose own rights have not been violated to “go free” or to otherwise benefit because the statute might conceivably interfere with the rights of others, it unjustifiably frustrates legitimate state interests. (b) The doctrine enables the Court to act “as if it had a roving commission” to find and to cure unconstitutionality and is thus inconsistent with a fundamental premise of judicial review—that judicial resolution of constitutional controversies is warranted only when unavoidable. A. Cox, The Warren Court 18 (1968). (c) The doctrine may promote judicial disingenuousness, for it invites the Court to escape possibly difficult decisions concerning the constitutionality of the statute “as applied” so long as it can hypothesize potentially unconstitutional applications not actually before the Court. (d) Because the Court may invalidate a statute for overbreadth without explaining precisely how the statute should have been drafted to pass constitutional muster, invocation of the doctrine “lacks intellectual coherence” and may leave legislatures with little or no guidance on how to avoid the Court’s objections in the future. Id. at 53.

3. The problem of narrowing construction. As noted in Gooding, the statute at issue in Chaplinsky was clearly overbroad on its face but was saved by the state court’s narrowing construction. When may a court narrowly construe a facially overbroad statute to save it from invalidation? In affirming the conviction of Gooding, could the Georgia Supreme Court have limited the statute to “fighting words” and thus avoided overbreadth invalidation? Was the legislative intent too clear in Gooding to permit a narrowing interpretation? Would a narrowing construction by the Georgia Supreme Court have come too late to affect Gooding?

Consider Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990), in which the Court upheld a child pornography statute as construed by the state supreme court on appeal in the same case. Although the statute, as written, was unconstitutionally overbroad, the Court held that it was saved from invalidation by the state supreme court's narrowing construction, and that the statute, as construed, could "be applied to conduct occurring prior to the construction, provided such application affords fair warning to the defendant." In Osborne, the Court concluded that the statute afforded "fair warning" because the defendant "would not [have been] surprised to learn that his possession of [the] photographs at issue [constituted] a crime."

Note that the Supreme Court of the United States had no authority to adopt a narrowing construction in Gooding. Is that sensible? Wouldn't a narrowing construction have involved a less drastic exercise of federal power than invalidation? Consider Virginia v. American Booksellers Association, Inc., 484 U.S. 383 (1988), in which the Court, rather than speculate on the reach of an ambiguous state statute, certified to the Virginia Supreme Court the question whether the challenged statute actually covered those acts of expression that gave rise to the overbreadth challenge. Is this a sensible approach?

Suppose that, while a criminal prosecution is on appeal, the state legislature amends the challenged statute to eliminate the unconstitutional overbreadth. May the defendant still take advantage of the fact that the statute was overbroad at the time he violated it? See Massachusetts v. Oakes, 491 U.S. 576 (1989) (defendant may still assert overbreadth).

4. Broadrick: requiring "substantial" overbreadth. Chief Justice Burger maintained in Gooding that the overbreadth doctrine should be invoked only when there is "a significant likelihood of deterring important First Amendment speech." In Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601 (1973), the Court, in a five-to-four decision, expressly adopted such a limitation. Broadrick involved a state law restricting the political activities of civil servants. The plaintiffs conceded that the state could constitutionally prohibit civil servants from doing what they had done—solicit funds for political candidates. They argued, however, that the law was unconstitutionally overbroad because it attempted also to prohibit civil servants from engaging in such relatively innocuous and thus constitutionally protected activities as displaying political bumper stickers and buttons.

The Court, in an opinion by Justice White, observed that under the overbreadth doctrine, litigants "are permitted to challenge a statute not because their own rights of free expression are violated, but because of a judicial prediction or assumption that the statute's very existence may cause others not before the court to refrain from constitutionally protected speech or expression."

Terming the doctrine “strong medicine,” the Court argued that, although laws, “if too broadly worded, may deter protected speech to some unknown extent, there comes a point where that effect—at best a prediction—cannot, with confidence, justify invalidating a statute on its face and so prohibiting a State from enforcing the statute against conduct that is admittedly within its power to proscribe.” Thus, the Court concluded, “we believe that the overbreadth of a statute must not only be real, but substantial as well, judged in relation to the statute’s plainly legitimate sweep.” Applying that standard to the statute in Broadrick, the Court concluded that, because the statute “regulates a substantial spectrum of conduct that [is] manifestly subject to state regulation,” it “is not substantially overbroad [and] whatever overbreadth may exist should [thus] be cured through case-by-case analysis of the fact situations to which its sanctions, assertedly, may not be applied.”

In dissent, Justice Brennan described Broadrick “as a wholly unjustified retreat from fundamental and previously well-established [principles].” The Court, Brennan noted, “makes no effort to define what it means by ‘substantial overbreadth’” and “no effort to explain why the overbreadth of the Oklahoma Act, while real, is somehow not quite substantial.”

5. The impact of Broadrick. In Los Angeles City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789 (1984), the Court offered the following elaboration:

The concept of “substantial overbreadth” is not readily reduced to an exact definition. It is clear, however, that the mere fact that one can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge. On the contrary, [there] must be a realistic danger that the statute itself will significantly compromise recognized First Amendment protections of parties not before the Court for it to be facially challenged on overbreadth grounds.

How should “substantiality” be measured: By the total number of unconstitutional applications? By the ratio of possible constitutional to possible unconstitutional applications? Should the state have to justify even an “insubstantial” overbreadth? See Redish, The Warren Court, the Burger Court and the First Amendment Overbreadth Doctrine, 78 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1031, 1067 (1983) (the “logical question [is] whether [a] more narrowly drawn [law] would inadequately achieve the state’s goal”).

The ultimate impact of Broadrick remains obscure. See New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982), section D6, infra (upholding as not substantially overbroad a child pornography statute prohibiting any person to produce, exhibit, or sell any material depicting any “performance” by a child under the age of sixteen that includes “actual or simulated sexual intercourse, deviate sexual intercourse, sexual bestiality, masturbation, sado-masochistic abuse, or lewd exhibition of the genitals”); National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569 (1998), section E2d, infra (upholding as not substantially overbroad a federal statute directing the NEA, in establishing procedures to judge the artistic merit of grant applications, to “take[e] into consideration general standards of decency and respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public”).

Note: Vagueness

1. The danger of vagueness. Although not all overbroad laws are vague (e.g., “No person may expressly advocate criminal conduct”), and not all vague laws are overbroad (e.g., “No person may engage in any speech that the state may constitutionally restrict”), there is in most circumstances a close relation between the two doctrines. As a matter of due process, a law is void on its face if it is so vague that persons “of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application.” Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391 (1926). A law that fails to define clearly the conduct it proscribes “may trap the innocent by not providing fair warning” and may in practical effect impermissibly delegate “basic policy matters to policemen, judges and juries for resolution on an ad hoc and subjective basis, with the attendant dangers of arbitrary and discriminatory application.” Grayned v. Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 108–109 (1972).

These concerns are present whenever a law is vague, whether or not it touches on expression. The vagueness doctrine has special bite in the first amendment context, however, for “where First Amendment interests are affected, a precise statute ‘evincing a legislative judgment that certain specific conduct [be] proscribed,’ assures us that the legislature has focused on the First Amendment interests and determined that other governmental policies compel regulation.” Moreover, “where a vague statute ‘[abuts] upon sensitive areas of basic First Amendment freedoms,’ it ‘operates to inhibit the exercise of [those] freedoms.’” Uncertain meanings inevitably lead citizens to “‘steer far wider of the unlawful zone’ [than] if the boundaries of the forbidden areas were clearly marked.” Id. at 109 and n.5. In at least some instances, in other words, it may be difficult to determine whether a vague law proscribes—or purports to proscribe—constitutionally protected expression. In such circumstances, vague laws, like overbroad laws, may have a significant chilling effect and may invite selective enforcement. See Amsterdam, The Void-for-Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court, 109 U. Pa. L. Rev. 67 (1960).

2. How “vague” is “too vague”? The degree of constitutionally tolerable vagueness “is not calculable with precision; in any particular area, the legislature confronts a dilemma: to draft with narrow particularity is to risk nullification by easy evasion of the legislative purpose; to draft with great generality is to risk ensnarement of the innocent in a net designed for others.” L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 1033 (2d ed. 1988). How vague must a law be for it to be held void on its face? Should it matter whether the vagueness is “avoidable”? Whether it is “substantial”? Consider the following:

a. A city ordinance provides that “no person, while on public or private grounds adjacent to any building in which a school [is] in session, shall willfully make [any] noise or diversion which disturbs or tends to disturb the peace or good order of such school.” In Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972), the Court rejected a vagueness challenge because “we think it is clear what the ordinance as a whole prohibits.”

b. A Massachusetts statute provides that any person who “publicly mutilates, tramples upon, defaces or treats contemptuously the flag of the United States” shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. In Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 566 (1974), the Court invalidated the statute because the statutory prohibition on treating the flag “contemptuously” failed “to draw reasonably clear lines between the kinds [of] treatment that are criminal and those that are not.”

2. Prior Restraint

The doctrine of prior restraint has its roots in the sixteenth- and seventeenth-century English licensing systems under which all printing presses and printers were licensed by the state and no book or pamphlet could lawfully be published without the prior approval of a government censor. With the expiration of this system in England in 1695, the right of the press to be free from licensing gradually assumed the status of a common law right. Blackstone’s definition of freedom of the press illustrates the importance of the doctrine of prior restraint in eighteenth-century thought: “The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published.” 4 W. Blackstone, Commentaries *151–152.

Even after adoption of the first amendment, Justice Story and other early American commentators accepted the view that liberty of the press was limited to “the right to publish without any previous restraint or license.” J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States §1879 (1833); see also 2

J. Kent, Commentaries on American Law 23 (2d ed. 1832). Moreover, in its 1907 decision in Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454, 462 (1907), the Court, speaking through Justice Holmes, announced that the Constitution prohibited “all such previous restraints upon publications as had been practiced by other governments,” but not “the subsequent punishment of such as may be deemed contrary to the public welfare.” And, although the Court, speaking again through Justice Holmes, recognized a dozen years later in Schenck that “the prohibition of laws abridging the freedom of speech is not confined to previous restraints,” the doctrine of prior restraint has continued to play a central role in the jurisprudence of the first amendment. As indicated in the Pentagon Papers and Nebraska Press decisions, section B3 supra, the Court has steadfastly held that there is a special presumption under the first amendment against the use of prior restraints.

Like the vagueness and overbreadth concepts, the doctrine of prior restraint is concerned with the permissible means of restricting speech. A prior restraint may thus be invalid even if the particular expression at issue could constitutionally be restricted by some other means, such as subsequent criminal prosecution. Although the historical origins of the doctrine are clear, its analytical and functional underpinnings are often puzzling, at best. Apart from historical considerations, why are prior restraints special? After all, “whether the sanction be fine or imprisonment for criminal violation or fine or imprisonment for violation of [a prior restraint], the judicial sanction takes its bite after the [expression.]” Freund, The Supreme Court and Civil Liberties, 4 Vand. L. Rev. 533, 537–538 (1951).

Lovell v. Griffin

303 U.S. 444 (1938)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant, Alma Lovell, was convicted in the Recorder’s Court of the City of Griffin, Georgia, of the violation of a city ordinance and was sentenced to imprisonment for fifty days in default of the payment of a fine of fifty dollars....

The ordinance in question is as follows:

Section 1. That the practice of distributing, either by hand or otherwise, circulars, handbooks, advertising, or literature of any kind, whether said articles are being delivered free, or whether same are being sold, within the limits of the City of Griffin, without first obtaining written permission from the City Manager of the City of Griffin, such practice shall be deemed a nuisance, and punishable as an offense against the City of Griffin....

The violation, which is not denied, consisted of the distribution without the required permission of a pamphlet and magazine in the nature of religious tracts, setting forth the gospel of the "Kingdom of Jehovah." Appellant did not apply for a permit....

The ordinance in its broad sweep prohibits the distribution of "circulars, handbooks, advertising, or literature of any kind." [The] ordinance is not limited to "literature" that is obscene or offensive to public morals or that advocates unlawful conduct. [The] ordinance embraces "literature" in the widest sense. [Moreover, the] ordinance prohibits the distribution of literature of any kind at any time, at any place, and in any manner without a permit from the City Manager.

We think that the ordinance is invalid on its face. Whatever the motive which induced its adoption, its character is such that it strikes at the very foundation of the freedom of the press by subjecting it to license and censorship. The struggle for the freedom of the press was primarily directed against the power of the licensor. It was against that power that John Milton directed his assault by his "Appeal for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing." And the liberty of the press became initially a right to publish "without a license what formerly could be published only with one." While this freedom from previous restraint upon publication cannot be regarded as exhausting the guaranty of liberty, the prevention of that restraint was a leading purpose in the adoption of the constitutional provision....

Legislation of the type of the ordinance in question would restore the system of license and censorship in its baldest form....

As the ordinance is void on its face, it was not necessary for appellant to seek a permit under it. She was entitled to contest its validity in answer to the charge against her....

Reversed.

Note: Licensing as Prior Restraint

1. Standardless licensing. What is the special vice of the licensing scheme in Lovell? Why not simply uphold the scheme on its face but permit any person whose application for a license is unconstitutionally denied to challenge that denial in court? Is the Court’s primary concern in Lovell the absence of standards to guide the city manager’s discretion? See Kagan, Private Speech, Public Purpose: The Role of Governmental Motive in First Amendment Doctrine, 63 U. Chi. L. Rev. 415, 459–463 (1996) (“the rule against standardless licensing [serves the] function of flushing out bad motives by establishing a safeguard against administrative action based on the content of expression”).

In City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Co., 486 U.S. 750 (1988), the Court applied the Lovell principle to invalidate an ordinance that gave a mayor standardless discretion to grant or deny permits to place newsracks on public property. The Court explained that the evils of standardless licensing “can be effectively alleviated only through a facial challenge”:

First, the mere existence of the licensor’s unfettered discretion [intimidates] parties into censoring their own speech, even if the discretion and power are never actually abused. [Self-censorship] is immune to an “as applied” challenge, for it derives from the individual’s own actions, not an abuse of government power. [Only] standards limiting the licensor’s discretion will eliminate this danger by adding an element of certainty to fatal self-censorship. And only a facial challenge can effectively test the statute for these standards.

Second, the absence of express standards makes it difficult to distinguish, “as applied,” between a licensor’s legitimate denial of a permit and its illegitimate abuse of censorial power. Standards provide the guideposts that check the licensor and allow courts quickly and easily to determine whether the licensor is discriminating against disfavored speech. Without these guideposts, post hoc rationalizations by the licensing official and the use of shifting or illegitimate criteria are far too easy, making it difficult for courts to determine in any particular case whether the licensor is permitting favorable, and suppressing unfavorable, expression.

Following Lovell, the Court has repeatedly held that a state “cannot vest restraining control over the right to speak [in] an administrative official where there are no appropriate standards to guide his action.” Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290, 295 (1951) (permit required for religious meetings); see also Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147 (1969) (permit required for parades); Staub v. City of Baxley, 355 U.S. 313 (1958) (permit required to solicit members for dues-paying organization); Saia v. New York, 334 U.S. 558 (1948) (permit required to operate sound amplifiers in public); Forsyth County, Georgia v. The Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123 (1992) (even nominal permit fees for marches, demonstrations, and parades cannot be imposed in the absence of clear standards governing the setting of fees).

2. Licensing with standards. Suppose the authority of licensing officials to deny a permit is explicitly limited to only those circumstances in which the proposed expression could constitutionally be punished in a subsequent criminal prosecution. Would such a scheme, like that in Lovell, be unconstitutional on its face? Assume, for example, a state may constitutionally prohibit any person to participate in a parade that would physically interfere with another, ongoing parade. To prevent such conflicts from occurring, could the state constitutionally prohibit any person to participate in a parade without first obtaining a permit, where the licensing officials are authorized to deny a permit only on a finding that the proposed parade would physically interfere with another, previously authorized parade? Cf. Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 (1941), section E2a, infra. Or assume a state may constitutionally make criminal the exhibition of “obscene” motion pictures. May the state constitutionally create a licensing board to which all movies must be submitted prior to public exhibition, where the board is authorized to deny a license only on a finding that a movie is “obscene”? So long as the standards are clear, precise, and in conformity with the standards employed in subsequent criminal prosecutions, is there any reason to erect a special presumption against “prior” restraints?

3. The objections to licensing. Consider Emerson, The Doctrine of Prior Restraint, 20 Law & Contemp. Probs. 648, 656–660 (1955):

[(1)] A system of prior restraint normally brings within the complex of government machinery a far greater amount of communication than a system of subsequent punishment. [The] pall of government control is, thus, likely to hang more pervasively over the area of communication.

[(2)] Under a system of subsequent punishment, the communication has already been made before the government takes action. [Under] a system of prior restraint, the communication, if banned, never reaches the market place at all. Or the communication may be withheld until the issue of its release is finally settled, at which time it may have become obsolete.

[(3)] A system of prior restraint is so constructed as to make it easier, and hence more likely, that in any particular case the government will rule adversely to free expression. [A] government official thinks longer and harder before deciding to undertake the serious task of subsequent punishment. [Under] a system of prior restraint, he can reach the result by a simple stroke of the pen.

[(4)] Under a system of prior restraint, the issue of whether a communication is to be suppressed or not is determined by an administrative rather than a criminal procedure. This means that the procedural protections built around the criminal prosecution [are] not applicable to a prior restraint.

[(5)] A system of prior restraint usually operates behind a screen of informality and partial concealment that seriously curtails opportunity for public appraisal and increases the chances of discrimination and other abuse.

[(6)] [As] common experience [shows, the] attitudes, drives, emotions, and impulses [of licensers] all tend to carry them to excesses. [The] function of the censor is to censor. He has a professional interest in finding things to suppress. [These factors combine to produce] unintelligent, overzealous, and usually absurd administration.

[(7)] A system of prior restraint is, in general, more readily and effectively enforced than a system of subsequent punishment. [A] penal proceeding to enforce a prior restraint normally involves only a limited and relatively simple issue—whether or not the communication was made without prior approval. The objection to the content or manner of the communication need not be demonstrated. And furthermore, the violation of a censorship order strikes sharply at the status of the licenser, whose prestige thus becomes involved and whose power must be vindicated.

How weighty are these concerns? In light of these concerns, should licensing ever be permitted?

4. The Freedman case: procedural safeguards. In Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965), appellant, in violation of a state motion picture censorship statute, exhibited a film, conceded by the state not to be obscene or otherwise violative of the statutory standards, without first submitting it to the State Board of Censors for review. In a unanimous decision, the Court, speaking through Justice Brennan, held the statute invalid. At the outset, the Court emphasized that the statute was unconstitutional not because it might “prevent even the first showing of a film whose exhibition may legitimately be the subject of an obscenity prosecution,” but rather because the administration of the censorship system “presents peculiar dangers to constitutionally protected speech.” The Court explained that unlike a prosecution for obscenity, a censorship proceeding puts the initial burden on the exhibitor or distributor. Because the censor’s business is to censor, there inheres the danger that he may well be less responsive than a court—part of an independent branch of government—to the constitutionally protected interests in free expression. And if it is made unduly onerous, by reason of delay or otherwise, to seek judicial review, the censor’s determination may in practice be final.

The Court thus concluded that “a noncriminal process which requires the prior submission of a film to a censor avoids constitutional infirmity only if it takes place under procedural safeguards designed to obviate the dangers of a censorship system.”

The Court then identified and explained several constitutionally required safeguards:

First, the burden of proving that the film is unprotected expression must rest on the [censor]. Second, while the State may require advance submission of all films, in order to proceed effectively to bar all showings of unprotected films, the requirement cannot be administered in a manner which would lend an effect of finality to the censor’s determination whether a film constitutes protected expression. [Because] only a judicial determination in an adversary proceeding ensures the necessary sensitivity to freedom of expression, only a procedure requiring a judicial determination suffices to impose a valid final restraint.

[To] this end, the exhibitor must be assured, by statute or authoritative judicial construction, that the censor will, within a specified brief period, either issue a license or go to court to restrain showing the film. Any restraint imposed in advance of a final judicial determination on the merits must similarly be limited to preservation of the status quo for the shortest fixed period compatible with sound judicial resolution. Moreover, [the] procedure must also assure a prompt final judicial decision, to minimize the deterrent effect of an interim and possibly erroneous denial of a license. Without these safeguards, it may prove too burdensome to seek review of the censor’s determination.

Because the Maryland scheme did not contain these procedural safeguards, the Court held it unconstitutional on its face. Justices Douglas and Black concurred on the ground that no “form of censorship—no matter how speedy or prolonged it may be—is permissible.”

5. The Freedman safeguards. Should the Freedman safeguards be deemed a minimum requirement before any licensing scheme may pass constitutional muster? What about the parade permit scheme, noted earlier? See Blasi, Prior Restraints on Demonstrations, 68 Mich. L. Rev. 1481, 1536–1552 (1970); Monaghan, First Amendment “Due Process,” 83 Harv. L. Rev. 518, 541–543 (1970). See Thomas v. Chicago Park District, 534 U.S. 316 (2002) (a content-neutral licensing scheme regulating the time, place and manner of use of a public forum need not employ the procedural safeguards required by Freedman because such a scheme “does not authorize a licensor to pass judgment on the content of speech").

To what extent do the Freedman safeguards mitigate the dangers of licensing? Does it follow from Freedman that a licensing scheme is always constitutional so long as (a) the licensor's authority to deny a permit is limited to only those circumstances in which the expression could constitutionally be subjected to subsequent criminal prosecution and (b) the Freedman safeguards are employed? Freedman involved the licensing of motion pictures. Can government constitutionally require that all books be submitted to a board of censors prior to publication in order to screen out those that are obscene or include libelous statements?

Near v. Minnesota

283 U.S. 697 (1931)

[A Minnesota statute provided for the abatement, as a public nuisance, of a "malicious, scandalous and defamatory newspaper, magazine or other periodical." The statute provided further that there "shall be available the defense that the truth was published with good motives and for justifiable ends." In November 1927, a county attorney sought to invoke this statute against The Saturday Press, which had run a series of articles charging "in substance that a Jewish gangster was in control of gambling, bootlegging and racketeering in Minneapolis, and that law enforcing officers and agencies were not energetically performing their duties." The Saturday Press was especially critical of the Chief of Police, who was charged "with gross neglect of duty, illicit relations with gangsters, and with participation in graft." Pursuant to the statute, a state trial court perpetually enjoined The Saturday Press and its owners from publishing or circulating "any publication whatsoever which is a malicious, scandalous or defamatory newspaper." The Supreme Court reversed.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES delivered the opinion of the Court....

[The] object of the statute is not punishment, in the ordinary sense, but suppression of the offending newspaper or periodical. The reason for the enactment, as the state court has said, is that prosecutions to enforce penal statutes for libel do not result in "efficient repression or suppression of the evils of scandal."...

[The statute provides] that public authorities may bring [the] publisher of a newspaper or periodical before a judge upon a charge of conducting a business of publishing scandalous and defamatory matter [and] unless [the] publisher is able [to prove] that the charges are true and are published with good motives and for justifiable ends, his newspaper or periodical is suppressed and further publication is made punishable as a contempt. This is of the essence of censorship.

The question is whether a statute authorizing such proceedings [is] consistent with the conception of the liberty of the press as historically conceived and guaranteed. In determining the extent of the constitutional protection, it has been generally, if not universally, considered that it is the chief purpose of the guaranty to prevent previous restraints upon publication. [The] protection even as to previous restraint is not absolutely unlimited. But the limitation has been recognized only in exceptional cases. [No] one would question but that a government might prevent actual obstruction to its recruiting service or the publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops. On similar grounds, the primary requirements of decency may be enforced against obscene publications. The security of the community life may be protected against incitements to acts of violence and the overthrow by force of orderly government. [These] limitations are not applicable here....

The fact that for approximately one hundred and fifty years there has been almost an entire absence of attempts to impose previous restraints upon publications relating to the malfeasance of public officers is significant of the deep-seated conviction that such restraints would violate constitutional right. Public officers, whose character and conduct remain open to debate and free discussion in the press, find their remedies for false accusations in actions under libel laws providing for redress and punishment, and not in proceedings to restrain the publication of newspapers and periodicals. [The] fact that the liberty of the press may be abused by miscreant purveyors of scandal does not make any the less necessary the immunity of the press from previous restraint in dealing with official misconduct. Subsequent punishment for such abuses as may exist is the appropriate remedy, consistent with constitutional privilege....

The statute in question cannot be justified by reason of the fact that the publisher is permitted to show, before injunction issues, that the matter published is true and is published with good motives and for justifiable ends. If such a statute, authorizing suppression and injunction on such a basis, is constitutionally valid, it would be equally permissible for the legislature to provide that at any time the publisher of any newspaper could be brought before a court, or even an administrative officer (as the constitutional protection may not be regarded as resting on mere procedural details) and required to produce proof of the truth of his publication, or of what he intended to publish, and of his motives, or stand enjoined. If this can be done, the legislature may provide machinery for determining in the complete exercise of its discretion what are justifiable ends and restrain publication accordingly. And it would be but a step to a complete system of censorship. The recognition of authority to impose previous restraint upon publication in order to protect the community against the circulation of charges of misconduct, and especially of official misconduct, necessarily would carry with it the admission of the authority of the censor against which the constitutional barrier was erected....

For these reasons we hold the statute, so far as it authorized the proceedings in this action [to] be an infringement of the liberty of the press guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment....

Judgment reversed.

MR. JUSTICE BUTLER, dissenting....

The Minnesota statute does not operate as a previous restraint on publication within the proper meaning of that phrase. It does not authorize administrative control in advance such as was formerly exercised by the licensers and censors but prescribes a remedy to be enforced by a suit in equity. In this case there was previous publication made in the course of the business of regularly producing malicious, scandalous and defamatory periodicals. [There] is no question of the power of the State to denounce such transgressions. The restraint authorized is only in respect of continuing to do what has been duly adjudged to constitute a nuisance. [It] is fanciful to suggest similarity between the granting or enforcement of the decree authorized by this statute to prevent further publication of malicious, scandalous and defamatory articles and the previous restraint upon the press by licensers as referred to by Blackstone and described in the history of the times to which he alludes....

It is well known, as found by the state supreme court, that existing libel laws are inadequate effectively to suppress evils resulting from the kind of business and publications that are shown in this case. The doctrine that measures such as the one before us are invalid because they operate as previous restraints [exposes] [every individual] to [the] false and malicious assaults of any insolvent publisher who [may] put into effect program[s] for oppression, blackmail or extortion.

The judgment should be affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER, MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS, and MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND concur in this opinion.

Note: Injunction as Prior Restraint

1. Injunctions, criminal prosecutions, and licensing. Assuming arguendo, as the Court apparently did in Near, that the speech prohibited by the injunction could constitutionally be punished in a subsequent criminal prosecution, why is the injunction invalid? Why isn't the injunction a preferable means of restraint? After all, unlike a criminal statute, an injunction is directed to a specific individual and is thus less likely to have a broad chilling effect. Moreover, unlike the licensing schemes in Lovell and Freedman, the injunctions in Near, the Pentagon Papers case, and Nebraska Press did not require prepublication submission to a censor for review. And, unlike licensing schemes, injunctions are issued and administered by judges rather than by censors whose "business is to censor." In what sense, then, is the injunction a prior restraint?

2. Injunctions: Are they too effective? It has been suggested that injunctions are especially threatening to free speech because they are more likely than criminal statutes to be obeyed. Does this make sense? If an injunction prohibits only speech that could constitutionally be punished in a subsequent criminal prosecution, is the greater effectiveness of the injunction a bad thing?

Suppose an injunction prohibits speech that could not constitutionally be punished in a subsequent criminal prosecution. Is the greater effectiveness of the injunction now a bad thing?

Are injunctions in fact more likely than criminal statutes to be obeyed? It has been argued that injunctions have a special "mystique," causing individuals to accord them an unusually high degree of respect, and that injunctions are more likely to be obeyed because they are more likely to be enforced. Injunctions, after all, are directed at specific individuals, thus increasing the probability that violations will be detected, and violations may be viewed as a direct affront to the issuing judge's authority, thus increasing the likelihood that violations will be punished. On the other hand, punishments imposed for violations of injunctions are typically less severe than those for violations of criminal statutes, thus reducing the potential costs of violation. For analyses of these issues, see O. Fiss, The Civil Rights Injunction 71–73 (1978); Barnett, The Puzzle of Prior Restraint, 29 Stan. L. Rev. 539, 551–552 (1977); Blasi, Toward a Theory of Prior Restraint: The Central Linkage, 66 Minn. L. Rev. 11, 24–49 (1981).

3. The collateral bar rule. It has been suggested that the critical feature of injunctions, making them far more likely to be obeyed than criminal statutes, and thus appropriately rendering them prior restraints, is the rule, applicable to injunctions generally, that an injunction "must be obeyed until it is set aside, and that persons subject to the [injunction] who disobey it may not defend against the ensuing charge of criminal contempt on the ground that the order was erroneous or even unconstitutional." Barnett, supra, at 552. In the ordinary criminal prosecution, the defendant may assert the unconstitutionality of the statute as a defense. Thus, an individual whose planned expression is prohibited by a statute he believes to be invalid may elect to gamble and speak in defiance of the statute on the assumption that, if prosecuted, he will be able to persuade a court of the statute's unconstitutionality. An individual confronted with an injunction, however, has no such option, for under the "collateral bar" rule, "persons subject to an injunctive order issued by a court with jurisdiction are expected to obey that decree until it is modified or reversed, even if they have proper grounds to object to the order." GTE Sylvania v. Consumers Union, 445 U.S. 375, 386 (1980). This rule, which derives from the notion that "respect for judicial process is a small price to pay for the civilizing hand of law," has been held applicable even to injunctions directed against expression. In Walker v. City of Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307, 321 (1967), for example, a state trial court convicted eight black ministers of criminal contempt for leading mass street parades in violation of a temporary restraining order enjoining them from participating in such parades without first obtaining a permit as required by a city ordinance. The Court, invoking the collateral bar rule, upheld the contempt convictions without passing on the constitutionality of the injunction.

The collateral bar rule may have a significant impact on an individual's willingness to disobey even a patently unconstitutional order, for if the individual violates the injunction, he is subject to punishment even if the injunction is invalid. Consider Barnett, supra, at 553:

[The rule places the individual] in a trilemma of chilling effects unique to a prior restraint situation. [He] can comply with the order and take no legal steps, thereby accepting the suppression. [He] can appeal the order directly, [but] must obey the interim restraint while [he] does so. [Or he] can [speak] in the face of [the] order, but only at the price of forfeiting [his] legal and constitutional objections to the order and thus, in all probability, embracing a contempt conviction.

With the collateral bar rule in force, the state in effect orders the enjoined individual to delay his speech unless and until a court lifts the injunction, whether or not the injunction itself is constitutionally permissible. The rule is thus strong medicine. In Near, for example, The Saturday Press was silenced for four years while courts debated the constitutionality of the injunction. In the Skokie controversy, section B2 supra, the injunction prohibited the Nazis from marching for more than eight months before it was set aside.

Does the existence of the collateral bar rule justify the observation that, whereas a “criminal statute chills,” an injunction “freezes”? A. Bickel, The Morality of Consent 61 (1975). Does it justify the characterization of injunctions as prior restraints? See Jeffries, Rethinking Prior Restraint, 92 Yale L.J. 409 (1983). For a general analysis of the collateral bar rule, see Palmer, Collateral Bar and Contempt: Challenging a Court Order after Disobeying It, 88 Cornell L. Rev. 215 (2002).

4. When is an injunction not a prior restraint? Consider the following:

a. Suppose state law provides that the collateral bar rule is inapplicable to injunctions against expression. See cases cited in Rendleman, Free Press—Fair Trial: Review of Silence Orders, 52 N.C. L. Rev. 127, 153 n.181, 154 nn.182–185 (1973). Should injunctions in such a jurisdiction be treated as prior restraints?

b. In Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Commission on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376 (1973), the commission, after a hearing, found that the Pittsburgh Press had violated a city ordinance by displaying “help wanted” advertisements in its daily newspaper under headings designating job preference by sex. The commission therefore issued an order prohibiting the newspaper from carrying sex-designated ads in the future. In upholding the order, the Court explained that a criminal statute cast in such terms would be constitutionally permissible and then observed:

[We have] never held that all injunctions are impermissible. [The] special vice of a prior restraint is that communication will be suppressed, either directly or by inducing excessive caution in the speaker, before an adequate determination that it is unprotected by the First Amendment. The present order does not endanger arguably protected speech. Because the order is based on a continuing course of repetitive conduct, this is not a case in which the Court is asked to speculate as to the effect of publication. Cf. [Pentagon Papers case]. Moreover, [because] no interim relief was granted, the order will not have gone into effect before our final determination that the actions of Pittsburgh Press were unprotected.

c. Should it matter whether an injunction is directed at the content of the restricted speech? Consider Madsen v. Women’s Health Center, Inc., 512 U.S. 753 (1994), in which the Court held that an injunction prohibiting particular named individuals from demonstrating within thirty-six feet of an abortion clinic was not a “prior restraint” because the injunction was issued “not because of the content of petitioners’ expression,” but “because of their prior unlawful conduct” in earlier demonstrations. Consider also an injunction prohibiting the use of loudspeakers in demonstrations within one hundred feet of a hospital, school, or abortion clinic. In Madsen, the Court suggested that content-neutral injunctions are not “prior restraints,” but that they nonetheless should be tested by more “rigorous” standards than other forms of content-neutral restrictions because injunctions “carry greater risks of censorship and discriminatory application than do general ordinances.”

5. Prior restraint revisited. Consider Freund, The Supreme Court and Civil Liberties, 4 Vand. L. Rev. 533, 539 (1951): “In sum, it will hardly do to place ‘prior restraint’ in a special category for condemnation. What is needed is a pragmatic assessment of its operation in the particular circumstances. The generalization that prior restraint is particularly obnoxious in civil liberties cases must yield to more particularistic analysis.”

D. CONTENT-BASED RESTRICTIONS: “LOW” VALUE

As suggested in section B, the Court has articulated a two-level theory of free expression. Some speech, in other words, is said to possess only “low” first amendment value and is therefore accorded less than full constitutional protection. The two-level theory has its roots in the famous dictum of Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, section B2 supra:

There are certain well-defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any Constitutional problem. These include the lewd and obscene, the profane, the libelous, and the insulting or “fighting” words—those which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace. It has been well observed that such utterances are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality.

This section examines the “low”-value theory in depth. In so doing, it poses several central first amendment questions: Is the very concept of low-value speech inherently incompatible with the guarantee of free expression? That is, does the determination that certain types of speech are of “slight social value as a step to truth” compel the Court to make “value judgments concerned with the content of expression, a role foreclosed to it by the basic theory of the First Amendment”? T. Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression 326 (1970). Is the Court’s exercise of this power tolerable so long as it confines itself to defining low-value speech in terms of discrete categories of expression rather than in terms of specific “good” or “bad” ideas? How is the Court to determine what speech is of low first amendment value? What follows from a determination that a certain category of expression is of low first amendment value? Is such expression wholly outside the protection of the first amendment, as suggested by Chaplinsky, or does such a determination trigger a form of “categorical balancing,” according such speech some, but less than “full,” first amendment protection?

It has been argued that the two-level theory is essential to “any well-functioning system of free expression” because without it one of two “unacceptable” results would follow—either (1) “the burden of justification imposed on government” when it regulates high-value speech, such as pure political expression, “would have to be lowered,” or (2) “the properly stringent standards applied to efforts to regulate” high-value speech would have to be applied to low-value speech, with the result that government would not be able to regulate speech “that in all probability should be regulated.” C. Sunstein, The Partial Constitution 233–234 (1993). Is there any answer to this argument?

Consider Lakier, The Invention of Low-Value Speech, 128 Harv. L. Rev. 2166 (2015):

[The] doctrine of low-value speech allows the government to do what it is not supposed to be able to do: That is, it allows the government to remove ideas it dislikes from public [circulation]. By emphasizing the historical basis of the low-value categories, the Court has attempted to depict the distinction between high- and low-value speech as the product of something other than the perhaps idiosyncratic value judgments and preferences of its individual members.... There is little historical evidence, however, to back up the Court’s claim that the categories of low-value speech we recognize [today] constituted, in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, well-defined and narrowly limited exceptions to the ordinary constitutional rule....

This section examines several categories of arguably “low”-value expression —false statements of fact; nonnewsworthy disclosures of “private” facts; threats; commercial advertising; obscenity; child pornography; depictions of animal cruelty; violent expression; lewd, profane, and indecent speech; and hate speech and pornography.

1. False Statements of Fact

The Supreme Court has long maintained that “[under] the First Amendment there is no such thing as a false idea. However pernicious an opinion may seem, we depend for its correction not on the conscience of judges and juries but on the competition of other ideas.” Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., infra this section. Government, in other words, may not restrict the expression of an idea or opinion because of its determination that the idea or opinion is “false.” What, though, of false statements of fact? Recall Justice Holmes’s example of the “false cry of fire.”

The problem of false statements of fact arises most often in the context of defamation. At the time of adoption of the first amendment, civil and criminal actions for defamation were commonplace, and in Chaplinsky the Court expressly included libel within the class of utterances that “are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality.” A decade later, in Beauharnais v. Illinois, section D8 infra, the Court announced that libelous utterances are not “within the area of constitutionally protected speech,” and, accordingly, that “no one would contend that [they] may be punished only upon a showing” of clear and present danger.

New York Times v. Sullivan

376 U.S. 254 (1964)

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

We are required in this case to determine for the first time the extent to which the constitutional protections for speech and press limit a State’s power to award damages in a libel action brought by a public official against critics of his official conduct.

Respondent L. B. Sullivan is one of the three elected Commissioners of the City of Montgomery, Alabama. [He] brought this civil libel action against the four individual petitioners, who are Negroes and Alabama clergymen, and against petitioner the New York Times....

Respondent’s complaint alleged that he had been libeled by statements in a full-page advertisement that was carried in the New York Times on March 29, 1960. Entitled “Heed Their Rising Voices,” the advertisement [described the civil rights movement in the South and concluded with an appeal for funds].

Of the 10 paragraphs of text in the advertisement, the third and a portion of the sixth were the basis of respondent’s claim of libel. They read as follows:

Third paragraph:

In Montgomery, Alabama, after students sang “My Country,’ Tis of Thee” on the State Capitol steps, their leaders were expelled from school, and truckloads of police armed with shotguns and tear-gas ringed the Alabama State College campus. When the entire student body protested to state authorities by refusing to re-register, their dining hall was padlocked in an attempt to starve them into submission.

Sixth paragraph:

Again and again the Southern violators have answered Dr. King’s peaceful protests with intimidation and violence. They have bombed his home almost killing his wife and child. They have assaulted his person. They have arrested him seven times—for “speeding,” “loitering” and similar “offenses.” And now they have charged him with “perjury”—a felony under which they could imprison him for ten years....

Although neither of these statements mentions respondent by name, he contended that the word “police” in the third paragraph referred to him as the Montgomery Commissioner who supervised the Police Department, so that he was being accused of “ringing” the campus with police. He further claimed that the paragraph would be read as imputing to the police, and hence to him, the padlocking of the dining hall in order to starve the students into submission. As to the sixth paragraph, he contended that since arrests are ordinarily made by the police, the statement “They have arrested [Dr. King] seven times” would be read as referring to him....

It is uncontested that some of the statements contained in the two paragraphs were not accurate descriptions of events which occurred in Montgomery. Although Negro students staged a demonstration on the State Capitol steps, they sang the National Anthem and not “My Country,’ Tis of Thee.” Although nine students were expelled by the State Board of Education, this was not for leading the demonstration at the Capitol, but for demanding service at a lunch counter in the Montgomery County Courthouse on another day. Not the entire student body, but most of it, had protested the expulsion. [The] campus dining hall was not padlocked on any occasion. [Although] the police were deployed near the campus in large numbers on three occasions, they did not at any time “ring” the campus. [Dr.] King had not been arrested seven times, but only four....

Respondent made no effort to prove that he suffered actual pecuniary loss as a result of the alleged libel.³

The trial judge submitted the case to the jury under instructions that the statements in the advertisement were “libelous per se” and were not privileged, so that petitioners might be held liable if the jury found that they had published the advertisement and that the statements were made “of and concerning” respondent. The jury was instructed that, because the statements were libelous per se, “the law...implies legal injury from the bare fact of publication itself,” “falsity and malice are presumed,” “general damages need not be alleged or proved but are presumed,” and “punitive damages may be awarded by the jury even though the amount of actual damages is neither found nor shown.” [The jury returned a judgment for respondent in the amount of $500,000.]

We reverse the judgment. We hold that the rule of law applied by the Alabama courts is constitutionally deficient for failure to provide the safeguards for freedom of speech and of the press that are required by the First and Fourteenth Amendments in a libel action brought by a public official against critics of his official conduct. We further hold that under the proper safeguards the evidence presented in this case is constitutionally insufficient to support the judgment for respondent.

I

We may dispose at the outset of [respondent’s argument that the judgment of the state court is insulated from constitutional scrutiny because] “The Fourteenth Amendment is directed against State action and not private action.” That proposition has no application to this case. Although this is a civil lawsuit between private parties, the Alabama courts have applied a state rule of law which petitioners claim to impose invalid restrictions on their constitutional freedoms of speech and press. It matters not that that law has been applied in a civil action and that it is common law only. [The] test is not the form in which state power has been applied but, whatever the form, whether such power has in fact been exercised....

II...

Respondent relies heavily, as did the Alabama courts, on statements of this Court to the effect that the Constitution does not protect libelous publications. Those statements do not foreclose our inquiry here. None of the cases sustained the use of libel laws to impose sanctions upon expression critical of the official conduct of public officials. [In] deciding the question now, we are compelled by neither precedent nor policy to give any more weight to the epithet “libel” than we have to other “mere labels” of state law. [Like] insurrection, contempt, advocacy of unlawful acts, breach of the peace, obscenity, solicitation of legal business, and the various other formulae for the repression of expression that have been challenged in this Court, libel can claim no talismanic immunity from constitutional limitations. It must be measured by standards that satisfy the First Amendment.

[We] consider this case against the background of a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials. See [Terminiello]. The present advertisement, as an expression of grievance and protest on one of the major public issues of our time, would seem clearly to qualify for the constitutional protection. The question is whether it forfeits that protection by the falsity of some of its factual statements and by its alleged defamation of respondent.

Authoritative interpretations of the First Amendment guarantees have consistently refused to recognize an exception for any test of truth—whether administered by judges, juries, or administrative officials—and especially one that puts the burden of proving truth on the speaker. [Erroneous] statement is inevitable in free debate, [and] it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the “breathing space” that they “need...to survive.”...

Injury to official reputation affords no more warrant for repressing speech that would otherwise be free than does factual error. Where judicial officers are involved, this Court has held that concern for the dignity and reputation of the courts does not justify the punishment as criminal contempt of criticism of the judge or his decision. [Bridges.] If judges are to be treated as “men of fortitude, able to thrive in a hardy climate,” [surely] the same must be true of other government officials, such as elected city commissioners. Criticism of their official conduct does not lose its constitutional protection merely because it is effective criticism and hence diminishes their official reputations.

If neither factual error nor defamatory content suffices to remove the constitutional shield from criticism of official conduct, the combination of the two elements is no less inadequate. This is the lesson to be drawn from the great controversy over the Sedition Act of 1798, which first crystallized a national awareness of the central meaning of the First Amendment....

Although the Sedition Act was never tested in this Court, the attack upon its validity has carried the day in the court of history. Fines levied in its prosecution were repaid by Act of Congress on the ground that it was unconstitutional. [Jefferson], as President, pardoned those who had been convicted and sentenced under the Act and remitted their fines. [These] views reflect a broad consensus that the Act, because of the restraint it imposed upon criticism of government and public officials, was inconsistent with the First Amendment....

What a State may not constitutionally bring about by means of a criminal statute is likewise beyond the reach of its civil law of libel. The fear of damage awards under a rule such as that invoked by the Alabama courts here may be markedly more inhibiting than the fear of prosecution under a criminal statute. [Alabama], for example, has a criminal libel law [which] allows as punishment upon conviction a fine not exceeding $500 and a prison sentence of six months. [The] judgment awarded in this case—without the need for any proof of actual pecuniary loss—was one thousand times greater than the maximum fine provided by the Alabama criminal statute, and one hundred times greater than that provided by the Sedition Act. [Whether] or not a newspaper can survive a succession of such judgments, the pall of fear and timidity imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism is an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive....

The state rule of law is not saved by its allowance of the defense of truth. [A] rule compelling the critic of official conduct to guarantee the truth of all his factual assertions—and to do so on pain of libel judgments virtually unlimited in amount—leads to a comparable “self-censorship.” Allowance of the defense of truth, with the burden of proving it on the defendant, does not mean that only false speech will be deterred.¹⁰ [Under] such a rule, would-be critics of official conduct may be deterred from voicing their criticism, even though it is believed to be true and even though it is in fact true, because of doubt whether it can be proved in court or fear of the expense of having to do so. They tend to make only statements which “steer far wider of the unlawful zone.” [The] rule thus dampens the vigor and limits the variety of public debate. It is inconsistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

The constitutional guarantees require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with “actual malice”—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not....

Such a privilege for criticism of official conduct is appropriately analogous to the protection accorded a public official when he is sued for libel by a private citizen. In Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564, 575, this Court held the utterance of a federal official to be absolutely privileged if made “within the outer perimeter” of his duties. The States accord the same immunity to statements of their highest officers. [The] reason for the official privilege is said to be that the threat of damage suits would otherwise “inhibit the fearless, vigorous, and effective administration of policies of government” and “dampen the ardor of all but the most resolute, or the most irresponsible, in the unflinching discharge of their duties.” [Analogous] considerations support the privilege for the citizen-critic of government. It is as much his duty to criticize as it is the official’s duty to administer. [As] Madison [said,] “the censorial power is in the people over the Government, and not in the Government over the people.”...

III

We hold today that the Constitution delimits a State’s power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct. Since this is such an action,²³ the rule requiring proof of actual malice is applicable....

Since respondent may seek a new trial, we deem that considerations of effective judicial administration require us to review the evidence in the present record to determine whether it could constitutionally support a judgment for respondent. [The] proof presented to show actual malice lacks the convincing clarity which the constitutional standard demands. [Although] there is evidence that the Times published the advertisement without checking its accuracy against the news stories in the Times’ own files, [we] think the evidence against the Times supports at most a finding of negligence in failing to discover the misstatements, and is constitutionally insufficient to show the recklessness that is required for a finding of actual malice....

We also think the evidence was constitutionally defective in another respect: it was incapable of supporting the jury’s finding that the allegedly libelous statements were made “of and concerning” respondent. [The state courts embraced the proposition that criticism of government action could be treated as criticism of the officials responsible for that action for purposes of a libel suit.]

This proposition has disquieting implications for criticism of government conduct. [It would transmute] criticism of government, however impersonal it may seem on its face, into personal criticism, and hence potential libel, of the officials of whom the government is composed. [We] hold that such a proposition may not constitutionally be utilized to establish that an otherwise impersonal attack on governmental operations was a libel of an official responsible for those operations....

Reversed and remanded.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, with whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS joins, concurring....

“Malice,” even as defined by the Court, is an elusive, abstract concept, hard to prove and hard to disprove. The requirement that malice be proved provides at best an evanescent protection for the right critically to discuss public affairs and certainly does not measure up to the sturdy safeguard embodied in the First Amendment....

The half-million-dollar verdict [gives] dramatic proof [that] state libel laws threaten the very existence of an American press virile enough to publish unpopular views on public affairs and bold enough to criticize the conduct of public officials. [There] is no reason to believe that there are not more such huge verdicts lurking just around the corner for the Times or any other newspaper or broadcaster which might dare to criticize public officials. In fact, briefs before us show that in Alabama there are now pending eleven libel suits by local and state officials against the Times seeking $5,600,000, and five such suits against the Columbia Broadcasting System seeking $1,700,000.

In my opinion the Federal Constitution has dealt with this deadly danger to the press in the only way possible without leaving the free press open to destruction—by granting the press an absolute immunity for criticism of the way public officials do their public duty. Compare Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564. Stopgap measures like those the Court adopts are in my judgment not enough....

[In a separate concurring opinion, Justice Goldberg, joined by Justice Douglas, maintained that the first amendment affords “an absolute, unconditional privilege to criticize official conduct,” but noted that “defamatory statements directed against the private conduct of a public official or private citizen” may be different, for “purely private defamation has little to do with the political ends of a self-governing society.”]

Note: “The Central Meaning” of New York Times v. Sullivan

1. The central meaning of the first amendment. Professors Meiklejohn and Kalven maintained that the New York Times decision “is [an] occasion for dancing in the streets.” Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on “The Central Meaning of the First Amendment,” 1964 Sup. Ct. Rev. 191, 221 n.125. Consider id. at 208–209:

The Court did not simply, in the face of an awkward history, definitively put to rest the status of the Sedition Act. More important, it found in the controversy over seditious libel the clue to “the central meaning of the First Amendment.” The choice of language was unusually apt. The Amendment has a “central meaning”—a core of protection of speech without which democracy cannot function, without which, in Madison's phrase, "the censorial power" would be in the Government over the people and not "in the people over the Government." This is not the whole meaning of the Amendment. There are other freedoms protected by it. But at the center there is no doubt what speech is being protected and no doubt why it is being protected. The theory of the freedom of speech clause was put right side up for the first time. [The] central meaning of the Amendment is that seditious libel cannot be made the subject of government sanction.

2. Low value? Does New York Times reject the view of Chaplinsky and Beauharnais (section D8 infra) that false statements of fact are of "slight social value" and hence not "within the area of constitutionally protected speech"? Consider footnote 10. Is the Court's primary concern with the protection of false statements of fact or with the risk that libel laws might generate a self-censorship that invades the zone of "high" value speech?

3. Categorical balancing. Consider Nimmer, The Right to Speak from Times to Time: First Amendment Theory Applied to Libel and Misapplied to Privacy, 56 Cal. L. Rev. 935, 942–943 (1968):

[New York Times] points the way to the employment of the balancing process on the [categorical level]. That is, the Court employs balancing [for] the purpose of [determining when certain categories of speech can be restricted] within the meaning of the first amendment. [By] in effect holding that [false statements of fact can be restricted when they are] knowingly and recklessly false [the] Court implicitly [balanced] certain competing policy considerations.

Is such "categorical balancing" an appropriate way to formulate first amendment doctrine? Contrast the "definitional balancing" in New York Times with that in Brandenburg. How does each treat the issue of intent? For a critique of categorical balancing, see Aleinikoff, Constitutional Law in the Age of Balancing, 96 Yale L.J. 943, 979–981 (1987).

4. Is New York Times overprotective of false speech? Consider the following views:

a. Even if the first amendment protects false statements of fact in the sense that government may not criminally punish them, does it necessarily follow that newspapers should not have to pay for the costs of their speech? Why should the first amendment require the victims of false statements to bear the loss and in effect to subsidize newspapers?

b. New York Times rests on the assumption that traditional libel law chills true speech. But an “argument based on chilling effect necessarily rests [on] intractable empirical suppositions” that might not be correct. See Kendrick, Speech, Intent, and the Chilling Effect, 54 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 1633 (2013).

c. New York Times rests on the assumption that the marketplace of ideas will function better with the Court’s rule than without it. But the opposite assumption seems at least equally plausible. First, self-censorship is not intrinsically a bad thing. It all depends on what speech is discouraged. Although traditional libel law may “chill” more valuable speech than the New York Times rule, it also “chills” more false speech. It is by no means clear that the effect of New York Times will be to improve the overall quality of public debate. Second, New York Times may actually reduce “the quality of information [available to the public by eliminating jury judgments] as to the truth or falsity of some accusations.” Nagel, How Useful Is Judicial Review in Free Speech Cases?, 69 Cornell L. Rev. 302, 323 (1984). Finally, New York Times may so expose public officials to journalistic abuse that it will drive capable persons away from government service, thus frustrating, rather than furthering, the political process.

d. Dun & Bradstreet v. Greenmoss Builders, 472 U.S. 749 (1985) (White, J., concurring):

Instead of escalating the plaintiff’s burden of proof to an almost impossible level, [the Court] could have achieved [its] goal by limiting the recoverable damages to a level that would not unduly threaten the press. Punitive [and presumed damages] might have been prohibited, or limited. Had that course been taken and the common-law standard of liability been retained, the defamed public official, upon proving falsity, could at least have had a judgment to that effect. His reputation would then be vindicated; and to the extent possible, the misinformation circulated would have been countered. He might also have recovered a modest amount, enough perhaps to pay his litigation expenses. [In] this way, both First Amendment and reputational interests would have been far better served.

5. Is New York Times underprotective of false speech? Consider Smolla, Let the Author Beware: The Rejuvenation of the American Law of Libel, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1, 4–7, 12, 91–93 (1984):

The data show a trend toward more generous jury awards, and a corresponding trend toward the media settling suits at a substantial cost. [One] study showed that thirty out of forty-seven damage awards included punitive damages, and seven of those punitive damage awards were for $1 million or more. [The] prospect of such lucrative awards is likely to entice more potential defamation plaintiffs to bring [suit]. A failure to adjust defamation doctrine [can] be expected to have a severe impact on the media. [Many] media outlets [defend] libel actions under the peril of shutdown if they lose. [One] alternative to current law is to allow punitive damages only when the plaintiff, in addition to proving actual malice, proves common law ill-will malice. [Preferably,] punitive damages should be [abolished altogether].

6. The limits of New York Times. What does the Court mean by “reckless disregard”? Does New York Times implicitly prohibit criminal prosecutions for libel of public officials? Are all public employees “public officials” within the meaning of New York Times?

Consider the following decisions, which shed light on these and related issues: Milkovich v. Lorain Journal Co., 497 U.S. 1 (1990) (a statement “must be provable as false before there can be liability”); Harte-Hanks Communications v. Connaughton, 491 U.S. 657 (1989) (neither failure to comply with “professional standards” nor publication of falsehood in order to increase profits is in itself sufficient to establish “actual malice,” but “purposeful avoidance of the truth” may be sufficient); Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767 (1986) (the “plaintiff must bear the burden of proving that the statements at issue are false”); Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265 (1971) (“a charge of criminal conduct, no matter how remote in time or place, can never be irrelevant to an official’s or a candidate’s fitness for office for purposes of application of” New York Times); St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727 (1968) (failure to investigate or otherwise seek corroboration prior to publication is not reckless disregard for the truth unless the publisher acts with a “high degree of awareness of [probable] falsity”); Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64 (1964) (first amendment does not absolutely prohibit criminal prosecution for libel even of public officials, but New York Times standard applies).

Perhaps the most important question remaining after New York Times was whether the privilege it recognized governed only libel of public officials or whether it extended to libel of other persons as well.

CURTIS PUBLISHING CO. v. BUTTS; ASSOCIATED PRESS v. WALKER, 388 U.S. 130 (1967). In these companion cases, the Court examined the question whether a libel action brought by an individual who is a “public figure,” but not a “public official,” must also be governed by the New York Times standard. Butts brought an action for libel, alleging that the defendant had published an article falsely accusing him of conspiring to “fix” a football game between the University of Georgia and the University of Alabama. At the time of the article, Butts was the athletic director of the University of Georgia, a state university, but was employed by the Georgia Athletic Association, a private corporation. Butts had served previously as head football coach at the university and had an established national reputation. In the companion case, Walker sued the Associated Press for libel, claiming that it had distributed a news dispatch falsely reporting that, when a riot erupted on the campus of the University of Mississippi because of federal efforts to enforce court-ordered desegregation, Walker had taken command of the crowd, encouraged it to use violence, and personally led a charge against the federal marshals. Walker, a private citizen at the time of the riot and publication, had pursued a distinguished military career and was a figure of national prominence. In each case, the jury found the defendant liable under state law, the trial judge approved a damage award of about $500,000, and the defendant maintained that New York Times should govern and that it thus could not be held liable without proof that it had published the story either knowing it to be false or with reckless disregard for the truth.

In a sharply divided set of opinions, the Court held the New York Times standard applicable to “public figures” as well as to “public officials,” and, further, that both Butts and Walker constituted “public figures” for purposes of the rule. Chief Justice Warren, joined by Justices Brennan and White, observed that “increasingly in this country, the distinctions between governmental and private sectors are blurred,” and that many individuals “who do not hold public office at the moment are nevertheless intimately involved in the resolution of important public questions or, by reason of their fame, shape events in areas of concern to society at large.” Moreover, Chief Justice Warren argued, “as a class these ‘public figures’ have as ready access as ‘public officials’ to mass media of communication, both to influence policy and to counter criticism of their views and activities.” Thus, Chief Justice Warren concluded, “differentiation between ‘public figures’ and ‘public officials’ and adoption of separate standards of proof for each have no basis in law, logic, or First Amendment policy.” Justice Black, joined by Justice Douglas, maintained that “the First Amendment was intended to leave the press [absolutely] free from the harassment of libel judgments,” but accepted the narrower rationale of Chief Justice Warren “‘in order for the Court to be able at this time to agree on [a disposition of] this important case.’” Justice Harlan, joined by Justices Clark, Stewart, and Fortas, concurred in the result.

Is the extension of New York Times to “public figures” mandated by “the central meaning of the first amendment”?

GERTZ v. ROBERT WELCH, INC., 418 U.S. 323 (1974). In 1968, a Chicago policeman named Nuccio shot and killed a youth named Nelson. The state prosecuted Nuccio and obtained a conviction for murder. The Nelson family retained Gertz, a Chicago attorney, to represent them in civil litigation against Nuccio. In 1969, respondent, publisher of American Opinion, a monthly outlet for the views of the John Birch Society, ran an article in which it accused Gertz of being the architect of a “frame-up” of Nuccio and stated that Gertz had a criminal record and long-standing communist affiliations. Gertz filed this action for libel. After the jury returned a $50,000 verdict for Gertz, the trial court entered judgment for respondent, concluding that the New York Times standard applied to any discussion of a “public issue.”

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Powell, reversed: “The principal issue in this case is whether a newspaper or broadcaster that publishes defamatory falsehoods about an individual who is neither a public official nor a public figure may claim a constitutional privilege against liability for the injury inflicted by those statements. [We] begin with the common ground. Under the First Amendment there is no such thing as a false idea. However pernicious an opinion may seem, we depend for its correction not on the conscience of judges and juries but on the competition of other ideas. But there is no constitutional value in false statements of fact. Neither the intentional lie nor the careless error materially advances society’s interest in ‘uninhibited, robust, and wide-open’ debate on public issues. [New York Times Co. v. Sullivan.] They belong to that category of utterances which ‘are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality.’ [Chaplinsky.] ”

“Although the erroneous statement of fact is not worthy of constitutional protection, it is nevertheless inevitable in free debate, [And] punishment of error runs the risk of inducing a cautious and restrictive exercise of the constitutionally guaranteed freedoms of speech and press. Our decisions recognize that a rule of strict liability that compels a publisher or broadcaster to guarantee the accuracy of his factual assertions may lead to intolerable self-censorship. [The] First Amendment requires that we protect some falsehood in order to protect speech that matters.

“The need to avoid self-censorship by the news media is, however, not the only societal value at issue. If it were, this Court would have embraced long ago the view that publishers and broadcasters enjoy an unconditional and indefeasible immunity from liability for defamation. [The] legitimate state interest underlying the law of libel is the compensation of individuals for the harm inflicted on them by defamatory falsehood. We would not lightly require the State to abandon this purpose, for [the] individual's right to the protection of his own good name 'reflects [our] basic concept of the essential dignity and worth of every human being—a concept at the root of any decent system of ordered [liberty].'...

"The New York Times standard defines the level of constitutional protection appropriate to the context of defamation of a public person. [We] have no difficulty in distinguishing among defamation plaintiffs. The first remedy of any victim of defamation is self-help—using available opportunities to contradict the lie or correct the error and thereby to minimize its adverse impact on reputation. Public officials and public figures usually enjoy significantly greater access to the channels of effective communication and hence have a more realistic opportunity to counteract false statements than private individuals normally enjoy. Private individuals are therefore more vulnerable to injury, and the state interest in protecting them is correspondingly greater.

"[Moreover, an] individual who decides to seek governmental office must accept certain necessary consequences of that involvement in public affairs. He runs the risk of closer public scrutiny than might otherwise be the case. [Those] classed as public figures stand in a similar position. [For] the most part those who attain this status have assumed roles of especial prominence in the affairs of society. Some occupy positions of such persuasive power and influence that they are deemed public figures for all purposes. More commonly, those classed as public figures have thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved. In either event, they invite attention and comment.

"Even if the foregoing generalities do not obtain in every instance, the communications media are entitled to act on the assumption that public officials and public figures have voluntarily exposed themselves to increased risk of injury from defamatory falsehood concerning them. No such assumption is justified with respect to a private individual. He has not accepted public office or assumed an 'influential role in ordering society.' [He] has relinquished no part of his interest in the protection of his own good name, and consequently he has a more compelling call on the courts for redress of injury inflicted by defamatory falsehood. Thus, private individuals are not only more vulnerable to injury than public officials and public figures; they are also more deserving of recovery.

"For these reasons we conclude that the States should retain substantial latitude in their efforts to enforce a legal remedy for defamatory falsehood injurious to the reputation of a private individual. The extension of the New York Times test [to defamatory falsehoods relating to private persons if the statements concerned matters of general or public interest] would abridge this legitimate state interest to a degree that we find unacceptable. [We] hold that, so long as they do not impose liability without fault, the States may define for themselves the appropriate standard of liability for a publisher or broadcaster of defamatory falsehood injurious to a private individual....

[We] endorse this approach in recognition of the strong and legitimate state interest in compensating private individuals for injury to reputation. But this countervailing state interest extends no further than compensation for actual injury. [We] hold that the States may not permit recovery of presumed or punitive damages, at least when liability is not based on a showing of knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth."

Justice Douglas dissented: "The Court describes this case as a return to the struggle of 'defin[ing] the proper accommodation between the law of defamation and the freedoms of speech and press protected by the First Amendment.' [I] would suggest that the struggle is a quite hopeless one, for, in light of the command of the First Amendment, no 'accommodation' of its freedoms can be 'proper' except those made by the Framers themselves."

Justice Brennan dissented: "[We] strike the proper accommodation between avoidance of media self-censorship and protection of individual reputations only when we require States to apply the [New York Times] knowing-or-reckless-falsity standard in civil libel actions concerning media reports of the involvement of private individuals in events of public or general interest."

Justice White dissented: "To me, it is quite incredible to suggest that threats of libel suits from private citizens are causing the press to refrain from publishing the truth. I know of no hard facts to support that proposition, and the Court furnishes none. [In] any event, if the Court's principal concern is to protect the communications industry from large libel judgments, it would appear that its new requirements with respect to general and punitive damages would be ample protection. Why it also feels compelled to escalate the threshold standard of liability I cannot fathom, particularly when this will eliminate in many instances the plaintiff's possibility of securing a judicial determination that the damaging publication was indeed false, whether or not he is entitled to recover money damages. Under the Court's new rules, the plaintiff must prove not only the defamatory statement but also some degree of fault accompanying it. The publication may be wholly false and the wrong to him unjustified, but his case will nevertheless be dismissed for failure to prove negligence or other fault on the part of the publisher. I find it unacceptable to distribute the risk in this manner and force the wholly innocent victim to bear the injury; for, as between the two, the defamer is the only culpable party. It is he who circulated a falsehood that he was not required to publish."

Chief Justice Burger also filed a dissenting opinion.

Note: Public and Private Figures, Public and Private Speech

1. Was Gertz a "public figure"? Consider Justice Powell's analysis of this question:

[The public figure] designation may rest on either of two alternative bases. In some instances an individual may achieve such pervasive fame or notoriety that he becomes a public figure for all purposes and in all contexts. More commonly, an individual voluntarily injects himself or is drawn into a particular public controversy and thereby becomes a public figure for a limited range of issues. In either case such persons assume special prominence in the resolution of public questions.

Petitioner has long been active in community and professional affairs. He has served as an officer of local civic groups and of various professional organizations, and he has published several books and articles on legal subjects. Although petitioner was consequently well known in some circles, he had achieved no general fame or notoriety in the community. [Absent] clear evidence of general fame or notoriety in the community, and pervasive involvement in the affairs of society, an individual should not be deemed a public personality for all aspects of his life. It is preferable to reduce the public-figure question to a more meaningful context by looking to the nature and extent of an individual's participation in the particular controversy giving rise to the defamation.

In this context it is plain that petitioner was not a public figure. He played a minimal role at the coroner's inquest, and his participation related solely to his representation of a private client. He took no part in the criminal prosecution of Officer Nuccio. Moreover, he never discussed either the criminal or civil litigation with the press and was never quoted as having done so. He plainly did not thrust himself into the vortex of this public issue, nor did he engage the public's attention in an attempt to influence its outcome. We are persuaded that the trial court did not err in refusing to characterize petitioner as a public figure for the purpose of this litigation.

2. Public figures. Consider the following:

a. Plaintiff was divorced by Russell Firestone, the scion of one of America's wealthiest families. Time magazine erroneously reported that the divorce was granted on the ground of adultery. Plaintiff sued Time for libel. In Time, Inc. v.

Firestone, 424 U.S. 448 (1976), the Court rejected Time's claim that Mrs. Firestone was a public figure: "[She] did not assume any role of especial prominence in the affairs of society, other than perhaps Palm Beach society, and she did not thrust herself to the forefront of any particular public controversy in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved in it."

b. In the late 1950s, in a widely publicized case, plaintiff was convicted of contempt for his refusal to appear before a grand jury investigating Soviet espionage. Sixteen years later, defendant published a book erroneously identifying plaintiff as a Soviet agent. Plaintiff sued for libel. In Wolston v. Reader's Digest Association, 443 U.S. 157 (1979), the Court rejected the publisher's claim that plaintiff was a "limited-purpose public figure." The Court emphasized that plaintiff had not "engaged the attention of the public in an attempt to influence the resolution of the issues involved" and explained that one who commits a crime does not become a public figure, even for the purpose "of comment on a limited range of issues relating to his conviction," for "[to] hold otherwise would create an 'open season' for all who sought to defame persons convicted of a crime."

c. Over the course of several years, various federal agencies spent almost half a million dollars funding plaintiff's research into aggressive monkey behavior. Senator Proxmire awarded the federal agencies his Golden Fleece of the Month Award, an award designed to publicize what Proxmire believed to be the most egregious examples of wasteful government spending. Claiming Proxmire's description of his research to be inaccurate, plaintiff sued for libel. In Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 443 U.S. 111 (1979), the Court rejected Proxmire's argument that plaintiff was a "limited-purpose public figure" for the "purpose of comment on his receipt of federal funds for research projects." The Court concluded that plaintiff "at no time assumed any role of public prominence in the broad question of concern about expenditures," and that "neither his applications for federal grants nor his publications in professional journals can be said to have invited that degree of public attention and comment on his receipt of federal grants essential to meet the public figure level."

3. The need for vindication. Justice White expressed concern in Gertz that the Court's decision would eliminate the private plaintiff's opportunity to vindicate himself by obtaining a judicial declaration of falsity. Is there any way to deal with this concern after Gertz? Consider Freund, Political Libel and Obscenity, 42 F.R.D. 491, 497 (1966): "Plaintiffs [should] be permitted to request a special verdict, so that if there is a verdict for the defendant based solely and simply on [the New York Times or Gertz privileges, the jury could nevertheless find] that the utterances were untrue." Consider also Justice

Brennan's suggestion in Gertz that states could enact statutes "not requiring proof of fault, which provide for an action for retraction or for publication of a court's determination of falsity if the plaintiff is able to demonstrate that false statements have been published concerning his activities." Would such a statute violate the first amendment "right" of newspapers not to publish information against their will? See Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974), section F4, infra.

4. The limits of Gertz. Does Gertz's "fault" standard govern all libelous statements not involving public officials or public figures, whether or not such statements concern matters of "general or public interest"? Is the Gertz privilege available only to media defendants? Note Justice Powell's consistent references to the media. Can denial of the privilege to nonmedia defendants be justified on the ground that the "press" is entitled to special constitutional protection? See section F infra.

DUN & BRADSTREET v. GREENMOSS BUILDERS, 472 U.S. 749 (1985). Petitioner, a credit reporting agency, provides subscribers with financial information about businesses. Petitioner sent a report to five subscribers indicating that respondent, a construction contractor, had filed a voluntary petition for bankruptcy. This report was inaccurate. In respondent's defamation action against petitioner, the trial judge instructed the jury that it could award presumed and punitive damages without a showing of "actual malice." The jury returned a verdict in favor of respondent and awarded $50,000 in compensatory or presumed damages and $300,000 in punitive damages. The Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision, affirmed the judgment.

Justice Powell's plurality opinion was joined by Justices Rehnquist and O'Connor: "We have never considered whether the Gertz balance obtains when the defamatory statements involve no issue of public concern. [The] state interest [here] is identical to the one weighed in Gertz. [The] First Amendment interest, on the other hand, is less important than the one weighed in Gertz. We have long recognized that not all speech is of equal First Amendment importance. It is speech on 'matters of public concern' that is 'at the heart of the First Amendment's protection.' In contrast, speech on matters of purely private concern is of less First Amendment concern. [When the state regulates such expression], 'There is no threat to the free and robust debate of public issues, [and] there is no potential interference with a meaningful dialogue of ideas concerning self-government.' [While] such speech is not totally unprotected by the First Amendment, its protections are less stringent. [In] light of the reduced constitutional value of speech involving no matters of public concern, we hold that the state interest adequately supports awards of presumed and punitive damages—even absent a showing of ‘actual malice.’”

Chief Justice Burger and Justice White concurred in the judgment. Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, dissented on the ground that, under Gertz, respondent “should be required to show actual malice to receive presumed or punitive damages.”

Note: Other False Statements of Fact

In Gertz, the Court again made explicit its conclusion that “there is no constitutional value in false statements of fact.” Nonetheless, in its New York Times/Gertz line of authority, the Court granted substantial first amendment protection to false statements of fact in the libel context to avoid “self-censorship” and “to protect speech that matters.” How should false statements of fact be dealt with in other contexts? Consider the following:

- a. Suppose an individual falsely asserts that a particular law was enacted because a majority of the legislators had been “paid off.” In what circumstances, if any, may government criminally punish an individual for factually false utterances that defame government itself?
- b. Recall section 3 of the Espionage Act of 1917, section B1 supra: “Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully make or convey false reports [with] intent to interfere with [the] success of the military [forces] of the United States [shall be guilty of a felony].” Is the act constitutional in light of the New York Times/Gertz line of authority? If not, how might it be redrafted to satisfy the first amendment? For discussion of the prosecution of an American Nazi under this provision during World War II, see G. Stone, Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime 258–275 (2004).

- c. The problem of false statements of fact arises often in the context of political campaigns. Suppose, for example, a supporter of a candidate’s opponent falsely accuses the candidate of some impropriety. So long as the candidate can meet the demands of New York Times, he can, of course, sue for libel. That may be small consolation, however, if he loses the election. To avoid that result, can the candidate obtain an injunction against further dissemination of the falsehood? Can a state electoral commission prohibit distribution of any campaign literature containing the falsehood? Suppose, instead of defaming an opponent, a candidate or his supporters falsely inflate the candidate’s own qualifications. In what circumstances, and by what means, may such speech be restricted? See Pestrak v. Ohio Elections Commission, 926 F.2d 573 (6th Cir. 1991) (upholding state election commission’s restriction on the dissemination of false statements in the context of political campaigns); Tomei v. Finley, 512 F. Supp. 695 (N.D. Ill. 1981) (granting a preliminary injunction against a candidate's use of a misleading campaign slogan); Stone, The Rules of Evidence and the Rules of Public Debate, 1993 U. Chi. Legal F. 127, 137–141 (arguing that such restrictions are invalid because of the “great danger” inherent in permitting “government to involve itself in the political process in this manner”); Marshall, False Campaign Speech and the First Amendment, 53 U. Pa. L. Rev. 285, 299 (2004) (“authorizing the government to decide what is true or false in campaign speech opens the door to partisan abuse”); Ashdown, Distorting Democracy: Campaign Lies in the 21st Century, 20 Wm. & Mary Bill Rts. J. 1085 (2012).

d. In a state law defamation action filed by attorney Johnnie Cochran, a California trial court found that defendant Tory had falsely claimed that Cochran owed him money, picketed Cochran’s office with signs containing insults, and pursued him in public, chanting similar insults, in order to coerce Cochran into paying Tory money to get him to desist from such defamatory activity. Because Tory was judgment-proof, the California court enjoined him from continuing in this conduct. Is such a prior restraint permissible in these circumstances? See Tory v. Cochran, 544 U.S. 734 (2004) (invalidating the injunction in light of Cochran’s death).

e. In light of changes in social media since the leading Supreme Court decisions on these issues, and the rise of so-called “fake news” that is said to undermine democratic discourse and deliberation, can the government intervene to make the publication of such “fake news” a crime?

UNITED STATES v. ALVAREZ, 567 U.S. --- (2012). The federal Stolen Valor Act makes it a crime for any person to falsely state that he was “awarded any decoration or medal authorized by Congress for the Armed Forces of the United States.” At a public meeting, Alvarez falsely stated to the persons present that he had received the Congressional Medal of Honor. This statement was made not to secure any particular benefit, but as “a pathetic attempt to gain respect that eluded him.” He was prosecuted and convicted for violating the Act. The Supreme Court held the Act unconstitutional.

Justice Kennedy delivered a plurality opinion joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Ginsburg and Sotomayor: “The Government [argues] that false statements ‘have no First Amendment value in themselves,’ and [are thus] beyond constitutional protection. [But the] Court has never endorsed the categorical rule [that] false statements receive no First Amendment protection.” Although conceding that some false statement could be restricted, including defamatory statements, perjury, and fraudulent statements intended to extract something from another, Kennedy noted that the Stolen Valor Act applies broadly, without regard to whether anyone else is harmed by the falsehood. “Permitting the government to decree this speech to be a criminal offense [without regard to the circumstances] would endorse government authority to compile a list of subjects about which false statements are punishable. That governmental power has no clear limiting principle. Our constitutional tradition stands against the idea that we need Oceania’s Ministry of Truth [citing George Orwell’s Nineteen-Eighty-Four]. Were the Court to hold that the interest in truthful discourse alone is sufficient to sustain a ban on speech, [] would give government a broad censorial power unprecedented in [our] constitutional tradition.”

Although agreeing that the “Government’s interest in protecting the integrity of the Medal of Honor is beyond question,” Kennedy concluded that in order to satisfy “exacting scrutiny” the restriction must “be ‘actually necessary’ to achieve” the Government’s interests. Here, the “Government points to no evidence [that] the public’s general perception of military awards is diluted by false claims such as those made by Alvarez.” Moreover, the “Government has not shown, and cannot show, why counterspeech would not suffice to achieve its interest.” Indeed, if the Government really wants to address this interest it can simply create an online database that “could list Congressional Medal of Honors winners.” It would then “be easy to verify and expose false claims.” In such circumstances, Kennedy held that the Act was unconstitutional.

Justice Breyer, joined by Justice Kagan, concurred. Breyer argued that “intermediate scrutiny” was appropriate in this situation, because “false factual statements are less likely than are true factual statements to make a valuable contribution to the marketplace of ideas [and] the government often has good reasons to prohibit such false speech.” Although noting that the Court “has frequently [said] that false factual statements enjoy little First Amendment protection,” Breyer observed that this does not mean “no protection at all.” After all, he argued, false “factual statements can serve useful human objectives.” In social contexts, for example, they can “prevent embarrassment, protect privacy, shield a person from prejudice, provide the sick with comfort, or preserve a child’s innocence; in public contexts [they can] stop a panic or otherwise preserve calm in the face of danger.”

Moreover, Breyer noted, there are dangers to free speech in allowing the government to punish even lies. As the Court recognized in New York Times v. Sullivan, “the threat of criminal prosecution for making a false statement can inhibit the speaker from making true statements, thereby ‘chilling’ a kind of speech that lies at the First Amendment's heart." In addition, he recognized, the inevitability of inaccurate statements in public discourse "provides a weapon to a government broadly empowered to prosecute falsity without more. And those who are unpopular may fear that the government will use that weapon selectively, say by prosecuting a pacifist who supports his cause by (falsely) claiming to have been a war hero, while ignoring members of other political groups who might make similar claims."

Like Justice Kennedy, though, Breyer conceded that the government can constitutionally restrict some types of factually false statements, such as fraud, defamation, perjury, false statements about terrorist threats, and impersonating a government official. But in such instances, he reasoned, "limitations of context, requirements of proof of injury, and the like, narrow the statute to a subset of lies where specific harm is more likely to occur," whereas the "statute before us lacks any such limiting features." Because the "government has provided no convincing explanation as to why a more finely tailored statute would not work," he concluded that "the statute as presently drafted works disproportionate constitutional harm. It consequently fails intermediate scrutiny, and so violates the First Amendment."

Justice Alito, joined by Justices Scalia and Thomas, dissented: "The [Act] was enacted to stem an epidemic of false claims about military decorations. [It] is a narrow statute that presents no threat to the freedom of speech. The statute reaches only knowingly false statements about hard facts directly within a speaker's personal knowledge. These lies have no value in and of themselves, and proscribing them does not chill any valuable speech. [Moreover,] the Act is strictly viewpoint neutral. [It] applies equally to all false statements, whether they tend to disparage or commend the Government, the military, or the system of military honors.

"[At the same time, these lies] inflict substantial harm. In many instances, the harm is tangible in nature: Individuals often falsely represent themselves as award recipients in order to obtain financial or other material rewards. [In] other cases the harm is less tangible, but nonetheless significant. The lies proscribed by the [Act] tend to debase the distinctive honor of military awards. [It] is well recognized in trademark law that the proliferation of cheap imitations of luxury goods blurs the "signal" given out by the purchasers of the originals.' [Surely] it was reasonable for Congress to conclude that the goal of preserving the integrity of our country's top military honors is at least as worthy as that of protecting the prestige associated with fancy watches and designer handbags....

"Time and again, this Court has recognized that as a general matter false factual statements possess no intrinsic First Amendment value. [There] are more than 100 federal criminal statutes that punish false statements made in connection with areas of federal agency concern. [Of course,] there are broad areas in which any attempt by the state to penalize purportedly false speech would present a grave and unacceptable danger of suppressing truthful speech. [But] the Stolen Valor Act presents no risk at all that valuable speech will be suppressed. The speech punished by the Act is not only verifiably false and entirely lacking in intrinsic value, but it also fails to serve any instrumental purpose that the First Amendment might protect....

“The plurality [worries] that a decision sustaining the Stolen Valor Act might prompt Congress and the state legislatures to enact laws criminalizing lies about ‘an endless list of subjects.’ The plurality apparently fears that we will see laws making it a crime to lie about civilian awards such as college degrees. [This] concern is likely unfounded. With very good reason, military honors have traditionally been regarded as quite different from civilian awards. [In] any event, if the plurality’s concern is not entirely fanciful, it falls outside the purview of the First Amendment. [If] there is a problem with, let us say, a law making it a criminal offense to falsely claim to have been a high school valedictorian, the problem is not the suppression of speech but the misuse of the criminal law, which should be reserved for conduct that inflicts or threatens truly serious societal harm. The objection to this hypothetical law would be the same as the objection to a law making it a crime to eat potato chips during the graduation ceremony. [The] safeguard against such laws is democracy, not the First Amendment. Not every foolish law is unconstitutional.

“...The Stolen Valor Act is a narrow law enacted to address an important problem, and it presents no threat to freedom of expression.”

Is there any good reason not to allow the government to punish “knowingly false statements about hard facts directly within a speaker’s personal knowledge”? Because an individual knows to a virtual certainty whether or not he’s won the Congressional Medal of Honor, does enforcement of the Stolen Valor Act pose any realistic risk of chilling valuable speech? Certainly, there would be a significant chilling effect if the government made it a crime to tell lies. After all, from a fact-finding standpoint, it is not usually not possible to determine with 100 percent certainty (a) whether a statement is objectively false, and (b) if it is, whether the speaker knew it to be false. But are those problems present in the context of the Stolen Valor Act? If there is zero risk of chilling valuable speech, is there any reason to protect lies of this sort?

Suppose a reporter lies about his identity in order to obtain information that reveals serious government corruption or suppose an investigator lies about his interest in purchasing a home in order to do a study of racial discrimination in housing. Do such lies have only low first amendment value? Can they constitutionally be forbidden? On the issue of high-value lies, see Chen & Marceau, High Value Lies, Ugly Truths, and the First Amendment, 68 Vand. L. Rev. 1435 (2015); Porat & Yadlin, A Welfarist Perspective on Lies, 91 Ind. L.J. 617 (2016); Han, Autobiographical Lies and the First Amendment's Protection of Self-Defining Speech, 87 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 70 (2012).

Assuming Justice Alito is correct that the government can constitutionally punish “knowingly false statements about hard facts directly within a speaker’s personal knowledge” because such speech has no first amendment value and such restrictions chill no valuable speech, should it matter that the Stolen Valor Act punishes only some speech falling within the category, but not other speech falling within it? For example, is it constitutional for the government to punish “knowingly false statements about hard facts directly within a speaker’s personal knowledge” if the statements relate to military medals but not if they relate to college degrees? Is there any first amendment problem in the government picking and choosing which of those statements to punish and which to leave alone? Is Justice Alito right that such choices pose no first amendment issue? See R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, section D8 infra. For a helpful analysis, see Norton, Lies and the Constitution, 2012 Sup. Ct. Rev. 161.

Why is perjury different from what Alvarez did? Consider Tushnet, The Coverage/Protection Distinction in the Law of Freedom of Speech, 25 Wm. & Mary Bill Rts. J. 1073, 1100 (2017):

Perhaps making perjury a crime could be defended as advancing the interest in preserving the integrity of judicial proceedings, or as penalizing insults to the legal system. Alvarez characterizes these as compelling interests, as it also characterizes the interest in preserving the integrity of the government’s system of military honors. But, with respect to the Stolen Valor Act the Court saw no “direct causal link between the restriction imposed and the injury to be prevented.” It is not clear to me how one could prove a causal link between an utterance and a harm as generalized as impairing the “integrity” of a system. Discussing the required causal connection, Justice Kennedy wrote, “The Government points to no evidence to support its claim that the public’s general perception of military awards is diluted by false claims such as those made by Alvarez.” Justice Kennedy did not discuss the existence or not of such evidence when he dealt with the way perjury “threatens the integrity of judgments that are the basis of the legal system[,]” and as far as I can tell none of the cases discussing the relation between perjury and the First Amendment offers such evidence.

HUSTLER MAGAZINE v. FALWELL, 485 U.S. 46 (1988). Hustler magazine published a “parody” of an advertisement concerning the nationally known minister Jerry Falwell. The relevant item contained the name and picture of Reverend Falwell and an “interview” in which Falwell says that his “first time” was during a drunken incestuous rendezvous with his mother in an outhouse. Small print at the bottom of the page noted “ad parody—not to be taken seriously.” Falwell brought suit for libel and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The jury found against Falwell on the libel claim because the ad parody could not “reasonably be understood as describing actual facts” about Falwell. The jury found in favor of Falwell on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, however, and awarded $100,000 in compensatory damages and $50,000 in punitive damages. The court of appeals affirmed. The Supreme Court, in a unanimous decision, reversed.

Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote the opinion: “The sort of robust political debate encouraged by the First Amendment is bound to produce speech that is critical of [public officials and public figures]. Such criticism, inevitably, will not always be reasoned or moderate; public figures as well as public officials will be subject to ‘vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks.’ [New York Times.]

“Respondent argues [that] a different standard should apply in this case because here the State seeks to prevent not reputational damage, but the severe emotional distress suffered by the person who is the subject of an offensive publication. In respondent’s view, [so] long as the utterance was intended to inflict emotional distress, was outrageous, and did in fact inflict serious emotional distress, it is of no constitutional import whether the statement was a fact or an opinion, or whether it was true or false. It is the intent to cause injury that is the gravamen of the tort, and the State’s interest in preventing emotional harm simply outweighs whatever interest a speaker may have in speech of this type.

“Generally speaking the law does not regard the intent to inflict emotional distress as one which should receive much [solicitude]. But [while a] bad motive may be deemed controlling for purposes of tort liability in other areas of the law, we think the First Amendment prohibits such a result in the area of public debate about public figures. Were we to hold otherwise, there can be little doubt that political cartoonists and satirists would be subjected to damage awards without any showing that their work falsely defamed its subject. [The] appeal of the political cartoon or caricature is often based on exploration of unfortunate physical traits or politically embarrassing events—an exploration often calculated to injure the feelings of the subject of the portrayal. The art of the cartoonist is often not reasoned or evenhanded, but slashing and one-sided....

“Respondent contends, however, that the caricature in question was so ‘outrageous’ as to distinguish it from more traditional political cartoons. [If] it were possible by laying down a principled standard to separate the one from the other, public discourse would probably suffer little or no harm. But we doubt that there is any such standard, and we are quite sure that the pejorative description ‘outrageous’ does not supply one. ‘Outrageousness’ in the area of political and social discourse has an inherent subjectiveness about it which would allow a jury to impose liability on the basis of the jurors’ tastes or views, or perhaps on the basis of the dislike of a particular expression. An ‘outrageousness’ standard thus runs afoul of our longstanding refusal to allow damages to be awarded because the speech in question may have an adverse emotional impact on the audience....

“We conclude that public figures and public officials may not recover for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress by reason of publications such as the one here at issue without showing in addition that the publication contains a false statement of fact which was made with ‘actual malice,’ i.e., with knowledge that the statement was false or with reckless disregard as to whether or not it was true....”

Suppose X posts online a parody analogous to the one in Hustler about Y, a non-public figure whom he particularly dislikes. Can Y sue X for intentional infliction of emotional distress? Recall Snyder v. Phelps. Can Y sue X for invasion of privacy? Suppose X calls Y and, pretending to be a doctor, falsely tells him that his son has been killed in a car accident. Can Y sue X for intentional infliction of emotional distress in that situation after Snyder and Hustler?

Did the Court in Hustler give sufficient weight to Falwell's dignitary interests? Consider Strauss Caricature, 75 BVerfGE 369 (1987), in which the German Constitutional Court reviewed a civil action for damages brought by Bavarian Prime Minister Franz Josef Strauss against the magazine Konkret, which had published a series of disparaging cartoons portraying Strauss as a rutting pig. One cartoon, for example, depicted a pig, clearly drawn to be a caricature of Strauss, copulating with other pigs dressed in judicial robes. Noting that individual dignity is a "preferred constitutional value," the court held that the cartoons were not protected by Germany's constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech. The court explained that by depicting the Prime Minister as a pig engaged in bestial sexual conduct, the cartoons were clearly "intended to devalue the person concerned as a person, to deprive him of his dignity as a human being," and therefore went "too far" to merit constitutional protection. See Ronald Krotoszynski, The First Amendment in Cross-Cultural Perspective 112 (2006); Carmi, Dignity—The Enemy from Within: A Theoretical and Comparative Analysis of Human Dignity as a Free Speech Justification, 9 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 957 (2007).

2. "Nonnewsworthy" Disclosures of "Private" Information

In the Pentagon Papers case, the Supreme Court took a strong position against government efforts to prohibit the publication of truthful information. In the years since, the Court has extended this position beyond the context of classified national security information. In Landmark Communications, Inc. v. Virginia, 435 U.S. 829 (1978), for example, the Court invalidated a state statute making it a crime for any person to divulge information regarding confidential matters pending before the state's Judicial Inquiry and Review Commission. Although the state argued that the disclosure of confidential information about pending investigations would create a clear and present danger to the effective operation of the commission by chilling the willingness of individuals to file complaints, the Court held that if the state wanted to protect this interest it had to do so by means other than restricting the press's publication of truthful information, for example, by adopting "careful internal procedures" to preserve confidentiality and by prohibiting participants in commission's proceedings from divulging confidential information.

Similarly, in Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976), the Court unanimously held unconstitutional a judge's order, issued in anticipation of a trial for a multiple murder that had attracted widespread news coverage, that restrained newspapers and broadcasters from disseminating accounts of confessions made by the accused or any other facts “strongly implicative” of the accused. The Court explained that even though the Constitution guarantees trial “by an impartial jury,” and that a trial judge therefore “has a major responsibility” to protect the rights of a defendant against unduly prejudicial pretrial publicity, the judge must use alternative means to mitigate the danger, such as changing the trial venue, postponing the trial, questioning prospective jurors about their knowledge, sequestering jurors, and restricting what the lawyers, police, and witnesses may “say to anyone.”

Are some types of information so private and so non-newsworthy, however, that government can constitutionally restrict their publication on the theory that, unlike the information in Pentagon Papers, Landmark Communications and Nebraska Press, they are of only “low” First Amendment value?

Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn

420 U.S. 469 (1975)

MR. JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The issue before us in this case is whether, consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, a State may extend a cause of action for damages for invasion of privacy caused by the publication of the name of a deceased rape victim which was publicly revealed in connection with the prosecution of the crime.

In August 1971, appellee’s 17-year-old daughter was the victim of a rape and did not survive the incident. Six youths were soon indicted for murder and rape. Although there was substantial press coverage of the crime and of subsequent developments, the identity of the victim was not disclosed pending trial, perhaps because of Ga. Code Ann. §26-9901 (1972), which makes it a misdemeanor to publish or broadcast the name or identity of a rape victim. In April 1972, some eight months later, the six defendants appeared in court....

In the course of the proceedings that day, appellant Wassell, a reporter covering the incident for his employer, learned the name of the victim from an examination of the indictments which were made available for his inspection in the courtroom. That the name of the victim appears in the indictments and that the indictments were public records available for inspection are not disputed. Later that day, Wassell broadcast over the facilities of station WSB-TV, a television station owned by appellant Cox Broadcasting Corp., a news report concerning the court proceedings. The report named the victim of the crime and was repeated the following day.

In May 1972, appellee brought an action for money damages against appellants, relying on §26-9901 and claiming that his right to privacy had been invaded by the television broadcasts giving the name of his deceased daughter. Appellants admitted the broadcasts but claimed that they were privileged under [the] First and Fourteenth Amendments....

Georgia stoutly defends both §26-9901 and the State's common-law privacy action challenged here. Its claims are not without force, for powerful arguments can be made, and have been made, that however it may be ultimately defined, there is a zone of privacy surrounding every individual, a zone within which the State may protect him from intrusion by the press, with all its attendant publicity. Indeed, the central thesis of the root article by Warren and Brandeis, The Right to Privacy, 4 Harv. L. Rev. 193, 196 (1890), was that the press was overstepping its prerogatives by publishing essentially private information and that there should be a remedy for the alleged abuses.¹⁶

More compellingly, the century has experienced a strong tide running in favor of the so-called right of privacy. “[I]n one form or another, the right of privacy is by this time recognized and accepted in all but a very few jurisdictions.” W. Prosser, Law of Torts 804 (4th ed.)....

These are impressive credentials for a right of privacy. [The] version of the privacy tort now before us—termed in Georgia “the tort of public disclosure,” [is] that in which the plaintiff claims the right to be free from unwanted publicity about his private affairs, which, although wholly true, would be offensive to a person of ordinary sensibilities. [In] this sphere of collision between claims of privacy and those of the free press, the interests on both sides are plainly rooted in the traditions and significant concerns of our society. Rather than address the broader question whether truthful publications may ever be subjected to civil or criminal liability, [it] is appropriate to focus on the narrower interface between press and privacy that this case presents, namely, whether the State may impose sanctions on the accurate publication of the name of a rape victim obtained from public records—more specifically, from judicial records which are maintained in connection with a public prosecution and which themselves are open to public inspection. We are convinced that the State may not do so.

[In] a society in which each individual has but limited time and resources with which to observe at first hand the operations of his government, he relies necessarily upon the press to bring to him in convenient form the facts of those operations. [With] respect to judicial proceedings in particular, the function of the press serves to guarantee the fairness of trials and to bring to bear the beneficial effects of public scrutiny upon the administration of justice. [The] commission of crime, prosecutions resulting from it, and judicial proceedings arising from the prosecutions [are] without question events of legitimate concern to the public and consequently fall within the responsibility of the press to report the operations of government....

[Moreover, the] interests in privacy fade when the information involved already appears on the public record. [The] publication of truthful information available on the public record contains none of the indicia of those limited categories of expression, such as “fighting” words, which “are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality.” [Chaplinsky.]

By placing the information in the public domain on official court records, the State must be presumed to have concluded that the public interest was thereby being served. Public records by their very nature are of interest to those concerned with the administration of government, and a public benefit is performed by the reporting of the true contents of the records by the media....

We are reluctant to embark on a course that would make public records generally available to the media but forbid their publication if offensive to the sensibilities of the supposed reasonable man. Such a rule would make it very difficult for the media to inform citizens about the public business and yet stay within the law. The rule would invite timidity and self-censorship and very likely lead to the suppression of many items that would otherwise be published and that should be made available to the public. At the very least, the First and Fourteenth Amendments will not allow exposing the press to liability for truthfully publishing information released to the public in official court records. If there are privacy interests to be protected in judicial proceedings, the States must respond by means which avoid public documentation or other exposure of private information. Their political institutions must weigh the interests in privacy with the interests of the public to know and of the press to publish. Once true information is disclosed in public court documents open to public inspection, the press cannot be sanctioned for publishing it. In this instance as in others reliance must rest upon the judgment of those who decide what to publish or broadcast....

Note: Invasion of Privacy and the First Amendment

1. The reach of Cox Broadcasting. For similar decisions, see The Florida Star

v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524 (1989) (newspaper cannot be held liable in damages for publishing a rape victim's name where the name was obtained from a publicly released police report); Oklahoma Publishing Co. v. District Court, 430 U.S. 308 (1977) (reporter cannot be prohibited from disclosing the name of a juvenile offender where the name was obtained at court proceedings that were open to the public); Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Co., 443 U.S. 97 (1979) (newspaper cannot be punished for publishing the name and photograph of a juvenile offender where the newspaper had learned the suspect's name from several witnesses to the shooting and from police and prosecutors at the scene).

2. Other sources of information. Suppose a reporter learns the name of a rape victim from a witness rather than from a public document or proceeding. Consider also the following:

a. William Sidis was a famous child prodigy in 1910. His name and prowess were well known to newspaper readers of the period. At the age of eleven, he lectured to distinguished mathematicians on the subject of four-dimensional bodies, and at the age of sixteen, he graduated from Harvard College amid considerable public attention. Thereafter, Sidis sought to live as unobtrusively as possible, and his name disappeared from public view. In 1937, however, The New Yorker ran a biographical sketch of Sidis in its Where Are They Now? feature. The article described Sidis's early achievements, his general breakdown, and his attempts to conceal his identity through his chosen career as an insignificant clerk. The article further described in intimate detail Sidis's enthusiasm for collecting streetcar transfers, his interest in the lore of the Okamakammessett Indians, and his personal lifestyle and habits. Sidis sued for invasion of privacy. Sidis v. F-R Publishing Corp., 113 F.2d 806 (2d Cir. 1940).

b. Dorothy Barber suffered from a rare condition that caused her to lose weight, even though she ate often. In its Medicine section, Time magazine reported on Barber's condition, disclosing her name and publishing a photograph that showed "her face, head and arms, with bedclothes over her chest." The article was titled Starving Glutton. Barber sued for invasion of privacy. Barber v. Time, Inc., 348 Mo. 1199, 159 S.W.2d 291 (1942).

c. In 1956, Marvin Briscoe and another man hijacked a truck. After paying his debt to society, Briscoe abandoned his life of crime, led an exemplary life, and made many friends who were unaware of the incident in his earlier life. In 1967, Reader's Digest published an article on The Big Business of Hijacking, which reported: "Typical of many beginners, Marvin Briscoe and [another man] stole a 'valuable-looking' truck in Danville, Ky., and then fought a gun battle with the local police only to learn that they had hijacked four bowling-pin spotters." Briscoe sued for invasion of privacy. Briscoe v. Reader's Digest Association, 4 Cal. 3d 529, 93 Cal. Rptr. 866, 483 P.2d 34 (1971).

3. Nonnewsworthiness and “low” value. As Justice White suggested in Cox Broadcasting, in most states the truthful disclosure of “private” facts concerning an individual constitutes a tort if the disclosure would be “highly offensive” to a reasonable person and is not in itself newsworthy. Is the tort of public disclosure compatible with the first amendment? Should it matter that the harm caused by such speech cannot be corrected by counterspeech? That there is no significant “risk that government will [use the tort to] insulate itself from the critical views of its enemies”? L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 889 (2d ed. 1988).

Is “nonnewsworthy” information of “low” first amendment value? Consider Bloustein, The First Amendment and Privacy: The Supreme Court Justice and the Philosopher, 28 Rutgers L. Rev. 41, 56–57 (1974): “[The] weight to be given ‘the public interest in obtaining information’ should depend on whether or not the information is relevant to the public’s governing purposes. ‘Public interest,’ taken to mean curiosity, must be distinguished from ‘public interest,’ taken to mean value to the public of receiving information of governing importance. There is [no first amendment] right to satisfy public curiosity and publish lurid gossip about private lives.”

On the other hand, consider Zimmerman, Requiem for a Heavyweight: A Farewell to Warren and Brandeis’s Privacy Tort, 68 Cornell L. Rev. 291, 332–334 (1983):

[Contemporary] society [uses] knowledge about the private lives of individual members [to] preserve and enforce social norms. [By] providing people with a way to learn about social groups to which they do not belong, gossip increases intimacy and a sense of community among disparate groups and individuals. [It] is a basic form of information exchange that teaches about other lifestyles and attitudes, and through which community values are changed or reinforced. [Perceived] in this way, gossip contributes directly to the first amendment “marketplace of ideas.”

Even if “nonnewsworthy” information has only “low” first amendment value, might there nonetheless be sound reasons to reject such a standard? In Gertz the Court expressed “doubt” as to “the wisdom of committing [the task of deciding what information is relevant to self-government] to the conscience of judges.” Is the “nonnewsworthiness” concept simply too vague to protect first amendment rights? Consider Kalven, Privacy in Tort Law—Were Warren and Brandeis Wrong?, 31 Law & Contemp. Probs. 326, 336 (1966): “What is at issue [is] whether the claim of privilege is not so overpowering as virtually to swallow the tort. [Surely] there is force to the simple contention that whatever is in the news media is by definition newsworthy, that the press must in the nature of things be the final arbiter of newsworthiness.”

4. The interest in “privacy.” Are the interests protected by the public disclosure tort of sufficient importance to justify a restriction of even “low”-value expression? How would you compare the gravity of the harm caused by speech that “invades privacy” with the gravity of the harm in the incitement, fighting words, and libel contexts? Consider Bloustein, supra, at 54: “In [public disclosure] cases the individual has been profaned by laying a private life open to public view. The intimacy and private space necessary to sustain individuality and human dignity has been impaired by turning a private life into a public spectacle. The innermost region of being [has] been bruised by exposure to the world.” See also Gewirtz, Privacy and Speech, 2001 Sup. Ct. Rev. 139. On the other hand, consider Posner, The Right of Privacy, 12 Ga. L. Rev. 393, 419 (1978): “If what is revealed is something the individual has concealed for purposes of misrepresenting himself to others, the fact that disclosure is offensive to him and of limited interest to the public at large is no better reason for protecting his privacy than if a seller advanced such arguments for being allowed to continue to engage in false advertising of his goods.”

5. Privacy and the internet. Consider the following views:

a. Stone, Privacy, the First Amendment, and the Internet, in Levmore & Nussbaum, eds., The Offensive Internet 174, 194 (2010):

[L]egal enforcement of the concept of non-newsworthiness [is now] staggeringly problematic. Consider [a] student who posts accurately on a blog dealing with her school that a teacher [was] seen in a gay bar. Within the confines of the school community, it would be difficult to argue that this is nonnewsworthy information or that the student could be punished for revealing it to others. But with modern technology, this information will be available not only to those in the particular school community, at that time and place, but to all Internet users and forever. [In] the world of the Internet it is no longer possible to segregate audiences based on immediate relevance of information to the community. [This] may be liberating or it may be unnerving and unwelcome, but in no event is it a state of affairs that can meaningfully be addressed by the invasion of privacy tort. [As a practical matter, the disclosure tort is a relic] of an earlier and vastly simpler era....

The most realistic way to protect privacy today is at its source. By prohibiting highly intrusive methods of gaining information that people want to keep confidential it is still possible to enable individuals who truly care about their privacy to preserve it, if they act carefully and with discretion. But once information is out of the bottle, once we share it with others, once others know it, we can longer hope to put it back. If that era ever existed, it is now the past.

b. Solove, Speech, Privacy, and Reputation on the Internet, in Levmore & Nussbaum, eds., The Offensive Internet 15, 16, 18, 21, 28 (2010):

Before the Internet, gossip would spread by word of mouth and remain within the boundaries of a social circle. [In] the village of yesteryear, people had to live under the ever-present judgmental eye of their fellow villagers. [One] of the benefits of the modern world was that people could escape from the oppressiveness of the small village fishbowl. But no longer. We now live in a “global village,” [but] with a pernicious twist. In the small village, people knew each other well, and disreputable information would be judged within the context of a person’s entire life. Now, people are judged out of context based on information fragments found online....

It is still possible to protect privacy, but doing so requires that we rethink outdated understandings of the concept. [The modern understanding of privacy should recognize] that a person should retain some control over personal information that becomes publicly available. [For example, suppose] a person discloses information on a Facebook page that is set up so that only the person’s friends can view it. Suppose the person has fifty friends. Is the information still private? I believe [that] it is. [If] one of the person’s friends were to disseminate the information beyond the group of friends, such a disclosure could be understood to be a breach of confidentiality.

6. “Revenge porn.” Would a prohibition on “revenge porn” be constitutional? “Revenge porn” refers to the practice of posting nude or sexually suggestive photographs or videos online without the consent of the person depicted. Consider the following proposed statute:

An actor commits criminal invasion of privacy if the actor harms another person by knowingly disclosing an image of another person whose intimate parts are exposed or who is engaged in a sexual act, when the actor knows that the other person did not consent to the disclosure and when the actor knows that the other person expected that the image would be kept private, under circumstances where the other person had a reasonable expectation that the image would be kept private. The fact that a person has consented to the possession of an image by another person does not imply consent to disclose that image more broadly.

D. Citron, Hate Crimes in Cyberspace (2014). The proposed statute contains exceptions for “lawful and common practices of law enforcement, criminal reporting, legal proceedings; or medical treatment,” for the reporting of unlawful conduct, for voluntary exposures in public or commercial settings, and for disclosures that relate to the public interest.

Is the proposed statute constitutional? If so, how (if at all) is this disclosure different from unconsented disclosure of verbal descriptions of sexual acts or from disclosure of other forms of embarrassing information gained through an intimate relationship? Consider Waldman, A Breach of Trust: Fighting Nonconsensual Pornography, 102 Iowa L. Rev. 709 (2017): “The distribution of sexually graphic or intimate images of individuals without their consent [can] have devastating effects: Victims experience severe anxiety and depression and they are often placed in physical danger. They lose their jobs and have difficulty finding new ones. Many have to recede from online life, move far away, and even change their names to escape revenge porn’s long shadow.”

For the argument that laws against revenge porn violate the first amendment, see Goldberg, Free Speech Consequentialism, 116 Colum. L. Rev. 687, 743-749 (2016):

[Advocates for the criminalization of revenge porn maintain that such speech is socially harmful and does not] “contribute any benefits to society.” Yet this does not separate revenge porn from any number of categories of protected speech that may cause others emotional distress and are considered by some to possess little value....There is not a principled way to create, at the wholesale level, an unprotected category of speech around revenge porn....However, partners can protect their own interests by explicitly asking their partners to agree not to [disclose such images.] The best way to regulate revenge porn is through private (noncriminal) law, as a breach of implied contract....

7. Unlawfully obtained information. In Cox Broadcasting, the Court emphasized that the information had been obtained lawfully by the press from government documents. Suppose, however, the information is obtained unlawfully? In Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514 (2001), a radio station aired a tape of a telephone conversation that the station received from an anonymous source. In the circumstances, the station knew that the tape had been made in violation of federal and state anti-wiretap statutes. The Court held that these statutes could not constitutionally be applied to the radio station because the topic of the call was a matter of public concern (collective-bargaining negotiations between a union representing teachers at a public high school and the local school board) and the broadcaster had not participated directly in the unlawful interception (even though the broadcaster knew that the material had been obtained unlawfully). Without deciding whether there might be some circumstances in which the privacy interest is “strong enough to justify the application” of the statute, such as when there is disclosure of “domestic gossip [of] purely private concern,” the Court held that the enforcement of the statute in this case “implicates core purposes of the First Amendment because it imposes sanctions on the publication of truthful information of public concern.” In this situation, “privacy concerns give way when balanced against the interest in publishing matters of public importance.” Recall the Pentagon Papers case. Suppose in Bartnicki that the radio station itself had unlawfully intercepted the phone call. Should that lead to a different result?

3. Threats

A “threat” is generally defined as “a statement of an intention to inflict pain, injury, damage, or other hostile action on someone if she does not do something the person making the statement wants her to do.” In what circumstances, and for what reasons, can the state constitutionally punish individuals who make threats? Are threats of only “low” First Amendment value?

BRIDGES v. CALIFORNIA, 314 U.S. 252 (1941). Bridges arose out of litigation between two rival unions. While a motion for new trial was pending, Bridges, president of the union against whom the trial judge had ruled, published a copy of a telegram he had sent to the Secretary of Labor describing the judge’s decision as “outrageous” and suggesting that, if the decision were enforced, his union would call a strike that would tie up the port of Los Angeles. As a result of this publication, Bridges was found guilty of contempt of court.

In an opinion by Justice Black, the Court held the contempt conviction unconstitutional: “The ‘clear and present danger’ language of the Schenck case has afforded practical guidance in a great variety of cases in which the scope of constitutional protections of freedom of expression was in issue. [What] finally emerges from the ‘clear and present danger’ cases is a working principle that the substantive evil must be extremely serious and the degree of imminence extremely high before utterances can be punished....

“Let us assume that the telegram could be construed as an announcement of Bridges’ intention to call a strike, something which [neither] the general law of California nor the court’s decree prohibited. With an eye on the realities of the situation, we cannot assume that Judge Schmidt was unaware of the possibility of a strike as a consequence of his decision. If he was not intimidated by the facts themselves, we do not believe that the most explicit statement of them could have sidetracked the course of justice.”

Justice Frankfurter, joined by Chief Justice Stone and Justices Roberts and Byrnes, dissented: “Of course freedom of speech and of the press [should] be employed in comment upon the work of [courts]. But [freedom] of expression can hardly carry implications that nullify the guarantees of impartial trials. [Comment] however forthright is one thing. Intimidation with respect to specific matters still in judicial suspense, quite another. [To be punishable, a publication] must refer to a matter under consideration and constitute in effect a threat to its impartial disposition. It must be calculated to create an atmospheric pressure incompatible with rational, impartial adjudication. But to interfere with justice it need not succeed. As with other offenses, the state should be able to proscribe attempts that fail because of the danger that attempts may succeed....

“The publication of the telegram was regarded by the state supreme court as ‘a threat that if an attempt was made to enforce the decision, the ports of the entire Pacific Coast would be tied up.’ [This] occurred immediately after counsel had moved to set aside the judgment which was criticized, so unquestionably there was a threat to litigation obviously alive. It would be inadmissible dogmatism for us to say that in the context of the immediate case [this] could not have dominated the mind of the judge before whom the matter was pending.”

Is clear and present danger the correct standard in a case like Bridges? Is Justice Frankfurter correct in asserting that Bridges “threatened” the judge? Should a threat be thought of only “low”-value speech “because it operates more like a physical action than [a] communication of ideas or emotions”? Gey, The Nuremberg Files and the First Amendment Value of Threats, 78 Tex. L. Rev. 541, 591–593 (2000). See K. Greenawalt, Speech, Crime and the Uses of Language 94 (1989) (the first amendment does not protect speech that “involves the creation of prospective harmful consequences in order to achieve one’s objective”).

Consider the following situations: (a) X threatens to kill Judge Y unless she acquits Z. (b) X threatens to disclose that Judge Y is having a lesbian relationship unless she acquits Z. (c) X threatens to oppose Judge Y’s reelection unless she acquits Z. (d) X threatens to call a general strike unless Judge Y convicts Z. If a “threat” is subject to regulation because it affects behavior by coercion rather than by persuasion, does that rationale support any distinction among situations (a), (b), (c), and (d)?

WATTS v. UNITED STATES, 394 U.S. 705 (1969). Petitioner, during a public rally at the Washington Monument, stated to a small group of persons: “I have already received my draft classification as 1-A and I have got to go for my physical this Monday coming. I am not going. If they ever make me carry a rifle the first man I want to get in my sights is L.B.J.” For this remark, petitioner was convicted of violating a federal statute prohibiting any person “knowingly and willfully [to make] any threat to take the life of or to inflict bodily harm upon the President of the United States.” Although conceding that the statute was constitutional “on its face,” the Court reversed the conviction on the ground that “the kind of political hyperbole indulged in by petitioner” did not constitute a “threat” within the meaning of the statute. Petitioner’s “only offense,” the Court concluded, “was ‘a kind of very crude offensive method of stating a political opposition to the President.’” Do you agree that the statute is constitutional “on its face”? Is a threat to kill the President of “low” first amendment value?

PLANNED PARENTHOOD v. AMERICAN COALITION OF LIFE ACTIVISTS, 290 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2002). Suppose defendant establishes a website (called the “Nuremberg Files”) that states that its purpose is to “collect dossiers on abortionists in anticipation that one day we may be able to hold them on trial for crimes against humanity,” lists the names and addresses of abortion providers, includes photographs of abortion providers in Wild-West-style “Wanted” posters, and crosses out the names of abortion providers who have been murdered. Can this expression be restricted on the ground that the website constitutes “incitement”? On the ground that it constitutes a “threat”? Should it matter that the website was established after an unrelated individual had murdered three abortion providers after distributing similar posters naming them as “Wanted” persons?

The Court of Appeals, in a six-to-five en banc decision, held that the operators of the Nuremberg Files website could be held liable in damages and enjoined because the site constituted an unprotected threat: “If ACLA had merely endorsed or encouraged the violent actions of others, its speech would be protected. [Citing Brandenburg.] However, while advocating violence is protected, threatening a person with violence is not. [Although the] posters contain no language that is [literally] a threat, whether a particular statement may properly be considered to be a threat is governed by an objective standard—whether a reasonable person would foresee that the statement would be interpreted by those to whom the maker communicates the statement as a serious expression of intent to harm or assault. [It] is not necessary that the defendant intend to, or be able to carry out his threat; the only intent requirement for a true threat is that the defendant intentionally or knowingly communicate the [threat] with the intent to intimidate. [It] is making a threat to intimidate that makes ACLA's conduct unlawful....

"The true threats analysis [in this case] turns on the poster pattern. [The website does not contain] any language that is overtly threatening. [It] is use of the 'Wanted'-type format in the context of the poster pattern—poster followed by murder—that constitutes the threat. Because of the pattern, a 'Wanted'-type poster naming a specific doctor who provides abortions was perceived by physicians, who are providers of reproductive health services, as a serious threat of death or bodily harm. [The] posters are a true threat because, [like] burning crosses, they connote something they do not literally say, yet both the actor and the recipient get the message. To the doctor who performs abortions, these posters meant 'You'll be shot or killed.' [As] a direct result of having [a] poster out on them, physicians wore bullet-proof vests and took other extraordinary security measures to protect themselves and their families. ACLA had every reason to foresee that its expression [would] elicit this reaction. Physicians' fear did not simply happen; ACLA intended to intimidate them from doing what they do. This [is] conduct that [lacks] any protection under the First Amendment. Violence is not a protected value. Nor is a true threat of violence with intent to intimidate."

The dissenting judges argued as follows: "[I]t is not illegal—and cannot be made so—merely to say things that would frighten or intimidate the listener. For example, when a doctor says, 'You have cancer and will die within six months,' it is not a threat, even though you almost certainly will be frightened. [By] contrast, 'If you don't stop performing abortions, I'll kill you' is a true threat and surely illegal. The difference between a true threat and protected expression is this: A true threat warns of violence or other harm that the speaker controls....

"[As the majority argues,] because context matters, the statements [in this case] could reasonably be interpreted as an effort to intimidate plaintiffs into ceasing their abortion-related activities. If that were enough to strip the speech of First Amendment protection, there would be nothing left to decide. But the Supreme Court has told us that '[s]peech does not lose its protected character... simply because it may embarrass others or coerce them into action.' [Claiborne Hardware.] In other words, some forms of intimidation enjoy constitutional protection. The majority does not point to any statement by defendants that they intended to inflict bodily harm on plaintiffs, nor is there any evidence that defendants took any steps whatsoever to plan or carry out physical violence against anyone. Rather, the majority relies on the fact that 'the poster format itself had acquired currency as a death threat for abortion providers.' [But none of the doctors who were killed were killed by anyone connected with this Web page.]

“The majority tries to fill this gaping hole in the record by noting that defendants ‘kn[ew] the fear generated among those in the reproductive health services community who were singled out for identification on a “Wanted”-type poster.’ But a statement does not become a true threat because it instills fear in the listener; as noted above, many statements generate fear in the listener, yet are not true threats and therefore may not be punished or enjoined consistent with the First Amendment. In order for the statement to be a threat, it must send the message that the speakers themselves—or individuals acting in concert with them—will engage in physical violence. [Yet] the opinion points to no evidence that defendants [would] have been understood by a reasonable listener as saying that they will cause the harm.

“From the point of view of the victims, it makes little difference whether the violence against them will come from the makers of the posters or from unrelated third parties; bullets kill their victims regardless of who pulls the trigger. But it makes a difference for the purpose of the First Amendment. Speech—especially political speech, as this clearly was—may not be punished or enjoined unless it falls into one of the narrow categories of unprotected speech recognized by the Supreme Court: true threat, incitement, fighting words, etc. [The] posters can be viewed, at most, as a call to arms for other abortion protesters to harm plaintiffs. However, the Supreme Court made it clear that under Brandenburg, encouragement or even advocacy of violence is protected by the First Amendment [unless the harm is both likely and imminent]....

“The Nuremberg Files website is clearly an expression of a political point of view. The posters and the website are designed both to rally political support for the views espoused by defendants, and to intimidate plaintiffs and others like them into desisting abortion related activities. This political agenda may not be to the liking of many people—political dissidents are often unpopular—but the speech, including the intimidating message, does not constitute a direct threat because there is no evidence [that] the speakers intend to resort to physical violence if their threat is not heeded. We have recognized that statements communicated directly to the target are much more likely to be true threats than those, as here, communicated as part of a public protest. [In] deciding whether the coercive speech is protected, it makes a big difference whether it is contained in a private communication—a face-to-face confrontation, a telephone call, a dead fish wrapped in newspaper—or is made during the course of public discourse. The reason for this distinction is obvious: Private speech is aimed only at its target. Public speech, by contrast, seeks to move public opinion and to encourage those of like mind. Coercive speech that is part of public discourse enjoys far greater protection than identical speech made in a purely private context. In this case, defendants said nothing remotely threatening, yet they find themselves crucified financially. Who knows what other neutral statements a jury might imbue with a menacing meaning based on the activities of unrelated parties....”

See Rothman, Freedom of Speech and True Threats, 25 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y. 283 (2001) (to prove a “true” threat, the prosecution should have to prove (a) that the speaker knowingly or recklessly made a statement that would frighten or intimidate the victim with the threat of harm; (b) that the speaker knowingly or recklessly suggested that the threat would be carried out by the speaker or his co-conspirators; and (c) that a reasonable person who heard the statement would conclude that it was meant to threaten the victim with harm).

In what circumstances, if any, might the display of a swastika or a burning cross constitute a “true threat”? Suppose a black family moves into an all-white community and the next day wakes up to discover a burning cross on the street in front of their home. Can the persons who erected the cross be punished for making a threat? In the incitement situation, the Court, following the leading of Judge Learned Hand in Masses, seems to require that for incitement of unlawful conduct to come within the low-value category of express incitement the incitement must be express. Is a burning cross an express threat? Does it make any sense to require express incitement but not express threats? On cross-burning as a threat, see Virginia v. Black, section D8, infra.

Can an individual be punished for threatening words if she does not intend for them to be perceived as a threat? In Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001 (2015), the petitioner posted on Facebook a series of threatening statements directed toward his wife and others. He maintained that he was an aspiring rap artist and that his speech was intended as mere hyperbole, analogizing it to the violence sometimes expressed in rap music. He was convicted under a federal statute making it a crime to transmit in interstate commerce “any threat...to injure the person of another.” The trial court instructed the jury that it could convict if a reasonable person would regard the statements as threats and declined to instruct the jury that the petitioner had to intend to communicate a threat.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Roberts, reversed the conviction, but declined to reach the constitutional question. As a matter of statutory construction, the Court held that the government was required to prove more than mere negligence, but did not specify what mental state was required.

In a separate opinion, Justice Alito argued that recklessness, meaning disregard of a risk of which the speaker was aware, was sufficient to satisfy the demands of the first amendment. In Alito’s view, “threats inflict great harm and have little if any social value,” and “whether or not the person making a threat intends to cause harm, the damage is the same.” Drawing an analogy to libel law, he concluded that “reckless disregard” for the harm caused should be sufficient to meet the demands of the first amendment in the threat context as well.

In another separate opinion, Justice Thomas, adopting an originalist approach that invoked state statutes and English precedent at the time of the framing, argued that the first amendment in this situation requires a showing of neither specific intent to threaten nor recklessness. Mere negligence, he concluded, is sufficient.

4. Commercial Advertising

Although the Chaplinsky dictum made no reference to commercial advertising, only a month after Chaplinsky the Court added commercial advertising to its list of “unprotected” expression in Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942). In Chrestensen, the Court upheld a prohibition on the distribution of any “handbill [or] other advertising matter [in] or upon any street.” Although conceding that a similar prohibition on noncommercial expression would violate the first amendment, the Court announced, without explanation or analysis, that the amendment imposed “no such restraint on government as respects purely commercial advertising.” See also Breard v. Alexandria, 341 U.S. 622 (1951) (upholding a prohibition on door-to-door solicitation of magazine subscriptions).

Despite Chrestensen, the precise contours and rationale of the commercial advertising doctrine remained obscure. The mere presence of a commercial motive, for example, was not deemed dispositive, as evidenced by the Court’s continued protection of books, movies, newspapers, and other forms of expression produced and sold for profit. Moreover, in New York Times v. Sullivan, section D1 supra, the Court rejected an argument that the paid “political” advertisement there at issue was unprotected commercial expression:

The publication here was not a “commercial” advertisement in the sense in which the word was used in Chrestensen. It communicated information, expressed opinion, recited grievances, [and] protested claimed abuses. [That] the Times was paid for publishing the advertisement is as immaterial in this connection as is the fact that newspapers and books are sold. [Any] other conclusion would discourage newspapers from carrying “editorial advertisements” of this type, and so might shut off an important outlet for the promulgation of information and ideas by persons who do not themselves have access to publishing facilities.

In the 1970s, the Court began to narrow the scope of the commercial speech doctrine. In Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975), for example, the Court reversed the conviction of an individual who, prior to the Court’s decision in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), and in violation of Virginia law, published in his newspaper an advertisement announcing the availability of legal abortions in New York. The Court distinguished Chrestensen on the ground that the advertisement in Bigelow “did more than simply propose a commercial transaction. It contained factual material of clear ‘public interest.’” The Court emphasized that Chrestensen’s holding was “distinctly a limited one.”

Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council
425 U.S. 748 (1976)

[An organization of prescription drug consumers challenged as violative of the first and fourteenth amendments a Virginia statute providing that a pharmacist licensed in Virginia is guilty of unprofessional conduct if he “publishes, advertises, or promotes, directly or indirectly, in any manner whatsoever, any amount, price, fee, premium, discount, rebate or credit terms [for] any drugs which may be dispensed only by prescription.” Although drug prices varied strikingly throughout the state and even within the same locality, the challenged law effectively prevented the dissemination of any prescription drug price information, since only licensed pharmacists were authorized to dispense such drugs. A three-judge district court held the law invalid. The Supreme Court affirmed.]

MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court....*

IV

The appellants contend that the advertisement of prescription drug prices is outside the protection of the First Amendment because it is “commercial speech.” There can be no question that in past decisions the Court has given some indication that commercial speech is unprotected. [Discussing Chrestensen, Breard, and Bigelow.]...

[The] question whether there is a First Amendment exception for “commercial speech” is squarely before us. Our pharmacist does not wish to editorialize on any subject, cultural, philosophical, or political. He does not wish to report any particularly newsworthy fact, or to make generalized observations even about commercial matters. The “idea” he wishes to communicate is simply this: “I will sell you the X prescription drug at the Y price.” Our question, then, is whether this communication is wholly outside the protection of the First Amendment.

V

We begin with several propositions that already are settled or beyond serious dispute. It is clear, for example, that speech does not lose its First Amendment protection because money is spent to project it, as in a paid advertisement of one form or another. [Citing New York Times v. Sullivan.] Speech likewise is protected even though it is carried in a form that is “sold” for profit, [and] even though it may involve a solicitation to purchase or otherwise pay or contribute money....

If there is a kind of commercial speech that lacks all First Amendment protection, therefore, it must be distinguished by its content. Yet the speech whose content deprives it of protection cannot simply be speech on a commercial subject. No one would contend that our pharmacist may be prevented from being heard on the subject of whether, in general, pharmaceutical prices should be regulated, or their advertisement forbidden. Nor can it be dispositive that a commercial advertisement is noneditorial, and merely reports a fact. Purely factual matter of public interest may claim protection....

Our question is whether speech which does “no more than propose a commercial transaction” is so removed from any “exposition of ideas,” [Chaplinsky], and from “truth, science, morality, and arts in general, in its diffusion of liberal sentiments on the administration of Government,” that it lacks all protection. Our answer is that it is not.

Focusing first on the individual parties to the transaction that is proposed in the commercial advertisement, we may assume that the advertiser’s interest is a purely economic one. That hardly disqualifies him from protection under the First Amendment. The interests of the contestants in a labor dispute are primarily economic, but it has long been settled that both the employee and the employer are protected by the First Amendment when they express themselves on the merits of the dispute in order to influence its outcome. [We] know of no requirement that, in order to avail themselves of First Amendment protection, the parties to a labor dispute need address themselves to the merits of unionism in general or to any subject beyond their immediate dispute....

As to the particular consumer's interest in the free flow of commercial information, that interest may be as keen, if not keener by far, than his interest in the day's most urgent political debate. Appellees' case in this respect is a convincing one. Those whom the suppression of prescription drug price information hits the hardest are the poor, the sick, and particularly the aged. A disproportionate amount of their income tends to be spent on prescription drugs; yet they are the least able to learn, by shopping from pharmacist to pharmacist, where their scarce dollars are best spent. When drug prices vary as strikingly as they do, information as to who is charging what becomes more than a convenience. It could mean the alleviation of physical pain or the enjoyment of basic necessities.

Generalizing, society also may have a strong interest in the free flow of commercial information. Even an individual advertisement, though entirely "commercial," may be of general public interest. The facts of decided cases furnish illustrations: advertisements stating that referral services for legal abortions are available, [Bigelow]; that a manufacturer of artificial furs promotes his product as an alternative to the extinction by his competitors of fur-bearing mammals, and that a domestic producer advertises his product as an alternative to imports that tend to deprive American residents of their jobs. [Obviously,] not all commercial messages contain the same or even a very great public interest element. There are few to which such an element, however, could not be added. Our pharmacist, for example, could cast himself as a commentator on store-to-store disparities in drug prices, giving his own and those of a competitor as proof. We see little point in requiring him to do so, and little difference if he does not.

Moreover, there is another consideration that suggests that no line between publicly "interesting" or "important" commercial advertising and the opposite kind could ever be drawn. Advertising, however tasteless and excessive it sometimes may seem, is nonetheless dissemination of information as to who is producing and selling what product, for what reason, and at what price. So long as we preserve a predominantly free enterprise economy, the allocation of our resources in large measure will be made through numerous private economic decisions. It is a matter of public interest that those decisions, in the aggregate, be intelligent and well informed. To this end, the free flow of commercial information is indispensable. [And] if it is indispensable to the proper allocation of resources in a free enterprise system, it is also indispensable to the formation of intelligent opinions as to how that system ought to be regulated or altered. Therefore, even if the First Amendment were thought to be primarily an instrument to enlighten public decisionmaking in a democracy, we could not say that the free flow of information does not serve that goal.

Arrayed against these substantial individual and societal interests are a number of justifications for the advertising ban. These have to do principally with maintaining a high degree of professionalism on the part of licensed pharmacists. Indisputably, the State has a strong interest in maintaining that professionalism....

Price advertising, it is argued, will place in jeopardy the pharmacist's expertise and, with it, the customer's health. It is claimed that the aggressive price competition that will result from unlimited advertising will make it impossible for the pharmacist to supply professional services in the compounding, handling, and dispensing of prescription drugs. Such services are time consuming and expensive; if competitors who economize by eliminating them are permitted to advertise their resulting lower prices, the more painstaking and conscientious pharmacist will be forced either to follow suit or to go out of business. It is also claimed that prices might not necessarily fall as a result of advertising. If one pharmacist advertises, others must, and the resulting expense will inflate the cost of drugs. [Finally] it is argued that damage will be done to the professional image of the pharmacist. This image, that of a skilled and specialized craftsman, attracts talent to the profession and reinforces the better habits of those who are in it. Price advertising, it is said, will reduce the pharmacist's status to that of a mere retailer.

The strength of these proffered justifications is greatly undermined by the fact that high professional standards, to a substantial extent, are guaranteed by the close regulation to which pharmacists in Virginia are subject. [At] the same time, we cannot discount the Board's justifications entirely. The Court regarded justifications of this type sufficient to sustain the advertising bans challenged on due process and equal protection grounds. [Citing, e.g., Williamson v. Lee Optical of Oklahoma, 348 U.S. 483 (1955).]

The challenge now made, however, is based on the First Amendment. This casts the Board's justifications in a different light, for on close inspection it is seen that the State's protectiveness of its citizens rests in large measure on the advantages of their being kept in ignorance. The advertising ban does not directly affect professional standards one way or the other. It affects them only through the reactions it is assumed people will have to the free flow of drug price information....

It appears to be feared that if the pharmacist who wishes to provide low cost, and assertedly low quality, services is permitted to advertise, he will be taken up on his offer by too many unwitting customers. They will choose the low-cost, low-quality service and drive the “professional” pharmacist out of business. They will respond only to costly and excessive advertising, and end up paying the price. They will go from one pharmacist to another, following the discount, and destroy the pharmacist-customer relationship. They will lose respect for the profession because it advertises. All this is not in their best interests, and all this can be avoided if they are not permitted to know who is charging what.

There is, of course, an alternative to this highly paternalistic approach. That alternative is to assume that this information is not in itself harmful, that people will perceive their own best interests if only they are well enough informed, and that the best means to that end is to open the channels of communication rather than to close them. If they are truly open, nothing prevents the “professional” pharmacist from marketing his own assertedly superior product, and contrasting it with that of the low-cost, high-volume prescription drug retailer. But the choice among these alternative approaches is not ours to make or the Virginia General Assembly’s. It is precisely this kind of choice, between the dangers of suppressing information, and the dangers of its misuse if it is freely available, that the First Amendment makes for us....

VI

In concluding that commercial speech, like other varieties, is protected, we of course do not hold that it can never be regulated in any way. Some forms of commercial speech regulation are surely permissible. We mention a few only to make clear that they are not before us and therefore are not foreclosed by this case.

There is no claim, for example, that the prohibition on prescription drug price advertising is a mere time, place, and manner restriction. We have often approved restrictions of that kind provided that they are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they serve a significant governmental interest, and that in so doing they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information. [Whatever] may be the proper bounds of time, place, and manner restrictions on commercial speech, they are plainly exceeded by this Virginia statute, which singles out speech of a particular content and seeks to prevent its dissemination completely.

Nor is there any claim that prescription drug price advertisements are forbidden because they are false or misleading in any way. Untruthful speech, commercial or otherwise, has never been protected for its own sake. [Gertz.] Obviously, much commercial speech is not provably false, or even wholly false, but only deceptive or misleading. We foresee no obstacle to a State’s dealing effectively with this problem.²⁴ The First Amendment, as we construe it today, does not prohibit the State from insuring that the stream of commercial information flows cleanly as well as freely....

Also, there is no claim that the transactions proposed in the forbidden advertisements are themselves illegal in any way. [Finally,] the special problems of the electronic broadcast media are likewise not in this case....

What is at issue is whether a State may completely suppress the dissemination of concededly truthful information about entirely lawful activity, fearful of that information's effect upon its disseminators and its recipients. Reserving other questions,²⁵ we conclude that the answer to this one is in the negative.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

[Justice Stevens did not participate. Chief Justice Burger concurred in an opinion emphasizing the reservations set out in footnote 25. Justice Stewart concurred in an opinion emphasizing that government still should be free to regulate false or misleading commercial advertising.]

MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST, dissenting.

The logical consequences of the Court's decision in this case, a decision which elevates commercial intercourse between a seller hawking his wares and a buyer seeking to strike a bargain to the same plane as has been previously reserved for the free marketplace of ideas, are far reaching indeed. Under the Court's opinion the way will be open not only for dissemination of price information but for active promotion of prescription drugs, liquor, cigarettes, and other products the use of which it has previously been thought desirable to discourage. Now, however, such promotion is protected by the First Amendment so long as it is not misleading or does not promote an illegal product or enterprise....

The Court speaks of the consumer's interest in the free flow of commercial information, particularly in the case of the poor, the sick, and the aged. It goes on to observe that "society also may have a strong interest in the free flow of commercial information." [One] need not disagree with either of these statements in order to feel that they should presumptively be the concern of the Virginia Legislature, which sits to balance these and other claims in the process of making laws such as the one here under attack. The Court speaks of the importance in a "predominantly free enterprise economy" of intelligent and well-informed decisions as to allocation of resources. While there is again much to be said for the Court's observation as a matter of desirable public policy, there is certainly nothing in the United States Constitution which requires the Virginia Legislature to hew to the teachings of Adam Smith in its legislative decisions regulating the pharmacy profession. E.g., Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502 (1934); Olsen v. Nebraska, 313 U.S. 236 (1941)....

The Court insists that the rule it lays down is consistent even with the view that the First Amendment is “primarily an instrument to enlighten public decisionmaking in a democracy.” I had understood this view to relate to public decisionmaking as to political, social, and other public issues, rather than the decision of a particular individual as to whether to purchase one or another kind of shampoo. It is undoubtedly arguable that many people in the country regard the choice of shampoo as just as important as who may be elected to local, state, or national political office, but that does not automatically bring information about competing shampoos within the protection of the First Amendment....

In the case of “our” hypothetical pharmacist, he may now presumably advertise not only the prices of prescription drugs, but may attempt to energetically promote their sale so long as he does so truthfully. Quite consistently with Virginia law requiring prescription drugs to be available only through a physician, “our” pharmacist might run any of the following representative advertisements in a local newspaper:

Pain getting you down? Insist that your physician prescribe Demerol. You pay a little more than for aspirin, but you get a lot more relief.

Can’t shake the flu? Get a prescription for Tetracycline from your doctor today.

Don’t spend another sleepless night. Ask your doctor to prescribe Seconal without delay.

Unless the State can show that these advertisements are either actually untruthful or misleading, it presumably is not free to restrict in any way commercial efforts on the part of those who profit from the sale of prescription drugs to put them in the widest possible circulation. But such a line simply makes no allowance whatever for what appears to have been a considered legislative judgment in most States that while prescription drugs are a necessary and vital part of medical care and treatment, there are sufficient dangers attending their widespread use that they simply may not be promoted in the same manner as hair creams, deodorants, and toothpaste. The very real dangers that general advertising for such drugs might create in terms of encouraging, even though not sanctioning, illicit use of them by individuals for whom they have not been prescribed, or by generating patient pressure upon physicians to prescribe them, are simply not dealt with in the Court's opinion....

Note: Virginia Pharmacy and the “Free Flow of Commercial Information”

1. Is commercial speech of “low” first amendment value? Consider the following:

a. Jackson and Jeffries, Commercial Speech: Economic Due Process and the First Amendment, 65 Va. L. Rev. 1, 17–18, 30–31 (1979):

[The Court's conclusion in Virginia Pharmacy that commercial speech is relevant to self-government is] a non sequitur. It apparently rests on the assertion that because regulation of the free enterprise system is a matter of political choice, commercial advertising that plays a part in the functioning of the free enterprise system is for that reason politically significant speech. But in terms of relevance to political decisionmaking, advertising is neither more nor less significant than a host of other market activities that legislatures concededly may regulate. [The] decisive point is the absence of any principled distinction between commercial soliciting and other aspects of economic activity. [In Virginia Pharmacy,] economic due process is resurrected, clothed in the ill-fitting garb of the first amendment.

For a critique of this argument, see Shiffrin, The First Amendment and Economic Regulation: Away from a General Theory of the First Amendment, 78 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1212, 1225–1239 (1983).

b. Redish, The First Amendment in the Marketplace: Commercial Speech and the Values of Free Expression, 39 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 429, 433, 441–444 (1971):

If the individual is to achieve the maximum degree of material satisfaction permitted by his resources, he must be presented with as much information as possible concerning the relative merits of competing products. After receiving the competing information, the individual will then be in a position [to] rationally decide which combination of features best satisfies his personal needs. [Viewed in this light,] informational commercial speech furthers legitimate first amendment purposes. When the individual is presented with rational grounds for preferring one product or brand over another, he is encouraged to consider the competing information [and to] exercise his abilities to reason and think; this aids him towards the intangible goal of rational self-fulfillment.

Compare R. Collins and D. Skover, The Death of Discourse 77, 80, 105, 114 (1996):

On the eve of the twenty-first century, America's marketplace of ideas has largely become a junkyard of commodity ideology. [Today's] mass advertising often has less to do with products than lifestyles, less to do with facts than image, and less to do with reason than romance. [In modern mass advertising, entire] categories of commercial communication are essentially bereft of any real informational content. [If] commercial communication is safe [in the free speech marketplace], it is not because it actually furthers the First Amendment's traditional values of rational decisionmaking and self-realization. [The] real reason for constitutional protection of modern mass advertising is less ennobling: It is speech in the service of selling.

c. Coase, Advertising and Free Speech, 6 J. Legal Stud. 1, 2, 14 (1977):

It seems to be believed that [if the government intervened in the market for ideas, it] would be inefficient and wrongly motivated. [How] different is the government assumed to be when we come to economic regulation. In this area government is considered to be competent in action and pure in motivation. [Since] we are concerned with [the] same government, why is it that it is regarded as incompetent and untrustworthy in the one market and efficient and reliable in the other? [It] seems to me that the arguments [used] to support freedom in the market for ideas are equally applicable in the market for goods.

Compare Scanlon, Freedom of Expression and Categories of Expression, 40 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 519, 541 (1979): “[Commercial speech deserves less than full first amendment protection because] we regard the government as much less partisan in the competition between commercial firms than in the struggle between religious or political views.” See also Stone, Ronald Coase’s First Amendment, 54 J. Law & Econ. 367, 374 (2011); Brudney, The First Amendment and Commercial Speech, 53 B.C. L. Rev. 1153, 1179, 1168 (2013).

d. Blasi, The Pathological Perspective and the First Amendment, 85 Colum. L. Rev. 449, 486, 488 (1985):

Commercial advertising was never a concern in any of the historical political struggles over freedom of expression. The first amendment claimants in disputes over commercial advertising often are sophisticated and driven by the profit motive. The speech in question is brief and intended to evoke a reflexive, even if somewhat delayed, response from listeners. There is a strong tradition of government regulation of [advertising]. [Perhaps] most important, [the] spectacle of voluminous litigation over [product] advertising, conducted in the name of the first amendment, [would] undercut [society's] belief that first amendment freedoms represent a noble commitment well worth preserving even in the face of serious anxieties, risks, and costs. [Thus, we should] exclude commercial advertising from the protection of the first amendment.

e. Justice Powell's opinion for the Court in Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar, 436 U.S. 447 (1978):

In rejecting the notion [that expression concerning purely commercial transactions] "is wholly outside the protection of the First Amendment," [we] were careful [in Virginia Pharmacy not to discard] the "commonsense distinction between speech proposing a commercial transaction [and] other varieties of speech." [Indeed,] to require a parity of constitutional protection for commercial and noncommercial speech alike could invite dilution, simply by a leveling process, of the force of the Amendment's guarantee with respect to the latter kind of speech. Rather than subject the First Amendment to such a devitalization, we have instead afforded commercial speech a limited measure of protection, commensurate with its subordinate position in the scale of First Amendment values....

2. What is "commercial" speech? In Virginia Pharmacy, the Court reaffirmed that the content of the speech, rather than the speaker's commercial or profit motivation, is determinative. What matters, in other words, is not whether the speaker is out to make money, but whether the expression does "no more than propose a commercial transaction." Is this definition satisfactory? Does a billboard displaying a cigarette package in a pastoral setting constitute "commercial" speech under this definition? What about corporate issue advertising that describes the corporation, its activities, or its policies without explicitly identifying any of the corporation's products or services? Consider Comment, First Amendment Protection for Commercial Advertising: The New Constitutional Doctrine, 44 U. Chi. L. Rev. 205, 236 (1976): "[Commercial speech should be defined as] (1) speech that refers to a specific brand name product or service, (2) made by a speaker with a financial interest in the sale of the advertised product or service, in the sale of a competing product or service, or in the distribution of the speech, (3) that does not advertise an activity itself protected by the first amendment.”

Is a law regulating the manner in which companies can state their prices a regulation of commercial speech? See Expressions Hair Design v. Schneiderman, 582 U.S. --- (2017).

In Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983), the Court held that various “informational pamphlets” dealing with contraceptives constituted “commercial” speech. “One of [the] pamphlets, ‘Condoms and Human Sexuality,’ specifically [referred] to a number of Trojan-brand condoms manufactured by [Youngs] and [described] the advantages of each type. [Another], ‘Plain Talk about Venereal Disease,’ [discussed] condoms without any specific reference to those manufactured by [Youngs].” The Court explained:

The mere fact that these pamphlets are conceded to be advertisements clearly does not compel the conclusion that they are commercial speech. [Citing New York Times v. Sullivan.] Similarly, the reference to a specific product does not by itself render the pamphlets commercial speech. Finally, the fact that Youngs has an economic motivation for mailing the pamphlets would clearly be insufficient by itself to turn the materials into commercial speech. [The] combination of all these characteristics, however, provides strong support for [the] conclusion that the informational pamphlets [are] commercial speech. [Moreover, the pamphlets] constitute commercial speech notwithstanding the fact that they contain discussions of important public issues such as venereal disease and family planning. [Advertising] which “links a product to a current public debate” is not thereby entitled to the constitutional protection afforded noncommercial speech. [Finally, that] a product is referred to generically [and not by brand name] does not [remove] it from the realm of commercial speech. [For] a company with sufficient control of the market for a product may be able to promote the product without reference to specific brand names. [Indeed, in] this case, Youngs describes itself as “the leader in the manufacture and sale” of contraceptives.

Note: Truthful, Nondeceptive Commercial Advertising after Virginia Pharmacy

In the years immediately after Virginia Pharmacy, the Court reaffirmed and expanded its protection of truthful, nondeceptive commercial speech:

1. Lawyer advertising. In Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977), the Court invalidated a state court rule prohibiting attorney advertising, as applied to a newspaper advertisement stating “DO YOU NEED A LAWYER? Legal Services at Very Reasonable Fees” and listing fees for a variety of services, such as uncontested divorce, uncontested adoption, uncontested nonbusiness bankruptcy, and name change. The Court rejected the state’s argument that attorney advertising of routine services would adversely affect professionalism and the quality of legal services, stir up unnecessary litigation, increase the overhead costs of lawyers, cause increased fees, and create difficulties in enforcing the line between protected and unprotected advertisements. Without specifying precisely what standard it was applying, the Court concluded that none “of the proffered justifications [rises] to the level of an acceptable reason for the suppression of all advertising by attorneys.”

2. “For sale” signs. In Linmark Associates v. Township of Willingboro, 431 U.S. 85 (1977), the Court invalidated an ordinance prohibiting the display of “For Sale” or “Sold” signs on all but model homes. The ordinance was designed to prevent “panic selling” in a racially integrated residential community that had recently experienced “white flight” in response to a sharp increase in the nonwhite proportion of the population. The Court recognized that the goal of “promoting stable, racially integrated housing” is “vital,” but nonetheless held that the township had failed to establish that the ordinance “was necessary to achieve this objective.” In any event, “the constitutional defect in this ordinance [is] far more basic,” for the township “has sought to restrict the free flow of these data because it fears that otherwise homeowners will make decisions inimical to what the [town council] views as the homeowners’ self-interest and the corporate interest of the township: they will choose to leave the town. [If] dissemination of this information can be restricted, then every locality in the country can suppress any facts that reflect poorly on the locality, so long as a plausible claim can be made that disclosure would cause the recipients of the information to act ‘irrationally.’ [Virginia Pharmacy] denies government such sweeping powers.”

3. Contraceptive advertising. In Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678 (1977), the Court invalidated a prohibition on the advertising of contraceptives because the state’s concerns “that advertisements of contraceptive products would be offensive and embarrassing to those exposed to them, and that permitting them would legitimate sexual activity of young people” are “classically not justifications validating the suppression of expression protected by the First Amendment.” See also Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983) (invalidating a federal statute prohibiting the mailing of unsolicited advertisements for contraceptives because the interest in shielding “recipients of mail from materials that they are likely to find offensive” is not sufficiently substantial to justify the suppression of “protected speech”).

CENTRAL HUDSON GAS v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION OF NEW YORK, 447 U.S. 557 (1980). The commission permitted electric utilities to engage in institutional and informational advertising, but, to further the conservation of energy, prohibited such utilities to engage in promotional advertising designed to stimulate the use of electricity. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Powell, held the order invalid. After observing that the “Constitution [accords] a lesser protection to commercial speech than to other constitutionally guaranteed expression,” the Court maintained that in its prior decisions, it had implicitly “developed” a “four-part analysis” for commercial speech cases:

“[First], we must determine whether the expression is protected by the First Amendment. For commercial speech to come within that provision, it at least must concern lawful activity and not be misleading. [Second], we ask whether the asserted governmental interest is substantial. [Third, if] both inquiries yield positive answers, we must determine whether the regulation directly advances the governmental interest. [And fourth], if the governmental interest could be served as well by a more limited restriction on commercial speech, the excessive restrictions cannot survive.”

Applying this analysis to the ban on promotional advertising, the Court noted that the “Commission does not claim that the expression at issue is either inaccurate or relates to unlawful activity.” Moreover, “in view of our country’s dependence on energy resources beyond our control, no one can doubt the importance of energy conservation. Plainly, therefore, the state interest asserted is substantial.” Further, “the State’s interest in energy conservation is directly advanced by the Commission order.” Thus, “the critical inquiry” is whether the commission’s complete suppression of speech ordinarily protected by the first amendment is “no more extensive than necessary to further the State’s interest.” The Court found the complete ban on promotional advertising to be too “extensive” because the commission “has not demonstrated that its interest in conservation cannot be protected adequately by more limited regulation of [the] format and content of Central Hudson’s advertising. It might, for example, require that the advertisements include information about the relative efficiency and expense of the offered service.” The Court thus concluded that, “in the absence of a showing that more limited speech regulation would be ineffective, we cannot approve the complete suppression of Central Hudson’s advertising.”

Justice Blackmun, joined by Justice Brennan, concurred, but argued that the Court's standard weakened the protection accorded commercial advertising in Virginia Pharmacy. Justice Rehnquist dissented. He argued that New York's order is essentially "an economic regulation to which virtually complete deference should be accorded by this Court," for "in terms of constitutional values," the ban on promotional advertising is "virtually indistinguishable" from a decision of the commission to raise the price of electricity in order to conserve energy.

Note: Truthful, Nondeceptive Commercial Advertising

1. Retreat? Confirming Justice Blackmun's concern that Central Hudson seemed to retreat from the Court's prior understanding of the first amendment's protection of truthful, nondeceptive commercial advertising, in a few post-Central Hudson decisions the Court did seem to take a relatively deferential approach to laws regulating commercial advertising.

In Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Co. of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328 (1986), for example, the Court, in a five-to-four decision, upheld a Puerto Rican statute that prohibited any advertising of legal casino gambling aimed at the residents of Puerto Rico. In an opinion by Justice Rehnquist, the Court explained that Puerto Rico apparently believed that "[excessive] casino gambling among local residents [would] produce serious harmful effects" similar to those that had "motivated the vast majority of the 50 States to prohibit casino gambling." The Court held this was a "substantial" government interest and declared that the law directly advanced that interest, within the meaning of Central Hudson.

In response to the argument that, having chosen to legalize casino gambling for residents of Puerto Rico, the first amendment prohibited the legislature from using restrictions on advertising to accomplish its goal of reducing demand for such gambling, the Court reasoned that because "the government could have enacted a wholesale prohibition of the underlying conduct" it was permissible for the government to take the "less intrusive step of allowing the conduct, but reducing the demand through restrictions on advertising." The Court observed that "the greater power to completely ban casino gambling necessarily includes the lesser power to ban advertising of casino gambling," and that it would "be a strange constitutional doctrine which would concede to the legislature the authority to totally ban a product or activity, but deny to the legislature the authority to forbid the stimulation of demand for the product or activity through advertising." After Posadas, could a state constitutionally ban all cigarette advertising?

See also Florida Bar v. Went for It, 515 U.S. 618 (1995) (upholding a rule of the Florida bar prohibiting any lawyer to send “a written communication to a prospective client for the purpose of obtaining professional employment if [the] communication concerns an action for personal injury [arising out of] an accident [involving] the person to whom the communication is addressed,” because the challenged rule protects “in a direct and material way” the “privacy and tranquility of personal injury victims [against] intrusive, unsolicited contact by lawyers”).

2. Retreat from retreat. The retreat from Virginia Pharmacy was short-lived, however. Consider the following decisions:

a. In Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co., 514 U.S. 476 (1995), the Court invalidated section 205(e)(2) of the Federal Alcohol Administration Act, which prohibited beer labels from displaying alcohol content. The government had argued that the labeling ban was necessary to prevent “strength wars” among brewers who, without regulation, would seek to compete in the marketplace based on the potency of their beer.

b. In Greater New Orleans Broadcasting Association, Inc. v. United States, 527 U.S. 173 (1999), the Court unanimously invalidated 18 U.S.C. §1304, which prohibited radio and television broadcasters from carrying advertisements about privately operated commercial casino gambling, as applied to broadcast stations located in states where such gambling is legal.

c. In 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996), the Court invalidated a Rhode Island statute prohibiting “advertising in any manner whatsoever” of the price of any alcoholic beverage, except for price tags or signs displayed within licensed premises and not visible from the street: “[When] a State [prohibits] the dissemination of truthful, nonmisleading commercial [messages], there is [little] reason to depart from the rigorous review that the First Amendment generally demands. [Bans] against truthful, nonmisleading commercial speech [usually] rest solely on the offensive assumption that the public will respond ‘irrationally’ to the truth. The First Amendment directs us to be especially skeptical of regulations that seek to keep people in the dark for what the government perceives to be their own good....

“The State [cannot] satisfy the requirement that its restriction on speech be no more extensive than necessary. It is perfectly obvious that alternative forms of regulation that would not involve any restriction on speech would be more likely to achieve the State’s goal of promoting temperance. [Higher] prices can be maintained [by] increased taxation. Per capita purchases could be limited as is the case with prescription drugs. Even educational campaigns focused on the problems [of] drinking might prove to be more effective. [Thus,] the price advertising ban cannot survive the more stringent constitutional review that Central Hudson [concluded] was appropriate for the complete suppression of truthful, nonmisleading commercial speech.”

Justice Thomas filed a concurring opinion: “In cases such as this, in which the government’s asserted interest is to keep legal users of a product or service ignorant in order to manipulate their choices in the marketplace, [the state’s interest] is per se illegitimate and can no more justify regulation of ‘commercial’ speech than it can justify regulation of ‘noncommercial’ speech. [I] would [hold that] all attempts to dissuade legal choices by citizens by keeping them ignorant are impermissible.”

d. In Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly, 533 U.S. 525 (2001), the Court invalidated Massachusetts regulations governing the advertising of cigarettes, smokeless tobacco products, and cigars. The regulations prohibited outdoor advertising of such products within one thousand feet of a public playground or elementary or secondary school: “The State’s interest in preventing underage tobacco use is substantial, and even compelling, but it is no less true that the sale and use of tobacco products by adults is a legal activity. [Tobacco] retailers and manufacturers have an interest in conveying truthful information about their products to adults, and adults have a corresponding interest in receiving truthful information about tobacco products. [The state] has failed to show that [these regulations] are not more extensive than necessary to advance the State’s substantial interest in preventing underage tobacco use.”

In a concurring opinion, Justice Thomas argued that “there is no ‘philosophical or historical basis for asserting that “commercial” speech is of “lower value” than “noncommercial” speech.’” Thus, the “asserted government interest in keeping people ignorant by suppressing expression ‘is per se illegitimate and can no more justify regulation of “commercial” speech than it can justify regulation of “noncommercial” speech.’”

e. Thompson v. Western States Medical Center, 535 U.S. 357 (2002) concerned the regulation of drug compounding, a process by which a pharmacist combines ingredients to create a medication tailored to the needs of an individual patient. Compounding is typically used to prepare medications that are not commercially available. It is a traditional component of the practice of pharmacy. The federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act of 1938 prohibits any person to manufacture or sell any “new drug” without prior FDA approval. Until the early 1990s, the FDA left the regulation of drug compounding to the states. In the early 1990s, however, the FDA became increasingly concerned about the practice. In 1997 Congress enacted the Food and Drug Administration Modernization Act which, among other things, expressly exempted compounded drugs from the FDA's standard drug approval requirements if, but only if, the providers of those drugs did not advertise them.

The Court, in a five-to-four decision, held this restriction unconstitutional: “[The] Government [notes] that the FDCA’s [general] drug approval requirements are critical to the public health [because the safety] of a new drug needs to be established by rigorous, scientifically valid clinical studies, [rather than by the] impressions of individual doctors, who cannot themselves compile sufficient [data]. [But] ‘because obtaining FDA approval for a new drug is a costly process, requiring [such] approval of all drug products compounded by pharmacies for the particular needs of an individual patient would, as a practical matter, eliminate the practice of compounding, and thereby [eliminate] compounded drugs for those patients who have no alternative treatment.’ [Thus], the Government needs to be able to draw a line between small-scale compounding and large-scale drug manufacturing. That line must distinguish compounded drugs produced on such a small scale that they could not [realistically] undergo [costly] safety and efficacy testing from drugs produced and sold on a large enough scale that they could undergo such testing and therefore must do so.

“[The] Government has failed to demonstrate that the speech restrictions are ‘not more extensive than is necessary to serve [its] interest[s].’ [Several] non-speech related means of drawing a line between compounding and large-scale manufacturing might be possible here. [For] example, the Government could ban the use of ‘commercial scale manufacturing [for] compounding drug products.’ [It could cap] the amount of any particular compounded drug [that] a pharmacist may make or sell in a given period of time. [The] Government has not offered any reason why these possibilities, alone or in combination, would be insufficient to prevent compounding from occurring on such a scale as to undermine the new drug approval process.”

Justice Breyer, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Stevens and Ginsburg, dissented: “There is considerable evidence that consumer oriented advertising will create strong consumer-driven demand for a particular drug, [and] there is strong evidence that doctors will often respond affirmatively to a patient’s request for a specific drug that the patient has seen advertised. [I] do not deny that the statute restricts the circulation of some truthful information. [Nonetheless], this Court has not previously held that commercial advertising restrictions automatically violate the First Amendment. Rather, the Court has applied a more flexible test. [It] has done so because it has concluded that, from a constitutional perspective, commercial speech does not warrant application of the Court’s strictest speech-protective tests. [The] Court, in my view, gives insufficient weight [in this case] to the Government's regulatory rationale, and too readily assumes the existence of practical alternatives. It thereby applies the commercial speech doctrine too strictly."

f. Sorrell v. IMS Health Inc., 564 U.S. 552 (2011) involved the process of "detailing," by which pharmaceutical manufacturers market their drugs to doctors. This typically involves a salesman's (or detailer's) visit to a doctor's office to persuade the doctor to prescribe a particular brand-name drug. Knowledge of the doctor's prescription practices—called "prescriber-identifying information"—enables the detailer to determine which doctors are likely to be interested in particular drugs and how best to present the sales pitch. Pharmacies receive prescriber-identifying information whenever they fill prescriptions. Many pharmacies sell this information to data miners, who then analyze the information and sell it to pharmaceutical manufacturers, who then give it to their detailers to enable them to refine their marketing approach and increase sales. In 2007, Vermont enacted legislation prohibiting pharmacies from selling prescriber-identifying information for the purpose of marketing prescription drugs.

The Court, in a six-to-three decision, held that this law violated the First Amendment: "[The State] contends that [its law] advances important public policy goals by lowering the costs of medical services and promoting public health. If prescriber-identifying information were available for use by detailers, the State contends, then detailing would be effective in promoting brand-name drugs that are more expensive and less safe than generic alternatives. [While these] goals may be proper, [the law] does not advance them in a permissible way. [Those] who seek to censor [expression] often assert that disfavored speech has adverse effects. But the 'fear that people would make bad decisions if given truthful information' cannot justify content-based burdens on speech. [Citing Thompson, Virginia Board of Pharmacy, and 44 Liquormart]."

Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Ginsburg and Kagan, dissented: "[O]ur cases make clear that the First Amendment offers considerably less protection to the maintenance of a free marketplace for goods and services [than for] a marketplace that provides access to 'social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences.' [To] apply a 'heightened' standard of review [in a case like this] would risk what then-Justice Rehnquist [once described] as a 'return to the bygone era of Lochner.' [By] inviting courts to scrutinize whether a State's legitimate regulatory interests can be achieved in less restrictive ways whenever they touch (even indirectly) upon commercial speech, today's majority risks repeated the mistakes of the past."

3. The implications of Rubin, Greater New Orleans, Liquormart, Lorillard,

Thompson, and Sorrell. After these six decisions, can you envision any circumstances in which the Court would uphold the regulation of truthful, nondeceptive commercial advertising of a lawful product or service because the advertising might cause consumers to make undesirable decisions? Is the Court's concern with paternalism in these cases warranted? For a skeptical view, see Brudney, The First Amendment and Commercial Speech, 53 B.C. L. Rev. 1153, 1194-1197 (2013). What about advertising directed at children? Can the state constitutionally ban cigarette advertisements in school newspapers? In comic books?

4. A Corporate Takeover of the First Amendment? A recent analysis of Supreme Court and lower court decisions finds that in the wake of Virginia Pharmacy "corporations have begun to displace individuals" as the primary beneficiaries of the first amendment. This analysis finds that until Virginia Pharmacy only expressive businesses, like media companies, were able to convince the Court to strike down laws regulating their expressive activity, but that since that decision the number of cases in which non-expressive businesses have successfully invoked the protection of the first amendment has increased dramatically, substantially displacing cases in which individuals are the primary beneficiary of the first amendment. See Coates, Corporate Speech and the First Amendment: History, Data, and Implications, 30 Const. Comment. 223 (2015); Kessler, The Early Years of First Amendment Lochnerism, 116 Colum. L. Rev. 1915 (2016).

Note: Other Regulations of Commercial Advertising

1. Regulating the means of commercial advertising. The cases considered above involved restrictions on the advertising of particular services or products. Suppose the government restricts all commercial advertising, as a class. How might that affect the analysis? Consider City of Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, 507 U.S. 410 (1993). In 1989, Cincinnati authorized respondent companies to place sixty-two freestanding newsracks on public property for the purpose of distributing free magazines that consisted primarily of advertisements for respondents' services. In 1990, motivated by its interest in the safety and attractive appearance of its streets and sidewalks, Cincinnati revoked respondents' permits on the ground that the magazines were "commercial handbills" whose distribution on public property could be prohibited. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Stevens, invalidated the restriction:

[Respondents] do [not] question the substantiality of the city's interest in safety and esthetics. [The critical issue is whether the city has met its burden under Central Hudson and Fox] to establish a “reasonable fit” between its legitimate interests [and] its [ban] on newsracks dispensing “commercial handbills.”...

The city argues that there is a close fit [because] every decrease in the number of such dispensing devices necessarily effects an increase in safety and an improvement in the attractiveness of the cityscape. [This is] an insufficient justification for the discrimination against respondents’ use of newsracks that are no more harmful than the [1,500 to 2,000 noncommercial newsracks that the city permits]. The major premise supporting the city’s argument is the proposition that commercial speech has only a low value. Based on that premise, the city contends that the fact that assertedly more valuable publications are allowed to use newsracks does not undermine its judgment that its esthetic and safety interests are stronger than the interest in allowing commercial speakers to have similar access to the reading public.

We cannot agree. [In] this case, the distinction [between commercial and noncommercial speech] bears no relationship whatsoever to the particular interests that the city has asserted. It is therefore an impermissible means of responding to the city’s admittedly legitimate interests. [Respondents’] newsracks are no greater an eyesore than the newsracks permitted to remain on Cincinnati’s sidewalks. [In] the absence of some basis for distinguishing between “newspapers” and “commercial handbills” that is relevant to an interest asserted by the city, we are unwilling to recognize Cincinnati’s bare assertion that the “low value” of commercial speech is a sufficient justification for its selective and categorical ban on newsracks dispensing “commercial handbills.”

Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justices White and Thomas, dissented, arguing that one “would have thought that the city [could] have decided to place the burden of its regulatory scheme on less protected speech [without] running afoul of the First Amendment.”

2. Regulating commercial billboards. In light of Discovery Network, how would you expect the Court to rule on the constitutionality of a city ordinance banning all commercial (but not political or public service) billboards? Consider Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego, 453 U.S. 490 (1981), which involved the constitutionality of a San Diego ordinance prohibiting virtually all outdoor advertising display signs. The ordinance was designed to eliminate hazards to pedestrians and motorists and to improve the appearance of the city. Although the Court invalidated the ordinance as applied to noncommercial advertising, it sustained the ordinance as applied to commercial messages. The Court explained that the “critical” question concerned “the third of the Central Hudson criteria:

Does the ordinance ‘directly advance’ governmental interests in traffic safety and in the appearance of the city?” Although noting that there was no direct evidence in the record “to show any connection between billboards and traffic safety,” the Court was reluctant “to disagree with the accumulated, common-sense judgments of local lawmakers [that] billboards are real and substantial hazards to traffic safety. There is nothing here to suggest that these judgments are unreasonable.” Similarly, although noting that “esthetic judgments are necessarily subjective,” the Court concluded that the city’s esthetic judgment was reasonable. Can Metromedia be squared with Discovery Network?

3. Regulating commercial spam. Commercial advertisers often send unsolicited, bulk emails to thousands of recipients. This has the potential to overwhelm individuals’ electronic mailboxes and thus to discourage the use of email generally. Could Congress constitutionally prohibit any person to send unsolicited commercial advertisements via email? Could it constitutionally prohibit any person to send unsolicited commercial advertisements via regular mail?

4. Regulating commercial advertisements of unlawful products or services. The Court has repeatedly stated that commercial advertisements offering to enter into unlawful transactions are not protected by the first amendment. See, e.g., Hoffman Estates v. Flipside, 455 U.S. 489 (1982) (“government may regulate or ban entirely” commercial “speech proposing an illegal transaction”). Is this reconcilable with Brandenburg?

5. Regulating the viewpoints expressed in commercial advertising. Suppose a law forbids any commercial advertisement that demeans any person or group. Should the constitutionality of such a law be evaluated under the Central Hudson standard or under the more general First Amendment standard that demands strict scrutiny for any law that discriminates on the basis of viewpoint? The Court confronted this question in Matal v. Tam, 582 U.S. --- (2017). “Slants” is a derogatory term for persons of Asian descent. Simon Tam, lead singer of the rock group “The Slants,” whose members are Asian-Americans, chose the name in order to “reclaim” the term and drain it of its denigrating force. The federal Patent and Trademark Office denied Tam’s application for federal trademark registration of the name because it violated a federal law prohibiting the registration of any trademarks that “disparage...or bring...into contemp[t] or disrepute” any “persons.” The government argued that trademarks are commercial speech and that the law should therefore be tested under Central Hudson. Although the eight justices participating in the case were unanimous in invalidating the law, four justices held that strict scrutiny is the appropriate standard for all viewpoint discrimination even in the context of commercial advertising, and four justices held that there was no need to decide whether trademarks constitute commercial advertising because the statute failed to pass muster even under Central Hudson.

6. Regulating factually false commercial advertising. In footnote 24 of Virginia Pharmacy, the Court offered several arguments as to why factually false commercial speech may constitutionally be regulated more extensively than other forms of factually false expression. Consider the following criticisms: (a) “Commercial speech is not necessarily more verifiable than other speech. There may well be uncertainty about some quality of a product, such as the health effect of eggs. [On] the other hand, political speech is often quite verifiable by the speakers. A political candidate knows the truth about his own past and present intentions, yet misrepresentations on these subjects are immune from state regulation.” Farber, Commercial Speech and First Amendment Theory, 74 Nw. U. L. Rev. 372, 385–386 (1979). (b) “[It] is also incorrect to distinguish commercial from political expression on the ground that the former is somehow harder because of the inherent profit motive. It could just as easily be said that we need not fear that commercial magazines and newspapers will cease publication for fear of government regulation, because they are in business for profit.” Redish, The Value of Free Speech, 130 U. Pa. L. Rev. 591, 633 (1982).

7. Regulating deceptive or misleading commercial advertising. Virginia Pharmacy suggests that commercial advertising may be regulated or prohibited, even if it is not factually false, if it is deceptive or misleading. Is this defensible? The Court observed in Gertz that “there is no constitutional value in false statements of fact.” Can the same be said of misleading or deceptive expression? Do you agree with the Court in Central Hudson that, since “the First Amendment’s concern for commercial speech is based on the informational function of advertising, [there] can be no constitutional objection to the suppression of commercial messages that [are] more likely to deceive the public than to inform it”? When is an advertisement “misleading”? See Friedman v. Rogers, 440 U.S. 1 (1979) (upholding a state statute prohibiting the practice of optometry under “any trade name” as a permissible restriction of misleading advertising); Peel v. Attorney Registration & Disciplinary Commission of Illinois, 496 U.S. 91 (1990) (rejecting a state’s claim that it is “inherently misleading” for lawyers to hold themselves out as “specialists” in particular fields); Ibanez v. Florida Department of Business and Professional Regulation, 512 U.S. 136 (1994) (rejecting a state’s claim that it is “inherently misleading” for an attorney truthfully to advertise that she is also a certified public accountant).

8. Compelled disclosure. In Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel, 471 U.S. 626 (1985), an attorney advertised in a certain type of case, “if there is no recovery, no legal fees are owed by our clients.” The Court upheld a disciplinary rule requiring the attorney to disclose in the advertisement that clients would have to pay “costs” even if the lawsuits were unsuccessful. The Court explained that “because the extension of First Amendment protection to commercial speech is justified principally by the value to consumers of the information such speech provides,” the state may constitutionally require advertisers to disclose specific information in their advertisements if that requirement is “reasonably related to the State’s interest in preventing deception of consumers.”

9. Compelled commercial speech. The Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, which is designed to maintain orderly agricultural markets, authorizes collective action by groups of agricultural producers on such matters as uniform prices, product standards, and generic advertising. The cost of such collective action, which must be approved by two-thirds of the affected producers, is covered by compulsory assessments on the producers. In Glickman v. Wileman Brothers & Elliott, Inc., 512 U.S. 1145 (1997), the Court held that marketing orders promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture, which assessed respondent producers for the cost of generic advertising of California tree fruits, did not violate respondents’ first amendment rights, even though respondents objected to the requirement that they pay for such advertising. The Court explained:

[The] regulatory scheme at issue [is distinguishable] from laws that we have found to abridge [the] First Amendment [see Chapter 6, section C, supra] [because] they do not compel the producers to endorse or to finance any political or ideological views. [None] of the advertising in this record promotes any particular message other than encouraging consumers to buy California tree fruit. Neither the fact that respondents may prefer to foster that message independently in order to promote and distinguish their own products, nor the fact that they think more or less money should be spent fostering it, makes this case comparable to those in which an objection rested on political or ideological disagreement with the content of the message. The mere fact that the objectors believe their money is not being well spent “does not mean [that] they have a First Amendment complaint.”

In such circumstances, the Court concluded that the wisdom of the overall program “is simply a question of economic policy for Congress and the Executive to resolve.” Justice Souter, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Thomas, dissented.

See also United States v. United Foods, 533 U.S. 405 (2001) (invalidating a federal statute requiring producers of fresh mushrooms to fund a common advertising program promoting mushroom sales on the ground that, unlike the situation in Glickman, where the compelled assessments were ancillary to a comprehensive regulatory scheme, the requirements in United Foods were not part of such a comprehensive scheme); Johanns v. Livestock Marketing Association, 544 U.S. 550 (2005) (upholding a federal statute imposing an assessment on all sales of cattle to fund, among other things, beef promotional campaigns, on the ground that, unlike the situation in United Foods, the promotional materials in this case are “government speech” rather than government-compelled private speech because the Secretary of Agriculture directly controls “every word” in the promotional materials). See Post, Compelled Subsidization of Speech: Johanns v. Livestock Marketing Association, 2005 Sup. Ct. Rev. 195. For more on the problem of government speech, see section E2d.

5. Obscenity

In the first reported obscenity case in the United States, a Pennsylvania court declared it an offense at common law to exhibit for profit a picture of a nude couple. Commonwealth v. Sharpless, 2 Serg. & Rawle 91 (1815). Despite Sharpless, there were few serious efforts to restrict “obscene” expression prior to the Civil War. In the late 1860s, however, Anthony Comstock, a grocer, initiated a campaign to suppress obscenity. Comstock’s efforts resulted in the enactment of anti-obscenity legislation in virtually every state. In applying this legislation, most courts adopted the Hicklin definition of obscenity: The “test of obscenity” is “whether the tendency of the matter [is] to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences.” Regina v. Hicklin, 3 L.R-Q.B. 360, 371 (1868). Under this test, which resulted in the suppression of such works as Theodore Dreiser’s An American Tragedy and D. H. Lawrence’s Lady Chatterley’s Lover, a work could be deemed obscene because of the potential effect of even isolated passages on the most susceptible readers or viewers. See Commonwealth v. Friede, 271 Mass. 318, 171 N.E. 472 (1930) (An American Tragedy); Commonwealth v. DeLacey, 271 Mass. 327, 171 N.E. 455 (1930) (Lady Chatterley’s Lover).

In an influential decision reviewing the suppression of James Joyce’s Ulysses in the early 1930s, a federal court rejected the Hicklin test and adopted instead a standard focusing on the effect on the average person of the dominant theme of the work as a whole. United States v. One Book Called "Ulysses," 5 F. Supp. 182 (S.D.N.Y. 1933), aff'd, 72 F.2d 705 (2d Cir. 1934). On the evolution of obscenity doctrine in this era, see G. Stone, Sex and the Constitution 145–148, 153–178 (2017).

Throughout this era, it was generally assumed that the first amendment posed no barrier to the suppression of obscenity. Indeed, the Chaplinsky dictum prominently featured the “obscene” in its catalogue of “unprotected” utterances. The Supreme Court first considered the obscenity issue in a 1948 case arising out of New York’s attempt to suppress Memoirs of Hecate County, a highly regarded book written by Edmund Wilson, one of America’s foremost literary critics. The Court divided equally on the issue, however, and thus affirmed the conviction without opinion. Doubleday & Co. v. New York, 335 U.S. 848 (1948).

Nine years later, in Roth v. United States, infra, the Court finally addressed the obscenity question. There have been two distinct periods in the Court’s efforts to come to grips with obscenity. The first period, which lasted from the 1957 decision in Roth until 1973, was dominated by the Warren Court’s frustrating and largely unsuccessful efforts to define “obscenity.” The second period, which began with the Court’s 1973 decisions in Miller v. California and Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, infra, has been dominated by the Court’s subsequent efforts to reformulate the doctrine. This section focuses on three questions: Is obscenity “low”-value speech? What is “obscenity”? What interests justify the suppression of obscenity?

ROTH v. UNITED STATES; ALBERTS v. CALIFORNIA, 354 U.S. 476 (1957). Roth was convicted of violating a federal statute prohibiting any person to mail any “obscene” publication. Alberts was convicted of violating a California statute prohibiting any person to write, print, or sell any “obscene” writing. The Supreme Court affirmed the convictions. Justice Brennan delivered the opinion of the Court:

“The dispositive question is whether obscenity is utterance within the area of protected speech and press. [All] ideas having even the slightest redeeming social importance—unorthodox ideas, controversial ideas, even ideas hateful to the prevailing climate of opinion—have the full protection of the guarantees, unless excludable because they encroach upon the limited area of more important interests. But implicit in the history of the First Amendment is the rejection of obscenity as utterly without redeeming social importance. [Thirteen] of the 14 States which by 1792 had ratified the Constitution [provided] for the prosecution of libel, and all of those States made either blasphemy or profanity, or both, statutory crimes. [In] light of this history, it is apparent [that] obscenity, [like] libel, [was] outside the protection intended for speech and press. [We therefore] hold that obscenity is not within the area of constitutionally protected speech or press. [Accordingly,] obscene material [may be suppressed] without proof [that it will] create a clear and present danger of antisocial conduct.

“However, sex and obscenity are not synonymous. Obscene material is material which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest. The portrayal of sex, e.g., in art, literature, and scientific works, is not itself sufficient reason to deny material the constitutional protection of freedom of speech and press. Sex, a great and mysterious motive in human life, has indisputably been a subject of absorbing interest to mankind through the ages; it is one of the vital problems of human interest and public concern. [It] is therefore vital that the standards for judging obscenity safeguard the protection of freedom of speech and press for material which does not treat sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest. [The proper test is] whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to the prurient interest.”

Chief Justice Warren concurred in the result: “It is not the book that is on trial; it is a person. [The] defendants [in] these cases [were] plainly engaged in the commercial exploitation of the morbid and shameful craving for materials with prurient effect. [State] and Federal Governments can constitutionally punish such conduct. That is all that [we] need to decide.”

Justice Harlan concurred in the result in Alberts, but dissented in Roth on the ground that the states have broader authority to regulate obscene expression than the federal government, which may restrict only “hard-core pornography.”

Justice Douglas, joined by Justice Black, dissented: “I do not think that the problem can be resolved by the Court’s statement that ‘obscenity is not expression protected by the First Amendment.’ [There] is no special historical evidence that literature dealing with sex was intended to be treated in a special manner by those who drafted the First Amendment. [Moreover,] I reject [the] implication that problems of freedom of speech [are] to be resolved by weighing against the values of free expression, the judgment of the Court that a particular form of expression has ‘no redeeming social importance.’ The First Amendment [was] designed to preclude courts as well as legislatures from weighing the values of speech against silence. [I] have the same confidence in the ability of our people to reject noxious literature as I have in their capacity to sort out the true from the false in theology, economics, politics, or any other field.”

Note: Obscenity and Free Expression

1. Samuel Roth. Samuel Roth was a character. Born in 1893 in the Carpathian Mountains in Eastern Europe, he emigrated to America as a child and grew up in the tenements on the Lower East Side of New York, in the same neighborhood as Mollie Steimer, one of the defendants in Abrams. As a young man he started a poetry magazine called The Lyric, in which he published not only his own work, but also poems by such then-unknown authors as Archibald MacLeish and D. H. Lawrence. He established a bookstore in Greenwich Village that became famous as the Poetry Bookshop.

During a trip to England, when he was in his early twenties, Roth was intrigued by a German sex manual that he picked up from one of the many pornography stalls in London. When he returned to New York, he translated, advertised, and distributed the pamphlet, but he soon got in trouble with the postal authorities. Several years later, in 1927, he began circulating advertisements for his impending publication of The Perfumed Garden, a pornographic fifteenth-century Arabian classic. The New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, which had been founded by Anthony Comstock, promptly had Roth arrested.

Over the next thirty years, Roth was repeatedly arrested for the publication of such works as D. H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover and a growing list of pornographic titles, such as Celestine: The Diary of a Chambermaid, Her Candle Burns Hot, and Beautiful Sinners of New York. Through it all, and through a series of jail terms, Roth insisted that individuals had a right to read such material. In his early sixties, and after being sentenced to five years in prison for publishing several ever-more sexually explicit works like Wild Passion and Wanton at Night, he finally made it to the Supreme Court of the United States. See G. Stone, Sex and the Constitution 269–271 (2017).

2. Entertainment, art, literature, and the first amendment. Does the first amendment protect not only speech that expressly addresses “public” issues but also “speech” in the form of entertainment, art, and literature? Does the latter form of “speech” have a “subordinate position” in the scale of first amendment values? Consider Kalven, The Metaphysics of the Law of Obscenity, 1960 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1, 15–16:

The classic defense of John Stuart Mill and the modern defense of Alexander Meiklejohn do not help much when the question is why the novel, the poem, the painting, the drama, or the piece of sculpture falls within the protection of the First Amendment. Nor do the famous opinions of Hand, Holmes, and Brandeis. The emphasis is all on truth winning out in a fair fight between competing ideas [and on the] argument that free speech is indispensable to the informed citizenry required to make self-government work. The people need free speech because they vote. [But not] all communications are relevant to the political process. The people do not need novels or dramas or paintings or poems because they will be called upon to vote. Art and belles-lettres do not deal in such ideas—at least not good art or belles-lettres. [Thus] there seems to be a hiatus in our basic free-speech theory.

Consider Meiklejohn's response:

[There] are many forms of thought and expression within the range of human communications from which the voter derives the knowledge, intelligence, sensitivity to human values: the capacity for sane and objective judgment which, so far as possible, a ballot should express. [The] people do need novels and dramas and paintings and poems, “because they will be called upon to vote.” The primary social fact which blocks and hinders the success of our experiment in self-government is that our citizens are not educated for self-government.

Meiklejohn, The First Amendment Is an Absolute, 1961 Sup. Ct. Rev. 245, 256, 263. Does the “self-fulfillment” defense of free expression fill Kalven’s “hiatus” and offer a more persuasive rationale for the protection of art, literature, and entertainment?

The Court has generally assumed that non-obscene literature and entertainment are entitled to “full” first amendment protection. In Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507, 510 (1948), for example, the Court explained that “[the] line between the informing and the entertaining is too elusive for the protection of the basic right. Everyone is familiar with instances of propaganda through fiction. What is one man’s amusement, teaches another’s doctrine.” See also Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61 (1981) (holding unconstitutional a prohibition on all live entertainment in the borough). For a more thorough explication of the values of aesthetic expression, see Bezanson, Art and the Constitution, 93 Iowa L. Rev. 1593 (2008); Nahmod, Artistic Expression and Aesthetic Theory: The Beautiful, The Sublime and The First Amendment, 1987 Wis. L. Rev. 221; Hamilton, Art Speech, 49 Vand. L. Rev. 73 (1996).

3. Is obscenity of only “low” first amendment value? Does obscenity further any of the values underlying the protection of free expression? Consider the following arguments:

a. As the Court demonstrated in Roth, the historical evidence shows that obscenity “was outside the protection intended for speech and press.” But consider Kalven, supra, at 9: “[The] Court’s use of history was so casual as to be [alarming]. Is it clear, for example, that blasphemy can constitutionally be made a crime today? And what would the Court say to an argument along the same lines appealing to the Sedition Act of 1798 as justification for the truly liberty-defeating crime of seditious libel?”

b. Stone, Sex, Violence, and the First Amendment, 74 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1857, 1861–1863 (2007):

In Roth, the Court maintained that “implicit in the history of the First Amendment is the rejection of obscenity as utterly without redeeming social importance.” [But] unlike libel, blasphemy, and profanity, obscenity was not unlawful under either English or American law in 1792.

In England, the state first punished an obscene publication in 1727. In King v. Currill [2 Stra. 788], the court sustained the conviction of Edward Currill for publishing Venus in the Cloister or the Nun in her Smock, [a] sexually explicit depiction of supposedly rampant sex among monks and nuns in a convent. It dealt quite graphically with voyeurism, masturbation, fornication, dildos, and flagellation. In a two-to-one decision, the King’s Bench held that Currill’s publication was “punishable at common law, as an offense against the peace, in tending to weaken the bonds of civil society, virtue, and morality.” In fact, the prosecution had less to do with the sexual nature of the material than with Currill’s [publication] of several politically libelous works that had infuriated public officials.

Thereafter, obscenity prosecutions remained essentially unknown in England throughout the 18th century, despite a profusion of sexually explicit writings. [In] the 1790s, when the United States was contemplating the First Amendment, England was awash with all sorts of sexually explicit material, [and the] first prosecution for obscenity in the United States did not occur until [almost] a quarter-century after the adoption of the First Amendment....

For a fuller account of this history, see G. Stone, Sex and the Constitution 145–148, 153–178, 269–278 (2017).

c. Schauer, Speech and “Speech”—Obscenity and “Obscenity”: An Exercise in the Interpretation of Constitutional Language, 67 Geo. L.J. 899, 906, 922, 923, 926 (1979):

Certain uses of words, although speech in the ordinary sense, clearly are not speech in the constitutional sense. [“Speech” for first amendment purposes is defined by] the idea of cognitive content, of mental effect, of a communication designed to appeal to the intellectual process. This [includes] the artistic and the emotive as well as the propositional. [But] hardcore pornography is [by definition] designed to produce a purely physical effect. [It is] essentially a physical rather than a mental stimulus. [A] pornographic item is in a real sense a sexual surrogate. [Consider] rubber, plastic, or leather sex aids. It is hard to find any free speech aspects in their sale or use. [The] mere fact that in pornography the stimulating experience is initiated by visual rather than tactile means is irrelevant. [Neither] means constitutes communication in the cognitive sense. [Thus,] hardcore pornography is sex, [not “speech”].

Is this what the Court meant in Roth when it defined obscenity as “material which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest”? For a critique of Schauer’s view, see Gey, The Apologetics of Suppression: The Regulation of Pornography as Act and Idea, 86 Mich. L. Rev. 1564 (1988).

d. Laws directed against obscenity are not restrictions on ideas as such, for they limit the means of expression rather than the ideas expressed. As the Court said in Chaplinsky, obscene “utterances are no essential part of any exposition of ideas.” Moreover, to the extent that obscenity is associated with a particular ideological message, such as “sexual freedom,” it is an especially problematic means of expression, for it alters “one’s tastes and preferences” not by direct persuasion or rational argument but by “a process that is, like subliminal advertising, both outside of one’s rational control and quite independent of the relevant grounds for preference.” Scanlon, Freedom of Expression and Categories of Expression, 40 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 519, 547 (1979). On the other hand, might it be said that the very concept of “obscenity” embodies a forbidden “viewpoint-based restriction” because “it is justified by moral objections to the ideas or messages that sexual speech is said to convey”? Heins, Viewpoint Discrimination, 24 Hast. Const. L.Q. 99, 103 (1996).

4. The interests furthered by the suppression of obscenity. Because the Court in Roth accepted the underlying premise of the Chaplinsky dictum—that obscene utterances are wholly “unprotected” by the first amendment—the Court found it unnecessary to inquire into the nature or substantiality of the state interests said to justify the suppression of obscene expression. The gradual breakdown of the rigid “two-level” theory (under which speech is either “protected” or “unprotected”) and the increased use of “categorical” balancing in such areas as libel and commercial speech would seem to raise doubts about this approach. Do the decisions to “balance” conflicting state and speech interests in the libel and commercial speech contexts suggest a need for similar balancing in the obscenity context? If so, what state interests are sufficiently important to justify restrictions on obscene expression? Consider the following:

a. The state may suppress obscenity because it may cause antisocial conduct. Must the state “prove” causation? What must be the nature of the correlation—clear and present danger? Bad tendency? For analysis of the “correlation,” see the Report of the Commission on Obscenity and Pornography 26–27 (1970) (finding “no evidence to date that exposure to explicit sexual materials plays a significant role in the causation of delinquent or criminal behavior”).

Sixteen years after publication of the Commission on Obscenity and Pornography’s report, a new government commission—the Attorney General’s Commission on Pornography—determined that at least certain forms of obscenity could cause some types of antisocial conduct. For criticism of the report, see G. Hawkins and F. Zimring, Pornography in a Free Society (1988). For further discussion of the causation issue, see Schauer, Causation Theory and the Causes of Sexual Violence, 1987 Am. B. Found. Res. J. 737. On the two presidential commissions, see G. Stone, Sex and the Constitution 284–286, 297–298 (2017).

b. The state may suppress obscenity because it “corrupts character,” impairs “mental health,” and “has a deleterious effect on the individual from which the community should protect him.” Henkin, Morals and the Constitution: The Sin of Obscenity, 63 Colum. L. Rev. 391, 394 (1963). But see Koppelman, Does Obscenity Cause Moral Harm?, 105 Colum. L. Rev. 1635 (2005) (analogizing regulation of the moral of harm supposedly caused by obscenity to the regulation of religious values).

c. The state may suppress obscenity to prevent the erosion of moral standards. Consider Lockhart and McClure, Literature, the Law of Obscenity, and the Constitution, 38 Minn. L. Rev. 295, 374–375 (1954):

The view that literature may be proscribed because [it] may [change] accepted moral standards [flies] squarely in the face of the [guarantee of free] expression. Back of this fundamental freedom lies the basic conviction that our democratic society must be free to perfect its own standards of conduct and belief [through] the heat of unrepressed controversy and debate. The remedy against those who attack currently accepted standards is [defense] of those standards, not censorship.

d. The state may suppress obscenity because it erodes moral standards not by rational persuasion but by indirect degradation of values. Consider H. Clor, Obscenity and Public Morality 121, 170–171 (1969):

[Obscene materials] do not make arguments which are to be met by intelligent defense. While they attack moral values, they do not [do so] in any sense relevant to [public debate]. [Rather,] they have an [effect] upon feeling, upon motivations—ultimately upon character and the basic attitudes which arise from character. [Constant] exposure to [obscene] materials which overemphasize sensuality and brutality, reduce love to sex, and blatantly expose to public view intimacies which have been thought [private] must eventually [erode] moral standards. [The] ethical convictions of man do not rest simply upon his explicit opinions. They rest also upon a delicate network of moral and aesthetic feelings, sensibilities, [and] tastes. [These] “finer feelings” [may be eroded] by a steady stream of [obscenity]. Men whose sensibilities are frequently assaulted by prurient and lurid impressions may become desensitized. [This] is what is meant by “an erosion of the moral fabric.”

e. The state may suppress the dissemination of obscenity to minors because they are especially vulnerable to its “harmful” effects. But is there really anything to the notion that children need to be protected from exposure to sexual images? Consider Garfield, Protecting Children from Speech, 57 Fla. L. Rev. 565 (2005): “[The] concept of sheltering children from [sexual] speech is largely a modern conceit. The concept, after all, presupposes a ‘childhood’—a prolonged period of innocence—that was rare in premodern times and continues to be rare in many parts of the world. Put bluntly, children in the Middle Ages, who slept in their parents’ beds...did not need sheltering from sexually-explicit speech.”

Note: Developments in the Law of “Obscenity”—1957–1973

1. The definition of obscenity: the breakdown of consensus. In Roth, the Court embraced the view that material is “obscene” if, “to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest.” But agreement on the definition of obscenity was short-lived. Only a decade after Roth, Justice Harlan aptly observed that “[the] subject of obscenity has produced a variety of views among the members of the Court unmatched in any other course of constitutional adjudication.” As evidence, Justice Harlan noted that in the thirteen obscenity cases decided in the decade after Roth, there were “a total of 55 separate opinions among the Justices.” Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. Dallas, 390 U.S. 676, 704–705, 705 n.1 (1968) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

By 1968, the following views had emerged:

a. Justices Clark and White adhered to the initial Roth formulation. See Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413, 441 (1966) (Clark, J., dissenting); id. at 460–462 (White, J., dissenting).

b. Justices Black and Douglas adhered to their view, expressed in Roth, that government is wholly powerless to regulate sexually oriented expression on the ground of its obscenity. See Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184, 196–197 (1964) (Black, J., joined by Douglas, J., concurring).

c. Justice Harlan adhered to the view he expressed in Roth. See Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. at 204 (Harlan, J., dissenting).

d. Justice Stewart “reached the conclusion [that] under the First and Fourteenth Amendments criminal laws in this area are constitutionally limited to hard-core pornography.” Justice Stewart continued: “I shall not today attempt further to define the kinds of material I understand to be embraced within that shorthand description; and perhaps I could never succeed in intelligibly doing so. But I know it when I see it, and the motion picture involved in this case is not that.” Jacobellis v. Ohio, id. at 197 (Stewart, J., concurring).

e. Justice Brennan, Chief Justice Warren, and Justice Fortas adopted the view that, for material to be deemed obscene, “three elements must coalesce: it must be established that (a) the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to a prurient interest in sex; (b) the material is patently offensive because it affronts contemporary community standards relating to the description or representation of sexual matters; and (c) the material is utterly without redeeming social value.” Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. at 418 (Brennan, J., joined by Warren, C.J., and Fortas, J.). Although this formulation represented the view of only three justices, it was the formulation most often followed by state and federal courts from 1966 until the Court’s 1973 decision in Miller, infra. Note the addition of elements (b) and (c) to the initial Roth formulation.

2. The definition of obscenity: pandering. To complicate matters further, there was substantial disagreement within the Court over the extent to which factors extrinsic to the material should be considered in the obscenity determination. In Ginzburg v. United States, 383 U.S. 463 (1966), the Court held that “the question of obscenity may include consideration of the setting in which the publications were presented.” Here, the publisher had “sought mailing privileges from the postmasters of Intercourse and Blue Ball, Pennsylvania” in order to sell the “publications on the basis of salacious appeal.” The Court held that such “commercial exploitation of erotica solely for the sake of their prurient appeal [may] support the determination that the material is obscene even though in other contexts the material would escape such condemnation.”

3. The definition of obscenity: material that is “obscene for minors.”

Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968), another “variable obscenity” case, involved the problem of children. The Court had previously addressed the problem of obscenity and children in Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380 (1957). In Butler, the Court held invalid a law prohibiting the sale of “lewd” material that might have a deleterious influence on youth. Justice Frankfurter, speaking for a unanimous Court, explained that the state may not “reduce the adult population of Michigan to reading only what is fit for children.” In Ginsberg, the Court held that a state can constitutionally prohibit “the sale to minors under seventeen years of age of material defined to be obscene on the basis of its appeal to them whether or not it would be obscene to adults.” In recognizing this principle, the Court observed that (1) “the power of the state to control the conduct of children reaches beyond the scope of its authority over adults”; (2) the claim of parents “to direct the rearing of their children is basic in the structure of our society,” and “the legislature could properly conclude that parents [are] entitled to the support of laws designed to aid discharge of that responsibility”; and (3) the state “has an independent interest in the well-being of its youth” and in seeing to it “that they are ‘safeguarded from abuses’ which might prevent their ‘growth into free and independent well-developed men and citizens.’”

Consider the following regulations: (1) No bookstore may display any book or magazine that is obscene for children, except in a separate “adults only” section. (2) No television station may broadcast any material that is obscene for children, except between the hours of 11:00 P.M. and 6:00 A.M. (3) No person may post on the internet any material that is obscene for children. (4) No person may display on any billboard any image that is obscene for children.

4. The definition of obscenity: Redrup. The inability of the Court to articulate a definition of obscenity that could command the allegiance of a majority, compounded by the potential relevance of factors extrinsic to the material itself, led to an era of chaos. In Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767 (1967), the Court began the practice of per curiam reversals of convictions for the sale or exhibition of materials that at least five members of the Court, applying their separate tests, deemed not to be obscene. From 1967 to 1973, some thirty-one cases were disposed of in this fashion. The full opinion of the Court in Walker v. Ohio, 398 U.S. 434 (1970), is typical: “The judgment of the Supreme Court of Ohio is reversed. [Redrup.]” As Justice Brennan later commented: “[The Redrup approach] resolves cases as between the parties, but offers only the most obscure guidance to legislation, adjudication by other courts, and primary conduct. [It] comes as no surprise that judicial attempts to follow our lead conscientiously have often ended in hopeless confusion.” Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413

U.S. 49, 83 (1973) (Brennan, J., dissenting).

5. The interests furthered by the suppression of obscenity. Although debating the definitional issue endlessly, the justices in this era said almost nothing about the nature of the interests that assertedly justified the suppression of obscene expression. As noted earlier, this was due largely to Roth's acceptance of the underlying premise of the Chaplinsky dictum—obscene utterances are wholly “unprotected” by the first amendment and their restriction thus does not necessitate an inquiry into the nature or substantiality of the state interests.

There was, however, one notable exception to the Court’s silence on this issue. In Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969), the Court, speaking through Justice Marshall, held that “the mere private possession of obscene matter cannot constitutionally be made a crime.” In reaching this result, the Court announced that the “right to receive information and ideas, regardless of their social worth, [is] fundamental to our free society,” and that “in the context of this case—a prosecution for mere possession of printed or filmed matter in the privacy of a person’s own home—that right takes on an added dimension,” for “also fundamental is the right to be free, except in very limited circumstances, from unwanted governmental intrusions into one’s privacy.” In light of these interests, “mere categorization of these films as ‘obscene’ is insufficient justification for such a drastic invasion of personal liberties,” for “if the First Amendment means anything, it means that a State has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his own house, what books he may read or what films he may watch.”

6. The implications of Stanley: Reidel. In United States v. Reidel, 402 U.S. 351 (1971), a federal district court, relying on Stanley, held a federal statute prohibiting the knowing use of the mails for the delivery of obscene matter unconstitutional as applied to the distribution of such matter to willing recipients who state that they are adults. The district court reasoned that, “if a person has the right to receive and possess this material, then someone must have the right to deliver it to him.” The Supreme Court reversed. The Court explained that the “focus of [Stanley] [was] on freedom of mind and thought and on the privacy of one’s home.” “Reidel,” however, “is in a wholly different position,” for “he has no complaints about governmental violations of his private thoughts or fantasies, but stands squarely on a claimed First Amendment right to do business in obscenity and use the mails in the process. [Stanley] did not overrule Roth and we decline to do so now.” To the same effect, see United States v. Thirty-Seven Photographs, 402 U.S. 363 (1971); United States v. 12 200 Ft. Reels, 413 U.S. 123 (1973); United States v. Orito, 413 U.S. 139 (1973). See also Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990) (holding Stanley inapplicable to the possession of child pornography).

7. Reformulation. By 1973, then, the law of obscenity was in a state of considerable confusion. Two questions were especially troublesome: How should obscenity be defined? When may it be restricted? With Richard Nixon's appointment of four new justices shortly after assuming office, the newly-constituted Burger Court was eager to address these questions. Indeed, "Warren Burger loathed pornography. He despised 'smut peddlers' and was determined that 'something had to be done to suppress them.'" As the new Chief Justice, he "could hardly wait" to get his "hands on the obscenity issue. Burger considered it fortunate that the justices of the Warren Court had never managed to get five votes to agree on a definition, because that would have settled the law. Their failure to agree on a single approach left the door open for him to reshape a critically important area of the law on which the Court, in his view, had been 'stumbling' since 1957. He eagerly awaited the challenge." G. Stone, Sex and the Constitution 288 (2017). In its 1973 decisions in Miller and Paris Adult Theatre, the Burger Court took on that challenge.

Miller v. California

413 U.S. 15 (1973)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is one of a group of "obscenity-pornography" cases being reviewed by the Court in a re-examination of [the standards] which must be used to identify obscene material that a State may regulate....

[In this case, appellant] conducted a mass mailing campaign to advertise the sale of illustrated books, euphemistically called "adult" material. [Appellant's] conviction was specifically based on his conduct in causing five unsolicited advertising brochures to be sent through the mail. [The] brochures [consist primarily] of pictures and drawings very explicitly depicting men and women in groups of two or more engaging in a variety of sexual activities, with genitals often prominently displayed. [This] case [thus] involves the application of a State's criminal obscenity statute to a situation in which sexually explicit materials have been thrust by aggressive sales action upon unwilling recipients.

II

[Obscene] material is unprotected by the First Amendment. [Roth.] [However,] State statutes designed to regulate obscene materials must be carefully limited. [Thus,] we now confine the permissible scope of such regulation to works which depict or describe sexual conduct. That conduct must be specifically defined by the applicable state law, as written or authoritatively construed....

The basic guidelines for the trier of fact must be: (a) whether “the average person, applying contemporary community standards” would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest; (b) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law; and (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. We do not adopt as a constitutional standard the “utterly without redeeming social value” test of [Memoirs]....

We emphasize that it is not our function to propose regulatory schemes for the States. [It] is possible, however, to give a few plain examples of what a state statute could define for regulation under part (b) of the standard announced in this opinion, supra:

1. Patently offensive representations or descriptions of ultimate sexual acts, normal or perverted, actual or simulated.
2. Patently offensive representations or descriptions of masturbation, excretory functions, and lewd exhibition of the genitals.

Sex and nudity may not be exploited without limit by films or pictures exhibited or sold in places of public accommodation any more than live sex and nudity can be exhibited or sold without limit in such public places. At a minimum, prurient, patently offensive depiction or description of sexual conduct must have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value to merit First Amendment protection. [In] resolving the inevitably sensitive questions of fact and law, we must continue to rely on the jury system, accompanied by the safeguards that judges, rules of evidence, presumption of innocence, and other protective features provide, as we do with [other] offenses against society and its individual members.

Mr. Justice Brennan [now] maintains that no formulation of this Court, the Congress, or the States can adequately distinguish obscene material unprotected by the First Amendment from protected expression, [Paris Adult Theatre, infra]. (Brennan J., dissenting.) [But under] the holdings announced today, no one will be subject to prosecution for the sale or exposure of obscene materials unless these materials depict or describe patently offensive “hard core” sexual conduct specifically defined by the regulating state law, as written or construed. We are satisfied that these specific prerequisites will provide fair notice to a dealer in such materials that his public and commercial activities may bring prosecution. See [Roth]....

Mr. Justice Brennan also emphasizes “institutional stress” in justification of his change of view. [It] is certainly true that the absence, since Roth, of a single majority view of this Court as to proper standards for testing obscenity has placed a strain on both state and federal courts. But today, for the first time since Roth was decided in 1957, a majority of this Court has agreed on concrete guidelines to isolate “hard core” pornography from expression protected by the First Amendment. Now we may abandon the casual practice of [Redrup] and attempt to provide positive guidance to federal and state courts alike.

This may not be an easy road, free from difficulty. But no amount of “fatigue” should lead us to adopt a convenient “institutional” rationale—an absolutist, “anything goes” view of the First Amendment—because it will lighten our burdens....

III

Under a National Constitution, fundamental First Amendment limitations on the powers of the States do not vary from community to community, but this does not mean that there are, or should or can be, fixed, uniform national standards of precisely what appeals to the “prurient interest” or is “patently offensive.” These are essentially questions of fact, and our Nation is simply too big and too diverse for this Court to reasonably expect that such standards could be articulated for all 50 States in a single formulation, even assuming the prerequisite consensus exists. [It] is neither realistic nor constitutionally sound to read the First Amendment as requiring that the people of Maine or Mississippi accept public depiction of conduct found tolerable in Las Vegas, or New York City.¹³ [People] in different States vary in their tastes and attitudes, and this diversity is not to be strangled by the absolutism of imposed uniformity. We hold that the requirement that the jury evaluate the materials with reference to “contemporary standards of the State of California” [is] constitutionally adequate.

IV

The dissenting Justices sound the alarm of repression. But, in our view, to equate the free and robust exchange of ideas and political debate with commercial exploitation of obscene material demeans the grand conception of the First Amendment. [The] First Amendment protects works which, taken as a whole, have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, regardless of whether the government or a majority of the people approve of the ideas these works represent. [But] the public portrayal of hard-core sexual conduct for its own sake, and for the ensuing commercial gain, is a different matter. [There] is no evidence, empirical or historical, that the stern 19th century American censorship of public distribution and display of material relating to sex [in] any way limited or affected expression of serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific ideas....

In sum, we (a) reaffirm the Roth holding that obscene material is not protected by the First Amendment; (b) hold that such material can be regulated by the States, subject to the specific safeguards enunciated above, without a showing that the material is “utterly without redeeming social value”; and (c) hold that obscenity is to be determined by applying “contemporary community standards.”...

Vacated and remanded.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, dissenting....

[The] idea that the First Amendment permits punishment for ideas that are “offensive” to the particular judge or jury sitting in judgment is astounding. No greater leveler of speech or literature has ever been designed....

I do not think we, the judges, were ever given the constitutional power to make definitions of obscenity. If it is to be defined, let the people [decide] by a constitutional amendment what they want to ban as [obscene]. Whatever the choice, the courts will have some guidelines. Now we have none except our own predilections.

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART and MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL join, dissenting.

In my dissent in [Paris Adult Theatre, infra], I noted that I had no occasion to consider the extent of state power to regulate the distribution of sexually oriented material [to] unconsenting adults. [I] need not now decide [that question, for] it is clear that under my dissent in Paris Adult Theatre the statute under which the prosecution was brought is unconstitutionally overbroad, and therefore invalid on its face....

Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton

413 U.S. 49 (1973)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Petitioners are two Atlanta, Georgia, movie theaters and their owners and managers, operating in the style of “adult” theaters. The theaters have a conventional, inoffensive entrance, without any pictures, but with signs indicating that the theaters exhibit “Atlanta’s Finest Mature Feature Films.” On the door is a sign saying “Adult Theater—You must be 21 and able to prove it. If viewing the nude body offends you, Please Do Not Enter.” The local state district attorney filed civil complaints alleging that petitioners were exhibiting to the public for paid admission two allegedly obscene films, Magic Mirror and It All Comes Out in the End, which depict scenes of simulated fellatio, cunnilingus, and group sex intercourse. Respondent’s complaints demanded that the two films be declared obscene, and that petitioners be enjoined from exhibiting the films. The trial judge found the films obscene, but dismissed the complaints on the ground that “the display of these films in a commercial theatre, when surrounded by requisite notice to the public of their nature and by reasonable protection against the exposure of these films to minors, is constitutionally permissible.” The Georgia Supreme Court reversed and held that exhibition of the films should be enjoined. The U.S. Supreme Court vacated and remanded for reconsideration in light of Miller.]

We categorically disapprove the theory [that] obscene, pornographic films acquire constitutional immunity from state regulation simply because they are exhibited for consenting adults only. [Although] we have often pointedly recognized the high importance of the state interest in regulating the exposure of obscene materials to juveniles and unconsenting adults, [this] Court has never declared these to be the only legitimate state interests permitting regulation of obscene material....

In particular, we hold that there are legitimate state interests at stake in stemming the tide of commercialized obscenity, even assuming it is feasible to enforce effective safeguards against exposure to juveniles and to passersby.⁷ Rights and interests “other than those of the advocates are involved.” [These] include the interest of the public in the quality of life and the total community environment, the tone of commerce in the great city centers, and, possibly, the public safety itself. The Hill-Link Minority Report of the Commission on Obscenity and Pornography indicates that there is at least an arguable correlation between obscene material and crime. Quite apart from sex crimes, however, there remains one problem of large proportions aptly described by Professor Bickel:

It concerns the tone of the society, the mode, or to use terms that have perhaps greater currency, the style and quality of life, now and in the future. A man may be entitled to read an obscene book in his room, or expose himself indecently there....We should protect his privacy. But if he demands a right to obtain the books and pictures he wants in the market, and to foregather in public places—discreet, if you will, but accessible to all—with others who share his tastes, then to grant him his right is to affect the world about the rest of us, and to impinge on other privacies. Even supposing that each of us can, if he wishes, effectively avert the eye and stop the ear (which, in truth, we cannot), what is commonly read and seen and heard and done intrudes upon us all, want it or not.

22 The Public Interest 25–26 (Winter 1971). (Emphasis added.) As Mr. Chief Justice Warren stated, there is a “right of the Nation and of the States to maintain a decent society...” [Jacobellis] (dissenting opinion)....

But, it is argued, there are no scientific data which conclusively demonstrate that exposure to obscene material adversely affects men and women or their society. It is urged on behalf of the petitioners that, absent such a demonstration, any kind of state regulation is “impermissible.” We reject this argument. It is not for us to resolve empirical uncertainties underlying state legislation, save in the exceptional case where that legislation plainly impinges upon rights protected by the Constitution itself. [Although] there is no conclusive proof of a connection between antisocial behavior and obscene material, the legislature of Georgia could quite reasonably determine that such a connection does or might exist. In deciding Roth, this Court implicitly accepted that a legislature could legitimately act on such a conclusion to protect “the social interest in order and morality.”...

Finally, petitioners argue that conduct which directly involves “consenting adults” only has, for that sole reason, a special claim to constitutional protection. Our Constitution establishes a broad range of conditions on the exercise of power by the States, but for us to say that our Constitution incorporates the proposition that conduct involving consenting adults only is always beyond state regulation, is a step we are unable to take.¹⁵ [The] issue in this context goes beyond whether someone, or even the majority, considers the conduct depicted as “wrong” or “sinful.” The States have the power to make a morally neutral judgment that public exhibition of obscene material, or commerce in such material, has a tendency to injure the community as a whole, to endanger the public safety, or to jeopardize [the] States’ “right [to] maintain a decent society.”...

Vacated and remanded.

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART and MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL join, dissenting. [A dissenting opinion of Justice Douglas is omitted.]

[I] am convinced that the approach initiated 16 years ago in [Roth], and culminating in the Court’s decision today, cannot bring stability to this area of the law without jeopardizing fundamental First Amendment [values]. The vagueness of the standards in the obscenity area produces a number of separate problems, [including a] lack of fair notice, [a] chill on protected expression, and [a severe] stress [on the] judicial machinery. [These concerns] persuade me that a significant change in direction is urgently required. I turn, therefore, to the alternatives that are now open.

[One] approach [would] be to draw a new line between protected and unprotected [speech] that resolves all doubt in favor of state [power]. We could hold, for example, that any depiction [of] human sexual organs [is] outside the protection of the First [Amendment]. That formula would [reduce the problems of vagueness]. But [it] would be appallingly [overbroad]....

The alternative adopted by the Court [today] adopts a restatement of the Roth-Memoirs definition of obscenity. [The] Court today permits suppression if the government can prove that the materials lack “serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value.” But [Roth] held that certain expression is obscene, and thus outside the protection of the First Amendment, precisely because it lacks even the slightest redeeming social value. [The] Court’s approach [is thus] nothing less than a rejection of the fundamental First Amendment premises [of Roth] and an invitation to widespread suppression of sexually oriented speech....

In any case, [the Court’s approach] can have no ameliorative impact on [the] problems that grow out of the vagueness of our current standards. [Although] the Court’s [test] does limit the definition of obscenity to depictions [of] explicit sexual acts, [even] a confirmed optimist could find little realistic comfort in the adoption of such a test. Indeed, the valiant attempt of one lower federal court to draw the constitutional line at depictions of explicit sexual conduct seems to belie any suggestion that this approach marks the road to clarity.¹⁶ ...

Finally, I have considered the view, urged so forcefully since 1957 by our Brothers Black and Douglas, that the First Amendment bars the suppression of any sexually oriented expression. That position would [strip] the States of power to an extent that cannot be justified by the commands of the Constitution, at least so long as there is available an alternative approach that strikes a better balance between the guarantee of free expression and the States’ legitimate interests....

[Given the] inevitable side effects of state efforts to suppress [obscenity], we must scrutinize with care the state interests that are asserted to justify the suppression. For in the absence of some very substantial interest in suppressing such speech, we can hardly condone the ill effects that seem to flow inevitably from the effort....

[The] state interests in protecting children and in protecting unconsenting adults [stand] on a different footing from the other asserted state interests. [But] whatever the strength of [those] interests, [they] cannot be asserted [where, as] in this case, [the] films [were] exhibited only to persons over the age of 21 who viewed them willingly and with prior knowledge of the nature of their contents. [The] justification for the suppression must be found, therefore, in some independent interest in regulating the reading and viewing habits of consenting adults....

In Stanley we pointed out that “[t]here appears to be little empirical basis for” the assertion that “exposure to obscene materials may lead to deviant sexual behavior or crimes of sexual violence.”²⁶ [In] any event, we added that “if the State [is] concerned about [sexual] materials inducing antisocial conduct, [we] should adhere to the view that ‘[a]mong free men, the deterrents ordinarily to be applied to prevent crime are education and punishment for violations of the law. ...’”

Moreover, in Stanley we rejected as “wholly inconsistent with the philosophy of the First Amendment” [the] notion that there is a legitimate state concern in the “control [of] the moral content of a person’s thoughts.” [That] is not to say, of course, that a State must remain utterly indifferent to—and take no action bearing on—the morality of the community. The traditional description of state police power does embrace the regulation of morals as well as the health, safety, and general welfare of the citizenry. [But] the State’s interest in regulating morality by suppressing obscenity, while often asserted, remains essentially unfocused and ill defined. And, since the attempt to curtail unprotected speech necessarily spills over into the area of protected speech, the effort to serve this speculative interest through the suppression of obscene material must tread heavily on rights protected by the First Amendment. [I] would hold, therefore, that at least in the absence of distribution to juveniles or obtrusive exposure to unconsenting adults, the First and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit the State and Federal Governments from attempting [to] suppress sexually oriented materials on the basis of their allegedly “obscene” contents....

Note: The 1973 Reformulation and Its Aftermath

1. Miller and Roth. Does the Miller reformulation constitute a “rejection of the fundamental first amendment premises” of Roth? Does its elimination of the “utterly without redeeming social value” criterion fatally undermine the notion that obscenity is of only “low” first amendment value?

2. Miller and vagueness. Is the Miller reformulation likely significantly to reduce the problems generated by the prior vagueness of the definition of obscenity? Are there any limits on the sorts of “sexual conduct” that might constitutionally be deemed “patently offensive”? In Jenkins v. Georgia, 418 U.S.

153 (1974), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Rehnquist, overturned a state court determination that the highly acclaimed movie Carnal Knowledge was obscene. The Court explained that Miller “intended to fix substantive constitutional limitations, deriving from the First Amendment, on the type of material subject to [a determination of patent offensiveness].” As an example, the Court observed that “it would be wholly at odds with this aspect of Miller to uphold an obscenity conviction based upon a defendant’s depiction of a woman with a bare midriff.” As for Carnal Knowledge, the Court noted that “our own viewing of the film satisfies us that [it] could not be found under the Miller standards to depict sexual conduct in a patently offensive way.” The Court explained that, “while the subject of the picture is, in a broader sense, sex, and there are scenes in which sexual conduct including ‘ultimate sexual acts’ is to be understood to be taking place, the camera does not focus on the bodies of the actors at such times. There is no exhibition of the actor’s genitals, lewd or otherwise, during these scenes. There are occasional scenes of nudity, but nudity alone is not enough to make material legally obscene under the Miller standards.” Thus, “the film could not, as a matter of constitutional law, be found to depict sexual conduct in a patently offensive way, [and] is therefore not outside the protection of the First and Fourteenth Amendments because it is obscene.”

3. Local versus national standards. What interests are furthered by the Court’s conclusion in Miller that “appeal to prurient interest” and “patent offensiveness” may be determined according to local rather than national standards? Consider the following objections to local standards:

- a. Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291, 313–315 (1977) (Stevens, J., dissenting):

The geographic boundaries of [a local] community are not easily defined. They are [thus] subject to elastic adjustment to suit the needs of the prosecutor. Moreover, although a substantial body of evidence and decisional law concerning the content of a national standard could have evolved through its consistent use, the derivation of the relevant community standard for each of our countless communities is necessarily dependent on the perceptions of the individuals who happen to compose the jury in a given case.

- b. Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 144–145 (1974) (Brennan, J., dissenting):

Under [a local standards approach national] distributors [will] be forced to cope with the community standards of every hamlet into which their goods may wander. [Because] these variegated standards are impossible to discern, national distributors, fearful of risking the expense and difficulty of defending against prosecution in any of several remote communities, must inevitably [retreat] to debilitating self-censorship. [As a result], the people of many communities will be “protected” far beyond government’s constitutional power to deny them access to sexually oriented materials.

4. Local standards: post-Miller decisions. The Court has handed down several post-Miller rulings concerning local standards. See Jenkins, supra (in a state obscenity prosecution, jurors need not “apply the standards of a hypothetical statewide community,” but may “rely on their understanding of community from which they come”); Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87 (1974) (in a federal obscenity prosecution, jurors need not rely on national standards, but may rely on their “knowledge of the community or vicinage” from which they come); Paris Adult Theatre, supra (the first amendment does not “require ‘expert’ affirmative evidence that the materials [are] obscene when the materials themselves [are] actually placed in evidence”); Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497 (1987) (a trial court may not use community standards to decide whether a work lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, for “the value of a work does not vary from community to community”).

5. Community standards on the internet. In Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union, 535 U.S. 564 (2002), the Court held that a federal statute (the Child Online Protection Act) regulating obscene material on the internet was not invalid on its face because it applies local community standards in determining whether particular material is obscene, even though an individual posting sexually explicit material on the internet has no control over the geographic areas in which the material is accessible. The majority left open the question, however, whether the statute might be unconstitutional as applied in specific circumstances. As Justice O’Connor observed, “given Internet speakers’ inability to control the geographic location of their audience, expecting them to bear the burden of controlling the recipients of their speech [may] be entirely too much to ask, and would potentially suppress an inordinate amount of expression.” Justice Stevens would have held the law invalid on its face.

6. Intent. What state of mind must the seller or distributor have in an obscenity prosecution? As the incitement and libel cases make clear, intent can play a central role in “definitional” balancing and can do much to reduce problems caused by the vagueness of the underlying concepts.

In Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959), appellant was convicted of violating a city ordinance construed by the state courts as imposing strict liability on the proprietor of any bookstore who possessed in his store any book later judicially determined to be obscene—even if the proprietor had no personal knowledge of the contents of the book. The Court held the imposition of strict liability invalid. This feature of the ordinance, the Court noted, “tends to impose a severe limitation on the public’s access to constitutionally protected matter. For if the bookseller is criminally liable without knowledge of the contents [he] will tend to restrict the books he sells to those he has inspected.” Such a state of affairs would generate a “self-censorship [affecting] the whole public.”

In Hamling v. United States, supra, however, the Court approved a jury instruction to the effect that, to satisfy its burden on intent, the prosecution need only prove that the defendants “had knowledge of the character of the materials.” The Court explained that the prosecution did not need to prove that the defendants knew that the materials were obscene because to “require proof of a defendant’s knowledge of the legal status of the materials would permit the defendant to avoid prosecution by simply claiming that he had not brushed up on the law.” Is this reconcilable with the Court’s analysis of intent in the libel context? Consider Lockhart, Escape from the Chill of Uncertainty: Explicit Sex and the First Amendment, 9 Ga. L. Rev. 533, 563 (1975): “My suggestion is that [the first amendment establishes] as a defense to a criminal obscenity prosecution that the defendant reasonably believed that the material involved was not obscene.”

7. The regulation of obscenity. The procedural issues involved in the regulation of obscenity have proved especially difficult. See, e.g., Times Film Corp. v. Chicago, 365 U.S. 43 (1961) (licensing); Bantam Books v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58 (1963) (blacklisting); Paris Adult Theatre, supra (injunction); Heller v. New York, 413 U.S. 483 (1973) (search and seizure); Alexander v. United States, 509 U.S. 544 (1993) (forfeiture).

8. Internet filters for public libraries. Can a public library use filters on its internet terminals designed to preclude patrons from accessing obscene websites? Suppose the filter is imprecise and inevitably will block access to non-obscene as well as obscene websites? See United States v. American Library Association, 539 U.S. 194 (2003), section E2, infra.

9. The end of obscenity? Consider the following proposition: In the forty years since the Court’s 1973 decisions, a combination of technological innovation and changing social mores have rendered the obscenity doctrine irrelevant. The advent of video rentals, DVDs, cable television, and the internet have completely overwhelmed the capacity of law enforcement to keep up with the flood of sexually oriented material. As more and more individuals have been exposed to more and more of that material, “contemporary community standards” about what is “patently offensive” have evolved (some might say deteriorated) to the point where today virtually nothing is obscene. Rather than focus their limited resources on ferreting out the few extreme images that a jury today might still find obscene, most prosecutors have moved on to more important matters and left obscenity in the dust. Thus, although there are still calls from moral crusaders for government to initiate obscenity prosecutions, such prosecutions now seem more symbolic than real—except, of course, for those few defendants who are unlikely enough to be targeted. Does this seem an accurate statement of reality? If so, is it a good or a bad thing? See G. Stone Sex and the Constitution 295–312, 340–347 (2017).

10. Obscenity and substantive due process. Even if obscenity is not protected by the First Amendment, is it protected from prohibition by the doctrine of substantive due process, as articulated in such decisions as Griswold v. Connecticut, Roe v. Wade, Planned Parenthood v. Casey, and Lawrence v. Texas, supra Chapter 6, section F? In Lawrence, the Court observed that “liberty gives substantial protection to adult persons in deciding how to conduct their private lives in matters pertaining to sex.” Does “the right of autonomous decision-making” in private matters include “the protection of both intimate sexual conduct and the commercial transactions that enable and promote sexual intimacy”? Kinsley, Sexual Privacy in the Internet Age: How Substantive Due Process Protects Online Obscenity, 16 Vand. J. Ent. & Tech. L. 103 (2013). See Reliable Consultants, Inc. v. Earle, 517 F.3d 738 (5th Cir. 2008) (invalidating on substantive due process grounds a Texas law prohibiting any person to sell, advertise, give away or lend any device “designed or marketed for sexual stimulation”).

6. Child Pornography, Animal Cruelty, and Violent Expression

The Court’s conclusion that obscenity can constitutionally be regulated inevitably invited analogies. To what extent does the obscenity doctrine open the door to other forms of speech restriction?

NEW YORK v. FERBER, 458 U.S. 747 (1982). Ferber, the proprietor of a Manhattan bookstore specializing in sexually oriented products, was prosecuted for selling two films to an undercover police officer. The films were devoted almost entirely to depicting young boys masturbating. A jury held that the films were not obscene, but convicted Ferber of violating a New York statute prohibiting any person knowingly to produce, promote, direct, exhibit, or sell any material depicting a “sexual performance” by a child under the age of sixteen. The statute defined “sexual performance” as any performance that includes “actual or simulated sexual intercourse, deviate sexual intercourse, sexual bestiality, masturbation, sado-masochistic abuse, or lewd exhibition of the genitals.” The Court unanimously upheld the conviction. Justice White delivered the opinion:

“In [the Chaplinsky dictum], the Court laid the foundation for the excision of obscenity from the realm of constitutionally protected expression. [For the following reasons, we are persuaded that pornographic depiction of children, like obscenity, is unprotected by the first amendment.]

“First. It is evident beyond the need for elaboration that a state’s interest in ‘safeguarding the physical and psychological well-being of a minor’ is ‘compelling.’ [The] use of children as subjects of pornographic materials is harmful to the physiological, emotional, and mental health of the child.

“Second. The distribution of photographs and films depicting sexual activity by juveniles is intrinsically related to the sexual abuse of children in at least two ways. First, the materials produced are a permanent record of the children’s participation and the harm to the child is exacerbated by their circulation. Second, the distribution network for child pornography must be closed if the production of material which requires the sexual exploitation of children is to be effectively controlled....

“Third. The advertising and selling of child pornography provides an economic motive for and is thus an integral part of the production of such materials, an activity illegal throughout the nation. [Were] the statutes outlawing the employment of children in these films and photographs fully effective, and the constitutionality of these laws have not been questioned, the First Amendment implications would be no greater than that presented by laws against distribution: enforceable production laws would leave no child pornography to be marketed.

“Fourth. The value of permitting live performances and photographic reproductions of children engaged in lewd sexual conduct is exceedingly modest, if not de minimis. We consider it unlikely that visual depictions of children performing sexual acts or lewdly exhibiting their genitals would often constitute an important and necessary part of a literary performance or scientific or educational work. [If] it were necessary for literary or artistic value, a person over the statutory age who perhaps looked younger could be utilized. Simulation outside of the prohibition of the statute could provide another alternative. Nor is there any question here of censoring a particular literary theme or portrayal of sexual activity. The First Amendment interest is limited to that of rendering the portrayal somewhat more ‘realistic’ by utilizing or photographing children.

“Fifth. Recognizing and classifying child pornography as a category of material outside the protection of the First Amendment is not incompatible with our earlier decisions. [It] is not rare that a content-based classification of speech has been accepted because it may be appropriately generalized that within the confines of the given classification, the evil to be restricted so overwhelmingly outweighs the expressive interests, if any, at stake, that no process of case-by-case adjudication is required....

“There are, of course, limits on the category of child pornography which, like obscenity, is unprotected by the First Amendment. As with all legislation in this sensitive area, the conduct to be prohibited must be adequately defined by the applicable state law, as written or authoritatively construed. [The] test for child pornography is separate from the obscenity standard enunciated in Miller, but may be compared to it for purpose of clarity. The Miller formulation is adjusted in the following respects: A trier of fact need not find that the material appeals to the prurient interest of the average person; it is not required that sexual conduct portrayed be done so in a patently offensive manner; and the material at issue need not be considered as a whole....

“It remains to address the claim that the New York statute is unconstitutionally overbroad because it would forbid the distribution of material with serious literary, scientific, or educational value or material which does not threaten the harms sought to be combated by the State. [The New York Court of Appeals, which invalidated the statute,] was understandably concerned that some protected expression, ranging from medical textbooks to pictorials in National Geographic would fall prey to the statute. [Yet] we seriously doubt, and it has not been suggested, that these arguably impermissible applications of the statute amount to more than a tiny fraction of the materials within the statute’s reach. [Under] these circumstances, [the statute] is ‘not substantially overbroad and whatever overbreadth exists should be cured through case-by-case analysis of the fact situations to which its sanctions, assertedly, may not be applied.’ [Broadrick v. Oklahoma, section C1, supra]. As applied to [Ferber] and to others who distribute similar material, the statute does not violate the First Amendment.”

Should the Court have analyzed the New York statute not as a content-based restriction of “unprotected” speech but as a content-neutral restriction on the “means” of expression? Child abuse is unlawful. Consider the following propositions: (1) There is no first amendment right to violate an otherwise valid criminal law that is unrelated to the suppression of free expression merely because the violation would render one's speech more effective. Can one, for example, steal a camera in order to make a movie? Could the government have punished Daniel Ellsberg for "stealing" the Pentagon Papers? (2) There is no first amendment right to depict the commission of a criminal act where the criminal act was committed solely in order to produce the depiction. In other words, if X stabs Y in order to film a real stabbing, X can be punished for the assault. But can the film be banned? If so, is that true of the Pentagon Papers as well?

Consider Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514 (2001), in which the Court held that federal and state antiwiretap statutes cannot constitutionally be applied to a radio station that broadcasts the tape of an unlawfully intercepted telephone call, where the subject of the call was a matter of public concern and the broadcaster did not participate directly in the unlawful wiretap, even though the broadcaster knew that the material had been obtained unlawfully. The Court expressly distinguished Ferber on the ground that Ferber involved speech "considered of minimal value." Suppose a documentary filmmaker secretly films the actual sexual abuse of a child in a foster home. Can the government make it unlawful for the filmmaker to show the documentary? Can it require the filmmaker to block out the face and identity of the child?

Suppose a film depicts simulated sex between an adult and a child but was made entirely with adult actors or by computer imaging. Can the exhibition of the film be prohibited after Ferber on the ground that it will encourage pederasty? What about an animated film?

ASHCROFT v. THE FREE SPEECH COALITION, 535 U.S. 234 (2002). The Court invalidated the Child Pornography Prevention Act of 1996 (CPPA), which extended the prohibition against child pornography to sexually explicit images that appear to depict minors, but were in fact produced without using real children—either by computer imaging or by using adults who look like children. Justice Kennedy delivered the opinion of the Court:

"By prohibiting child pornography that does not depict an actual child, the statute goes beyond Ferber, which distinguished child pornography from other sexually explicit speech because of the State's interest in protecting the children exploited by the production process. [Although the statute] captures a range of depictions [that] do not [harm] any children in the production process, [Congress] decided the materials threaten children in other, less direct, ways. Pedophiles might use the materials to encourage children to participate in sexual activity [or they] might 'whet their own sexual appetites' with the pornographic images, ‘thereby increasing the creation and distribution of child pornography and the sexual abuse and exploitation of actual children.’ Under these rationales, harm flows from the content of the images, not from the means of their production. In addition, Congress [was concerned that the existence of] computer-generated images [can] can make it harder to prosecute pornographers who [use] real minors. As imaging technology improves, Congress found, it becomes more difficult to prove that a particular picture was produced using actual children. To ensure that defendants possessing child pornography using real minors cannot evade prosecution, Congress extended the ban to virtual child pornography....

“The sexual abuse of a child is a most serious crime and an act repugnant to the moral instincts of a decent people. [Congress] may pass valid laws to protect children from abuse, and it has. The prospect of crime, however, by itself does not justify laws suppressing protected speech. See Kingsley Pictures. (‘Among free men, the deterrents ordinarily to be applied to prevent crime are education and punishment for violations of the law, not abridgment of the rights of free speech’)....

“As a general principle, the First Amendment bars the government from dictating what we see or read or speak or hear. The freedom of speech has its limits; it does not embrace certain categories of speech, including defamation, incitement, obscenity, and pornography produced with real children. While these categories may be prohibited without violating the First Amendment, none of them includes the speech prohibited by the CPPA....

“[T]he CPPA [does not deal with] obscenity. Under Miller, the Government must prove that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest, is patently offensive in light of community standards, and lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. The CPPA, however, [applies] without regard to the Miller requirements....

“The Government seeks to address this deficiency by arguing that speech prohibited by the CPPA is virtually indistinguishable from child pornography, which may be banned without regard to whether it depicts works of value. See Ferber. Where the images are themselves the product of child sexual abuse, Ferber recognized that the State had an interest in stamping it out without regard to any judgment about its content. The production of the work, not its content, was the target of the statute. The fact that a work contained serious literary, artistic, or other value did not excuse the harm it caused to its child participants. [Ferber] upheld a prohibition on the distribution and sale of child pornography, as well as its production, because these acts were ‘intrinsically related’ to the sexual abuse of children in two ways. First, as a permanent record of a child’s abuse, the continued circulation itself would harm the child who had participated. Like a defamatory statement, each new publication of the speech would cause new injury to the child's reputation and emotional well-being. Second, because the traffic in child pornography was an economic motive for its production, the State had an interest in closing the distribution network. [Under] either rationale, the speech had what the Court in effect held was a proximate link to the crime from which it came....

"In contrast to the speech in Ferber, [the] CPPA prohibits speech that records no crime and creates no victims by its production. Virtual child pornography is not 'intrinsically related' to the sexual abuse of children, as were the materials in Ferber. While the Government asserts that the images can lead to actual instances of child abuse, the causal link is contingent and indirect. The harm does not necessarily follow from the speech, but depends upon some unquantified potential for subsequent criminal acts.

"The Government says these indirect harms are sufficient because, as Ferber acknowledged, child pornography rarely can be valuable speech. This argument, however, suffers from two flaws. First, Ferber's judgment about child pornography was based upon how it was made, not on what it communicated. [Second,] Ferber did not hold that child pornography is by definition without value. On the contrary, the Court recognized some works in this category might have significant value, but relied on virtual images—the very images prohibited by the CPPA—as an alternative and permissible means of expression. Ferber, then, not only referred to the distinction between actual and virtual child pornography, it relied on it as a reason supporting its holding. Ferber provides no support for a statute that eliminates the distinction and makes the alternative mode criminal as well.

"The CPPA [is thus] inconsistent with Miller and finds no support in Ferber. The Government seeks to justify its prohibitions in other ways. It argues that the CPPA is necessary because pedophiles may use virtual child pornography to seduce children. There are many things innocent in themselves, however, such as cartoons, video games, and candy, that might be used for immoral purposes, yet we would not expect those to be prohibited because they can be misused. The Government, of course, may punish adults who provide unsuitable materials to children, see Ginsberg, and it may enforce criminal penalties for unlawful solicitation. The precedents establish, however, that speech within the rights of adults to hear may not be silenced completely in an attempt to shield children from it. [Here, the] evil in question depends upon the actor's unlawful conduct, conduct defined as criminal quite apart from any link to the speech in question. This establishes that the speech ban is not narrowly drawn. The objective is to prohibit illegal conduct, but this restriction goes well beyond that interest by restricting the speech available to law-abiding adults.

“The Government submits further that virtual child pornography whets the appetites of pedophiles and encourages them to engage in illegal conduct. This rationale cannot sustain the provision in question. The mere tendency of speech to encourage unlawful acts is not a sufficient reason for banning it. [The] Court’s First Amendment cases draw vital distinctions between words and deeds, between ideas and conduct. The government may not prohibit speech because it increases the chance an unlawful act will be committed ‘at some indefinite future time.’ [The] Government has shown no more than a remote connection between speech that might encourage thoughts or impulses and any resulting child abuse. Without a significantly stronger, more direct connection, the Government may not prohibit speech on the ground that it may encourage pedophiles to engage in illegal conduct....

“Finally, the Government says that the possibility of producing images by using computer imaging makes it very difficult for it to prosecute those who produce pornography by using real children. Experts, we are told, may have difficulty in saying whether the pictures were made by using real children or by using computer imaging. The necessary solution, the argument runs, is to prohibit both kinds of images. The argument, in essence, is that protected speech may be banned as a means to ban unprotected speech. This analysis turns the First Amendment upside down. The Government may not suppress lawful speech as the means to suppress unlawful speech. Protected speech does not become unprotected merely because it resembles the latter.”

Justice Thomas filed a concurring opinion in which he observed that “if technological advances” eventually reach a point where they actually (as opposed to speculatively) “thwart prosecution of ‘unlawful speech,’ the Government may well have a compelling interest [in] regulating some narrow category of ‘lawful speech’ in order to enforce effectively laws against pornography made through the abuse of real children.”

Justice O’Connor, joined in part by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Scalia, dissented in part. Justice O’Connor concluded that the CPPA was unconstitutional insofar as it restricts material created by using youthful-looking adults, but that it was constitutional insofar as it restricts virtual-child pornography. With respect to the latter, Justice O’Connor argued that if the CPPA is narrowly construed to limit only computer-generated images that are “virtually indistinguishable” from real child pornography, it would satisfy “strict scrutiny” because it would then be narrowly tailored to serve the compelling governmental interest in eliminating real child pornography. She also noted that if any work falling within this category in fact has serious social, political, literary or scientific value, the possible “overbreadth” of the law in that regard could be considered in an “as applied” challenge. On the other hand, Justice O’Connor concurred with the Court in invalidating the law insofar as it restricts material created with youthful-looking adults because such material would not pose the same problem to the enforcement of the prohibition on actual child pornography as material created using computer images.

Note: Child Pornography

1. Morphing. Another provision of the CPPA, not at issue in this case, prohibits the use of computer morphing to alter the images of real children so they appear to be engaged in sexual activity. Is this different from the issues addressed in Ashcroft? The Court noted in passing that because such morphed images “implicate the interests of real children” they are closer to the issue considered in Ferber. Might this better be analyzed as a form of libel?

2. An affirmative defense. Suppose Congress re-enacted the CPPA verbatim, but recognized an affirmative defense to enable the defendant to prove that the image had been created without the abuse of a real child. Would that satisfy the first amendment?

3. Child pornography in the home. In Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990), the Court held that Stanley v. Georgia does not extend to the private possession of child pornography. The Court, in an opinion by Justice White, explained: “[The] interests underlying child pornography prohibitions far exceed the interests justifying [the] law at issue in Stanley. [In] Stanley, Georgia primarily sought to proscribe the private possession of obscenity because it was concerned that obscenity will poison the mind of its viewers. [The] difference here is obvious: the State does not rely on a paternalistic interest in regulating [the defendant’s] mind. Rather, [the law is designed] to protect the victims of child pornography; it hopes to destroy a national market for the exploitative use of children.” Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens dissented.

4. Offers to sell child pornography. In response to Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, Congress in 2003 enacted the Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to end the Exploitation of Children Today Act (the PROTECT Act), which made it a crime for any person “knowingly” to “advertise, promote, present, distribute, or solicit through the mails, or in interstate or foreign commerce [any] material or purported material in a manner that reflects the belief, or that is intended to cause another to believe, that the material or purported material is, or contains, [a] visual depiction of an actual minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct.”

The act defined “sexually explicit conduct” in a manner consistent with the New York law upheld in Ferber.

Congress enacted the act because it was concerned that “limiting the child-pornography prohibition to material that could be proved to feature actual children [would] enable many child pornographers to evade conviction.” Congress found that the “emergence of new technology and the repeated retransmission of picture files over the Internet could make it nearly impossible to prove that a particular image was produced using real children—even though ‘[t]here is no substantial evidence that any of the child pornography images being trafficked today were made other than by the abuse of real children.’” The Court of Appeals held that the act was unconstitutionally overbroad, because it makes it a crime to distribute constitutionally protected material, that is, material that does not constitute child pornography within the meaning of Free Speech Coalition.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Scalia, reversed: “Offers to engage in illegal transactions are categorically excluded from First Amendment protection. One would think that this principle resolves the present case, since the statute criminalizes only offers to provide or requests to obtain contraband—child [pornography] involving actual children. [The position of the Court of Appeals] would forbid the government from punishing fraudulent offers to provide illegal products. We see no logic in that position. [According] to the dissent, Congress has made an end-run around the First Amendment’s protection of virtual child pornography by prohibiting proposals to transact in such images rather than prohibiting the images themselves. But an offer to provide or request to receive virtual child pornography is not prohibited by the statute. A crime is committed only when the speaker believes or intends the listener to believe that the subject of the proposed transaction depicts real children. [Simulated] child pornography will be as available as ever, so long as it is offered and sought as such, and not as real child pornography.”

Justice Souter, joined by Justice Ginsburg, dissented: “What justification can there be for making independent crimes of proposals to engage in transactions that [actually distribute] constitutionally protected materials? [The Court argues] that a proposal to commit a crime enjoys no speech protection. [But why] should [this] general rule [cover] a case like the proposal to transfer what [turns] out to be [constitutionally protected speech?] If the Act can be enforced, it will function just as it was meant to do, by merging the whole subject of child pornography into the offense of proposing a transaction, dispensing with the real-child element in the underlying subject. [We] should hold that a transaction in what turns out to be [constitutionally protected speech] is better understood, not as an incomplete attempt to commit a crime, but as a completed series of intended acts that simply do not add up to a crime, owing to the privileged character of the material the parties were in fact about to deal in.”

UNITED STATES v. STEVENS, 559 U.S. 460 (2010). 18 U.S.C. §48 establishes a criminal penalty of up to five years in prison for anyone who knowingly “creates, sells, or possesses a depiction of animal cruelty” for “commercial gain” in interstate or foreign commerce. A depiction of “animal cruelty” is defined as one “in which a living animal is intentionally maimed, mutilated, tortured, wounded, or killed,” if that conduct violates federal or state law where “the creation, sale, or possession takes place.” The law exempts from prohibition any depiction “that has serious religious, political, scientific, educational, journalistic, historical, or artistic value.”

The legislative background of §48 focused primarily on the interstate market for “crush videos,” which depict women crushing small animals like mice and hamsters to death with their bare feet or while wearing high heeled shoes, sometimes while talking to the animals in a kind of dominatrix patter. Apparently these depictions appeal to persons with a very specific sexual fetish. The acts depicted in crush videos are typically prohibited by the animal cruelty laws enacted by all 50 States and the District of Columbia, but because crush videos rarely disclose the participants’ identities, prosecution of the underlying conduct is often impossible.

This case involved an application of §48 not to crush videos, but to depictions of dogfighting. Dogfighting is unlawful in all 50 States and the District of Columbia, and has been restricted by federal law since 1976. Robert Stevens ran a business, “Dogs of Velvet and Steel,” and an associated Web site, through which he sold videos of pit bulls engaging in dogfights and attacking other animals. His videos included contemporary footage of dogfights in Japan (where such conduct is legal) as well as footage of American dogfights from the 1960’s and 1970’s. On the basis of these videos, Stevens was convicted of violating §48. The court of appeals declared §48 facially unconstitutional and vacated Stevens’s conviction.

In an eight-to-one decision, the Supreme Court affirmed. Chief Justice Roberts delivered the opinion of the Court:

“The Government’s primary submission is that §48 necessarily complies with the Constitution because the banned depictions of animal cruelty, as a class, are categorically unprotected by the First Amendment. We disagree....

“From 1791 to the present, [the] First Amendment has ‘permitted restrictions upon the content of speech in a few limited areas,’ [including, for example, obscenity, defamation, threats, and incitement]. [Citing Chaplinsky.] The Government argues that ‘depictions of animal cruelty’ should be added to the list. It contends that depictions of ‘illegal acts of animal cruelty’ that are ‘made, sold, or possessed for commercial gain’ necessarily ‘lack expressive value,’ and may accordingly ‘be regulated as unprotected speech.’ [The] prohibition of animal cruelty [has] a long history in American law, [but] we are unaware of any similar tradition excluding depictions of animal cruelty from ‘the freedom of speech’ codified in the First Amendment....

“The Government contends that ‘historical evidence’ about the reach of the First Amendment is not ‘a necessary prerequisite for regulation today,’ and that categories of speech may be exempted from the First Amendment’s protection without any long-settled tradition of subjecting that speech to regulation. Instead, the Government points to Congress’s ‘legislative judgment that...depictions of animals being intentionally tortured and killed [are] of such minimal redeeming value as to render [them] unworthy of First Amendment protection,’ and asks the Court to uphold the ban on the same basis. The Government thus proposes that a claim of categorical exclusion should be considered under a simple balancing test: ‘Whether a given category of speech enjoys First Amendment protection depends upon a categorical balancing of the value of the speech against its societal costs.’ [Quoting Brief for United States].

“As a free-floating test for First Amendment coverage, that sentence is startling and dangerous. The First Amendment’s guarantee of free speech does not extend only to categories of speech that survive an ad hoc balancing of relative social costs and benefits. The First Amendment itself reflects a judgment by the American people that the benefits of its restrictions on the Government outweigh the costs. Our Constitution forecloses any attempt to revise that judgment simply on the basis that some speech is not worth it....

“When we have identified categories of speech as fully outside the protection of the First Amendment, it has not been on the basis of a simple cost-benefit analysis. [Our decisions] cannot be taken as establishing a freewheeling authority to declare new categories of speech outside the scope of the First Amendment. Maybe there are some categories of speech that have been historically unprotected, but have not yet been specifically identified or discussed as such in our case law. But if so, there is no evidence that ‘depictions of animal cruelty’ is among them. We need not foreclose the future recognition of such additional categories to reject the Government’s highly manipulable balancing test as a means of identifying them....

“We read §48 to create a criminal prohibition of alarming breadth. [The] only thing standing between defendants who sell such depictions and five years in federal prison—other than the mercy of a prosecutor—is the statute’s exceptions clause. Subsection (b) exempts from prohibition ‘any depiction that has serious religious, political, scientific, educational, journalistic, historical, or artistic value.’ The Government argues that this clause substantially narrows the statute’s reach: News reports about animal cruelty have ‘journalistic’ value; pictures of bullfights in Spain have ‘historical’ value; and instructional hunting videos have ‘educational’ value. [But much valuable speech under the First Amendment does not] fall within one of the enumerated categories. [Most] hunting videos, for example, are not obviously instructional in nature, [but] ‘have primarily entertainment value.’ [The] Government offers no principled explanation why these depictions of hunting or depictions of Spanish bullfights would be inherently valuable while those of Japanese dog-fights are not....

“The Government explains that the language of §48(b) was largely drawn from our opinion in Miller v. California, which excepted from its definition of obscenity any material with ‘serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.’ According to the Government, this incorporation of the Miller standard into §48 is therefore surely enough to answer any First Amendment objection. In Miller we held that ‘serious’ value shields depictions of sex from regulation as obscenity. We did not, however, determine that serious value could be used as a general precondition to protecting other types of speech in the first place. Most of what we say to one another lacks ‘religious, political, scientific, educational, journalistic, historical, or artistic value’ (let alone serious value), but it is still sheltered from government regulation. [Thus,] the protection of the First Amendment presumptively extends to many forms of speech that do not qualify for the serious-value exception of §48(b), but nonetheless fall within the broad reach of §48(c).”

Why are depictions of animal cruelty different from depictions of child sexual abuse? Consider Chief Justice Roberts’s explanation: “In Ferber, [we] classified child pornography as [unprotected speech]. We noted that the State [had] a compelling interest in protecting children from abuse, and that the value of using children in these works (as opposed to simulated conduct or adult actors) was de minimis. But our decision did not rest on this ‘balance of the competing interests’ alone. We made clear that Ferber presented a special case: The market for child pornography was ‘intrinsically related’ to the underlying abuse, and was ‘an integral part of the production of such materials, an activity illegal throughout the Nation.’ As we noted, ‘[i]t rarely has been suggested that the constitutional freedom for speech and press extends its immunity to speech or writing used as an integral part of conduct in violation of a valid criminal statute.’ Ferber thus grounded its analysis in a previously recognized, long-established category of unprotected speech.” Is this persuasive?

The Court held in Ferber and Ashcroft that the government can constitutionally prohibit the sale or exhibition of child pornography only because the government has a “compelling” interest in “safeguarding the physical and psychological well-being of a minor.” The Court explained that the prohibition of child pornography serves this “compelling” interest in two ways: (1) by drying up the market for such materials and thereby eliminating the incentive to create them, and (2) by protecting the victims from the emotional and psychological harm caused by the continued circulation of the images. Does the government have a similarly “compelling” argument in the animal cruelty context?

Consider the following arguments: (1) As evidenced by the many circumstances (including hunting and slaughtering food animals) in which we permit cruelty to animals, we clearly do not take the interest in preventing animal cruelty as seriously as we take the interest in preventing child sexual abuse, which is never permitted. (2) Unlike people, animals have no consciousness of the continuing exhibition of the depiction of their abuse and therefore suffer no comparable emotional or psychological injury.

Justice Alito was the lone dissenter: “The Court strikes down in its entirety a valuable statute [that] was enacted not to suppress speech, but to prevent horrific acts of animal cruelty—in particular, the creation and commercial exploitation of ‘crush videos,’ a form of depraved entertainment that has no social value. The Court’s approach [is] unwarranted. [The] most relevant of our prior decisions is Ferber. [In] Ferber, an important factor—I would say the most important factor—was that child pornography involves the commission of a crime that inflicts severe personal injury to the ‘children who are made to engage in sexual conduct for commercial purposes.’ [As] later noted in Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, in Ferber ‘[t]he production of the work, not its content, was the target of the statute.’ [Ferber also] emphasized [that] these underlying crimes could not be effectively combated without targeting the distribution of child pornography. [And, finally,] the Ferber Court noted that the value of child pornography ‘is exceedingly modest, if not de minimis,’ and that any such value was ‘overwhelmingly outweigh[ed]’ by ‘the evil to be restricted.’

“All three of these characteristics are shared by §48, as applied to crush videos. [It] must be acknowledged that §48 differs from a child pornography law in an important respect: preventing the abuse of children is certainly much more important than preventing the torture of the animals used in crush videos. But while protecting children is unquestionably more important than protecting animals, the Government also has a compelling interest in preventing the torture depicted in crush videos. [The] animals used in crush videos are living creatures that experience excruciating pain. [Applying] the principles set forth in Ferber, I would hold that crush videos are not protected by the First Amendment."

BROWN v. ENTERTAINMENT MERCHANTS ASS'N, 564 U.S. 786 (2011). In Brown, the Court invalidated a California law imposing restrictions on violent video games. Justice Scalia delivered the opinion of the Court: "California Assembly Bill 1179 prohibits the sale or rental of 'violent video games' to [minors]. The Act covers games 'in which the range of options available to a player includes killing, maiming, dismembering, or sexually assaulting an image of a human being, if those acts are depicted' in a manner that 'a reasonable person, considering the game as a whole, would find appeals to a deviant or morbid interest of minors,' that is 'patently offensive to prevailing standards in the community as to what is suitable for minors,' and that 'causes the game, as a whole, to lack serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value for minors.'..."

"[V]ideo games qualify for First Amendment protection. The Free Speech Clause exists principally to protect discourse on public matters, but we have long recognized that it is difficult to distinguish politics from entertainment, and dangerous to try. [Like] the protected books, plays, and movies that preceded them, video games communicate ideas—and even social messages—through many familiar literary devices (such as characters, dialogue, plot, and music) and through features distinctive to the medium (such as the player's interaction with the virtual world). That suffices to confer First Amendment protection. [W]hatever the challenges of applying the Constitution to ever-advancing technology, 'the basic principles of freedom of speech and the press, like the First Amendment's command, do not vary' when a new and different medium for communication appears.

"The most basic of those principles is this: '[A]s a general matter,... government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content.' There are of course exceptions. "From 1791 to the present,"...the First Amendment has "permitted restrictions upon the content of speech in a few limited areas]." These limited areas—such as obscenity [Roth, incitement [Brandenburg], and fighting words [Chaplinsky]—represent 'well-defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any Constitutional problem.' Last Term, in Stevens, we held that new categories of unprotected speech may not be added to the list by a legislature that concludes certain speech is too harmful to be tolerated. [There] was no American tradition of forbidding the depiction of animal cruelty—though States have long had laws against committing it. [As] in Stevens, California has tried to make violent-speech regulation look like obscenity regulation, [but] the obscenity exception to the First Amendment does not cover whatever a legislature finds shocking, but only depictions of ‘sexual conduct.’

“[B]ecause speech about violence is not obscene, it is of no consequence that California’s statute mimics the New York statute regulating obscenity for minors that we upheld in Ginsberg. [The] California Act [does] not adjust the boundaries of an existing category of unprotected speech to ensure that a definition designed for adults is not uncritically applied to children. California does not argue that it is empowered to prohibit selling offensively violent works to adults....Instead, it wishes to create a wholly new category of content-based regulation that is permissible only for speech directed at children. That is unprecedented and mistaken. [No] doubt a State possesses legitimate power to protect children from harm, but that does not include a free-floating power to restrict the ideas to which children may be exposed. [California’s] argument would fare better if there were a long standing tradition in this country of specially restricting children’s access to depictions of violence, but there is none. Certainly the books we give children to read—or read to them when they are younger—contain no shortage of gore. [As] her just deserts for trying to poison Snow White, the wicked queen is made to dance in red hot slippers ‘till she fell dead on the [floor].’ Hansel and Gretel (children!) kill their captor by baking her in an oven. High-school reading lists are full of similar fare. Homer’s Odysseus blinds Polyphemus the Cyclops by grinding out his eye with a heated stake. [And] Golding’s Lord of the Flies recounts how a schoolboy called Piggy is savagely murdered by other children while marooned on an island....

“California claims that video games present special problems because they are ‘interactive,’ [but as] Judge Posner has observed, all literature is interactive. ‘[T]he better it is, the more interactive....’ American Amusement Machine Assn. v. Kendrick, 244 F. 3d 572, 577 (CA7 2001). [Justice] Alito has done considerable independent research to identify, video games in which ‘the violence is astounding.’ ‘Victims are dismembered, decapitated, disemboweled, set on fire, and chopped into little pieces....Blood gushes, splatters, and pools.’ Justice Alito recounts all these disgusting video games in order to disgust us—but disgust is not a valid basis for restricting expression....

“Because the Act imposes a restriction on the content of protected speech, it is invalid unless California can demonstrate that it passes strict scrutiny—that is, unless it is justified by a compelling government interest and is narrowly drawn to serve that interest. [California] cannot meet that standard. At the outset, it acknowledges that it cannot show a direct causal link between violent video games and harm to minors. [Indeed,] the State's evidence is not compelling. California relies primarily [on a few] research psychologists whose studies purport to show a connection between exposure to violent video games and harmful effects on children. These studies have been rejected by every court to consider them, and with good reason: They do not prove that violent video games cause minors to act aggressively (which would at least be a beginning). Instead, '[n]early all of the research is based on correlation, not evidence of causation, and most of the studies suffer from [significant] flaws in methodology.' [Even] taking for granted [the conclusion] that violent video games produce some effect on children's feelings of aggression, those effects are both small and indistinguishable from effects produced by other media. [It appears that] the 'effect sizes' of children's exposure to violent video games are 'about the same' as that produced by their exposure to [cartoons] starring Bugs Bunny or the Road Runner, [or] video games like Sonic the Hedgehog that are rated 'E' (appropriate for all ages), or even when they 'vie[w] a picture of a gun.'

"Of course, California has (wisely) declined to restrict Saturday morning cartoons, the sale of games rated for young children, or the distribution of pictures of guns. The consequence is that its regulation is wildly underinclusive when judged against its asserted justification, which in our view is alone enough to defeat it. Underinclusiveness raises serious doubts about whether the government is in fact pursuing the interest it invokes, rather than disfavoring a particular speaker or viewpoint. Here, California has singled out the purveyors of video games for disfavored treatment—at least when compared to booksellers, cartoonists, and movie producers—and has given no persuasive reason why.

"The Act is also seriously underinclusive in another respect. The California Legislature is perfectly willing to leave this dangerous, mind-altering material in the hands of children so long as one parent (or even an aunt or uncle) says it's OK. [That] is not how one addresses a serious social problem.

"California claims that the Act is justified in aid of parental authority: By requiring that the purchase of violent video games can be made only by adults, the Act ensures that parents can decide what games are appropriate. [But] California cannot show that the Act's restrictions meet a substantial need of parents who wish to restrict their children's access to violent video games but cannot do so. The video-game industry has in place a voluntary rating system designed to inform consumers about the content of games. [Moreover,] the Act's purported aid to parental authority is vastly overinclusive. Not all of the children who are forbidden to purchase violent video games on their own have parents who care whether they purchase violent video games. While some of the legislation's effect may indeed be in support of what some parents of the restricted children actually want, its entire effect is only in support of what the State thinks parents ought to want. This is not the narrow tailoring to 'assisting parents' that restriction of First Amendment rights requires."

Justice Alito, joined by Chief Justice Roberts, concurred in the result because "the law's definition of 'violent video game' is impermissibly vague." Justice Alito argued that it was unnecessary to go beyond that conclusion to resolve the case, but he nonetheless suggested that he disagreed "with the approach taken in the Court's opinion." He reasoned that in "considering the application of unchanging constitutional principles to new and rapidly evolving technology, [we] should not jump to the conclusion that new technology is fundamentally the same as some older thing with which we are familiar. And we should not hastily dismiss the judgment of legislators, who may be in a better position than we are to assess the implications of new technology."

Justice Thomas dissented: "The Court's decision [does] not comport with the original public understanding of the First Amendment. [The] practices and beliefs of the founding generation establish that 'the freedom of speech,' as originally understood, does not include a right to speak to minors (or a right of minors to access speech) without going through the minors' parents or guardians. [Because] the Constitution is a written instrument, 'its meaning does not alter.' 'That which it meant when adopted, it means now.' [The] founding generation would not have considered it an abridgment of 'the freedom of speech' to support parental authority by restricting speech that bypasses minors' parents."

Justice Breyer also dissented: "In my view, California's statute provides 'fair notice' of what is prohibited,' and consequently is not impermissibly vague. [I] can find no vagueness-related differences between California's law and the New York law upheld in Ginsberg....

"Like the majority, I believe that the California law must be 'narrowly tailored' to further a 'compelling interest,' without there being a 'less restrictive' alternative that would be 'at least as effective.' [But I would not apply this strict standard mechanically. Rather, in applying it, I would evaluate the degree to which the statute injures speech-related interests, the nature of the potentially-justifying 'compelling interests,' the degree to which the statute furthers that interest, the nature and effectiveness of possible alternatives, and, in light of this evaluation, whether, overall, 'the statute works speech-related harms...out of proportion to the benefits that the statute seeks to provide.' First Amendment standards applied in this way are difficult but not impossible to satisfy. [Citing his dissenting opinion in Holder v. Humanitarian Law Project.]...

“California’s law imposes no more than a modest restriction on expression. [All] it prevents is a child or adolescent from buying, without a parent’s assistance, a gruesomely violent video [game]. The interest that California advances in support of the statute is compelling. As the Court has previously described that interest, it consists of both (1) the ‘basic’ parental claim ‘to authority in their own household to direct the rearing of their children,’ which makes it proper to enact ‘laws designed to aid discharge of [parental] responsibility, and (2) the State’s ‘independent interest in the well-being of its youth.’ [Quoting Ginsberg.] Both interests are present here....

“[Moreover,] there is considerable evidence that California’s statute significantly furthers this compelling interest. [There] are many scientific studies that support California’s views. [Some] of these studies [explain] that the closer a child’s behavior comes, not to watching, but to acting out horrific violence, the greater the potential psychological harm. [Of course, experts] debate the conclusions of all these studies [and] critics have produced studies [that] reach different conclusions. [I], like most judges, lack the social science expertise to say definitively who is right. [But unlike] the majority, I would find sufficient grounds in these studies [for] this Court to defer to an elected legislature’s conclusion that the video games in question are particularly likely to harm children....

“I add that the majority’s [conclusion] creates a serious anomaly in First Amendment law. [What] sense does it make to forbid selling to a 13-year-old boy a magazine with an image of a nude woman, while protecting a sale to that 13-year-old of an interactive video game in which he actively, but virtually, binds and gags the woman, then tortures and kills her?”

Are video games “speech” within the meaning of the first amendment? Are games such as bingo, blackjack, chess, and baseball “speech”? After Brown, how would you analyze the constitutionality of a state law prohibiting anyone to engage in mixed martial arts? Suppose the law prohibited only public “exhibitions” of mixed martial arts?

Does the Court’s emphasis on history in the low-value analysis make sense? Consider Magarian, The Marrow of Tradition: The Roberts Court and Categorical First Amendment Speech Exclusions, 56 Wm. & M. L. Rev. 1339 (2015): “Most of the Court’s [major] categorical decisions—Chaplinsky, Brandenburg, Virginia Pharmacy, Ferber—have said little or nothing about tradition, concentrating almost entirely on substantive justifications for excluding certain speech from First Amendment protection. [The] most transparent way for the Court to decide categorical exclusion cases would be for the Justices to talk openly about which values matter and why. By rejecting that substantive analysis in favor of a tradition-bound analysis, the Roberts Court hides the analytic ball.” For a similar critique, see Lakier, The Invention of Low-Value Speech, 128 Harv. L. Rev. 2166 (2015).

7. The Lewd, the Profane, and the Indecent

In what circumstances, if any, may government restrict the public use of profane or sexually oriented, but non-obscene, expression because of its offensive character? Recall that in Chaplinsky the Court’s list of utterances “the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any Constitutional problem” expressly included not only “fighting words,” the “libelous,” and the “obscene,” but also the “lewd” and the “profane.” Moreover, in explaining why such utterances are “unprotected,” the Court in Chaplinsky noted not only that they might “tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace,” but also that they might “by their very utterance inflict injury.”

Cohen v. California

403 U.S. 15 (1971)

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case may seem at first blush too inconsequential to find its way into our books, but the issue it presents is of no small constitutional significance.

Appellant Paul Robert Cohen was convicted in the Los Angeles Municipal Court of violating that part of California Penal Code §415 which prohibits “maliciously and willfully disturb[ing] the peace or quiet of any neighborhood or person...by...offensive conduct....” He was given 30 days’ imprisonment. The facts upon which his conviction rests are detailed in the opinion of the [state court]:

On April 26, 1968, the defendant was observed in the Los Angeles County Courthouse in the corridor outside [of] the municipal court wearing a jacket bearing the words “Fuck the Draft.” There were women and children present in the corridor. The defendant was arrested. The defendant testified that he wore the jacket [as] a means of informing the public of the depth of his feelings against the Vietnam War and the draft.

The defendant did not engage in, nor threaten to engage in, nor did anyone as the result of his conduct in fact commit or threaten to commit any act of violence. The defendant did not make any loud or unusual noise, nor was there any evidence that he uttered any sound prior to his arrest....

[We reverse.]

I

In order to lay hands on the precise issue which this case involves, it is useful first to canvass various matters which this record does not present.

The conviction quite clearly rests upon the asserted offensiveness of the words Cohen used, [for] the State certainly lacks power to punish Cohen for [the] message the inscription conveyed. [Moreover], this is not [an] obscenity case. Whatever else may be necessary to give rise to the States' broader power to prohibit obscene expression, such expression must be, in some significant way, erotic. [Roth.] It cannot plausibly be maintained that this vulgar allusion to the Selective Service System would conjure up such psychic stimulation in anyone likely to be confronted with Cohen's crudely defaced jacket.

This Court has [held] that the States are free to [ban] so-called "fighting words," those personally abusive epithets which, when addressed to the ordinary citizen, [are] inherently likely to provoke violent reaction. [Chaplinsky.] While the four-letter word displayed by Cohen in relation to the draft is not uncommonly employed in a personally provocative fashion, in this instance it was clearly not "directed to the person of the hearer." [No] individual actually or likely to be present could reasonably have regarded the words on appellant's jacket as a direct personal insult. Nor do we have here an instance of the exercise of the State's police power to prevent a speaker from intentionally provoking a given group to hostile reaction. Cf. [Feiner]. There [is] no showing that anyone who saw Cohen was in fact violently aroused or that appellant intended such a result.

Finally, in arguments before this Court much has been made of the claim that Cohen's distasteful mode of expression was thrust upon unwilling or unsuspecting viewers, and that the State might therefore legitimately act as it did in order to protect the sensitive from otherwise unavoidable exposure to appellant's crude form of protest. Of course, the mere presumed presence of unwitting listeners or viewers does not serve automatically to justify curtailing all speech capable of giving offense. [While] this Court has recognized that government may properly act in many situations to prohibit intrusion into the privacy of the home of unwelcome views and ideas which cannot be totally banned from the public dialogue, e.g., Rowan v. Post Office Dept., 397 U.S. 728

(1970), we have at the same time consistently stressed that “we are often ‘captives’ outside the sanctuary of the home and subject to objectionable speech.” [The] ability of government, consonant with the Constitution, to shut off discourse solely to protect others from hearing it is, in other words, dependent upon a showing that substantial privacy interests are being invaded in an essentially intolerable manner. Any broader view of this authority would effectively empower a majority to silence dissidents simply as a matter of personal predilections.

In this regard, persons confronted with Cohen’s jacket were in a quite different posture than, say, those subjected to the raucous emissions of sound trucks blaring outside their residences. Those in the Los Angeles courthouse could effectively avoid further bombardment of their sensibilities simply by averting their eyes. And, while it may be that one has a more substantial claim to a recognizable privacy interest when walking through a courthouse corridor than, for example, strolling through Central Park, surely it is nothing like the interest in being free from unwanted expression in the confines of one’s own home....

II

Against this background, the issue flushed by this case stands out in bold relief. It is whether California can excise, as “offensive conduct,” one particular scurrilous epithet from the public discourse, either upon the theory [that] its use is inherently likely to cause violent reaction or upon a more general assertion that the States, acting as guardians of public morality, may properly remove this offensive word from the public vocabulary.

The [first rationale] is plainly untenable. At most it reflects an “undifferentiated fear or apprehension of disturbance [which] is not enough to overcome the right to freedom of expression.” [We] have been shown no evidence that substantial numbers of citizens are standing ready to strike out physically at whoever may assault their sensibilities with execrations like that uttered by Cohen. There may be some persons about with such lawless and violent proclivities, but that is an insufficient base upon which to erect, consistently with constitutional values, a governmental power to force persons who wish to ventilate their dissident views into avoiding particular forms of expression. The argument amounts to little more than the self-defeating proposition that to avoid physical censorship of one who has not sought to provoke such a response by a hypothetical coterie of the violent and lawless, the States may more appropriately effectuate that censorship themselves....

Admittedly, it is not so obvious that the First and Fourteenth Amendments must be taken to disable the States from punishing public utterance of this unseemly expletive in order to maintain what they regard as a suitable level of discourse within the body politic. We think, however, that examination and reflection will reveal the shortcomings of a contrary viewpoint.

At the outset, we cannot overemphasize that, in our judgment, most situations where the State has a justifiable interest in regulating speech will fall within one or more of the various established exceptions, discussed above but not applicable here, to the usual rule that governmental bodies may not prescribe the form or content of individual expression. Equally important to our conclusion is the constitutional backdrop against which our decision must be made. The constitutional right of free expression is powerful medicine in a society as diverse and populous as ours. It is designed and intended to remove governmental restraints from the arena of public discussion, putting the decision as to what views shall be voiced largely into the hands of each of us, in the hope that use of such freedom will ultimately produce a more capable citizenry and more perfect polity and in the belief that no other approach would comport with the premise of individual dignity and choice upon which our political system rests. See [Whitney (Brandeis, J., concurring)].

To many, the immediate consequence of this freedom may often appear to be only verbal tumult, discord, and even offensive utterance. These are, however, within established limits, in truth necessary side effects of the broader enduring values which the process of open debate permits us to achieve. That the air may at times seem filled with verbal cacophony is, in this sense not a sign of weakness but of strength. We cannot lose sight of the fact that, in what otherwise might seem a trifling and annoying instance of individual distasteful abuse of a privilege, these fundamental societal values are truly implicated....

Against this perception of the constitutional policies involved, we discern certain more particularized considerations that peculiarly call for reversal of this conviction. First, the principle contended for by the State seems inherently boundless. How is one to distinguish this from any other offensive word? Surely the State has no right to cleanse public debate to the point where it is grammatically palatable to the most squeamish among us. Yet no readily ascertainable general principle exists for stopping short of that result were we to affirm the judgment below. For, while the particular four-letter word being litigated here is perhaps more distasteful than most others of its genre, it is nevertheless often true that one man's vulgarity is another's lyric. Indeed, we think it is largely because governmental officials cannot make principled distinctions in this area that the Constitution leaves matters of taste and style so largely to the individual.

Additionally, we cannot overlook the fact, because it is well illustrated by the episode involved here, that much linguistic expression serves a dual communicative function: it conveys not only ideas capable of relatively precise, detached explication, but otherwise inexpressible emotions as well. In fact, words are often chosen as much for their emotive as their cognitive force. We cannot sanction the view that the Constitution, while solicitous of the cognitive content of individual speech, has little or no regard for that emotive function which, practically speaking, may often be the more important element of the overall message sought to be communicated....

Finally, and in the same vein, we cannot indulge the facile assumption that one can forbid particular words without also running a substantial risk of suppressing ideas in the process. Indeed, governments might soon seize upon the censorship of particular words as a convenient guise for banning the expression of unpopular views. We have been able, as noted above, to discern little social benefit that might result from running the risk of opening the door to such grave results.

It is, in sum, our judgment that, absent a more particularized and compelling reason for its actions, the State may not, consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, make the simple public display here involved of this single four-letter expletive a criminal offense....

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and MR. JUSTICE BLACK join.

I dissent....

Cohen's absurd and immature antic, in my view, was mainly conduct and little speech. [Further,] the case appears to me to be well within the sphere of [Chaplinsky], where Mr. Justice Murphy, a known champion of First Amendment freedoms, wrote for a unanimous bench. As a consequence, this Court's agonizing over First Amendment values seems misplaced and unnecessary.

[Justice White dissented on other grounds.]

Note: Profanity, Cohen, and the Captive Audience

1. Profanity as “low”-value speech. Does Cohen repudiate Chaplinsky's assumption that profanity is of only “low” first amendment value? If obscenity has “no redeeming social value,” why isn't the same true of profanity? Consider the following proposition: Profanity has “high” first amendment value because (a) its use may be necessary to convey “otherwise inexpressible emotions,” (b) its suppression creates “a substantial risk of suppressing ideas in the process,” and (c) there exists “no readily ascertainable general principle” for distinguishing between prohibitable and nonprohibitable offensive language.

Consider W. Berns, The First Amendment and the Future of American Democracy 200 (1976):

This country managed to live most of its years under rules, conventional and legal, that forbade the public use of profanity [and] it would be an abuse of language to say that its freedom was thereby restricted in any important respect. Now, suddenly, and for reasons that ought to persuade no one, we are told that it is a violation of the First Amendment for the law to enforce these rules; that however desirable it might be to see them preserved, there is no way for the law to do this except by threatening the freedom of all speech. [Do] we really live in a world so incapable of communication that it can be said that “one man’s vulgarity is another’s lyric”?

2. Profanity and fighting words. As evident in Chaplinsky, the problems of fighting words and profanity are closely related. In Cohen, however, the Court “made clear that [the phrase ‘fighting words’] was no longer to be understood as a euphemism for controversial or dirty talk but was to require instead a quite unambiguous invitation to a brawl.” J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust 114 (1980). The Court thus recognized in Cohen that the fighting words and profanity problems are analytically distinct—although fighting words typically involve the use of profanity, this is not essential; although fighting words usually involve insults directed personally to the addressee, the problem of profanity is not so limited; and although the fighting words doctrine is designed primarily to forestall an addressee’s violent response, government efforts to suppress offensive language are designed primarily to raise the level of public discourse and to protect the sensibilities of an unconsenting audience. The fighting words doctrine is examined in section B3 supra.

3. Profanity: manner or content? Is a law restricting the use of profanity in public more akin to a law restricting the public expression of an “offensive” idea or to a law restricting the use of an “offensive” means of expression? Compare, for example, a law prohibiting the expression of “offensive ideas” in a public park, a law prohibiting the use of profanity in a public park, and a law prohibiting the use of loudspeakers in a public park. Is the prohibition on profanity more akin to the prohibition on loudspeakers because both are directed against “consequences unrelated” to the particular ideas expressed? Cox, Foreword: Freedom of Expression in the Burger Court, 94 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 40 (1980). Is it more akin to the prohibition on “offensive ideas” because the “harms of shock and offense [flow] entirely from the communicative content of [the] message”? Ely, supra, at 114.

Consider the following views:

- a. Haiman, Speech v. Privacy: Is There a Right Not to Be Spoken To?, 67 Nw. U. L. Rev. 153, 189 (1972):

The problem with the position [that prohibitions on the use of profanity are merely restrictions on the manner of expression] is that the form and content of communications are so inextricably tied that to control the former is, in fact, to modify the latter. [For] example, it can hardly be maintained that phrases like, “Repeal the Draft,” “Resist the Draft,” or “The Draft Must Go” convey essentially the same message as “Fuck the Draft.” Clearly something is lost in the translation.

- b. Stone, Content Regulation and the First Amendment, 25 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 189, 243–244 (1983):

Governmental efforts to limit speech because it is offensively noisy [do] not implicate the same kind of censorial or heckler’s veto concerns as governmental efforts to limit speech because the ideas are offensive. Analytically, offense at language is more like offense at noise than offense at ideas. [Moreover, although] restrictions on the use of profanity may affect some speakers more than others, [this] is also true of most content-neutral restrictions.

4. The captive audience. Does Justice Harlan undervalue the interests of the “audience” in Cohen? Consider A. Bickel, The Morality of Consent 72 (1975): “There is such a thing as verbal violence, a kind of cursing, assaultive speech that amounts to almost physical aggression. [The sort of speech at issue in Cohen] constitutes an assault.” As noted in Chaplinsky, such profanities “by their very utterance inflict injury.” Why, then, can’t such expression be suppressed? Is the interest in protecting the sensibilities of unconsenting individuals against such “assaults” simply too insubstantial to justify restrictions on “offensive” expression? Note Justice Harlan’s conclusion in Cohen that “[the] ability of government [to] shut off discourse solely to protect others from hearing it is [dependent] upon a showing that substantial privacy interests are being invaded in an essentially intolerable manner.”

Consider the following:

- a. Suppose Congress enacts a law authorizing any homeowner who no longer wishes to receive mail from a particular person or organization to instruct the Postmaster General to direct that person or organization to refrain from further mailings to the homeowner. Consider Rowan v. Post Office Department, 397 U.S. 728 (1970):

In today's complex society we are inescapably captive audiences for many purposes, but a sufficient measure of individual autonomy must survive to permit every householder to exercise control over unwanted mail. To make the householder the exclusive and final judge of what will cross his threshold undoubtedly has the effect of impeding the flow of ideas, information, and arguments that, ideally, he should receive and consider. [But] nothing in the Constitution compels us to listen to or view any unwanted communication, whatever its merit. [The] ancient concept that "a man's home is his castle" into which "not even the king may enter" has lost none of its vitality, [and we] therefore categorically reject the argument that [an individual] has a right under the Constitution [to] send unwanted material into the home of another.

- b. Suppose Congress enacts a law prohibiting any person to mail to another any materials containing profanity or photographs revealing bare human pubic areas without the recipient's prior written consent. In Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983), the Court invalidated a federal statute prohibiting the mailing of unsolicited advertisements for contraceptives. The Court explained:

We [have] recognized the important interest in allowing addressees to give notice to a mailer that they wish no further mailings [citing Rowan]. But we have never held that the government itself can shut off the flow of mailings to protect those recipients who might potentially be offended. The First Amendment "does not permit the government to prohibit speech as intrusive unless the 'captive' audience cannot avoid objectionable speech." [The] "short, regular, journey from mail box to trash can [is] an acceptable burden, at least so far as the Constitution is concerned."

In light of Rowan and Bolger, could Congress constitutionally require all televisions to have a chip that enables the owner to block out unwanted channels or shows? Could it constitutionally require all televisions to have a chip that enables the owner to block out only unwanted channels or shows that are rated as especially violent or sexual? See Balkin, Media Filters, the V-Chip, and the Foundations of Broadcast Regulation, 45 Duke L.J. 1131 (1996).

c. Suppose a city operates a public bus system and each bus contains twenty interior advertising spaces available for lease by private persons. May the city, to protect the sensibilities of “captive” commuters, exclude such “highly offensive” messages as “Welfare Is Black Theft,” “God Is Dead,” and “Abortion Is Murder”? Is this a situation in which, as in Cohen, the audience “could effectively avoid further bombardment of their sensibilities simply by averting their eyes”? Suppose the city excludes ads that contain profanity? Nudity? Cf. Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298 (1974) (plurality opinion upholding city policy permitting the display of commercial but not generally more “controversial” political or public issue advertisements in the interior of city buses), section E2c infra. Note that in the bus situation, unlike the situation in Cohen, the city could protect the “captive” audience by adopting a content-neutral restriction excluding all speech. Is a content-neutral restriction preferable to a “narrower” restriction based on content? Consider Stone, supra, at 280: “If a ‘true’ captive audience exists, the state may protect the sensibilities of unwilling listeners by banning all speech, regardless of content. It should never, however, be permitted to use the captive audience as a lever for censorship.” Should that conclusion, however justified as applied to offensive ideas, apply also to the use of profanity and to the display of “lewd” pictures?

ERZNOZNIK v. JACKSONVILLE, 422 U.S. 205 (1975). In Erznoznik, the Court invalidated a Jacksonville, Florida, ordinance that declared it a public nuisance for any drive-in movie theater to exhibit any motion picture “in which the human male or female bare buttocks, human female bare breasts, or human bare pubic areas are shown, if such motion picture [is] visible from any public street or place.” Justice Powell delivered the opinion of the Court:

“[The city] concedes that its ordinance sweeps far beyond the permissible restraints on obscenity [and] thus applies to films that are protected by the First Amendment. [Nevertheless], it maintains that any movie containing nudity which is visible from a public place may be suppressed as a nuisance....

“[The city’s] primary argument is that it may protect its citizens against unwilling exposure to materials that may be offensive. Jacksonville’s ordinance, however, does not protect citizens from all movies that might offend; rather it singles out films containing nudity, presumably because the lawmakers considered them especially offensive to passersby. [A] State or municipality may protect individual privacy by enacting reasonable time, place, and manner regulations applicable to all speech irrespective of content. [But] when government [undertakes] selectively to shield the public from some kinds of speech on the ground that they are more offensive than others, the First Amendment strictly limits its power. [Absent extraordinary circumstances], the burden normally falls upon the viewer to ‘avoid further bombardment of [his] sensibilities simply by averting [his] eyes.’ [Cohen.] [The] limited privacy interest of persons on the public streets cannot justify this censorship of otherwise protected speech on the basis of its content....

“[The city] also attempts to support the ordinance as an exercise of the city’s undoubtedly police power to protect children. [But] the ordinance is not directed [only] against sexually explicit [nudity]. Rather, it sweepingly forbids display of all films containing any uncovered buttocks or breasts, irrespective of context or pervasiveness. [Clearly] all nudity cannot be deemed obscene even as to minors. [Thus], if Jacksonville’s ordinance is intended to regulate expression accessible to minors it is overbroad in its proscription....

“[Finally, the city attempts] to justify the ordinance [on the ground] that nudity on a drive-in movie screen distracts passing motorists, thus slowing the flow of traffic and increasing the likelihood of accidents. [But] the legislative classification is strikingly underinclusive. There is no reason to think that a wide variety of other scenes in the customary screen diet, ranging from soap opera to violence, would be any less distracting to the passing motorist.”

Justice Douglas filed a concurring opinion.

Chief Justice Burger, joined by Justice Rehnquist, dissented: “Whatever validity the notion that passersby may protect their sensibilities by averting their eyes may have when applied to words printed on an individual’s jacket, see [Cohen], it distorts reality to apply that notion to the outsize screen of a drive-in movie theater. [It] is not unreasonable for lawmakers to believe that public nudity on a giant screen, visible at night to hundreds of [drivers], may have a tendency to divert attention from their task and cause accidents. [Moreover], those persons who legitimately desire to [view such films] are not foreclosed from doing so. [Such films may be] exhibited [in] indoor theaters [and in any] drive-in movie theater [whose] screen [is shielded] from public view. Thus, [the challenged] ordinance [is] not a restriction of any ‘message.’ [The] First Amendment interests involved in this case are trivial at best.” Justice White also dissented.

FCC v. PACIFICA FOUNDATION, 438 U.S. 726 (1978). At about 2 o’clock in the afternoon on October 30, 1973, a New York radio station, owned by Pacifica Foundation, broadcast George Carlin’s monologue entitled “Filthy Words.” In this twelve-minute monologue, Carlin discussed “the words you couldn't say on the public, ah, airwaves, um, the ones you definitely wouldn't say, ever." He proceeded to list those words ("shit, piss, fuck, cunt, cocksucker, motherfucker, and tits"), which he described as the "ones that will curve your spine [and] grow hair on your hands," and then repeated them in a variety of colloquialisms. The recording includes frequent laughter from the live audience. A few weeks later, a man who had heard the broadcast while driving with his young son wrote a letter complaining to the Commission.

Pacifica responded to the complaint by explaining that the monologue had been played during a program about contemporary society's attitude toward language and that, immediately before its broadcast, listeners had been advised that it included "sensitive language which might be regarded as offensive to some." Pacifica characterized Carlin as "a significant social satirist" who uses "words to satirize as harmless and essentially silly our attitudes towards those words." There were no other complaints about the broadcast.

The Commission issued a declaratory order granting the complaint. Characterizing Carlin's language as "patently offensive," though not obscene, the Commission explained that such "indecent" speech should be regulated by principles analogous to those found in the law of nuisance. Specifically, the Commission announced that broadcasters may not air language that describes sexual or excretory activities or organs in terms that are patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards at times of the day when children are likely to be in the audience. Although the Commission did not impose formal sanctions, it stated that the complaint would be "associated with the station's license [file]."

The Court upheld the Commission, although there was no majority opinion. In a plurality opinion, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Rehnquist, Justice Stevens noted that a "requirement that indecent language be avoided will have its primary effect on the form, rather than the content, of serious communication. There are few, if any, thoughts that cannot be expressed by the use of less offensive language." Although affirming that "the government must remain neutral in the marketplace of ideas," Stevens maintained that the FCC's action had nothing to do with the substance of Carlin's political ideas or opinions. Rather, the Commission objected only to the "way" in which Carlin expressed those ideas. In such circumstances, "we must consider its context in order to determine whether the Commission's action was constitutionally permissible."

Applying that approach, Justice Stevens upheld the FCC's order: "The broadcast media have established a uniquely pervasive presence in the lives of all Americans. Patently offensive, indecent material presented over the airwaves confronts the citizen, not only in public, but also in the privacy of the home, where the individual's right to be left alone plainly outweighs the First Amendment rights of an intruder. [Rowan.] Because the broadcast audience is constantly tuning in and out, prior warnings cannot completely protect the listener or viewer from unexpected program content. [Moreover], broadcasting is uniquely accessible to children, even those too young to read. Although Cohen's written message might have been incomprehensible to a first grader, Pacifica's broadcast could have enlarged a child's vocabulary in an instant. Other forms of offensive expression may be withheld from the young without restricting the expression at its source. Bookstores and motion picture theaters, for example, may be prohibited from making indecent material available to children. [Citing Ginsberg, section D5, supra.] The ease with which children may obtain access to broadcast material, coupled with the concerns recognized in Ginsberg, amply justify special treatment of indecent broadcasting.

"It is appropriate [to] emphasize the narrowness of our holding. [As] Mr. Justice Sutherland wrote, a 'nuisance may be merely a right thing in the wrong place,—like a pig in the parlor instead of the barnyard.' [We] simply hold that when the Commission finds that a pig has entered the parlor, the exercise of its regulatory power does not depend on proof that the pig is obscene."

Justice Powell, joined by Justice Blackmun, filed a concurring opinion: "The Commission sought to 'channel' the monologue to hours when the fewest unsupervised children would be exposed to it. [This] consideration provides strong support for the Commission's holding. [The] Commission properly held that [the] language involved in this case is as potentially degrading and harmful to children as representations of many erotic acts. In most instances, the dissemination of this kind of speech to children may be limited without also limiting willing adults' access to it. [The] difficulty is that such a physical separation of the audience cannot be accomplished in the broadcast media. [In] my view, the Commission was entitled to give substantial weight to this difference [between the broadcast and other media] in reaching its decision in this case....

"The Commission's holding does not prevent willing adults from purchasing Carlin's record, from attending his performances, or, indeed, from reading the transcript reprinted as an appendix to the Court's opinion. [It] does not prevent Pacifica Foundation from broadcasting the monologue during late evening hours when fewer children are likely to be in the audience, nor from broadcasting discussions of the contemporary use of language at any time during the day."

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented: "[An] individual's actions in switching on and listening to communications transmitted over the public airways and directed to the public at large do not implicate fundamental privacy interests, even when engaged in within the home. Instead, [these] actions are more properly viewed as a decision to take part, if only as a listener, in an ongoing public discourse. [Moreover], unlike other intrusive modes of communication, such as sound trucks, '[t]he radio can be turned off.' [The Court] fails to accord proper weight to the interests of listeners who wish to hear broadcasts the FCC deems offensive. It permits majoritarian tastes completely to preclude a protected message from entering the homes of a receptive, unoffended minority. No decision of this Court supports such a result....

"[The] government unquestionably has a special interest in the well-being of children and consequently 'can adopt more stringent controls on communicative materials available to youths than on those available to adults.' [But] '[s]peech that is neither obscene as to youths nor subject to some other legitimate proscription cannot be suppressed solely to protect the young from ideas or images that a legislative body thinks unsuitable for them.' [Erznoznik.] [Thus, the Court's] result violates in spades the principle of Butler v. Michigan [that government may not] 'reduce the adult population [to] reading only what is fit for children.'"

Justice Stewart, joined by Justices Brennan, White, and Marshall, dissented on the ground that the FCC had statutory authority to regulate only "obscene" material.

Note: Fleeting Expletives

In 2004, the Federal Communications Commission amended the indecency rule that the Court had upheld twenty-five years earlier in Pacifica to provide for the first time that any use of indecent words could be actionable, even if the words were not used in a sexual manner and even if they were used spontaneously and only in passing. The 2004 order arose out of several incidents involving so-called "fleeting" expletives. In one incident, Cher exclaimed during an unscripted acceptance speech at the 2002 Billboard Music Awards, "I've had my critics for the last 40 years saying that I was on my way out every year. Right. So fuck 'em." In another incident, at the 2003 Golden Globe Awards, Bono, upon winning the award for Best Original Song, exclaimed, "This is really, really, fucking brilliant." For these and similar incidents involving fleeting expletives, the FCC levied fines on broadcasters totaling some $8 million. The Commission defended its new rule on the ground that the word "fuck" "is one of the most vulgar, graphic and explicit descriptions of sexual activity in the English language." It therefore argued that its action was necessary to “safeguard the well-being of the nation’s children from the most objectionable, most offensive language.”

In 2008, the United States Court of Appeals ruled that the FCC lacked statutory authority to punish broadcasters for mere fleeting expletives. In 2009, in FCC v. Fox Television Stations, 566 U.S. 502 (2009), the Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision, reversed, holding that the FCC did, indeed, have statutory authority for its rule. But the Court remanded the case to the Court of Appeals to decide whether the FCC’s new rule violated the first amendment.

On remand, the Court of Appeals held that the FCC’s indecency policy did, indeed, violate the first amendment because the Commission, in applying its rule, had made ad hoc and inconsistent judgments about the circumstances in which the use of the word fuck was forbidden. In FCC v. Fox Television Stations, 132 S.Ct. 2307 (2012) (Fox II), the Supreme Court vacated the Court of Appeals’ first amendment holding, but unanimously ruled that the FCC’s standard violated the due process clause because the FCC had failed to give the broadcasters fair notice that fleeting expletives could be found indecent.

Perhaps the most interesting thing about the Court’s opinions in these cases is that unlike the opinions in Cohen and Pacifica, in which the justices used the words fuck, cunt, shit, and cocksucker in their opinions, because they were the relevant facts in the cases, in their opinions in Fox I and Fox II, Justices Scalia and Kennedy insisted on using f, s, and fing. What do you think of the following argument:

This is not what lawyers and judges do. Lawyers and judges must deal forthrightly with the real world. They deal with murder and greed and rape; they deal with torture and brutality and gruesome wounds. It is their responsibility as professionals to deal in a mature and straightforward manner with all sorts of unpleasantness. Especially in a First Amendment case, lawyers and judges have to be willing to say the words out loud, even if it makes them uncomfortable. To do otherwise is to deny the realities of the case before them. It is to put their own sensitivities above their obligations to their clients and to the law. It is, in short, unprofessional.

SABLE COMMUNICATIONS, INC. v. FCC, 492 U.S. 115 (1989). The Court unanimously held unconstitutional a federal statute prohibiting the interstate transmission of “indecent” commercial telephone messages (“dial-a-porn” services). In an opinion by Justice White, the Court distinguished the “emphatically narrow holding” of Pacifica. The Court explained that telephone communications are different, for they require the caller to take “affirmative steps” to receive the message: “Placing a telephone call is not the same as turning on a radio and being taken by surprise by an indecent message.” Moreover, the government’s interest in protecting children could be served by various technical means other than a total ban of the transmission of such messages; although some limited numbers of children might be able to defeat these devices, the prohibition “has the invalid effect of limiting the content of adult telephone conversations to that which is suitable for children to hear.”

RENO v. AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, 521 U.S. 844

(1997). In an opinion by Justice Stevens, the Court invalidated two sections of the Communications Decency Act of 1996 (CDA) that were designed to protect minors from “indecent” and “patently offensive” communications on the internet. Section 223(a) prohibited any person from making any communication over the internet “which is...indecent, knowing that the recipient of the communication is under eighteen years of age.” Section 223(d) prohibited any person from knowingly sending over the internet any communication that will be available to a person under 18 years of age and “that, in context, depicts or describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards, sexual or excretory activities or organs.”

At the outset, the Court distinguished Pacifica: “[There] are significant differences between the order upheld in Pacifica and the CDA. First, the order in Pacifica [focused on when—rather than whether—it would be permissible to air such a program in that particular medium. The CDA’s broad categorical prohibitions are not limited to particular [times]. Second, [the] Commission’s order [in Pacifica] applied to a medium which as a matter of history had ‘received the most limited First Amendment protection,’ in large part because warnings could not adequately protect the listener from unexpected program content. The Internet, however, has no comparable history. Moreover, [the] risk of encountering indecent material [on the Internet] by accident is remote because a series of affirmative steps is required to access specific material.”

The Court next noted “the many ambiguities” concerning the act’s coverage, which “render it problematic” for purposes of the first amendment: “For instance, each of the two parts of the CDA uses a different linguistic form. The first uses the word ‘indecent,’ while the second speaks of material that ‘in context, depicts or describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards, sexual or excretory activities or organs.’ Given the absence of a definition of either term, this difference in language will provoke uncertainty among speakers about how the two standards relate to each other and just what they mean.”

The Court found this “lack of precision” fatal: “In order to deny minors access to potentially harmful speech, the CDA effectively suppresses a large amount of speech that adults have a constitutional right to receive and to address to one another. That burden on adult speech is unacceptable if less restrictive alternatives would be at least as effective in achieving the legitimate purpose that the statute was enacted to serve. In evaluating the free speech rights of adults, we have made it perfectly clear that ‘[s]exual expression which is indecent but not obscene is protected by the First Amendment.’ [It] is true that we have repeatedly recognized the governmental interest in protecting children from harmful materials. [Citing Ginsberg; Pacifica.] But that interest does not justify an unnecessarily broad suppression of speech addressed to adults. As we have explained, the Government may not ‘reduc[e] the adult population [to] only what is fit for children.’”

ASHCROFT v. AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, 535 U.S. 564

(2004). In response to Reno, Congress enacted the Child Online Protection Act (COPA), which was designed to address the constitutional defects the Court had identified in the Communications Decency Act. COPA imposes criminal penalties of a $50,000 fine and six months in prison for the knowing posting, for “commercial purposes,” of World Wide Web content that is “harmful to minors.” The act defines material that is “harmful to minors” as: “any communication, picture, image, graphic image file, article, recording, writing, or other matter of any kind that is obscene or that (A) the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find, taking the material as a whole and with respect to minors, is designed to appeal to, or is designed to pander to, the prurient interest; (B) depicts, describes, or represents, in a manner patently offensive with respect to minors, an actual or simulated sexual act or sexual contact, an actual or simulated normal or perverted sexual act, or a lewd exhibition of the genitals or post-pubescent female breast; and (C) taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value for minors.”

COPA defines “minor” as “any person under 17 years of age” and specifies that a person acts for “commercial purposes” only if he “makes a communication, or offers to make a communication, by means of the World Wide Web, that includes any material that is harmful to minors,...as a regular course of such person’s trade or business, with the objective of earning a profit as a result of such activities.” COPA recognizes an affirmative defense for those who attempt to prevent minors from gaining access to the prohibited materials “(A) by requiring use of a credit card, debit account, adult access code, or adult personal identification number; (B) by accepting a digital certificate that verifies age; or (C) by any other reasonable measures that are feasible under available technology.”

In a five-to-four decision, the Court held that the federal district court did not “abuse its discretion” in entering a preliminary injunction against enforcement of COPA. In its opinion, written by Justice Kennedy, the Court explained that the district court had issued the preliminary injunction because it found that there “are plausible, less restrictive alternatives to COPA.”

The Court continued: “The primary alternative considered by the District Court was blocking and filtering software. [Filters] are less restrictive than COPA. They impose selective restrictions on speech at the receiving end, not universal restrictions at the source. Under a filtering regime, adults without children may gain access to speech they have a right to see without having to identify themselves or provide their credit card information. Even adults with children may obtain access to the same speech on the same terms simply by turning off the filter on their home computers....

“Filters also may well be more effective than COPA. First, a filter can prevent minors from seeing all pornography, not just pornography posted to the Web from America. The District Court noted [that] 40% of harmful-to-minors content comes from overseas. COPA does not prevent minors from having access to those foreign harmful materials. That alone makes it possible that filtering software might be more effective in serving Congress’ goals. [It] is not an answer to say that COPA reaches some amount of materials that are harmful to minors; the question is whether it would reach more of them than less restrictive alternatives. In addition, the District Court found that verification systems may be subject to evasion and circumvention, for example by minors who have their own credit cards. [The] Commission on Child Online Protection, a blue-ribbon commission created by Congress, unambiguously found that filters are more effective than age-verification requirements....

“Filtering software, of course, is not a perfect solution to the problem of children gaining access to harmful-to-minors materials. It may block some materials that are not harmful to minors and fail to catch some that are. Whatever the deficiencies of filters, however, the Government failed to introduce specific evidence proving that existing technologies are less effective than the restrictions in COPA. In the absence of a showing as to the relative effectiveness of COPA and the alternatives proposed by respondents, it was not an abuse of discretion for the District Court to grant the preliminary injunction....

One argument to the contrary is worth mentioning—the argument that filtering software is not an available alternative because Congress may not require it to be used. That argument carries little weight, because Congress undoubtedly may act to encourage the use of filters. [The] need for parental cooperation does not automatically disqualify a proposed less restrictive alternative. [By] enacting programs to promote use of filtering software, Congress could give parents that ability without subjecting protected speech to severe penalties."

Justice Breyer, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice O'Connor, dissented: "Like the Court, I would subject the Act to 'the most exacting scrutiny.' [But] my examination of (1) the burdens the Act imposes on protected expression, (2) the Act's ability to further a compelling interest, and (3) the proposed 'less restrictive alternatives' convinces me that the Court is wrong....

"[The] Act, properly interpreted, imposes a burden on protected speech that is no more than modest. [The] Act does not censor the material it covers. Rather, it requires providers of the 'harmful to minors' material to restrict minors' access to it by verifying age. [I] recognize that the screening requirement imposes some burden on adults who seek access to the regulated material, as well as on its providers. The [burden] is, in part, monetary [and, in part, the fear of embarrassment caused by the identification requirement]. Both monetary costs and potential embarrassment can deter potential viewers and, in that sense, the statute's requirements may restrict access to a site....

"I turn next to the question of 'compelling interest,' that of protecting minors from exposure to commercial pornography. No one denies that such an interest is 'compelling.' Rather, the question here is whether the Act, given its restrictions on adult access, significantly advances that interest. [Filtering] software, as presently available, does not solve the 'child protection' problem. It suffers from four serious inadequacies that prompted Congress to pass legislation instead of relying on its voluntary use. First, its filtering is faulty, allowing some pornographic material to pass through without hindrance. [Second], filtering software costs money. Not every family has the $40 or so necessary to install it. Third, filtering software depends upon parents willing to decide where their children will surf the Web and able to enforce that decision. [Fourth], software blocking lacks precision, with the result that those who wish to use it to screen out pornography find that it blocks a great deal of material that is valuable. [Thus], Congress could reasonably conclude that a system that relies entirely upon the use of such software is not an effective system. And a law that adds to that system an age-verification screen requirement significantly increases the system's efficacy. That is to say, at a modest additional cost to those adults who wish to obtain access to a screened program, that law will bring about better, more precise blocking, both inside and outside the home....”

Justice Scalia also dissented.

Note: “Indecent” Expression

1. Reno: right result, wrong reason? Consider Volokh, Freedom of Speech, Shielding Children, and Transcending Balancing, 1997 Sup. Ct. Rev. 141, 148–149, 165–166:

The CDA is invalid, the Court said, because it is possible to protect speech in this context without any sacrifice of shielding of children. [But] the Court is wrong. None of the Court’s proposed alternatives to the CDA [would] have been as effective [in protecting children] as the CDA’s more or less total ban. [This] error is more than just a harmless misstatement, [for the] pregnant negative in the Court’s reasoning is that, had there really been no equally effective alternatives, the CDA should have been upheld. [This view] is unsound. As Butler v. Michigan [section D5 supra] correctly holds, the government may not reduce adults to reading only what is fit for children. This is true even though letting adults access indecent material would necessarily sacrifice a great deal of shielding of children—even though a total ban would genuinely be the only means to effectively further the interest. [Thus, the correct approach would provide that if] the law imposes a substantial burden on generally protected speech, then it is per se impermissible, even if this means we must sacrifice a significant amount of shielding of children. [Under this approach, the] CDA would be unconstitutional because [banning such] communications substantially burdens speech to adults, [even if there are no less restrictive alternatives].

2. Discrimination against “indecent” expression. The Cable Act of 1984 required cable operators to reserve approximately 15 percent of their channels for commercial lease. The act expressly prohibited cable operators from exercising any editorial control over the content of programs broadcast on “leased access” channels. In Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium, Inc. v. FCC, 518 U.S. 727 (1996), the Court considered the constitutionality of several provisions of the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992, which altered this scheme with respect to “indecent programming,” defined as programming that depicts or describes “sexual activities or organs in a patently offensive manner.”

Section 10(a) authorized cable operators to prohibit “indecent” programming on leased access channels. In defense of this provision, the FCC argued that a cable operator is analogous to a newspaper, which, as a private actor, can refuse to carry such material without violating the first amendment. Petitioners (a consortium of leased access channel programmers) offered a different view. Noting that section 10(a) is an exception to the general statutory prohibition against cable operators exercising editorial control over leased access programming, they argued that it was an unconstitutional content-based discrimination against “indecent” speech because it authorized cable operators to exercise editorial control over only this form of expression.

The Court upheld the provision. In a plurality opinion, Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Stevens, O’Connor, and Souter, argued that “the permissive nature of the provision, coupled with its viewpoint-neutral application, [suggests that section 10(a) is] a constitutionally permissible way to protect [children].” Justice Thomas, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Scalia, concurred in the result. Justice Kennedy, joined by Justice Ginsburg, dissented. Kennedy emphasized that in section 10(a) “Congress singles out one sort of speech for vulnerability to private censorship in a context where [it does not otherwise permit] content-based discrimination.” Kennedy argued that, in such circumstances, “strict scrutiny applies,” and however “compelling Congress’ interest in shielding children from indecent programming,” section 10(a) “cannot survive this exacting review” because of the availability of other means of regulating such expression, such as blocking mechanisms available to individual subscribers.

3. Blocking versus unblocking. Section 10(b) of the 1992 Cable Act required cable operators who choose to carry “indecent” programming to segregate such programming on a single channel, to block that channel from viewer access, and to unblock it only on a subscriber’s written request. In Denver Area, the Court invalidated this provision. In an opinion by Justice Breyer, the Court explained that this provision “significantly differs” from section 10(a) because “it does not simply permit, but rather requires cable operators to restrict [such] speech.” The Court observed that this provision had a potentially significant chilling effect because of its “written notice” requirement, which might affect subscribers who may “fear for their reputations should the operator, advertently or inadvertently, disclose the list of those who wish to watch the ‘patently offensive’ channel.” Although agreeing with the government that the “protection of children is a ‘compelling interest,’” the Court concluded that this provision was nonetheless invalid because it was not the “‘least restrictive alternative.’” An obvious alternative, for example, was to require those who did not want to receive such channels to bear the burden of requesting that they be blocked. Justice Thomas, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Scalia, dissented.

4. Scrambling and blocking. Section 505 of the Telecommunications Act of 1996 requires cable operators who provide channels “primarily dedicated to sexually-oriented programming” either to “fully scramble” those channels or to limit their transmission to between 10 P.M. and 6 A.M. Even before the enactment of section 505, cable operators used scrambling to ensure that only paying customers had access to such programming, but the technology of scrambling is imperfect and the scrambled programs occasionally “bleed” through to the viewer. The purpose of section 505 was to shield children from exposure to sexually-oriented “signal bleed.” Because the technology to “fully” eliminate signal bleed is very expensive, most cable operators conformed to the requirements of section 505 by limiting transmission to only the eight authorized hours.

In United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, Inc., 529 U.S. 803 (2000), the Court invalidated section 505. Justice Kennedy wrote the opinion of the Court:

The only reasonable way for a substantial number of cable operators to comply with [section 505] is to time channel, which silences the protected speech for two-thirds of the day in every [home], regardless of the presence or [absence] of children or of the wishes of the viewers. According to the District Court, 30% to 50% of all adult programming is viewed by households prior to 10 P.M. [To] prohibit this much speech is a significant restriction of communication. [There is a] key difference between cable television and the broadcasting media, which is the point on which this case turns: Cable systems have the capacity to block unwanted channels on a household-by-household basis. [Simply] put, targeted blocking is less restrictive than banning, and the Government cannot ban speech if targeted blocking is a feasible and effective means of furthering its compelling interests....

[The] Government [argues] that society’s independent interests will be unserved if parents fail to act [by failing to use the blocking alternative. But even] upon the assumption that the Government has an interest in substituting itself for informed and empowered parents, its interest is not sufficiently compelling to justify this widespread restriction on speech. The Government’s argument stems from the idea that parents do not know their children are viewing the material on a scale or frequency to cause concern, or if so, that parents do not want to take affirmative steps to block it and their decisions are to be superceded. [The] Government has not [shown, however,] that [the voluntary blocking] alternative [would] be insufficient to secure its objective, or that any overriding harm justifies its intervention.

Justice Breyer, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices O'Connor and Scalia, dissented.

5. Indecent expression and subsidies for the arts. In considering the constitutionality of government regulations of “indecent” expression, to what extent should it matter whether the government directly restricts such expression (as in Reno, Pacifica, and Sable) or merely refuses to subsidize it in a government-sponsored grant program? See National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, section E2d, infra, in which the Court upheld against both overbreadth and vagueness challenges a federal statute that directs the National Endowment for the Arts, in establishing procedures to judge the artistic merit of grant applications, to take “into consideration general standards of decency.” The subsidy issue is closely related to the issue of “unconstitutional conditions.” See Chapter 9, section E, infra. See G. Stone, Sex and the Constitution 334–340 (2017).

6. Indecent expression and public employees. In City of San Diego v. John Roe, 543 U.S. 77 (2004), the Court unanimously upheld the discharge of a police officer for selling on the adults-only section of eBay videotapes of himself stripping off a police uniform (not his official uniform) and then masturbating. His eBay user profile identified him as a person “employed in the field of law enforcement.” The Court explained that “a governmental employer may impose certain restraints on the speech of its employees, restraints that would not be constitutional if applied to the general public.” Indeed, Pickering balancing applies only when an employee speaks on “matters of public concern.” When an employee speaks on matters unrelated to his employment and of no “public concern,” the governmental employer may discipline or discharge him if “legitimate and substantial interests [are] compromised by his speech.”

The Court held that the police officer’s speech “does not qualify as a matter of public concern under any view of the public concern test.” Because the officer “took deliberate steps to link his videos [to] his police work,” and because his “debased parody of an officer performing indecent acts while in the course of his official duties brought the mission of the employer and the professionalism of its officers into serious disrepute,” he could be discharged consistent with the first amendment. To what extent does this decision turn on the officer’s sexual activity? Suppose he had performed in a skit mocking the police department’s respect for the Constitution? Suppose he had performed in black-face in order to parody the department’s treatment of African Americans?

7. Indecent expression and students. In Bethel School District No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986), the Court rejected a first amendment attack on a public high school's decision to discipline a student for speech containing sexual innuendo. Respondent delivered the speech, nominating a fellow student for student elective office, to a high school assembly of approximately six hundred students:

I know a man who is firm—he's firm in his pants, he's firm in his shirt, his character is firm—but most [of] all, his belief in you, the students of Bethel, is firm. Jeff Kuhlman is a man who takes his point and pounds it in. If necessary, he'll take an issue and nail it to the wall. He doesn't attack things in spurts—he drives hard, pushing and pushing until finally—he succeeds. Jeff is a man who will go to the very end—even the climax, for each and every one of you.

There was evidence before the trial court that during the speech, some students hooted, yelled, and made gestures simulating the sexual activities alluded to in the speech, while others appeared bewildered and embarrassed. One teacher reported that she found it necessary to forgo a portion of her scheduled class on the following day to discuss the speech.

In an opinion by Chief Justice Burger, the Court emphasized the “sexual content” of the student’s speech:

[The] penalties imposed in this case were unrelated to any political viewpoint. The First Amendment does not prevent the school officials from determining that to permit a vulgar and lewd speech such as respondent's would undermine the school's basic educational mission. A high school assembly or classroom is no place for a sexually explicit monologue [and] it was perfectly appropriate for the school to disassociate itself to make the point to the pupils that vulgar speech [is] wholly inconsistent with the “fundamental values” of public school education.

Note: Zoning Theaters with Adult Movies and Bars with Nude Dancing

1. Zoning adult movie theaters. In the mid-1970s, Detroit adopted zoning ordinances providing that no adult theater may be located within one thousand feet of any two other “regulated uses” or within five hundred feet of a residential area. Other “regulated uses” included cabarets, bars, hotels, motels, pawnshops, pool halls, shoeshine parlors, and secondhand stores. The ordinance classified a theater as “adult” if it was used to present “material distinguished or characterized by an emphasis on matter depicting, describing or relating to ‘Specified Sexual Activities’ or ‘Specified Anatomical Areas.’”

In Young v. American Mini-Theatres, 427 U.S. 50 (1976), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Stevens, upheld the constitutionality of the ordinances: “In the opinion of urban planners and real estate experts who supported the ordinances, the location of several regulated uses in the same neighborhood tends to attract an undesirable quantity and quality of transients, adversely affects property values, causes an increase in crime, [and] encourages residents and businesses to move elsewhere. [The] ordinances are not challenged on the ground that they impose a limit on the total number of adult theaters which may operate in the city of Detroit. There is no claim that distributors or exhibitors of adult films are denied access to the market or, conversely, that the viewing public is unable to satisfy its appetite for sexually explicit fare. Viewed as an entity, the market for this commodity is essentially unrestrained. [Thus,] apart from the fact that the ordinances treat adult theaters differently from other theaters and the fact that the classification is predicated on the content of material shown in the respective theaters, the regulation of the place where such films may be exhibited does not offend the First Amendment.

“[The Detroit ordinances draw a line] on the basis of content without violating the government’s paramount obligation of neutrality in its regulation of protected communication. For the regulation of the places where sexually explicit films may be exhibited is unaffected by whatever social, political, or philosophical message a film may be intended to communicate; whether a motion picture ridicules or characterizes one point of view or another, the effect of the ordinances is exactly the same. [Moreover,] even though we recognize that the First Amendment will not tolerate the total suppression of erotic materials that have some arguably artistic value, it is manifest that society’s interest in protecting this type of expression is of a wholly different, and lesser, magnitude than the interest in untrammeled political debate....[Even] though the First Amendment protects communication in this area from total suppression, we hold that the State may legitimately use the content of these materials as the basis for placing them in a different classification from other motion pictures.

“The remaining question is whether the line drawn by these ordinances is justified by the city’s interest in preserving the character of its neighborhoods. [The] record discloses a factual basis for the Common Council’s conclusion that this kind of restriction will have the desired effect. It is not our function to appraise the wisdom of its decision to require adult theaters to be separated.... The city’s interest in attempting to preserve the quality of urban life is one that must be accorded high respect [and it] must be allowed a reasonable opportunity to experiment with solutions to admittedly serious problems.”

Justice Stewart, joined by Justices Brennan, Marshall and Blackmun, dissented: “This case does not involve a simple zoning ordinance, or a content-neutral time, place, and manner restriction, or a regulation of obscene expression or other speech that is entitled to less than the full protection of the First Amendment. The kind of expression at issue here is no doubt objectionable to some, but that fact does not diminish its protected status any more than did the particular content of the ‘offensive’ expression in [Erznoznik or Cohen]. What this case does involve is the constitutional permissibility of selective interference with protected speech whose content is thought to produce distasteful effects. It is elementary that a prime function of the First Amendment is to guard against just such interference. By refusing to invalidate Detroit’s ordinance the Court rides roughshod over cardinal principles of First Amendment law, which require that time, place, and manner regulations that affect protected expression be content neutral....”

Presumably, the Court would not uphold a law requiring cable operators to confine antiwar or Nazi programming to certain hours or restricting the location of movie theaters that show racist films or films that portray adultery or homosexuality in a positive light. What, then, explains Young? Is it that “indecent” (but non-obscene) speech is of only “low” first amendment value? Is it that regulations of such expression are “viewpoint-neutral”? Does Young make any sense? Recall Denver Area, supra.

2. Making sense of Young? Ten years later, in City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, 475 U.S. 41 (1986), the Court considered the constitutionality of an ordinance prohibiting adult movie theaters from locating within one thousand feet of any residential zone, single- or multiple-family dwelling, church, park, or school. In an opinion by Justice Rehnquist, the Court upheld the ordinance. At the outset, the Court observed that “the resolution of this case is largely dictated by [Young].” After noting the distinction between “regulations enacted for the purpose of restraining speech on the basis of its content,” which “presumptively violate the First Amendment,” and “‘content-neutral’ time, place, and manner regulations,” which “are acceptable so long as they are designed to serve a substantial governmental interest and do not unreasonably limit alternative avenues of communication,” the Court concluded that, because “the Renton ordinance is aimed not at the content of the films, [but] at the secondary effects of such theaters on the surrounding community,” it is “completely consistent with our definition of ‘content-neutral’ speech regulations as those that ‘are justified without regard to the content of the regulated speech.’” This being so, the Court held that the Renton ordinance must be tested as a content-neutral restriction. Applying that standard, the Court echoed its finding in Young that “a city's 'interest in attempting to preserve the quality of urban life is one that must be accorded high respect.'"

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented. Brennan lamented the Court's "misguided" conclusion that the Renton ordinance was "content-neutral." In Justice Brennan's view, the "fact that adult movie theaters may cause harmful 'secondary' land use effects" does not mean that the regulation is content-neutral. To the contrary, because the ordinance explicitly "discriminates on its face against certain forms of speech based on content," it must be tested as a content-based restriction.

Was the Renton ordinance "content-neutral"? Does it make sense to treat a law that expressly "discriminates on its face against certain forms of speech based on content" more leniently than other content-based laws because it is "justified" in terms of the "secondary effects" of the speech? The issue of content-neutrality is taken up in section E infra.

3. Making sense of Renton? In 1977, the city of Los Angeles conducted a study that concluded that concentrations of adult entertainment establishments are associated with higher crime rates. Accordingly, it enacted an ordinance prohibiting such establishments within one thousand feet of each other or within five hundred feet of a religious institution, school, or public park. In 1983, to close a "loophole" in the original ordinance, the city amended the ordinance to prohibit "more than one adult entertainment business in the same building." Alameda Books, which operated a combined adult book store and adult video arcade in a single location, challenged the amendment on the ground that there was no evidence that combining these two activities in a single location caused higher crime rates. The lower court granted summary judgment to Alameda Books. The Supreme Court reversed.

Justice O'Connor, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Thomas, delivered the plurality opinion: "[In Renton,] we stated that the ordinance would be upheld so long as the city [showed] that [it] was designed to serve a substantial government interest and that reasonable alternative avenues of communication remained available. [It was] rational for the city to infer that reducing the concentration of adult operations in a neighborhood, whether within separate establishments or in one large establishment, will reduce crime rates. [We] conclude that the city [has sufficiently] complied with the evidentiary requirement in Renton [to withstand a motion for summary judgment]."

Justice Kennedy concurred in the judgment: "If a city can decrease the crime and blight associated with certain speech by the traditional exercise of its zoning power, and at the same time leave the quantity and accessibility of the speech substantially undiminished, there is no First Amendment objection. [But] the purpose and effect of [such] a zoning ordinance must be to reduce secondary effects and not to reduce speech. [In Renton,] the Court designated the restriction ‘content neutral.’ [This] was something of a fiction. [Whether] a statute is content-based or content neutral is something that can be determined on the face of it; if the statute describes speech by content then it is content based. [This ordinance is] content based and we should call [it] so. [Nevertheless], the central holding of Renton is sound: [Zoning] regulations do not automatically raise the specter of impermissible content discrimination, even if they are content based, [because the] zoning context provides a built-in legitimate rationale, which rebuts the usual presumption that content-based restrictions are unconstitutional. [But] the necessary rationale for applying intermediate [rather than strict] scrutiny is the promise that zoning ordinances like this one [will] reduce [the] secondary effects without substantially reducing speech.”

Justice Souter, joined by Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer, dissented: “Because content-based regulation applies to expression by very reason of what is said, it carries a high risk that expressive limits are imposed for the sake of suppressing a message that is disagreeable to listeners or readers, or the government. [The] risk lies in the fact that when a law applies selectively only to speech of particular content, the more precisely the content is identified, the greater is the opportunity for government censorship. [The] capacity of zoning regulations to address the [secondary effects] without eliminating the speech [is] the only possible excuse for [treating them] as akin to time, place and manner regulations. [In] this case, [the] government has not shown that bookstores containing viewing booths [increase] negative secondary effects, [and] we are thus left without substantial justification for viewing the [restriction as content neutral].”

Is it credible to call these regulations “content-neutral”? In Reed v. Town of Gilbert, 135 S. Ct. 2218 (2015), the Supreme Court invalidated an ordinance that treated different types of signs differently based on their content. Temporary political signs, for example, were treated differently in terms of their permissible size and the length of time they could be displayed than were temporary directional signs. The lower court upheld the ordinance as a content-neutral regulation because the town’s justifications for regulating the signs differently were “unrelated to the content of the sign.” The Supreme Court, in an opinion authored by Justice Thomas, rejected this argument, stating emphatically that a “law that is content-based on its face is subject to strict scrutiny regardless of the government’s benign motive, content-neutral justification, or lack of ‘animus toward the ideas contained’ in the regulated speech.” Does Reed effectively overrule this line of cases? If the laws in these cases cannot defensibly be characterized as “content-neutral,” is there any other way to uphold them? See Lakier, Reed v. Town of Gilbert, Arizona, and the Rise of the Anticlassificatory First Amendment, 2016 Sup. Ct. Rev. 233, noting that Reed effectively overruled the Court’s prior decisions that had suggested that “a law that made facial content distinctions” should be analyzed as content-neutral if “it could be justified by reference to a content-neutral purpose.”

4. Nude dancing. In Schad v. Borough of Mt. Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61 (1981), appellants, who operated an adult bookstore, installed a coin-operated mechanism permitting a customer to watch a live dancer, usually nude, performing behind a glass panel. Appellants were convicted of violating a Mount Ephraim zoning ordinance prohibiting all live entertainment within the borough. The Court, in an opinion by Justice White, held the ordinance invalid. The Court noted that, as a form of entertainment, “nude dancing is not without its First Amendment protections.” The Court explained that “this case is not controlled by Young,” for unlike the situation in Young, there was “no evidence” in Schad “that the kind of entertainment appellants wish to provide is available in reasonably nearby areas.” Chief Justice Burger, joined by Justice Rehnquist, dissented, observing that “to invoke the First Amendment to protect the activity involved in this case trivializes and demeans that great Amendment.”

See also California v. LaRue, 409 U.S. 109 (1972) (upholding as “reasonable” under the twenty-first amendment an administrative regulation prohibiting nude dancing in bars and nightclubs that are licensed to sell liquor because of administrative findings that such explicitly sexual performances in establishments licensed to sell liquor tend to promote rape and prostitution and often result in the commission by customers of unlawful public acts of sexuality); New York State Liquor Authority v. Bellanca, 452 U.S. 714 (1981) (upholding a statute prohibiting nude dancing in establishments licensed by the state to sell liquor for on-premises consumption); Newport v. Iacobucci, 479 U.S. 92 (1986) (same); 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996) (disavowing LaRue’s reliance on the twenty-first amendment and concluding that the twenty-first amendment does not qualify the first amendment’s prohibition against laws abridging the freedom of speech).

In Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560 (1991), the Court upheld an Indiana statute prohibiting any person to appear “in a state of nudity” in any “public place,” as applied to establishments that present nude dancing as entertainment. Although there was no opinion of the Court, a majority of the justices concluded that nude performance dancing “is expressive conduct within the outer perimeters of the First Amendment.” A majority also concluded, however, that the requirement that such dancers wear pasties and a G-string does not violate the first amendment because the nudity statute was not directed at nude dancing as such and had only an “incidental effect” on constitutionally protected activity. See also City of Erie v. Pap’s A.M., 529 U.S. 277 (2000) (upholding a city ordinance banning public nudity, as applied to nude performance dancing). For a fuller account of Barnes and Pap’s A.M., see section E3 infra.

8. Hate Speech and Pornography

Beauharnais v. Illinois

343 U.S. 250 (1952)

[Beauharnais, president of the White Circle League, organized the distribution of a leaflet setting forth a petition calling on the mayor and city council of Chicago “to halt the further encroachment, harassment and invasion of white people, their property, neighborhoods and persons, by the Negro.” The leaflet called for “[one] million self respecting white people in Chicago to unite” and added that, “[if] persuasion and the need to prevent the white race from becoming mongrelized by the negro will not unite us, then the aggressions, [rapes], robberies, knives, guns and marijuana of the negro surely will.” Attached to the leaflet was an application for membership in the White Circle League. As a result of his participation in the distribution of this leaflet, Beauharnais was convicted under an Illinois statute declaring it unlawful for any person to [distribute] any publication that “portrays depravity, criminality, unchastity, or lack of virtue of a class of citizens, of any race, color, creed or religion, which [publication] exposes the citizens of any race, color, creed or religion to contempt, derision, or obloquy or which is productive of breach of the peace or riots.” At Beauharnais’s trial, the judge refused to instruct the jury that, in order to convict, they must find “that the article complained of was likely to produce a clear and present danger of a serious substantive evil that rises far above public inconvenience, annoyance or unrest.” The trial judge also refused to consider Beauharnais’s offer of proof on the issue of truth, for under Illinois law, the defense of truth is unavailable in a prosecution for criminal libel unless “the truth of all facts in the utterance [be] shown together with good motive for publication.” The Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision, affirmed the conviction.]

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court....

Libel of an individual was a common-law crime, and thus criminal in the colonies. Indeed, at common law, truth or good motives was no defense. In the first decades after the adoption of the Constitution, this was changed by judicial decision, statute or constitution in most States, but nowhere was there any suggestion that the crime of libel be abolished. [As we have observed, "libelous utterances are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality...."] [Chaplinsky.]

No one will gainsay that it is libelous falsely to charge another with being a rapist, robber, carrier of knives and guns, and user of marijuana. The precise question before us, then, is whether the [Constitution] prevents a State from punishing such libels—as criminal libel has been defined, limited and constitutionally recognized time out of mind—directed at designated collectivities and flagrantly disseminated. [If] an utterance directed at an individual may be the object of criminal sanctions, we cannot deny to a State power to punish the same utterance directed at a defined group, unless we can say that this is a willful and purposeless restriction unrelated to the peace and well-being of the State.

Illinois did not have to look beyond her own borders or await the tragic experience of the last three decades to conclude that wilful purveyors of falsehood concerning racial and religious groups promote strife and tend powerfully to obstruct the manifold adjustments required for free, ordered life in a metropolitan, polyglot community. From the murder of the abolitionist Lovejoy in 1837 to the Cicero riots of 1951, Illinois has been the scene of exacerbated tension between races, often flaring into violence and destruction. In many of these outbreaks, utterances of the character here in question, so the Illinois legislature could conclude, played a significant part....

In the face of this history and its frequent obligato of extreme racial and religious propaganda, we would deny experience to say that the Illinois legislature was without reason in seeking ways to curb false or malicious defamation of racial and religious groups, made in public places and by means calculated to have a powerful emotional impact on those to whom it was presented. [Moreover, it would be] quite outside the scope of our authority [for] us to deny that the Illinois legislature may warrantably believe that a man's job and his educational opportunities and the dignity accorded him may depend as much on the reputation of the racial and religious group to which he willy-nilly belongs, as on his own merits. This being so, we are precluded from saying that speech concededly punishable when immediately directed at individuals cannot be outlawed if directed at groups with whose position and esteem in society the affiliated individual may be inextricably involved.

As to the defense of truth, Illinois in common with many States requires a showing not only that the utterance state the facts, but also that the publication be made "with good motives and for justifiable ends." Both elements are necessary if the defense is to prevail....

Libelous utterances not being within the area of constitutionally protected speech, it is unnecessary, either for us or for the State courts, to consider the issues behind the phrase "clear and present danger." Certainly no one would contend that obscene speech, for example, may be punished only upon a showing of such circumstances. Libel, as we have seen, is in the same class.

We find no warrant in the Constitution for denying to Illinois the power to pass the law here under attack....

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, with whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS concurs, dissenting....

The Court condones this expansive state censorship by painstakingly analogizing it to the law of criminal libel. As a result of this refined analysis, the Illinois statute emerges labeled a "group libel law." This label may make the Court's holding more palatable for those who sustain it, but the sugar-coating does not make the censorship less deadly. However tagged, the Illinois law is not that criminal libel which has been "defined, limited and constitutionally recognized time out of mind." For as "constitutionally recognized" that crime has provided for punishment of false, malicious, scurrilous charges against individuals, not against huge groups. This limited scope of the law of criminal libel is of no small importance. It has confined state punishment of speech and expression to the narrowest of areas involving nothing more than purely private feuds. Every expansion of the law of criminal libel so as to punish discussions of matters of public concern means a corresponding invasion of the area dedicated to free expression by the First Amendment....

Moreover, the leaflet used here was [the] means adopted by an assembled group to enlist interest in their efforts to have legislation enacted. [Freedom] of petition, assembly, speech and press could be greatly abridged by a practice of meticulously scrutinizing every editorial, speech, sermon or other printed matter to extract two or three naughty words on which to hang charges of "group libel." The Chaplinsky case makes no such broad inroads on First Amendment freedoms....

If there be minority groups who hail this holding as their victory, they might consider the possible relevancy of this ancient remark: "Another such victory and I am undone."

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, dissenting....

My view is that if in any case other public interests are to override the plain command of the First Amendment, the peril of speech must be clear and present, leaving no room for argument, raising no doubts as to the necessity of curbing speech in order to prevent disaster....

[Dissenting opinions of Justices Reed and Jackson are omitted.]

Note: Group Defamation and “Hate Speech”

1. The Skokie controversy. Reconsider the Skokie controversy, section B2 supra, in light of Beauharnais. Does the display of a swastika constitute “group libel”?

2. Group defamation as “libel.” Central to Justice Frankfurter’s analysis was the conclusion that “group libel,” as defined in the Illinois statute, is not “within the area of constitutionally protected speech” and thus need not be tested by the clear and present danger standard. In justifying this conclusion, Justice Frankfurter relied primarily on Chaplinsky’s characterization of “libelous” utterances as “unprotected” speech. In New York Times v. Sullivan, however, the Court held that “libel can claim no talismanic immunity from constitutional limitations.” Moreover, the concept of “group libel,” held in Beauharnais to be “unprotected” expression, was not limited to false statements of fact. Subsequent opinions, however, such as New York Times and Hustler, have unequivocally held that “libel” is of “low” first amendment value only insofar as it consists of false statements of fact. These decisions have generally been understood to pull the rug out from under Beauharnais. See, e.g., Collin v. Smith, 578 F.2d 1197 (7th Cir. 1978) (the “approach sanctioned [in] Beauharnais would [not] pass constitutional muster today”).

3. False statements of fact. Suppose the Illinois statute prohibited only false statements of fact that portray “depravity, criminality, unchastity, or lack of virtue of a class of citizens, of any race, color, creed or religion.” Are the interests threatened by such expression too diffuse to warrant restriction? Given the statements in the Beauharnais leaflet, what sort of showing would be necessary to establish “truth” or “falsity”? Consider Arkes, Civility and the Restriction of Speech: Rediscovering the Defamation of Groups, 1974 Sup. Ct. Rev. 281, 301: “One can think of few things worse than having a jury pronounce on the ‘truth’ of Beauharnais’s charges, with all the solemnity and authority of the legal process. [These] are not the kinds of questions that we typically trust to the judgment of juries.”

4. Other bases for “low”-value status. If the conclusion that group libel constitutes “low”-value speech can no longer be sustained solely by invocation of the term “libel,” is there any other basis for attributing to such expression only “low” first amendment value? Consider the following arguments:

- a. The group libel doctrine is a logical extension of the fighting words doctrine. The fighting words doctrine declares the malicious use of personal epithets to be of “low” first amendment value, see section B2 supra; the group libel doctrine accords equivalent treatment to the similarly malicious use of what amounts to epithets directed against groups.
- b. Group libel is of “low” first amendment value because it operates not by persuasion but by insidiously undermining social attitudes and beliefs, as evidenced by the experience of Nazi Germany. See Riesman, Democracy and Defamation: Control of Group Libel, 42 Colum. L. Rev. 727 (1942). For a description of contemporary anti-Nazi legislation in Germany, see Stein, History against Free Speech: The New German Law against the “Auschwitz”—and Other—Lies, 85 Mich. L. Rev. 277 (1986).
- c. It cannot seriously be maintained that the first amendment was intended to protect speech that maliciously “portrays depravity, criminality, unchastity, or lack of virtue of a class of citizens, of any race, color, creed or religion.” Just as express language of incitement to crime is incompatible with the fundamental assumptions of our democratic system, and is thus of “low” first amendment value, group libel is likewise of “low” value because it is incompatible with our fundamental commitment to human dignity and equality. Indeed, this issue poses a clash of constitutional rights and calls for the first amendment to be interpreted and applied in light of the fourteenth amendment’s equally important guarantee of “equal protection of the laws.”

d. Waldron, Dignity and Defamation: The Visibility of Hate, 123 Harv. L. Rev. 1597, 1599-1600, 1627 (2010):

[H]ate speech regulation can be understood as the protection of a certain sort of precious public good: a visible assurance offered by society to all of its members that they will not be subject to abuse, defamation, humiliation, discrimination, and violence on grounds of race, ethnicity, religion, gender, and in some cases sexual orientation. [The] most important aim of these laws [is] simply to diminish the presence of visible hatred in society by protecting the public commitment to their equal standing in society against public denigration. [In] a well-ordered society, [people] know that when they leave home in the morning they can reasonably count on not being discriminated against, humiliated, or terrorized. [When] a society is defaced with anti-Semitic signage, burning crosses, or defamatory racial leaflets, that sort of assurance evaporates. [In a] society that tolerates hate speech], people no longer have the benefit of a general public assurance [of] human dignity. [The] security that people look for is security against the soul-shriveling humiliation that accompanies the manifestation of injustice in society.

e. Matsuda, Public Response to Racist Speech: Considering the Victim's Story, 87 Mich. L. Rev. 2320, 2332, 2336–2337, 2357, 2359 (1989):

The claim that a legal response to racist speech is required stems from a recognition of the structural reality of racism in America. Racism, as used here, comprises the ideology of racial supremacy and the mechanisms for keeping selected victim groups in subordinated positions. [Victims of] hate propaganda have experienced [fear, nightmares], post-traumatic stress disorder, hypertension, psychosis, and suicide. [In] order to avoid receiving hate messages, victims [of such speech] have had to quit jobs, forego education, leave their homes, avoid certain public places, curtail their own exercise of free speech rights, and otherwise modify their behavior....

Racist speech is best treated as a sui generis category, presenting an idea so historically untenable, so dangerous, and so tied to perpetuation of violence and degradation [that] it is properly treated as outside the realm of protected discourse. [The] identifying characteristics [of] racist hate [speech are]: 1. The message is of racial inferiority; 2. The message is directed against a historically oppressed group; and 3. The message is persecutorial, hateful, and degrading....

How can one argue for censorship of racist hate messages without encouraging a revival of McCarthyism? There is an important difference that comes from human experience, our only source of collective knowledge. [The] doctrines of racial supremacy and racial hatred [are] uniformly rejected. [We] have fought wars and spilled blood to establish [this principle]. The universality of this principle, in a world bereft of agreement on many things, is a mark of collective human progress.

In light of Matsuda's argument that hate speech causes its victims to "curtail their own exercise of free speech rights," can it be said that the regulation of hate speech is justified because it maximizes free expression in the aggregate?

Consider also Powell, As Justice Requires/Permits: The Delimitation of Harmful Speech in a Democratic Society, 16 Law & Inequality 97, 103, 147–149 (1998):

[The] insights proffered by critical race and post-modern theorists [suggest] that the classic remedy for harmful speech—that is, more speech—will, in some instances, perpetuate disparities of power and destabilize our sense of self. The marketplace of ideas cannot self-regulate so long as objections to lack of participatory access are subsumed by claims that the liberty interest in expression is primary to the equality interest in participatory access. A self-regulating marketplace presupposes an equal starting line—an assumption that has never been a reality in American political life.

[A decision of the Canadian Supreme Court, Regina v. Keegstra, 2 W.W.R. 1 (1991), illustrates] an alternative way of using democratic principles to valorize liberty and equality. [In Keegstra, a Canadian high school teacher was convicted of “communicating statements [that] willfully promote hatred against any identifiable group” for communicating anti-Semitic statements to his students. The Canadian Supreme Court rejected Keegstra’s claim that his conviction violated the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms because his speech] was not expression that “serves individual and societal values in a free and democratic society.” [This decision reflects] a commitment to both liberty and equality, and mediates between these values by recourse to a collective concern for the underlying values and principles of the society, including social justice. [Commenting] that it is destructive of free expression values themselves, as well as other democratic values, “to treat all expression as equally crucial to those principles at the core” of free expression, the Court suggested that democratic principles recommend viewing free expression as a function of three underlying goals. These goals are truth attainment, ensuring [the] development of self-identity, and most importantly, [the] guarantee that the opportunity for participation in the democratic process is open to all. The Court simultaneously supports these rationales with the observations that hate speech can impede the search for truth, impinge on the autonomy necessary to individual development, and subvert the democratic process. Cognizant that the regulation “muzzles the participation of a [few],” the Court remains certain that the loss of that voice is not substantial. [What] is most instructive about the decision is that the Court was willing to employ a democratic calculus.

See also A. Tsesis, Destructive Messages 180, 192 (2002) (“A general consensus among nations holds that hate propaganda [threatens] both outgroup participation in democracy and minority rights. Countries that have enacted laws penalizing the dissemination of hate speech include Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Cyprus, England, France, Germany, India, Israel, Italy, Netherlands, and Switzerland. [These] international examples demonstrate that the United States’s pure speech jurisprudence is anomalous.”).

f. Graber, Old Wine in New Bottles: The Constitutional Status of Unconstitutional Speech, 48 Vand. L. Rev. 349, 352, 364, 367–368, 371–372 (1995):

Scholars who would ban [hate speech] insist that government can regulate certain expressions of prejudice without violating First Amendment values [because] the First Amendment does not fully protect unconstitutional speech—speech that denies or threatens the realization of fundamental constitutional values. [But what proponents of hate speech regulation] fail to realize is that the leading opponents of free speech in every generation [have] insisted that the First Amendment does not fully protect the right to deny or criticize what their generation regards to be fundamental constitutional values.

[The leading] proponents of restrictions on speech during World War I, [for example, maintained] that persons had no constitutional right to attack what they believed to be the essential principles of republican government. [Similarly,] proponents of the freedom of contract [argued] that the First Amendment did not protect [attacks] on private property because such advocacy [was] unconstitutional speech, [and proponents of restricting the speech of communists asserted] that “[n]o democratic or constitutional principle is violated [when] a democracy acts to exclude those groups from entering the struggle for political power which, if victorious, will not permit that struggle to continue in accordance with the democratic way.”

g. Post, Racist Speech, Democracy, and the First Amendment, 32 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 267, 312–317 (1991):

[If] representations in the current literature are accepted as true, [the members of victim groups] confront in public discourse an undifferentiated complex of circumstances in which they are systematically demeaned, stigmatized, ignored; in which the very language of debate resists the articulation of their claims; in which they are harassed, abused, intimidated, and systematically [injured] both individually and collectively. The question [posed is] whether this unacceptable situation would be cured by restraints on speech....

Bluntly expressed, the argument requires us to balance the integrity of public discourse [against] the importance of enhancing the experience [of] members of victim groups. [This] invitation to balance ought to be declined [because] the temptation to balance rests on what might be termed the fallacy of immaculate isolation. The effect on public discourse is acceptable only if it is de minimis, and it is arguably de minimis only when a specific claim is evaluated in isolation from other, similar claims. But no claim is in practice immaculately isolated in this manner. As the flag burning [issue] suggests, there is no shortage of powerful groups contending that uncivil speech [ought] to be “minimally” regulated for highly pressing symbolic reasons. [This] is already plain in the regulations that have proliferated on college campuses, which commonly proscribe not merely speech that degrades persons on the basis of their race, but also [on] the basis of their “color, national origin, religion, sex, sexual orientation, age, handicap, or veteran’s status.” The claim of de minimis impact loses credibility as the list of claimants to special protection grows longer.

h. R. Kennedy, Nigger 151, 154, 158–159 (2002):

[Proponents] of enhanced hate-speech regulation have typically failed to establish persuasively the asserted predicate for their campaign—that is, that verbal abuse [is] a “rising” [development] demanding countermeasures. Regulationists do cite racist incidents [but] too often the dramatic retelling of an anecdote is permitted to substitute for a more systematic, quantitative analysis. [An] examination of the substance of the regulationists’ proposals turns up suggested reforms that are puzzlingly narrow, frighteningly broad, or disturbingly susceptible to discriminatory manipulation....

The cumulative effect of [the Supreme Court’s] speech-protective doctrines is a conspicuous toleration of speech [that] many people—in some instances the vast majority of people—find deeply, perhaps even viscerally, obnoxious, including flag burning, pornography, Nazis’ taunting of Holocaust survivors, a jacket emblazoned with the phrase “Fuck the Draft,” The Satanic Verses, The Birth of a Nation, The Last Temptation of Christ. And just as acute wariness [of] censorship has long furthered struggles for freedom of expression in all its many guises, so has resistance against censorship always been an important and positive feature of the great struggles against racist tyranny in the United States, from the fight against slavery to the fight against Jim Crow. For this reason, we may count ourselves fortunate that the anti-hate-speech campaign [has] fizzled and largely subsided. This [effort] was simply not worth the various costs that success would have exacted.

i. T. Ash, Free Speech: Ten Principles for a Connected World 90–94 (2016):

Today’s veto statements come most often in the form of claimed offence to a group identity. [Do] we want to be the kind of human beings who are habitually at the ready to take offense, and our children to be educated and socialized that way? [Should] our role model be the thin-skinned identity activist who is constantly crying, "I am offended"? Or should it be the Mandela, Baldwin, or Gandhi who says, in effect, "although what I see written or depicted is grossly offensive, I hold it beneath my dignity to take offense. It is those who abuse me who are demeaning themselves." [However,] we should take positive steps of many different kinds, whether in education, journalism, local communities or our own personal conduct, not merely to equip us to live with offence but to develop a culture of open debate and robust civility. These are twin tasks. The better we succeed in the latter, the less we will have need of the former.

j. Goldberg, Free Speech Consequentialism, 116 Colum. L. Rev. 687 (2016):

[As many proponents of laws forbidding hate speech have observed, the emotional burdens of speech may not be shared equally.] This is a significant concern, especially when the burdens of speech fall on particularly vulnerable members of the population, or those who have been historically oppressed. [Proponents] of laws regulating hate speech [maintain] that [such laws make] society overall more tolerant and more welcoming to marginalized groups....

It is unclear whether members of minority groups fare better in societies where speech damaging to these groups is aired or in cultures that prohibit this type of speech and force it underground. There is reason to believe that suppressing the types of speech most damaging to women and minorities may not actually benefit members of these groups in the long term. Some feminists, generally associated with third-wave feminism, convincingly argue that the association of women with emotional trauma, and the law's efforts to specifically cater to women's emotional distress, has actually deprived women of autonomy and the ability to make their own choices. Further, instead of feeling victimized, many are empowered by collective efforts to speak out against expressions of bigotry. The U.S. approach of tolerating the intolerant may actually make society overall more tolerant and more welcoming to marginalized groups.

R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul
505 U.S. 377 (1992)

JUSTICE SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

[After allegedly burning a cross on a black family's lawn, petitioner, a teenager, was charged under the St. Paul, Minnesota, Bias-Motivated Crime

Ordinance, which prohibits the display of a burning cross, a swastika, or other symbol that one knows or has reason to know “arouses anger, alarm or resentment in others” on the basis of race, color, creed, religion, or gender. The state supreme court rejected a claim that the ordinance was unconstitutionally overbroad, because the phrase “arouses anger, alarm or resentment in others” had been construed in earlier state cases to limit the ordinance’s reach to fighting words within the meaning of Chaplinsky. It also rejected the claim that the ordinance was impermissibly content-based, because it was narrowly tailored to serve a compelling governmental interest. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed.]

I

[We] accept the Minnesota Supreme Court’s authoritative statement that the ordinance reaches only those expressions that constitute “fighting words” within the meaning of Chaplinsky. [Assuming,] arguendo, that all of the expression reached by the ordinance is proscribable under the “fighting words” doctrine, we nonetheless conclude that the ordinance is facially unconstitutional in that it [prohibits] speech solely on the basis of the subjects the speech addresses.

The First Amendment generally prevents government from proscribing speech [because] of disapproval of the ideas expressed. Content-based regulations are presumptively invalid. From 1791 to the present, however, our society [has] permitted restrictions upon the content of speech in a few limited areas, which are “of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality.” [Chaplinsky.] [We] have sometimes said that these categories of expression are “not within the area of constitutionally protected speech.” [Such] statements must be taken in context, however. [What] they mean is that these areas of speech can, consistently with the First Amendment, be regulated because of their constitutionally proscribable content (obscenity, defamation, etc.)—not that they are categories of speech entirely invisible to the Constitution, so that they may be made the vehicles for content discrimination unrelated to their distinctively proscribable content. Thus, the government may proscribe libel; but it may not make the further content discrimination of proscribing only libel critical of the government, [and although a city may proscribe obscenity, it may not prohibit] only those legally obscene works that contain criticism of the city government....

Even the prohibition against content discrimination [is] not absolute. It applies differently in the context of proscribable speech than in the area of fully protected speech. [When] the basis for the content discrimination consists entirely of the very reason the entire class of speech at issue is proscribable, no significant danger of idea or viewpoint discrimination exists. Such a reason, having been adjudged neutral enough to support exclusion of the entire class of speech from First Amendment protection, is also neutral enough to form the basis of distinction within the class. To illustrate: A State might choose to prohibit only that obscenity which is the most patently offensive in its prurience —i.e., that which involves the most lascivious displays of sexual activity. But it may not prohibit, for example, only that obscenity which includes offensive political messages. And the Federal Government can criminalize only those threats of violence that are directed against the President—since the reasons why threats of violence are outside the First Amendment (protecting individuals from the fear of violence, from the disruption that fear engenders, and from the possibility that the threatened violence will occur) have special force when applied to the person of the President. But the Federal Government may not criminalize only those threats against the President that mention his policy on aid to inner cities. And to take a final example, [a] State may choose to regulate price advertising in one industry but not in others, because the risk of fraud (one of the characteristics of commercial speech that justifies depriving it of full First Amendment protection), is in its view greater there. But a State may not prohibit only that commercial advertising that depicts men in a demeaning fashion....

II

Applying these principles to the St. Paul ordinance, we conclude that, even as narrowly construed by the Minnesota Supreme Court, the ordinance is facially unconstitutional. Although the phrase in the ordinance, “arouses anger, alarm or resentment in others,” has been limited by the Minnesota Supreme Court’s construction to reach only those symbols or displays that amount to “fighting words,” the remaining, unmodified terms make clear that the ordinance applies only to “fighting words” that insult, or provoke violence, “on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender.” Displays containing abusive invective, no matter how vicious or severe, are permissible unless they are addressed to one of the specified disfavored topics. Those who wish to use “fighting words” in connection with other ideas—to express hostility, for example, on the basis of political affiliation, union membership, or homosexuality—are not covered. The First Amendment does not permit St. Paul to impose special prohibitions on those speakers who express views on disfavored subjects.

In its practical operation, moreover, the ordinance goes even beyond mere content discrimination, to actual viewpoint discrimination. Displays containing some words—odious racial epithets, for example—would be prohibited to proponents of all views. But “fighting words” that do not themselves invoke race, color, creed, religion, or gender—aspersions upon a person’s mother, for example—would seemingly be usable ad libitum in the placards of those arguing in favor of racial, color, etc. tolerance and equality, but could not be used by that speaker’s opponents. One could hold up a sign saying, for example, that all “anti-Catholic bigots” are misbegotten; but not that all “papists” are, for that would insult and provoke violence “on the basis of religion.” St. Paul has no such authority to license one side of a debate to fight freestyle, while requiring the other to follow Marquis of Queensbury Rules.

What we have here [is] a prohibition of fighting words that contain (as the Minnesota Supreme Court repeatedly emphasized) messages of “bias-motivated” hatred and in particular, as applied to this case, messages “based on virulent notions of racial supremacy.” One must wholeheartedly agree with the Minnesota Supreme Court that “it is the responsibility, even the obligation, of diverse communities to confront such notions in whatever form they appear,” but the manner of that confrontation cannot consist of selective limitations upon speech. St. Paul’s brief asserts that a general “fighting words” law would not meet the city’s needs because only a content-specific measure can communicate to minority groups that the “group hatred” aspect of such speech “is not condoned by the majority.” The point of the First Amendment is that majority preferences must be expressed in some fashion other than silencing speech on the basis of its content....

The content-based discrimination reflected in the St. Paul ordinance [does] not fall within the exception for content discrimination based on the very reasons why the particular class of speech at issue (here, fighting words) is proscribable. [The] reason why fighting words are categorically excluded from the protection of the First Amendment is not that their content communicates any particular idea, but that their content embodies a particularly intolerable (and socially unnecessary) mode of expressing whatever idea the speaker wishes to convey. St. Paul has not singled out an especially offensive mode of expression—it has not, for example, selected for prohibition only those fighting words that communicate ideas in a threatening (as opposed to a merely obnoxious) manner. Rather, it has proscribed fighting words of whatever manner that communicate messages of racial, gender, or religious intolerance. Selectivity of this sort creates the possibility that the city is seeking to handicap the expression of particular ideas....

Finally, St. Paul [argues] that, even if the ordinance regulates expression based on hostility towards its protected ideological content, this discrimination is nonetheless justified because it is narrowly tailored to serve compelling state interests. Specifically, [it asserts] that the ordinance helps to ensure the basic human rights of members of groups that have historically been subjected to discrimination, including the right of such group members to live in peace where they wish. We do not doubt that these interests are compelling, and that the ordinance can be said to promote them. But the “danger of censorship” presented by a facially content-based statute requires that that weapon be employed only where it is “necessary to serve the asserted [compelling] interest.” The existence of adequate content-neutral alternatives thus “undercuts significantly” any defense of such a statute, casting considerable doubt on the government’s protestations that “the asserted justification is in fact an accurate description of the purpose and effect of the law.” The dispositive question in this case, therefore, is whether content discrimination is reasonably necessary to achieve St. Paul’s compelling interests; it plainly is not. An ordinance not limited to the favored topics, for example, would have precisely the same beneficial effect. In fact the only interest distinctively served by the content limitation is that of displaying the city council’s special hostility towards the particular biases thus singled out. That is precisely what the First Amendment forbids....

Let there be no mistake about our belief that burning a cross in someone’s front yard is reprehensible. But St. Paul has sufficient means at its disposal to prevent such behavior¹ without adding the First Amendment to the fire.

The judgment of the Minnesota Supreme Court is reversed....

JUSTICE WHITE, with whom JUSTICE BLACKMUN and JUSTICE O’CONNOR join, and with whom JUSTICE STEVENS joins except as to Part I(A), concurring in the judgment....

A

This Court’s decisions have plainly stated that expression falling within certain limited categories so lacks the values the First Amendment was designed to protect that the Constitution affords no protection to that expression. [Nevertheless], the majority holds that the First Amendment protects those narrow categories of expression long held to be undeserving of First Amendment protection—at least to the extent that lawmakers may not regulate some fighting words more strictly than others because of their content. [It] is inconsistent to hold that the government may proscribe an entire category of speech because the content of that speech is evil; but that the government may not treat a subset of that category differently without violating the First Amendment; the content of the subset is by definition worthless and undeserving of constitutional protection....

II

Although I disagree with the Court's analysis, I do agree with its conclusion: The St. Paul ordinance is unconstitutional. However, I would decide the case on overbreadth grounds. [In] construing the St. Paul ordinance, the Minnesota Supreme Court drew upon the definition of fighting words that appears in Chaplinsky—words “which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace.” [The court also stated, however,] “the ordinance censors only those displays that one knows or should know will create anger, alarm or resentment based on racial, ethnic, gender or religious bias.” [Our] fighting words cases have made clear, however, that such generalized reactions are not sufficient to strip expression of its constitutional protection. The mere fact that expressive activity causes hurt feelings, offense, or resentment does not render the expression unprotected. [Citing, e.g., Cohen v. California; Terminiello v. Chicago.] [Thus, although] the ordinance reaches conduct that is unprotected, it also makes criminal expressive conduct that causes only hurt feelings, offense, or resentment, and is protected by the First Amendment. The ordinance is therefore fatally overbroad and invalid on its face.

...

JUSTICE BLACKMUN, concurring in the judgment.

I regret what the Court has done in this case. [I] fear that the Court has been distracted from its proper mission by the temptation to decide the issue over “politically correct speech” and “cultural diversity,” neither of which is presented here. [I] see no First Amendment values that are compromised by a law that prohibits hoodlums from driving minorities out of their homes by burning crosses on their lawns, but I see great harm in preventing the people of Saint Paul from specifically punishing the race-based fighting words that so prejudice their community.

I concur in the judgment, however, because I agree with Justice White that this particular ordinance reaches beyond fighting words to speech protected by the First Amendment.

JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring in the judgment....

[The] St. Paul ordinance regulates [fighting words] not on the basis of [content], but rather on the basis of the harm the speech causes. [Contrary] to the Court's suggestion, the ordinance regulates [a] subcategory of expression that causes injuries based on "race, color, creed, religion or gender," not a subcategory that involves discussions [of] those characteristics. [Moreover], even if the St. Paul ordinance did regulate fighting words based on its subject matter, such a regulation would, in my opinion, be constitutional. [Subject matter restrictions] generally do not raise the same concerns of government censorship and the distortion of public discourse presented by viewpoint regulations. [Contrary] to the suggestion of the majority, the St. Paul ordinance does not regulate expression based on viewpoint. [The] St. Paul ordinance is evenhanded. In a battle between advocates of tolerance and advocates of intolerance, the ordinance does not prevent either side from hurling fighting words at the other on the basis of their conflicting ideas, but it does bar both sides from hurling such words on the basis of the target's "race, color, creed, religion or gender." To extend the Court's pugilistic metaphor, the St. Paul ordinance simply bans punches "below the belt"—by either party. It does not, therefore, favor one side of any debate....

WISCONSIN v. MITCHELL, 508 U.S. 476 (1993). After viewing the motion picture Mississippi Burning, in which a white man beat a young black who was praying, Mitchell, who is black, urged a group of blacks to assault a young white boy who happened to be walking by. The group, including Mitchell, beat the white boy severely. Mitchell was convicted of aggravated battery, which ordinarily carries a maximum sentence of two years' imprisonment. But because the jury found that Mitchell had intentionally selected his victim because of the boy's race, the maximum sentence for his offense was increased to seven years under the state's hate-crime penalty enhancement statute, which enhances the maximum penalty for an offense whenever the defendant "intentionally selects the person against whom the crime...is committed...because of the race, religion, color, disability, sexual orientation, national origin or ancestry of that person." The Court overturned the holding of the Wisconsin Supreme Court that the statute violated the first amendment. Chief Justice Rehnquist delivered the opinion for a unanimous Court:

"[A] physical assault is not by any stretch of the imagination expressive conduct protected by the First Amendment. [But this does not end the matter, for] although the statute punishes criminal conduct, it enhances the maximum penalty for conduct motivated by a discriminatory point of view more severely than the same conduct engaged in for some other reason or for no reason at all. Because the only reason for the enhancement is the defendant's discriminatory motive for selecting his victim, Mitchell argues (and the Wisconsin Supreme Court held) that the statute violates the First Amendment by punishing offenders' bigoted beliefs. [But] motive plays the same role under the Wisconsin statute as it does under federal and state antidiscrimination [laws]. Title VII, for example, makes it unlawful for an employer to discriminate against an employee 'because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.' [In Hishon v. King & Spalding, 467 U.S. 69 (1984), we] rejected the argument that Title VII infringed employers' First Amendment rights....

"Nothing in our decision last Term in R.A.V. compels a different result here, [for] whereas the ordinance struck down in R.A.V. was explicitly directed at expression (i.e., 'speech' or 'messages'), the statute in this case is aimed at conduct unprotected by the First Amendment. Moreover, the Wisconsin statute singles out for enhancement bias-inspired conduct because this conduct is thought to inflict greater individual and societal harm. For example, according to the [State], bias-motivated crimes are more likely to provoke retaliatory crimes, inflict distinct emotional harms on their victims, and incite community unrest. The State's desire to redress these perceived harms provides an adequate explanation for its penalty-enhancement provision over and above mere disagreement with offenders' beliefs or biases."

Note: R.A.V. and Mitchell

1. Variations on R.A.V.

a. Consider the following law: "No public official may sue for libel for any statement concerning the performance of her official duties." Is this distinguishable from R.A.V.? If so, is it because the "content discrimination is based on the very reason why the particular class of speech at issue is proscribable"? Is it because the state can adequately justify the exemption of defamatory statements concerning the performance of a public official's duties from the "content-neutral" alternative of restricting all defamatory statements governed by New York Times v. Sullivan?

b. After R.A.V., how would you assess the constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. §241, which prohibits any person to "injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate" others in the enjoyment of their civil rights, as applied to a white who burns a cross in front of a black's home?

c. The civil rights laws prohibit an employer from firing an employee because of her race, even though the employer may fire her for many other reasons. Are the civil rights laws invalid after R.A.V. because they penalize the employer for his political convictions? That is, if the employer fires an employee because he does not like blacks he is penalized, but if he fires an employee because he does not like Democrats, he is not. Why is R.A.V. different? Because the employer is not engaged in “speech”?

d. In United States v. Alvarez, section D1 supra, Justices Alito, Scalia and Thomas voted to uphold the Stolen Valor Act. Can their position be squared with R.A.V.?

2. Hate speech and viewpoint-discrimination. The Court in R.A.V. makes clear that laws banning hate speech are unconstitutional because they constitute viewpoint discrimination. In that light, consider Matal v. Tam, 582 U.S. --- (2017). “Slants” is a derogatory term for persons of Asian descent. Simon Tam, lead singer of the rock group “The Slants,” whose members are Asian-Americans, chose the name in order to “reclaim” the term and drain it of its denigrating force. The federal Patent and Trademark Office denied Tam’s application for federal trademark registration of the name because it violated a federal law prohibiting the registration of any trademarks that “disparage...or bring...into contemp[t] or disrepute” any “persons, living or dead.”

In a plurality opinion joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Breyer and Thomas, Justice Alito concluded that even though the statute did not forbid a specific viewpoint, but forbade any trademark that disparaged or brought into contempt or disrepute any person or group, it nonetheless constituted unconstitutional “viewpoint discrimination.” Alito explained that although the statute “evenhandedly prohibits disparagement of all groups,” and “applies equally to marks that damn Democrats and Republicans, capitalists and socialists, and those arrayed on both sides of every possible issue,” it nonetheless constituted “viewpoint discrimination” because “giving offense is a viewpoint.” In short, he concluded, it was well established that “the public expression of ideas may not be prohibited merely because the ideas are themselves offensive to some of their hearers.” Indeed, “no matter how the point is phrased, its unmistakable thrust is this: The Government has no interest in preventing speech expressing ideas that offend.” Thus, “[s]peech that demeans on the basis of race, ethnicity, gender, religion, age, disability, or any other similar ground is hateful, but the proudest boast of our free speech jurisprudence is that we protect the freedom to express ‘the thought that we hate.’”

In a separate concurring opinion, Justice Kennedy, joined by Justices Ginsburg, Sotomayor, and Kagan, agreed. Kennedy explained that because the statute “reflects the Government’s disapproval of a subset of messages it finds offensive,” it embodies “the essence of viewpoint discrimination.” Although the government argued that “the law is viewpoint neutral because it applies in equal measure to any trademark that demeans or offends,” that argument “misses the point.” “To prohibit all sides from criticizing their opponents makes a law more viewpoint based, not less so.” “The danger of viewpoint discrimination,” Kennedy added, “is that the government is attempting to remove certain ideas or perspectives from a broader debate. That danger is all the greater if the ideas or perspectives are ones a particular audience might think offensive.”

3. Mitchell and R.A.V. On what principle is Mitchell consistent with R.A.V.? Is the difference that, unlike the defendant in Mitchell, the cross-burner was engaged in “speech”? But if cross-burning is “speech,” why isn’t the act of beating an individual “because of his race” speech as well? After all, the assault “communicates” the defendant’s views both to the victim and to observers. Is the assault not “speech” within the meaning of the first amendment because the message is communicated by conduct rather than by words? But then what of cross-burning? Is the difference that in R.A.V. the harm was caused by the communicative element of the conduct, whereas in Mitchell the harm was caused directly by the conduct itself? But would any of the harms identified by the Court in Mitchell to justify the enhanced punishment arise if the act did not communicate a message of racial hatred? On the problem of symbolic expression, see section E3 infra.

4. Harassment in the workplace. Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act prohibits discrimination in conditions of employment by race, religion, national origin, and sex. Courts have held that various kinds of harassment at work can be so severe that an employee effectively suffers from “discrimination” within the meaning of title VII. Such harassment generally takes two forms. First, there is quid pro quo harassment. This typically arises when an employer conditions an individual’s hiring, promotion, or continued employment on sexual involvement, as when a supervisor tells an employee that he will fire her unless she has sex with him. This sort of harassment is generally regarded as an explicit threat that, at least in this context, is not protected by the first amendment.

The second form of harassment is more complex. It may arise when an employer or coworker creates a situation in which the work environment becomes hostile or abusive. Consider the following situations: (a) A white supervisor repeatedly says that black workers are lazy. (b) A male employee repeatedly compliments a female employee on her appearance. (c) Christian employees post pictures of Jesus at their workstations, over the objections of Jewish employees. (d) Male employees post pictures of naked women at their workstations, over the objections of female employees. To what extent, and on what theories, can the government constitutionally prohibit such speech?

Consider the following arguments: (a) Workplace harassment is not speech. It is discrimination. (b) The workplace is for work, not speech. (c) Workplace harassment is private conversation, not public discourse. (d) Workers are a captive audience. (e) Workplace harassment is of “low” first amendment value. For further discussion of workplace harassment, see Estlund, Freedom of Expression in the Workplace and the Problem of Discriminatory Harassment, 75 Tex. L. Rev. 687 (1997); Fallon, Sexual Harassment, Content-Neutrality, and the First Amendment Dog That Didn’t Bark, 1994 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1; Volokh, Freedom of Speech and Workplace Harassment, 39 UCLA L. Rev. 1791 (1992); Strauss, Sexist Speech in the Workplace, 25 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L. Rev. 1 (1990).

Virginia v. Black

538 U.S. 343 (2003)

JUSTICE O’CONNOR announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, and III, and an opinion with respect to Parts IV and V, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, JUSTICE STEVENS, and JUSTICE BREYER join.

In this case we consider whether the Commonwealth of Virginia’s statute banning cross burning with “an intent to intimidate a person or group of persons” violates the First Amendment. Va. Code Ann. §18.2-423 (1996). We conclude that while a State, consistent with the First Amendment, may ban cross burning carried out with the intent to intimidate, the provision in the Virginia statute treating any cross burning as prima facie evidence of intent to intimidate renders the statute unconstitutional....

I

Respondents Barry Black, Richard Elliott, and Jonathan O’Mara were convicted separately of violating Virginia’s cross-burning statute, §18.2-423. That statute provides:

It shall be unlawful for any person or persons, with the intent of intimidating any person or group of persons, to burn, or cause to be burned, a cross on the property of another, a highway or other public place....Any such burning of a cross shall be prima facie evidence of an intent to intimidate a person or group of persons.

On August 22, 1998, Barry Black led a Ku Klux Klan rally in Carroll

County, Virginia. Twenty-five to thirty people attended this gathering, which occurred on private property with the permission of the owner, who was in attendance. The property was located on an open field....

When the sheriff of Carroll County learned that a Klan rally was occurring in his county, he went to observe it from the side of the road. During the approximately one hour that the sheriff was present, about 40 to 50 cars passed the site, a "few" of which stopped to ask the sheriff what was happening on the property. [Rebecca] Sechrist, who was related to the owner of the property where the rally took place, "sat and watched to see what [was] going on" from the lawn of her in-laws' house. She looked on as the Klan prepared for the gathering and subsequently conducted the rally itself.

During the rally, Sechrist heard Klan members speak about "what they were" and "what they believed in." The speakers "talked real bad about the blacks and the Mexicans." One speaker told the assembled gathering that "he would love to take a .30/.30 and just random[ly] shoot the blacks." The speakers also talked about "President Clinton and Hillary Clinton," and about how their tax money "goes to...the black people." Sechrist testified that this language made her "very...scared."

At the conclusion of the rally, the crowd circled around a 25- to 30-foot cross. The cross was between 300 and 350 yards away from the road. According to the sheriff, the cross "then all of a sudden...went up in a flame." As the cross burned, the Klan played Amazing Grace over the loudspeakers. Sechrist stated that the cross burning made her feel "awful" and "terrible."

When the sheriff observed the cross burning, he informed his deputy that they needed to "find out who's responsible and explain to them that they cannot do this in the State of Virginia." The sheriff then went down the driveway, entered the rally, and asked "who was responsible for burning the cross." Black responded, "I guess I am because I'm the head of the rally." The sheriff then told Black, "[T]here's a law in the State of Virginia that you cannot burn a cross and I'll have to place you under arrest for this."

Black was charged with burning a cross with the intent of intimidating a person or group of persons, in violation of §18.2-423. At his trial, the jury was instructed that "intent to intimidate means the motivation to intentionally put a person or a group of persons in fear of bodily harm. Such fear must arise from the willful conduct of the accused rather than from some mere temperamental timidity of the victim." The trial court also instructed the jury that "the burning of a cross by itself is sufficient evidence from which you may infer the required intent." [The] jury found Black guilty, and fined him $2,500. The Court of Appeals of Virginia affirmed Black's conviction.

On May 2, 1998, respondents Richard Elliott and Jonathan O'Mara, as well as a third individual, attempted to burn a cross on the yard of James Jubilee. Jubilee, an African-American, was Elliott's next-door neighbor in Virginia Beach, Virginia. Four months prior to the incident, Jubilee and his family had moved from California to Virginia Beach. Before the cross burning, Jubilee spoke to Elliott's mother to inquire about shots being fired from behind the Elliott home. Elliott's mother explained to Jubilee that her son shot firearms as a hobby, and that he used the backyard as a firing range.

On the night of May 2, respondents drove a truck onto Jubilee's property, planted a cross, and set it on fire. Their apparent motive was to "get back" at Jubilee for complaining about the shooting in the backyard. Respondents were not affiliated with the Klan. The next morning, as Jubilee was pulling his car out of the driveway, he noticed the partially burned cross approximately 20 feet from his house. After seeing the cross, Jubilee was "very nervous" because he "didn't know what would be the next phase," and because "a cross burned in your yard...tells you that it's just the first round."

Elliott and O'Mara were charged with attempted cross burning and conspiracy to commit cross burning. O'Mara pleaded guilty to both counts, reserving the right to challenge the constitutionality of the cross-burning statute. The judge sentenced O'Mara to 90 days in jail and fined him $2,500. The judge also suspended 45 days of the sentence and $1,000 of the fine. At Elliott's trial, the judge [instructed] the jury that the Commonwealth must prove that "the defendant intended to commit cross burning," that "the defendant did a direct act toward the commission of the cross burning," and that "the defendant had the intent of intimidating any person or group of persons." The court did not instruct the jury on the meaning of the word "intimidate," nor on the prima facie evidence provision of §18.2-423. The jury found Elliott guilty of attempted cross burning and acquitted him of conspiracy to commit cross burning. It sentenced Elliott to 90 days in jail and a $2,500 fine. The Court of Appeals of Virginia affirmed the convictions of both Elliott and O'Mara. O'Mara v. Commonwealth, 33 Va. App. 525, 535 S.E. 2d 175 (2000).

Each respondent appealed to the Supreme Court of Virginia, arguing that §18.2-423 is facially unconstitutional. The Supreme Court of Virginia consolidated all three cases, and held that the statute is unconstitutional on its face. 262 Va. 764, 553 S.E. 2d 738 (2001). It held that the Virginia cross-burning statute "is analytically indistinguishable from the ordinance found unconstitutional in [R.A.V. v. St. Paul]. The Virginia statute, the court held, discriminates on the basis of content since it "selectively chooses only cross burning because of its distinctive message." The court also held that the prima facie evidence provision renders the statute overbroad because “[t]he enhanced probability of prosecution under the statute chills the expression of protected speech.”...

II

...Burning a cross in the United States is inextricably intertwined with the history of the Ku Klux Klan. [Since at least 1905], cross burnings have been used to communicate both threats of violence and messages of shared ideology. [Often] the Klan used cross burnings as a tool of intimidation and a threat of impending violence. For example, [in] 1941, the Klan burned four crosses in front of a proposed housing project, declaring, “We are here to keep niggers out of your town....When the law fails you, call on us.” [These] threats had special force given the long history of Klan violence. [The] Klan continued to use cross burnings to intimidate after World War II. [These] incidents of cross burning, among others, helped prompt Virginia to enact its first version of the cross-burning statute in 1950....

Throughout the history of the Klan, cross burnings have also remained potent symbols of shared group identity and ideology. The burning cross became a symbol of the Klan itself and a central feature of Klan gatherings. [The] Klan has often published its newsletters and magazines under the name The Fiery Cross. [At] Klan gatherings across the country, cross burning became the climax of the rally or the initiation. [Throughout] the Klan’s history, the Klan continued to use the burning cross in their ritual ceremonies. [For] its own members, the cross was a sign of celebration and ceremony....

To this day, regardless of whether the message is a political one or whether the message is also meant to intimidate, the burning of a cross is a “symbol of hate.” And while cross burning sometimes carries no intimidating message, at other times the intimidating message is the only message conveyed. For example, when a cross burning is directed at a particular person not affiliated with the Klan, the burning cross often serves as a message of intimidation, designed to inspire in the victim a fear of bodily harm. Moreover, the history of violence associated with the Klan shows that the possibility of injury or death is not just hypothetical. The person who burns a cross directed at a particular person often is making a serious threat, meant to coerce the victim to comply with the Klan’s wishes unless the victim is willing to risk the wrath of the Klan. Indeed, as the cases of respondents Elliott and O’Mara indicate, individuals without Klan affiliation who wish to threaten or menace another person sometimes use cross burning because of this association between a burning cross and violence.

In sum, while a burning cross does not inevitably convey a message of intimidation, often the cross burner intends that the recipients of the message fear for their lives. And when a cross burning is used to intimidate, few if any messages are more powerful.

A...

The protections afforded by the First Amendment [are] not absolute, and we have long recognized that the government may regulate certain categories of expression consistent with the Constitution. The First Amendment permits “restrictions upon the content of speech in a few limited areas, which are ‘of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality.’” [R.A.V., quoting Chaplinsky]....

Thus, for example, a State may punish [a] “true threat.” [Watts.] “True threats” encompass those statements where the speaker means to communicate a serious expression of an intent to commit an act of unlawful violence to a particular individual or group of individuals. The speaker need not actually intend to carry out the threat. Rather, a prohibition on true threats “protect[s] individuals from the fear of violence” and “from the disruption that fear engenders,” in addition to protecting people “from the possibility that the threatened violence will occur.” Intimidation in the constitutionally proscribable sense of the word is a type of true threat, where a speaker directs a threat to a person or group of persons with the intent of placing the victim in fear of bodily harm or death. Respondents do not contest that some cross burnings fit within this meaning of intimidating speech, and rightly so. As noted in Part II, supra, the history of cross burning in this country shows that cross burning is often intimidating, intended to create a pervasive fear in victims that they are a target of violence.

B

The Supreme Court of Virginia ruled that in light of R.A.V., even if it is constitutional to ban cross burning in a content-neutral manner, the Virginia cross-burning statute is unconstitutional because it discriminates on the basis of content and viewpoint. It is true [that] the burning of a cross is symbolic expression. The reason why the Klan burns a cross at its rallies, or individuals place a burning cross on someone else's lawn, is that the burning cross represents the message that the speaker wishes to communicate. Individuals burn crosses as opposed to other means of communication because cross burning carries a message in an effective and dramatic manner.

The fact that cross burning is symbolic expression, however, does not resolve the constitutional question. [In] R.A.V., we held that a local ordinance that banned certain symbolic conduct, including cross burning, when done with the knowledge that such conduct would “arouse anger, alarm or resentment in others on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender” was unconstitutional. We held that the ordinance did not pass constitutional muster because it discriminated on the basis of content by targeting only those individuals who “provoke violence” on a basis specified in the law. The ordinance did not cover “[t]hose who wish to use ‘fighting words’ in connection with other ideas—to express hostility, for example, on the basis of political affiliation, union membership, or homosexuality.” This content-based discrimination was unconstitutional because it allowed the city “to impose special prohibitions on those speakers who express views on disfavored subjects.”

We did not hold in R.A.V. that the First Amendment prohibits all forms of content-based discrimination within a proscribable area of speech. Rather, we specifically stated that some types of content discrimination did not violate the First Amendment: “When the basis for the content discrimination consists entirely of the very reason the entire class of speech at issue is proscribable, no significant danger of idea or viewpoint discrimination exists. Such a reason, having been adjudged neutral enough to support exclusion of the entire class of speech from First Amendment protection, is also neutral enough to form the basis of distinction within the class.”

Indeed, we noted that it would be constitutional to ban only a particular type of threat: “[T]he Federal Government can criminalize only those threats of violence that are directed against the President...since the reasons why threats of violence are outside the First Amendment...have special force when applied to the person of the President.” And a State may “choose to prohibit only that obscenity which is the most patently offensive in its prurience—i.e., that which involves the most lascivious displays of sexual activity.” Consequently, while the holding of R.A.V. does not permit a State to ban only obscenity based on “offensive political messages,” or “only those threats against the President that mention his policy on aid to inner cities,” the First Amendment permits content discrimination “based on the very reasons why the particular class of speech at issue...is proscribable."

Similarly, Virginia's statute does not run afoul of the First Amendment insofar as it bans cross burning with intent to intimidate. Unlike the statute at issue in R.A.V., the Virginia statute does not single out for opprobrium only that speech directed toward "one of the specified disfavored topics." It does not matter whether an individual burns a cross with intent to intimidate because of the victim's race, gender, or religion, or because of the victim's "political affiliation, union membership, or homosexuality."...

The First Amendment permits Virginia to outlaw cross burnings done with the intent to intimidate because burning a cross is a particularly virulent form of intimidation. Instead of prohibiting all intimidating messages, Virginia may choose to regulate this subset of intimidating messages in light of cross burning's long and pernicious history as a signal of impending violence. Thus, just as a State may regulate only that obscenity which is the most obscene due to its prurient content, so too may a State choose to prohibit only those forms of intimidation that are most likely to inspire fear of bodily harm. A ban on cross burning carried out with the intent to intimidate is fully consistent with our holding in R.A.V. and is proscribable under the First Amendment.

IV

The Supreme Court of Virginia ruled in the alternative that Virginia's cross-burning statute was unconstitutionally overbroad due to its provision stating that "[a]ny such burning of a cross shall be prima facie evidence of an intent to intimidate a person or group of persons." [The] Supreme Court of Virginia has... stated that "the act of burning a cross alone, with no evidence of intent to intimidate, [will] suffice for arrest and prosecution and will insulate the Commonwealth from a motion to strike the evidence at the end of its case-in-chief."...

The prima facie evidence provision...renders the statute unconstitutional. [The] prima facie provision strips away the very reason why a State may ban cross burning with the intent to intimidate. The prima facie evidence provision permits a jury to convict in every cross-burning case in which defendants exercise their constitutional right not to put on a defense. And even where a defendant [presents] a defense, the prima facie evidence provision makes it more likely that the jury will find an intent to intimidate regardless of the particular facts of the case. The provision permits the Commonwealth to arrest, prosecute, and convict a person based solely on the fact of cross burning itself.

It is apparent that the provision as so interpreted "would create an unacceptable risk of the suppression of ideas.’’ The act of burning a cross may mean that a person is engaging in constitutionally proscribable intimidation. But that same act may mean only that the person is engaged in core political speech. The prima facie evidence provision in this statute blurs the line between these two meanings of a burning cross. As interpreted by the jury instruction, the provision chills constitutionally protected political speech because of the possibility that a State will prosecute—and potentially convict—somebody engaging only in lawful political speech at the core of what the First Amendment is designed to protect.

As the history of cross burning indicates, a burning cross is not always intended to intimidate. Rather, sometimes the cross burning is a statement of ideology, a symbol of group solidarity. It is a ritual used at Klan gatherings, and it is used to represent the Klan itself. Thus, “[b]urning a cross at a political rally would almost certainly be protected expression.” . . .

The prima facie provision makes no effort to distinguish among these different types of cross burnings. It [may] be true that a cross burning, even at a political rally, arouses a sense of anger or hatred among the vast majority of citizens who see a burning cross. But this sense of anger or hatred is not sufficient to ban all cross burnings. [The] prima facie evidence provision in this case ignores all of the contextual factors that are necessary to decide whether a particular cross burning is intended to intimidate. The First Amendment does not permit such a shortcut....

JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring.

Cross burning with “an intent to intimidate” unquestionably qualifies as the kind of threat that is unprotected by the First Amendment. For the reasons stated in the separate opinions that Justice White and I wrote in R.A.V., that simple proposition provides a sufficient basis for upholding the basic prohibition in the Virginia statute even though it does not cover other types of threatening expressive conduct. With this observation, I join Justice O’Connor’s opinion.

JUSTICE THOMAS, dissenting.

In every culture, certain things acquire meaning well beyond what outsiders can comprehend. That goes for both the sacred, see Texas v. Johnson [section E3 infra] (describing the unique position of the American flag in our Nation’s 200 years of history), and the profane. I believe that cross burning is the paradigmatic example of the latter.

Although I agree with the majority’s conclusion that it is constitutionally permissible to “ban...cross burning carried out with intent to intimidate,” I believe that the majority errs in imputing an expressive component to the activity in question. [In] our culture, cross burning has almost invariably meant lawlessness and understandably instills in its victims well-grounded fear of physical violence. [This] statute prohibits only conduct, not expression. And, just as one cannot burn down someone's house to make a political point and then seek refuge in the First Amendment, those who hate cannot terrorize and intimidate to make their point. In light of my conclusion that the statute here addresses only conduct, there is no need to analyze it under any of our First Amendment tests. [Because] I would uphold the validity of this statute, I respectfully dissent.*

JUSTICE SOUTER, with whom JUSTICE KENNEDY and JUSTICE GINSBURG join, concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part.

I agree with the majority that the Virginia statute makes a content-based distinction within the category of punishable intimidating or threatening expression, [but] I disagree that [the Virginia statute can be saved even in part] from unconstitutionality under the holding in R.A.V.....

The [prohibition] of cross burning with intent to intimidate selects a symbol with particular content from the field of all proscribable expression meant to intimidate. [The] issue is whether the statutory prohibition restricted to this symbol falls within one of the exceptions to R.A.V.'s general condemnation of limited content-based proscription within a broader category of expression proscribable generally. [R.A.V.] defines the special virulence exception [this] way: prohibition by subcategory [is] constitutional if it is made "entirely" on the "basis" of "the very reason" that "the entire class of speech at issue is proscribable" at all. The Court explained that when the subcategory is confined to the most obviously proscribable instances, "no significant danger of idea or viewpoint discrimination exists."....

The first example of permissible distinction is for a prohibition of obscenity unusually offensive "in its prurience." [Distinguishing] obscene publications on this basis does not suggest discrimination on the basis of the message conveyed. The opposite is true, however, when a general prohibition of intimidation is rejected in favor of a distinct proscription of intimidation by cross burning. The cross may have been selected because of its special power to threaten, but it may also have been singled out because of disapproval of its message of white supremacy, either because a legislature thought white supremacy was a pernicious doctrine or because it found that dramatic, public espousal of it was a civic embarrassment. Thus, there is no kinship between the cross-burning statute and the core prurience example.

Nor does this case present any analogy to the statute prohibiting threats against the President. [The] content discrimination in that statute [reflects] the special risks and costs associated with threatening the President. Again, however, threats against the President are not generally identified by reference to the content of any message that may accompany the threat, let alone any viewpoint, and there is no obvious correlation in fact between victim and message. [Differential] treatment of threats against the President, then, selects nothing but special risks, not special messages. A content-based proscription of cross burning, on the other hand, may be a subtle effort to ban not only the intensity of the intimidation cross burning causes when done to threaten, but also the particular message of white supremacy that is broadcast even by nonthreatening cross burning. [I] thus read R.A.V.'s examples of the particular virulence exception as covering prohibitions that are not clearly associated with a particular viewpoint, and that are consequently different from the Virginia statute....

Note: R.A.V. and Black

Consider the following views:

- a. Schauer, Intentions, Conventions, and the First Amendment: The Case of Cross-Burning, 2003 Sup. Ct. Rev. 197, 206–208:

[Because] Justice O'Connor saw the Virginia statute as singling [out] intimidation with special intimidating power, she concluded [that] the statute was [a] constitutionally permissible prohibition on unprotected intimidation. [But] a closer look at the dynamics of what causes cross-burning to be especially intimidating [makes] the Court's distinction between Black and R.A.V. difficult to accept. What makes cross-burning more intimidating than, say, flag-burning or leaf-burning, [is] a function of the racist [point] of view it embodies. [Virginia's] belief that burning a cross is especially intimidating is based solely on the viewpoint-based judgment that symbols with one point of view have effects that symbols with another point of view do not have.

- b. Gey, A Few Questions About Cross Burning, Intimidation, and Free Speech, 80 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1287, 1373–1374 (2005):

Black is just one example of a disturbing [proliferation] of alternative First Amendment constructs to regulate antisocial speech. These constructs appear uncoordinated by any central principle and seem limited only by the ingenuity of plaintiffs and prosecutors in fitting familiar examples of antisocial speech into the new regulatory patterns. [Some] overriding constitutional framework is needed to limit the expansion of the new categories and constrain the use of flexible terms such as “intimidation” and “terrorism.” The Brandenburg [explicitness and immediate harm] paradigm was devised to serve precisely that function, if the courts would only use it.

c. In the incitement situation, the Court, following the lead of Judge Learned Hand in Masses, seems to require that for incitement of unlawful conduct to come within the low-value category of express incitement the incitement must be express. Is Black's treatment of threats consistent with that requirement? Is a burning cross an express threat? Does it make any sense to require express incitement but not express threats? See Taylor, Free Expression and Expressiveness, 33 N.Y.U. Rev. L. & Soc. Ch. 375 (2009). Is a noose on someone's front lawn equivalent to a burning cross?

Note: Pornography and the Victimization of Women

1. A model statute. Consider the constitutionality of the following law:

Pornography is the sexually explicit subordination of women, graphically depicted, whether in words or pictures, that also includes one or more of the following: (i) women are presented dehumanized as sexual objects, things or commodities; (ii) women are presented as sexual objects who enjoy pain, humiliation or rape; (iii) women are presented as sexual objects tied up or cut up or mutilated or physically hurt; (iv) women are presented in postures of sexual submission or sexual servility, including by inviting penetration; or (v) women are presented as whores by nature. No person may sell, exhibit, or distribute pornography.

2. Evaluation. Consider the following views:

a. MacKinnon, Not a Moral Issue, 2 Yale L. & Soc. Pol. Rev. 321, 322–324 (1984):

Obscenity law is concerned with morality, specifically morals from the male point of view, meaning the standpoint of male dominance. The feminist critique of pornography is politics, specifically politics from the women's point of view, meaning the standpoint of the subordination of women to men. Morality here means good and evil; politics means power and powerlessness. Obscenity is a moral idea; pornography is a political practice. The two concepts represent entirely different things. Nudity, explicitness, excess of candor, [these] qualities bother obscenity law when sex is depicted or portrayed. [Sex] forced on real women so that it can be sold at a profit to be forced on other real women; women's bodies trussed and maimed and raped and made into things to be hurt and obtained and accessed and this presented as the nature of women; the coercion that is visible and the coercion that has become invisible—this and more bothers feminists about pornography. Obscenity as such probably does little harm; pornography causes attitudes and behaviors of violence and discrimination which define the treatment and status of half of the population.

b. Clark, Liberalism and Pornography, in Pornography and Censorship 52–57 (D. Copp and S. Wendells eds. 1983):

[Pornography] has very little to do with sex, [but] it has everything to do with [the] use of sexuality as an instrument of active oppression. [Pornography is] a species of hate literature. [It depicts] women [as inviting] humiliating, degrading, and violently abusive [treatment]. [It feeds] traditional male fantasies [and glorifies] the traditional advantages men have enjoyed in relation to exploitation of female sexuality. [Pornography] is a method of socialization; [it] “teaches society to view women as less than human.” [It is thus an] affront to [the dignity of women] as equal persons. [Moreover,] role modeling has a powerful effect on human behavior. [People] tend to act out and operationalize the behavior that they see typically acted out around them.

See also A. Dworkin, Pornography: Men Possessing Women (1981); Take Back the Night: Women on Pornography (L. Lederer ed. 1980).

c. MacKinnon, Pornography, Civil Rights, and Speech, 20 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L. Rev. 1, 52–54 (1985):

Recent experimental research on pornography shows that [pornographic material may cause] measurable harm to women through increasing men's attitudes and behaviors of discrimination in both violent and nonviolent forms. Exposure to [pornography] increases men's immediately subsequent willingness to aggress against women under laboratory conditions. It [significantly] increases attitudinal measures known to correlate with rape, [such as] hostility toward women, [condoning] rape, and predicting that one would rape [if] one knows one would not get caught.

d. West, The Feminist-Conservative Anti-Pornography Alliance and the 1986 Attorney General's Commission on Pornography Report, 1987 Am. B. Found. Res. J. 681, 686, 691–692:

A woman-centered conception of pornography [has] two dimensions: for many women (perhaps most), pornography is primarily victimizing, threatening and oppressive, [but] for others [it] is on occasion liberating and transformative. [Indeed, some pornography assaults] a source of oppression: the marital, familial, productive, and reproductive values that the conservative wrongly identifies as necessary to the creation of a virtuous life and a virtuous society. [According] to women who enjoy pornography, the validation of pleasure, desire, and sexuality found in some pornography is [a] healthy attack on a stifling and oppressive societal denial of female sexuality. [It can be] something to celebrate, rather than something to condemn.

e. In American Booksellers Association v. Hudnut, 771 F.2d 323 (7th Cir. 1985), the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held unconstitutional an Indianapolis antipornography ordinance similar to the model antipornography law set forth above. The court of appeals accepted the factual premises of the ordinance, conceding that “depictions of subordination tend to perpetuate subordination,” and that the “subordinate status of women in turn leads to affront and lower pay at work, insult and injury at home, battery and rape on the streets.” The court of appeals observed, however, that “racial bigotry, anti-semitism, violence on television [and other forms of expression also] influence the culture and shape our socialization. [Yet] all is protected speech, however insidious. Any other answer leaves the government in control of all of the institutions of culture, the great censor and director of which thoughts are good for us.” Moreover, the court of appeals rejected the argument that pornography, as defined in the ordinance, is “low”-value speech: “True, pornography and obscenity have sex in common. But Indianapolis left out of its definition any reference to literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. [Moreover, although the Supreme] Court sometimes balances the value of speech against the costs of its restriction, [it] does this by category of speech and not by the content of particular works.” The Court emphasized that the Indianapolis ordinance expressly discriminated against a particular viewpoint: “Under the ordinance graphic sexually explicit speech is ‘pornography’ or not depending on the perspective the author adopts. Speech that ‘subordinates’ women [is] forbidden, [but speech] that portrays women in positions of equality is [lawful]. This is thought control. [Those] who espouse that approved view may use sexual images; those who do not, may not.” The court of appeals concluded that, because the ordinance “created an approved point of view,” it could not be defended as a restriction of only “low”-value speech. See also Stone, Anti-Pornography Legislation as Viewpoint Discrimination, 9 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y. 701 (1986). For the Supreme Court’s summary affirmance of Hudnut, see 475 U.S. 1001 (1986). The Canadian Supreme Court has unanimously upheld legislation that is similar to the model antipornography ordinance. See Butler v. Regina, File No. 22191 (1992).

f. Consider Posner, The Speech Market and the Legacy of Schenck, in L. Bollinger and G. Stone, Eternal Vigilance: Free Speech in the Modern Era 121, 136–137 (2002):

In the case of both pornography and hate speech, [one] has the sense that the desire to crack down on these forms of speech has little to do with demonstrable harms [but] with an ideological project—[that] of denying or occluding the existence of deep-seated differences between groups (in particular men and women, and blacks and whites). Hate speakers are vociferous deniers of equality, and pornography caters primarily to a specifically male interest in women as sexual playthings for men....Insofar as campaigns for the regulation of hate speech and pornography have the purpose and effect of correcting ideological or political “error,” giving them the backing of the law interferes arbitrarily with the market in ideas and opinions.

3. Alternative approaches. Consider the following:

a. Suppose a city enacted an ordinance that prohibited obscenity, which is concededly of “low” first amendment value, only insofar as it is also pornographic, within the meaning of the ordinance invalidated in Hudnut. Would such a law be constitutional? Recall R.A.V.

b. In light of Ferber, could the antipornography ordinance be justified on the ground that pornography harms women participants in the same way that child pornography harms children? Consider Note, Anti-Pornography Laws and First Amendment Values, 98 Harv. L. Rev. 460, 473 (1984): “Because the Court is probably not disposed to presume that adult models are incapable of refusing to participate in pornographic films or photographs, it is unlikely to reason that adult pornography [can] be banned irrespective of a work’s social merit.”

Note: “Low”-Value Speech—Final Thoughts

Has the doctrine of “low”-value speech injected the Court “into value judgments [foreclosed] to it by the basic theory of the First Amendment”? T. Emerson, The System of Free Expression 326 (1970). Reconsider the various categories of “low” or arguably “low”-value expression—express incitement, fighting words, threats, technical military information, false statements of fact, nonnewsworthy invasions of privacy, commercial speech, obscenity, offensive language, offensive sexually oriented expression, group defamation, hate speech, pornography. Has the Court developed a coherent theory of first amendment “value”? What considerations are relevant in deciding whether particular categories of expression constitute “low”-value speech?

Consider Sunstein, Pornography and the First Amendment, 1986 Duke L.J. 589, 603–604:

[In] determining whether speech qualifies as low-value, the cases suggest that four factors are relevant. First, the speech must be far afield from the central concern of the first amendment, which, broadly speaking, is effective popular control of public affairs. [Second], a distinction is drawn between cognitive and noncognitive aspects of speech. [Third], the purpose of the speaker is relevant: if the speaker is seeking to communicate a message, he will be treated more favorably than if he is not. Fourth, the various classes of low-value speech reflect judgments that in certain areas, government is unlikely to be acting for constitutionally impermissible reasons or producing constitutionally troublesome harms.

For a slightly different formulation, consider Stone, Sex, Violence and the First Amendment, 74 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1857, 1863–1864 (2007):

The Supreme Court has never offered a clearly-defined theory of low-value speech. The case law, however, suggests that several factors are relevant to the analysis. First, categories of low-value speech (for example, false statements of fact, threats, commercial advertising, fighting words, express incitement of unlawful conduct, and obscenity) do not primarily advance political discourse. Second, categories of low-value speech are not defined in terms of disfavored ideas or political viewpoints. Third, low-value speech usually has a strong noncognitive impact on its audience. Fourth, categories of low-value speech have long been regulated without undue harm to the overall system of free expression.

Does either of these four-factor analyses adequately explain (or at least describe) the Court’s decisions? Are these the right factors to consider? What role should the history of regulation of different categories of speech play in the “low”-value analysis? See Lakier, The Invention of Low-Value Speech, 128 Harv. L. Rev. 2166 (2015).

How would you assess the overall impact of the “low”-value doctrine? Have any of the restrictions upheld under this doctrine seriously threatened the system of free expression?

Consider the following evaluations:

(1) The Court’s use of the “low”-value theory “has been marked by vacillation and uncertainty.” It is a highly “result-oriented” approach that is susceptible to an endless expansion of the list of “low”-value categories “whenever another kind of expression [gains] a renewed disfavor.” To the extent that fighting words, commercial speech, obscenity, and libel are “subject to regulation, it should be because they cause harm and not because they are presumed to be low in communicative value.” Shaman, The Theory of Low-Value Speech, 48 S.M.U. L. Rev. 297, 339, 348 (1995).

(2) “The important line for resolving whether restrictions on the content of speech [should] receive highest scrutiny [should turn not on judgments about the ‘value’ of the speech, but on the distinction] between censorial and non-censorial theories of harm. [Censorial] restrictions are those that rest on the possibility that expression of a dangerous idea will cause social harm through the processing, influence, and spread of that idea or message. [Non-censorial] restrictions, on the other hand, [are directed at categories of speech such as libel, obscenity, child pornography, hate speech, animal cruelty videos, fighting words, violent video games, misogynistic pornography, and threats, that cause harm] by virtue of some kind of non-rational impact that the expression can be expected to have by its utterance, not dependent on any idea or message that it may also contain. [Once] a law is determined to fall on the non-censorial side of the [line], then it must still be justified and tested for scope and possible pretext, but without the heavy presumption of invalidity that comes with the suppression of ideas.” Brown, The Harm Principle and Free Speech, 89 S. Cal. L. Rev. 953 (2016).

(3) The “low”-value doctrine has served a salutary function, for it has operated as a critical “safety valve,” enabling the Court to deal sensibly with somewhat harmful, but relatively insignificant, speech without running the risk of diluting the protection accorded expression at the very heart of the guarantee.

(4) In the decades after Chaplinsky, defenders of free speech viewed the Chaplinsky dictum as an “unfortunate” invitation to the Court to make open-ended value judgments about which speech is and is not to be protected by the First Amendment. Indeed, Harry Kalven criticized it as a “broad dictum” that “haunted constitutional law.” H. Kalven, A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America 18 (1988). In light of the Roberts Court’s decisions in Stevens, Snyder, Brown, and Alvarez, however, the Chaplinsky dictum seems to have taken on a somewhat different cast. Indeed, one might say that the Roberts Court “has generally declined to expressly invoke Chaplinsky’s low-value [doctrine] as a rationale for enlarging the realm of unprotected expression” and instead has “moved in the opposite direction.” Collins, Exceptional Freedom: The Roberts Court, the First Amendment, and the New Absolutism, 76 Alb. L. Rev. 409, 424 (2013).

E. CONTENT-NEUTRAL RESTRICTIONS: LIMITATIONS ON THE MEANS OF COMMUNICATION AND THE PROBLEM OF CONTENT-NEUTRALITY

Content-neutral restrictions limit expression without regard to its content. They turn neither on their face nor as applied on the content or communicative impact of speech. Such restrictions encompass a broad spectrum of limitations on expressive activity, ranging from a prohibition on the use of loudspeakers, to a ban on billboards, to a limitation on campaign contributions, to a prohibition on the mutilation of draft cards. To what extent, and in what manner, do content-neutral restrictions implicate the concerns and values underlying the first amendment? How do they differ in this regard from content-based restrictions? Should the doctrines devised to govern content-based restrictions also govern content-neutral restrictions? In exploring these and related questions, this section begins with a search for general principles and then examines four specific areas: the right to a public forum; symbolic speech; regulation of the electoral process; and litigation, association, and the right not to speak. Throughout, this section questions the meaning of “content-neutrality” and tests the occasionally elusive line between content-based and content-neutral restrictions.

1. General Principles

SCHNEIDER v. STATE, 308 U.S. 147 (1939). Appellants, who distributed leaflets on a public street announcing a protest meeting, were convicted of violating an ordinance prohibiting any person to distribute leaflets in “any street or way.” The Court held the ordinance invalid. Justice Roberts delivered the opinion:

“Municipal authorities, as trustees for the public, have the duty to keep their communities’ streets open and available for movement of people and property, the primary purpose to which the streets are dedicated. So long as legislation to this end does not abridge the constitutional liberty of one rightfully upon the street to impart information through speech or the distribution of literature, it may lawfully regulate the conduct of those using the streets. For example, a person could not exercise this liberty by taking his stand in the middle of a crowded street, contrary to traffic regulations, and maintain his position to the stoppage of all traffic; [nor] does the guarantee of freedom of speech or of the press deprive a municipality of power to enact regulations against throwing literature broadcast in the streets. Prohibition of such conduct would not abridge the constitutional liberty since such activity bears no necessary relationship to the freedom to speak, write, print or distribute information or opinion.

“This court has characterized the freedom of speech and freedom of press as fundamental personal rights and liberties. [Mere] legislative preferences or beliefs respecting matters of public convenience may well support regulation directed at other personal activities, but be insufficient to justify such as diminishes the exercise of rights so vital to the maintenance of democratic institutions. And so, as cases arise, the delicate and difficult task falls upon the courts to weigh the circumstances and to appraise the substantiality of the reasons advanced in support of the regulation of the free enjoyment of the rights.

“[The] legislation under attack [is designed to prevent littering]. Although the alleged offenders were not charged with themselves scattering paper in the streets, their convictions were sustained upon the theory that distribution by them [resulted] in such littering. We are of opinion that the purpose to keep the streets clean and of good appearance is insufficient to justify an ordinance which prohibits a person rightfully on a public street from handing literature to one willing to receive it. Any burden imposed upon the city authorities in cleaning and caring for the streets as an indirect consequence of such distribution results from the constitutional protection of the freedom of speech and press. This constitutional protection does not deprive a city of all power to prevent street littering. There are obvious methods of preventing littering. Amongst these is the punishment of those who actually throw papers on the streets....

“It is suggested that the [ordinance is] valid because [its] operation is limited to streets and alleys and leaves persons free to distribute printed matter in other places. [But] the streets are natural and proper places for the dissemination of information and opinion; and one is not to have the exercise of his liberty of expression in appropriate places abridged on the plea that it may be exercised in some other place.”

MARTIN v. CITY OF STRUTHERS, 319 U.S. 141 (1943). Appellant, a Jehovah’s Witness, went to the homes of strangers, knocking on doors and ringing doorbells in order to distribute leaflets advertising a religious meeting. She was convicted of violating a municipal ordinance prohibiting any person “to ring the doorbell [or] otherwise summon the inmate [of] any residence [for] the purpose of [distributing] handbills.” The Court held the ordinance invalid. Justice Black delivered the opinion of the Court:

“We are faced [with] the necessity of weighing the conflicting interests of the appellant in the civil rights she claims, as well as the right of the individual householder to determine whether he is willing to receive her message, against the interest of the community which by this ordinance offers to protect the interests of all its citizens, whether particular citizens want that protection or not. [In] considering legislation which thus limits the dissemination of knowledge, we [must] ‘weigh the circumstances [and] appraise the substantiality of the reasons advanced in support of the regulation.’ [Schneider.]...

“While door to door distributors of literature may be either a nuisance or a blind for criminal activities, they may also be useful members of society engaged in the dissemination of ideas in accordance with the best tradition of free discussion. The widespread use of this method of communication by many groups espousing various causes attests its major importance. [Door] to door distribution of circulars is essential to the poorly financed causes of little people.

“Freedom to distribute information to every citizen whenever he desires to receive it is so clearly vital to the preservation of a free society that, putting aside reasonable police and health regulations of time and manner of distribution, it must be fully preserved. [Traditionally] the American law punishes persons who enter onto the property of another after having been warned by the owner to keep off. [Thus], the city may make it an offense for any person to ring the bell of a householder who has appropriately indicated that he is unwilling to be disturbed. This or any similar regulation leaves the decision as to whether distributors of literature may lawfully call at a home where it belongs—with the homeowner himself. [Because] the dangers of distribution can so easily be controlled by traditional legal methods, [the challenged ordinance] can serve no purpose but that forbidden by the Constitution, the naked restriction of the dissemination of ideas.”

Justice Frankfurter filed a separate opinion: “[The] ordinance before us [penalizes only] the distribution of ‘literature.’ [It does not penalize door-to-door canvassing for other purposes, such as the sale of pots and pans.] The Court’s opinion leaves one in doubt whether prohibition of [all door-to-door canvassing] would be deemed an infringement of free speech. It would be fantastic to suggest that a city has power [to] forbid house-to-house canvassing generally, but the Constitution prohibits the inclusion in such prohibition of door-to-door [distribution of] printed matter." Is Justice Frankfurter right that this would be a different case?

KOVACS v. COOPER, 336 U.S. 77 (1949). In Kovacs, the Court, in a five-to-four decision, upheld a city ordinance prohibiting any person to use any sound truck or other instrument that emits "loud and raucous noises" on any public street. Justice Reed wrote a plurality opinion: "City streets are recognized as a normal place for the exchange of [ideas]. But this does not mean the freedom is beyond all control. We think it is a permissible exercise of legislative discretion to bar sound [trucks], amplified to a loud and raucous volume, from the public ways of municipalities. [That] more people may be more easily and cheaply reached by sound trucks [is] not enough to call forth constitutional protection for what those charged with public welfare reasonably think is a nuisance when easy means of publicity are open."

Justice Frankfurter concurred in the result: "Surely there is not a constitutional right to force unwilling people to listen. [So] long as a legislature does not prescribe what ideas may be noisily expressed, [it] is not for us to supervise the limits it may impose in safeguarding the steadily narrowing opportunities for serenity and reflection."

Justice Black, joined by Justices Douglas and Rutledge, dissented: "The basic premise of the First Amendment is that all present instruments of communication, as well as others that inventive genius may bring into being, shall be free from governmental censorship or prohibition. Laws which hamper the free use of some instruments of communication [favor] competing channels. Thus, [laws] like [this] ordinance can give an overpowering influence to views of owners of legally favored instruments of communication. [There] are many people who have ideas that they wish to disseminate but who do not have enough money to own or control publishing plants, newspapers, radios, moving picture studios, or chains of show places. [Transmission] of ideas through public speaking is [thus] essential to the sound thinking of a fully informed citizenry. [And] it is an obvious fact that public speaking today without sound amplifiers is a wholly inadequate way to reach the people on a large scale...."

"I am aware that the 'blare' of this new method of carrying ideas is susceptible of abuse and may under certain circumstances constitute an intolerable nuisance. But ordinances can be drawn which adequately protect a community from unreasonable use of public speaking devices without absolutely denying to the community's citizens all information that may be disseminated or received through this new avenue for trade in ideas. [A] city ordinance that reasonably restricts the volume of sound, or the hours during which an amplifier may be used, does not, in my mind, infringe the constitutionally protected area of free speech. [But the challenged] ordinance [is] an absolute prohibition of all uses of an amplifier on any of the streets of [the city].”

METROMEDIA, INC. v. SAN DIEGO, 453 U.S. 490 (1981). A San Diego ordinance banned virtually all billboards. Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Blackmun, argued that the ordinance was unconstitutional: “[The] practical effect of the San Diego ordinance is to eliminate the billboard as an effective medium of communication. [Thus, it is necessary to assess] the ‘substantiality of the governmental interests asserted’ and ‘whether those interests could be served by means that would be less intrusive on activity protected by the First Amendment.’ [Schneider; Struthers.] Applying that test to the instant case, I would invalidate the San Diego ordinance. [First], although I have no quarrel with the substantiality of the city’s interest in traffic safety, the city has failed to come forward with evidence demonstrating that billboards actually impair traffic safety in San Diego. [Second], the city has failed to show that its asserted interest in aesthetics is sufficiently substantial in the commercial and industrial areas of San Diego....

“It is no doubt true that the appearance of certain areas of the city would be enhanced by the elimination of billboards, but ‘it is not immediately [apparent]’ that their elimination in all other areas as well would have more than a negligible impact on aesthetics. [A] billboard is not necessarily inconsistent with oil storage tanks, blighted areas, or strip development. Of course, it is not for a court to impose its own notion of beauty on San Diego. But before deferring to a city’s judgment, a court must be convinced that the city is seriously and comprehensively addressing aesthetic concerns with respect to its environment. Here, San Diego has failed to demonstrate a comprehensive coordinated effort in its commercial and industrial areas to address other obvious contributors to an unattractive environment. In this sense the ordinance is underinclusive.”

Justice Stevens disagreed: “[The] net effect of the city’s ban on billboards will be a reduction in the total quantity of communication in San Diego. [But that does not in itself render the ordinance invalid.] Graffiti [is] an inexpensive means of communicating [to] large numbers of people; some creators of graffiti have no effective alternative means of publicly expressing themselves. Nevertheless, I believe a community has the right to decide that its interests [in] securing beautiful surroundings outweigh the countervailing interest in uninhibited expression by means of words and pictures in public places....

“It seems to be accepted by all that a zoning regulation excluding billboards from residential neighborhoods is justified by the interest in maintaining pleasant surroundings and enhancing property values. The same interests are at work in commercial and industrial zones, [for the] character of the environment affects property values and the quality of life not only for the suburban resident but equally so for the individual who toils in a factory or invests his capital in industrial properties.

“Because the legitimacy of the interests [is] beyond dispute, [the] constitutionality of the prohibition of outdoor advertising involves two separate questions. First, is there any reason to believe that the regulation is biased in favor of one point of view? Second, is it fair to conclude that the market which remains open for the communication [of] ideas is ample and not threatened with gradually increasing restraints? In this case, there is not even a hint of bias or censorship in the city’s actions. Nor is there any reason to believe that the overall communications market in San Diego is inadequate. [Thus,] nothing in this record suggests that the ordinance poses a threat to the interests protected by the First Amendment.” Chief Justice Burger and Justice Rehnquist agreed with Justice Stevens because “there has been no suggestion that billboards [advance] any particular viewpoint or issue disproportionately.” The remaining justices found it unnecessary to address this issue.

CITY OF LADUE v. GILLEO, 512 U.S. 43 (1994). In a unanimous opinion, the Court held that a city could not constitutionally prohibit homeowners from displaying signs on their property. The purpose of the ordinance was to minimize “visual clutter.” At issue was respondent’s desire to place on her front lawn a 24-by-36-inch sign printed with the words “Say No to War in the Persian Gulf, Call Congress Now.” Justice Stevens delivered the opinion of the Court:

“Ladue has almost completely foreclosed a venerable means of communication that is both unique and important. [Although] prohibitions foreclosing entire media may be completely free of content or viewpoint discrimination, the danger they pose to freedom of speech is readily apparent—by eliminating a common means of speaking, such measures can suppress too much speech....

“Ladue contends, however, that its ordinance is a mere regulation of the ‘time, place, or manner’ of speech because residents remain free to convey their desired messages by other means, such as hand-held signs, ‘letters, handbills, flyers, telephone calls, newspaper advertisements, bumper stickers, speeches, and neighborhood or community meetings.’ However, even regulations [of] time, place, or manner [must] ‘leave open ample alternative channels for communication.’ In this case, we are not persuaded that adequate substitutes exist for the important medium of speech that Ladue has closed off.

“Displaying a sign from one’s own residence often carries a message quite distinct from placing the same sign someplace else, or conveying the same text or picture by other means. Precisely because of their location, such signs provide information about the identity of the ‘speaker.’ [Moreover, residential] signs are an unusually cheap and convenient form of communication. Especially for persons of modest means or limited mobility, a yard or window sign may have no practical substitute....

“A special respect for individual liberty in the home has long been part of our culture and our law; that principle has special resonance when the government seeks to constrain a person’s ability to speak there. Most Americans would be understandably dismayed, given that tradition, to learn that it was illegal to display from their window [a] sign expressing their political views....

“Our decision [by] no means leaves the City powerless to address the ills that may be associated with residential signs. [We] are not confronted here with mere regulations short of a ban. [We] are confident that more temperate measures could in large part satisfy Ladue’s stated regulatory needs without harm to the First Amendment rights of its citizens. As currently framed, however, the ordinance abridges those rights.”

BARTNICKI v. VOPPER, 532 U.S. 514 (2001). During contentious collective-bargaining negotiations between a union representing teachers at a public high school and the local school board, an unidentified person intercepted and recorded a cell phone conversation between the union negotiator and the union president. Vopper, a radio commentator, played a tape of the intercepted conversation on his public affairs talk show in connection with news reports about the settlement. The Court held that Vopper could not be held liable for damages under federal or state wiretap laws for broadcasting the unlawfully recorded phone call.

Justice Stevens delivered the opinion of the Court. The Court accepted that the information on the tapes had been obtained unlawfully by an unknown party, that Vopper had played no part in the illegal interception, that he knew or should have known that the phone call had been intercepted unlawfully, and that “the subject matter of the conversation was a matter of public concern.”

The Court explained that the relevant statutes, which prohibited the unauthorized disclosure of unlawfully intercepted communications, were “content-neutral” laws of general applicability. The Court then defined the issue as follows: “Where the punished publisher of information has obtained the information [in] a manner lawful in itself but from a source who has obtained it unlawfully, may the government punish the ensuing publication of that information?” The Court explained that, as a general proposition, “if a newspaper unlawfully obtains truthful information about a matter of public significance then [government] officials may not constitutionally punish publication of the information, absent a need of the highest order,” [quoting Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Co.].

The Court identified “two interests served by the statutes—first, the interest in removing an incentive for parties to intercept private conversations, and second, the interest in minimizing the harm to persons whose conversations have been illegally intercepted.” With respect to the first of these interests, the Court reasoned that “the normal method of deterring unlawful conduct is to impose an appropriate punishment on the person who engages in it. If the sanctions that presently attach to [these unlawful acts] do not provide sufficient deterrence, perhaps those sanctions should be made more severe. But it would be quite remarkable to hold that speech by a law-abiding possessor of information can be suppressed in order to deter conduct by a non-law abiding third party.”

The Court conceded that the second interest “is considerably stronger” because “privacy of communications is an important interest” and “the fear of public disclosure of private conversations might well have a chilling effect on private speech.” Without deciding whether there might be some circumstances in which the privacy interest is “strong enough to justify the application” of the statutes, such as when there is disclosure of a trade secret or “domestic gossip [of] purely private concern,” the Court held that the enforcement of the statutes in this case “implicates core purposes of the First Amendment because it imposes sanctions on the publication of truthful information of public concern.” In such circumstances, “privacy concerns give way when balanced against the interest in publishing matters of public importance.” Justice Breyer, joined by Justice O’Connor, filed a concurring opinion.

Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justices Scalia and Thomas, dissented: “[The] Court’s decision diminishes, rather than enhances, the purposes of the First Amendment: chilling the speech of the millions of Americans who rely upon electronic technology to communicate each day. [These] laws are content-neutral; they only regulate information that was illegally obtained; they do not restrict republication of what is already in the public domain; they impose no special burdens upon the media; they have a scienter requirement to provide fair warning; and they promote the privacy and free speech of those using cellular telephones. [These] laws should [be] upheld if they further a substantial governmental interest unrelated to the suppression of free speech, and they do.”

Note: The Search for Principles

1. Balancing. Is “balancing” underprotective of free speech? Should content-neutral restrictions be governed by the same standards as content-based restrictions? Consider Redish, The Content Distinction in First Amendment Analysis, 34 Stan. L. Rev. 113, 128 (1981):

The most puzzling aspect of the distinction between content-based and content-neutral restrictions is that either restriction reduces the sum total of information or opinion disseminated. That governmental regulation impedes all forms of speech, rather than only selected viewpoints or subjects, does not alter the fact that the regulation impairs the free flow of expression. Whatever rationale one adopts for the constitutional protection of speech, the goals behind that rationale are undermined by any limitation on expression, content-based or not.

Consider the following responses: (a) Content-based restrictions generally are more dangerous than content-neutral restrictions because they are more likely significantly to distort the “marketplace of ideas.” (b) Content-based restrictions are more dangerous than content-neutral restrictions because they are more likely to be enacted for the constitutionally impermissible purpose of suppressing “erroneous,” “undesirable,” or “unpopular” ideas. (c) Content-based restrictions are more dangerous than content-neutral restrictions because they are more likely to restrict speech because of its “communicative impact” (i.e., because of government’s fear of how people will react to the content of the speaker’s message).

For further commentary on the content-based/content-neutral distinction, see Ely, Flag Desecration: A Case Study in the Roles of Categorization and Balancing in First Amendment Analysis, 88 Harv. L. Rev. 1482 (1975); Stephan, The First Amendment and Content Discrimination, 68 Va. L. Rev. 203 (1982); Stone, Content-Neutral Restrictions, 54 U. Chi. L. Rev. 46 (1987); Williams, Content Discrimination and the First Amendment, 139 U. Pa. L. Rev. 615 (1991); Kagan, Private Speech, Public Purpose: The Role of Governmental Motive in First Amendment Doctrine, 63 U. Chi. L. Rev. 415, 446–463 (1996) (arguing that the concern with improper government motivation best explains the content-based/content-neutral distinction). For a critique of the Court’s use of “intermediate scrutiny” across a broad range of First Amendment issues, see Bhagwat, The Test that Ate Everything: Intermediate Scrutiny in First Amendment Jurisprudence, 2007 U. Ill. L. Rev. 783.

2. Striking the balance. If content-neutral restrictions are tested by “balancing,” what factors should be weighed in the balance? Consider the following propositions:

- a. Although “the purpose to keep the streets clean and of good appearance is insufficient to justify” a prohibition on leafleting, the first amendment does not “deprive a municipality of power to enact regulations against throwing literature broadcast in the streets [since] such activity bears no necessary relationship to the freedom to speak, write, print or distribute information or opinion.”
- b. “[One] is not to have the exercise of his liberty of expression in appropriate places abridged on the plea that it may be exercised in some other place.” Suppose a city permits soapbox orators to make public speeches in only four of its six municipal parks.
- c. “That more people may be more easily and cheaply reached by sound trucks [is] not enough to call forth constitutional protection for what those charged with public welfare reasonably think is a nuisance when [alternative] means of publicity are open.” Is this consistent with b? Should the existence of alternative means of communication affect the balance?
- d. “The dangers of [door-to-door distribution of leaflets] can so easily be controlled by traditional legal methods [that] stringent prohibition can serve no purpose but [the] naked restriction of the dissemination of ideas.” Should it matter that the state may be able to achieve part or all of its goals through alternative means that may have a less restrictive effect on expression?
- e. “It would be fantastic to suggest that a city has power [to] forbid house-to-house canvassing generally, but that the Constitution prohibits the inclusion in such prohibition of door-to-door [distribution of] printed matter.” Should it matter whether a law specifically restricts expression or restricts a broader range of activities in a manner that has only an incidental effect on expression?
- f. “There has been no suggestion that billboards heretofore have advanced any particular viewpoint or issue disproportionately....Thus, the ideas billboard advertisers have been presenting are not relatively disadvantaged vis-à-vis the messages of those who heretofore have chosen other methods of spreading their views.” Should it matter whether a content-neutral restriction has “content-differential” effects?

Note: The Meaning of “Content-Neutrality”

In most cases, a law’s content-neutrality is self-evident. There are several situations, however, in which the matter is more complex:

1. Communicative impact. A law may be content-neutral on its face but may turn in application on communicative impact—that is, “on how people will react to what the speaker is saying.” J. Ely, Democracy and Distrust 111 (1980). Consider, for example, a law declaring it unlawful for any person to “disturb the peace” by making any public speech that “may cause a hostile audience response.” Although such laws are “neutral” on their face, the Court has analyzed them as content-based because it is the content of the message that triggers the restriction. Recall, for example, Terminiello, Cantwell, and Edwards, section B2 supra. For analysis of this issue, see Stone, Content Regulation and the First Amendment, 25 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 189, 207–217 (1983); Rubenfeld, The First Amendment’s Purpose, 53 Stan. L. Rev. 767 (2001).

2. Secondary effects. A law may be content-based on its face but may be defended in terms that are unrelated to communicative impact. In Renton, section D7, supra, for example, the Court characterized a zoning ordinance that restricted the location of movie theaters that exhibit movies emphasizing “specified sexual activities” as “content-neutral” because it was defended not in terms of the communicative impact of the restricted expression but in terms of “the secondary effects of such theaters on the surrounding community.” As noted in section D7, however, in its decisions since Renton the Court seems to have backed away from this approach. See Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312 (1988); City of Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, 507 U.S. 410 (1993); City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, 535 U.S. 425 (2002); Reed v. Town of Gilbert, 135 S. Ct. 2218 (2015). Indeed, in Reed the Court made clear that a “law that is content-based on its face” must be treated as content-based “regardless of the government’s...content-neutral justification” for the restriction. See Lakier, Reed v. Town of Gilbert, Arizona, and the Rise of the Anticlassificatory First Amendment, 2016 Sup. Ct. Rev. 233, noting that Reed effectively overruled the Court’s prior decisions that had suggested that “a law that made facial content distinctions” should be analyzed as content-neutral if “it could be justified by reference to a content-neutral purpose.”

3. Impermissible motive. A law may be content-neutral on its face but may have been enacted with the purpose of suppressing a particular message. Consider, for example, a law prohibiting any person to destroy a draft card, enacted for the purpose of punishing those individuals who publicly burn their draft cards to protest national policy. For analysis of this issue, see section E3 infra.

Consider McDonald, Speech and Distrust: Rethinking the Content Approach to Protecting the Freedom of Expression, 81 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1347, 1387 (2006):

Consider [laws] currently being enacted by states that prohibit picketing and demonstrating within a certain distance of funerals shortly before and after a service. These laws are being passed in response to an alleged pastor and members of a church who are using funerals of American soldiers killed in Iraq as opportunities to get out their message that the war and soldiers' deaths constitute divine retribution for the country's tolerant attitude towards homosexuals. Apparently, the church group assembles across the street from such funerals, engaging in expletive-laden chants and displaying signs containing messages such as "Thank God for Dead Soldiers," "Thank God for IEDs" (improvised explosive devices that frequently kill soldiers), and "God Hates Fags."

Should such laws be analyzed as content-based or content-neutral? In Reed v. Town of Gilbert, supra, the Court made clear that "facially content neutral" laws "will be considered content-based" if they "were adopted by the government 'because of disagreement with the message [the speech] conveys.'" How should a court go about determining whether any particular law was adopted for such a reason?

4. Content-differential effects. Some laws are content-neutral on their face but have content-differential effects. Recall, for example, Justice Black's observation in Struthers that "door to door distribution of circulars is essential to the poorly financed causes of little people." To what extent should this factor convert a content-neutral regulation into one that is treated as content-based? See Williams, Content Discrimination and the First Amendment, 139 U. Pa. L. Rev. 615 (1991) (disparate impact should trigger content-based analysis); Stone, Content-Neutral Restrictions, 54 U. Chi. L. Rev. 46, 81–86 (1987) (disparate impact should merely be a relevant factor in content-neutral analysis).

5. Speaker-based restrictions. Is an injunction prohibiting specifically named antiabortion protestors from demonstrating near an abortion clinic content-based or content-neutral? In Madsen v. Women's Health Center, Inc., 512 U.S. 753 (1994), the Court held that such an injunction, issued after the specifically named petitioners had previously violated a narrower order enjoining them from blocking access to the clinic, was content-neutral:

We [reject] petitioners' contention that the [order is content-based because it] restricts only the speech of antiabortion protestors. [The] injunction, by its very nature, applies only to a particular group. [It] does so, however, because of the group's past actions in the context of a specific dispute. [The] fact that the injunction in the present case did not prohibit activities of those demonstrating in favor of abortion is justly attributable to the lack of any similar demonstrations by those in favor of abortion, and of any consequent request that their demonstrations be regulated by injunction. There is no suggestion [that] Florida law would not equally restrain similar conduct directed at a target having nothing to do with abortion; none of the restrictions [were] directed at the contents of petitioners' message. [The] state court imposed restrictions on petitioners incidental to their abortion message because they repeatedly violated the court's original order. That petitioners all share the same viewpoint regarding abortion does not in itself demonstrate that some invidious content or viewpoint-based purpose motivated the issuance of the order. It suggests only that those in the group whose conduct violated the court's order happen to share the same opinion regarding abortions being performed in the clinic.

Suppose the injunction had prohibited "any antiabortion protestor from demonstrating within thirty-six feet of an abortion clinic"? Would that be content-neutral? Speaker-based restrictions, which treat some speakers differently than others but define the distinction in terms other than content, do not fit neatly within the Court's content-based/content-neutral distinction. For example, suppose a city bans all door-to-door canvassing after 8:00 P.M., except for canvassing by veterans' groups. How should such a law be analyzed? For commentary on speaker-based restrictions, see Stone, Content Regulation, supra, at 244–251. See also Regan v. Taxation with Representation, Perry Educators' Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association, and Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, sections E2c and E2d, infra.

6. Content or not? In McCullen v. Coakley, 134 S. Ct. 2518 (2014), the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a Massachusetts statute that made it a crime for any person knowingly to stand on a "public way or sidewalk" within 35 feet of an entrance or driveway to any place, other than a hospital, where abortions are performed. The law was designed to eliminate clashes between abortion opponents and advocates of abortion rights that had occurred outside clinics where abortions were performed. The law was challenged by individuals "who approach and talk to women outside such facilities, attempting to dissuade them from having abortions." According to testimony presented at the trial, such individuals have, over time, "persuaded hundreds of women to forgo abortions." The Act exempted persons entering or leaving the facility, employees or agents of the facility, law enforcement and similar personnel, and persons using the sidewalk area solely for the purpose of reaching another destination. The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Roberts, invalidated the law as an unconstitutional content-neutral restriction of speech in a traditional public forum. This facet of the decision is examined in section 2a,

The challengers also argued, however, that the law was an unconstitutional content-based restriction because it applied only at facilities that performed abortions and therefore had a disparate impact on those who oppose abortion. Chief Justice Roberts rejected this argument:

To begin, the Act does not draw content based distinctions on its face. The Act would be content based if it required “enforcement authorities” to “examine the content of the message that is conveyed to determine whether” a violation has occurred. But it does not. Whether petitioners violate the Act “depends” not “on what they say,” but simply on where they say it. Indeed, petitioners can violate the Act merely by standing in a buffer zone, without displaying a sign or uttering a word.

It is true, of course, that by limiting the buffer zones to abortion clinics, the Act has the “inevitable effect” of restricting abortion-related speech more than speech on other subjects. But a facially-neutral law does not become content based simply because it may disproportionately affect speech on certain topics. [The] question in such a case is whether the law is “justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech.” [The] Massachusetts Act is. Its stated purpose is to “increase public safety at reproductive health care facilities.” [Obstructed] access and congested sidewalks are problems no matter what caused them. A group of individuals can obstruct clinic access and clog sidewalks just as much when they loiter as when they protest abortion or counsel patients....

[The challengers argue, however, that] by choosing to pursue these interests only at abortion clinics, [the] Massachusetts Legislature evinced a purpose to “single[] out for regulation speech about one particular topic: abortion.” We cannot infer such a purpose from the Act’s limited scope. [The] Massachusetts Legislature [enacted the statute] in response to a problem that was, in its experience, limited to abortion clinics. There was a record of crowding, obstruction, and even violence outside such clinics. There were apparently no similar recurring problems associated with other kinds of healthcare facilities [or other kinds of buildings or activities]. In light of the limited nature of the problem, it was reasonable for the Massachusetts Legislature to enact a limited solution. [W]e thus conclude that the Act is neither content nor viewpoint based and therefore need not be analyzed under strict scrutiny.

Justice Scalia, joined by Justices Kennedy and Thomas, filed a concurring opinion in which he maintained that the challenged statute “is content based and fails strict scrutiny”: “[It] blinks reality to say [that] a blanket prohibition on the use of streets and sidewalks where speech on only one politically controversial topic is likely to occur—and where that speech can most effectively be communicated—is not content based. Would the Court exempt from strict scrutiny a law banning access to the streets and sidewalks surrounding the site of the Republican National Convention? Or those used annually to commemorate the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery civil rights marches? Or those outside the Internal Revenue Service? Surely not....” Justice Alito also filed a concurring opinion arguing that the law was content-based and therefore unconstitutional. For a thoughtful analysis of McCullen, see Kendrick, Nonsense on Sidewalks: Content Discrimination in McCullen v. Coakley, 2014 Sup. Ct. Rev. 215.

2. Speech on Public Property: The Public Forum

In what circumstances, if any, does the first amendment guarantee the individual the right to commandeer publicly owned property for the purpose of exercising the freedom of speech? The Court has been highly solicitous of the right of owners of private property to prevent others from using their property for speech purposes. In Struthers, for example, the Court left no doubt that the city could constitutionally “punish those who call at a home in defiance of the previously expressed will of the occupant.” More generally, the Court has accepted the view that in most circumstances “an uninvited guest may [not] exercise general rights of free speech on property privately owned,” for it “would be an unwarranted infringement of property rights to require them to yield to the exercise of First Amendment rights.” Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551, 568, 567 (1972).

To what extent does the first amendment supersede the “property rights” of the state? Must the state “subsidize” speech by allowing individuals to use publicly owned property for speech purposes? For early commentary on the “public forum,” see Kalven, The Concept of the Public Forum: Cox v. Louisiana, 1965 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1; Stone, Fora Americana: Speech in Public Places, 1974 Sup. Ct. Rev. 233.

Public forum theory has evolved along two separate, but related, lines—one governing streets and parks, the other governing all other publicly owned property. The first two parts of this section track this distinction. The remaining two parts of this section examine the problem of inequality of access to public property for speech purposes.

a. The Public Forum: Streets and Parks

COMMONWEALTH v. DAVIS, 162 Mass. 510, 39 N.E. 113 (1895), aff'd sub nom. DAVIS v. MASSACHUSETTS, 167 U.S. 43 (1897). Davis, a preacher whose congregation apparently consisted of the crowds on the Boston Common, was convicted under a city ordinance that forbade, among other things, “any public address” on any publicly owned property “except in accordance with a permit from the mayor.” The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, speaking through Justice Holmes, affirmed the conviction. Justice Holmes explained that the ordinance “is directed against free speech generally, [whereas] in fact it is directed toward the modes in which Boston Common may be used,” and that, “as representative of the public,” the legislature “may and does exercise control over the use which the public may make of such places,” and for “the Legislature absolutely or conditionally to forbid public speaking in a highway or public park is no more an infringement of the rights of a member of the public than for the owner of a private house to forbid it in his house.” Since the legislature “may end the right of the public to enter upon the public place by putting an end to the dedication to public uses,” it necessarily “may take the lesser step of limiting the public use to certain purposes.”

On appeal, the Supreme Court unanimously embraced Justice Holmes’s position. Chief Justice White, speaking for the Court, maintained that the federal Constitution “does not have the effect of creating a particular and personal right in the citizen to use public property in defiance of the constitution and laws of the State.” Indeed, the “right to absolutely exclude all right to use, necessarily includes the authority to determine under what circumstances such use may be availed of, as the greater power contains the lesser.”*

Is this a satisfactory resolution of the public forum issue? Consider Stone, Fora Americana: Speech in Public Places, 1974 Sup. Ct. Rev. 233, 237: “[Under] the Holmes-White approach, the state possessed the power absolutely to prohibit the exercise of First Amendment rights [on] public property simply by asserting the prerogatives traditionally associated with the private ownership of land. [The] problem of the public forum had been ‘solved’ by resort to common law concepts of private property.”

HAGUE v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496 (1939). Forty-two years later, the Court reopened the question. In Hague, the Court considered the constitutionality of a municipal ordinance forbidding all public meetings in the streets and other public places without a permit. The city maintained that the ordinance was clearly constitutional under Davis. The dispute in Hague was a bitter one. Frank Hague, the Mayor of Jersey City, was a fierce opponent of the labor movement. Hague cast labor organizers and their defenders as “Communist interlopers,” and his “police force harassed, beat, and arrested agitators and shut down union picketing, meetings, and leafleting.” For a full telling of the Hague case, see L. Weinrib, The Taming of Free Speech 226–269 (2016). Although the Court did not directly decide the question presented in Hague, Justice Roberts, in a plurality opinion, flatly rejected the city’s contention in a dictum that has played a central role in the evolution of public forum theory:

Wherever the title of streets and parks may rest, they have immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and, time out of mind, have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thought between citizens, and discussing public questions. Such use of the streets and public places has, from ancient times, been a part of the privileges, immunities, rights, and liberties of citizens. The privilege of a citizen of the United States to use the streets and parks for communication of views on national questions may be regulated in the interest of all; it is not absolute, but relative, and must be exercised in subordination to the general comfort and convenience, and in consonance with peace and good order; but it must not, in the guise of regulation, be abridged or denied.

Consider Stone, supra, at 238:

Perhaps the most interesting aspect of the Roberts dictum is its implicit acceptance of the underlying premise of the Holmes-White position—that the public forum issue must be defined in terms of the common law property rights of the state. Rather than challenging that premise head-on, Roberts conveniently adapted it to his own advantage, predicating the public forum right upon established common law notions of adverse possession and public trust. [In effect, Roberts concluded that] the streets, parks, and similar public places are subject to what Professor Kalven has termed “a kind of First-Amendment easement.” [Citing Kalven, The Concept of the Public Forum: Cox v. Louisiana, 1965 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1, 13.] Since such places have been used, “time out of mind,” for purposes of speech and assembly, the Constitution now requires that their continued use for these purposes not “be abridged or denied.”

Is this a sound rationale for the right to a public forum? Note that the Roberts rationale creates by implication two distinct classes of public property. Although streets, parks, and similar public places may constitute public fora, publicly owned property that cannot satisfy the “time out of mind” requirement remains subject to the Davis dictum, and access to such places for purposes of speech and assembly may thus be denied absolutely upon the state’s naked assertion of title. Would it be preferable to base public forum theory on the notion that access to public property for speech purposes is essential to effective exercise of first amendment rights?

Consider C. Sunstein, republic.com 30–32 (2001):

[The] public forum doctrine promotes three important goals. First, it ensures that speakers can have access to a wide array of people. [It allows speakers] to press their concerns that might otherwise be ignored by their fellow citizens. [Second, the doctrine] allows speakers [to have access] to specific people and specific institutions with whom they have a complaint. [The] public forum doctrine ensures that you can make your views heard by legislators, for example, by protesting in front of the state legislature. [Third, the doctrine] increases the likelihood that people generally will be exposed to a wide variety of people and views. [It] tends to ensure a range of experiences that are widely shared [and] a set of exposures to diverse views. [These] exposures can help promote understanding.

SCHNEIDER v. STATE, 308 U.S. 147 (1939). In Schneider, section E1, supra, decided only eight months after Hague, the Court held that a city’s interest in keeping “the streets clean and of good appearance” was “insufficient” to justify a municipal ordinance prohibiting the distribution of leaflets on public property. Although the Court did not explicitly address the status of Davis, the impact of Hague and Schneider was made clear several years later in Jamison v. Texas, 318 U.S. 413 (1943), in which the Court, following Schneider, invalidated a city ordinance prohibiting the dissemination of leaflets. Relying on Davis, the city maintained that “it has the power absolutely to prohibit the use of the streets for the communication of ideas.” The Court responded: “This same argument, made in reliance upon the same decision, has been directly rejected by this Court. [Citing Justice Roberts’s concurring opinion in Hague.]”

Consider Kalven, supra, at 18–21:

The result [in Schneider] had an impressive bite. Leaflet distribution in public places in a city is a method of communication that carries as an inextricable and expected consequence substantial littering of the streets, which the city has an obligation to keep clean. It is also a method of communication of some annoyance to a majority of people so addressed; that its impact on its audience is very high is doubtful. Yet the constitutional balance in Schneider was struck emphatically in favor of keeping the public forum open for this mode of communication. [At stake in Schneider was] the immemorial claim of the free man to use the streets as a forum. [The state], the Court was telling us, must recognize the special nature and value of that claim to be on the street. [The] operative theory of the Court, at least for the leaflet situation, is that [the] right to use the streets as a public forum [cannot] be prohibited and can be regulated only for weighty reasons.

How does the Hague/Schneider theory of the public forum relate to the analysis of content-neutral restrictions generally? Consider the following propositions:

1. Although the Hague/Schneider theory holds that the property rights of the state do not in themselves permit the state absolutely to exclude expression from public property that has been used “time out of mind” for speech purposes, it does not hold that government property rights are irrelevant. Thus, content-neutral restrictions governing streets and parks should be tested by more lenient standards of justification than content-neutral restrictions that do not implicate the property rights of the state.

2. The Hague/Schneider theory holds that government property rights are irrelevant when the property has been used “time out of mind” for speech purposes. Thus, content-neutral restrictions governing streets and parks should be tested by the same standards of justification that are used to test content-neutral restrictions that do not implicate the property rights of the state.

3. The Hague/Schneider theory holds that the streets and parks are “public fora” in which the state must be especially solicitous of free expression. Thus, content-neutral restrictions governing streets and parks should be tested by more stringent standards of justification than content-neutral restrictions that do not implicate “public forum” rights.

Note: Regulating the Public Forum

1. Signs near a courthouse. In United States v. Grace, 461 U.S. 171 (1983), the Court invalidated a federal statute prohibiting any person to display on the public sidewalks surrounding the Supreme Court building “any flag, banner, or device designed [to] bring into public notice any party, organization or movement.” The Court explained that the “public sidewalks forming the perimeter of the Supreme Court grounds [are] public forums,” and that “the government's ability" to restrict expression in such places "is very limited." Indeed, "the government may enforce reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions" in public forums only if "the restrictions 'are content-neutral, are narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest, and leave open ample alternative channels of communication,'" and it may absolutely prohibit "a particular type of expression" only if the prohibition is "narrowly drawn to accomplish a compelling governmental interest."

The Court held that this statute could not be justified as a means "to maintain proper order and decorum" near the Supreme Court, for a "total ban" was not necessary to achieve these ends. And the restriction could not be justified as a means to prevent the appearance "that the Supreme Court is subject to outside influence," for the restriction did not "sufficiently serve" that purpose "to sustain its validity."

2. Noise near a school. In Grayned v. Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972), approximately two hundred demonstrators marched on a public sidewalk about one hundred feet from a public high school to protest the school's racial policies. Appellant, a participant in the demonstration, was convicted of violating a Rockford ordinance prohibiting any "person, while on public or private grounds adjacent to any building in which a school or any class thereof is in session, [to make] any noise or diversion which disturbs or tends to disturb the peace or good order of such school." The Court, in an eight-to-one decision, affirmed the conviction.

The Court explained that, although "the public sidewalk adjacent to school grounds may not be declared off limits for expressive activity, [such] activity may be prohibited if it 'materially disrupts classwork or involves substantial disorder or invasion of the rights of others.'" In this case, the Court held that the "antinoise" ordinance "is narrowly tailored to further Rockford's compelling interest in having an undisrupted school session conducive to the students' learning"; "punishes only conduct which disrupts or is about to disrupt normal school activities"; requires that the "decision [be] made [on] an individualized basis"; and "gives no license to punish anyone because of what he is saying." The Court concluded that "such a reasonable regulation is not inconsistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments."

3. Picketing near a home. In Frisby v. Shultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988), a group varying in size from eleven to forty people picketed in protest on six occasions within one month on the public street outside the residence of a doctor who performed abortions. The picketing was orderly and peaceful. Thereafter, the town enacted an ordinance that prohibited residential picketing that focuses on and takes place in front of a particular residence. The Court, in a six-to-three decision, upheld the ordinance.

Although emphasizing that “a public street does not lose its status as a traditional public forum because it runs through a residential neighborhood,” the Court nonetheless concluded that the ordinance was constitutional because it left “open ample alternative channels of communication” and was “narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest.” The Court found the first requirement “readily” satisfied because the ordinance left protestors free to march, proselytize door-to-door, leaflet, and even picket in a manner that did not focus exclusively on a particular residence.

As to the second requirement, the Court observed that “privacy of the home is [of] the highest order in a free and civilized society.” Moreover, the “type of picketers banned by [this ordinance] generally do not seek to disseminate a message to the general public, but to intrude upon the targeted resident, and to do so in an especially offensive way. [And] even if some such picketers have a broader communicative purpose, their activity nonetheless inherently and offensively intrudes on residential privacy.” Indeed, “even a solitary picket can invade residential privacy, [for the] target of the focused picketing banned by [this] ordinance is [a] ‘captive,’ [figuratively], and perhaps literally, trapped within the home.” The Court thus concluded that the ordinance was “narrowly tailored” because “the ‘evil’ of targeted residential picketing, ‘the very presence of an unwelcome visitor at the home,’ is ‘created by the medium of expression itself.’” Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens dissented.

4. Sleeping in a park. In Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288 (1983), the National Park Service permitted CCNV to erect symbolic tent cities, consisting of between twenty and forty tents, in Lafayette Park and on the Mall in Washington, D.C., for the purpose of conducting a round-the-clock demonstration designed to dramatize the plight of the homeless. Pursuant to a National Park Service regulation prohibiting “camping” in these parks, however, the Park Service prohibited CCNV demonstrators from sleeping overnight in the tents. The Court assumed arguendo “that overnight sleeping in connection with the demonstration is expressive conduct protected [by] the First Amendment,” but upheld the regulation as a “reasonable time, place, and manner restriction.”

The Court emphasized that the regulation is “content neutral,” that it does not prevent CCNV from demonstrating the “plight of the homeless [in] other ways,” and that it “narrowly focuses on the Government’s substantial interest in maintaining the parks [in] an attractive and intact condition.” The Court rejected CCNV’s argument that, once the Park Service decided to permit “the symbolic city of tents,” the “incremental benefit to the parks was insufficient to justify the ban on sleeping.” Justice Marshall, joined by Justice Brennan, dissented.

5. Noise in a park. In Ward v. Rock against Racism, 491 U.S. 781 (1989), the Court upheld a New York City regulation requiring the use of city-provided sound systems and technicians for concerts in the Bandshell in Central Park. The principal justification for the regulation was the city’s desire to control noise levels to avoid undue intrusion into other areas of the park and adjacent residential areas. The Court held that government clearly “ha[s] a substantial interest in protecting its citizens from unwelcome noise,” and that the regulation clearly leaves “open ample alternative channels of communication.” Justice Marshall, joined by Justices Brennan and Stevens, dissented.

6. Demonstrating near an abortion clinic. In Madsen v. Women’s Health Center, Inc., 512 U.S. 753 (1994), after petitioners repeatedly violated an injunction prohibiting them from blocking access to an abortion clinic and engaging in other activities that harassed patients and doctors both at the clinic and at their homes, a state court issued a new injunction prohibiting the petitioners from, inter alia, demonstrating within thirty-six feet of the clinic; making excessive noise near the clinic by “singing, chanting, whistling, shouting, yelling, use of bullhorns, auto horns [or] sound amplification equipment”; exhibiting “images observable” by patients within the clinic; approaching patients within three hundred feet of the clinic who did not voluntarily indicate a desire to speak with them; and demonstrating within three hundred feet of the residence of any of the clinic’s employees.

The Court upheld the thirty-six-foot buffer zone as a reasonable way to protect “access to the clinic” and the restriction on excessive noise because noise “control is particularly important around hospitals and medical facilities.” On the other hand, the Court invalidated the restriction on exhibiting “images observable” to patients within the clinic because the proper remedy is for the clinic to “pull its curtains.” It also invalidated that portion of the injunction that prohibited petitioners from “approaching any person seeking services of the clinic ‘unless such person indicates a desire to communicate’ in an area within 300 feet of the clinic.” The Court held that, “[absent] evidence that the protesters’ speech is independently proscribable (i.e., ‘fighting words’ or threats), [this] provision cannot stand.” Finally, the Court invalidated the provision enjoining petitioners from demonstrating within three hundred feet of the residences of clinic staff. The Court explained that “the 300-foot zone [is] much larger than the zone [upheld] in Frisby. [A] limitation of the time, duration of picketing, and number of pickets outside a smaller zone could have accomplished the desired result.”

7. Demonstrating near an abortion clinic II. In Schenck v. Pro-Choice

Network of Western New York, 519 U.S. 357 (1997), several abortion clinics in upstate New York were subjected to a series of large-scale blockades in which antiabortion protesters marched, stood, knelt, or lay in clinic parking lots and doorways, blocking cars from entering the lots and interfering with patients and clinic employees who attempted to enter the clinics. Smaller groups of protesters, called “sidewalk counselors,” crowded, jostled, pushed, and yelled and spit at women entering the clinics. Police officers who attempted to control the protests often were harassed by the protesters both verbally and by mail. A federal district court issued an injunction against fifty individuals and three organizations (including Operation Rescue), which, among other things, (a) prohibited them from demonstrating within fifteen feet of clinic doorways, parking lots, and driveways (“fixed buffer zones”); and (b) prohibited them from demonstrating within fifteen feet of any person or vehicle seeking access to or leaving a clinic (“floating buffer zones”).

In upholding the “fixed buffer zones,” the Court explained that, in light of the prior conduct of the protesters, the district court “was entitled to conclude” that fixed buffer zones were necessary to prevent the protesters from doing “what they had done before: aggressively follow and crowd individuals right up to the clinic door and then refuse to move, or purposefully mill around parking lot entrances in an effort to impede or block the progress of cars.” On the other hand, the Court invalidated the “floating buffer zones” because they would effectively prevent protesters “from communicating a message from a normal conversational distance or handing leaflets to people entering or leaving the clinics [on] the public sidewalks.”

8. Demonstrating near an abortion clinic III. In Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703 (2000), the Court, in a six-to-three decision, upheld a Colorado statute that makes it unlawful for any person within one hundred feet of a health care facility to “knowingly approach” within eight feet of another person, without that person’s consent, in order to pass “a leaflet or handbill to, [display] a sign to, or [engage] in oral protest, education, or counseling with, such other person.” Citing Frisby, the Court explained that although the right to free speech “includes the right to attempt to persuade others to change their views, and may not be curtailed simply because the speaker’s message may be offensive to his audience,” the “protection afforded to offensive messages does not always embrace offensive speech that is so intrusive that the unwilling audience cannot avoid it.” Indeed, “no one has a right to press even ‘good’ ideas on an unwilling recipient,” and “none of our decisions has minimized the enduring importance of ‘the right to be free’ from persistent ‘importunity, following and doggling’ after an offer to communicate has been declined.” The Court thus concluded that the statute “is a valid time, place, and manner regulation [because it] serves governmental interests that are significant and legitimate and [is] ‘narrowly tailored’ to serve those interests and...leaves open ample alternative channels for communication.”

9. Demonstrating near an abortion clinic IV. In McCullen v. Coakley, 134 S. Ct. 2518 (2014), the Supreme Court invalidated a Massachusetts statute that made it a crime for any person knowingly to stand on a “public way or sidewalk” within 35 feet of an entrance or driveway to any place, other than a hospital, where abortions are performed. The law was designed to eliminate clashes between abortion opponents and advocates of abortion rights that had occurred outside clinics where abortions were performed. The law was challenged by individuals “who approach and talk to women outside such facilities, attempting to dissuade them from having abortions.” According to testimony presented at the trial, such individuals have, over time, “persuaded hundreds of women to forgo abortions.”

The Court unanimously invalidated the ordinance. Chief Justice Roberts authored the opinion of the Court: “[We] have held that the government’s ability to restrict speech in [traditional public fora] is ‘very limited.’ [Even if such laws are content neutral, they must be] narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest. [The] buffer zones burden substantially more speech than necessary to achieve the Commonwealth’s asserted interests. [The] Commonwealth’s interests include ensuring public safety outside abortion clinics, preventing harassment and intimidation of patients and clinic staff, and combating deliberate obstruction of clinic entrances. [The Act] itself contains a separate provision [that] prohibits much of this conduct. That provision subjects to criminal punishment ‘[a]ny person who knowingly obstructs, detains, hinders, impedes or blocks another person’s entry to or exit from a reproductive health care facility.’ [If] Massachusetts determines that broader prohibitions along the same lines are necessary, it could enact legislation similar to the federal Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act of 1994, which subjects to both criminal and civil penalties anyone who ‘by force or threat of force or by physical obstruction, intentionally injures, intimidates or interferes with or attempts to injure, intimidate or interfere with any person because that person is or has been, or in order to intimidate such person or any other person or any class of persons from, obtaining or providing reproductive health services.’ [If] the Commonwealth is particularly concerned about harassment, it could also consider an ordinance such as the one adopted in New York City that not only prohibits obstructing access to a clinic, but also makes it a crime ‘to follow and harass another person within 15 feet of the premises of a reproductive health care facility.’ [The] point is not that Massachusetts must enact all or even any of the proposed measures discussed above. The point is instead that the Commonwealth has available to it a variety of approaches that appear capable of serving its interests without excluding individuals from areas historically open for speech and debate.” Justices Scalia, Kennedy Thomas, and Kennedy concurred in the result.

10. Picketing near military funerals. In recent years, members of the Westboro Baptist Church have protested at the funerals of American soldiers, carrying placards and shouting such phrases as “Thank God for Dead Soldiers,” “God Is Your Enemy,” and “Thank God for 9/11.” The church’s predominant message is one of virulent anti-homosexuality, and these protests are designed to convey the message that the United States is being punished for its toleration of such conduct.

To rein in such protests, most states have enacted laws designed to restrict demonstrations near military funerals. What do you think of the constitutionality of the federal Respect for America’s Fallen Heroes Act, which was enacted in 2006? The act, which governs funerals at national cemeteries, prohibits any “demonstration” “during the period beginning 60 minutes before and ending 60 minutes” after a funeral at a national cemetery if the demonstration is “within 150 feet of a road pathway, or other route of ingress to or egress from such cemetery property” and the demonstrators willfully makes “any noise or diversion that disturbs or tends to disturb the peace or good order” of the funeral or is “within 300 feet of such cemetery” if the demonstration “impedes the access to or egress from such cemetery.” The act defines “demonstration” to include “any picketing or similar conduct,” “any oration, speech, use of sound amplification equipment” that is not part of the funeral, “the display of any placard, banner, flag, or similar device” that is not part of the funeral, and the “distribution of any handbill, pamphlet, or other written or printed matter” that is not part of the funeral. Is this law a reasonable regulation of public property? Is it content-neutral? See Wells, Privacy and Funeral Protests, 87 N.C. L. Rev. 151 (2008); McAllister, Funeral Picketing Laws and Free Speech, 55 U. Kan. L. Rev. 575 (2007).

11. Free speech zones. Consider Zick, Speech and Spatial Tactics, 84 Tex. L. Rev. 581, 584–589 (2006):

Governments have learned to manipulate geography in a manner that now seriously threatens basic First Amendment principles. [The] state has moved from regulating place to actually...creating places [such as “buffer zones,” “free speech zones,” and “speech-free zones”] for the express purpose of controlling and disciplining protest and dissent. [By] design, these places mute and even suppress messages, depress participation in social and political protests, and send negative signals to those on the outside regarding those confined within. [Protests in such] places are docile; they are tightly scripted and ineffectual imitations of past social and political movements. [Passively] filing into cages, zones, and other tactical places is an utter capitulation to the status quo. [Such places are] being used to marginalize dissent, to capture and confine it. [Courts] should view [such manipulation of protests] with far greater skepticism than they currently do [and should] take far more seriously the notion that “one is not to have the exercise of his liberty of expression in appropriate places abridged on the plea that it may be exercised elsewhere.” [Quoting Schneider v. State.]

12. Unlawful assembly. In what circumstances can the police constitutionally arrest individuals who are participating in an otherwise lawful assembly because of a concern that the event seems likely to get out of hand and result in damage to persons or property? In what circumstances can the police order individuals to disperse because of such concerns? Must there be a clear and present danger of violence or of serious damage to property? What if some demonstrators begin throwing rocks through windows? Can the police order the entire crowd to disband? See Inazu, Unlawful Assembly as Social Control, 64 UCLA L. Rev. 2 (2017).

13. Unattended structures. Does an individual have a constitutional right to erect an unattended display in a public park? Suppose, for example, an individual wants to construct a statue, or a cross, or a billboard in such a park. Can the state prohibit this completely? If prohibition is impermissible, what sorts of regulations would be appropriate? In Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995), the Court strongly suggested, but did not decide, that “a ban on all unattended displays” might be constitutional. As Justice Stevens explained in a separate opinion, such a display “creates a far greater intrusion on government property and interferes with the Government’s ability to differentiate its own message from those of private individuals.”

Note: Devices for Regulating the Public Forum

1. Licensing. In Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 (1941), a group of Jehovah’s Witnesses were convicted of violating a state statute prohibiting any “parade or procession” upon a public street without first obtaining a permit. The Court, in a unanimous decision, affirmed the convictions. Chief Justice Hughes, speaking for the Court, explained that, “as regulation of the use of the streets for parades and processions is a traditional exercise of control by local government, the question in a particular case is whether that control is exerted so as not to deny or unwarrantedly abridge the right of assembly and the opportunities for the communication of [thought] immemorially associated with resort to public places.”

The Court emphasized that the state court had “construed the statute” as authorizing “the licensing authority” to take into account only “considerations of time, place and manner so as to conserve the public convenience.” Such a limited permit requirement had the “obvious advantage” of “giving the public authorities notice in advance so as to afford opportunity for proper policing” and, “in fixing time and place, ‘[to] prevent confusion by overlapping parades or processions, to secure convenient use of the streets by other travelers, and to minimize the risk of disorder.’” Moreover, the Court emphasized that the state court had stressed that “the licensing board was not vested with arbitrary power [and] that its discretion must be [exercised] ‘free [from] unfair discrimination.’” The Court concluded that under this construction of the statute, it is “impossible to say that the limited authority conferred by the licensing provisions [contravened] any constitutional right.”

For a critical view, see Baker, Unreasoned Reasonableness: Mandatory Parade Permits and Time, Place, and Manner Regulations, 78 Nw. U. L. Rev. 937 (1983). For analysis of licensing generally, see section C2 supra. See also Thomas v. Chicago Park District, 534 U.S. 316 (2002) (a content-neutral licensing scheme regulating the time, place and manner of use of a public forum need not employ the Freedman safeguards because such a scheme “does not authorize a licensor to pass judgment on the content of speech”).

If a city can use a “time, place, and manner” based licensing scheme for individuals who want to parade on public streets, can it also use such a licensing scheme for speakers who want to go door-to-door to speak with homeowners and distribute literature? In Watchtower Bible & Tract Society v. Village of Stratton, 536 U.S. 150 (2002), the Court, in an eight-to-one decision, held such a scheme unconstitutional. Although acknowledging that the Village’s interests in preventing fraud, preventing crime and protecting privacy are “important,” the Court nonetheless held that the effect of the licensing scheme on the interests of speakers who want to maintain their anonymity, the administrative burden the scheme imposes on speakers, and the potential impact of the licensing requirement on “spontaneous speech” rendered the ordinance unconstitutional. The Court indicated that such a scheme limited to commercial activities and the solicitation of funds might not be invalid.

2. Fees. To what extent may the state charge for use of the public forum? In Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105 (1943), the Court held that the state may not impose a “flat license tax [as] a condition to the pursuit of activities whose enjoyment is guaranteed by the First Amendment” where the tax “is not a nominal fee imposed as a regulatory measure to defray the expenses of policing the activities in question.” In Cox v. New Hampshire, supra, the licensing statute provided that “every licensee shall pay in advance” a fee ranging from a nominal amount to $300 per day. The state court construed the statute as requiring “a reasonable fixing of the amount of the fee.” That is, the amount of the fee must in each instance turn on the size of the “parade or procession,” the size of the crowd, and the “public expense of policing” the event. The state court explained that the fee was “not a revenue tax, but one to meet the expense incident to the administration of the Act and to the maintenance of public order in the matter licensed.” The Court held that in such circumstances “there is nothing contrary to the Constitution in the charge of a fee limited to the purpose stated.” Moreover, the Court rejected “the suggestion that a flat fee should have been charged,” explaining that it is difficult to frame “a fair schedule to meet all circumstances,” and that there is “no constitutional ground for denying to local governments that flexibility of adjustment of fees which in the light of varying conditions would tend to conserve rather than impair the liberty sought.”

During the Skokie controversy, section B2 supra, the village enacted an ordinance requiring applicants for parade or public demonstration permits to procure public liability insurance in the amount of $350,000 and property damage insurance in the amount of $50,000. Is this ordinance constitutional under the doctrine of Cox? Consider Forsyth County, Georgia v. The Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123 (1992), in which the Court invalidated a municipal ordinance that authorized permit fees for parades, demonstrations, marches, and similar activities, up to a maximum of $1,000, based in part on the anticipated expense necessary to maintain the public order. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Blackmun, explained that under this scheme the fee “will depend on the administrator’s measure of the amount of hostility likely to be created by the speech.” As a result, those “wishing to express views unpopular with bottle throwers [may] have to pay more for their permit.” The Court announced that speech “cannot be financially burdened, any more than it can be punished or banned, simply because it might offend a hostile mob,” and that “regulations which permit the Government to discriminate on the basis of the content of the message cannot be tolerated under the First Amendment.”

3. Disclosure. To what extent may the state, in order to prevent abuse, require speakers to disclose their identities? In Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60 (1960), a distributor of handbills protesting employment discrimination was prosecuted for violating a Los Angeles ordinance prohibiting any person to distribute “any hand-bill [which] does not have printed on [the] face thereof, the name and address of [the] person who printed, wrote, compiled, or manufactured [it].” The Court held the ordinance invalid:

[It is] urged that this ordinance is aimed at providing a way to identify those responsible for fraud, false advertising and libel. [But] such an identification requirement would tend to restrict freedom to distribute information and thereby freedom of expression. [Anonymous] pamphlets, leaflets, brochures and even books have played an important role in the progress of mankind. Persecuted groups [throughout] history have been able to criticize oppressive practices [either] anonymously or not at all. [Identification] and fear of reprisal might deter perfectly peaceful discussions of public matters of importance. This broad Los Angeles ordinance is subject to the same infirmity.

See also McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Commission, 514 U.S. 334 (1995), in which the Court invalidated a state statute prohibiting the distribution of campaign literature that does not contain the name and address of the person issuing the literature: “Under our Constitution, anonymous pamphleteering is not a pernicious, fraudulent practice, but an honorable tradition of advocacy and of dissent. Anonymity is a shield from the tyranny of the majority. It thus exemplifies the purpose behind the Bill of Rights, and of the First Amendment in particular: to protect unpopular individuals from retaliation—and their ideas from suppression—at the hand of an intolerant society.” See also Buckley v. American Constitutional Law Foundation, 525 U.S. 182 (1999) (invalidating a state law requiring petition circulators to wear a badge identifying them by name).

Are there any circumstances in which compelled disclosure is constitutional? See Buckley v. Valeo, section E4 infra (upholding compelled disclosure of campaign contributions). Are there any circumstances in which compelled disclosure is generally constitutional, but is unconstitutional as applied to particular speakers who can demonstrate a meaningful risk of “economic reprisal, loss of employment, threat of physical coercion [or] other manifestations of public hostility”? See NAACP v. Alabama, section E5 infra (invalidating an Alabama statute requiring disclosure of the names of members of registered organizations, as applied to the NAACP); Brown v. Socialists Workers ’74 Campaign Committee, 459 U.S. 87 (1982) (invalidating the statute compelling disclosure of campaign contributions that had been upheld in Buckley, as applied to the Socialist Workers Party).

b. The Public Forum: Other Publicly Owned Property

If there is a first amendment right to use streets and parks for purposes of expression, to what extent, if any, is there an analogous right to use other publicly owned property, ranging from the grounds surrounding a jail, to a military base, to a state fair? Does the Hague dictum's definition of the right to a "public forum" in terms of the common law property rights of the state suggest that the right does not extend to property that has not been used "time out of mind" for speech purposes?

Adderley v. Florida

385 U.S. 39 (1966)

[About two hundred Florida A. & M. students marched to the county jail to protest the arrest the previous day of several of their schoolmates who had engaged in a civil rights demonstration. The protestors went directly to the jail entrance, where they were met by a deputy sheriff who explained that they were blocking the entrance to the jail and asked them to move back. The protestors moved back part of the way, where they stood or sat, singing, clapping, and dancing, on the jail driveway and on an adjacent grassy area on the jail premises. This jail entrance and driveway were normally used not by the public, but by the sheriff's department for transporting prisoners and by commercial concerns for servicing the jail. [The] county sheriff, who was legal custodian of the jail and jail grounds, [ordered the students] to leave and informed them that, if they did not leave within ten minutes, he would arrest them for trespassing. Some protestors left, but 107 others, including petitioners, remained and were arrested. They were convicted of violating a Florida statute declaring unlawful "every trespass upon the property of another, committed with a malicious and mischievous intent." The Court, in a five-to-four decision, affirmed the convictions.]

MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court....

[Petitioners maintain that conviction under the trespass statute] unconstitutionally deprives [them] of their rights to freedom of speech, press, assembly, or petition. We hold that it does not. The sheriff, as jail custodian, had power [to] direct that this large crowd of people get off the grounds. There is not a shred of evidence in this record that this power was exercised [because] the sheriff objected to what was being sung or said by the demonstrators or because he disagreed with the objectives of their protest. The record reveals that he objected only to their presence on that part of the jail grounds reserved for jail uses. There is no evidence at all that on any other occasion had similarly large groups of the public been permitted to gather on this portion of the jail grounds for any purpose. Nothing in the Constitution of the United States prevents Florida from even-handed enforcement of its general trespass statute against those refusing to obey the sheriff's order to remove themselves from what amounted to the curtilage of the jailhouse. The State, no less than a private owner of property, has power to preserve the property under its control for the use to which it is lawfully dedicated. For this reason there is no merit to the petitioners' argument that they had a constitutional right to stay on the property, over the jail custodian's objections, because this "area chosen for the peaceful civil rights demonstration was not only 'reasonable' but also particularly appropriate...." Such an argument has as its major unarticulated premise the assumption that people who want to propagandize protests or views have a constitutional right to do so whenever and however and wherever they please. [We] reject [that concept]. The United States Constitution does not forbid a State to control the use of its own property for its own lawful nondiscriminatory purpose.

These judgments are affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE, MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN, and MR. JUSTICE FORTAS concur, dissenting....

The jailhouse, like an executive mansion, a legislative chamber, a courthouse, or the statehouse itself [is] one of the seats of government, whether it be the Tower of London, the Bastille, or a small county jail. And when it houses political prisoners or those who many think are unjustly held, it is an obvious center for protest. The right to petition for the redress of grievances has an ancient history and is not limited to writing a letter or sending a telegram to a congressman; it is not confined to appearing before the local city council, or writing letters to the President or Governor or Mayor. [Conventional] methods of petitioning may be, and often have been, shut off to large groups of our citizens. [Those] who do not control television and radio, those who cannot afford to advertise in newspapers or circulate elaborate pamphlets may have only a more limited type of access to public officials. Their methods should not be condemned as tactics of obstruction and harassment as long as the assembly and petition are peaceable, as these were.

There is no question that petitioners had as their purpose a protest against the arrest of Florida A. & M. students for trying to integrate public theatres. [There] was no violence; no threat of violence; no attempted jail break; no storming of a prison; no plan or plot to do anything but protest....

We do violence to the First Amendment when we permit this “petition for redress of grievances” to be turned into a trespass action. [To] say that a private owner could have done the same if the rally had taken place on private property is to speak of a different case, as an assembly and a petition for redress of grievances run to government, not to private proprietors.

The Court forgets that prior to this day our decisions have drastically limited the application of state statutes inhibiting the right to go peacefully on public property to exercise First Amendment rights. [Citing Justice Roberts’s plurality opinion in Hague. There] may be some public places which are so clearly committed to other purposes that their use for the airing of grievances is anomalous. There may be some instances in which assemblies and petitions for redress of grievances are not consistent with other necessary purposes of public property. A noisy meeting may be out of keeping with the serenity of the statehouse or the quiet of the courthouse. No one, for example, would suggest that the Senate gallery is the proper place for a vociferous protest rally. And in other cases it may be necessary to adjust the right to petition for redress of grievances to the other interests inhering in the uses to which the public property is normally put. [See Cox v. New Hampshire.] But this is quite different from saying that all public places are off limits to people with grievances....

Note: “No Less Than a Private Owner of Property”?

1. Davis revisited? Does Adderley turn on Justice Black’s assertion that “the State, no less than a private owner of property, has power to preserve the property under its control for the use to which it is lawfully dedicated”? Does Adderley undervalue the interest of the speaker in selecting a “particularly appropriate” location for his speech?

2. The Grayned dictum. In Grayned v. Rockford, section E2a, supra, decided in 1972, the Court, although upholding the antinoise ordinance as a reasonable time, place, and manner regulation, offered the following analysis of the public forum issue:

The nature of a place, “the pattern of its normal activities, dictate the kinds of regulations of time, place, and manner that are reasonable.” [The] crucial question is whether the manner of expression is basically incompatible with the normal activity of a particular place at a particular time. Our cases make clear that in assessing the reasonableness of a regulation, we must weigh heavily the fact that communication is involved; the regulation must be narrowly tailored to further the State's legitimate interest.

What are the implications of Grayned? Does it reject the central premise of Adderley? Consider Stone, Fora Americana: Speech in Public Places, 1974 Sup. Ct. Rev. 233, 251–252:

In [the Grayned dictum], the right to a public forum came of age. No longer does the right to effective freedom of expression turn on the common law property rights of the state, and no longer does it turn on whether the particular place at issue has historically been dedicated to the exercise of First Amendment rights. The streets, parks, public libraries, and other publicly owned places are all brought under the same roof. In each case, the “crucial question is whether the manner of expression is basically incompatible with the normal activity of a particular place at a particular time.”

As events turned out, this celebration proved premature. Consider the following post-Grayned decisions.

3. A military base. The Fort Dix Military Reservation is a U.S. Army post. Although the federal government exercises exclusive jurisdiction over the base, civilian vehicular traffic is permitted on paved roads within the reservation, and civilians are freely permitted to visit unrestricted areas of the base. In 1972, Benjamin Spock, the People’s Party’s candidate for President of the United States, requested permission to enter the base to hold a meeting to discuss election issues with service personnel and their dependents. The commanding officer of the base rejected the request, citing a Fort Dix regulation providing that “demonstrations, picketing, sit-ins, protest marches, political speeches and similar activities are prohibited and will not be conducted on the Fort Dix Military Reservation.”

In Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828 (1976), the Court, in a six-to-two decision, upheld the regulation. In an opinion by Justice Stewart, the Court rejected “the principle that whenever members of the public are permitted freely to visit a place owned or operated by the Government, then that place becomes a ‘public forum’ for purposes of the First Amendment.” Quoting Adderley, the Court explained that “[t]he State, no less than a private owner of property, has power to preserve the property under its control for the use to which it is lawfully dedicated.” The Court added that it is “the business of a military installation like Fort Dix to train soldiers, not to provide a public forum,” and that the challenged regulation reflects “a considered [policy], objectively and evenhandedly applied, of keeping official military activities [free] of entanglement with partisan political campaigns of any kind [in order to insulate] the military [from] both the reality and the appearance of acting as a handmaiden for partisan political causes or candidates.”

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented. Justice Brennan maintained that the Court’s emphasis on whether the base was a “public forum” was misplaced, for “the determination that a locale is a ‘public forum’ has never been erected as an absolute prerequisite to all forms of demonstrative First Amendment activity.” What is needed, Justice Brennan explained, is a “flexible approach [for] determining when public expression should be protected.” Justice Brennan reasoned that the speech in this case was “basically compatible with the activities otherwise occurring” at the base, and he rejected the contention that the interest in “military neutrality” could justify the restriction, for “it borders on casuistry to contend that by evenhandedly permitting public expression to occur in unrestricted portions of a military installation, the military will be viewed as sanctioning the causes there espoused.”

4. A state fair. The Minnesota State Fair is conducted each year on a 125-acre site. The average daily attendance exceeds 100,000. Minnesota State Fair Rule 6.05 prohibits the sale or distribution of any merchandise, including printed or written material, except from a booth rented from the state. Booths are rented to all comers in a nondiscriminatory manner on a first-come, first-served basis. The rental charge is based on the size and location of the booth. The International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), an international religious society espousing the views of the Krishna religion, challenged Rule 6.05 on the ground that it would impair ISKCON’s ability effectively to distribute its literature.

In Heffron v. International Society for Krishna Consciousness, 452 U.S. 640 (1981), the Court upheld the rule. In an opinion by Justice White, the Court rejected ISKCON’s effort to analogize “the fairgrounds [to] city streets which have ‘immemorially been [used] for purposes [of] assembly [and] discussing public questions’”:

A street is continually open, often uncongested, [and] a place where people may enjoy the open air or the company of friends [in] a relaxed environment. The Minnesota Fair [is] a temporary event attracting great numbers of visitors who come to the event for a short period to see [the] host of exhibits [at] the Fair. The flow of the crowd and the demands of safety are more pressing in the context of the Fair. As such, any comparisons to public streets are necessarily inexact.” [Thus, given the] threat to the State’s interest in crowd control if [all] organizations [could] move freely about the fairgrounds distributing and selling literature and soliciting funds at will, [the] State's interest in confining distribution, selling, and fund solicitation activities to fixed locations is sufficient to satisfy the requirement that a place or manner restriction must serve a substantial state interest.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall and Stevens, concurred in part and dissented in part. Although conceding that "the State has a significant interest in maintaining crowd control on its fairgrounds," Justice Brennan concluded that the "booth rule is an overly intrusive means of achieving [that interest]." "A state fair," Justice Brennan maintained, "is truly a marketplace of ideas and a public forum for the communication of ideas and information." Thus, Rule 6.05 constitutes a "significant restriction on First Amendment rights," for "by prohibiting distribution of literature outside the booths, the fair officials sharply limit the number of fairgoers to whom the proselytizers [can] communicate their messages."

5. A mailbox. In U.S. Postal Service v. Council of Greenburgh Civic Associations, 453 U.S. 114 (1981), the Court upheld a federal statute prohibiting the deposit of unstamped "mailable matter" in a letter box approved by the U.S. Postal Service, as applied to appellee civic association, which routinely delivered its messages by placing unstamped notices in the letter boxes of private homes. In an opinion by Justice Rehnquist, the Court explained:

There is neither historical nor constitutional support for the characterization of a letter box as a public forum. [At least since 1934, when the statute was promulgated,] access to [letter boxes] has been unlawful except under the terms and conditions specified by Congress and the Postal Service. As such, it is difficult to accept appellees' assertion that because it may be somewhat more efficient to place their messages in letter boxes there is a First Amendment right to do so. [Indeed,] it is difficult to conceive of any reason why this Court should treat a letter box differently for First Amendment [purposes] than it has in the past treated the military base in [Greer or] the jail [in Adderley]....What we hold is the principle reiterated by cases such as [Adderley] and [Greer], that property owned or controlled by the government which is not a public forum may be subject to a prohibition of speech, leafleting, picketing, or other forms of communication without running afoul of the First Amendment. Admittedly, the government must act reasonably in imposing such restrictions [and] the prohibition must be content-neutral. [But] this statute is both a reasonable and content-neutral regulation.

Justices Marshall and Stevens dissented.

6. A public utility pole. In Members of the City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789 (1984), the Court upheld a Los Angeles ordinance prohibiting the posting of signs on public property as applied to individuals who tied political campaign signs to public utility poles. Justice Stevens delivered the opinion:

The ordinance [diminishes] the total quantity of [appellees'] communication in the City. [But] the state [may] curtail speech [in a content-neutral manner if the restriction] "furthers an important or substantial governmental interest [and if the] restriction on [free speech] is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest." [It is undisputed that the] problem addressed by this ordinance —the visual assault [on] citizens [presented] by an accumulation of signs posted on public property—constitutes a significant substantive evil. [Moreover, the] restriction on appellees' expressive activity is [no] broader than necessary to protect the City's interest. [By] banning these signs, the City did no more than eliminate the exact source of the evil it sought to remedy. [Appellees] suggest that the public property covered by the ordinance is [a] "public forum," [but they] fail to demonstrate the existence of a traditional right of access respecting such items as utility poles for purposes [of] communication comparable to that recognized for public streets and parks. [The] mere fact that government property can be used as a vehicle for communication does not mean that the Constitution requires such uses to be permitted.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall and Blackmun, dissented. Is Vincent consistent with Schneider? Consider Justice Stevens's answer in Vincent: "It is true that the esthetic interest in preventing [litter] cannot support a prophylactic prohibition against [leafleting]. But the] rationale of Schneider is inapposite in the context of this case. [In Schneider,] an anti-littering statute could have addressed the substantive evil without prohibiting expressive activity. [Here], the substantive evil—visual blight—is not merely a possible by-product of the activity, but is created by the medium of expression itself. [Thus, the] ordinance curtails no more speech than is necessary to accomplish its purpose."

7. A post office sidewalk. In United States v. Kokinda, 497 U.S. 720 (1990), respondents, members of a political advocacy group, set up a table on a sidewalk near the entrance to a United States Post Office to distribute literature and solicit contributions. The sidewalk, which is located entirely on Postal Service property, is the sole means by which customers may travel from the parking lot to the post office building. Respondents were convicted of violating a federal regulation prohibiting any person from soliciting contributions “on postal premises.” The Court upheld the regulation as applied.

Justice O’Connor, in a plurality opinion joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices White and Scalia, explained that the “postal sidewalk [does] not have the characteristics of public sidewalks traditionally open to expressive activity.” Rather, “the postal sidewalk was constructed solely to provide for the passage of individuals engaged in postal business.” Although conceding that individuals had generally “been permitted to leaflet, speak, and picket on postal premises,” Justice O’Connor argued this did “not add up to the dedication of postal property to speech activities.” Justice O’Connor therefore concluded that “the regulation [must] be analyzed under the standards set forth for nonpublic fora: it must be reasonable and ‘not an effort to suppress expression merely because public officials oppose the speaker’s view.’” Applying that standard, Justice O’Connor noted that, “based on its long experience with solicitation,” the Postal Service had concluded that “solicitation is inherently disruptive of the postal service’s business” because it “impedes the normal flow of traffic” and “is more intrusive and intimidating than an encounter with a person giving out information.” Justice O’Connor concluded that the challenged regulation therefore “passes constitutional muster under [the] usual test for reasonableness.” Justice Kennedy concurred in the result. Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, dissented.

What about an airport terminal?

INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS v. LEE, 505 U.S. 672 (1992). The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns and operates three major airports in the New York City area, forbids within the airport terminals the repetitive solicitation of money and the repetitive sale or distribution of any merchandise, “including but not limited to jewelry, food stuffs, candles, flowers,...flyers, brochures, pamphlets, books or any other printed or written material.” The regulation governs only the terminal buildings. It does not restrict such activities on the public sidewalks outside the buildings. In a bewildering array of opinions, the Court upheld the ban on solicitation but invalidated the ban on the sale or distribution of literature.

Solicitation. Chief Justice Rehnquist delivered the opinion of the Court upholding the ban on solicitation. The Court explained that airport terminals are not traditional public fora because, “given the lateness with which the modern air terminal has made its appearance, it hardly qualifies for the description of having ‘immemorially...time out of mind’ been held in the public trust and used for purposes of expressive activity.” Moreover, such terminals have not “been intentionally opened by their operators to such activity.” To the contrary, “the frequent and continuing litigation evidencing the operators’ objections belies any such claim.” Moreover, “airports are commercial establishments funded by use fees and designed to make a regulated profit.” The Court thus concluded that, “because it cannot fairly be said that an airport terminal has as a principal purpose ‘promoting the free exchange of ideas,’” it is not a public forum.

This being so, the prohibition of solicitation “need only satisfy a requirement of reasonableness,” a standard the Court held was easily satisfied because of “the disruptive effect that solicitation may have on business.” Specifically, the Court observed that solicitation impedes “the normal flow of traffic,” and that such “delays may be particularly costly in this setting, as a flight missed by only a few minutes can result in hours worth of subsequent inconvenience.” Moreover, “face to face solicitation presents risk of duress” and “fraud,” and it may be especially difficult for airport authorities to enforce rules against such abuses because passengers “frequently are on tight schedules” and are “unlikely to stop and formally complain.” Finally, the prohibition is reasonable because solicitation is permitted on the “sidewalk areas outside the terminals,” where the “overwhelming” majority of airport users can be reached.

Justice Kennedy, joined by Justices Blackmun, Stevens, and Souter, offered a very different approach to the public forum issue and, contrary to the majority, concluded that airport terminals are public fora. Justice Kennedy complained that “our public forum doctrine ought [not] convert what was once an analysis protective of expression into one which grants the government authority to restrict speech by fiat.” Justice Kennedy observed that the Court’s analysis, which “holds that traditional public forums are limited to public property which have as their ‘principal purpose...the free exchanges of ideas,’” as “evidenced by a longstanding historical practice of permitting speech,” leaves “the government with almost unlimited authority to restrict speech on its property,” for “the critical step in the Court’s analysis” is “the government’s own definition or decision, unconstrained by an independent duty to respect the speech its citizens can voice” on public property. Justice Kennedy argued that this view “is contrary to the underlying purposes of the public forum doctrine,” for “at the heart of our jurisprudence lies the principle that in a free nation citizens must have the right to gather and speak with other persons in public places.”

Justice Kennedy therefore argued that the purposes of the public forum doctrine “cannot be given effect unless we recognize that open, public spaces and thoroughfares which are suitable for discourse may be public forums, whatever their historical pedigree and without concern for a precise classification of the property.” Indeed, “without this recognition our forum doctrine retains no relevance in times of fast-changing technology and increasing insularity,” and the Court’s failure to “recognize the possibility that new types of government property may be appropriate forums for speech will lead to a serious curtailment of our expressive activity.” Justice Kennedy thus maintained that, “if the objective, physical characteristics of the property at issue and the actual public access and uses which have been permitted by the government indicate that expressive activity would be appropriate and compatible with those uses, the property is a public forum.”

Turning to the issue of airport terminals, Justice Kennedy observed that “in these days an airport is one of the few government-owned spaces where people have extended contact with other members of the public.” Although an “airport corridor [is] not a street,” it bears important “physical similarities” to a street, the relevant areas “are open to the public without restriction,” and the “recent history of airports [demonstrates] that when adequate time, place, and manner regulations are in place, expressive activity is quite compatible with the uses of major airports.” Justice Kennedy thus found that the public areas of an airport terminal constitute a public forum.

Despite this disagreement with the Court, Justice Kennedy, writing only for himself, concurred that the ban on solicitation was constitutional as “a reasonable time, place, and manner restriction” because of the risks of fraud and duress. Justice Souter, joined by Justices Blackmun and Stevens, adopted Justice Kennedy’s analysis of the general public forum issue but dissented on the constitutionality of the ban on solicitation. In Justice Souter’s view, “the claim to be preventing coercion is weak” because, “while a solicitor can be insistent,” a pedestrian on the street or airport concourse can simply “walk away.” Moreover, Justice Souter found the claim to be preventing fraud unpersuasive because, once it is accepted that the terminal is a public forum, the absolute ban on solicitation does not meet “the requirement of narrow tailoring.”

Sale or distribution of literature. In a plurality opinion, Justice Kennedy, joined by Justices Blackmun, Stevens, and Souter, concluded that the ban on the sale or distribution of literature violated the first amendment. After finding, for the reasons set forth above, that airport terminals are public fora, Justice Kennedy explained that the ban was invalid because “the right to distribute flyers and literature lies at the heart of the liberties guaranteed” by the first amendment, the challenged “regulation is not drawn in narrow terms [and] does not leave open ample alternative channels for communication,” and the “Port Authority’s concerns with the problem of congestion can be addressed through narrow restrictions on the time and place of expressive activity.”

Justice O’Connor concurred in the result. Although agreeing with the dissent that airport terminals are not public fora, she nonetheless concluded that the ban on the sale or distribution of literature was invalid because it was an “unreasonable” restriction. Justice O’Connor explained that “leafleting does not necessarily entail the same kinds of problems presented by face-to-face solicitation.” Indeed, “with the possible exception of avoiding litter, it is difficult to point to any problems intrinsic to the act of leafleting that would make it naturally incompatible with a large, multipurpose forum such as those at issue here.”

Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justices White, Scalia, and Thomas, dissented. Having found that airport terminals are not public fora, Chief Justice Rehnquist reasoned that “the distribution ban, no less than the solicitation ban, is reasonable.” He argued that “the weary, harried or hurried traveler may have no less desire and need to avoid the delays generated by having literature foisted upon him than he does to avoid delays from a financial solicitation.” Moreover, like solicitation, leafleting can cause congestion. Finally, leafleting is even worse than solicitation insofar as leafleting may produce litter, thereby “creating an eyesore, a safety hazard, and additional clean-up work for the airport staff.”

Note: Modern Public Forum Doctrine

1. Deference to regulators. Consider Goldberger, Judicial Scrutiny in Public Forum Cases: Misplaced Trust in the Judgment of Public Officials, 32 Buff. L. Rev. 175, 206–207, 217–218 (1983):

By employing [low] levels of scrutiny in [these cases], the Court [assumes] that regulatory decision making is [generally] trustworthy. [The] Court has failed to recognize [that] public officials [often] have strong incentives to overregulate. [These incentives come] from two sources. First, there is the tendency of forum regulators to be disproportionately sensitive to threats of [disruption]. Second, forum regulators tend to be particularly sensitive toward protecting public services [when] the communication is controversial or is of interest to only a small segment of the population. [To compensate for these incentives, the Court in these cases should have required state] officials to prove that the activities regulated were as disruptive [as] claimed.

See also Post, Between Governance and Management: The History and Theory of the Public Forum, 34 UCLA L. Rev. 1713, 1809–1824 (1987).

2. Evaluation. Consider the following assessment: The dispute over access to nonpublic forum public property turns on a conflict between two competing views. Under one view, the first amendment requires government to permit the widest possible opportunity for free expression. The greater the opportunity for free expression, the healthier the marketplace of ideas. Thus, any law that restricts free expression must be invalidated unless the government interest served by the restriction outweighs the effect on free expression. Under the competing view, the traditional means of expression—radio, television, newspapers, speeches, parades, picketing, leaflets, and the like—provide ample opportunity for free expression. Although access to nonpublic forum public property might make some speech marginally more effective, a denial of access to such property poses no real threat to the marketplace of ideas. But to require such access would necessarily interfere with competing government interests and involve the courts in an endless series of highly subjective and unpredictable judgments. Thus, the costs of such inquiries far exceed the benefits. In recent years, the Court has embraced this second view.

Note: The Right to a “Private” Forum

To what extent, if any, does the first amendment guarantee the individual a right to commandeer some other person's private property for speech purposes? Do the property rights of private owners absolutely preclude such an interpretation of the first amendment? Does the state action requirement foreclose such an interpretation? On the state action doctrine, see Chapter 9.

1. The company town. In Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946), the Court considered whether a state could constitutionally “impose criminal punishment on a person who undertakes to distribute religious literature on the premises of a company-owned town contrary to the wishes of the town’s management.” The town, a suburb of Mobile, Alabama, known as Chickasaw, was owned by the Gulf Shipbuilding Corporation. The town was freely used by the public, and there was “nothing to distinguish [it] from any other town [except] the fact that the title to the property [belonged] to a private corporation.” Appellant, a Jehovah’s Witness, attempted to distribute literature on one of the town’s sidewalks. She was informed that, pursuant to a formal corporation policy, she could not distribute literature without a permit, and that no permit would be issued her. When asked to leave, she declined. She was eventually convicted of violating a state statute prohibiting any person to enter or remain on the premises of another after having been warned not to do so.

The Court overturned the conviction. Justice Black, speaking for the Court, observed:

Had the title to Chickasaw belonged not to a private, but to a municipal corporation [it] would have been clear that appellant's conviction must be reversed. [The] State urges [that] the corporation's right to control the inhabitants of Chickasaw is coextensive with the right of a homeowner to regulate the conduct of his guests. We cannot accept that contention. Ownership does not always mean absolute dominion. The more an owner, for his advantage, opens up his property for use by the public in general, the more do his rights become circumscribed by the statutory and constitutional rights of those who use it. [In] our view the circumstance that the property rights to the premises where the deprivation of liberty, here involved, took place, were held by others than the public, is not sufficient to justify the State's permitting a corporation to govern a community of citizens so as to restrict their fundamental liberties and the enforcement of such restraint by the application of a state statute.

2. Privately owned shopping centers. Suppose a privately owned shopping center bans all leafleting in the shopping center. Does that violate the first amendment? Consider the following argument:

[The] similarities between the business block in Marsh and the [modern day] shopping center [are] striking. [The] shopping center premises are open to the public to the same extent as the commercial center of a normal town. [Because the] shopping center [is] clearly the functional equivalent of the business district of Chickasaw involved in Marsh, [the] State may not delegate the power, through the use of its trespass laws, wholly to exclude those members of the public wishing to exercise their First Amendment rights on the premises in a manner and for a purpose generally consonant with the use to which the property is actually put.

Food Employees Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308 (1968) (holding that the “peaceful [labor] picketing of a business enterprise located within a shopping center” cannot constitutionally be prohibited by the owner of the shopping center). In Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976), the Court overruled Logan Valley. For a critical evaluation, consider C. Sunstein, The Partial Constitution 208 (1993):

The [Court] has said that the First Amendment is not implicated [in cases like Hudgens because] no government regulation of speech is involved. All that has happened is that private property owners have barred people from their land. [But] this is a poor way to understand the situation. [The] owners of the shopping center are able to exclude the protestors only because government has conferred on them a legal right to do so. The conferral of that right is an exercise of state power. It is this action that restricts the speech of the protestors. Surely it is a real question whether the grant of exclusionary power violates the First Amendment.

3. Does the appropriation of private property for speech purposes violate the constitutional rights of owners? Suppose the state, in an effort to promote free expression, grants the individual a right under state law to enter on private property for speech purposes. Might that in itself violate the property or speech rights of the property owner? In PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74 (1980), a group of high school students who sought to solicit support for their opposition to a United Nations resolution against Zionism set up a card table in the PruneYard Shopping Center and asked passersby to sign petitions. Pursuant to a policy prohibiting any visitor to engage in any publicly expressive activity not directly related to the shopping center's commercial purposes, a security guard ordered the students to leave. The California Supreme Court held that the California Constitution protects "speech and petitioning, reasonably exercised, in shopping centers even when the centers are privately owned." The U.S. Supreme Court rejected PruneYard's contention that the California Supreme Court's decision violated the federal constitutional rights of the shopping center owner. The Court explained:

[PruneYard contends] that a right to exclude others underlies the Fifth Amendment guarantee against the taking of property without just compensation. [But] "not every destruction or injury to property by governmental action has been held to be a 'taking' in the constitutional sense." [Here, there] is nothing to suggest that preventing [PruneYard] from prohibiting this sort of activity will unreasonably impair the value or use of [the] property as a shopping center. [PruneYard contends further] that a private property owner has a First Amendment right not to be forced by the State to use his property as a forum for the speech of others. [Although there are circumstances in which] a State may not constitutionally require an individual to participate in the dissemination of an ideological message by displaying it on his private property, [this is not such a case. First, PruneYard is] a business establishment that is open to the public to come and go as they please. The views expressed by members of the public in passing out pamphlets or seeking signatures for a petition thus will not likely be identified with those of the owner. Second, no specific message is dictated by the State to be displayed. [There] consequently is no danger of governmental discrimination for or against a particular message. Finally, [PruneYard] can expressly disavow any connection with the message by simply posting signs in the area where the speakers or handbillers stand.

On the right “not to speak,” see section E5 infra. On the problem of “takings,” see Chapter 6.

c. The Public Forum: Unequal Access and the Problem of Content-Neutrality

As we have seen, there are many situations in which government can constitutionally restrict expression on public property in a content-neutral manner. Suppose, however, government decides voluntarily to permit some, but not all, speech? For example, the Court held in Lee that government can constitutionally prohibit all solicitation in airport terminals. Suppose government decides to permit solicitation by antiabortion groups, or local political candidates, or groups interested in issues relating to air travel?

The issue is one of “underinclusion.” That is, such a regulation restricts less speech than a broader and concededly constitutional content-neutral restriction. But in so doing, it adopts a potentially problematic inequality. To avoid this inequality, the regulation could be broadened to restrict more speech. Can it be that a law that restricts more speech is constitutional but a law that restricts less speech is unconstitutional? Recall R.A.V., section D8 supra.

Consider Kagan, The Changing Faces of First Amendment Neutrality, 1992 Sup. Ct. Rev. 38–40:

Such underinclusion [is] a particular kind of content-based restriction....In [most] cases of content-based restrictions, the question [is] the permissibility of the burden placed on the speech affected. Consider, for example, [a] statute that [criminalizes] seditious advocacy. In deciding [on the constitutionality of such a statute], the Court usually will not ask whether the government has a sufficient reason to treat speech of one kind (sedition advocacy) differently from speech of another; rather, the Court will ask merely whether the government has a sufficient reason to restrict the speech actually affected. [In] such a case, the issue is not underinclusion, for the government could not cure the constitutional flaw by extending the restriction to [other speech]. By contrast, in a content-based underinclusion case, equality is all that is at issue.

Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley

408 U.S. 92 (1972)

MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

At issue in this case is the constitutionality of [a] Chicago ordinance [providing that a] “person commits disorderly conduct when he knowingly [pickets] or demonstrates on a public way within 150 feet of [any] school building while the school is in [session], provided that this subsection does not prohibit the peaceful picketing of any school involved in a labor dispute....”

[For] seven months prior to the enactment of [this ordinance], Earl Mosley, a federal postal employee, [frequently] picketed Jones Commercial High School in Chicago. During school hours and usually by himself, Mosley would walk the public sidewalk adjoining the school, carrying a sign that read: “Jones High School practices black discrimination. Jones High School has a black quota.” His lonely crusade was always peaceful, orderly, and quiet, and was conceded to be so by the city of Chicago. [Mosley brought this action] seeking declaratory and injunctive relief. [We] hold that the ordinance is unconstitutional because it makes an impermissible distinction between labor picketing and other peaceful picketing.

Because Chicago treats some picketing differently from others, we analyze this ordinance in terms of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Of course, the equal protection claim in this case is closely intertwined with First Amendment interests; the Chicago ordinance affects picketing, which is expressive conduct; moreover, it does so by classifications formulated in terms of the subject of the picketing. As in all equal protection cases, however, the crucial question is whether there is an appropriate governmental interest suitably furthered by the differential treatment.

The central problem with Chicago’s ordinance is that it describes permissible picketing in terms of its subject matter. Peaceful picketing on the subject of a school’s labor-management dispute is permitted, but all other peaceful picketing is prohibited. The operative distinction is the message on a picket sign. But, above all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content. [Citing Cohen v. California; New York Times v. Sullivan; Terminiello v. Chicago.]...

Necessarily, [then], government may not grant the use of a forum to people whose views it finds acceptable, but deny use to those wishing to express less favored or more controversial views. And it may not select which issues are worth discussing or debating in public facilities. There is an “equality of status in the field of ideas,” and government must afford all points of view an equal opportunity to be heard. Once a forum is opened up to assembly or speaking by some groups, government may not prohibit others from assembling or speaking on the basis of what they intend to say. Selective exclusions from a public forum may not be based on content alone, and may not be justified by reference to content alone....

This is not to say that all picketing must always be allowed. We have continually recognized that reasonable “time, place and manner” regulations of picketing may be necessary to further significant governmental interests. [Cox v. New Hampshire; Adderley v. Florida.] Conflicting demands on the same place may compel the State to make choices among potential users and uses. And the State may have a legitimate interest in prohibiting some picketing to protect public order. But these justifications for selective exclusions from a public forum must be carefully scrutinized [and such discriminations] among pickets must be tailored to serve a substantial governmental interest.

In this case, the ordinance itself describes impermissible picketing not in terms of time, place, and manner, but in terms of subject matter. The regulation “thus slip[s] from the neutrality of time, place, and circumstance into a concern about content.” This is never permitted. In spite of this, Chicago urges that the ordinance is not improper content censorship, but rather a device for preventing disruption of the school. [Although] preventing school disruption is a city’s legitimate concern, Chicago itself has determined that peaceful labor picketing during school hours is not an undue interference with school. Therefore, [Chicago] may not maintain that other picketing disrupts the school unless that picketing is clearly more disruptive than the picketing Chicago already permits. “Peaceful” nonlabor picketing, [however], is obviously no more disruptive than “peaceful” labor picketing....

Similarly, we reject the city’s argument that, although it permits peaceful labor picketing, it may prohibit all nonlabor picketing because, as a class, nonlabor picketing is more prone to produce violence than labor picketing. Predictions about imminent disruption from picketing involve judgments appropriately made on an individualized basis, not by means of broad classifications, especially those based on subject matter. [Some] labor picketing is peaceful, some disorderly; the same is true of picketing on other themes. [Given] what Chicago tolerates from labor picketing, the excesses of some nonlabor picketing may not be controlled by a broad ordinance prohibiting both peaceful and violent picketing. Such excesses “can be controlled by narrowly drawn statutes,” [focusing] on the abuses and dealing even handedly with picketing regardless of subject matter. [Far] from being tailored to a substantial governmental interest, the discrimination among pickets is based on the content of their expression. Therefore, under the Equal Protection Clause, it may not stand.

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN and MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST concur in the result.

Note: Mosley and the “Equality” of Ideas

1. Equality and underinclusion. Is the Chicago ordinance, absent the labor picketing exemption, a permissible content-neutral restriction? Recall Grayned v. Rockford, section E2a, supra. If the ordinance is constitutional absent the labor-picketing exemption, should the exemption render it invalid? Is it anomalous that under the Court’s reasoning the ordinance would be more likely to be constitutional if it restricted more speech? Consider the following arguments:

a. The city’s willingness to enact the labor exemption undermines the credibility of its asserted justifications for the restriction of nonlabor speech. Thus, even under the ordinary standards of content-neutral review, the restriction of nonlabor picketing may be invalid, even though a restriction of all picketing might be valid.

b. The standard of review should be higher when the city distinguishes between labor and nonlabor speech than when it acts in a content-neutral manner. That is, from a constitutional perspective, the inequality between labor and nonlabor picketing is more problematic than the broader, but more “equal,” restriction of all picketing near a school. (On the other hand, consider the following argument: The standard of review should be especially lenient in a case like Mosley because the ordinance was designed not to restrict but to expand the opportunities for free expression.)

2. Subject matter restrictions. Note that in Mosley the content-based restriction was directed not against a particular viewpoint but against an entire subject of discussion—all nonlabor expression. Should the first amendment’s hostility to content-based regulation extend not only to restrictions on particular viewpoints but also to restrictions on entire topics? Recall the debate on this issue in R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, section D8 supra. Consider Stone, Restrictions of Speech because of Its Content: The Peculiar Case of Subject-Matter Restrictions, 46 U. Chi. L. Rev. 81, 83, 108 (1978):

[Although] “subject-matter” distinctions unquestionably regulate content, they [do] not fit neatly within the Court's general framework. [The] Court's rigorous approach to content-based restrictions stems in part from the realization that such restrictions generally have an especially potent viewpoint-differential impact upon the "marketplace of ideas." [Because] they are at least facially viewpoint-neutral, [however, subject-matter restrictions] do not have the same sort of skewing effect on "the thinking process of the community" as restrictions directed against speech taking a particular side in an ongoing debate. Moreover, because of their apparent viewpoint-neutrality, subject-matter restrictions seem much less likely than other forms of content-based restrictions to be the product of government hostility to the ideas suppressed. In general, one is more likely to be hostile to speech espousing a specific point of view than to speech about an entire subject. As a result, one [might] argue that subject-matter restrictions are in general less threatening than other sorts of content-based restrictions and, like content-neutral restrictions, need not be subjected to the most stringent standards of review.

3. The reach of Mosley: residential picketing. In Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455 (1980), appellees participated in a peaceful demonstration in front of the home of the mayor of Chicago, protesting his alleged failure to support the busing of school children to achieve racial integration. As a result of this demonstration, appellees were convicted of violating an Illinois statute declaring it "unlawful to picket before or about the residence [of] any person, except when the residence" is "a place of employment involved in a labor dispute."

The Court held that the residential picketing statute was "constitutionally indistinguishable from the ordinance invalidated in Mosley:

[The] Act accords preferential treatment to the expression of views on one particular subject; information about labor disputes may be freely disseminated, but discussion of all other issues is restricted. [When] government regulation discriminates among speech-related activities in a public forum, the Equal Protection Clause mandates that the legislation be finely tailored to serve substantial state interests, and the justifications offered for and distinctions it draws must be carefully scrutinized. [Mosley.]...

Justice Rehnquist, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Blackmun, dissented.

4. The reach of Mosley: universities and the problem of religious expression. The University of Missouri at Kansas City, which officially recognizes more than one hundred student groups and routinely permits such groups to meet in university facilities, adopted a regulation prohibiting the use of university buildings for “purposes of religious worship or religious teaching.” Several university students who were members of an organization of evangelical Christian students challenged the regulation.

In Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981), the Court invalidated the regulation:

[The] campus of a public university, at least for its students, possesses many of the characteristics of a public forum. [At] the same time, however, [a] university differs in significant respects from public forums such as streets or parks. [A] university’s mission is education, and [it may] impose reasonable regulations compatible with that mission upon the use of its campus and facilities. [Here, through] its policy of accommodating their meetings, the University has created a forum generally open for use by student groups. [The] Constitution forbids a State to enforce certain exclusions from a forum generally open to the public, even if it was not required to create the forum in the first place. [In] order to justify discriminatory exclusion from a public forum based on the religious content of a group’s intended speech, the University [must] show that its regulation is necessary to serve a compelling state interest and that it is narrowly drawn to achieve that end. See [Carey v. Brown]. In this case the University claims a compelling interest in maintaining a strict separation of church and state. [We] agree that the interest of the University in complying with its constitutional obligations may be characterized as compelling. It does not follow, however, that an “equal access” policy would be incompatible with [the establishment clause]. It is possible—perhaps even foreseeable—that religious groups will benefit from access to University facilities. But [a] religious organization’s enjoyment of merely “incidental” benefits does not violate the prohibition against the “primary advancement” of religion.

Justice Stevens concurred in the judgment. Justice White dissented.

See also Lamb’s Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District, 508 U.S. 384 (1993) (relying on Widmar to invalidate a school district rule permitting school property to be used after school for social, civic, and recreational uses, but prohibiting the use of such property for religious purposes); Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995) (relying on Lamb’s Chapel to invalidate a University of Virginia policy authorizing payment from the Student Activities Fund for the printing costs of a variety of student publications, but prohibiting payment for any student publication that “primarily promotes or manifests a particular belief in or about a deity or an ultimate reality").

5. The reach of Mosley: the “careful scrutiny” standard. Are there circumstances in which a content-based law, like the ones invalidated in Mosley, Carey, and Widmar, can withstand “careful scrutiny”? See Burson v. Freeman, 504 U.S. 191 (1992) (upholding a law prohibiting the solicitation of votes and the display or distribution of campaign materials within one hundred feet of the entrance to a polling place).

Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights

418 U.S. 298 (1974)

MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN announced the judgment of the Court and an opinion, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, MR. JUSTICE WHITE, and MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST join.

This case presents the question whether a city which operates a public rapid transit system and sells [commercial and public service] advertising space for car cards on its vehicles is required by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to accept paid political advertising on behalf of a candidate for public office.

[Petitioner, a candidate for the office of state representative,] sought to promote his candidacy by purchasing car card space on the Shaker Heights Rapid Transit System for the months of August, September, and October.

[He] was informed [that], although space was then available, [the] city did not permit political advertising. The system, however, accepted ads from cigarette companies, banks, savings and loan associations, liquor companies, retail and service establishments, churches, and civic and public-service oriented groups....

When petitioner did not succeed in his effort to have his copy accepted, he sought declaratory and injunctive relief in the state courts of Ohio without success....It is urged that the car cards here constitute a public forum protected by the First Amendment, and that there is a guarantee of nondiscriminatory access to such publicly owned and controlled areas of communication “regardless of the primary purpose for which the area is dedicated.” [We] disagree.

[This situation is] different from the traditional settings where First Amendment values inalterably prevail. [Although] American constitutional jurisprudence, in the light of the First Amendment, has been jealous to preserve access to public places for purposes of free speech, the nature of the forum and the conflicting interests involved have remained important in determining the degree of protection afforded by the Amendment to the speech in question....

Here, we have no open spaces, no meeting hall, park, street corner, or other public thoroughfare. Instead, the city is engaged in commerce. It must provide rapid, convenient, pleasant, and inexpensive service to the commuters of Shaker Heights. The car card space, although incidental to the provision of public transportation, is a part of the commercial venture. In much the same way that a newspaper or periodical, or even a radio or television station, need not accept every proffer of advertising from the general public, a city transit system has discretion to develop and make reasonable choices concerning the type of advertising that may be displayed in its vehicles....

Because state action exists, however, the policies and practices governing access to the transit system's advertising space must not be arbitrary, capricious, or invidious. Here, the city has decided that "[p]urveyors of goods and services saleable in commerce may purchase advertising space on an equal basis, whether they be house builders or butchers." This decision is little different from deciding to impose a 10-, 25-, or 35-cent fare, or from changing schedules or the location of bus stops. [Revenue] earned from long-term commercial advertising could be jeopardized by a requirement that short-term candidacy or issue-oriented advertisements be displayed on car cards. Users would be subjected to the blare of political propaganda. There could be lurking doubts about favoritism, and sticky administrative problems might arise in parcelling out limited space to eager politicians. In these circumstances, the managerial decision to limit car card space to innocuous and less controversial commercial and service oriented advertising does not rise to the dignity of a First Amendment violation....

[The] city consciously has limited access to its transit system advertising space in order to minimize chances of abuse, the appearance of favoritism, and the risk of imposing upon a captive audience. These are reasonable legislative objectives advanced by the city in a proprietary capacity. [There] is no First or Fourteenth Amendment violation.

[Affirmed.]

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, concurring in the judgment....

[If] the streetcar or bus were a forum for communication akin to that of streets or public parks, considerable problems would be presented. [But] a streetcar or bus is plainly not a park or sidewalk or other meeting place for discussion.

[It] is only a way to get to work or back home. The fact that it is owned and operated by the city does not without more make it a forum.

[If] we are to turn a bus or streetcar into either a newspaper or a park, we take great liberties with people who because of necessity become commuters and at the same time captive viewers or listeners.

In asking us to force the system to accept his message as a vindication of his constitutional rights, the petitioner overlooks the constitutional rights of the commuters. While petitioner clearly has a right to express his views to those who wish to listen, he has no right to force his message upon an audience incapable of declining to receive it. In my view the right of the commuters to be free from forced intrusions on their privacy precludes the city from transforming its vehicles of public transportation into forums for the dissemination of ideas upon this captive audience....

I do not view the content of the message as relevant either to petitioner's right to express it or to the commuters' right to be free from it. Commercial advertisements may be as offensive and intrusive to captive audiences as any political message. But the validity of the commercial advertising program is not before us since we are not faced with one complaining of an invasion of privacy through forced exposure to commercial ads. Since I do not believe that petitioner has any constitutional right to spread his message before this captive audience, I concur in the Court's judgment.

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART, MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL, and MR. JUSTICE POWELL join, dissenting....

In the circumstances of this case, [we] need not decide whether public transit cars must be made available as forums for the exercise of First Amendment rights. By accepting commercial and public service advertising, the city effectively waived any argument that advertising in its transit cars is incompatible with the rapid transit system's primary function of providing transportation. A forum for communication was voluntarily established when the city installed the physical facilities for the advertisements [and] created the necessary administrative machinery for regulating access to that forum.

The plurality opinion, however, contends that as long as the city limits its advertising space to "innocuous and less controversial commercial and service oriented advertising," no First Amendment forum is created. I find no merit in that position. Certainly, noncommercial public service advertisements convey messages of public concern and are clearly protected by the First Amendment. And while it is possible that commercial advertising may be accorded less First Amendment protection than speech concerning political and social issues of public importance, [it] is "speech" nonetheless, often communicating information and ideas found by many persons to be controversial. [Once] such messages have been accepted and displayed, the existence of a forum for communication cannot be gainsaid. To hold otherwise, and thus sanction the city's preference for bland commercialism and noncontroversial public service messages over "uninhibited, robust, and wide-open" debate on public issues, would reverse the traditional priorities of the First Amendment.

Once a public forum for communication has been established, both free speech and equal protection principles prohibit discrimination based solely upon subject matter or content. See, e.g., [Mosley]. That the discrimination is among entire classes of ideas, rather than among points of view within a particular class, does not render it any less odious. Subject matter or content censorship in any form is forbidden. [Few] examples are required to illustrate the scope of the city's policy and practice.¹⁰

The city contends that its ban against political advertising is bottomed upon its solicitous regard for "captive riders" of the rapid transit system, who are "forced to endure the advertising thrust upon [them]." Whatever merit the city's argument might have in other contexts, it has a hollow ring in the present case, where the city has voluntarily opened its rapid transit system as a forum for communication. In that circumstance, the occasional appearance of provocative speech should be expected....

The line between ideological and nonideological speech is impossible to draw with accuracy. By accepting commercial and public service advertisements, the city opened the door to "sometimes controversial or unsettling speech" and determined that such speech does not unduly interfere with the rapid transit system's primary purpose of transporting passengers. In the eyes of many passengers, certain commercial or public service messages¹¹ are as profoundly disturbing as some political advertisements might be to other passengers. There is certainly no evidence in the record of this case indicating that political advertisements, as a class, are so disturbing when displayed that they are more likely than commercial or public service advertisements to impair the rapid transit system's primary function of transportation....

Moreover, even if it were possible to draw a manageable line between controversial and noncontroversial messages, the city's practice of censorship for the benefit of "captive audiences" still would not be justified. [The] advertisements accepted by the city [are] not broadcast over loudspeakers in the transit cars. The privacy of the passengers is not, therefore, dependent upon their ability "to sit and to try not to listen." [Rather], all advertisements accepted for display are in written form. [Should] passengers chance to glance at advertisements they find offensive, they can "effectively avoid further bombardment of their sensibilities simply by averting their eyes." [Cohen v. California.] Surely that minor inconvenience is a small price to pay for the continued preservation of so precious a liberty as free speech.

The city's remaining justification is equally unpersuasive. The city argues that acceptance of "political advertisements [would] suggest [that] the candidate so advertised is being supported or promoted by the government of the City." Clearly, such ephemeral concerns do not provide the city with carte blanche authority to exclude an entire category of speech from a public forum....

Moreover, neutral regulations, which do not distinguish among advertisements on the basis of subject matter, can be narrowly tailored to allay the city's fears. The impression of city endorsement can be dispelled by requiring disclaimers to appear prominently on the face of every advertisement. And while problems of accommodating all potential advertisers may be vexing at times, the appearance of favoritism can be avoided by the even-handed regulation of time, place, and manner for all advertising, irrespective of subject matter....

Note: Lehman and the Limits of Mosley

1. Analysis of Lehman. In Mosley, the Court announced that laws granting unequal access to government property for speech purposes "must be carefully scrutinized" and "must be tailored to serve a substantial governmental interest." But in Lehman, Justice Blackmun, speaking for the plurality, upheld such a law because it was not "arbitrary, capricious, or invidious." Is Justice Blackmun's analysis in Lehman consistent with Mosley? Consider the following:

a. In its operation of the transit system and its sale of advertising space, "the city is engaged in commerce." Consider Wells and Hellerstein, The Governmental-Proprietary Distinction in Constitutional Law, 66 Va. L. Rev. 1073, 1116 (1980):

As a regulator of the general public, the government must base its proscription of an activity on the premise that the proscription will act to enhance the general welfare. [As] a procurer or provider of goods and services, however, it may assert a different, more specific kind of interest—the interest of an employer who needs an efficient workforce, a landlord who would prefer not to deal with tenants who do not pay rent, or a purchaser who wishes to contract with a trustworthy seller. This quasi-business interest may adequately support regulation that a court might strike down if applied to the public at large and the state supported it with arguments that it promotes the general welfare. [That government acts in a proprietary capacity, however,] legitimately serves only to identify a state interest not present when the state regulates the general public. It should be but one element in the analysis and should not by itself determine the outcome.

See also International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. v. Lee, supra (invoking the proprietary/governmental distinction in upholding a ban on solicitation in airport terminals); United States v. Kokinda, section E2b, supra (invoking the distinction in upholding a Postal Service regulation prohibiting any person from soliciting contributions on post office property).

b. Streetcar passengers are a “captive audience.” Recall Cohen v. California, section D7, supra: “The ability of government, consonant with the Constitution, to shut off discourse solely to protect others from hearing it is [dependent] upon a showing that substantial privacy interests are being invaded in an essentially intolerable manner.” Is that test satisfied in Lehman? If so, is the exclusion of all political speech an appropriate device for protecting the sensibilities of captive commuters? Suppose that, after polling its commuters, the city finds that, although the vast majority do not object to the ideas of Democratic and Republican candidates, they “deeply resent” the views expressed by Socialist candidates. Based on this finding, may the city permit Democratic and Republican candidates to purchase car card space to espouse their “inoffensive” ideas, while excluding the “offensive” Socialist messages? For analysis of the “captive” audience, see section D7 supra.

c. “No First Amendment forum is here to be found.” Do you agree with Justice Brennan that, even if the car card space did not inherently constitute a public forum, the city’s acceptance of commercial and public service advertisements “created” such a forum? Recall Widmar. Consider Emerson, The Affirmative Side of the First Amendment, 15 Ga. L. Rev. 795, 813 (1981): “The dissenters fail to recognize the complications arising when the government is affirmatively promoting expression by providing facilities for a selected area of expression. They argue that, once the ‘forum’ has been opened, the government may not regulate on the basis of content. The issue before the Court, however, was what the scope of the forum was.”

Would any of these “explanations” of Lehman justify a content-based restriction defined in terms of viewpoint rather than subject matter?

2. The reach of Lehman: military bases. In Greer v. Spock, section E2b, supra, the base commander of the Fort Dix Military Reservation, acting under the authority of a regulation prohibiting “demonstrations, picketing, sit-ins, protest marches, political speeches and similar activities” on the base, denied the request of a political candidate to make a speech on the base to discuss election issues with service personnel and their dependents. The candidate maintained that the regulation was invalid because the ban on civilian access to the base for expressive purposes was not content-neutral: “Civilian speakers have occasionally been invited to the base to address military personnel. The subjects of their talks have ranged from business management to drug abuse. Visiting clergymen have, by invitation, participated in religious services at the base chapel. Theatrical exhibitions and musical productions have also been presented on the base.”

The Court upheld the regulation. Although the base was generally open to the public, the Court explained that “the business of a military installation [is] to train soldiers, not to provide a public forum.” Moreover, the Court emphasized that there was “no claim that the military authorities discriminated in any way among candidates for public office based upon the candidates’ supposed political views.” In such circumstances, the ban on partisan political expression was not unconstitutional. Justices Brennan and Marshall dissented. Is Greer reconcilable with Mosley and Widmar?

PERRY EDUCATORS’ ASSOCIATION v. PERRY LOCAL EDUCATORS’ ASSOCIATION, 460 U.S. 37 (1983). The school district of Perry Township, Indiana, operates an interschool mail system to transmit messages among the teachers and between the teachers and the school administration. In addition, some private organizations, such as the YMCA and the Cub Scouts, have been permitted to use the system. After the Perry Educators’ Association (PEA) was certified as the exclusive bargaining representative of the district’s teachers, the school district and PEA entered into a collective bargaining agreement granting PEA, but no other union, access to the mail system. The Perry Local Educators’ Association (PLEA), a rival union, brought this suit claiming that the district’s access policy violated the Constitution.

The Court, in a five-to-four decision, upheld the challenged policy. Justice White delivered the opinion: “The existence of a right of access to public property [depends] on the character of the property at issue. [First, there are the] streets and [parks]. In these quintessential public forums, the government may not [enforce] a content-based exclusion [unless the exclusion] is necessary to serve a compelling state interest and [is] narrowly drawn to achieve that end. [Mosley; Carey.] [A] second category consists of public property which the state has [voluntarily] opened for use by the public as a place for expressive activity. [Although] a state is not required to indefinitely retain the open character of [such facilities], as long as it does so it is bound by the same standards as apply in a traditional public forum. [Widmar.] [A third category consists of public] property which is not by tradition or designation a forum for public communication. [The] state may reserve [such property] for its intended purposes, communicative or otherwise, so long as the regulation of speech is reasonable and not an effort to suppress expression merely because public officials oppose the speaker's view....

"The school mail facilities [fall] within the third category. [The] interschool mail system is not a traditional public forum [and it] is not held open to the general public. [PLEA argues, however,] that the school mail facilities have become a 'limited public forum' from which it may not be excluded because of the periodic use of the system by private non-school connected groups, [such as] the YMCA, Cub Scouts, and other civic and church organizations. [The] use of the [mail system] by [such] groups [is] no doubt a relevant consideration. [Indeed, had the school district] opened its mail system for indiscriminate use by the general public, then PLEA could justifiably argue a public forum [had] been created. [But that] is not the case. [And the] type of selective access [involved here] does not transform government property into a public forum. [Greer; Lehman.] Moreover, even if [the grant of] access to the Cub Scouts, YMCAs, and parochial schools [had] created a 'limited' public forum, the constitutional right of access [would] extend only to other entities of similar character. While the school mail facilities thus might be a forum generally open for [other] organizations that engage in activities of interest [to] students, they would not [be] open to an organization such as PLEA, which is concerned with the terms and conditions of teacher employment....

"[PLEA argues further that by allowing PEA and not PLEA to use the mail facilities,] the access policy [favors] a particular viewpoint, that of the PEA, on labor relations, and consequently must be strictly scrutinized regardless of whether a public forum is involved. There is, however, no indication that the school board intended to discourage one viewpoint and advance another. [It] is more accurate to characterize the access policy as based on the status of the respective unions rather than their views. Implicit in the concept of the nonpublic forum is the right to make distinctions in access on the basis of subject matter and speaker identity. These distinctions may be impermissible in a public forum but are inherent and inescapable in the process of limiting a nonpublic forum to activities compatible with the intended purpose of the property. The touchstone for evaluating these distinctions is whether they are reasonable in light of the purpose which the forum at issue serves. [Access to the] mail service [clearly] could be restricted to those with teaching and operational responsibility in the schools. [By] the same token—and upon the same principle—the system was properly opened to PEA, when it [was] designated the collective bargaining agent for all teachers in the Perry schools. PEA thereby assumed an official position in the operational structure of [the schools]. [The] differential access provided PEA and PLEA is reasonable because it is wholly consistent with the district's legitimate interest in 'preserv[ing] the property [for] the use to which it is lawfully dedicated.'"

Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall, Powell, and Stevens, dissented: "In focusing on the public forum issue, the Court disregards the First Amendment's central proscription [against] viewpoint discrimination, in any forum, public or nonpublic. [As the] Court of Appeals [noted], 'the access policy [favors] a particular viewpoint on labor relations in the Perry schools: the teachers inevitably will receive from [PEA] self-laudatory descriptions of its activities [and] will be denied the critical perspective offered by [PLEA].' [Indeed], the only reason for [PEA] to seek an exclusive access policy is to deny its rivals access to an effective channel of communication. [In effect, the school district] has agreed to amplify the speech of [PEA], while repressing the speech of [PLEA] based on [PLEA's] point of view. [Such viewpoint discrimination] can be sustained 'only if the government can show that the regulation is a precisely drawn means of serving a compelling state interest.' [The state interests here] are not sufficient to sustain the [challenged] policy."

Note: Quintessential, Designated, and Nonpublic Forums

1. Distinctions among charities. The Combined Federal Campaign (CFC) is an annual charitable fund-raising drive conducted in the federal workplace during working hours largely through the voluntary efforts of federal employees. In Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund, 473 U.S. 788 (1985), the Court, in a four-to-three decision, upheld an Executive Order limiting participation in the CFC to voluntary, tax-exempt, nonprofit charitable agencies that provide direct health and welfare services to individuals and expressly excluding legal defense and political advocacy organizations.

In an opinion by Justice O'Connor, the Court first held that the CFC is a nonpublic forum:

Respondents argue [that] the Government created a limited public forum for use by all charitable organizations to solicit funds from federal employees. [We do not agree.] The Government's consistent policy has been to limit participation in the CFC to "appropriate" voluntary [agencies]. Such selective access, unsupported by evidence of a purposeful designation for public use, does not create a public forum.

Citing Perry, the Court explained that “control over access to a nonpublic forum can be based on subject matter and speaker identity so long as the distinctions drawn are reasonable in light of the purpose served by the forum and are viewpoint neutral.” The Court held that the challenged limitation was reasonable because “the President could reasonably conclude” that (1) “a dollar directly spent on providing food or shelter to the needy is more beneficial than a dollar spent on litigation that might or might not result in aid to the needy”; (2) the participation of legal defense and political advocacy groups would generate controversy and thus “be detrimental to the Campaign and disruptive of the federal workplace”; and (3) the exclusion of legal defense and political advocacy groups would “avoid the reality and the appearance of government favoritism or entanglement with particular viewpoints.” Justices Blackmun, Brennan, and Stevens dissented.

2. Payroll deductions for union political activities. Until 2003, public employees in Idaho could authorize both a payroll deduction for general union dues and a separate payroll deduction for union political activities. In 2003, the Idaho legislature prohibited payroll deductions for political purposes. A group of Idaho public employee unions challenged the 2003 legislation on the ground that it violated the first amendment. In Ysursa v. Pocatello Education Association, 555 U.S. 353 (2009), the Court rejected this claim.

Chief Justice Roberts wrote the opinion of the Court: “Restrictions on speech based on its content are ‘presumptively invalid’ and subject to strict scrutiny. [But ‘a] legislature’s decision not to subsidize the exercise of a fundamental right does not infringe the right, and thus is not subject to strict scrutiny.’ [The] State is not constitutionally obligated to provide payroll deductions at all. [While] publicly administered payroll deductions for political purposes can enhance the unions’ exercise of First Amendment rights, Idaho is under no obligation to aid the unions in their political activities. And the State’s decision not to do so is not an abridgment of the unions’ speech. [Given] that the State has not infringed the unions’ First Amendment rights, the State need only demonstrate a rational basis to justify the ban on political payroll deductions. [The] prohibition is [justified] by the State’s interest in avoiding the reality or appearance of government favoritism or entanglement with partisan politics.”

Justice Ginsburg filed a concurring opinion. Justices Stevens, Breyer, and Souter filed dissenting opinions. Would the outcome be different if the State prohibited payroll deductions to support the Democratic Party?

3. Distinctions among political candidates. The Arkansas Educational Television Commission is a state agency that owns and operates five noncommercial television stations in the Arkansas. In 1992, the AETC planned a series of debates between candidates for federal office. Given the time constraints of such debates, the AETC decided to limit participation “to the major party candidates or any other candidate who had strong popular support.” Forbes, an independent candidate for Congress, had satisfied the Arkansas requirement that he obtain two thousand signatures to qualify him to appear on the ballot, but the AETC nonetheless refused to include him in the debates because he “had not generated appreciable voter support” and “was not regarded as a serious candidate by the press.” It was undisputed that the AETC did not exclude Forbes because of any “disagreement with his views.” Forbes claimed that his exclusion violated the first amendment.

In Arkansas Educational Television Commission v. Forbes, 523 U.S. 666 (1998) the Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, rejected this claim. At the outset, the Court asked whether the debate was a designated public forum or a nonpublic forum:

To create a [designated public forum], the government must intend to make the property ‘generally available’ to a class of speakers. [A] designated public forum is not created when the government allows selective access for individual speakers rather than general access for a class of speakers. [Citing Perry, Cornelius, and Widmar.] These cases illustrate the distinction between ‘general access,’ which indicates the property is a designated public forum, and ‘selective access,’ which indicates the property is a nonpublic forum. [By] recognizing the distinction, we encourage the government to open its property to some expressive activity in cases where, if faced with an all-or-nothing choice, it might not open the property at all.

Applying this analysis, the Court held that the “AETC debate was not a designated public forum”:

Here, the debate did not have an open-microphone format. [The] AETC did not make its debate generally available to candidates for [this congressional] seat. Instead, just as the [government] in Cornelius reserved eligibility for participation in the CFC program to certain classes of voluntary agencies, AETC reserved eligibility for participation in the debate to candidates for [this congressional] seat (as opposed to some other seat). [Just] as the government in Cornelius made agency-by-agency determinations as to which of the eligible agencies would participate in the CFC, AETC made candidate-by-candidate determinations as to which of the eligible candidates would participate in the debate. “Such selective access, unsupported by evidence of a purposeful designation for public use, does not create a public forum.” Thus the debate was a nonpublic forum.

Applying the standard for exclusions from a nonpublic forum, the Court concluded that the decision to exclude Forbes “because he had generated no appreciable public support” was constitutionally permissible because it was not “based on the speaker’s viewpoint” and was “reasonable in light of the purpose of the property.”

Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Souter and Ginsburg, dissented. Although agreeing with the general analysis of the Court, Justice Stevens objected that the broad “flexibility of AETC’s purported standard” for excluding individual candidates gave it “nearly limitless discretion to exclude Forbes from the debate based on ad hoc justifications.”

4. Specialty license plates. In Walker v. Texas Div., Sons of Confederate Veterans, Inc., 135 S. Ct. 2239 (2015), the Court, in a five-to-four decision written by Justice Breyer, held that Texas had not created a limited or nonpublic forum when it permitted private groups to submit proposals for specialty license plates. It upheld the refusal of the Texas Department of Motor Vehicles to approve a license plate featuring the Confederate battle flag on the ground that the plate constituted government, rather than private, speech. In the Court’s view, the license plates were not a nonpublic forum because the state was “not simply managing government property, but instead is engaging in expressive conduct.” It based this conclusion on the historical context, observers’ reasonable interpretation of the messages conveyed by Texas specialty plates, and the “effective control that Texas exerted over the design selection process.” Justice Alito, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Scalia and Kennedy, dissented.

5. Distinctions among means of expression. In United States v. Kokinda, supra, respondents, members of a political advocacy group, set up a table on a sidewalk near the entrance to a United States Post Office to distribute literature and solicit contributions. The sidewalk is located entirely on post office property and is the sole means by which customers travel from the parking lot to the post office building. Respondents were convicted of violating a regulation prohibiting any person from soliciting contributions on postal premises. The Court upheld the regulation as applied.

In a plurality opinion, Justice O’Connor, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices White and Scalia, concluded that the sidewalk is not a “traditional” public forum because the “postal sidewalk at issue does not have the characteristics of public sidewalks traditionally open to expressive activity.” Justice O’Connor then rejected the claim that the sidewalk, which was available for all conventional forms of expressive activity other than solicitation, was a “limited-purpose” public forum:

The Postal Service has not expressly dedicated its sidewalks to any expressive activity. [Although] individuals or groups have been permitted to leaflet, speak, and picket on postal premises, [the] practice of allowing some speech activities on postal property [does] not add up to the dedication of postal property to speech activities. [“The] government does not create a public forum by...permitting limited discourse, but only by intentionally opening a nontraditional forum for public discourse.” [Cornelius]. [It] is anomalous [to suggest] that the Service’s allowance of some avenues of speech would be relied upon as evidence that it is impermissibly suppressing other speech. If anything, the Service’s generous accommodation of some types of speech testifies to its willingness to provide as broad a forum as possible, consistent with its postal mission. [Any other view] would create, in the name of the First Amendment, a disincentive for the Government to dedicate its property to any speech activities at all.

Justice Kennedy concurred in the result. Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, dissented. Would it be constitutional for the post office to permit only charities eligible to participate in the CFC to distribute literature on this sidewalk?

6. Speaker-based restrictions. Note that Perry, Cornelius, and Forbes involved “speaker-based” restrictions. Such restrictions, which treat some speakers differently than others, but define the distinction in terms other than content, do not fit neatly within the Court’s content-based/content-neutral distinction. In these cases, the Court sharply distinguished speaker-based from viewpoint-based restrictions and, at least in the nonpublic forum context, tested speaker-based restrictions by a standard of reasonableness. But speaker-based restrictions often have clear viewpoint-differential effects. In Perry, for example, the challenged policy unquestionably favored some viewpoints over others, for recognized bargaining agents are likely to take consistent and predictable positions on particular issues. Indeed, in some instances, speaker-based restrictions may correlate almost perfectly with viewpoint. Consider, for example, laws granting special subsidies to veterans’ organizations or denying tax deductions to individuals who contribute to the Communist Party. How should we deal with such restrictions? See Stone, Content Regulation and the First Amendment, 25 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 189, 244–251 (1983).

7. Evaluation. Consider the Court’s categorization of “quintessential,” “limited,” and “non” public forums. Do these categories make sense? Do you agree that the Court in Perry “indulged in a shell game, [throwing] out a circular definition of the public forum”? L. Tribe, Constitutional Choices 207 (1985). Consider the following views:

a. Subject matter classifications should be subjected to closer scrutiny in “quintessential” public forums than in “non” public forums for the same reasons that content-neutral restrictions are subjected to closer scrutiny in quintessential public forums.

b. Whether a particular public facility constitutes a “limited” public forum, rather than a “non” public forum, turns on the amount of speech government has allowed. If the government allows almost all speech, and excludes only a narrow category, as in Widmar, it has created a public forum. If it excludes almost all speech, and allows only a narrow category, as in Lehman, Greer, and Perry, it has not created a public forum.

c. “Classification of public places as various types of forums has only confused judicial opinions by diverting attention from the real first amendment [issues]. Like the fourth amendment, the first amendment ‘protects people, not places.’ Constitutional protection should depend not on labeling the speaker’s physical location but on the first amendment values and governmental interests involved in the case.” Farber and Nowak, The Misleading Nature of Public Forum Analysis: Content and Context in First Amendment Adjudication, 70 Va. L. Rev. 1219, 1234 (1984).

d. Contrary to the Court’s doctrine, government should be permitted to impose viewpoint-based restrictions in non-public forums, such as “vanity license plates, ads on public transit vehicles, and public school classrooms used for after-school programs,” at least insofar as it forbids “demeaning speech based on race and other characteristics that we protect in various ways through equality doctrine, either constitutional or statutory.” This makes sense because when the government decides to permit speech in non-public forums, it is acting not as a censor but as a “participant” in “the speech market.” In sum, “we should overcome” our concerns about viewpoint discrimination in such settings “because criminal and civil sanctions are not involved, and we want the state to provide space for a wide variety of private speech while permitting it to avoid fostering certain kinds of hateful messages.” Greene, The Concept of the Speech Platform: Walker v. Texas Division, 68 Ala. L. Rev. 337 (2016).

Note: Religious Expression and the Meaning of “Viewpoint Neutrality”

1. Viewpoint versus subject matter. In Lamb's Chapel v. Moriches Union Free School District, supra, the Court considered the constitutionality of a school district rule that permitted after-school social, civic, and recreational uses of school property, but prohibited the use of such property for religious purposes. Applying this rule, the school district rejected Lamb's Chapel's request to show on school property religious-oriented films concerning family values and childrearing. The lower courts upheld the rule on the theory that the school property was "a limited public forum open only for designated purposes," and that access to such a forum "can be based on subject matter [so] long as the distinctions drawn are reasonable [and] viewpoint neutral." The Supreme Court accepted this analysis, but nonetheless invalidated the rule because it was not "viewpoint neutral."

In reaching this result, the Court rejected the lower courts' conclusion that the challenged rule was based on subject matter, rather than viewpoint, "because it [would] be applied in the same way to all uses of school property for religious purposes." Although conceding that "all religions and all uses for religious purposes are treated alike under the rule," the Court observed that this "does not answer the critical question" whether it constitutes discrimination "on the basis of viewpoint to permit the school property to be used for the presentation of all views about family issues [except] those dealing with the subject matter from a religious standpoint." The Court reasoned that the "film involved here [dealt] with a subject otherwise permissible under [the rule], and its exhibition was denied solely because the film dealt with the subject from a religious standpoint." The Court therefore concluded that the rule "violates the First Amendment" because it denied "access to a speaker solely to suppress the point of view he espouses on an otherwise included subject."

Consider Stone, The Equal Access Controversy: The Religion Clauses and the Meaning of "Neutrality," 81 Nw. U. L. Rev. 168, 169–170 (1986):

The protection of political speech, like religious speech, lies at the very core of the first amendment. The Court often has recognized, however, that government may grant special benefits to nonpolitical speech without extending those benefits to political speech, so long as it does not expressly favor any particular political viewpoint. [Citing Lehman, Greer, and Cornelius.] This is so because policies that disadvantage political speech as a class are less threatening to first amendment values than laws that expressly disadvantage specific points of view.

A similar principle [should govern] religious expression. As the Supreme Court has long recognized, the "clearest command" of the religion clauses is that "one religious denomination cannot be officially preferred over another."

[Denominational] discrimination in the religious context is the analog of viewpoint discrimination in the political context. [The] corollary is also true, however. Governmental policies that grant special benefits to nonreligious expression as a class should be tested by the same—less demanding—standards that the Court uses to test the constitutionality of governmental policies that grant special benefits to nonpolitical expression as a class. In the religious, as in the political, realm the broader subject-matter classification is less threatening to core first amendment values.

2. Lamb's Chapel revisited: further debate on the meaning of viewpoint neutrality. In Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995), the Court, in a five-to-four decision, invalidated a University of Virginia policy authorizing payment from the Student Activities Fund for the printing costs of a variety of student publications, but prohibiting payment for any student publication that “primarily promotes or manifests a particular belief in or about a deity or an ultimate reality.” The suit was brought by a student organization that was denied funding because it publishes a journal that “offers a Christian perspective on both personal and community issues,” such as “racism, crisis pregnancy, [and] homosexuality.”

The Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, explained that, although the “necessities of confining a forum to the limited and legitimate purposes for which it was created may justify the State in reserving it for certain groups or for the discussion of certain topics,” it may not “discriminate against speech on the basis of its viewpoint.” The Court then observed that these “same principles apply” to the Student Activities Fund, which the Court described as a “forum,” albeit “more in a metaphysical than in a spatial or geographic sense.”

Acknowledging that the definition of viewpoint discrimination “is not a precise one,” the Court nonetheless concluded that “here, as in Lamb's Chapel, viewpoint discrimination is the proper way to interpret the University’s” policy. The Court explained that this was so because it was the religious “perspective” of the journal, rather than the “subjects discussed,” such as racism, pregnancy or homosexuality, that resulted in the university’s refusal to pay the journal’s printing costs.

In dissent, Justice Souter, joined by Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer, maintained that the “issue whether a distinction is based on viewpoint does not turn simply on whether a government regulation happens to be applied to a speaker who seeks to advance a particular viewpoint,” but “on whether the burden on speech is explained by reference to viewpoint.” Thus, citing Lehman, Justice Souter observed that “a municipality’s decision to prohibit political advertising on bus placards” does not “amount to viewpoint discrimination when in the course of applying this policy it denies space to a person who wishes to speak in favor of a particular political candidate.”

Justice Souter argued that it is the “element of taking sides in a public debate that identifies viewpoint discrimination and makes it the most pernicious of all distinctions based on content.” Justice Souter reasoned that, given this understanding, there was “no viewpoint discrimination” in this case:

If the [policy] were written [so] as to limit [only] Christian advocacy, [the] discrimination would be based on viewpoint. But that is not what the regulation authorizes; it applies to Muslim and Jewish and Buddhist advocacy as well as Christian. And since it limits funding to activities promoting or manifesting a particular belief not only “in” but “about” a deity or ultimate reality, it applies to agnostics and atheists as well as [to] deists and theists. [Thus, the policy does] not skew debate by funding one position but not its competitors. [It simply denies] funding for hortatory speech that “primarily promotes or manifests” any view on the merits of religion; [it denies] funding for the entire subject matter of religious apologetics.

Justice Souter therefore concluded that this case was distinguishable from Lamb’s Chapel, where the “regulation did not purport to deny access to any speaker wishing to express a non-religious or expressly antireligious point of view.” He concluded that, if the policy at issue in this case “amounts to viewpoint discrimination, the Court has all but eviscerated the line between viewpoint and content.”

Recall the debate over a similar issue in R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, section D8, supra. In light of the Court’s reasoning in Lamb’s Chapel and Rosenberger, does it follow that the regulation of “obscenity” is also impermissibly viewpoint-based “because it is justified by moral objections to the ideas or messages that sexual speech is said to convey”? Heins, Viewpoint Discrimination, 24 Hast. Const. L.Q. 99, 103 (1996).

3. Religious speech as viewpoint discrimination: another look. In Good News Club v. Milford Central School, 533 U.S. 98 (2001), the school district authorized district residents to use school buildings after school hours for “instruction in education, learning, or the arts” and for “social, civic, recreational, and entertainment uses pertaining to the community welfare,” but not for “religious purposes.” The school district denied a request by the Good News Club, a private Christian organization for children ages six to twelve, to use school property to “sing songs, hear Bible lessons, memorize scripture and pray” on the ground that this constituted “religious purposes.”

The Court, in a six-to-three decision, held that this was unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination in a limited public forum. In his opinion for the Court, Justice Thomas explained that “the Club seeks to address a subject otherwise permitted under the rule, the teaching of morals and character, from a religious standpoint.” He therefore concluded that this case was indistinguishable from Lamb’s Chapel and Rosenberger.

In dissent, Justice Stevens argued that “speech for ‘religious purposes’ may reasonably be understood to encompass three different categories. First, there is religious speech that is simply speech about a particular topic from a religious point of view. [Second], there is religious speech that amounts to worship. [Third], there is [speech] that is aimed principally at proselytizing or inculcating a belief in a particular religious faith.” In Justice Stevens’s view, “the question is whether a school can [create] a limited public forum that admits the first type of religious speech without allowing the other two.” He concluded that “just as a school may allow meetings to discuss current events from a political perspective without also allowing organized political recruitment, so too can a school allow discussion of topics such as moral development from a religious (or nonreligious) perspective without thereby opening its forum to religious proselytizing or worship.”

In a separate dissenting opinion, Justice Souter, joined by Justice Ginsburg, argued that this case was distinguishable from Lamb’s Chapel and Rosenberger because “Good News intends to use the public school premise not for the mere discussion of a subject from a particular, Christian point of view, but for an evangelical service of worship calling children to commit themselves in an act of Christian conversion.” He maintained that the majority’s position stands “for the remarkable proposition that any public school opened for civic meetings must be opened for use as a church, synagogue, or mosque.”

In a concurring opinion, Justice Scalia responded to the dissenters: “The dissenters emphasize that the religious speech [of the Club is] ‘aimed principally at proselytizing or inculcating belief in a particular religious faith. [But this] does not distinguish the Club’s activities from those of [political, social, and cultural organizations that also] may seek to inculcate children with their beliefs [and try to] ‘recruit others to join their respective groups.’”

CHRISTIAN LEGAL SOCIETY CHAPTER v. MARTINEZ, 561 U.S. 661 (2011). Hastings College of the Law, a public law school within the University of California system, extends official recognition to student groups through its “Registered Student Organization” (RSO) program. RSOs receive certain benefits, including the use of school funds, facilities, and channels of communication, as well as the use of Hastings' name and logo. In exchange for such recognition, RSOs must abide by certain conditions. All RSOs, for example, must comply with the school's Nondiscrimination Policy, which forbids discrimination on the basis of race, religion, gender, national origin, age, disability, ancestry, and sexual orientation. Hastings interprets this policy to mandate acceptance of all students.

In 2004, students at Hastings created the Christian Legal Society by affiliating with a national Christian association that charters student chapters at law schools throughout the country. These chapters must adopt bylaws that, inter alia, require members and officers to sign a "Statement of Faith" and to conduct their lives in accord with prescribed principles. CLS excludes from affiliation anyone who engages in "unrepentant homosexual conduct" or holds religious convictions different from those in the Statement of Faith. Hastings rejected CLS's application for RSO status on the ground that the group excluded students based on religion and sexual orientation. CLS filed this action asserting that Hastings' "accept all-comers" policy violates its First Amendment rights of expression and association.

The Court, in a five-to-four decision, rejected CLS's claim. Justice Ginsburg delivered the opinion of the Court: "[Hastings], through its RSO program, established a limited public forum. [See Rosenberger]. [The] Court has permitted restrictions on access to a limited public forum, like the RSO program here, [if they are] reasonable and viewpoint neutral. [We first] consider whether the Hastings' policy is reasonable. [With] appropriate regard for school administrators' judgment, we review the justifications Hastings offers in defense of its all-comers requirement. First, the open-access policy 'ensures that the leadership, educational, and social opportunities afforded by [RSOs] are available to all students.' [Second], the all-comers requirement helps Hastings police the written terms of its Nondiscrimination Policy without inquiring into an RSO's motivation for membership restrictions. [Third], the Law School reasonably adheres to the view that an all-comers [policy] 'encourages tolerance, cooperation, and learning among students.' [Fourth], Hastings' policy [conveys] the Law School's decision 'to decline to subsidize with public monies and benefits [discriminatory conduct].'"

"The Law School's policy is all the more creditworthy in view of the substantial alternative channels that remain open for [CLS-student] communication to take place. [Student groups] commonly maintain a presence at universities without official school affiliation. Based on the record before us, CLS [hosted] a variety of activities the year after Hastings denied it recognition.

[It bears emphasizing] that nonrecognition of a student organization is [not] equivalent to prohibiting its members from speaking....

“CLS [assails] the reasonableness of the all-comers policy [by forecasting] that the policy will facilitate hostile takeovers; if organizations must open their arms to all, CLS contends, saboteurs will infiltrate groups to subvert their mission and message. This supposition strikes us as more hypothetical than real, [but if] students begin to exploit an all-comers policy by hijacking organizations to distort or destroy their missions, Hastings presumably would revisit and revise its policy....

“We next consider whether Hastings’ all-comers policy is viewpoint neutral. [It is] hard to imagine a more viewpoint-neutral policy than one requiring all student groups to accept all comers. [CLS] attacks the regulation by pointing to its effect: The policy is vulnerable to constitutional assault, CLS contends, because ‘it systematically and predictably burdens most heavily those groups whose viewpoints are out of favor with the campus mainstream.’ [This] argument stumbles from its first step because ‘[a] regulation that serves purposes unrelated to the content of expression is deemed neutral, even if it has an incidental effect on some speakers or messages but not others.’ [Moreover,] Hastings’ requirement that student groups accept all [comers] ‘is justified without reference to the content [or viewpoint] of the regulated speech.’ The Law School’s policy aims at the act of rejecting would-be group members without reference to the reasons motivating that [behavior]. CLS’ conduct—not its Christian perspective—is [what] stands between the group and RSO status. [Finding] Hastings’ open-access condition on RSO status reasonable and viewpoint neutral, we reject CLS’ free-speech and expressive-association claims.”

Note that the Court decided the case on the basis of a stipulation by the parties that Hastings had interpreted and applied the Nondiscrimination Policy as an “accept all-comers” policy. Would it change the analysis if the Court had considered the constitutionality of the Nondiscrimination Policy itself—that is, as a policy denying RSO status to organizations discriminating on the basis of certain particular characteristics (that is, race, religion, gender, sexual orientation, etc.)?

Does it matter that this case involves a subsidy rather than a prohibition? Suppose, for example, the state made it unlawful for any group or organization to deny membership to any person. Would such a law be constitutional as applied to the Democratic Party, if it wants to exclude Republicans from voting in its upcoming primary? Would it be constitutional as applied to a synagogue that restricts membership only to Jews? Suppose that, instead of prohibiting such selective membership, the state merely denied tax-exempt status to any group or organization that isn't open to all comers?

Consider the Court's response to this question: "CLS, in seeking what is effectively a state subsidy, faces only indirect pressure to modify its membership policies; CLS may exclude any person for any reason if it forgoes the benefits of official recognition. [Our] decisions have distinguished between policies that require action and those that withhold benefits. [The] First Amendment shields CLS against state prohibition of the organization's expressive activity, [but] CLS enjoys no constitutional right to state subvention of its selectivity." Suppose Hastings denied RSO status only to student organizations that promote religion? On compelled association, see Section 5e2 infra.

Justice Alito, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Scalia and Thomas, dissented: "The proudest boast of our free speech jurisprudence is that we protect the freedom to express 'the thought that we hate.' Today's decision rests on a very different principle: no freedom for expression that offends prevailing standards of political correctness in our country's institutions of higher learning. [Hastings] currently has more than 60 registered groups and, in all its history, has denied registration to exactly one: the Christian Legal Society."

Justice Alito maintained that, for procedural reasons, the Nondiscrimination Policy rather than the accept-all-comers policy was properly at issue in the case, and he therefore proceeded to consider the constitutionality of that policy: "[Many RSOs at Hastings] are dedicated to expressing a message. For example, Silenced Right, a pro-life group, [teaches] that 'all human life [is] sacred and has inherent dignity,' while [the] American Constitution Society [seeks] 'to counter [a] narrow conservative vision' of American law.' [Under the Nondiscrimination Policy, such groups may exclude members who do not share the organization's views, without losing their RSO status, because discrimination of the basis of political, philosophical, cultural, or social viewpoints is not prohibited. The Nondiscrimination Policy] singled out one category of expressive associations for disfavored treatment: groups formed to express a religious message. Only religious groups were required to admit students who did not share their views. An environmentalist group was not required to admit students who rejected global warming. [But] CLS was required to admit avowed atheists. This was patent viewpoint discrimination. It is no wonder that the Court makes no attempt to defend the constitutionality of the Nondiscrimination Policy.]"

Although the Court found it unnecessary to consider the constitutionality of the Nondiscrimination Policy because of the parties' stipulation, Justice Stevens filed a separate concurring opinion responding to Justice Alito: "In the dissent's view, by refusing to grant CLS an exemption from the Nondiscrimination Policy, Hastings violated CLS's rights, for by proscribing unlawful discrimination on the basis of religion, the policy discriminated unlawfully on the basis of religion. [But] the Nondiscrimination Policy is content and viewpoint neutral. It does not reflect a judgment by school officials about any student group's speech. [Indeed], it does not regulate expression or belief at all. [What] the policy does reflect is a judgment that discrimination [on] the basis of certain factors, such as race and religion, is less tolerable than discrimination on the basis of other factors."

Justice Alito responded to this argument: "Justice Stevens [argues] that the Nondiscrimination Policy is viewpoint neutral because it 'does not regulate expression or belief at all' but instead regulates conduct. This Court has held, however, that the particular conduct at issue here constitutes a form of expression that is protected by the First Amendment. It is [well] established that the First Amendment shields the right of a group to engage in expressive association by limiting membership to persons whose admission does not significantly interfere with the group's ability to convey its views. [Citing Boy Scouts v. Dale, section E5 infra.] [Moreover, the Nondiscrimination Policy] also discriminates on the basis of viewpoint regarding sexual morality. CLS has a particular viewpoint on this subject, namely, that sexual conduct outside marriage [is] wrongful. Hastings would not allow CLS to express this viewpoint by limiting membership to persons willing to express a sincere agreement with CLS's views. By contrast, [a] Free Love Club could require members to affirm that they reject the traditional view of sexual morality to which CLS adheres. It is hard to see how this can be viewed as anything other than viewpoint discrimination."

Justice Alito then turned to the "accept-all-comers" version of the Hastings policy: "There can be no dispute that [the first amendment] would not permit a generally applicable law mandating that private religious groups admit members who do not share the group's beliefs. Religious groups like CLS obviously engage in expressive association, and no legitimate state interest could override the powerful effect that an accept-all-comers law would have on the ability of religious groups to express their views. The State of California surely could not demand that all Christian groups admit members who believe that Jesus was merely human. [Muslim] groups could not be forced to admit person who are viewed as slandering Islam. [But] the Court now holds that Hastings [may] impose these very same requirements on students who wish to [gain the benefits of RSO status]. The Court lists four justifications offered by Hastings in defense of the accept-all-comers policy, [but these justifications] are insufficient.

[Moreover], statements in the majority opinion make it seem as if the denial of registration did not hurt CLS at all. [Beyond that, though, the] majority's emphasis on CLS's ability to endure [by] using private facilities and means of communication [is] quite amazing. This Court does not customarily brush aside a claim of unlawful discrimination with the observation that the effects of the discrimination were really not so bad....

"The Court is also wrong in holding that the accept-all-comers policy is viewpoint neutral. The Court proclaims that it would be 'hard to imagine a more viewpoint-neutral policy,' but I would not be so quick to jump to this conclusion. Even if it is assumed that the policy is viewpoint neutral on its face, there is strong evidence in the record that the policy was announced as a pretext. The adoption of a facially neutral policy for the purpose of suppressing the expression of a particular viewpoint is viewpoint discrimination. Here, CLS has made a strong showing that Hastings's sudden adoption [of] its accept-all-comers policy was a pretext for the law school's unlawful denial of CLS's registration application under the Nondiscrimination Policy....

"I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that today's decision is a serious setback for freedom of expression in this country. [I] can only hope this decision will turn out to be an aberration."

REED v. TOWN OF GILBERT, 135 S. Ct. 2218 (2015). The Court in Mosley held that even subject-matter restrictions in public forums must be subjected to heightened scrutiny because they distinguish among speakers on the basis of the content of their expression. In subsequent decisions, the Court made clear that a less demanding standard of review applies to subject-matter restrictions in nonpublic forums. What rule should apply to subject-matter restrictions that regulate speech on private property? The Court addressed the private property issue in Reed v. Town of Gilbert. The Town of Gilbert comprehensively regulated signs displayed on private property in ways that made distinctions between different types of signs. For example, "temporary directional signs" could be no larger than six square feet and could be in place for no longer than twelve hours before the event and one hour afterward, while "political signs" could be up to thirty-two square feet and could be displayed up to sixty days before a primary election and up to fifteen days following a general election. In total, the regulations imposed different rules for twenty-three categories of signs.

Applying this regulation, the Good News Community Church was cited for exceeding the permissible time limit for a sign displaying the time and location of an upcoming service. What standard of review should apply in such a case?

Should this regulation be tested by the same standard of review as a law that distinguished between signs on the basis of viewpoint (distinguishing, for example, between the permissible size of anti-war and pro-war signs), or should it be tested by some less demanding standard?

The Court, in an opinion by Justice Thomas, held the challenged ordinance unconstitutional. Invoking Mosley, Thomas declared that because the Town's code was "content based on its face" it must be subjected to "strict scrutiny," explaining that although "this type of ordinance may seem like a perfectly rational way to regulate signs,...a clear and firm rule governing content neutrality is an essential means of protecting the freedom of speech." Thomas conceded that "government discrimination among viewpoints" may be the most "blatant and egregious form of content discrimination," but he insisted that "the First Amendment's hostility to content-based regulations extends not only to restrictions on particular viewpoints, but also to prohibition of public discussion of an entire topic." Thus, Thomas concluded, because the challenged ordinance "singles out specific subject matter for differential treatment, even if it does not target viewpoints within that subject matter," it must be tested by strict scrutiny, "which requires the Government to prove that the restriction furthers a compelling interest and is narrowly tailored to achieve that interest."

Does it make sense to treat all content-based restrictions in the same way that viewpoint-based restrictions are treated? What are the costs and benefits of such an approach? Although concurring in the result because the particular distinctions drawn by the ordinance could not pass "even the laugh test," Justice Kagan, joined by Justices Ginsburg and Breyer, emphatically disagreed with the Court's analysis. Indeed, she noted, given the Court's approach many perfectly sensible "sign ordinances [are] now in jeopardy." The courts, she noted, will now "have to determine that a town has a compelling interest in informing passersby where George Washington slept. And likewise, courts [will] have to find that a town has no way to prevent hidden-driveway mishaps than by specially treating hidden-driveway signs. [The] consequence—unless courts water down strict scrutiny to something unrecognizable—is that our communities will find themselves in an unenviable bind: They will have to either repeal the exemptions that allow for helpful signs on streets and sidewalks, or else lift their sign restrictions altogether and resign themselves to the resulting clutter."

In a separate concurring opinion, Justice Breyer also rejected the majority's reasoning. He maintained that although it makes sense to use strict scrutiny to evaluate the constitutionality of laws that discriminate on the basis of viewpoint or that restrict speech on the basis of content in "a traditional public forum," it makes no sense to hold that content discrimination always triggers strict scrutiny. Such a rule, he observed, would require the Court to invalidate a broad range of perfectly sensible content-based regulations, including, for example, regulations of “securities,” of “energy conservation labeling-practices,” of “prescription-drugs,” of “doctor-patient confidentiality,” of “signs at petting zoos,” and so on. Breyer warned that the likely outcome of the Court’s approach will be the “watering down” of “strict scrutiny” in order to reach sensible results in such cases, with the dangerous consequence of weakening “the First Amendment’s protection in instances where ‘strict scrutiny’ should apply in full force.”

For an especially thoughtful analysis of this puzzle, see Lakier, Reed v. Town of Gilbert, Arizona, and the Rise of the Anticlassificatory First Amendment, 2016 Sup. Ct. Rev. 233. See also Armijo, Reed v. Town of Gilbert, Relax, Everybody, 58 B.C. L. Rev. 65 (2017).

d. Unequal Access and the Problem of Government Speech

To what extent, if any, should the principles and doctrines that govern access to public parks, airport terminals, and military bases also govern public auditoriums, school libraries, and government-funded programs to support the arts? To what extent may the government itself engage in speech? When the government speaks, must it do so in an even-handed manner?

Consider Matal v. Tam, 582 U.S. --- (2017): “[The] Free Speech Clause... does not regulate government speech.’ [‘The] First Amendment forbids the government to regulate speech in ways that favor some viewpoints or ideas at the expense of others,’ [but] imposing a requiring of viewpoint neutrality on government speech would be paralyzing. [Here] is a simply example. During the Second World War, the Federal Government produced and distributed millions of posters to promote the war effort. [These] posters expressed a viewpoint, but the First Amendment did not demand that the Government balance the message on these posters by producing and distributing posters [opposing the war effort.]” What are limits of this doctrine?

SOUTHEASTERN PROMOTIONS v. CONRAD, 420 U.S. 546 (1975).

Petitioner, a promoter of theatrical productions, applied to a municipal board charged with managing a city auditorium and a city-leased theater to present the musical Hair at the theater. Although no conflicting engagement was scheduled, the board, based on reports that the musical was sexually explicit, involved nudity, and might be “obscene,” rejected the application because the production would not be “in the best interest of the community.” The Court held that this action constituted an unconstitutional prior restraint. Justice Blackmun, speaking for the Court, explained:

“The elements of prior restraint [were] clearly present in the system by which [the] board regulated the use of its theaters. One seeking to use a theater was required to apply to the board. The board was empowered to determine whether the applicant should be granted permission—in effect, a license or permit—on the basis of its review of the content of the proposed production. [The board’s] action was no less a prior restraint because the public facilities under [its] control happened to be municipal theaters. The Memorial Auditorium and the [city-leased theater] were public forums designed for and dedicated to expressive activities. [Thus, in] order to be held lawful, [the board’s] action [must] have been accomplished with procedural safeguards that reduce the danger of suppressing constitutionally protected speech. [We] held in [Freedman v. Maryland, section C2 supra], that a system of prior restraint runs afoul of the First Amendment if it lacks certain safeguards. [Such] safeguards were lacking here.”

Justice Douglas dissented in part and concurred in the result in part: “The critical flaw in this case lies, not in the absence of procedural safeguards, but rather in the very nature of the content screening in which respondents have engaged. [A] municipal theater is no less a forum for the expression of ideas than is a public park, or a sidewalk. [As] soon as municipal officials are permitted to pick and choose [between] those productions which are ‘clean and healthful and culturally uplifting’ in content and those which are not, the path is cleared for a regime of censorship under which full voice can be given only to those views which meet with the approval of the powers that be.”

Justice White, joined by Chief Justice Burger, dissented: “[The District Court described] the play as involving not only nudity but repeated ‘simulated acts of anal intercourse, frontal intercourse, heterosexual intercourse, homosexual intercourse, and group intercourse.’ Given this description of ‘Hair,’ the First Amendment in my view does not compel municipal authorities to permit production of the play in municipal facilities. Whether or not a production as described by the District Court is obscene and may be forbidden to adult audiences, it is apparent to me that the [State] could constitutionally forbid exhibition of the musical to children, [Ginsberg v. New York, section D5, supra], and that [the city] may reserve its auditorium for productions suitable for exhibition to all citizens of the city, adults and children alike.”

Justice Rehnquist also dissented: “[Until] this case the Court has not equated a public auditorium, which must of necessity schedule performances by a process of inclusion and exclusion, with public streets and parks. [Moreover, here] we deal with municipal [action], not prohibiting or penalizing the expression of views in dramatic form [in privately owned theaters], but rather managing its municipal auditorium. [If] it is the desire of the citizens of [the city], who presumably have paid for and own the facilities, that the attractions to be shown there should not be of the kind which would offend any substantial number of potential theatergoers, I do not think the policy can be described as arbitrary or unreasonable. [May] an opera house limit its production to operas, or must it also show rock musicals? May a municipal theater devote an entire season to Shakespeare, or is it required to book any potential producer on a first come, first served basis?"

What substantive standards should govern the use of municipal auditoriums? Consider Shiffrin, Government Speech, 27 UCLA L. Rev. 565, 584 (1980): "Conrad does not appreciate the complicated relationships between public forum doctrine and government interests in speech. Conrad supposes that the government could not choose between competing applicants on a content basis. Yet such a supposition denies any legitimate government speech interest." What is the city's "speech interest" in Conrad? May the city limit use of the auditorium to the presentation of Shakespeare? To "family" productions? To "competently performed" productions?

Suppose a city allocates $50,000 per year to "promote the arts." What factors may it consider in awarding its grants? Consider the following statute, which was proposed by Senator Jesse Helms in 1990:

None of the funds authorized to be appropriated pursuant to this Act may be used by [the National Endowment for the Arts] to promote, disseminate, or produce—

- obscene or indecent material, including but not limited to depictions of sadomasochism, homo-eroticism, the exploitation of children, or individuals engaged in sex acts; or
- material which denigrates the objects or beliefs of the adherents of a particular religion or non-religion; or
- material which denigrates, debases, or reviles a person, group, or class of citizens on the basis of race, creed, sex, handicap, age, or national origin.

Are government subsidies of expression less problematic than government restrictions? Is the ordinance in Mosley a subsidy or a restriction?

BOARD OF EDUCATION, ISLAND TREES UNION FREE SCHOOL DISTRICT v. PICO, 457 U.S. 853 (1982). In 1975, several members of the petitioner Board of Education attended a conference sponsored by a politically conservative organization at which they obtained lists of books described as “objectionable” and as “improper fare for school students.” Thereafter, the board removed eleven of the listed books from the district’s school libraries “so that Board members could read them.” In a press release justifying this action, the board characterized the books as “anti-American, anti-Christian, anti-Semitic, and just plain filthy.” Among the books removed were Slaughterhouse Five, by Kurt Vonnegut, Jr.; The Naked Ape, by Desmond Morris; Best Short Stories of Negro Writers, edited by Langston Hughes; Soul on Ice, by Eldridge Cleaver; and Go Ask Alice, of anonymous authorship. The board appointed a Book Review Committee, consisting of parents and teachers, to recommend whether the books should be retained. Although the committee recommended that most of the books should be retained, the board decided to remove nine of the books and to make one other available subject to parental approval. Respondents, students in the Island Trees school system, brought this action claiming that the board’s decision violated the first amendment. The district court, finding that the board acted not on religious or political principles, but “on its belief that the [books] were irrelevant, vulgar, immoral, and in bad taste,” granted summary judgment to the board. The court of appeals reversed and remanded for a trial on the merits. The Supreme Court affirmed. Justice Brennan delivered an opinion joined by Justices Marshall and Stevens and joined in part by Justice Blackmun:

“[A]lthough petitioners] rightly possess significant discretion to determine the content of their school [libraries, that] discretion may not be exercised in a narrowly partisan or political manner. If a Democratic school board, motivated by party affiliation, ordered the removal of all books written by or in favor of Republicans, few would doubt that the order violated the [first amendment]. The same conclusion would surely apply if an all-white school board, motivated by racial animus, decided to remove all books authored by blacks or advocating racial equality and integration. Our Constitution does not permit the official suppression of ideas. Thus, whether petitioners’ removal of the books from their school libraries [violated the first amendment] depends upon the motivation behind petitioners’ actions. If petitioners intended by their removal decision to deny respondents access to ideas with which petitioners disagreed, and if this intent was the decisive factor in petitioners’ decision, then petitioners have exercised their discretion in violation of the Constitution. On the other hand, [an] unconstitutional motivation would not be demonstrated if it were shown that petitioners had decided to remove the books at issue because those books were pervasively vulgar [or educationally unsuitable]. Such motivations] would not carry the danger of an official suppression of ideas, and thus would not violate respondents' First Amendment rights." Justices White and Blackmun filed concurring opinions.

Justice Rehnquist, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Powell, filed a dissenting opinion: "[When the government] acts as an educator, at least at the elementary and secondary school level, [it] is engaged in inculcating social values and knowledge in relatively impressionable young people. Obviously there are innumerable decisions to be made as to what courses should be taught, what books should be purchased, or what teachers should be employed. [In my view,] it is 'permissible and appropriate for local boards to make educational decisions based upon their personal, social, political and moral views.' [Actions] by the government as educator do not raise the same First Amendment concerns as actions by the government as sovereign." Chief Justice Burger and Justices Powell and O'Connor also filed dissenting opinions.

Do you agree with the plurality that a school board cannot constitutionally remove books "simply because they dislike the ideas" espoused? Consider Justice Powell's evaluation, set forth in his Pico dissent: "[Under the plurality's approach, books] may not be removed because they are indecent; extoll violence, intolerance and racism; or degrade the dignity of the individual. [I] would not require a school board to promote ideas and values repugnant to a democratic society."

Suppose a school or public library has computer terminals to connect users to the internet. To what extent, and in what circumstances, may the library use filters to prevent students or library patrons from accessing "inappropriate" material?

Consider United States v. American Library Association, 539 U.S. 194 (2003): Two federal programs provided funds to public libraries to help them expand access to the internet. The Children's Internet Protection Act (CIPA), however, forbade public libraries to receive federal funds under these programs unless they installed software to block obscenity and child pornography and to prevent minors from accessing material that is "harmful to minors." A group of libraries, library patrons, and Web site publishers brought suit challenging CIPA's filtering provisions. The lower federal court held CIPA unconstitutional, but the Supreme Court reversed.

Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justices O'Connor, Scalia, and Thomas, authored a plurality opinion: "Congress has wide latitude to attach conditions to the receipt of federal assistance in order to further its policy objectives. But Congress may not 'induce' the recipient 'to engage in activities that would themselves be unconstitutional.' To determine whether libraries would violate the First Amendment by employing the filtering software that CIPA requires, we must [examine] the role of libraries in our society. Public libraries pursue the worthy missions of facilitating learning and cultural enrichment. [To] fulfill [these] missions, public libraries must have broad discretion to decide what material to provide to their patrons. Although they seek to provide a wide array of information, their goal has never been to provide 'universal coverage.' Instead, public libraries seek to provide materials 'that would be of the greatest direct benefit or interest to the community.' To this end, libraries collect only those materials deemed to have 'requisite and appropriate quality.' [Most] libraries already exclude pornography from their print collections because they deem it inappropriate for inclusion. We do not subject these decisions to heightened scrutiny; it would make little sense to treat libraries' judgments to block online pornography any differently, when these judgments are made for just the same reason....

"Appellees urge us to affirm the District Court's judgment on [the] ground that CIPA imposes an unconstitutional condition on the receipt of federal assistance. Under this doctrine, 'the government may not deny a benefit to a person on a basis that infringes his constitutionally protected...freedom of speech even if he has no entitlement to that benefit.' Appellees argue that CIPA imposes an unconstitutional condition on libraries that receive [federal] subsidies by requiring them, as a condition on their receipt of federal funds, to surrender their First Amendment right to provide the public with access to constitutionally protected speech....

"Within broad limits, 'when the Government appropriates public funds to establish a program it is entitled to define the limits of that program.' [Citing Rust.] The [internet subsidy] programs were intended to help public libraries fulfill their traditional role of obtaining material of requisite and appropriate quality for educational and informational purposes. Congress may certainly insist that these 'public funds be spent for the purposes for which they were authorized.' Especially because public libraries have traditionally excluded pornographic material from their other collections, Congress could reasonably impose a parallel limitation on its Internet assistance programs. As the use of filtering software helps to carry out these programs, it is a permissible condition under Rust. [CIPA does not prohibit public libraries from providing computers to adult patrons that enable them to access material that is obscene for minors, it] simply reflects Congress' decision not to subsidize their doing so. ['A] refusal to fund protected activity, without more, cannot be equated with the imposition of a "penalty" on that activity.'" [Quoting Rust.] Justices Kennedy and Breyer filed concurring opinions. Justices Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg dissented.

REGAN v. TAXATION WITH REPRESENTATION OF WASHINGTON, 461 U.S. 540 (1983). In a unanimous decision, the Court upheld a federal statute providing that contributions to an otherwise tax-exempt organization, other than a tax-exempt veterans' organization, are not tax deductible if a substantial part of the organization's activities consists of attempts to influence legislation. Justice Rehnquist delivered the opinion of the Court:

"Congress is not required by the First Amendment to subsidize lobbying. [Respondent contends, however, that the challenged provision is unconstitutional because of its distinction between veterans' and other tax-exempt organizations. We do not agree.] The case would be different if Congress were to discriminate invidiously in its subsidies in such a way as to "aim[] at the suppression of dangerous ideas.'" [But] veterans' organizations [receive] tax-deductible contributions regardless of the content of [their speech]. We find no indication that the statute was intended to suppress any ideas or any demonstration that it has had that effect....

"It [is] not irrational for Congress to decide that, even though it will not subsidize substantial lobbying by charities generally, it will subsidize lobbying by veterans' organizations. Veterans have [made a unique contribution to the nation]. Our country has a long standing policy of compensating veterans for [this contribution] by providing them with numerous advantages. This policy has 'always been deemed to be legitimate.'"

Justice Blackmun, joined by Justices Brennan and Marshall, filed a concurring opinion: "Because [the] discrimination between veterans' organizations and charitable organizations is not based on the content of their speech, [it] does not deny charitable organizations equal protection of the law. [As] the Court says, a statute designed to discourage the expression of particular views would present a very different question."

Consider the following: (a) "No organization, other than a veterans' organization, may demonstrate on a military base." (b) "Contributions to an otherwise tax-exempt organization are not deductible if the organization engages in substantial lobbying activities, unless those activities concern the subject of abortion.” (c) “Contributions to an otherwise tax-exempt organization are not deductible if the organization advocates the violent overthrow of government.”

In FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1984), the Court invalidated section 399 of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, which prohibited any noncommercial educational station that receives a grant from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting to “engage in editorializing.” The Court distinguished Taxation with Representation on the ground that, under the statute at issue in Taxation with Representation, “a charitable organization could create [an] affiliate to conduct its non-lobbying activities using tax-deductible contributions, and, at the same time, establish [a] separate affiliate to pursue its lobbying efforts without such contributions,” whereas in League of Women Voters “a noncommercial educational station that receives [even] 1% of its overall income from [the CPB] is barred absolutely from all editorializing.” Thus, in Taxation with Representation the law prevented only the use of government funds for lobbying, whereas in League of Women Voters the law prohibited any station that accepted government funds from editorializing, whether or not the editorializing was paid for with government funds.

NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE ARTS v. FINLEY, 524 U.S. 569 (1998). Since its creation by Congress in 1965, the NEA has made more than 100,000 grants, totaling some three billion dollars, to promote “public knowledge, education, understanding and appreciation of the arts.” In 1989, two provocative works that were supported by NEA grants—a series of homoerotic photographs by Robert Mapplethorpe and a photograph by Andres Serrano that depicted a crucifix immersed in urine (“Piss Christ”)—prompted a public controversy that led to a congressional reevaluation of the NEA’s funding priorities and procedures. Senator Jesse Helms (R-North Carolina), for example, declared that public funding for such “art” was “an insult to taxpayers,” who “have a right not to be denigrated, offended, or mocked with their own tax dollars.” In light of those controversies, in 1990 Congress enacted section 954(d)(1), which directs the NEA, in establishing procedures to judge the artistic merit of grant applications, to “tak[e] into consideration general standards of decency and respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public.” In implementing this provision, the NEA concluded that it was not required to do anything more than ensure that its peer review panels were constituted in such a way as to represent geographic, ethnic, and aesthetic diversity. Invoking that provision, the NEA denied a grant to support the work of the performance artist

Karen Finley, who “was well known in the late 1980s for her use of food, nudity, music, and discourse on stage to address such issues as incest, rape, domination, the sexualization of women, violence, and AIDS.” See G. Stone, Sex and the Constitution 337–339 (2017).

The Court, in an opinion by Justice O’Connor, held that section 954(d)(1) is not unconstitutional “on its face”: “Respondents argue that the provision is a paradigmatic example of viewpoint discrimination. [But the challenged provision merely] adds ‘considerations’ to the grant-making process; it does not preclude awards to projects that might be deemed ‘indecent’ or ‘disrespectful,’ [or] even specify that those factors be given any particular weight in reviewing an application....

“[Moreover], the considerations that the provision introduces [do] not engender the kind of directed viewpoint discrimination that would prompt this Court to invalidate a statute on its face. [The considerations enumerated in section 954(d)(1) are] susceptible to multiple interpretations, [and particularly because the NEA considers grant applications through the decisions of many diverse review panels], the provision does not introduce considerations that, in practice, would effectively preclude or punish the expression of particular views.”

Although acknowledging that the provision could conceivably be applied in ways that could violate the first amendment, the Court was “reluctant...to invalidate legislation ‘on the basis of its hypothetical application to situations not before the Court,’” particularly where, as here, there are numerous “constitutional applications” for both the “decency” and “respect” criteria. For example, “educational programs are central to the NEA’s mission,” and “it is well-established that ‘decency’ is a permissible factor where ‘educational suitability’ motivates its consideration. [Citing Pico.]” And “permissible applications of the mandate to consider ‘respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public’ are also apparent, [for the] agency expressly takes diversity into account, giving special consideration to ‘projects and productions...that reach, or reflect the culture of, a minority, inner city, rural, or tribal community.’”

The Court was unpersuaded that “the language of §954(d)(1) itself will give rise to the suppression of protected expression”: “Any content-based considerations that may be taken into account in the grant-making process are a consequence of the nature of arts funding. The NEA has limited resources and it must deny the majority of the grant applications that it receives, including many that propose ‘artistically excellent’ projects. The agency may decide to fund particular projects for a wide variety of reasons, ‘such as the technical proficiency of the artist, the creativity of the work, the anticipated public interest in or appreciation of the work, the work's contemporary relevance, its educational value, its suitability for or appeal to special audiences (such as children or the disabled), its service to a rural or isolated community, or even simply that the work could increase public knowledge of an art form.' [The] very 'assumption' of the NEA is [that] absolute neutrality is simply 'inconceivable.'"

The Court therefore distinguished its decision in Rosenberger on the ground that, in "the context of arts funding, in contrast to many other subsidies, the Government does not indiscriminately 'encourage a diversity of views from private speakers.' The NEA's mandate is to make aesthetic judgments, and the inherently content-based 'excellence' threshold for NEA support sets it apart from the subsidy issue in Rosenberger—which was available to all student organizations that were 'related to the educational purpose of the University'—and from comparably objective decisions on allocating public benefits, such as access to a school auditorium or a municipal theater [citing Lamb's Chapel and Southeastern Promotions]."

The Court emphasized that "we have no occasion here to address an as-applied challenge in a situation where the denial of a grant may be shown to be the product of invidious viewpoint discrimination. If the NEA were to leverage its power to award subsidies on the basis of subjective criteria into a penalty on disfavored viewpoints, then we would confront a different case. [Even] in the provision of subsidies, the Government may not 'ai[m] at the suppression of dangerous ideas,' and if a subsidy were 'manipulated' to have a 'coercive effect,' then relief could be appropriate. In addition, as the NEA itself concedes, a more pressing constitutional question would arise if government funding resulted in the imposition of a disproportionate burden calculated to drive 'certain ideas or viewpoints from the marketplace.'"

Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, concurred in the result: "[Under the challenged provision, to] the extent a particular applicant exhibits disrespect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public or fails to comport with general standards of decency, the likelihood that he will receive a grant diminishes. [This] unquestionably constitutes viewpoint discrimination. That conclusion is not altered by the fact that the statute does not 'compel' the denial of funding, any more than a provision imposing a five-point handicap on all black applicants for civil service jobs is saved from being race discrimination by the fact that it does not compel the rejection of black applicants....

"[The challenged provision does] not abridge the speech of those who disdain the beliefs and values of the American public, nor [does] it abridge indecent speech. Those who wish to create indecent and disrespectful art are as unconstrained now as they were before the enactment of this statute. [They] are merely deprived of the [satisfaction] of having the [public] taxed to pay for it. It is preposterous to equate the denial of taxpayer subsidy with measures ‘aimed at the suppression of dangerous ideas.’ ‘The reason that denial of participation in a tax exemption or other subsidy scheme does not necessarily “infringe” a fundamental right is that—unlike direct restriction or prohibition—such a denial does not, as a general rule, have any significant coercive effect.’....”

Justice Souter dissented: “The decency and respect proviso mandates viewpoint-based decisions in the disbursement of government subsidies, and the Government has wholly failed to explain why the statute should be afforded an exemption from the fundamental rule of the First Amendment that viewpoint discrimination in the exercise of public authority over expressive activity is unconstitutional. [‘If] there is a bedrock principle underlying the First Amendment, it is that the government may not prohibit the expression of an idea simply because society finds the idea itself offensive or disagreeable.’ [Because] this principle applies not only to affirmative suppression of speech, but also to disqualification for government favors, Congress is generally not permitted to pivot discrimination against otherwise protected speech on the offensiveness or unacceptability of the views it expresses. [Citing Rosenberger and Lamb’s Chapel.] One need do nothing more than read the text of [this] statute to conclude that Congress’s purpose in imposing the decency and respect criteria was to prevent the funding of art that conveys an offensive message; the [provision] on its face is quintessentially viewpoint-based, [for] it penalizes [art] that disrespects the ideology, opinions, or convictions of a significant segment of the American [public, but not] art that reinforces those values....”

“[Another] basic strand in the Court’s [analysis], and the heart of Justice Scalia’s, in effect assumes that whether or not the statute mandates viewpoint discrimination, [government] art subsidies fall within a zone of activity free from First Amendment restraints. [This argument] calls attention to the roles of government-as-speaker and government-as-buyer, in which the government is of course entitled to engage in viewpoint discrimination: if the Food and Drug Administration launches an advertising campaign on the subject of smoking, it may condemn the habit without also having to show a cowboy taking a puff on the opposite page; and if the Secretary of Defense wishes to buy a portrait to decorate the Pentagon, he is free to prefer George Washington over George the Third.

“[But the government] neither speaks through the expression subsidized by the NEA, nor buys anything itself with NEA grants. On the contrary, [in this context] the government acts as a patron, financially underwriting the production of art by private artists [for] independent consumption. [And] outside of the contexts of government-as-buyer and government-as-speaker, we have held time and again that Congress may not ‘discriminate invidiously in its subsidies in such a way as to aim at the suppression of ideas.’ [As we held in Rosenberger, when] the government acts as patron, subsidizing the expression of others, it may not prefer one lawfully stated view over another. [The Court attempts] to distinguish Rosenberger on the ground that the student activities funds in that case were generally available to most applicants, whereas NEA funds are disbursed selectively and competitively to a choice few. But the Court in Rosenberger [specifically] rejected just this distinction when it held [that] ‘[t]he government cannot justify viewpoint discrimination among private speakers on the economic fact of scarcity.’ Scarce money demands choices, of course, but choices ‘on some acceptable [viewpoint] neutral principle,’ like artistic excellence; ‘nothing in our decision[s] indicates that scarcity would give the State the right to exercise viewpoint discrimination that is otherwise impermissible.’”

RUST v. SULLIVAN, 500 U.S. 173 (1991). Title X of the Public Health Service Act, enacted in 1970, provides that none of the federal funds appropriated under the act for family planning services “shall be used in programs where abortion is a method of family planning.” In 1988, respondent, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, issued new regulations attaching three conditions on the grant of federal funds for title X projects. First, a “[title] X project may not provide counseling concerning the use of abortion or provide referral for abortion as a method of family planning,” even upon request. Second, a title X project may not engage in activities that “encourage, promote or advocate abortion as a method of family planning.” Forbidden activities include lobbying for legislation and disseminating materials, providing speakers, and using legal action to increase the availability of abortion. Third, title X projects must be organized so that they are “physically and financially separate” from prohibited abortion activities.

Petitioners, title X grantees and doctors suing on behalf of themselves and their patients, challenged these regulations. The Court, in a five-to-four decision, upheld the regulations. Chief Justice Rehnquist delivered the opinion of the Court:

“Petitioners contend that the regulations violate the first amendment by impermissibly discriminating based on viewpoint because they prohibit ‘all discussion about abortion as a lawful option—including counseling, referral, and the provision of neutral and accurate information about ending a pregnancy—while compelling the clinic or counselor to provide information that promotes continuing a pregnancy to term.' [In] Maher v. Roe, [432 U.S. 464 (1977)], we upheld a state welfare regulation under which Medicaid recipients received payments for services related to childbirth, but not for nontherapeutic abortions. The Court rejected the claim that this unequal subsidization worked a violation of the Constitution. We held that the government may 'make a value judgment favoring childbirth over abortion, and...implement that judgment by the allocation of public funds.' Here the Government is exercising the authority it possesses under Maher [to] subsidize family planning services [while] declining to 'promote or encourage abortion.' The Government can, without violating the Constitution, selectively fund a program to encourage certain activities it believes to be in the public interest, without at the same time funding an alternate program which seeks to deal with the problem in another way. In so doing, the Government has not discriminated on the basis of viewpoint; it has merely chosen to fund one activity to the exclusion of the other. '[A governmental] decision not to subsidize the exercise of a fundamental right does not infringe that right.' [Quoting Taxation with Representation.] The challenged regulations [are] designed to ensure that the limits of the federal program are observed. [This] is not a case of the Government 'suppressing a dangerous idea,' but of a prohibition on a project grantee or its employees from engaging in activities outside of its scope.

"To hold that the Government unconstitutionally discriminates on the basis of viewpoint when it chooses to fund a program dedicated to advance certain permissible goals, because the program in advancing those goals necessarily discourages alternate goals, would render numerous government programs constitutionally suspect. When Congress established a National Endowment for Democracy to encourage other countries to adopt democratic principles, it was not constitutionally required to fund a program to encourage competing lines of political philosophy such as Communism and Fascism. Petitioners' assertions ultimately boil down to the position that if the government chooses to subsidize one protected right, it must subsidize analogous counterpart rights. But the Court has soundly rejected that proposition. [Citing Taxation with Representation; Maher.] Within far broader limits than petitioners are willing to concede, when the government appropriates public funds to establish a program it is entitled to define the limits of that program. [We] have here not the case of a general law singling out a disfavored group on the basis of speech content, but a case of the Government refusing to fund activities, including speech, which are specifically excluded from the scope of the project funded.

"[Relying on League of Women Voters, petitioners] contend that the restrictions on the subsidization of abortion-related speech [are] impermissible because they condition the receipt of a benefit [on] the relinquishment of [the constitutional] right to engage in abortion advocacy and counseling. [Petitioners'] reliance on [this case] is unavailing, however, because here the Government is not denying a benefit to anyone, but is instead simply insisting that public funds be spent for the purposes for which they were authorized. The [regulations] do not force the Title X grantee to give up abortion-related speech; they merely require that the grantee keep such activities separate and distinct from Title X activities. [By] requiring that the Title X grantee engage in abortion-related activity separately from activity receiving federal funding, Congress has, consistent with our teaching in League of Women Voters and Taxation with Representation, not denied it the right to engage in abortion-related activities. Congress has merely refused to fund such activities out of the public fisc....

“This is not to suggest that funding by the Government, even when coupled with the freedom of the fund recipients to speak outside the scope of the Government-funded project, is invariably sufficient to justify government control over the content of expression. For example, this Court has recognized that the existence of a Government ‘subsidy,’ in the form of Government-owned property, does not justify the restriction of speech in areas that have ‘been traditionally open to the public for expressive activity’ [or] have been ‘expressly dedicated to speech activity.’ [Citing Kokinda; Hague; Perry.] In [the] circumstances [of this case, however], the general rule that the Government may choose not to subsidize speech applies with full force.”

Justice Blackmun, joined by Justices Marshall and Stevens, dissented: “Until today, the Court has never upheld viewpoint-based suppression of speech simply because that suppression was a condition upon the acceptance of public funds. [Nothing in Taxation with Representation] can be said to challenge this long-settled understanding. In [Taxation with Representation], the Court upheld a content-neutral provision [and emphasized that the] ‘case would be different if Congress were to discriminate invidiously in its subsidies in such a way as to “[aim] at the suppression of dangerous ideas.”’ [The regulations at issue here are] clearly viewpoint-based. [Indeed, if] a client asks directly about abortion, a Title X physician or counselor is required to say, in essence, that the project does not consider abortion to be an appropriate method of family planning. [The] regulations pertaining to ‘advocacy’ are even more explicitly viewpoint-based. [The] majority’s reliance on the fact that the regulations pertain solely to funding decisions simply begs the question. Clearly, there are some bases upon which government may not rest its decisions to fund or not to fund. For example, [the] majority surely would agree that government may not base its decision to support an activity upon considerations of race. [Our] cases make clear that ideological viewpoint is a similarly repugnant ground upon which to base funding decisions....

“In the cases at bar, the speaker’s interest in the communication is both clear and vital. In addressing the family planning needs of their clients, the physicians and counselors who staff Title X projects seek to provide them with the full range of information and options regarding their health and reproductive freedom. Indeed, the legitimate expectations of the patient and the ethical responsibilities of the medical profession demand no less. [Indeed], it is of no small significance that the speech the Secretary would suppress is truthful information regarding constitutionally protected conduct of vital importance to the listener. One can imagine no legitimate governmental interest that might be served by suppressing such information.” Justice O’Connor dissented on statutory grounds.

Note: The Implications of Rust

1. Abortions versus smoking. Suppose government establishes a program to give grants to organizations that help people quit smoking. Does the first amendment require government also to give grants to organizations that encourage people to smoke? Consider the following argument: The cigarette regulation is constitutional, even though Rust was wrong. This is so because in the cigarette case the information relates only to the individual’s decision whether to smoke, whereas in Rust the information relates to the individual’s decision whether to exercise a constitutional right (abortion). Along these lines, suppose the government instructs all public defenders not to advise their clients of their rights under the fourth amendment exclusionary rule. Is Rust distinguishable? After Rust, could the government constitutionally fund the Democratic, but not the Republican, Convention?

2. Government speech. At least part of the Court’s argument in Rust turned on the notion that government does not unconstitutionally discriminate “on the basis of viewpoint when it chooses to fund a program dedicated to advance certain permissible goals.” Consider Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995), in which the Court invalidated a University of Virginia policy authorizing payment from the Student Activities Fund for the printing costs of a variety of student publications but prohibiting payment for any student publication that “primarily promotes or manifests a particular belief in or about a deity or an ultimate reality.” Citing Rust, the University argued that it “must have substantial discretion in determining how to allocate scarce resources to accomplish its educational mission,” and that the challenged policy was reasonably designed to serve the permissible goal of preserving the separation of church and state. The Court rejected this argument:

[We] have permitted the government to regulate the content of what is or is not expressed when it is the speaker or when it enlists private entities to convey its own message. [In Rust, for example,] the government did not create a program to encourage private speech but instead used private speakers to transmit specific information pertaining to its own program. We recognized that when the government appropriates public funds to promote a particular policy of its own it is entitled to say what it wishes [and] it may take [appropriate] steps to ensure that its message is neither garbled nor distorted by the grantee. It does not follow, however, [that] viewpoint-based restrictions are proper when the [government] does not itself speak or subsidize transmittal of a message it favors but instead expends funds to encourage a diversity of views from private speakers. [The] distinction between the University’s own favored message and the private speech of students is evident in the case before us. [The] University declares that the student groups eligible for Student Activities Fund support are not the University’s agents, are not subject to its control, and are not its responsibility. Having offered to pay [the printing costs] of private speakers who convey their own messages, the University may not silence the expression of selected viewpoints.

3. What’s wrong with Rust? Consider Redish and Kessler, Government Subsidies and Free Expression, 80 Minn. L. Rev. 543, 576–577 (1996):

The problem with the [Court’s analysis in Rust] is that it allows the government to define its subsidization programs in a wholly unchecked, self-referential manner. [The] fallacy of [this approach] becomes clear if one visualizes the subsidization of private expression exclusively in favor of such ideas as a free-market economic philosophy, or the political theories of Mao Zedong or Rush Limbaugh. [Government] may appropriately choose neutrally to fund works on family planning, on the viability of free-market economic philosophy, or on the wisdom of Mao Zedong’s or Rush Limbaugh’s political thought. Each of these subsidies would foster First Amendment values by adding to the public’s knowledge. [But] government may not foster public acceptance of its own viewpoints on these issues by manipulating private expression [in a viewpoint-based manner].

Consider also Norton, The Measure of Government Speech: Identifying Expression's Source, 88 B.U. L. Rev. 587, 589, 595-597, 629-630 (2008):

[T]he Supreme Court has shielded the government's expression from Free Speech Clause scrutiny. [Government] speech merits this insulation because it is both inevitable and valuable. [One danger of government speech, though, is] that the government may manipulate the public's attitudes towards its views by deliberately obscuring its identity as a message's source. [In] Rust, [doctors and nurses] delivered the contested counseling [without] any requirement that its governmental origins be disclosed. Under these circumstances, patients might well misunderstand clinic employees to be offering their own independent counsel, rather than speaking as agents required to espouse the government's view. [Rust] thus illustrates the danger of treating expression that fails to satisfy the demands of functional transparency as government speech free from First Amendment scrutiny.

4. Professional Speech. Wholly apart from the question of government speech, to what extent can the government constitutionally regulate the speech of doctors, lawyers, and other professionals? In what circumstances can the state forbid doctors to give certain medical advice to their patients? Can it constitutionally forbid doctors to use certain psychological treatments to "cure" patients of homosexuality? Similar questions arise, of course, in the regulation of lawyers. See Haupt, Professional Speech, 125 Yale L.J. 1238 (2016).

LEGAL SERVICES CORPORATION v. VELAZQUEZ, 531 U.S. 533 (2001). In 1974, Congress established the Legal Services Corporation (LSC), whose mission is to distribute funds appropriated by Congress to eligible local grantee organizations "for the purpose of providing financial support for legal assistance in noncriminal proceedings...to persons financially unable to afford legal assistance." LSC grantees consist of hundreds of local organizations governed by local boards of directors. In many instances, the grantees are funded by a combination of LSC funds and other public or private sources. The grantee organizations hire and supervise lawyers to provide free legal assistance to indigent clients.

In a five-to-four decision, the Court distinguished Rust and held unconstitutional a congressionally imposed restriction prohibiting LSC-funded attorneys from challenging the legality or constitutionality of existing welfare laws. Justice Kennedy delivered the opinion of the Court: "The Court in Rust did not place explicit reliance on the rationale that the counseling activities of the doctors under Title X amounted to governmental speech; when interpreting the holding in later cases, however, we have explained Rust on this understanding. We have said that viewpoint-based funding decisions can be sustained in instances in which the government is itself the speaker, or instances, like Rust, in which the government ‘used private speakers to transmit information pertaining to its own program.’ As we said in Rosenberger, ‘[w]hen the government disburses public funds to private entities to convey a governmental message, it may take legitimate and appropriate steps to ensure that its message is neither garbled nor distorted by the grantee.’...

“[But] ‘[i]t does not follow...that viewpoint-based restrictions are proper when the [government] does not itself speak or subsidize transmittal of a message it favors but instead expends funds to encourage a diversity of views from private speakers.’ Rosenberger. Although the LSC program differs from the program at issue in Rosenberger in that its purpose is not to ‘encourage a diversity of views,’ the salient point is that, like the program in Rosenberger, the LSC program was designed to facilitate private speech, not to promote a governmental message. Congress funded LSC grantees to provide attorneys to represent the interests of indigent clients. [In] this vital respect this suit is distinguishable from Rust.

“The private nature of the speech involved here, and the extent of LSC’s regulation of private expression, are indicated further by the circumstance that the Government seeks to use an existing medium of expression and to control it, in a class of cases, in ways which distort its usual functioning. Where the government uses or attempts to regulate a particular medium, we have been informed by its accepted usage in determining whether a particular restriction on speech is necessary for the program’s purposes and limitations. [Citing FCC v. League of Women Voters; Arkansas Educational Television Commission v. Forbes; and Rosenberger.]

“[Restricting] LSC attorneys in advising their clients and in presenting arguments and analyses to the courts distorts the legal system by altering the traditional role of the attorneys in much the same way broadcast systems or student publication networks were changed in the limited forum cases we have cited. Just as government in those cases could not elect to use a broadcasting network or a college publication structure in a regime which prohibits speech necessary to the proper functioning of those systems, it may not design a subsidy to effect this serious and fundamental restriction on advocacy of attorneys and the functioning of the judiciary....

“Congress was not required to fund an LSC attorney to represent indigent clients; and when it did so, it was not required to fund the whole range of legal representations or relationships. The LSC and the United States, however, in effect ask us to permit Congress to define the scope of the litigation it funds to exclude certain vital theories and ideas. The attempted restriction is designed to insulate the Government's interpretation of the Constitution from judicial challenge. The Constitution does not permit the Government to confine litigants and their attorneys in this manner. We must be vigilant when Congress imposes rules and conditions which in effect insulate its own laws from legitimate judicial challenge."

Justice Scalia, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices O'Connor and Justice Thomas, dissented: "The LSC Act is a federal subsidy program, not a federal regulatory program, and '[t]here is a basic difference between [the two].' Regulations directly restrict speech; subsidies do not. [In Rust, the Court upheld] a statutory scheme that is in all relevant respects indistinguishable from [the provision challenged in this case]. The LSC Act, like the scheme in Rust, does not [discriminate] on the basis of viewpoint, since it funds neither challenges to nor defenses of existing welfare law. The provision simply declines to subsidize a certain class of litigation, and under Rust that decision 'does not infringe the right' to bring such litigation....There is no legitimate basis for declaring [this law] unconstitutional."

Is there a coherent distinction between Rust and Velazquez? If so, what is it? Note that Justice Kennedy was the only justice to vote differently in the two cases.

AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT v. ALLIANCE FOR OPEN SOCIETY INTERNATIONAL, 133 S. Ct. 2321 (2013). The United States Leadership Against HIV/AIDS, Tuberculosis, and Malaria Act of 2003 (Leadership Act) authorized the appropriation of billions of dollars to fund efforts by nongovernmental organizations to combat HIV/AIDS worldwide. The Act imposed a condition ("The Policy Requirement") on all recipients of funds under the Act: All recipients must explicitly oppose prostitution. This requirement was challenged by recipients of Leadership Act funds who wish to remain neutral on the issue of prostitution. The Court, in a six-to-two decision, held that this requirement violated the First Amendment rights of recipients.

Chief Justice Roberts delivered the opinion of the Court: "The Policy Requirement mandates that recipients of Leadership Act funds explicitly agree with the Government's policy to oppose prostitution....It is, however, a basic First Amendment principle that 'freedom of speech prohibits the government from telling people what they must say.' [Citing West Virginia Bd. of Educ. v.

Barnette; Wooley v. Maynard]. [Were The Policy Requirement] enacted as a direct regulation of speech, [it] would plainly violate the First Amendment. The question is whether the Government may nonetheless impose that requirement as a condition on the receipt of federal funds....

“[As] a general matter, if a party objects to a condition on the receipt of federal funding, its recourse is to decline the funds. This remains true when the objection is that a condition may affect the recipient’s exercise of its First Amendment rights. [At] the same time, however, we have held that the Government ‘may not deny a benefit to a person on a basis that infringes his constitutionally protected...freedom of speech even if he has no entitlement to that benefit.’ In some cases, a funding condition can result in an unconstitutional burden on First Amendment rights....

“The dissent thinks that can only be true when the condition is not relevant to the objectives of the program [or] when the condition is actually coercive, in the sense of an offer that cannot be refused. Our precedents, however, are not so limited. In the present context, the relevant distinction that has emerged from our cases is between conditions that define the limits of the government spending program—those that specify the activities Congress wants to subsidize—and conditions that seek to leverage funding to regulate speech outside the contours of the program itself. The line is hardly clear, in part because the definition of a particular program can always be manipulated to subsume the challenged condition. We have held, however, that ‘Congress cannot recast a condition on funding as a mere definition of its program in every case, lest the First Amendment be reduced to a simple semantic exercise.’” [Velazquez.]

As an example, Chief Justice Roberts invoked FCC v. League of Women Voters, in which “the Court struck down a condition on federal financial assistance to noncommercial broadcast television and radio stations that prohibited all editorializing, including with private funds. Even a station receiving only one percent of its overall budget from the Federal Government, the Court explained, was ‘barred absolutely from all editorializing.’ [The] law provided no way for a station to limit its use of federal funds to non-editorializing activities, while using private funds ‘to make known its views on matters of public importance.’ The prohibition thus went beyond ensuring that federal funds not be used to subsidize ‘public broadcasting station editorials,’ and instead leveraged the federal funding to regulate the stations’ speech outside the scope of the program.

“Our decision in Rust elaborated on the approach [in] League of Women Voters. In Rust, [the] organizations received funds from a variety of sources other than the Federal Government for a variety of purposes. The Act, however, prohibited the Title X federal funds from being ‘used in programs where abortion is a method of family planning.’ To enforce this provision, HHS regulations barred Title X projects from advocating abortion as a method of family planning, and required grantees to ensure that their Title X projects were ‘physically and financially separate’ from their other projects that engaged in the prohibited activities....

“We explained that Congress can, without offending the Constitution, selectively fund certain programs to address an issue of public concern, without funding alternative ways of addressing the same problem. In Title X, Congress had defined the federal program to encourage only particular family planning methods. The challenged regulations were simply ‘designed to ensure that the limits of the federal program are observed,’ and ‘that public funds [are] spent for the purposes for which they were authorized.’ [The] regulations governed only the scope of the grantee’s Title X projects, leaving it ‘unfettered in its other activities.’ [Title X grantees could continue to engage in abortion advocacy as long as they conducted] ‘those activities through programs that are separate and independent from the project that receives Title X funds.’ Because the regulations did not ‘prohibit[] the recipient from engaging in the protected conduct outside the scope of the federally funded program,’ they did not run afoul of the First Amendment. Here, however, [the] Policy Requirement falls on the unconstitutional side of the line. [By] demanding that funding recipients adopt—as their own—the Government’s view on an issue of public concern, the condition by its very nature affects ‘protected conduct outside the scope of the federally funded program.’ [By] requiring recipients to profess a specific belief, the Policy Requirement goes beyond defining the limits of the federally funded program to defining the recipient. [In] so doing, it violates the First Amendment and cannot be sustained.”

Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, dissented: “The First Amendment does not mandate a viewpoint neutral government. Government must choose between rival ideas and adopt some as its own: competition over cartels, solar energy over coal, weapon development over disarmament, and so forth. Moreover, the government may enlist the assistance of those who believe in its ideas to carry them to fruition; and it need not enlist for that purpose those who oppose or do not support the ideas. That seems to me a matter of the most common common sense....

“The argument is that this commonsense principle will enable the government to discriminate against, and injure, points of view to which it is opposed. Of course the Constitution does not prohibit government spending that discriminates against, and injures, points of view to which the government is opposed; every government program which takes a position on a controversial issue does that. Anti-smoking programs injure cigar aficionados, programs encouraging sexual abstinence injure free-love advocates, etc. The constitutional prohibition at issue here is not a prohibition against discriminating against or injuring opposing points of view, but the First Amendment's prohibition against the coercing of speech. I am frankly dubious that a condition for eligibility to participate in a minor federal program such as this one runs afoul of that prohibition even when the condition is irrelevant to the goals of the program. Not every disadvantage is a coercion.

"But that is not the issue before us here. Here the views that the Government demands an applicant forswear—or that the Government insists an applicant favor—are relevant to the program in question. The program is valid only if the Government is entitled to disfavor the opposing view (here, advocacy of or toleration of prostitution). And if the program can disfavor it, so can the selection of those who are to administer the program. There is no risk that this principle will enable the Government to discriminate arbitrarily against positions it disfavors. It would not, for example, permit the Government to exclude from bidding on defense contracts anyone who refuses to abjure prostitution. But here a central part of the Government's HIV/AIDS strategy is the suppression of prostitution, by which HIV is transmitted. It is entirely reasonable to admit to participation in the program only those who believe in that goal...."

Note: The Reach of Government Speech: Summum, Walker, and Matal

1. Monuments in a public park. Presumably, there is no first amendment right to erect monuments in a public park. But what if the government erects some monuments but not others? Pioneer Park, a public park in Pleasant Grove City, contains fifteen permanent displays, eleven of which were donated to the city by private groups. These include an historic granary, a wishing well, a September 11 monument, and a Ten Commandments monument donated by the Fraternal Order of Eagles in 1971. Summum is a religious organization founded in 1975 and headquartered in Salt Lake City. In 2003, Summum's president requested permission to erect a stone monument in Pioneer Park. The monument would contain the Seven Aphorisms of Summum, which according to Summum doctrine were inscribed on the original tablet handed down by God to Moses on Mount Sinai. The city denied the request, explaining that it permitted monuments to be displayed in the park only if they "directly related to the history of Pleasant Grove" or they "were donated by groups with longstanding ties to the Pleasant Grove community." The Court of Appeals for the Tenth

Circuit held that because public parks have traditionally been regarded as public forums, the city could not constitutionally reject the Seven Aphorisms monument absent a compelling justification for doing so.

In a unanimous decision in Pleasant Grove City, Utah v. Summum, 555 U.S. 460 (2009), the Supreme Court reversed. Justice Alito delivered the opinion of the Court: “The [fundamental] disagreement [centers] on the nature of [the city’s] conduct when [it] permitted privately donated monuments to be erected in Pioneer Park. [Was the city] engaging in [its] own expressive conduct? Or [was it] providing a forum for private speech? [If the city was] engaging in [its] own expressive conduct, then the Free Speech Clause has no application. The Free Speech Clause restricts government regulation of private speech; it does not regulate government speech. [Citing Rust.] [Indeed,] it is not easy to imagine how government could function if it lacked this freedom....

“[There] may be situations in which it is difficult to tell whether a government entity is speaking on its own behalf or is providing a forum for private speech, but this case does not present such a situation. Permanent monuments displayed on public property typically represent government speech. [When] a government entity arranges for the construction of a monument, it does so because it wishes to convey some thought or instill some feeling in those who see the structure. [Just] as government-commissioned and government-financed monuments speak for the government, so do privately financed and donated monuments that the government accepts and displays to the public on government land. [The] monuments that are accepted [are] meant to convey and have the effect of conveying a government message, and they thus constitute government speech....

“[Summum] voices the legitimate concern that the government speech doctrine not be used as a subterfuge for favoring certain private speakers over others based on viewpoint. [Summum] and the Court of Appeals analogize the installation of permanent monuments in a public park to the delivery of speeches and the holding of marches and demonstrations, and they thus invoke the rule that a public park is a traditional public forum for these activities. But ‘public forum principles...are out of place in the context of this case.’ The forum doctrine has been applied in situations in which government-owned property or a government program was capable of accommodating a large number of public speakers without defeating the essential function of the land or the program. For example, a park can accommodate many speakers and, over time, many parades and demonstrations. [A] public university’s student activity fund can provide money for many campus activities. [Citing Rosenberger.] A public university’s buildings may offer meeting space for hundreds of student groups. [Citing

Widmar.]

[By] contrast, public parks can accommodate only a limited number of permanent monuments. [It] is hard to imagine how a public park could be opened up for the installation of permanent monuments by every person or group wishing to engage in that form of expression. [Indeed,] if public parks were considered to be traditional public forums for the purpose of erecting privately donated monuments, most parks would have little choice but to refuse all such donations. And where the application of forum analysis would lead almost inexorably to closing of the forum, it is obvious that forum analysis is out of place. [Therefore,] forum analysis simply does not apply to the installation of permanent monuments on public property. [We therefore] hold that the City's decision to accept certain privately donated monuments while rejecting [Summum's] is best viewed as a form of government speech. As a result, the City's decision is not subject to the Free Speech Clause...."

2. Specialty license plates. Suppose a state permits individuals to purchase vanity license plates. Can it constitutionally refuse to sell such plates if the message would be demeaning to any person on the basis of race, religion, gender, or sexual orientation? In Walker v. Texas Div., Sons of Confederate Veterans, Inc., 135 S. Ct. 2239 (2015), the Court upheld the refusal of the Texas Department of Motor Vehicles to approve a specialty license plate design submitted by the Sons of Confederate Veterans and featuring the Confederate battle flag. In a five-to-four decision, written by Justice Breyer, the Court relied heavily upon Summum to conclude that the plate was government speech and therefore did not have to be viewpoint neutral. In the Court's view, license plates, like monuments in public parks, "long have communicated messages from the States," are "'often closely identified in the public mind with the [State]'" and are subject to direct government control. The fact that private parties took part in the design and propagation of the message did not extinguish the governmental nature of the message.

Consider Justice Alito's dissent, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Scalia and Kennedy: "Here is a test. Suppose you sat by the side of a Texas highway and studied the license plates on the vehicles passing by. You would see, in addition to the standard Texas plates, an impressive array of specialty plates. (There are now more than 350 varieties.)...[Would] you really think that the sentiments reflected in these specialty plates are the views of the State of Texas and not those of the owners of the cars? If a car had a plate that says 'Rather Be Golfing' passed by at 8:30 A.M. on a Monday morning, would you think: 'This is the official policy of the State—better to golf than to work?'

Consider Papandrea, The Government Brand, 110 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1195

[A major] problem with the government speech doctrine after Summum and Walker is that the government is not required to articulate any particular message. The Court first expressly rejected any such requirement in Summum, where Justice Alito waxed eloquently for the Court about how the meaning of public monuments is potentially different for each observer and changes over time. Although it may not be possible to declare definitively what message a permanent government monument is intended to express, the wide variety of the over 400 Texas specialty license plates indicates that the government has no message at all....

Because Texas does not exercise any meaningful selectivity over the specialty license plates it chooses, the program appears to be some sort of forum like the one in Rosenberger, where the university did not “speak or subsidize...a message it favors but instead expends funds to encourage a diversity of views from private speakers.” By rejecting the SCV plate, Texas appears to be doing nothing but blatantly and impermissibly “manipulating private expression” in a viewpoint-based manner. [The] ramifications of Walker are potentially staggering. Using this decision as a guide, the government will likely assert the government speech doctrine in a wide variety of contexts in order to justify content-based and even viewpoint-based censorship of private speech.

Along similar lines, see Strasser, Government Speech and the Circumvention of the First Amendment, 44 Hast. Const. L.Q. 37 (2016); Schauer, Not Just About License Plates: Walker v. Sons of Confederate Veterans, Government Speech, and Doctrinal Overlap in the First Amendment, 2015 Sup. Ct. Rev. 265.

3. Trademarks. “Slants” is a derogatory term for persons of Asian descent. Simon Tam, lead singer of the rock group “The Slants,” whose members are Asian-Americans, chose the name to “reclaim” the term and drain it of its denigrating force. The federal Patent and Trademark Office denied Tam’s application for federal trademark registration of the name because it violated a federal law prohibiting the registration of any trademarks that “disparage...or bring...into contemp[t] or disrepute” any “persons, living or dead.” The government argued that federally-registered trademarks are government speech and that, as in Summum and Walker, the statute therefore did not violate the First Amendment. In a unanimous decision, the Supreme Court in Matal v. Tam, 582 U.S. --- (2017) disagreed and held that the statutory provision violated the First Amendment.

In his opinion for the Court, Justice Alito explained that “while the government-speech doctrine is important—indeed, essential—it is a doctrine that is susceptible to dangerous misuse.” This is so because if “private speech could be passed off as government speech by simply affixing a government seal of approval, government could silence or muffle the expression of disfavored viewpoints.” Thus, Alito insisted, “we must exercise great caution before extending our government-speech precedents.”

Alito maintained that because the federal government “does not dream up these marks, and it does not edit marks submitted for registration, [it] is far-fetched to suggest that the content of a registered mark is government speech.” Indeed, if “the federal registration of a trademark makes the mark government speech, the Federal Government is babbling prodigiously and incoherently [and it] is unashamedly endorsing a vast array of commercial products and services.” Moreover, it “is unlikely that more than a tiny fraction of the public has any idea what federal registration of a trademark means.”

Alito insisted that “[n]one of our government speech cases even remotely supports the idea that registered trademarks are government speech.” In Summum, for example, “we cited many factors. Governments have used monuments to speak to the public since ancient times; parks have traditionally been selective in accepting and displaying donated monuments; parks would be overrun if they were obliged to accept all monuments offered by private groups; [and] monuments that are accepted...are meant to convey and have the effect of conveying a government message.” Trademarks, Alito reasoned, “share none of these characteristics.”

Alito also distinguished Walker, which, he noted, “likely marks the outer bounds of the government speech doctrine.” The Court in Walker, Alito explained, “cited three factors distilled from Summum. First, license plates have long been used by the States to convey state messages.” Second, “license plates ‘are often closely identified in the public mind’ with the State....Third, Texas ‘maintain[ed] direct control over the messages conveyed on its specialty plates.’” Alito maintained that “none of these factors are present in this case.” In sum, then, “the federal registration of trademarks is vastly different from [the] monuments in Summum, and even the specialty license plates in Walker.” Moreover, “[h]olding that the registration of a trademark converts the mark into government speech would constitute a huge and dangerous extension of the government-speech doctrine.” Thus, he concluded, “trademarks are private, not government speech.”

Are you persuaded that Matal is distinguishable from Summum and Walker? Suppose the government allows individuals to display signs inside public buses. Is that case governed by Walker or Matal? Suppose the government excludes any sign that “disparages or brings into contempt or disrepute any person or group”? Is that case governed by Walker or Matal? Or is it instead a created public forum case? How does one know the difference? On the problem of competing modes of analysis, see Schauer, supra. The Court made clear in Matal that even if the case were analyzed in terms of public forum analysis, the statute embodied an unconstitutional viewpoint based restriction.

3. Symbolic Conduct

This section explores the use of nonverbal conduct—such as burning a draft card or mutilating a flag—as a means of “symbolic” expression. In what circumstances, if any, does such nonverbal conduct constitute protected “speech” within the meaning of the first amendment? Consider Henkin, Foreword: On Drawing Lines, 82 Harv. L. Rev. 63, 79–80 (1968): “A constitutional distinction between speech and conduct is specious. Speech is conduct, and actions speak. There is nothing intrinsically sacred about wagging the tongue or wielding a pen; there is nothing intrinsically more sacred about words than other symbols. [The] meaningful constitutional distinction is not between speech and conduct, but between conduct that speaks, communicates, and other kinds of conduct.” In fact, the Court has long recognized that at least some forms of conduct may constitute “speech” within the meaning of the first amendment. In West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), for example, Justice Jackson explained that “symbolism is a primitive but effective way of communicating ideas. [It] is a short cut from mind to mind.” See also R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, section D8, supra (cross-burning); Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969) (black armbands); Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131 (1966) (sit-in); Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931) (red flag).

If it is assumed that some forms of nonverbal conduct may constitute “speech,” the question remains, how are we to determine what nonverbal conduct merits first amendment protection? At one level, it seems clear that “[everything] that one does, every action that one takes or fails to take, ‘speaks’ to anyone who is interested in looking for a message.” That is, “all behavior is capable of being understood as communication.” F. Haiman, Speech and Law in a Free Society 31 (1981). Surely, however, not all behavior that is “capable of being understood as communication” constitutes “speech,” for that would bring all conduct within the ambit of the first amendment.

Consider Nimmer, The Meaning of Symbolic Speech under the First Amendment, 21 UCLA L. Rev. 29, 36 (1973):

A further element must be added to the mix before conduct may be considered to be speech. Whatever else may or may not be true of speech, as an irreducible minimum it must constitute a communication. That, in turn, implies both a communicator and a communicate—a speaker and an audience. [Without] an actual or potential audience there can be no first amendment speech right. Nor may the first amendment be invoked if there is an audience but no actual or potential “speaker.” [Unless] there is a human communicator intending to convey a meaning by his conduct, it would be odd to think of it as conduct constituting a communication protected by the first amendment.

Does all nonverbal conduct that is intended to communicate constitute “speech”? Note that such a doctrine might create a serious “imposter problem.” That is, it would invite fraudulent claims by “criminals” that their actual intent was to communicate. Should courts be in the business of inquiring into the sincerity of individuals who claim to have exercised first amendment rights? Is there any way to avoid such inquiries? The issue of inquiry into sincerity in the religion context is examined in Chapter 8, section C, infra. Note also that, depending on the circumstances, nonverbal conduct that is intended to communicate may range across the entire spectrum of human behavior. It may include assassination, refusal to pay taxes, public nudity, flag burning, and urination on the steps of the state capitol. Does all such conduct constitute constitutionally protected “speech,” so long as the actor intended to communicate?

United States v. O'Brien

391 U.S. 367 (1968)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

On the morning of March 31, 1966, David Paul O'Brien and three companions burned their Selective Service registration certificates on the steps of the South Boston Courthouse. A sizable crowd, including several agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, witnessed the event. Immediately after the burning, [O'Brien] stated to FBI agents that he had burned his registration certificate because of his beliefs, knowing that he was violating federal law.

For this act, O'Brien was indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced in the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts. He did not contest the fact that he had burned the certificate. He stated in argument to the jury that he burned the certificate publicly to influence others to adopt his antiwar beliefs, as he put it, “so that other people would reevaluate their positions with Selective Service, with the armed forces, and reevaluate their place in the culture of today, to hopefully consider my position.”

The indictment upon which he was tried charged that he “willfully and knowingly did mutilate, destroy, and change by burning [his] registration Certificate [in] violation of [§462(b)(3) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act of 1948].” Section 462(b)(3) [was] amended by Congress in 1965 (adding the words italicized below) so that at the time O’Brien burned his certificate an offense was committed by any person, “who forges, alters, knowingly destroys, knowingly mutilates, or in any manner changes any such certificate....” (Italics supplied.)...

[The] Court of Appeals [held] the 1965 Amendment unconstitutional as a law abridging freedom of speech. At the time the Amendment was enacted, a regulation of the Selective Service System required registrants to keep their registration certificates in their “personal possession at all times.” 32 C.F.R. §1617.1 (1962). [The] Court of Appeals [was] of the opinion that conduct punishable under the 1965 Amendment was already punishable under the nonpossession regulation, and consequently that the Amendment served no valid purpose; further, that in light of the prior regulation, the Amendment must have been “directed at public as distinguished from private destruction.” On this basis, the court concluded that the 1965 Amendment ran afoul of the First Amendment by singling out persons engaged in protests for special treatment. [We] hold that the 1965 Amendment is constitutional both as enacted and as applied....

[The] 1965 Amendment plainly does not abridge free speech on its face, and we do not understand O’Brien to argue otherwise. Amended §12(b)(3) on its face deals with conduct having no connection with speech. It prohibits the knowing destruction of certificates issued by the Selective Service System, and there is nothing necessarily expressive about such conduct. The Amendment does not distinguish between public and private destruction, and it does not punish only destruction engaged in for the purpose of expressing views. Compare Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931). A law prohibiting destruction of Selective Service certificates no more abridges free speech on its face than a motor vehicle law prohibiting the destruction of drivers’ licenses, or a tax law prohibiting the destruction of books and records.

O’Brien nonetheless argues that the 1965 Amendment is unconstitutional in its application to him, and is unconstitutional as enacted because what he calls the “purpose” of Congress was “to suppress freedom of speech.” We consider these arguments separately.

II

O'Brien first argues that the 1965 Amendment is unconstitutional as applied to him because his act of burning his registration certificate was protected "symbolic speech" within the First Amendment. His argument is that the freedom of expression which the First Amendment guarantees includes all modes of "communication of ideas by conduct," and that his conduct is within this definition because he did it in "demonstration against the war and against the draft."

We cannot accept the view that an apparently limitless variety of conduct can be labeled "speech" whenever the person engaging in the conduct intends thereby to express an idea. However, even on the assumption that the alleged communicative element in O'Brien's conduct is sufficient to bring into play the First Amendment, it does not necessarily follow that the destruction of a registration certificate is constitutionally protected activity. This Court has held that when "speech" and "nonspeech" elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest in regulating the nonspeech element can justify incidental limitations on First Amendment freedoms. To characterize the quality of the governmental interest which must appear, the Court has employed a variety of descriptive terms: compelling; substantial; subordinating; paramount; cogent; strong. Whatever imprecision inheres in these terms, we think it clear that a government regulation is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the Government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest. We find that the 1965 Amendment [meets] all of these requirements, and consequently that O'Brien can be constitutionally convicted for violating it.

The constitutional power of Congress to raise and support armies and to make all laws necessary and proper to that end is broad and sweeping. [Pursuant] to this power, Congress may establish a system of registration for individuals liable for training and service, and may require such individuals within reason to cooperate in the registration system. The issuance of certificates indicating the registration and eligibility classification of individuals is a legitimate and substantial administrative aid in the functioning of this system. And legislation to insure the continuing availability of issued certificates serves a legitimate and substantial purpose in the system's administration....

1. The registration certificate serves as proof that the individual described thereon has registered for the draft. The classification certificate shows the eligibility classification of a named but undescribed individual. Voluntarily displaying the two certificates is an easy and painless way for a young man to dispel a question as to whether he might be delinquent in his Selective Service obligations. [Additionally] in a time of national crisis, reasonable availability to each registrant of the two small cards assures a rapid and uncomplicated means for determining his fitness for immediate induction, no matter how distant in our mobile society he may be from his local board.

2. The information supplied on the certificates facilitates communication between registrants and local boards, simplifying the system and benefiting all concerned. To begin with, each certificate bears the address of the registrant's local board, an item unlikely to be committed to memory. Further, each card bears the registrant's Selective Service number, and a registrant who has his number readily available so that he can communicate it to his local board when he supplies or requests information can make simpler the board's task in locating his file....

3. Both certificates carry continual reminders that the registrant must notify his local board of any change of address, and other specified changes in his status....

The many functions performed by Selective Service certificates establish beyond doubt that Congress has a legitimate and substantial interest in preventing their wanton and unrestrained destruction and assuring their continuing availability by punishing people who knowingly and wilfully destroy or mutilate them. And we are unpersuaded that the pre-existence of the nonpossession regulations in any way negates this interest.

In the absence of a question as to multiple punishment, it has never been suggested that there is anything improper in Congress' providing alternative statutory avenues of prosecution to assure the effective protection of one and the same interest. [Here], the pre-existing avenue of prosecution was not even statutory. Regulations may be modified or revoked from time to time by administrative discretion. Certainly, the Congress may change or supplement a regulation.

Equally important, a comparison of the regulations with the 1965 Amendment indicates that they protect overlapping but not identical governmental interests, and that they reach somewhat different classes of wrongdoers. The gravamen of the offense defined by the statute is the deliberate rendering of certificates unavailable for the various purposes which they may serve. Whether registrants keep their certificates in their personal possession at all times, as required by the regulations, is of no particular concern under the 1965 Amendment, as long as they do not mutilate or destroy the certificates so as to render them unavailable....

We think it apparent that the continuing availability to each registrant of his Selective Service certificates substantially furthers the smooth and proper functioning of the system that Congress has established to raise armies [and] that the 1965 Amendment specifically protects this substantial governmental interest. We perceive no alternative means that would more precisely and narrowly assure the continuing availability of issued Selective Service certificates than a law which prohibits their wilful mutilation or destruction.

[Moreover,] both the governmental interest and the operation of the 1965 Amendment are limited to the noncommunicative aspect of O'Brien's conduct. The governmental interest and the scope of the 1965 Amendment are limited to preventing harm to the smooth and efficient functioning of the Selective Service System. When O'Brien deliberately rendered unavailable his registration certificate, he wilfully frustrated this governmental interest. For this noncommunicative impact of his conduct, and for nothing else, he was convicted.

The case at bar is therefore unlike one where the alleged governmental interest in regulating conduct arises in some measure because the communication allegedly integral to the conduct is itself thought to be harmful. In Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931), for example, this Court struck down a statutory phrase which punished people who expressed their "opposition to organized government" by displaying "any flag, badge, banner, or device." Since the statute there was aimed at suppressing communication it could not be sustained as a regulation of noncommunicative conduct....

In conclusion, we find that because of the Government's substantial interest in assuring the continuing availability of issued Selective Service certificates, because amended §462(b) is an appropriately narrow means of protecting this interest and condemns only the independent noncommunicative impact of conduct within its reach, and because the noncommunicative impact of O'Brien's act of burning his registration certificate frustrated the Government's interest, a sufficient governmental interest has been shown to justify O'Brien's conviction.

III

O'Brien finally argues that the 1965 Amendment is unconstitutional as enacted because what he calls the "purpose" of Congress was "to suppress freedom of speech." We reject this argument because under settled principles the purpose of Congress, as O'Brien uses that term, is not a basis for declaring this legislation unconstitutional.

It is a familiar principle of constitutional law that this Court will not strike down an otherwise constitutional statute on the basis of an alleged illicit legislative motive....

Inquiries into congressional motives or purposes are a hazardous matter. When the issue is simply the interpretation of legislation, the Court will look to statements by legislators for guidance as to the purpose of the legislature, because the benefit to sound decision-making in this circumstance is thought sufficient to risk the possibility of misreading Congress' purpose. It is entirely a different matter when we are asked to void a statute that is, under well-settled criteria, constitutional on its face, on the basis of what fewer than a handful of Congressmen said about it. What motivates one legislator to make a speech about a statute is not necessarily what motivates scores of others to enact it, and the stakes are sufficiently high for us to eschew guesswork. We decline to void [legislation] which could be reenacted in its exact form if the same or another legislator made a "wiser" speech about it....

We think it not amiss, in passing, to comment upon O'Brien's legislative-purpose argument. There was little floor debate on this legislation in either House. Only Senator Thurmond commented on its substantive features in the Senate. [After] his brief statement, and without any additional substantive comments, the [bill] passed the Senate. [In] the House debate only two Congressmen addressed themselves to the Amendment—Congressmen Rivers and Bray. [The] bill was passed after their statements without any further debate by a vote of 393 to 1. It is principally on the basis of the statements by these three Congressmen that O'Brien makes his congressional—"purpose" argument. We note that if we were to examine legislative purpose in the instant case, we would be obliged to consider not only these statements but also the more authoritative reports of the Senate and House Armed Services Committees. [While] both reports make clear a concern with the "defiant" destruction of so-called "draft cards" and with "open" encouragement to others to destroy their cards, both reports also indicate that this concern stemmed from an apprehension that unrestrained destruction of cards would disrupt the smooth functioning of the Selective Service System.

IV

Since the 1965 Amendment to §12(b)(3) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act is constitutional as enacted and as applied, the Court of Appeals should have affirmed the judgment of conviction entered by the District Court....

MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, concurring....

I wish to make explicit my understanding that this [decision] does not foreclose consideration of First Amendment claims in those rare instances when an “incidental” restriction upon expression, imposed by a regulation which furthers an “important or substantial” governmental interest and satisfies the Court’s other criteria, in practice has the effect of entirely preventing a “speaker” from reaching a significant audience with whom he could not otherwise lawfully communicate. This is not such a case, since O’Brien manifestly could have conveyed his message in many ways other than by burning his draft card.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, dissenting....

[Justice Douglas maintained that the “underlying and basic [issue] in this case [is] whether conscription is permissible in the absence of a declaration of war.” Justice Douglas therefore suggested that “this case should be put down for reargument” on that question. Justice Douglas briefly addressed the symbolic conduct issue in his concurring opinion the following term in Brandenburg v. Ohio, section B1 supra: “Action is often a method of expression and within the protection of the First Amendment. Suppose one tears up his own copy of the Constitution in eloquent protest to a decision of this Court. May he be indicted? Suppose one rips his own Bible to shreds to celebrate his departure from one ‘faith’ and his embrace of atheism. May he be indicted? [This] Court’s affirmation of [O’Brien’s conviction for burning the draft card] was not, with all respect, consistent with the First Amendment.”]

Note: Draft Card Burning and the First Amendment

1. Is draft card burning “speech”? Did the Court decide that question? How would you decide it? Why was Chief Justice Warren reluctant in O’Brien to “accept the view that an apparently limitless variety of conduct can be labeled ‘speech’ whenever the person engaging in the conduct intends thereby to express an idea”? Consider the following propositions: (a) If nonverbal conduct that is intended “to express an idea” constitutes “speech,” government may not restrict that conduct unless it poses a “clear and present danger” within the meaning of the Holmes/Brandeis formulation. (b) Even if nonverbal conduct that is intended to communicate constitutes “speech,” the first amendment does not “afford the same kind of freedom to those who would communicate ideas by conduct [as it affords] to those who communicate by pure speech.” Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 555 (1965).

2. Symbolic conduct and the content-based/content-neutral distinction. Should a distinction be drawn between laws that restrict symbolic conduct because of its content and laws that restrict symbolic conduct for reasons unrelated to content? Compare, for example, a law prohibiting “any person to urinate in public” with a law prohibiting “any person to urinate on a public building as a symbolic act of opposition to government.” Does the content-based/content-neutral distinction provide a useful framework for analyzing the constitutionality of such laws? Does O’Brien adopt such an analysis?

3. Restrictions related “to the suppression of free expression”: Stromberg, Tinker, and Schacht. In Stromberg v. California, discussed in O’Brien, the Court invalidated a statute prohibiting any person to display “a red flag [in] any public place [as] a [symbol] of opposition to organized government.” The Court explained that the law might be construed to prohibit “peaceful and orderly opposition to government by legal means” and thus curtail “the opportunity for free political discussion.”

In Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), decided a year after O’Brien, school officials, fearing possible disruption of school activities, suspended three public school students because they wore black armbands to school to protest the government’s policy in Vietnam. In invalidating the suspensions, the Court observed that “the wearing of an armband for the purpose of expressing certain views is the type of symbolic act that is within [the] First Amendment” and is “closely akin to ‘pure speech.’” The Court observed further that “the school authorities did not purport to prohibit the wearing of all symbols of political or controversial significance; [rather], a particular symbol—black armbands worn to exhibit opposition to this Nation’s involvement in Vietnam—was singled out for prohibition.” Consider Ely, Flag Desecration: A Case Study in the Roles of Categorization and Balancing in First Amendment Analysis, 88 Harv. L. Rev. 1482, 1498 & n.63 (1975): “[In] Tinker the state regulated [the armbands] because it feared the effect that the message those armbands conveyed would have on the other children. [Tinker] would have been quite a different case had it arisen [in] the context of a school regulation banning armbands in woodworking class along with all other sartorial embellishments liable to become safety hazards.”

In Schacht v. United States, 398 U.S. 58 (1970), petitioner, who participated in a skit demonstrating opposition to American involvement in Vietnam, was convicted of violating 18 U.S.C. §702, which made criminal the unauthorized wearing of an American military uniform. The Court reversed the conviction. Citing O'Brien, the Court observed that section 702 “is, standing alone, a valid statute on its face.” The Court noted, however, that another statute, 10 U.S.C. §772(f), authorized the wearing of an American military uniform in a theatrical production “if the portrayal does not tend to discredit [the armed forces].” Finding that petitioner’s skit constituted a “theatrical production” within the meaning of section 772(f), the Court concluded: “[Petitioner’s] conviction can be sustained only if he can be punished for speaking out against the role of our Army and our country in Vietnam. Clearly punishment for this reason would be an unconstitutional abridgement of freedom of speech. [Section 772(f)], which leaves Americans free to praise the war in Vietnam but can send persons like [petitioner] to prison for opposing it, cannot survive in a country which has the First Amendment.”

4. Restrictions “unrelated to the suppression of free expression.” O'Brien's analysis of restrictions that are “unrelated to the suppression of free expression” applies the general principles of content-neutral balancing to the specific context of symbolic conduct. Is O'Brien's application of those principles sufficiently speech-protective?

Consider Alfange, The Draft-Card Burning Case, 1968 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1, 23, 26:

[As] the Court's own inventory of possible draft-card uses indicates, [the certificates] serve functions of dispensable convenience rather than urgent necessity. The Court's use of “substantial,” therefore, is more appropriate if the term is understood in its sense of “having substance” or “not imaginary,” rather than the sense of “considerable” or “large.” [Moreover, the Court should have weighed] the importance of the government's interest against the impact of the draft law amendment on freedom of speech.

Should the Court have “balanced” the competing interests in O'Brien? How would you assess the importance of the draft law amendment’s impact on free speech? Consider the following arguments:

a. “In view of the fact that the amendment does not punish dissent per se, but merely forbids one very specific means of conveying the expression of dissent, it cannot seriously be contended that the amendment’s effect upon speech is anything but minor.” Id. at 27.

b. “Burning a draft card [is] the ordinary person’s way of attracting the attention of the national news media. [To] [prohibit] such an effective form of propagating one's views [is] to greatly diminish the effectiveness of the individual's right [to] make his dissent known." Velvel, Freedom of Speech and the Draft Card Burning Cases, 16 U. Kan. L. Rev. 149, 153 (1968).

c. "[Symbolic] conduct deserves a high degree of constitutional protection. [The] kind of stimulus necessary to activate the political conscience of [the] populace sometimes can be created only by transcending rationality and appealing to more primitive, more basic instincts. [The] communication achieved by the wave of draft-card burnings at the height of the United States involvement in Vietnam represents a paradigm example of the 'speech' with which the First Amendment is concerned." Blasi, The Checking Value in First Amendment Theory, 1977 Am. B. Found. Res. J. 521, 640.

d. "[Much] of the effectiveness of O'Brien's communication [derived] precisely from the fact that it was illegal. Had there been no law prohibiting draft card [burning], he might have attracted no more attention than he would have by swallowing a goldfish." Ely, supra, at 1489–1490. See G. Stone, Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime 471–472 (2004): "By 1965, the act of publicly burning one's draft card had become a potent means of protest. This was more than a clever way to express one's opposition to the war. Burning a copy of the Constitution is also a clever way to express opposition, but burning a copy of the Constitution (as distinct from burning the original) was not a crime. Burning a draft card was. Thus, this act represented not only symbolic dissent but direct resistance. Those who publicly burned their draft cards [crossed] the line between protest and civil disobedience."

e. "As applied to expression, the [O'Brien] statute had [a] disparate impact on those who opposed government policy, for who would destroy a draft card as an expression of support for government policy? [Indeed], in practical effect, the statute had essentially the same content-differential effect as a law prohibiting any person [to destroy] a draft card 'as a symbolic expression of protest against government policy.'" Stone, Content Regulation and the First Amendment, 25 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 189, 222–223 (1983).

Is the Court's analysis of symbolic expression in O'Brien consistent with its analysis of content-neutral restrictions generally? Consider Ely, supra, at 1488–1489: "What was unconsciously going on in O'Brien [was] a reservation [of] serious balancing [for] relatively familiar [means] of expression, such as pamphlets, pickets, public speeches and rallies, [and a relegation of] other, less orthodox modes of communication to the [highly deferential approach] that sustained the draft card burning law."

5. "Incidental" restrictions on free speech. Note that, unlike most content-neutral restrictions, such as laws prohibiting leafleting, the law at issue in

O'Brien was not expressly directed at speech. Its effect on speech was merely “incidental.” Should it matter whether a content-neutral law expressly restricts speech or whether it restricts a broader range of activities but has only an incidental effect on speech? For analysis of incidental restrictions, see Kagan, Private Speech, Public Purpose: The Role of Governmental Motive in First Amendment Doctrine, 63 U. Chi. L. Rev. 415, 494–508 (1996) (the distinction between direct and incidental restrictions can be explained largely in terms of the concern with avoiding possible improper governmental motivation); Rubenfeld, The First Amendment’s Purpose, 53 Stan. L. Rev. 767, 769 (2001) (“there is no such thing as a free speech immunity based on the claim that someone wants to break an otherwise constitutional law for expressive purposes”); Dorf, Incidental Burdens on Fundamental Rights, 109 Harv. L. Rev. 1175 (1996) (“sound reasons can be advanced for taking direct burdens more seriously than incidental burdens,” but “substantial incidental burdens” raise “a bona fide constitutional problem”); Stone, Content-Neutral Restrictions, 54 U. Chi. L. Rev. 46, 114 (1987) (incidental restrictions may be unconstitutional if they have a highly disproportionate and significant impact on particular viewpoints).

For an example of a (relatively rare) decision in which the Court has invalidated an incidental restriction on expression, see NAACP v. Alabama, section E5, infra, in which the Court held at the height of the civil rights movement that an Alabama statute requiring all out-of-state corporations doing business in the state to disclose the names and addresses of all Alabama “members” was invalid as applied to the NAACP, because “on past occasions revelation of the identity of [the NAACP’s] rank-and-file members has exposed these members to economic reprisal, loss of employment, threat of physical coercion, and other manifestations of public hostility.” The Court concluded that, “under these circumstances, [compelled] disclosure of [the NAACP’s] Alabama membership is likely to affect adversely the ability of [the NAACP] and its members to pursue their [constitutional rights].” For a more recent example, see Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, section E5, infra.

6. When is an incidental restriction not “incidental”? A paradigm example of an incidental restriction might be a law prohibiting any person to speed, as applied to an individual who speeds in order to express his opposition to speed limits. Note that two factors are present in this situation: (1) the law is not directed at speech, and (2) it is not the expressive element of the act that causes the harm the state seeks to prevent. Both factors must be present for the incidental effect doctrine to apply. Consider, for example, a prosecution for breach of the peace based on an inflammatory speech given by an individual on a street corner that causes a fight. The breach of the peace statute is not directed at speech, as such. It applies to all sorts of nonspeech conduct, such as making loud noises late at night in a residential neighborhood or parking one's car on a sidewalk. In that sense, the statute has only an incidental effect on speakers. But because the speaker has breached the peace because of the response of others to the message he has conveyed, the Court does not treat this as a mere incidental effect. Indeed, this is implicit in the World War I cases in which defendants were prosecuted for "obstructing the draft" and in the hostile audience cases in which they were prosecuted for breach of the peace. Put simply, where the relevant harm is caused by the message, the incidental effects doctrine is inapplicable.

Along these lines, consider Holder v. Humanitarian Law Project, 561 U.S. 1 (2010), which involved the constitutionality of a federal statute declaring it unlawful for any person knowingly to provide "material support" to a foreign terrorist organization, where the statute defined "material support" as including, among other things, property, money, lodging, safehouses, facilities, weapons, and expert advice. Plaintiffs, who wanted to advise foreign terrorist organizations how to further their ends through legal channels, challenged the constitutionality of the statute as applied to them. The government argued that the statute had only an incidental effect on speech and that O'Brien should govern. Although the Court upheld the statute on other grounds, it unanimously rejected the government's argument:

O'Brien does not provide the applicable standard for reviewing a content-based regulation of speech, and [this statute] regulates speech on the basis of its content. [The government] argues that [the statute falls under O'Brien] because it generally functions as a regulation of conduct. That argument runs headlong into a number of our precedents, most prominently Cohen v. California, [which] involved a generally applicable regulation of conduct, barring breaches of the peace. But when Cohen was convicted for wearing a jacked bearing an epithet, we did not apply O'Brien. Instead, we recognized that the generally applicable law was directed at Cohen because of what his speech communicated—he violated the breach of the peace statute because of the offensive content of his particular message. We accordingly applied more rigorous scrutiny and reversed his conviction. This suit falls into the same category.

7. The problem of legislative motivation. Should the Court in O'Brien have invalidated the 1965 amendment because "the 'purpose' of Congress was 'to suppress freedom of speech'"? As the Court noted, only two Representatives and one Senator commented directly on the legislation. Congressman Bray's comments are representative: "The need of this legislation is clear. Beatniks and so-called ‘campus cults’ have been publicly burning their draft cards to demonstrate their contempt for the United States and our resistance to Communist takeovers. [If] these ‘revolutionaries’ are permitted to deface and destroy their draft cards, our entire Selective Service System is dealt a serious blow.”

Consider Alfange, supra, at 15, 16: “[What] emerges with indisputable clarity from an examination of the legislative history of the amendment is that the intent of its framers was purely and simply to put a stop to this particular form of antiwar protest, which they deemed extraordinarily contemptible and vicious—even treasonous—at a time when American troops were engaged in combat. [The Court’s contrary conclusion blinked] the facts.”

The Court has often inquired into the motivation underlying executive and administrative decisions. See, e.g., Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund, 473 U.S. 788 (1985) (“the existence of reasonable grounds for limiting access to a nonpublic forum [will] not save a regulation that is in reality a facade for viewpoint-based discrimination”); Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977) (although untenured teacher can be dismissed for “no reason whatever,” he cannot be fired for exercise of first amendment rights); Keyes v. School District No. 1, 413 U.S. 189 (1973) (Denver schools held unlawfully segregated because school board decisions concerning the location of schools were motivated by racial considerations); Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886) (licensing law invalidated because of discriminatory administration).

As indicated in O’Brien, however, the Court has been reluctant to inquire into the motivation underlying legislative actions. Three explanations have usually been offered for this reluctance: the difficulty of ascertaining the “actual” motivation of a collective body; the futility of invalidating a law that could be reenacted with a show of “wiser” motives; and the inappropriateness of impugning the integrity of a coordinate branch of government. Are these explanations sufficiently weighty to justify the conclusion that “the purpose of Congress [is] not a basis for declaring [legislation] unconstitutional”? See Brest, Palmer v. Thompson: An Approach to the Problem of Unconstitutional Legislative Motive, 1971 Sup. Ct. Rev. 95; Ely, Legislative and Administrative Motivation in Constitutional Law, 79 Yale L.J. 1205 (1970). For more on the problem of “motivation,” see Chapter 5, section C2, supra.

Note: Flag Desecration and Misuse

1. Flag burning. In Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576 (1969), appellant, after hearing a news report that civil rights leader James Meredith had been shot, took his American flag out of a drawer, carried it to a nearby street corner, and lit it with a match. As it burned on the pavement, appellant said to a group of onlookers, “We don’t need no damn flag. [If] they let that happen to Meredith we don’t need an American flag.” Appellant was convicted of violating a New York statute declaring it a misdemeanor “publicly [to] mutilate, deface, defile, trample upon, or cast contempt upon either by words or acts [any flag of the United States].” The Court, in a five-to-four decision, overturned appellant’s conviction. The Court found it unnecessary, however, to address appellant’s assertion “that New York may not constitutionally punish one who publicly destroys or damages an American flag as a means of protest,” holding instead that the statute “was unconstitutionally applied in appellant’s case because it permitted him to be punished merely for speaking defiant or contemptuous words about the American flag.”

Chief Justice Warren and Justices Black, White, and Fortas dissented. Chief Justice Warren chastised the Court for ducking “the basic question presented”: “whether the deliberate act of burning an American flag in public as a “protest” may be punished as a crime.” On that question, Chief Justice Warren concluded that “the States and the Federal Government [have] the power to protect the flag from acts of desecration and disgrace.” In a separate dissenting opinion, Justice Fortas elaborated:

If a state statute provided that it is a misdemeanor to burn one’s shirt [on] the public thoroughfare, it could hardly be asserted that the citizen’s constitutional right is violated. [And if] the arsonist asserted that he was burning his shirt [as] a protest against the Government’s fiscal policies, [it] is hardly possible that his claim to First Amendment shelter would prevail against the State’s claim of a right to avert danger to the public and to avoid obstruction to traffic as a result of the fire. [If], as I submit, it is permissible to prohibit the burning of personal property on the public sidewalk, there is no basis for applying a different rule to flag burning. And the fact that the law is violated for purposes of protest does not immunize the violator. [Citing O’Brien.]

Suppose Street had been convicted of violating a law prohibiting any person to make any “open fire in public.” Is the flag desecration statute distinguishable?

2. Contemptuous treatment. In Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 566 (1974), appellee, who wore a small cloth replica of the United States flag sewn to the seat of his trousers, was convicted of violating a Massachusetts statute prohibiting any person to “publicly mutilate, trample upon, deface or treat contemptuously the flag of the United States.” The Court, in an opinion by Justice Powell, overturned the conviction. The Court found it unnecessary to decide whether the statute was unconstitutionally overbroad, holding instead that it was “void for vagueness.” The Court emphasized that appellee was charged not “with any act of physical desecration,” but with “publicly [treating] contemptuously the flag of the United States.” Noting that “the flag has become ‘an object of youth fashion and high camp,’” and that “casual treatment of the flag in many contexts has become a widespread contemporary phenomenon,” the Court concluded that this aspect of the statute was “inherently vague” and hence violative of due process. Chief Justice Burger and Justices Blackmun and Rehnquist dissented.

3. Flag misuse. In Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405 (1974), appellant, to protest the invasion of Cambodia and the killings at Kent State University, displayed a United States flag, which he owned, out of the window of his apartment. Affixed to the flag was a large peace symbol made of removable tape. Appellant was convicted under Washington’s “flag misuse” statute, which prohibited the exhibition of a United States flag to which is attached or superimposed “any word, figure, mark, design, drawing, or advertisement.” The Court held, in a per curiam opinion, that, “as applied to appellant’s activity,” which the Court described as “a pointed expression of anguish by appellant about [the] affairs of his government,” the Washington statute “impermissibly infringed free expression”:

[The state maintains that it] has an interest in preserving the national flag as an unalloyed symbol of our country. [This] interest might be seen as an effort to prevent the appropriation of a revered national symbol by an individual, interest group, or enterprise where there was a risk that association of the symbol with a particular product or viewpoint might be taken erroneously as evidence of governmental endorsement. [Alternatively], the interest [may be understood as] based on the uniquely universal character of the national flag as a symbol. [If] it may be destroyed or permanently disfigured, it [could] lose its capability of mirroring the sentiments of all who view it.

[We] need not decide in this case whether the interest advanced by the [state] is valid. We assume, arguendo, that it is. [But even if] it is valid, [it] is directly related to expression in the context of activity like that undertaken by appellant. For that reason [the] four-step analysis of [O’Brien] is inapplicable. [We hold that the statute is] unconstitutional as applied to appellant’s activity. There was no risk that appellant’s acts would mislead viewers into assuming that the Government endorsed his viewpoint. [Moreover, appellant] did [not] permanently disfigure the flag or destroy it. [And] his message was direct, likely to be understood, and within the contours of the First Amendment. [The] conviction must be reversed.

Justice Rehnquist, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice White, dissented:

[The] Court's treatment [of the state's interest] lacks all substance. The suggestion that the State's interest somehow diminishes when the flag is decorated with removable tape trivializes something which is not trivial. The State [is] hardly seeking to protect the flag's resale value. [The] true nature of the State's interest in this case is [one] of preserving the flag as "an important symbol of nationhood and unity." [It] is the character, not the cloth, of the flag which the State seeks to protect. "[The] flag is a national property, and the Nation may regulate those who would make, imitate, sell, possess, or use it."...

[That] the State has a valid interest in preserving the character of the flag does not mean, of course, that it can employ all conceivable means to enforce it. It certainly could not require all citizens to own the flag or compel citizens to salute one. [It] presumably cannot punish criticism of the flag, or the principles for which it stands, any more than it could punish criticism of this country's policies or ideas. But the statute in this case demands no such allegiance. Its operation does not depend upon whether [the] use of the flag is respectful or contemptuous. [It] simply withdraws a unique national symbol from the roster of materials that may be used as a background for communications. [The] Constitution [does not prohibit] Washington from making that decision.

Is Spence consistent with O'Brien? Do you agree with the Court that the interests underlying flag misuse statutes are "directly related to expression," and that the O'Brien standard thus should not govern? Consider Ely, Flag Desecration: A Case Study in the Roles of Categorization and Balancing in First Amendment Analysis, 88 Harv. L. Rev. 1482, 1503–1504, 1506–1508 (1975):

[The flag misuse statute is] ideologically neutral on its face, and would proscribe the superimposition of "Buy Mother Fletcher's Ambulance Paint" [as] fully as it would the addition of a swastika. Such "improper use" provisions are [thus] more complicated constitutionally than the ideologically tilted "desecration" provisions. [In the flag misuse context], the state may assert an interest [similar] to that asserted in [defense of a content-neutral law prohibiting any person to interrupt a public speaker]. The state's interest in both of these cases might be characterized as an interest in preventing the [defendant] from interfering with the expression of others. [As with interruption of a public speaker, the] state does not care what message the defendant is conveying by altering the flag: all that matters is that he is interrupting the message conveyed by the flag. [There is, however, an answer to this argument, for] although improper use statutes do not single out certain messages for proscription, they do single out one set of messages, namely the set of messages conveyed by the American flag, for protection. That, of course, is not true of a law that generally prohibits the interruption of speakers. [In reality, then, an improper use statute] is, at best, analogous to a law prohibiting the interruption of patriotic speeches, and that is a law that is hardly “unrelated to the suppression of free expression.”

4. Flag desecration. The Court directly confronted the issue of flag desecration in Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989). During the 1984 Republican National Convention, Johnson burned an American flag as part of a political demonstration protesting the policies of the Reagan administration. Johnson was arrested and convicted of violating a Texas flag desecration statute, which made it a crime for any person to “deface, damage or otherwise physically mistreat” the flag “in a way that the actor knows will seriously offend one or more persons likely to observe or discover his action.” The Court, in a five-to-four decision, overturned the conviction.

In an opinion by Justice Brennan, the Court began by concluding that “Johnson’s flag-burning was ‘conduct’ sufficiently imbued with elements of ‘communication’ to implicate the First Amendment.” After rejecting the claim that the statute could be justified in terms of the state’s interest in “preventing breaches of the peace,” see section B2 supra, the Court turned to the heart of the issue:

The Government generally has a freer hand in restricting expressive conduct than it has in restricting the written or spoken word. It may not, however, proscribe particular conduct because it has expressive elements. [Thus], although we have recognized that where “‘speech’ and ‘nonspeech’ elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest in regulating the nonspeech element can justify incidental limitations on First Amendment freedoms,” [O’Brien], we have limited the applicability of O’Brien’s relatively lenient standard to those cases in which “the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression.”...

The State [asserts] an interest in preserving the flag as a symbol of nationhood and national unity. [We are] persuaded that this interest is related to expression in the case of Johnson's burning of the flag. The State, apparently, is concerned that such conduct will lead people to believe either that the flag does not stand for nationhood and national unity, but instead reflects other, less positive concepts, or that the concepts reflected in the flag do not in fact exist, that is, we do not enjoy unity as a Nation. These concerns blossom only when a person's treatment of the flag communicates some message, and thus are related "to the suppression of free expression" within the meaning of O'Brien....

It remains to consider whether the State's interest in preserving the flag as a symbol of nationhood and national unity justifies Johnson's conviction. [Johnson] was prosecuted because he knew that his politically charged expression would cause "serious offense." [The] Texas law is thus not aimed at protecting the physical integrity of the flag in all circumstances, but is designed instead to protect it only against impairments that would cause serious offense to others. [Whether] Johnson's treatment of the flag violated Texas law thus depended on the likely communicative impact of his expressive conduct. [Because] this restriction [is] content-based, [we must] subject the State's asserted interest [to] "the most exacting scrutiny."...

If there is a bedrock principle underlying the First Amendment, it is that the Government may not prohibit the expression of an idea simply because society finds the idea itself offensive or disagreeable. We have not recognized an exception to this principle even where our flag is involved. [Citing Street; Spence; and Goguen.] [Nothing] in our precedents suggests that a State may foster its own view of the flag by prohibiting expressive conduct related to it. [If] we were to hold that a State may forbid flag-burning wherever it is likely to endanger the flag's symbolic role, but allow it wherever burning a flag promotes that role—as where, for example, a person ceremoniously burns a dirty flag—we would be saying that when it comes to impairing the flag's physical integrity, the flag itself may be used as a symbol [only] in one direction. We would be permitting a State to "prescribe what shall be orthodox" by saying that one may burn the flag to convey one's attitude toward it and its referents only if one does not endanger the flag's representation of nationhood and national unity.

We never before have held that the Government may ensure that a symbol be used to express only one view of that symbol or its referents. [Citing Schacht.] To conclude that the Government may permit designated symbols to be used to communicate only a limited set of messages would be to enter territory having no discernible or defensible boundaries. Could the Government, on this theory, prohibit the burning of state flags? Of copies of the presidential seal? Of the Constitution?...

Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justices White and O'Connor, dissented:

The flag is not simply another “idea” or “point of view” competing for recognition in the marketplace of ideas. [Flag burning is] no essential part of any expression of ideas, [citing Chaplinsky], and [Johnson’s] act [conveyed] nothing that could not have been conveyed [in] a dozen different ways. [Far] from being a case of “one picture being worth a thousand words,” flag burning is the equivalent of an inarticulate grunt or roar that [is] most likely to be indulged in not to express any particular idea, but to antagonize others. [The] Texas statute deprived Johnson of only one rather inarticulate symbolic form of protest—a form of protest that was profoundly offensive to many—and left him with a full panoply of other symbols and every conceivable form of verbal expression to express his deep disapproval of national policy. Thus, in no way can it be said that Texas is punishing him because his hearers—or any other group of people—were profoundly opposed to the message that he sought to convey. [It] was Johnson’s use of this particular symbol, and not the idea that he sought to convey by [it], for which he was punished.

Justice Stevens also dissented.

5. Flag desecration revisited. Almost immediately after the decision in Johnson, Congress enacted the Flag Protection Act of 1989, which made it a crime for any person knowingly to mutilate, deface, physically defile, burn, maintain on the floor or ground, or trample upon any flag of the United States. The government maintained that this act was constitutional because, unlike the statute addressed in Johnson, the act was designed to protect “the physical integrity of the flag under all circumstances,” did “not target expressive conduct on the basis of the content of its message,” and proscribed “conduct (other than disposal) that damages or mistreats a flag, without regard to the actor’s motive, his intended message, or the likely effects of his conduct on onlookers.” In United States v. Eichman, 496 U.S. 310 (1990), the Court, in a five-to-four decision, invalidated this act.

Justice Brennan delivered the opinion:

Although the [act] contains no explicit content-based limitation on the scope of prohibited conduct, it is nevertheless clear that the Government’s asserted interest is “related to the suppression of free expression” and concerned with the content of such expression. The Government’s interest in protecting the “physical integrity” of a privately owned flag rests upon a perceived need to preserve the flag’s status as a symbol of our Nation and certain national ideals.

But the mere destruction or disfigurement of a particular physical manifestation of the symbol, without more, does not diminish or otherwise affect the symbol itself in any way. For example, the secret destruction of a flag in one's own basement would not threaten the flag's recognized meaning. Rather, the Government's desire to preserve the flag as a symbol for certain national ideals is implicated "only when a person's treatment of the flag communicates [a] message" to others that is inconsistent with those ideals.

Moreover, the precise language of the Act's prohibitions confirms Congress' interest in the communicative impact of flag destruction. The Act criminalizes the conduct of anyone who "knowingly mutilates, defaces, physically defiles, burns, maintains on the floor or ground, or tramples upon any flag." Each of the specified terms—with the possible exception of "burns"—unmistakably connotes disrespectful treatment....

Although Congress cast the [act] in somewhat broader terms than the Texas statute at issue in Johnson, the Act still suffers from the same fundamental flaw: it suppresses expression out of concern for its likely communicative impact. Despite the Act's wider scope, its restriction on expression cannot be "'justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech.'" The Act therefore must be subjected to "the most exacting scrutiny," and for the reasons stated in Johnson, the Government's interest cannot justify its infringement on First Amendment rights.

Justice Stevens, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices White and O'Connor, dissented.

Central to the Court's reasoning in Eichman is its assertion that the Flag Protection Act was "related to the suppression of free expression" because "the Government's desire to preserve the flag as a symbol for certain national ideals" is implicated "only when a person's treatment of the flag 'communicates [a] message' to others that is inconsistent with those ideals." Is that assertion persuasive? Suppose Congress enacts the following statute: "No person may knowingly impair the physical integrity of the American flag." Do Johnson and Eichman require the invalidation of this law? See Stone, Flag Burning and the Constitution, 75 Iowa L. Rev. 111 (1989). Could government constitutionally protect the flag as a matter of copyright law? See Kmiec, In the Aftermath of Johnson and Eichman, 1990 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 577.

BARNES v. GLEN THEATRE, INC., 501 U.S. 560 (1991). Respondents, two Indiana establishments that present nude dancing as entertainment, brought suit to enjoin enforcement of Indiana's public indecency statute, which prohibits any person to appear “in a state of nudity” in any “public place.” The state courts interpreted the statute as requiring nude dancers in such establishments to wear pasties and a G-string. The Court, in a five-to-four decision, rejected the claim that this statute, as applied to respondents, violates the first amendment.

Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justices O’Connor and Kennedy, delivered the plurality opinion: “[Nude] dancing of the kind sought to be performed here is expressive conduct within the outer perimeters of the First Amendment, though we view it as only marginally so. [Indiana], of course, has not banned nude dancing as such, but has proscribed public nudity across the board. [Applying] the four-part O’Brien test, we find that Indiana’s public indecency statute is justified despite its incidental limitations on some expressive activity. The public indecency statute is clearly within the constitutional power of the State and furthers substantial governmental interests. [Such statutes, which] are of ancient origin, and presently exist in at least 47 States, [reflect] moral disapproval of people appearing in the nude among strangers in public places. [The] traditional police power of the States is defined as the authority to provide for the public health, safety, and morals, and we have upheld such a basis for legislation. [Citing Roth, section D5 supra; Paris Adult Theatre, section D5, supra.]

“This interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression. [Respondents contend] that even though prohibiting nudity in public generally may not be related to suppressing expression, prohibiting the performance of nude dancing is related to expression because the state seeks to prevent its erotic message. [But] we do not think that when Indiana applies its statute to the nude dancing in these nightclubs it is proscribing nudity because of the erotic message conveyed by the dancers. Presumably numerous other erotic performances are presented at these establishments [without] any interference from the state, so long as the performers wear a scant amount of clothing. Likewise, the requirement that the dancers don pasties and a G-string does not deprive the dance of whatever erotic message it conveys; it simply makes the message slightly less graphic. The perceived evil that Indiana seeks to address is not erotic dancing, but public nudity. The appearance of people of all shapes and sizes in the nude at a beach, for example, would convey little if any erotic message, yet the state still seeks to prevent it. Public nudity is the evil the state seeks to prevent, whether or not it is combined with expressive activity....”

Justice Scalia filed a separate concurring opinion: “[The] challenged regulation must be upheld [because], as a general law regulating conduct and not specifically directed at expression, it is not subject to First Amendment scrutiny at all. [Virtually] every law restricts conduct, and virtually any prohibited conduct can be performed for an expressive purpose—if only expressive of the fact that the actor disagrees with the prohibition. It cannot reasonably be demanded, therefore, that every restriction of expression incidentally produced by a general law regulating conduct pass normal First Amendment scrutiny, or even—as some of our cases have suggested, see, e.g., O'Brien—that it be justified by an ‘important or substantial’ government interest....

“This is not to say that the first amendment affords no protection to expressive conduct. Where the government prohibits conduct precisely because of its communicative attributes, we hold the regulation unconstitutional. See, e.g., Eichman; Johnson; Spence. [In] each of the foregoing cases, we explicitly found that suppressing communication was the object of the regulation of conduct. Where that has not been the case, however—where suppression of communicative use of the conduct was merely the incidental effect of forbidding the conduct for other reasons—we have allowed the regulation to stand. [All] our holdings (though admittedly not some of our discussion) support the conclusion that ‘the only First Amendment analysis applicable to laws that do not directly or indirectly impede speech is the threshold inquiry of whether the purpose of the law is to suppress communication. If not, that is the end of the [matter].’ We have explicitly adopted such a regime in another First Amendment context: that of Free Exercise. [Citing Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, Chapter 8, section C, infra.] I think we should avoid wherever possible [a] mode of analysis that requires judicial assessment of the ‘importance’ of government interests—and especially of government interests in various aspects of morality.”

Justice Souter also filed a concurring opinion: “[I] agree with the plurality that the appropriate analysis to determine the actual protection required by the First Amendment is the four-part enquiry described in O'Brien. [I rest my concurrence, however,] not on the possible sufficiency of society’s moral views [but] on the State’s substantial interest in combating the secondary effects of adult establishments of the sort typified by respondents’ establishments. [In] my view, the interest [in] preventing prostitution, sexual assault, and other criminal activity, although presumably not a justification for all applications of the statute, is sufficient under O'Brien to justify the State’s enforcement of the statute against the type of adult entertainment at issue here. [Citing Renton and Young, section D7 supra.] [This] justification of the statute may not be ignored merely because it is unclear to what extent this purpose motivated the Indiana Legislature in enacting the statute. Our appropriate focus is not an empirical enquiry into the actual intent of the enacting legislature, but rather the existence [of a] governmental interest in the service of which the challenged application of the statute may be constitutional. [The] secondary effects rationale on which I rely would be open to question if the State were to seek to enforce the statute by barring expressive nudity in classes of productions that could not readily be analogized to the adult films at issue in Renton. It is difficult to see, for example, how the enforcement of Indiana's statute against nudity in a production of 'Hair' or 'Equus' somewhere other than in an 'adult' theater would further the State's interest in avoiding harmful secondary effects...."

Justice White, joined by Justices Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, dissented: "The purpose of forbidding people from appearing nude in parks, beaches, hot dog stands, and like public places is to protect others from offense. But that could not possibly be the purpose of preventing nude dancing in theaters and barrooms since the viewers are exclusively consenting adults who pay money to see these dances. The purpose of the proscription in these contexts is to protect the viewers from what the State believes is the harmful message that nude dancing communicates. [This] being the case, it cannot be that the statutory prohibition is unrelated to expressive conduct. [It] is only because nude dancing performances may generate emotions and feelings of eroticism and sensuality among the spectators that the State seeks to regulate such expressive activity, apparently on the assumption that creating or emphasizing such thoughts and ideas in the minds of the spectators may lead to increased prostitution and the degradation of women. But generating thoughts, ideas, and emotions is the essence of communication. The nudity element of nude dancing performances cannot be neatly pigeonholed as mere 'conduct' independent of any expressive component of the dance. That fact dictates the level of First Amendment protection to be accorded the performances at issue here. [Content] based restrictions 'will be upheld only if narrowly drawn to accomplish a compelling governmental interest.' [Neither] the Court nor the State suggests that the statute could withstand scrutiny under that standard."

Consider Justice Scalia's response to Justice White's dissent: "The dissent confidently asserts that the purpose of restricting nudity in public places in general is to protect nonconsenting parties from offense; and argues that since only consenting, admission-paying patrons see respondents dance, that purpose cannot apply and the only remaining purpose must relate to the communicative elements of the performance. Perhaps the dissenters believe that 'offense to others' ought to be the only reason for restricting nudity in public places generally, but there is no basis for thinking that our society has ever shared that Thoreauvian 'you-may-do-what-you-like-so-long-as-it-does-not-injure-someone-else' beau ideal—much less for thinking that it was written into the Constitution. The purpose of Indiana's nudity law would be violated, I think, if 60,000 fully consenting adults crowded into the Hoosierdome to display their genitals to one another, even if there were not an offended innocent in the crowd. Our society prohibits, and all human societies have prohibited, certain activities not because they harm others but because they are considered in the traditional phrase, 'contra bonos mores,' i.e., immoral. [The] purpose of the Indiana statute [is] to enforce the traditional moral belief that people should not expose their private parts indiscriminately, regardless of whether those who see them are disedified. Since that is so, the dissent has no basis for positing that, where only thoroughly edified adults are present, the purpose must be repression of communication."

Consider the constitutionality, after Barnes, of the application of Indiana's public nudity statute to movies, art exhibits, and television productions depicting nudity. For the argument that "the outcome in Barnes would have been different" had Indiana attempted to apply its "statute to accepted media for the communication of ideas, as for example by attempting to prohibit nudity in movies or in the theater," see Post, Recuperating First Amendment Doctrine, 47 Stan. L. Rev. 1249, 1255–1259 (1995); Kagan, Regulation of Hate Speech and Pornography after R.A.V., 60 U. Chi. L. Rev. 873, 887–888 (1993) (arguing that the application of pandering statutes to the producers of sexually-explicit but non-obscene movies is "questionable" because of the "potential for applying such statutes to large amounts of speech at the core of constitutional protection"); People v. Freeman, 758 P.2d 1128 (1988) (reversing the pandering conviction of a film producer who had paid actors to copulate on screen).

CITY OF ERIE v. PAP'S A.M., 529 U.S. 277 (2000). Erie, Pennsylvania, enacted an ordinance banning public nudity. The preamble stated that the "purpose" of the ordinance was to respond to "a recent increase in nude live entertainment within the City, which activity adversely impacts...the public health, safety and welfare by providing an atmosphere conducive to violence, sexual harassment, public intoxication, prostitution, the spread of sexually transmitted diseases and other deleterious effects." The ordinance was challenged by the owner of Kandyland, a nude dancing establishment. Does the existence of this preamble distinguish this case from Barnes? The Court, in a six-to-three decision, upheld the ordinance.

Justice O'Connor delivered a plurality opinion, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Kennedy and Breyer: "The ordinance here, like the statute in Barnes, is on its face a general prohibition on public nudity. [It] bans all public nudity, regardless of whether that nudity is accompanied by expressive activity. [Moreover, the] State's interest in preventing harmful secondary effects is not related to the suppression of expression. In trying to control the secondary effects of nude dancing, the ordinance seeks to deter crime and the other deleterious effects caused by the presence of such an establishment in the neighborhood. [Citing Renton.]

"[Even] if Erie's public nudity ban has some minimal effect on the erotic message by muting that portion of the expression that occurs when the last stitch is dropped, [erotic dancers] are free to perform wearing pasties and G-strings. Any effect on the overall expression is de minimis....

"[This] case is, in fact, similar to [O'Brien]. The justification for the government regulation in each case prevents harmful 'secondary' effects that are unrelated to the suppression of expression. [While] the doctrinal theories behind 'incidental burdens' and 'secondary effects' are, of course, not identical, there is nothing objectionable about a city passing a general ordinance to ban public nudity (even though such a ban may place incidental burdens on some protected speech) and at the same time recognizing that one specific occurrence of public nudity—nude erotic dancing—is particularly problematic because it produces harmful secondary effects....

"We conclude that Erie's asserted interest in combating the negative secondary effects associated with adult entertainment establishments [is] unrelated to the suppression of the erotic message conveyed by nude dancing. The ordinance [is] therefore valid if it satisfies the four-factor test from O'Brien for evaluating restrictions on symbolic speech." Justice O'Connor then went on to find that the ordinance did, indeed, satisfy the O'Brien test.

Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, concurred in the judgment, reaffirming his position in Barnes that because the public nudity ordinance is "a general law regulating conduct and not specifically directed at expression, it is not subject to First Amendment scrutiny at all." Justice Scalia argued further that the existence of the preamble is irrelevant to the constitutionality of the ordinance because it neither "make[s] the law any less general in its reach nor demonstrate[s] that what the municipal authorities really find objectionable is expression rather than public nakedness."

Justice Stevens, joined by Justice Ginsburg, dissented: "The censorial purpose of Erie's ordinance precludes reliance on [Barnes]. As its preamble forthrightly admits, the ordinance's 'purpose' is to 'limit' a protected form of speech. [Moreover,] Erie's ordinance differs from the statute in Barnes in another respect, [for in] an earlier proceeding in this case, [the city stipulated that it had] permitted a production of [the play] Equus to proceed without prosecution [even though it included public nudity]. [Thus, unlike the statute in Barnes, the Erie] ordinance is deliberately targeted at Kandyland's type of nude dancing (to the exclusion of plays like Equus)."

In her plurality opinion, Justice O'Connor offered the following response to Justice Stevens's argument about the purpose of the ordinance: "The argument that the ordinance is 'aimed' at suppressing expression through a ban on nude dancing—an argument [supported] by pointing to statements [that] the public nudity ban was not intended to apply to 'legitimate' theater productions—is really an argument that the city council [had] an illicit motive in enacting the ordinance. [But] this Court will not strike down an otherwise constitutional statute on the basis of an alleged illicit motive. [Citing O'Brien.]" Justice Souter also dissented.

Note: Other Forms of Symbolic Speech

1. Political boycotts. Suppose an antiabortion group boycotts all manufacturers who sell supplies to abortion clinics. Is such a concerted refusal to deal "speech"? May the group constitutionally be punished under a statute that prohibits "two or more persons, acting in concert, to refuse to deal with any merchant in an effort to induce such merchant to adopt a policy it would not otherwise choose to adopt"? See NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886 (1982), in which the Court invalidated a civil judgment against the NAACP for instituting a boycott of white merchants designed to induce business and civic leaders to adopt a number of reforms, including the desegregation of public facilities. The Court explained that "speech does not lose its protected character...simply because it may...coerce [others] into action." And while "States have broad powers to regulate economic activity, we do not find a comparable right to prohibit peaceful political activity such as that found in the boycott in this case."

2. Banning military recruiters. Suppose law schools exclude from their placement facilities any employer, including the military, who discriminates against gays and lesbians. Suppose also that the government makes it a crime for any institution of higher education to discriminate against the military in the use of its placement facilities. Is the exclusion of military recruiters "speech" within the meaning of the first amendment? Is the constitutionality of the statute governed by O'Brien?

In Rumsfeld v. FAIR, 547 U.S. 47 (2006), the Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Roberts, declared that "we have extended First Amendment protection only to conduct that is inherently expressive." Unlike burning a draft card, the exclusion by law schools of military recruiters “is not inherently expressive,” because such conduct has meaning only if the law schools accompany “their conduct with speech explaining it.” Indeed, “an observer who sees military recruiters interviewing away from the law school has no way of knowing whether the law school is expressing its disapproval of the military, all the law school’s interview rooms are full, or the military recruiters decided for reasons of their own that they would rather interview someplace else.” The Court concluded that the fact that “explanatory speech is necessary” to give content to the act “is strong evidence that the conduct [is] not so inherently expressive that it warrants protection under O’Brien.” In any event, the Court held that even if the law were regarded as incidentally burdening speech it would satisfy O’Brien because it serves the government’s legitimate interest in facilitating military recruitment. For more on FAIR, see section E5 infra.

3. Are signatures on a referendum petition “speech” within the meaning of the First Amendment? In Doe v. Reed, 561 U.S. 186 (2010), the Court considered the constitutionality of a Washington state public records statute that authorizes the public disclosure of the names of individuals who sign referendum petitions. The plaintiffs argued that public disclosure would chill the willingness of individuals to sign such petitions. Although upholding the statute on its face, the Court rejected the argument that such signatures are not “speech” because “signing a petition is a legally operative legislative act and therefore ‘does not involve any significant expressive element.’” The Court concluded that “[p]etition signing remains expressive even when it has legal effect in the electoral process.”

4. Are legislative votes “speech” within the meaning of the First Amendment? In Nevada Comm’n on Ethics v. Carrigan, 564 U.S. 117 (2011), Carrigan, a state legislator, voted to approve a casino project that had used his long-time friend and campaign manager as a paid consultant. The commission held that, by so doing, Carrigan had violated a state ethics rule prohibiting public officials from voting on legislative matters with respect to which they have a conflict of interest. Carrigan claimed that this finding violated his rights under the First Amendment. The key issue was whether the casting of a vote by a state legislator is constitutionally protected speech. In a unanimous decision, the Court rejected Carrigan’s claim.

Justice Scalia delivered the opinion of the Court: “Laws punishing libel and obscenity are not thought to violate ‘the freedom of speech’ [because] such laws existed in 1791 and have been in place ever since. The same is true of legislative recusal rules. [Such] rules have been commonplace for over 200 years. ‘[E]arly congressional enactments “provid[e] contemporaneous and weighty evidence of the Constitution’s meaning,’” [and that] evidence is dispositive here. Within 15 years of the founding, both the House of Representatives and the Senate adopted recusal rules. [Moreover, today,] virtually every State has enacted some type of recusal law....

“But how can it be that restrictions upon legislators’ voting are not restrictions upon legislators’ protected speech? The answer is that a legislator’s vote is the commitment of his apportioned share of the legislature’s power to the passage or defeat of a particular proposal. The legislative power thus committed is not personal to the legislator but belongs to the people; the legislator has no personal right to it. [In] this respect, voting by a legislator is different from voting by a citizen....

“Carrigan and Justice Alito [cite] Doe v. Reed as establishing ‘the expressive character of voting.’ But Reed did no such thing. That case held only that a citizen’s signing of a petition—“core political speech”—was not deprived of its protected status simply because, under state law, a petition that garnered a sufficient number of signatures would suspend the state law to which it pertained, pending a referendum. It is one thing to say that an inherently expressive act remains so despite its having governmental effect, but it is altogether another thing to say that a governmental act becomes expressive simply because the governmental actor wishes it to be so.” Justices Alito and Kennedy filed concurring opinions.

Are you persuaded by the Court’s distinction of Doe v. Reed? What do you think of the Court’s “originalist” argument? Note that Justice Scalia was wrong about obscenity laws. In fact, there were no anti-obscenity laws in the United States until the nineteenth century. See Stone, Sex, Violence, and the First Amendment, 74 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1857, 1861–1863 (2007). What does this tell you about the dangers of “originalism” as a method of constitutional interpretation? Does Carrigan suggest that New York Times v. Sullivan was wrong and that a modern Sedition Act based on the Sedition Act of 1798 would be constitutional?

4. Other Means of Expression: Litigation, Association, and the Right Not to Speak

NAACP v. BUTTON, 371 U.S. 415 (1963). For more than a decade, the Virginia Conference of the NAACP had financed litigation aimed at ending racial segregation in the public schools of Virginia. In 1956, the Virginia legislature enacted chapter 33, which prohibited any organization to retain a lawyer in connection with litigation to which it was not a party and in which it had no pecuniary right or liability. The Supreme Court held that, as applied to the NAACP's activities, chapter 33 violated the first amendment. Justice Brennan delivered the opinion:

"In the context of NAACP objectives, litigation is not a technique of resolving private differences; it is a means for [achieving] equality of treatment [for] the members of the Negro [community]. It is [a] form of political expression. Groups which find themselves unable to achieve their objectives through the ballot frequently turn to the courts. [Under] Chapter 33 , [a] person who advises another that his legal rights have been infringed and refers him to a particular attorney [for] assistance has committed a [crime]. There thus inheres in the statute the gravest danger of smothering all discussion looking to the eventual institution of litigation on behalf of the rights of members of an unpopular minority. [We] cannot close our eyes to the fact that the militant Negro civil rights movement has engendered the intense resentment and opposition of the politically dominant white community of Virginia. [In] such circumstances, a statute broadly curtailing group activity leading to litigation may easily become a weapon of oppression, however even-handed its terms appear. Its mere existence could well freeze out of existence all such activity on behalf of the civil rights of Negro citizens.

"It is apparent, therefore, that Chapter 33 as construed limits First Amendment freedoms. [However] valid may be Virginia's interest in regulating the traditionally illegal practices of barratry, maintenance and champerty, that interest does not justify the prohibition of the NAACP activities disclosed by this record. Malicious intent was the essence of the common-law offenses of fomenting or stirring up litigation. [The exercise] of First Amendment rights to enforce constitutional rights through litigation, as a matter of law, cannot be deemed malicious...."

Justice White concurred in part and dissented in part.

Justice Harlan, joined by Justices Clark and Stewart, dissented: "Freedom of expression embraces more than the right of an individual to speak his mind. It includes also his right to advocate and his right to join with his fellows in an effort to make that advocacy effective. And just as it includes the right jointly to petition the legislature for redress of grievances, so it must include the right to join together for purposes of obtaining judicial redress....

"But to declare that litigation is a form of conduct that may be associated with political expression does not resolve this case. [For this Court has repeatedly held that] 'general regulatory statutes, not intended to control the content of speech but incidentally limiting its unfettered exercise,' are permissible 'when they have been found justified by subordinating valid governmental interests.' ...

"The important function of organizations like petitioner in vindicating constitutional rights is [not] substantially impaired by this statute. [This] enactment [does] not in any way suppress [advocacy] of litigation in general or in particular. [Moreover, it does not] prevent petitioner from recommending the services of attorneys who are not subject to its directions and control. [It] prevents only the solicitation of business for attorneys subject to petitioner's control, and as so limited, should be sustained."

Note: Litigation and the First Amendment

1. Button in context. Consider H. Kalven, The Negro and the First Amendment 66–69, 75–79 (1965):

One of the most distinctive features of the Negro revolution [of the 1950s and 1960s was] its almost military assault on the Constitution via the strategy of systematic litigation. [Chapter 33 was designed] to slow down [NAACP litigation]. Unless the NAACP [could go] out and sign up the client, pay for the case, and deliver the client to one of its expert lawyers, it [would have been] unable to recruit the needed flow of litigation. Unless it [could] control the timing and line of attack in the litigation once it was begun, its grand strategy of war by lawsuit [would have been] frustrated. [The] case thus raised a profound question for our scheme of constitutional adjudication.

2. Litigation as “speech.” Why does Button pose a first amendment issue? Because the law might be discriminatorily applied against persons espousing a particular view? Because association for the purpose of litigation is “speech”? Because litigation is “speech”? Because litigation is “speech” when it attempts to enforce constitutional rights?

3. The reach of Button: Primus. In In re Primus, 436 U.S. 412 (1978), an ACLU “cooperating lawyer” wrote a letter to a woman who had been sterilized, informing her of the ACLU’s willingness to provide free legal representation to women in her position in a proposed lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of an alleged program of sterilizing pregnant mothers as a condition of their continued receipt of Medicaid benefits. The Disciplinary Board of the South Carolina Supreme Court reprimanded the ACLU lawyer for violating a disciplinary rule prohibiting any “lawyer who has given unsolicited advice to a layman that he should [take] legal action [to] accept employment resulting from that advice.”

The Court held the reprimand unconstitutional. The Court emphasized that “for the ACLU, as for the NAACP, ‘litigation is not a technique of resolving private differences’; it is ‘a form of political expression’ and ‘political association.’” To justify a restriction on such “‘core First Amendment rights,’” the state must demonstrate that the attorney’s “activity in fact involved the type of misconduct at which South Carolina’s [prohibition on solicitation] is said to be directed.” Since the record did “not support [the state’s] contention that undue influence, overreaching, misrepresentation, or invasion of privacy [had] actually occurred,” the reprimand violated the first amendment.

See also United Transportation Union v. State Bar of Michigan, 401 U.S. 576 (1971) (invalidating an injunction prohibiting the union from recommending attorneys to its members only if the attorneys agreed that their fees would not exceed 25 percent of the recovery); United Mine Workers v. Illinois Bar Association, 389 U.S. 217 (1967) (invalidating an injunction prohibiting the union from employing a salaried attorney to assist its members with workers’ compensation claims); Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia State Bar, 377 U.S. 1 (1964) (invalidating an injunction prohibiting a union from recommending lawyers to its members to represent them in railroad personal injury litigation).

4. The reach of Button: Ohralik. In Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Association, 436 U.S. 447 (1978), decided on the same day as Primus, appellant, an attorney, after learning about an automobile accident, personally contacted two young women who had been injured in the accident and arranged to represent them in subsequent litigation. As a result of this “ambulance chasing,” Ohralik was suspended by the Ohio State Bar for violation of a disciplinary rule prohibiting any “lawyer who has given unsolicited advice to a layman that he should obtain counsel” to accept “employment resulting from that advice.”

The Court upheld the suspension. The Court explained that Ohralik was not governed by Button and Primus, for appellant’s “approaches to the young women [did not involve] political expression or an exercise of associational freedom ‘[to] secure constitutionally guaranteed civil rights.’” Moreover, Ohralik was not governed by the union cases, for “[appellant cannot] compare his solicitation to the mutual assistance in asserting legal rights that was at issue [in those cases].” Indeed, a “lawyer’s procurement of remunerative employment is a subject only marginally affected with First Amendment concerns. It falls within the State’s proper sphere of economic and professional regulation.” Appellant’s conduct, the Court added, was analogous to commercial expression, which occupies only a “subordinate position in the scale of First Amendment values.” In light of changes in the commercial speech doctrine, is Ohralik still good law?

NAACP v. ALABAMA, 357 U.S. 449 (1958). Alabama has a statute, similar to those of many other states, that requires out-of-state corporations to qualify before doing business in the state. For membership organizations, this requirement includes disclosure of the names and addresses of all Alabama members of the organization. In an opinion by Justice Harlan, the Court held at the height of the civil rights movement in the South that this otherwise valid requirement could not constitutionally be applied to the NAACP:

“It is hardly a novel perception that compelled disclosure of affiliation with groups engaged in advocacy may constitute [an effective] restraint on freedom of association. [There is a] vital relationship between freedom to associate and privacy in one’s associations. [Inviolability] of privacy in group association may in many circumstances be indispensable to preservation of freedom of association, particularly where a group espouses dissident beliefs....

“We think that the production order [must] be regarded as entailing the likelihood of a substantial restraint upon the exercise by petitioner’s members of their right to freedom of association. Petitioner has made an uncontested showing that on past occasions revelation of the identity of its rank-and-file members has exposed these members to economic reprisal, loss of employment, threat of physical coercion, and other manifestations of public hostility. Under these circumstances, we think it apparent that compelled disclosure of petitioner’s Alabama membership is likely to affect adversely the ability of petitioner and its members to pursue their collective effort to foster beliefs which they admittedly have the right to advocate, in that it may induce members to withdraw from the Association and dissuade others from joining it because of fear of exposure of their beliefs shown through their associations and of the consequences of this exposure....

“We turn to the final question whether Alabama has demonstrated an interest in obtaining the disclosures it seeks from petitioner which is sufficient to justify the deterrent effect which we have concluded these disclosures may well have on the free exercise by petitioner’s members of their constitutionally protected right of association. [Whatever] interest the State may have in obtaining names of ordinary members has not been shown to be sufficient to overcome petitioner’s constitutional objections to the production order.”

ROBERTS v. U.S. JAYCEES, 468 U.S. 609 (1984). The Jaycees is a nonprofit membership corporation whose objective is to provide young men with an “opportunity for personal development and achievement and an avenue for intelligent participation [in] the affairs of [the] community.” Regular membership in the Jaycees is limited to men between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five. Associate membership is open to older men and to women. Associate members may not vote, hold office, or participate in certain leadership training programs. The Minnesota Department of Human Rights found that the Jaycees’ membership policy violated the Minnesota Human Rights Act, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex. The Court held that the act does not violate the first amendment right of association. Justice Brennan delivered the opinion of the Court:

“[We have long] recognized a right to associate for the purpose of engaging in those activities protected by the First Amendment, [for an] individual’s freedom to speak [and] to petition the Government for the redress of grievances could not be vigorously protected [unless] a correlative freedom to engage in group effort toward those ends were not also guaranteed. [There] can be no clearer example of an intrusion into the internal structure [of] an association than a regulation that forces the group to accept members it does not desire....

“The right to associate for expressive purposes is not, however, absolute. Infringements on that right may be justified by regulations adopted to serve compelling state interests, unrelated to the suppression of ideas, that cannot be achieved through means significantly less restrictive of associational freedoms. [We] are persuaded that Minnesota’s compelling interest in eradicating discrimination against its female citizens justifies the impact that application of the statute to the Jaycees may have on the male members’ associational freedoms....

“[The challenged act] does not aim at the suppression of speech [and it] does not distinguish between prohibited and permitted activity on the basis of viewpoint. [The] Act reflects the State’s strong historical commitment to eliminating [discrimination]. That goal, which is unrelated to the suppression of expression, plainly serves compelling state interests of the highest order....

“[Moreover], the Jaycees have failed to demonstrate that the Act imposes any serious burdens on the male members’ freedom of expressive association. [To] be sure, [a] ‘not insubstantial part’ of the Jaycees’ activities constitutes protected expression on political, economic, cultural, and social affairs. [There] is, however, no basis [for] concluding that admission of women as full voting members will impede the organization’s ability to engage in these protected activities or to disseminate its preferred views. The Act requires no change in the Jaycees’ creed of promoting the interests of young men, and it imposes no restrictions on the organization’s ability to exclude individuals with ideologies [different] from those of its existing members....

“It [is] arguable that, insofar as the Jaycees is organized to promote the views of young [men], admission of women as voting members will change the message communicated by the group’s [speech]. [In] claiming that women might have a different attitude about such issues as the federal budget, school prayer, voting rights, and foreign relations, [the] Jaycees rely solely on unsupported generalizations about the relative interests and perspectives of men and women. Although such generalizations may or may not have a statistical basis in fact with respect to particular positions adopted by the Jaycees, we have repeatedly condemned legal decisionmaking that relies uncritically on such assumptions. [In] the absence of a showing far more substantial than that attempted by the Jaycees, we decline to indulge in the sexual stereotyping that underlies the [contention] that, by allowing women to vote, the [act] will change the content or impact of the organization’s speech.”

Justices O’Connor and Rehnquist concurred in the judgment. Chief Justice Burger and Justice Blackmun did not participate.

Note: Association and the First Amendment

1. Incidental restrictions. Note that analytically NAACP v. Alabama and Roberts are variants of O’Brien. That is, in all these cases a law that arguably was not directed at expression was challenged on the ground that it had an incidental effect on speech. In what circumstances does a law that has only an incidental effect on speech violate the first amendment?

2. The reach of Roberts: social and business clubs. In Board of Directors of Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537 (1987), the Court unanimously upheld a California antidiscrimination statute that required the Rotary Club to admit women. The Court explained that, although “the right to engage in activities protected by the First Amendment implies ‘a corresponding right to associate with others in pursuit of a wide variety of political, social, economic, educational, religious, and cultural ends,’ [the] evidence [in this case] fails to demonstrate that admitting women to Rotary Clubs will affect in any significant way the existing members’ ability to carry out their various purposes.” See also New York State Club Association, Inc. v. City of New York, 487 U.S. 1 (1988) (upholding a New York City human rights law that banned discrimination on the basis of race, creed, or sex in any institution, club, or place of accommodation that has more than four hundred members, provides regular meal service, and regularly receives payment from nonmembers for the furtherance of trade or business).

3. The reach of Roberts: political associations. After Roberts, can a state prohibit the Nazi Party of America from excluding Jews? Is that case different because the Nazis, unlike the Jaycees, are engaged principally in political expression? Is it different because the admission of Jews would symbolically interfere with the essential message of the party? In Roberts, the Court rejected the argument that the act was invalid as applied to the Jaycees because the admission of women would interfere with the symbolic message inherent in an all-male organization: “[Even] if enforcement of the Act causes some incidental abridgment of the Jaycees’ protected speech, that effect is no greater than is necessary to accomplish the State’s legitimate purposes. [Like] violence or other types of potentially expressive activities that produce special harms distinct from their communicative impact, [discrimination on the basis of gender is] entitled to no constitutional protection.”

After Roberts, can a state permit Republicans to vote in a Democratic primary? See California Democratic Party v. Jones, 530 U.S. 567 (2000), in which the Court held that a state may not require political parties to allow individuals who are not members of the party to vote in the party’s primary. The Court explained that such a law “forces political parties to associate with—to have their nominees and hence their positions, determined by—those who, at best, have refused to affiliate with the party, and, at worst, have expressly affiliated with a rival.” The Court explained that “freedom of association would prove an empty guarantee if associations could not limit control over their decisions to those who share the interests and persuasions that underlie the association’s being.”

Compare Rosario v. Rockefeller, 410 U.S. 752 (1973) (upholding a New York statute requiring voters to register their party affiliation eleven months prior to the next party primary in order to inhibit “party raiding”); Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. 724 (1974) (upholding a California statute forbidding ballot position to an independent candidate who “had a registered affiliation with [any] political parties at any time within one year prior to the immediately preceding primary election”); Tashjian v. Republican Party, 479 U.S. 208 (1987) (invalidating a state law prohibiting independents from voting in party primaries).

4. The reach of Roberts: dance halls. In City of Dallas v. Stanglin, 490 U.S. 19 (1989), the Court unanimously upheld a Dallas ordinance restricting admittance to certain dance halls to persons between the ages of fourteen and eighteen:

[The opportunities to dance with adults, and for adults to dance with minors] do not involve the sort of expressive association that the First Amendment has been held to protect. The hundreds of teenagers who congregate each night at this particular dance hall are not members of any organized association; they are patrons of the same business establishment. Most are strangers to one another, and the dance hall admits all who are willing to pay the admission fee. [These patrons do not] “take positions on public questions,” or perform any of the other [activities that constitute First Amendment expression]. The activity of these dance-hall patrons—coming together to engage in recreational dancing—is not protected by the First Amendment. Thus this activity [does not qualify] as a form of “expressive association” as [that term was used] in Roberts.

BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA v. DALE, 530 U.S. 640 (2000). Dale’s position as an adult scoutmaster in the Boy Scouts was revoked when the Boy Scouts learned that he is an “avowed homosexual” and a gay rights activist. New Jersey’s public accommodations law, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, was interpreted by the New Jersey courts to prohibit the Boy Scouts from revoking Dale’s position. The Court, in a five-to-four decision, held that this application of the New Jersey public accommodations law violates the Boy Scouts’ first amendment right of expressive association. Chief Justice Rehnquist delivered the opinion of the Court:

“The forced inclusion of an unwanted person in a group infringes the group’s freedom of expressive association if the presence of that person affects in a significant way the groups ability to advocate public or private viewpoints. [But] the freedom of expressive association, like many freedoms, is not absolute. We have held that the freedom could be overridden ‘by regulations adopted to serve compelling state interests, unrelated to the suppression of ideas, that cannot be achieved through means significantly less restrictive of associational freedoms.’ [Roberts.]

“To determine whether a group is protected by the First Amendment’s expressive associational right, we must determine whether the group engages in ‘expressive association.’ The First Amendment’s protection of expressive association is not reserved for advocacy groups. But to come within its ambit, a group must engage in some form of expression, whether it be public or private.

“The Boy Scouts is a private, nonprofit organization. According to its ‘mission statement,’ [the] general mission of the Boy Scouts is ‘[t]o instill values in young people.’ The Boy Scouts seeks to instill these values by having its adult leaders spend time with the youth members, instructing and engaging them in activities like camping, archery, and fishing. During the time spent with the youth members, the scoutmasters and assistant scoutmasters inculcate them with the Boy Scouts' values—both expressly and by example. It seems indisputable that an association that seeks to transmit such a system of values engages in expressive activity....

"Given that the Boy Scouts engages in expressive activity, we must determine whether the forced inclusion of Dale as an assistant scoutmaster would significantly affect the Boy Scouts' ability to advocate public or private viewpoints. This inquiry necessarily requires us first to explore, to a limited extent, the nature of the Boy Scouts' view of homosexuality. [Although the] Boy Scout Oath and Law do not expressly mention sexuality or sexual orientation, [the] Boy Scouts asserts that it 'teach[es] that homosexual conduct is not morally straight' [and] that it does 'not want to promote homosexual conduct as a legitimate form of behavior.' [We] accept the Boy Scouts' assertion....

"We must then determine whether Dale's presence as an assistant scoutmaster would significantly burden the Boy Scouts' desire to not 'promote homosexual conduct as a legitimate form of behavior.' As we give deference to an association's assertions regarding the nature of its expression, we must also give deference to an association's view of what would impair its expression. [That] is not to say that an expressive association can erect a shield against antidiscrimination laws simply by asserting that mere acceptance of a member from a particular group would impair its message. But here Dale, by his own admission, is one of a group of gay Scouts who have 'become leaders in their community and are open and honest about their sexual orientation.' Dale was the co-president of a gay and lesbian organization at college and remains a gay rights activist. Dale's presence in the Boy Scouts would, at the very least, force the organization to send a message, both to the youth members and the world, that the Boy Scouts accepts homosexual conduct as a legitimate form of behavior.

"The New Jersey Supreme Court determined that the Boy Scouts' ability to disseminate its message was not significantly affected by the forced inclusion of Dale as an assistant scoutmaster because 'Boy Scout members do not associate for the purpose of disseminating the belief that homosexuality is immoral.' [We] disagree with the New Jersey Supreme Court's [reasoning]. First, associations do not have to associate for the 'purpose' of disseminating a certain message in order to be entitled to the protections of the First Amendment. An association must merely engage in expressive activity that could be impaired in order to be entitled to protection. Second, [the] First Amendment simply does not require that every member of a group agree on every issue in order for the group's policy to be 'expressive association.' The Boy Scouts takes an official position with respect to homosexual conduct, and that is sufficient for First Amendment purposes....

“Having determined that the Boy Scouts is an expressive association and that the forced inclusion of Dale would significantly affect its expression, we inquire whether the application of New Jersey’s public accommodations law to require that the Boy Scouts accept Dale as an assistant scoutmaster runs afoul of the Scouts’ freedom of expressive association. We conclude that it does....

“We recognized in cases such as Roberts [that] States have a compelling interest in eliminating discrimination against women in public accommodations. But in each of these cases we went on to conclude that the enforcement of these statutes would not materially interfere with the ideas that the organization sought to express. In Roberts, we said ‘[i]ndeed, the Jaycees has failed to demonstrate [any] serious burden on the male members’ freedom of expressive association.’ We thereupon concluded in each of these cases that the organizations’ First Amendment rights were not violated by the application of the States’ public accommodations laws.

“[We] have already concluded that a state requirement that the Boy Scouts retain Dale as an assistant scoutmaster would significantly burden the organization’s right to oppose or disfavor homosexual conduct. The state interests embodied in New Jersey’s public accommodations law do not justify such a severe intrusion on the Boy Scouts’ rights to freedom of expressive association. That being the case, we hold that the First Amendment prohibits the State from imposing such a requirement through the application of its public accommodations law.”

Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, dissented: “[Until] today, we have never once found a claimed right to associate in the selection of members to prevail in the face of a State’s antidiscrimination law. To the contrary, we have squarely held that a State’s antidiscrimination law does not violate a group’s right to associate simply because the law conflicts with that group’s exclusionary membership policy. [Citing Roberts.]

“Surely there are instances in which an organization that truly aims to foster a belief at odds with the purposes of a State’s antidiscrimination laws will have a First Amendment right to association that precludes forced compliance with those laws. But that right is not a freedom to discriminate at will, nor is it a right to maintain an exclusionary membership policy simply out of fear of what the public reaction would be if the group’s membership were opened up. It is an implicit right designed to protect the enumerated rights of the First Amendment, not a license to act on any discriminatory impulse. To prevail in asserting a right of expressive association as a defense to a charge of violating an antidiscrimination law, the organization must at least show it has adopted and advocated an unequivocal position inconsistent with a position advocated or epitomized by the person whom the organization seeks to exclude....

“Dale’s inclusion in the Boy Scouts [sends] no cognizable message to the Scouts or to the world. [If] there is any kind of message being sent, [it] is by the mere act of joining the Boy Scouts. [The] only apparent explanation for the majority’s holding [is] that homosexuals are simply so different from the rest of society that their presence alone—unlike any other individual’s—should be singled out for special First Amendment treatment. Under the majority’s reasoning, an openly gay male is irreversibly affixed with the label ‘homosexual.’ [Reliance] on such a justification is tantamount to a constitutionally prescribed symbol of inferiority....

“Furthermore, it is not likely that BSA would be understood to send any message, either to Scouts or to the world, simply by admitting someone as a member. Over the years, BSA has generously welcomed over 87 million young Americans into its ranks. In 1992 over one million adults were active BSA members. [The] notion that an organization of that size and enormous prestige implicitly endorses the views that each of those adults may express in a non-Scouting context is simply mind boggling. Indeed, in this case there is no evidence that the young Scouts in Dale’s troop, or members of their families, were even aware of his sexual [orientation]. It is equally farfetched to assert that Dale’s open declaration of his homosexuality, reported in a local newspaper, will effectively force BSA to send a message to anyone simply because it allows Dale to be an Assistant Scoutmaster.”

Note: The Meaning of Dale

1. Competing analogies. Should Dale have been governed by Roberts or by California Democratic Party? Is the Boy Scouts more of an “expressive association” than the Jaycees? Is the compelled inclusion of a gay Boy Scout more intrusive upon the right of expressive association than the compelled inclusion of a woman Jaycee? Is Dale reconcilable with O’Brien? Because the government’s interests in preventing the destruction of draft cards are more important than its interests in preventing discrimination against gays? Because it is more important for the Boy Scouts to discriminate against gays than it is for antiwar protesters to burn draft cards? Is the incidental effect of the law in Dale equivalent to the incidental effect of the law in NAACP v. Alabama?

2. The rationale and reach of Dale. Consider Rubenfeld, The First Amendment’s Purpose, 53 Stan. L. Rev. 767, 768–769 (2001):

[The] Boy Scouts claim was a simple one. The Scouts wanted [to] discriminate for expressive reasons. If they could not exclude homosexuals, they would not be able effectively—or as effectively—to express their sincerely held anti-homosexual views. [But] people constantly want to violate laws for expressive reasons. Every person and every organization that wants to discriminate probably has good expressive reasons for doing so. Discrimination is profoundly expressive. It is by far the most effective way most people have of expressing their view of the superiority of their own group and the inferiority of others.

Title VII has “significantly affected” the ability of countless employers to express their views about race or sex. Indeed, it has forced them to “send a message” of equality that many presumably oppose (or would oppose if permitted to do so), in the same way that New Jersey’s law forced the Boy Scouts to do so. Should racist and sexist employers be able to come to court with First Amendment challenges to Title VII, demanding that judges accord them the same strict scrutiny that the Boy Scouts received?

3. Prohibition v. subsidy. Suppose Dale involved not a state law prohibiting discrimination, but a state law denying tax-exempt status to any organization that discriminates on the basis of sexual orientation or a public high school’s policy that denies any student group the right to use school facilities if it discriminates on that basis. As applied to the Boy Scouts, would such restrictions be constitutional? See Christian Legal Society v. Martinez, section E2c supra.

PRUNEYARD SHOPPING CENTER v. ROBINS, 447 U.S. 74 (1980).

The PruneYard is a privately owned shopping center containing more than seventy-five shops and restaurants. It prohibits any visitors or tenants from engaging in any publicly expressive activity, including the circulation of petitions. Several high school students seeking support for their opposition to a United Nations resolution against Zionism set up a card table in PruneYard’s central courtyard. They distributed leaflets and asked passersby to sign petitions. They were asked to leave and thereafter filed suit to enjoin PruneYard from denying them access to the premises for the purpose of circulating their petitions. The California Supreme Court held that the California Constitution protects “speech and petitioning, reasonably exercised, in shopping centers even when the centers are privately owned.” Appellants, the owners of PruneYard, maintained that “a private property owner has a First Amendment right not to be forced by the State to use his property as a forum for the speech of others.” The Court, in an opinion by Justice Rehnquist, rejected appellants’ claim:

“[The] shopping center [is] a business establishment that is open to the public. [The] views expressed by members of the public in passing out pamphlets or seeking signatures for a petition thus will not likely be identified with those of the owner. [Moreover], no specific message is dictated by the State. [There] consequently is no danger of governmental discrimination for or against a particular message. Finally, [appellants] can expressly disavow any connection with the message by simply posting signs [disclaiming] any sponsorship of the message and [explaining] that the persons are communicating their own messages by virtue of state law. [Appellants here are not] compelled to affirm their belief in any governmentally prescribed position or view, and they are free to publicly dissociate themselves from the views of the speakers or handbillers.” Justice Powell, joined by Justice White, concurred in the result.

Note: Compelled Affirmation, Expression, and Association: The Right Not to Speak

1. The pledge of allegiance. Are there any circumstances in which there is a right not to be compelled to support or express ideas with which one disagrees? This right first received articulation in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), in which the Court overruled its prior decision in Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), and held unconstitutional a state law requiring all children in the public schools to salute and pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States. Justice Jackson, speaking for the Court, explained:

[The] compulsory flag salute and pledge requires affirmation of a belief and an attitude of mind. [To] sustain the compulsory flag salute we are required to say that a Bill of Rights which guards the individual's right to speak his own mind, left it open to public authorities to compel him to utter what is not in his mind. [But if] there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein. If there are any circumstances which permit an exception, they do not now occur to us.

Justice Frankfurter dissented. Is PruneYard reconcilable with Barnette? In PruneYard, the Court explained that “Barnette is inapposite because it involved the compelled recitation of a message containing an affirmation of belief,” whereas in PruneYard “no specific message [was] dictated by the State.”

2. “Live free or die.” In Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977), the Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Burger, held that New Hampshire could not criminally punish individuals who covered up the state motto “Live Free or Die” on their passenger vehicle license plates because the motto was repugnant to their moral, political, and religious beliefs:

[Here,] as in Barnette, we are faced with a state measure which forces an individual, as part of his daily life [to] be an instrument for fostering public adherence to an ideological point of view he finds unacceptable. [Thus, we must] determine whether the State’s countervailing interest is sufficiently compelling to justify requiring appellees to display the state motto on their license plates. The two interests advanced by the State are that display of the motto (1) facilitates the identification of passenger [as distinct from other] vehicles, and (2) promotes appreciation of history, individualism, and state pride. [The first argument is insufficient] “in the light of less drastic means for achieving the same basic purpose.” [The] State’s second claimed interest is not ideologically neutral. [The State’s interest in disseminating an ideology] cannot outweigh an individual’s First Amendment right to avoid becoming the courier for such message.

The Court in Wooley distinguished PruneYard as follows: “[In Wooley,] the government itself prescribed the message, required it to be displayed openly on appellee’s personal property that was used ‘as part of his daily life,’ and refused to permit him to take any measures to cover up the motto even though the Court found that the display of the motto served no important state interest.” Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justice Blackmun, dissented.

Does it follow from Wooley that the government may not engage in viewpoint discrimination when it chooses between specialty license plates designed and submitted by motorists? The Court answered this question in the negative in Walker v. Texas Div., Sons of Confederate Veterans, Inc., 135 S. Ct. 2239 (2015), where, in a five-to-four decision written by Justice Breyer, it upheld the refusal of the Texas Department of Motor Vehicles to issue a license plate featuring the Confederate battle flag on the ground that the plate consisted of government, rather than private, speech:

Our determination that Texas’s specialty license plate designs are government speech does not mean that the designs do not also implicate the free speech rights of private persons. We have acknowledged that drivers who display a State’s selected license plate designs convey the messages communicated through those designs. [Wooley.] And we have recognized that the First Amendment stringently limits a State's authority to compel a private party to express a view with which the private party disagrees. But here, compelled private speech is not at issue. And just as Texas cannot require [The Sons of Confederate Veterans] to convey "the State's ideological message," [Wooley], [The Sons of Confederate Veterans] cannot force Texas to include a Confederate battle flag on its specialty license plates.

3. A St. Patrick's Day parade. The City of Boston authorized the South Boston Allied War Veterans Council to organize the annual St. Patrick's Day Parade. The council refused a place in the parade to GLIB, an organization formed for the purpose of expressing its members' pride in their Irish heritage as openly gay, lesbian, and bisexual individuals. GLIB filed suit claiming that this refusal violated a Massachusetts law prohibiting discrimination on account of sexual orientation in places of public accommodation. In Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557 (1995), the Court, in a unanimous opinion by Justice Souter, held that application of the statute in this context violated the first amendment rights of the council.

The Court explained that, because "every participating unit affects the message conveyed by the private organizers," application of the statute in this context effectively required the council "to alter the expressive content" of its parade. The Court declared that "this use of the State's power violates the fundamental rule" that "a speaker has the autonomy to choose the content of his own message." Thus, if the council "objects," for example, to GLIB's implicit assertion that homosexuals and bisexuals are entitled to full and equal "social acceptance," it has a right "not to propound" this message.

The Court held that PruneYard was distinguishable because (1) the proprietors of the shopping center "were running 'a business establishment that [was] open to the public,'" (2) they "could 'expressly disavow any connection with the message by simply posting signs in the areas where the speakers or handbillers stand,'" and (3) the shopping center owners' own right to speak was not implicated because they "did not even allege that [they] objected to the content" of the speech. On the disclaimer issue, the Court observed that disclaimers would not be sufficient to protect the interests of the council because "such disclaimers would be quite curious in a moving parade."

4. Military recruiting in law schools. Most law schools do not permit employers who discriminate on the basis of race, religion, gender, national origin, or sexual orientation to use their placement facilities. In the 1980s, most law schools extended this policy to the U.S. military, because it discriminated on the basis of sexual orientation. In response, Congress enacted the Solomon Amendment, which provided that if any part of an institution of higher education denied military recruiters access equal to that provided other recruiters, the entire institution would lose access to federal funds. Because most universities are heavily dependent on federal support for research and financial aid, most law schools waived their nondiscrimination policy as applied to the military. The Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights (FAIR), an association of law schools and law faculties, filed suit to enjoin the application of the Solomon Amendment on the ground that it violated the first amendment.

In a unanimous decision, the Court rejected this argument in Rumsfeld v. FAIR, 547 U.S. 47 (2006). In his opinion for the Court, Chief Justice Roberts observed that the Solomon Amendment “gives universities a choice: Either allow military recruiters the same [access] afforded any other recruiter or forgo certain federal funds.” Roberts distinguished Hurley on the ground that in that case “the complaining speaker’s own message was affected by the speech it was forced to accommodate.” Indeed, he explained, the “expressive nature of a parade was central” to the result in Hurley. In this case, however, “accommodating the military’s message does not affect the law schools’ speech, because the schools are not speaking when they host interviews and recruiting receptions. Unlike a parade organizer’s choice of parade contingents, a law school’s decision to allow recruiters on campus is not inherently expressive.” Roberts concluded that, in this respect, the case was governed by PruneYard.

5. Union dues. May a state compel government employees to pay union dues? See Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977) (upholding a state statute authorizing unions representing government employees to charge members dues insofar as the dues are used to support collective bargaining and related activities, but invalidating the statute insofar as the union uses the dues “to contribute to political candidates and to express political views unrelated to its duties as exclusive bargaining representative”); Ellis v. Brotherhood of Railway, Airline & Steamship Clerks, 466 U.S. 85 (1984) (compelled contributions may constitutionally be used to pay for union conventions, social activities, and publications); Keller v. State Bar of California, 496 U.S. 1 (1990) (an integrated state bar association may not use compulsory dues to finance political and ideological activities with which particular members disagree when such expenditures are not “necessarily or reasonably incurred for the purpose of regulating the legal profession or improving the quality of legal services”); Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Association, 500 U.S. 507 (1991) (a union may constitutionally charge dissenting employees only for those activities that are (1) “germane” to collective bargaining; (2) justified by the government’s interests in labor peace and avoiding free riders; and (3) not significantly burdening of speech); Davenport v. Washington Education Association, 551 U.S. 177 (2007) (a state may constitutionally require public-sector unions to receive affirmative authorization from nonmembers before spending their agency fees for election-related purposes); Knox v. Service Employees International Union, 567 U.S. 310 (2012) (when a public-sector union imposes a special assessment or mid-year dues increase, the union cannot constitutionally require nonmembers to pay the increased amount unless they choose to opt in by affirmatively consenting).

In Harris v. Quinn, 134 S. Ct. 2618 (2014), the Court considered the constitutionality of an Illinois law that allowed Medicaid recipients who normally would need institutional care to hire a “personal assistant” (PA) to provide homecare services. Under the law, the Medicaid homecare recipients and the state both play a role in the employment relationship with the PAs. Pursuant to this program, the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) was designated the exclusive union representative for the PAs. SEIU entered into collective-bargaining agreements with the state that included an agency-fee provision, which requires PAs who do not wish to join the union to pay the union a fee for the cost of collective-bargaining expenses, but not for the cost of any political activities of the union unrelated to collective bargaining. A group of PAs who had not joined the union and did not want to pay any union fees brought this suit claiming that the law violated their First Amendment right not to be compelled to support the union. Pursuant to Abood, the lower courts rejected this challenge and upheld the law.

In a five-to-four decision, the Supreme Court reversed. In an opinion by Justice Alito, the Court cast serious doubt on Abood, insofar as it permitted the state to compel non-union members to pay union fees even for the costs of collective-bargaining activities that benefit them. Ultimately, though, the Court invalidated the law without overruling Abood, by distinguishing the specific factual situation in the context of PAs from the situations in other public union arrangements. Justice Kagan, joined by Justices Ginsburg, Breyer, and Sotomayor, dissented. Kagan insisted that Abood reflected sound First Amendment principles and that the situation in this case was not in any principled way distinguishable from the Court’s prior decisions. For an analysis of the implications of Harris v. Quinn, see Estlund, Are Unions a Constitutional Anomaly?, 114 Mich. L. Rev. 169 (2015).

6. Student activity fees. Board of Regents of the University of Wisconsin System v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217 (2000), concerned the constitutionality of the University of Wisconsin’s requirement that all full-time students pay an annual activities fee, part of which is allocated by the student government to support registered student organizations that engage in a broad range of expressive and other activities. Examples of the more than six hundred registered student organizations at the University of Wisconsin are the College Democrats, the College Republicans, the International Socialist Organization, and the Future Financial Gurus of America. Citing Abood, respondents challenged the constitutionality of this program on the ground that by compelling them financially to support political and ideological expression with which they disagree, the program violates their first amendment right “not to speak.”

In a unanimous decision, the Court rejected this challenge. Justice Kennedy authored the opinion of the Court:

In Abood [the] constitutional rule took the form of limiting the required subsidy to speech germane to the purposes of the [union]. The standard of germane speech as applied to student speech at a university is [unworkable]. The speech the University seeks to encourage in the program before us is distinguished not by discernable limits but by its vast, unexplored bounds. To insist upon asking what speech is germane would be contrary to the very goal the University seeks to pursue. It is not for the Court to say what is or is not germane to the ideas to be pursued in an institution of higher learning....

7. The right not to publish or broadcast. In what circumstances, if any, may government constitutionally compel a broadcaster or publisher to broadcast or publish material? See Denver Area Education Telecommunications Consortium, Inc. v. FCC, 518 U.S. 727 (1996) (considering the constitutionality of several provisions of the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992 concerning the broadcasting of “indecent” programming on public access and leased access channels); *Turner Broadcasting System Inc. v. 5. Regulation of Political Solicitation, Contribution, Expenditure, and Activity

It has been suggested that the “critical problem for contemporary First Amendment theory is the unequal access that wealth can buy.” Carter, Technology, Democracy, and the Manipulation of Consent, 93 Yale L.J. 581 (1984). This section explores that “problem.” To what extent is the solicitation, contribution, or expenditure of money “speech” within the meaning of the first amendment? To what extent may government regulate or restrict such activities in order to “enhance” the quality of public debate?

Buckley v. Valeo

424 U.S. 1 (1976)

PER CURIAM.

These appeals present constitutional challenges to the key provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (Act), and related provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, all as amended in 1974....

[The] statutes at issue [contain] the following provisions: (a) individual political contributions [and expenditures] “relative to a clearly identified candidate” are limited, [and] campaign spending by candidates for various federal offices [is] subject to prescribed limits; (b) contributions and expenditures above certain threshold levels must be reported and publicly disclosed; (c) a system for public funding of Presidential campaign activities is established; [and] (d) a Federal Election Commission is established to administer and enforce the legislation....

[The Court upheld the constitutionality of the individual contribution limits, the disclosure and reporting provisions, and the public financing scheme. The Court invalidated the composition of the Federal Election Commission and the limitations on expenditures. The following excerpts relate to the contribution and expenditure limitations.]

I. CONTRIBUTION AND EXPENDITURE LIMITATION

The intricate statutory scheme adopted by Congress to regulate federal election campaigns includes restrictions on political contributions and expenditures that apply broadly to all phases of and all participants in the election process. The major contribution and expenditure limitations in the Act prohibit individuals from contributing more than $25,000 in a single year or more than $1,000 to any single candidate for an election campaign and from spending more than $1,000 a year “relative to a clearly identified candidate.” Other provisions restrict a candidate’s use of personal and family resources in his campaign and limit the overall amount that can be spent by a candidate in campaigning for federal office....

A. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

The Act's contribution and expenditure limitations operate in an area of the most fundamental First Amendment activities. Discussion of public issues and debate on the qualifications of candidates are integral to the operation of the system of government established by our Constitution....

In upholding the constitutional validity of the Act's contribution and expenditure provisions on the ground that those provisions should be viewed as regulating conduct, not speech, the Court of Appeals relied upon [O'Brien].

We cannot share the view that the present Act's contribution and expenditure limitations are comparable to the restrictions on conduct upheld in O'Brien. The expenditure of money simply cannot be equated with such conduct as destruction of a draft card. Some forms of communication made possible by the giving and spending of money involve speech alone, some involve conduct primarily, and some involve a combination of the two. Yet this Court has never suggested that the dependence of a communication on the expenditure of money operates itself to introduce a nonspeech element or to reduce the exacting scrutiny required by the First Amendment....

Even if the categorization of the expenditure of money as conduct were accepted, the limitations challenged here would not meet the O'Brien test because the governmental interests advanced in support of the Act involve "suppressing communication." The interests served by the Act include restricting the voices of people and interest groups who have money to spend and reducing the overall scope of federal election campaigns. Although the Act does not focus on the ideas expressed by persons or groups subject to its regulations, it is aimed in part at equalizing the relative ability of all voters to affect electoral outcomes by placing a ceiling on expenditures for political expression by citizens and groups. Unlike O'Brien, where the Selective Service System's administrative interest in the preservation of draft cards was wholly unrelated to their use as a means of communication, it is beyond dispute that the interest in regulating the alleged "conduct" of giving or spending money "arises in some measure because the communication allegedly integral to the conduct is itself thought to be harmful."...

Nor can the Act's contribution and expenditure limitations be sustained, as some of the parties suggest, by reference to the constitutional principles reflected in such decisions as [Adderley v. Florida and Kovacs v. Cooper, supra]. Those cases stand for the proposition that the government may adopt reasonable time, place, and manner regulations, which do not discriminate among speakers or ideas, in order to further an important governmental interest unrelated to the restriction of communication. [In] contrast to O'Brien, where the method of expression was held to be subject to prohibition, [Adderley] and Kovacs involved place or manner restrictions on legitimate modes of expression—picketing, parading, demonstrating, and using a soundtruck. The critical difference between this case and those time, place, and manner cases is that the present Act's contribution and expenditure limitations impose direct quantity restrictions on political communication and association by persons, groups, candidates, and political parties in addition to any reasonable time, place, and manner regulations otherwise imposed.¹⁷

A restriction on the amount of money a person or group can spend on political communication during a campaign necessarily reduces the quantity of expression by restricting the number of issues discussed, the depth of their exploration, and the size of the audience reached.¹⁸ This is because virtually every means of communicating ideas in today's mass society requires the expenditure of money....

The expenditure limitations contained in the Act represent substantial rather than merely theoretical restraints on the quantity and diversity of political speech. The $1,000 ceiling on spending "relative to a clearly identified candidate," [for example,] would appear to exclude all citizens and groups except candidates, political parties, and the institutional press from any significant use of the most effective modes of communication.²⁰ ...

By contrast with a limitation upon expenditures for political expression, a limitation upon the amount that any one person or group may contribute to a candidate or political committee entails only a marginal restriction upon the contributor's ability to engage in free communication, [for] it permits the symbolic expression of support evidenced by a contribution but does not in any way infringe the contributor's freedom to discuss candidates and issues. While contributions may result in political expression if spent by a candidate or an association to present views to the voters, the transformation of contributions into political debate involves speech by someone other than the contributor.

Given the important role of contributions in financing political campaigns, contribution restrictions could have a severe impact on political dialogue if the limitations prevented candidates and political committees from amassing the resources necessary for effective advocacy. There is no indication, however, that the contribution limitations imposed by the Act would have any dramatic adverse effect on the funding of campaigns and political associations.²³ The overall effect of the Act's contribution ceilings is merely to require candidates and political committees to raise funds from a greater number of persons and to compel people who would otherwise contribute amounts greater than the statutory limits to expend such funds on direct political expression, rather than to reduce the total amount of money potentially available to promote political expression....

In sum, although the Act's contribution and expenditure limitations both implicate fundamental First Amendment interests, its expenditure ceilings impose significantly more severe restrictions on protected freedoms of political expression and association than do its limitations on financial contributions.

B. CONTRIBUTION LIMITATIONS

Section 608(b) provides, with certain limited exceptions, that "no person shall make contributions to any candidate with respect to any election for Federal office which, in the aggregate, exceed $1,000."...

[The] primary First Amendment problem raised by the Act's contribution limitations is their restriction of one aspect of the contributor's freedom of political association. The Court's decisions involving associational freedoms establish that the right of association is a "basic constitutional freedom," [and that] governmental "action which may have the effect of curtailing the freedom to associate is subject to the closest scrutiny." Yet, it is clear that "Neither the right to associate nor the right to participate in political activities is absolute." [Even] a "'significant interference' with protected rights of political association" may be sustained if the State demonstrates a sufficiently important interest and employs means closely drawn to avoid unnecessary abridgment of associational freedoms....

It is unnecessary to look beyond the Act's primary purpose—to limit the actuality and appearance of corruption resulting from large individual financial contributions—in order to find a constitutionally sufficient justification for the $1,000 contribution limitation. [The] increasing importance of the communications media and sophisticated mass-mailing and polling operations to effective campaigning make the raising of large sums of money an ever more essential ingredient of an effective candidacy. To the extent that large contributions are given to secure a political quid pro quo from current and potential office holders, the integrity of our system of representative democracy is undermined....

Of almost equal concern [is] the appearance of corruption stemming from

[the] opportunities for abuse inherent in a regime of large individual financial contributions. [Congress] could legitimately conclude that the avoidance of the appearance of improper influence [is] “critical [if] confidence in the system of representative Government is not to be [eroded].”...

Appellants contend that the contribution limitations must be invalidated because bribery laws and narrowly drawn disclosure requirements constitute a less restrictive means of dealing with “proven and suspected quid pro quo arrangements.” But laws making criminal the giving and taking of bribes deal with only the most blatant and specific attempts of those with money to influence governmental action. And while disclosure requirements serve [many salutary purposes] Congress was surely entitled to conclude that disclosure was only a partial measure, and that contribution ceilings were a necessary legislative concomitant to deal with the reality or appearance of corruption....

We find that, under the rigorous standard of review established by our prior decisions, the weighty interests served by restricting the size of financial contributions to political candidates are sufficient to justify the limited effect upon First Amendment freedoms caused by the $1,000 contribution ceiling.

[Appellants argue further, however,] that the contribution limitations work [an] invidious discrimination between incumbents and [challengers].³³ [But] there is [no] evidence [that] contribution limitations [discriminate] against major-party challengers to incumbents, [and although] the charge of discrimination against minor-party and independent candidates is more troubling, [the] record provides no basis for concluding that the Act invidiously disadvantages such candidates. [Indeed, in some circumstances] the restriction would appear to benefit minor-party and independent candidates relative to their major-party opponents because major-party candidates receive far more money in large contributions....

In view of these considerations, we conclude that the impact of the Act’s $1,000 contribution limitation on major-party challengers and on minor-party candidates does not render the provision unconstitutional on its face.

[For similar reasons, the Court also upheld the $5,000 limit on contributions by “political committees,” the limits on volunteers’ incidental expenses, and the $25,000 limit on total political contributions by an individual during a single calendar year.]

C. EXPENDITURE LIMITATIONS

The Act’s expenditure ceilings impose direct and substantial restraints [on] the quantity of campaign speech by individuals, groups, and candidates. The restrictions, while neutral as to the ideas expressed, limit political expression “at the core of our electoral process and of the First Amendment freedoms.”...

1. The $1,000 Limitation on Expenditures “Relative to a Clearly Identified Candidate”

Section 608(e)(1) provides that “[n]o person may make any expenditure... relative to a clearly identified candidate during a calendar year [which] exceeds $1,000.” [Appellants maintain] that the provision is unconstitutionally vague. [The] use of so indefinite a phrase as “relative to” a candidate fails to clearly mark the boundary between permissible and impermissible [speech]. “Such a distinction offers no security for free [discussion].” [To] preserve the provision against invalidation on vagueness grounds, §608(e)(1) must be construed to apply only to expenditures for communications that in express terms advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate for federal office.

We turn then to the basic First Amendment question—whether §608(e)(1), even as thus narrowly and explicitly construed, impermissibly burdens the constitutional right of free expression....

The discussion in Part I-A supra, explains why the Act’s expenditure limitations impose far greater restraints on the freedom of speech and association than do its contribution limitations....

We find that the governmental interest in preventing corruption and the appearance of corruption is inadequate to justify §608(e)(1)’s ceiling on independent expenditures. [First], §608(e)(1) prevents only some large expenditures. So long as persons and groups eschew expenditures that in express terms advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate, they are free to spend as much as they want to promote the candidate and his views. The exacting interpretation of the statutory language necessary to avoid unconstitutional vagueness thus undermines the limitation’s effectiveness....

Second, [although the] parties defending §608(e)(1) contend that it is necessary to prevent would-be contributors from avoiding the contribution limitations [by] paying directly for media advertisements or for other portions of the candidate’s campaign activities, [such] coordinated expenditures are treated as contributions rather than expenditures under the Act [and are thus limited by the] contribution ceilings. [Thus], §608(e)(1) limits [only] expenditures [made] totally independently of the candidate and his campaign. [But the] absence of [coordination with respect to such expenditures] undermines the value of the expenditure to the candidate [and] alleviates the danger that expenditures will be given as a quid pro quo for improper commitments. [Thus,] §608(e)(1) severely [restricts] independent advocacy despite its substantially diminished potential for abuse....

It is argued [further, however, that the] governmental interest in equalizing the relative ability of individuals [to] influence the outcome of elections [justifies the] expenditure ceiling. But the concept that government may restrict the speech of some [in] order to enhance the relative voice of others is wholly foreign to the First Amendment, which was designed “to secure ‘the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources.’” [The] First Amendment’s protection against governmental abridgment of free expression cannot properly be made to depend on a person’s financial ability to engage in public discussion. [Section] 608(e)(1)’s [expenditure] limitation is unconstitutional under the First Amendment.

2. Limitation on Expenditures by Candidates from Personal or Family Resources

The Act also [limits] expenditures by a candidate “from his personal funds, or the personal funds of his immediate family, in connection with his campaigns during any calendar year.”...

The ceiling on personal expenditures by candidates on their own [behalf] imposes a substantial restraint on the ability of persons to engage in protected First Amendment expression. The candidate, no less than any other person, has a First Amendment right to engage in the discussion of public issues and [to] advocate his own election....

The [interest] in equalizing the relative financial resources of candidates competing for elective office is clearly not sufficient to justify the provision’s infringement of fundamental First Amendment rights....

3. Limitations on Campaign Expenditures

Section 608(c) places limitations on overall campaign expenditures by candidates seeking nomination for election and election to federal office. [For example, the] Act imposes blanket $70,000 limitations on both primary campaigns and general election campaigns for the House of Representatives....

No governmental interest that has been suggested is sufficient to justify the restriction on the quantity of political expression imposed by §608(c)’s campaign expenditure limitations. [The] interest in alleviating the corrupting influence of large contributions is served by the Act’s contribution limitations and disclosure provisions, [and the] interest in equalizing the financial resources of candidates [is not a] convincing justification for restricting the scope of federal election campaigns. [The] campaign expenditure ceilings appear to be designed primarily to [reduce] the allegedly skyrocketing costs of political campaigns. [But the] First Amendment denies government the power to determine that spending to promote one's political views is wasteful, excessive, or unwise. In the free society ordained by our Constitution it is not the government, but the people—individually as citizens and candidates and collectively as associations and political committees—who must retain control over the quantity and range of debate on public issues in a political campaign.

For these reasons we hold that §608(c) is constitutionally invalid.

In sum, the provisions of the Act that impose a $1,000 [limitation on contributions] are constitutionally valid. These limitations [serve] the basic governmental interest in safeguarding the integrity of the electoral process without directly impinging upon the rights of individual citizens and candidates to engage in political debate and discussion. By contrast, the First Amendment requires the invalidation of the Act's independent expenditure [ceilings]. These provisions place substantial and direct restrictions on the ability of candidates, citizens, and associations to engage in protected political expression, restrictions that the First Amendment cannot tolerate....

[Affirmed] in part and reversed in part.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER, concurring in part and dissenting in part....

[The contribution limitations are unconstitutional. Contributions] and expenditures are two sides of the same First Amendment coin. [Limiting] contributions, as a practical matter, will limit expenditures and will put an effective ceiling on the amount of political activity [that] the Government will permit to take place....

The Court's attempt to distinguish the communication inherent in political contributions from the speech aspects of political expenditures simply "will not wash." We do little but engage in word games unless we recognize that people—candidates and contributors—spend money on political activity because they wish to communicate ideas, and their constitutional interest in doing so is precisely the same whether they or someone else utters the words. [Moreover, the contribution] restrictions are hardly incidental in their effect upon particular campaigns. [Such restrictions] will foreclose some candidacies,⁹ [and] alter the nature of some electoral contests drastically.¹⁰

At any rate, the contribution limits are a far more severe restriction on First Amendment activity than the sort of "chilling" legislation for which the Court has shown such extraordinary concern in the past. See, e.g., [Cohen v. California, section D7 supra]. If such restraints can be justified at all, they must be justified by the very strongest of state interests....

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, concurring in part and dissenting in part....

I dissent [from] the Court's view that the expenditure limitations [violate] the First Amendment....

The congressional judgment [was that expenditure limitations are necessary] to counter the corrosive effects of money in federal election campaigns. [The] Court strikes down [§608(e)], strangely enough claiming more [knowledge] as to what may improperly influence candidates than is possessed by the majority of Congress that passed this bill and the President who signed it. [I] would take the word of those who know—that limiting independent expenditures is essential to prevent transparent and widespread evasion of the contribution limits....

The Court also rejects Congress' judgment manifested in §608(c) that the federal interest in limiting total campaign expenditures by individual candidates justifies the incidental effect on their opportunity for effective political speech. I disagree....

[The] argument that money is speech and that limiting the flow of money to the speaker violates the First Amendment proves entirely too much. Compulsory bargaining [has] increased the labor costs of those who publish newspapers, [and] taxation directly removes from company coffers large amounts of money that might be spent on larger and better newspapers. [But] it has not been suggested [that] these laws, and many others, are invalid because they siphon [off] large sums that would otherwise be available for communicative activities.

[The] judgment of Congress was that reasonably effective campaigns could be conducted within the limits established by the Act. [There] is no sound basis for invalidating the expenditure limitations, so long as the purposes they serve are legitimate and sufficiently substantial, which in my view they are.

[Expenditure] ceilings reinforce the contribution limits and help eradicate the hazard of corruption. [Without] limits on total expenditures, campaign costs will [inevitably] escalate, [creating an incentive to accept unlawful contributions]. Moreover,] the corrupt use of money by candidates is as much to be feared as the corrosive influence of large contributions. [There are many illegal ways of spending money to influence elections. [The] expenditure limits could play a substantial role in preventing unethical practices. There just would not be enough of "that kind of money" to go around....

It is also important to [restore] public confidence in federal elections. It is critical to obviate [the] impression that federal elections are purely and simply a function of money. [The] ceiling on candidate expenditures represents the considered judgment of Congress that elections are to be decided among candidates none of whom has overpowering advantage by reason of a huge campaign war chest. [This] seems an acceptable purpose and the means chosen a common-sense way to achieve it....

I also disagree with the Court's judgment that §608(a), which limits the amount of money that a candidate or his family may spend on his campaign, violates the Constitution. [By] limiting the importance of personal wealth, §608(a) helps to assure that only individuals with a modicum of support from others will be viable candidates. [This] would tend to discourage any notion that the outcome of elections is primarily a function of money. Similarly, §608(a) tends to equalize access to the political arena, encouraging the less wealthy [to] run for political office. [Congress] was entitled to determine that personal wealth ought to play a less important role in political campaigns than it has in the past. Nothing in the First Amendment stands in the way of that determination....

MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

[The] Court invalidates §608(a), [which limits the amount a candidate may spend from personal or family funds], as violative of the candidate's First Amendment Rights. [I] disagree.

[The] perception that personal wealth wins elections may not only discourage potential candidates without significant personal wealth from entering the political arena, but also undermine public confidence in the integrity of the electoral process.¹

The concern that candidacy for public office not become, or appear to become, the exclusive province of the wealthy assumes heightened significance when one considers the impact of §608(b), which the Court today upholds. That provision prohibits contributions from individuals and groups to candidates in excess of $1,000, and contributions from political committees in excess of $5,000. While the limitations on contributions are neutral there can be no question that large contributions generally mean more to the candidate without a substantial personal fortune to spend on his campaign. Large contributions are the less wealthy candidate's only hope of countering the wealthy candidate's immediate access to substantial sums of money. [Section 608(a) thus provides] some symmetry to a regulatory scheme that otherwise enhances the natural advantage of the wealthy....

MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I am not persuaded that the Court makes [a] principled constitutional distinction between the contribution limitations [and] the expenditure limitations. [I] therefore do not join Part I-B of the Court's opinion or those portions of Part I-A that are consistent with Part I-B. As to those, I dissent....

Note: Buckley and the Problem of Abridging Speech to “Enhance” the Electoral Process

1. The problem of unequal resources. In upholding the expenditure and contribution limitations in Buckley, the court of appeals explained:

[The] statute taken as a whole affirmatively enhances First Amendment values. By reducing in good measure disparity due to wealth, the Act tends to equalize both the relative ability of all voters to affect electoral outcomes, and the opportunity of all interested citizens to become candidates for elective federal office. This broadens the choice of candidates and the opportunity to hear a variety of views.

519 F.2d 817, 841 (D.C. Cir. 1975). Do you agree that, if the purpose and “net effect of the legislation [are] to enhance freedom of speech, the exacting review reserved for abridgements of free speech is inapposite”? L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 1135 (2d ed. 1988). Do you agree with the Court that “the concept that government may restrict the speech of some elements of our society in order to enhance the relative voice of others is wholly foreign to the First Amendment”?

Note that Buckley posed a conflict between two conceptions of a properly functioning system of free expression, and between two conceptions of the role of the state. Under one view, government should take the “private” status quo for granted and all persons, no matter their resources, are free to press their interests on the political process. If some people have more money than others, and if their greater resources permit more speech, that result is something for which government is not itself responsible and which cannot be “remedied” consistent with the first amendment. The role of government is to remain “neutral” as people in the private sphere compete in the political marketplace.

Under the competing view, a system of free expression is one in which there is fair deliberation on what the public good requires, and inequality of resources, which can seriously distort that deliberation, is understood to be at least in part the product of governmental choices. If government permits the process of political deliberation to become distorted by this inequality of resources, the result is inconsistent with first amendment aspirations. Under this view, government efforts to equalize resources are permitted (and perhaps even required) in order to promote a more fair public debate. See Balkin, Some Realism about Pluralism: Legal Realist Approaches to the First Amendment, 1990 Duke L.J. 375.

2. Competing views. Consider the following:

- a. Wright, Politics and the Constitution: Is Money Speech?, 85 Yale L.J. 1001, 1005, 1015–1019 (1976):

Nothing in the First Amendment prevents us, as a political community, from [choosing] to move closer to the kind of community process that lies at the heart of the First Amendment conception—a process wherein ideas and candidates prevail because of their inherent worth, not because [one] side puts on a more elaborate show of support. [The] picture of the political process that emerges from [Buckley] corresponds [to the] pluralist model. [To] the pluralist, the political process consists [of] the pulling and hauling of various competing interest groups. [Force] collides with counterforce, [and] the strongest force [determines] the outcome of [the] process. [This model] gives undeserved weight [to] highly organized and wealthy groups [and drains] politics of its moral and intellectual content.

- b. Kagan, Private Speech, Public Purpose: The Role of Governmental Motive in First Amendment Doctrine, 63 U. Chi. L. Rev. 415, 467–475 (1996):

In what has become one of the most castigated passages in modern First Amendment case law, the Court pronounced in Buckley that “the concept that government may restrict the speech of some elements of our society in order to enhance the relative voice of others is wholly foreign to the First Amendment. . . .” [The] Buckley principle emerges not from the view that redistribution of speech opportunities is itself an illegitimate end, but from the view that governmental actions justified as redistributive devices often (though not always) stem partly from hostility or sympathy toward ideas—or, even more commonly, from self-interest. [The] nature of [such] regulations, as compared with other content-neutral regulations, creates [a special problem]: that governmental officials (here, legislators) more often will take account of improper factors. [This] increased probability of taint arises [from] the very design of laws directed at equalizing the realm of public expression. Unlike most content-neutral regulations, these laws not only have, but are supposed to have, content-based effects....In considering such a law, a legislator’s own views of the ideas (or speakers) that the equalization effort means to suppress or promote may well intrude, consciously or not, on her decisionmaking process. [Thus,] there may be good reason to distrust the motives of politicians when they apply themselves to reconstructing the realm of expression.

c. Strauss, Corruption, Equality, and Campaign Finance, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 1369, 1383–1384 (1994):

[The principle] “one person, one vote” is [the] decisive counterexample to the suggestion [in Buckley] that the aspiration [of equalizing “speech”] is foreign to the First Amendment. We do not think of “one person, one vote” as an example of reducing the speech of some to enhance the relative speech of others, but that is only because the principle seems so natural. When legislatures were malapportioned, rural voters had a more effective voice than urban voters. Reapportionment reduced their influence in order to enhance the relative influence of others. We might unreflectively say that the rural voters were deprived of voting power that was not rightfully theirs, while my ability to make a campaign contribution is rightfully [mine]. But this formulation begs the question. We have to explain why superior spending power is rightfully mine but superior voting power is not....

d. B. Neuborne, Madison’s Music 67–68 (2015):

By treating independent campaign expenditures much more favorably than campaign contributions to a candidate, the Court undermined the ability of candidates (and political parties) to define their own political agendas, licensing “independent” ideological outriders to spend unlimited funds to dominate the electoral agenda, while candidates must struggle to raise tightly regulated contributions. [Buckley] left us with a judge-made campaign finance system that turns American democracy over to ideologues in the top 1 percent of the economic tree, a system that no legislator has ever supported and one that would astound the Founders. [Tell] the truth. If you tried, could you have come up with a worse way to structure and finance our democracy?

3. A comparative perspective. The Canada Elections Act of 2000 set limits for third party spending in elections. Specifically, the Act provides that a third-party (that is, a group or individual who is not a candidate) “shall not incur election advertising expenses of a total amount of more than $150,000 during an election period in relation to a general election” and “not more than $3,000 [to] promote or oppose the election of one or more candidates in a given electoral district.” The act defines “election advertising expenses” as including any paid message that names candidates, shows their likeness, or takes a position on an issue “with which they are particularly associated.” Stephen Harper, the head of a conservative political group, brought suit claiming that the act violated the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which guarantees to every person the fundamental “freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression.” The Charter provides that fundamental freedoms may be subjected “only to such reasonable limits [as] can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.” In Harper v. Canada, 1 S.C.R. 827 (2004), excerpted in Hasen, Regulation of Campaign Finance, in V. Amar and M. Tushnet, Global Perspectives on Constitutional Law 198 (2009), the Supreme Court of Canada upheld these provisions of the act, therefore reaching a different result than the Supreme Court of the United States in Buckley.

Justice Bastarache delivered the opinion of the court: “Third party advertising is political expression. [As such, it] lies at the core of the expression guaranteed by the Charter and warrants a high degree of constitutional protection. [In] some circumstances, however, third party advertising will be less deserving of constitutional protection. Indeed, it is possible that third parties who have access to significant financial resources can manipulate political discourse to their advantage through political advertising. [Advertising] expense limits may restrict free expression to ensure that participants are able to meaningfully participate in the electoral process. For candidates, political parties and third parties, meaningful participation means the ability to inform voters of their position. For voters, meaningful participation means the ability to hear and weigh many points of view. The difficulties of striking this balance are evident.

“The question, then, is what promotes an informed voter? For voters to be able to hear all points of view, the information disseminated by third parties, candidates, and political parties cannot be unlimited. In the absence of spending limits, it is possible for the affluent or a number of persons or groups pooling their resources and acting in concert to dominate the political discourse. [If] a few groups are able to flood the electoral discourse with their message, it is possible, indeed likely, that the voices of some will be drowned out. Where those having access to the most resources monopolize the election discourse, their opponents will be deprived of a reasonable opportunity to speak and be heard. This unequal dissemination of points of view undermines the voter’s ability to be adequately informed of all views. In this way, equality in the political discourse is necessary for meaningful participation in the electoral process and ultimately enhances the right to vote.”

Note: Subsidy and Disclosure

1. Public financing of campaigns. Buckley concluded that, absent extraordinary circumstances, government cannot constitutionally restrict speech in order to eliminate imbalance in the marketplace. What other means, if any, might government employ to achieve this objective? Consider Powe, Mass Speech and the Newer First Amendment, 1982 Sup. Ct. Rev. 243, 268–269, 282–283:

[To] attempt to tone down a debate [in] the interests of enhancing the marketplace [is] wildly at odds with the normal First Amendment belief that more speech is better. [If the problem is that] the wealthy are too powerful, [we should provide] significant additional public funding [for] electoral campaigns, so that the advantages of wealth can [be] minimized.

2. Subtitle H. In Buckley, the Court considered the constitutionality of subtitle H of the Internal Revenue Code, which established a scheme of campaign “subsidies” to equalize the financial resources of political candidates. Under subtitle H, major political parties (those that had received more than 25 percent of the vote in the preceding presidential election) qualified for subsidies of up to $20 million for their candidates’ presidential campaigns. Minor parties (those that had received between 5 and 25 percent of the vote in the preceding presidential election) qualified for subsidies proportional to their share of the vote in the preceding or current election, whichever was higher. All other political parties qualified for subsidies only if they received more than 5 percent of the vote in the current election. Subtitle H provided for public financing of primaries and party nominating conventions on similar terms. All subsidies were indexed to inflation. Major party candidates were eligible for public funding only if they agreed to forgo all private contributions and to limit their expenditures to the amount of the subsidy. Other candidates who accepted subsidies were permitted to supplement their public funding with private contributions as long as they agreed to limit their total expenditures to the amount of the major party subsidy.

The Court upheld the public financing provisions: “Subtitle H is a congressional effort, not to abridge, restrict, or censor speech, but rather to use public money to facilitate and enlarge public discussion and participation in the electoral process, goals vital to a self-governing people. Thus, Subtitle H furthers, not abridges, pertinent First Amendment values.” Is this consistent with the Court’s analysis in other parts of the opinion?

The Court held further that subtitle H’s requirement that a candidate who accepts public financing agree to limit total campaign expenditures to the amount of the major party subsidy did not independently violate the first amendment: “Congress [may] condition acceptance of public funds on an agreement by the candidate to abide by specified expenditure limitations. Just as a candidate may voluntarily limit the size of the contributions he chooses to accept, he may decide to forgo private fundraising and accept public funding.”

3. Subsidizing individuals rather than parties. Consider the following proposal: “The principle of equal-dollars-per-voter means that each eligible voter should receive the same amount of financial resources for the purpose of participating in electoral politics. [The] only money that voters would be permitted to [spend or contribute] would be the money they receive from the government.” Foley, Equal-Dollars-Per-Voter: A Constitutional Principle of Campaign Finance, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 1204, 1206–1207 (1994). For a variant of this proposal, consider B. Ackerman and I. Ayres, Voting with Dollars 4–8, 156–157 (2002):

[The] American citizen should [be] given a more equal say in [campaign] funding decisions. Just as he receives a ballot on election day, he should also receive a special credit card to finance his favorite candidate. [Suppose] that Congress seeded every voter’s account with fifty [dollars, which each voter could then allocate among the candidates for federal office as he sees fit. Additional private contributions should be permitted, but contributors should] be barred from giving money directly to candidates. They [should] instead pass their checks through a blind trust [so candidates] won’t be able to identify who provided the funds. [There] are lots of reasons for contributing to campaigns, and this [approach] undercuts only one of them—the desire to obtain a quid pro quo from a victorious candidate. [This two-pronged approach] promises an effective increase in both political equality and political expression.

See Karlan, Elections and Change Under “Voting with Dollars,” 91 Cal. L. Rev. 706 (2003) (suggesting some contradictions between first amendment theory and the proposal’s reliance on anonymous donation).

4. Disclosure. To what extent is disclosure of the identity of contributors an effective and constitutional means of preventing undue influence? The Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 requires every political candidate and “political committee” to maintain records of the names and addresses of all persons who contribute more than $10 in a calendar year and to make such records available for inspection by the commission. Moreover, the act provides that such reports are to be available “for public inspection and copying.” In Buckley, the Court upheld these provisions:

The governmental interests sought to be vindicated by the disclosure requirements [fall] into three categories. First, disclosure provides the electorate with information “as to where political campaign money comes [from]” in order to aid the voters in evaluating those who seek federal office. [Second,] disclosure requirements deter actual corruption and avoid the appearance of corruption by exposing [contributions] to the light of publicity. [Third, such] requirements are an essential means of gathering the data necessary to detect violations of the contribution limitations. [Thus, the] disclosure requirements [directly] serve substantial governmental interests....

In subsequent decisions, the Court has reaffirmed Buckley's conclusion that disclosure requirements in the context of campaign finance regulations are presumptively constitutional. See McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, 540 U.S. 93 (2003) (upholding disclosure requirements in the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002); Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission, 558 U.S. 310 (2010) (same).

At the same time, though, the Court has recognized constitutional limits on disclosure requirements. In Brown v. Socialist Workers '74 Campaign Committee, 459 U.S. 87 (1982), the Court held that the disclosure provisions of the Ohio campaign reporting law could not constitutionally be applied to the Socialist Workers Party, “a minor political party which historically has been the object of harassment by government officials and private parties.”

The Court followed Buckley and Brown in Doe v. Reed, 561 U.S. 186 (2010), which involved the constitutionality of a Washington state public records statute, which authorizes the public disclosure of the names of individuals who sign referendum petitions. The plaintiffs argued that public disclosure would chill the willingness of individuals to sign such petitions. The Court held that the state’s interest in “preserving the integrity of the electoral process by combating fraud, detecting invalid signatures, and fostering government transparency and accountability” is sufficient to justify the generally modest impact on those who sign such petitions. On the other hand, the Court made clear that if those who sign any particular petition can demonstrate “a reasonable probability that the compelled disclosure [of personal information] will subject them to threats, harassment, or reprisals from either Government officials or private parties,” then disclosure might well violate the First Amendment.

Note: Campaign Finance Regulation in the Thirty Years After Buckley

1. Contribution limits. In Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC, 523

U.S. 666 (2000), the Court upheld a Missouri statute imposing limits ranging from $275 to $1,075 on contributions to candidates for state offices (different limits were applicable to different offices). In an opinion by Justice Souter, the Court rejected the argument that “Buckley set a minimum constitutional threshold for contribution limits, which in dollars adjusted for loss of purchasing power are now well above the lines drawn by Missouri.” The key question, he explained, was whether “the limits were so low as to impede the ability of candidates to ‘amas[s] the resources necessary for effective advocacy.’” The Court found no such showing in this case. Justices Kennedy, Scalia, and Thomas dissented.

In Randall v. Sorrell, 548 U.S. 230 (2006), the Court, in a six-to-three decision, invalidated Vermont’s Act 64, which stringently limited the amount that individuals, organizations, and political parties could contribute to state and local political candidates. The act limited contributions to candidates for governor to $200 over a two-year period, with substantially lower limits for contributions to candidates for state senator and state representative. In a plurality opinion joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito, Justice Breyer concluded that Act 64’s limits were so “low as to generate suspicion” that they were “not closely drawn” to serve the state’s legitimate interest in preventing the reality and appearance of corruption. Justice Souter, joined by Justices Stevens and Ginsburg, dissented.

2. Political action committees. The Court has handed down several decisions concerning political action committees (PACs) and related organizations. See, e.g., Federal Election Commission v. National Conservative Political Action Committee, 470 U.S. 480 (1985) (invalidating a statute prohibiting any independent political action committee to spend more than $1,000 to further the election of a presidential candidate who receives public financing); California Medical Association v. Federal Election Commission, 453 U.S. 182 (1981) (upholding a statute prohibiting individuals and unincorporated associations from contributing more than $5,000 per year to any multicandidate political committee); Federal Election Commission v. National Right to Work Committee, 459 U.S. 197 (1982) (upholding a statute prohibiting nonstock corporations from soliciting contributions from persons other than their “members” for the purpose of generating funds to be spent in federal election campaigns); Citizens against Rent Control v. Berkeley, 454 U.S. 290 (1981) (invalidating an ordinance imposing a $250 limit on contributions to committees formed to support or oppose ballot measures submitted to a popular vote).

3. Political parties. After Buckley, can the government constitutionally limit the amount a political party can spend in support of its own candidates? Are such expenditures “contributions” or “expenditures” within the meaning of Buckley? See Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission, 518 U.S. 604 (1996), in which the Court held that the first amendment prohibits the application of a provision of the Federal Election Campaign Act that imposes dollar limits on political party “expenditures in connection with the general election campaign of a [congressional] candidate.” In a plurality opinion, Justice Breyer, joined by Justices O’Connor and Souter, held that, under Buckley, the first amendment prohibits the application of this provision to expenditures that the political party makes “independently, without coordination with a candidate.”

In Federal Election Commission v. Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee, 533 U.S. 431 (2001) (Colorado II), the Court rejected the claim that a political party’s coordinated expenditures on behalf of its electoral candidates should be treated as expenditures rather than contributions. The Court explained that “a party’s right to make unlimited expenditures coordinated with a candidate would induce individual and other nonparty contributors to give to the party in order to finance coordinated spending for a favored candidate beyond the contribution limits, [and thus bypass the very limits] that Buckley upheld.” Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia, Kennedy, and Thomas dissented.

4. Corporate speech. First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765 (1978), involved a Massachusetts statute that prohibited any corporation to make contributions or expenditures “for the purpose [of] influencing or affecting the vote on any question submitted to the voters, other than one materially affecting any of the property, business or assets of the corporation.” The statute specified further that “[n]o question submitted to the voters solely concerning the taxation of the income, property or transactions of individuals shall be deemed materially to affect the property, business or assets of the corporation.” The state court, in upholding the statute, held that the first amendment rights of a corporation are limited to issues that materially affect its business, property, or assets.

The Court, in a five-to-four decision, reversed. In an opinion by Justice Powell, the Court explained that the state court had “posed the wrong question.” The proper question “is not whether corporations ‘have’ First Amendment rights and, if so, whether they are coextensive with those of natural persons, [but] whether [the statute] abridges expression that the First Amendment was meant to protect.” The statute is directed against speech that is “indispensable to decisionmaking in a democracy,” and that lies “at the heart of the First Amendment’s protection.” Moreover, the Court could “find no support in the First [Amendment], or in the decisions of this Court, for the proposition that speech that otherwise would be within the protection of the First Amendment loses that protection simply because its source is a corporation that cannot prove, to the satisfaction of a court, a material effect on its business or property.”

Justice White, joined by Justices Brennan and Marshall, dissented: “[The] special status of corporations has placed them in a position to control vast amounts of economic power which may, if not regulated, dominate not only the economy but also the very heart of our democracy, the electoral process. Although [Buckley] provides support for the position that the desire to equalize the financial resources available to candidates does not justify the limitation upon the expression of support which a restriction upon individual contributions entails, the interest of Massachusetts [is] quite different. It is not one of equalizing the resources of opposing candidates or opposing positions, but rather of preventing institutions which have been permitted to amass wealth as a result of special advantages extended by the State for certain economic purposes from using that wealth to acquire an unfair advantage in the political process. [The] State need not permit its own creation to consume it.” Justice Rehnquist also dissented.

5. Corporate speech II. In Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652 (1990), the Court, in a six-to-three decision, upheld section 54(1) of the Michigan Campaign Finance Act, which prohibited corporations from using corporate treasury funds for independent expenditures in support of or in opposition to any candidate for state office. In an opinion by Justice Marshall, the Court observed that “the unique legal and economic characteristics of corporations”—such as “limited liability, perpetual life, and favorable treatment of the accumulation and distribution of assets”—enable corporations “to use ‘resources amassed in the economic marketplace’ to obtain ‘an unfair advantage in the political marketplace.’” Noting that section 54(1) was designed to deal with “the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth that are accumulated with the help of the corporate form and that have little or no correlation to the public’s support for the corporation’s political ideas,” the Court held that “the State has articulated a sufficiently compelling rationale to support its restriction on independent expenditures by corporations.”

Justice Scalia dissented: “[Corporations] are, to be sure, given special advantages, [but] so are other associations and private individuals, [ranging] from tax breaks to contract awards to public employment to outright cash subsidies. It is rudimentary that the State cannot exact as the price of those special advantages the forfeiture of First Amendment rights. [Moreover], the fact that corporations ‘amas[s] large treasuries’ [is] not sufficient justification for the suppression of political speech, unless one thinks it would be lawful to prohibit men and women whose net worth is above a certain figure from endorsing political candidates.”

6. Advocacy corporations. North Carolina Right to Life, a nonprofit advocacy corporation that counsels pregnant women how to deal with unwanted pregnancies without resorting to abortion, challenged the constitutionality of 2 U.S.C. §441, which prohibits corporations from making political contributions directly to candidates for federal office, but permits them to establish, administer, and solicit contributions to separately created PACs, which can themselves make such contributions. In Federal Election Commission v. Beaumont, 539 U.S. 146 (2003), the Court upheld §441, even as applied to nonprofit advocacy corporations. In an opinion by Justice Souter, the Court noted that nonprofit advocacy corporations, like for-profit corporations, benefit from state-created advantages and may thus be able to amass substantial political war chests. Moreover, §441 helps to prevent individuals and organizations from circumventing the contribution limits upheld in Buckley. Because restrictions on political contributions are “merely ‘marginal’ speech restrictions,” and “lie closer to the edges than to the core of political expression,” they are constitutional if they are “closely drawn” to serve a “sufficiently important interest,” a test the Court held was satisfied in this case. Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Scalia, dissented. See also McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, infra.

7. The thirty years after Buckley. As evident from the above decisions, in the thirty years after Buckley the Court, often in five-to-four decisions, took an increasingly moderate approach to campaign finance regulation. In part, this was due to concerns about the steadily growing influence of money in the political process. Perhaps the most revealing and most important decision in this era was McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, in which the Court, again by a five-to-four vote, upheld the constitutionality of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), which was signed into law by President George W. Bush, and which amended the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (FECA).

McCONNELL v. FEDERAL ELECTION COMM’N, 540 U.S. 93 (2003). The Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA) sought to address several important developments in the years since Buckley, including the increased importance of “soft money” and the disturbing findings of a Senate investigation into campaign practices related to the 1996 federal elections. Prior to BCRA, FECA’s contribution limitations extended only to so-called “hard money” contributions made for the purpose of influencing an election for federal office. Political parties and candidates were able to contribute “soft money”—money unregulated under FECA—to support activities intended to influence state or local elections, to support get-out-the-vote (GOTV) drives and generic party advertising, and to pay for legislative advocacy advertisements, even if they mentioned a federal candidate's name, as long as the ads did not expressly advocate the candidate's election or defeat. In BCRA, Congress sought to close these soft-money "loopholes" on the premise that they facilitated widespread circumvention of FECA's requirements.

Justices Stevens and O'Connor, joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, delivered the opinion of the Court: "The solicitation, transfer, and use of soft money [has] enabled parties and candidates to circumvent FECA's limitations on the source and amount of contributions in connection with federal elections.

"In 1998 the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs issued a six-volume report summarizing the results of an extensive investigation into the campaign practices in the 1996 federal elections. The report gave particular attention to the effect of soft money on the American political system, including elected officials' practice of granting special access in return for political contributions. [The report concluded] that both parties promised and provided special access to candidates and senior Government officials in exchange for large soft-money contributions....

"The cornerstone of Title I [of the BCRA is] §323(a), which prohibits national party committees and their agents from soliciting, receiving, directing, or spending any soft money. [In] Buckley, [we] recognized that contribution limits, unlike limits on expenditures, 'entai[l] only a marginal restriction upon the contributor's ability to engage in free communication.' [The] less rigorous standard of review we have applied to contribution limits [shows] proper deference to Congress' ability to weigh competing constitutional interests in an area in which it enjoys particular expertise. [Like] the contribution limits we upheld in Buckley, §323's restrictions have only a marginal impact on the ability of contributors, candidates, officeholders, and parties to engage in effective political speech. Complex as its provisions may be, §323, in the main, does little more than regulate the ability of wealthy individuals, corporations, and unions to contribute large sums of money to influence federal elections, federal candidates, and federal officeholders....

"[§323(a)] provides that 'national committee[s] of a political party...may not solicit, receive, or direct to another person a contribution, donation, or transfer of funds or any other thing of value, or spend any funds, that are not subject to the limitations, prohibitions, and reporting requirements of this Act.' [Before the enactment of this provision], national parties were able to use vast amounts of soft money in their efforts to elect federal candidates. Consequently, as long as they directed the money to the political parties, donors could contribute large amounts of soft money for use in activities designed to influence federal elections. New §323(a) is designed to put a stop to that practice.

“The Government defends §323(a)’s ban on national parties’ involvement with soft money as necessary to prevent the actual and apparent corruption of federal candidates and officeholders. Our cases have made clear that the prevention of corruption or its appearance constitutes a sufficiently important interest to justify political contribution limits. [The] idea that large contributions to a national party can corrupt or, at the very least, create the appearance of corruption of federal candidates and officeholders is neither novel nor implausible....

“The question for present purposes is whether large soft-money contributions to national party committees have a corrupting influence or give rise to the appearance of corruption. Both common sense and the ample record in these cases confirm Congress’ belief that they do. [The] evidence in the record shows that candidates and donors alike [have] exploited the soft-money loophole, the former to increase their prospects of election and the latter to create debt on the part of officeholders, with the national parties serving as willing intermediaries.

“The core of §323(b) is a straightforward contribution regulation: It prevents donors from contributing [soft-money] to state and local party committees to help finance ‘Federal election activity.’ The term ‘Federal election activity’ encompasses four distinct categories of electioneering: (1) voter registration activity during the 120 days preceding a regularly scheduled federal election; (2) voter identification, get-out-the-vote (GOTV), and generic campaign activity that is ‘conducted in connection with an election in which a candidate for Federal office appears on the ballot’; (3) any ‘public communication’ that ‘refers to a clearly identified candidate for Federal office’ and ‘promotes,’ ‘supports,’ ‘attacks,’ or ‘opposes’ a candidate for that office; and (4) the services provided by a state committee employee who dedicates more than 25% of his or her time to ‘activities in connection with a Federal election.’...

“[In] addressing the problem of soft-money contributions to state committees, Congress both drew a conclusion and made a prediction. Its conclusion, based on the evidence before it, was that the corrupting influence of soft money does not insinuate itself into the political process solely through national party committees. Rather, state committees function as an alternate avenue for precisely the same corrupting forces. [Congress] also made a prediction. Having been taught the hard lesson of circumvention by the entire history of campaign finance regulation, Congress knew that soft-money donors would react to §323(a) by scrambling to find another way to purchase influence. [We] ‘must accord substantial deference to the predictive judgments of Congress.’ [Preventing] corrupting activity from shifting wholesale to state committees and thereby eviscerating FECA clearly qualifies as an important governmental interest. [Because] voter registration, voter identification, GOTV, and generic campaign activity all confer substantial benefits on federal candidates, the funding of such activities creates a significant risk of actual and apparent corruption. Section 323(b) is a reasonable response to that risk.”

Justice Scalia concurred in part and dissented in part: “We are governed by Congress, and this legislation prohibits the criticism of Members of Congress by those entities most capable of giving such criticism loud voice: national political parties. [To] be sure, the legislation is evenhanded: It similarly prohibits criticism of the candidates who oppose Members of Congress in their reelection bids. But as everyone knows, this is an area in which evenhandedness is not fairness. [If] incumbents and challengers are limited to the same quantity of electioneering, incumbents are favored. [Beyond] that, however, the present legislation targets for prohibition certain categories of campaign speech that are particularly harmful to incumbents. Is it accidental, do you think, that incumbents raise about three times as much ‘hard money’—the sort of funding generally not restricted by this legislation—as do their challengers? Or that lobbyists [give] 92 percent of their money in ‘hard’ contributions? [Is] it mere happenstance [that] national-party funding, which is severely limited by the Act, is more likely to assist cash-strapped challengers than flush-with-hard-money incumbents[?]”

Justice Kennedy, joined in part by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Thomas, filed an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part: “Today’s decision [replaces] respected First Amendment principles with new, amorphous, and unsound rules, rules which dismantle basic protections for speech. [Our] precedents teach, above all, that Government cannot be trusted to moderate its own rules for suppression of speech. The dangers posed by speech regulations have led the Court to insist upon principled constitutional lines and a rigorous standard of review. The majority now abandons these distinctions and limitations....

“In Buckley, the Court held that one, and only one, interest justified the significant burden on the right of association involved there: eliminating, or preventing, actual corruption or the appearance of corruption stemming from contributions to candidates. [The] Court [today] ignores these constitutional bounds and in effect interprets the anticorruption rationale to allow regulation not just of ‘actual or apparent quid pro quo arrangements,’ but of any conduct that wins goodwill from or influences a Member of Congress. [The] very aim of Buckley's standard [was] to define undue influence by reference to the presence of quid pro quo involving the officeholder. The Court, in contrast, concludes that access, without more, proves influence is undue. [This] new definition of corruption sweeps away all protections for speech that lie in its path." Justice Thomas, joined in part by Justice Scalia, also concurred in part and dissented in part.

In another aspect of McConnell, the Court, in by the same five-to-four vote, upheld §203 of The Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act, which prohibited corporations and labor unions from funding "electioneering communications" from their general treasuries. The BCRA defined an "electioneering communication" as any "broadcast, cable, or satellite communication" that refers to a clearly identified candidate for federal office, is made within 60 days before a general election or 30 days before a primary election, and is targeted to the relevant electorate.

Justices Stevens and O'Connor delivered the opinion of the Court. At the outset, the Court noted that Congress's "power to prohibit corporations and unions from using funds in their treasuries to finance advertisements expressly advocating the election or defeat of [particular] candidates in federal elections has been firmly embedded in our law." The ability of such organizations to create PACs, the Court observed, has "provided corporations and unions with a constitutionally sufficient opportunity to engage in [such] advocacy." In the Court's view, all BCRA did was to extend this principle from advertisements that expressly advocate the election or defeat of named candidates ("Vote Against Smith") to advertisements that purport to address general issues but that expressly refer to named candidates, without literally calling for their election or defeat, in circumstances in which the underlying point of the advertisement is clear ("Tell Smith to stop raising your taxes.").

Justice Kennedy, joined in part by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Thomas, dissented: "The majority permits a new and serious intrusion on speech when it upholds §203, [which] prohibits corporations and labor unions from using money from their general treasury to fund electioneering communications. The majority compounds the error made in Austin, and silences political speech central to the civic discourse that sustains and informs our democratic processes. Unions and corporations, including nonprofit corporations, now face severe criminal penalties for broadcasting advocacy messages that 'refe[r] to a clearly identified candidate' in an election season."

Note: Campaign Finance and the Roberts Court

1. A critical shift in the Court. The appointment of Samuel Alito to replace Sandra Day O'Connor led to a sudden shift in the Court. Only four years after the decision in McConnell, after Justice Alito had replaced O'Connor, who had voted with the majority in McConnell, the Court in a five-to-four decision in Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, 551 U.S. 449 (2007), now held §203 of BCRA unconstitutional as applied to Wisconsin Right to Life's televised political advertisements that criticized Wisconsin's senators for participating in a filibuster to block the confirmation of several of President Bush's judicial nominees. Because the ads expressly mentioned Senator Russ Feingold by name and called upon viewers to contact Feingold to urge him to oppose the filibuster, they clearly violated §203.

In an opinion joined only by Justice Alito, Chief Justice Roberts argued that the Court in McConnell had upheld §203 only insofar as it regulated political advertising that "was the 'functional equivalent' of express campaign speech." The question in this case, Roberts declared, was whether the WRTL ads were "the 'functional equivalent' of speech expressly advocating the election or defeat of a candidate for federal office," which could constitutionally be regulated under McConnell, or whether they were "genuine" issue ads, which, he maintained, could not be regulated consistent with the First Amendment:

"In drawing that line, the First Amendment requires us to err of the side of protecting political speech rather than suppressing it. We conclude that the speech at issue in this as-applied challenge is not the 'functional equivalent' of express campaign speech. We further conclude that the interests held to justify restricting corporate campaign speech or its functional equivalent do not justify restricting issue advocacy, and accordingly we hold that BCRA §203 is unconstitutional as applied to the advertisements at issue."

Justice Scalia, joined by Justices Kennedy and Thomas, concurred in the result: "[It] was adventurous for McConnell to extend Austin beyond corporate speech constituting express advocacy. [I] would overrule that part of the Court's decision in McConnell upholding §203(a) of the BCRA."

Justice Souter, joined by Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer, dissented: "[In] McConnell, we found [§203] to be 'easily understood and objective[e]' [and] we held that the [line] separating regulated election speech from general political discourse does not, on its face, violate the First Amendment. [We] found '[l]ittle difference...between an ad that urged viewers to "vote against Jane Doe" and one that condemned Jane Doe's record on a particular issue before exhorting viewers to "call Jane Doe and tell her what you think.'" McConnell's "holding that §203 is facially constitutional is overruled. [The] price of McConnell's demise [seems] to me a high one. The Court (and I think the country) loses when important precedent is overruled without good reason, and there is no justification for departing from our usual rule of stare decisis here.”

2. The “Millionaire’s Amendment.” The next year, the Court considered the constitutionality of §319(a) of BCRA, the so-called “Millionaire’s Amendment,” which provided that if a candidate for Congress spends $350,000 or more of his own money in order to secure his own election, the opposing candidate was then permitted to accept individual campaign contributions up to three-times larger than would otherwise be allowed. (The opposing candidate could not accept additional contributions under this provision that would in total exceed the “millionaire” candidate’s personal expenditures.) In Davis v. Federal Election Commission, 554 U.S. 724 (2008), the Court, in a five-to-four decision, held the provision unconstitutional.

Justice Alito delivered the opinion of the Court: “In Buckley, we soundly rejected a cap on a candidate’s expenditure of personal funds to finance campaign speech. [We] rejected the argument that [such] an expenditure cap could be justified on that ground that it served [the] ‘interest in equalizing the relative financial resources of candidates competing for elective office.’ [While §319(a)] does not impose a cap on a candidate’s expenditure of personal funds, it imposes [a] penalty on any candidate who robustly exercises that First Amendment right. Section 319(a) requires a candidate to choose between the First Amendment right to engage in unfettered political speech and subjection to discriminatory fundraising limitations. [Under] §319(a), the vigorous exercise of the right to use personal funds to finance campaign speech produces fundraising advantages for opponents in the competitive context of electoral politics. [Because] §319(a) imposes a substantial burden on the exercise of the First Amendment right to use personal funds for campaign speech, [it] cannot stand unless it is ‘justified by a compelling state interest.’ No such justification is present here.”

Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer, dissented: “The Millionaire’s Amendment [is] the product of a congressional judgment that candidates who are willing and able to spend over $350,000 of their own money in seeking election to Congress enjoy an advantage over opponents who must rely on contributions to finance their campaigns. To reduce that advantage, and to combat the perception that congressional seats are for sale to the highest bidder, Congress has relaxed the amount of contributions that the opponents of self-funding candidates may accept from their supporters. [Because] the Millionaire’s Amendment does not impose any burden [on] the self-funding candidate’s freedom to speak [and] because it does no more than diminish the unequal strength of the self-funding candidate, it does not violate the [Constitution].”

3. Arizona Free Enterprise. The Arizona Citizens Clean Elections Act of 1998 created a voluntary public financing system to fund the primary and general election campaigns of candidates for state office. All eligible candidates may opt to receive public funding. Eligibility is contingent on the collection of a specified number of five-dollar contributions from Arizona voters and the acceptance of certain campaign restrictions and obligations. Publicly funded candidates must agree to limit their expenditure of personal funds to $500, participate in at least one public debate, adhere to an overall expenditure cap, and return all unspent public moneys to the State.

In exchange for accepting these conditions, participating candidates are granted public funds to conduct their campaigns. When certain conditions are met, publicly funded candidates are granted additional “equalizing” or matching funds. Equalizing funds are made available to a publicly funded candidate when the amount of money a privately financed candidate receives in contributions (including expenditures of his own funds), combined with the expenditures of independent groups made in support of the privately financed candidate or in opposition to the publicly financed candidate, exceed the initial allotment of funds to the publicly financed candidate. Once matching funds are triggered, each additional dollar that a privately financed candidate spends or is spent on his behalf results in one dollar in additional state funding to his publicly financed opponent. Matching funds top out at two times the initial authorized grant of public funding to the publicly financed candidate. Under Arizona law, a privately financed candidate may raise and spend unlimited funds.

In Arizona Free Enterprise Club’s Freedom Club PAC v. Bennett, 564 U.S. 721 (2011), the Court, in another five-to-four decision, held that this scheme violates the First Amendment. Chief Justice Roberts wrote the opinion of the Court: “Although the speech of the candidates and independent expenditure groups that brought this suit is not directly capped by Arizona’s matching funds provision, those parties contend that their political speech is substantially burdened by the state law in the same way that speech was burdened by the law we recently found invalid in Davis. [The] logic of Davis largely controls our approach to this case. Much like the burden placed on speech in Davis, the matching funds provision “imposes an unprecedented penalty on any candidate who robustly exercises [his] First Amendment right[s].”

Justice Kagan, joined by Justices Ginsburg, Breyer, and Sotomayor, dissented: “The First Amendment’s core purpose is to foster a healthy, vibrant political system full of robust discussion and debate. [Campaign] finance reform over the last century has focused on one key question: how to prevent massive pools of private money from corrupting our political system. If an officeholder owes his election to wealthy contributors, he may act for their benefit alone, rather than on behalf of all the people. [To] prevent both corruption and the appearance of corruption—and so to protect our democratic system of governance—citizens have implemented reforms designed to curb the power of special interests. Among these measures, public financing of elections has emerged as a potentially potent mechanism to preserve elected officials' independence. By supplanting private cash in elections, public financing eliminates the source of political corruption. For this reason, [almost] one-third of the States have adopted some form of public financing, and so too has the Federal Government for presidential elections....

"We declared the presidential public financing system constitutional in Buckley. [We] reiterated "that public financing as a means of eliminating the improper influence of large private contributions furthers a significant governmental interest." And finally, in rejecting a challenge based on the First Amendment, we held that the program did not 'restrict[] or censor speech, but rather...use[d] public money to facilitate and enlarge public discussion and participation in the electoral process.' [But] this model, which distributes a lump-sum grant at the beginning of an election cycle, has a significant weakness: It lacks a mechanism for setting the subsidy at a level that will give candidates sufficient incentive to participate, while also conserving public resources. [Candidates] will choose to sign up only if the subsidy provided enables them to run competitive races. If the grant is pegged too low, it puts the participating candidate at a disadvantage: Because he has agreed to spend no more than the amount of the subsidy, he will lack the means to respond if his privately funded opponent spends over that threshold. [But] if the subsidy is set too high, it may impose an unsustainable burden on the public fisc. [The] difficulty, then, is in finding the Goldilocks solution—not too large, not too small, but just right....

"...The hallmark of Arizona's program is its inventive approach to the challenge that bedevils all public financing schemes: fixing the amount of the subsidy. [Arizona's] matching funds arrangement responds to the shortcoming of the lump-sum model by adjusting the public subsidy in each race to reflect the expenditures of a privately financed candidate and the independent groups that support him. Arizona can therefore assure candidates that, if they accept public funds, they will have the resources to run a viable race against those who rely on private money. And at the same time, Arizona avoids wasting taxpayers' dollars. In this way, the Clean Elections Act creates an effective and sustainable public financing system. [The] majority contends that the matching funds provision ‘substantially burdens protected political speech’ and does not ‘serv[e] a compelling state interest.’ But the Court is wrong on both counts.

“Arizona’s statute does not impose a ‘restriction,’ or ‘substantia[l] burde[n],’ on expression. The law has quite the opposite effect: It subsidizes and so produces more political speech. [Except] in a world gone topsy-turvy, additional campaign speech and electoral competition is not a First Amendment injury.

“At every turn, the majority tries to convey the impression that Arizona’s matching fund statute is of a piece with laws prohibiting electoral speech. The majority [insists] that the statute ‘restrict[s] the speech of some elements of our society’ to enhance the speech of others. And it concludes by reminding us that the point of the First Amendment is to protect ‘against unjustified government restrictions on speech.’ There is just one problem. Arizona’s matching funds provision does not restrict, but instead subsidizes, speech. The law ‘impose[s] no ceiling on [speech] and do[es] not prevent anyone from speaking.’ [What] the law does—all the law does—is fund more speech. And under the First Amendment, that makes all the difference. In case after case, we have distinguished between speech restrictions and speech subsidies. [No] one can claim that Arizona’s law discriminates against particular [ideas.] Republicans and Democrats, conservatives and liberals may [participate.] Arizona disburses funds based not on a candidate’s (or supporter’s) ideas, but on the candidate’s decision to sign up for public funding. So under our precedent, Arizona’s subsidy statute should easily survive First Amendment scrutiny.”

Citizens United v. Federal Elections Commission

558 U.S. 310 (2010)

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

Federal law prohibits corporations and unions from using their general treasury funds to make independent expenditures for speech defined as an “electioneering communication” or for speech expressly advocating the election or defeat of a candidate. Limits on electioneering communications were upheld in [McConnell]. The holding of McConnell rested to a large extent on [Austin, which] had held that political speech may be banned based on the speaker’s corporate identity.

In this case we are asked to reconsider Austin and, in effect, McConnell. [We] hold that stare decisis does not compel the continued acceptance of Austin.

Citizens United is a nonprofit corporation. [In] January 2008 Citizens United released a film entitled Hillary: The Movie. [It] is a 90-minute documentary about then-Senator Hillary Clinton, who was a candidate in the Democratic Party's 2008 Presidential primary elections....

Before the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), federal law prohibited—and still does prohibit—corporations and unions from using general treasury funds [to] make independent expenditures that expressly advocate the election or defeat of a candidate. 2 U.S.C. §441b. [BCRA §203 prohibited] any “electioneering communication” as well. [The Federal Elections Commission held that Hillary was an “electioneering communication” within the meaning of BCRA §203.]...

III

...The law before us is an outright ban [on speech], backed by criminal sanctions. Section 441b makes it a felony for all corporations [either] to expressly advocate the election or defeat of candidates or to broadcast electioneering communications within 30 days of a primary election and 60 days of a general election. [If] §441b applied to individuals, [it would clearly be unconstitutional under Buckley.] Laws that burden political speech are “subject to strict scrutiny,” which requires the Government to prove that the restriction “furthers a compelling interest and is narrowly tailored to achieve that interest.” [WRTL]....

Premised on mistrust of governmental power, the First Amendment stands against attempts to disfavor certain subjects or viewpoints. Prohibited, too, are restrictions distinguishing among different speakers, allowing speech by some but not others. [Citing Bellotti.] As instruments to censor, these categories are interrelated: Speech restrictions based on the identity of the speaker are all too often simply a means to control content. [By] taking the right to speak from some and giving it to others, the Government deprives the disadvantaged person or class of the right to use speech to strive to establish worth, standing, and respect for the speaker’s voice. The Government may not by these means deprive the public of the right and privilege to determine for itself what speech and speakers are worthy of consideration. The First Amendment protects speech and speaker, and the ideas that flow from each. [We] find no basis for the proposition that, in the context of political speech, the Government may impose restrictions on certain disfavored speakers....

A

The Court has recognized that First Amendment protection extends to corporations. [Citing Bellotti; Cox Broadcasting; New York Times v. United States; New York Times v. Sullivan.] Under the rationale of these precedents, political speech does not lose First Amendment protection “simply because its source is a corporation.” [Bellotti]. The Court [has] rejected the argument that political speech of corporations or other associations should be treated differently under the First Amendment simply because such associations are not “natural persons.” [Bellotti.]...

Austin “upheld a direct restriction on the independent expenditure of funds for political speech for the first time in [this Court’s] history.” [To] bypass Buckley and Bellotti, the Austin Court identified a new governmental interest in limiting political speech: an antidistortion interest. Austin found a compelling governmental interest in preventing “the corrosive and distorting effects of immense aggregations of wealth that are accumulated with the help of the corporate form and that have little or no correlation to the public’s support for the corporation’s ideas.”

This Court is thus confronted with conflicting lines of precedent: a pre-Austin line that forbids restrictions on political speech based on the speaker’s corporate identity and a post-Austin line that permits them. [In] its defense of the corporate-speech restrictions in §441b, the Government notes the antidistortion rationale....[This] rationale cannot support §441b. If the First Amendment has any force, it prohibits Congress from fining or jailing citizens, or associations of citizens, for simply engaging in political speech. If the antidistortion rationale were to be accepted, however, it would permit Government to ban political speech simply because the speaker is an association that has taken on the corporate form. [Austin] sought to defend the antidistortion rationale as a means to prevent corporations from obtaining “an unfair advantage in the political marketplace” by using “resources amassed in the economic marketplace.” But Buckley rejected the premise that the Government has an interest “in equalizing the relative ability of individuals and groups to influence the outcome of elections.”

[T]he Austin majority undertook to distinguish wealthy individuals from corporations on the ground that “[s]tate law grants corporations special advantages—such as limited liability, perpetual life, and favorable treatment of the accumulation and distribution of assets.” This does not suffice, however, to allow laws prohibiting speech. “It is rudimentary that the State cannot exact as the price of those special advantages the forfeiture of First Amendment rights.”.

The censorship we now confront is vast in its reach. The Government has “muffle[d] the voices that best represent the most significant segments of the economy.” The purpose and effect of this law is to prevent corporations [from] presenting both facts and opinions to the public. [The] speech that §441b forbids [is] public, and all can judge its content and purpose. References to massive corporate treasuries should not mask the real operation of this law. Rhetoric ought not obscure reality. [When] Government seeks to use its full power, including the criminal law, to command where a person may get his or her information or what distrusted source he or she may not hear, it uses censorship to control thought. This is unlawful. The First Amendment confirms the freedom to think for ourselves....

What we have said also shows the invalidity of other arguments made by the Government. [The] Government falls back on the argument that corporate political speech can be banned in order to prevent corruption or its appearance. In Buckley, the Court found this interest “sufficiently important” to allow limits on contributions but did not extend that reasoning to expenditure limits. [Indeed], 26 States do not restrict independent expenditures by for-profit corporations. The Government does not claim that these expenditures have corrupted the political process in those States. [The] appearance of influence or access, furthermore, will not cause the electorate to lose faith in our democracy. [The] fact that a corporation, or any other speaker, is willing to spend money to try to persuade voters presupposes that the people have the ultimate influence over elected officials....

When Congress finds that a problem exists, we must give that finding due deference; but Congress may not choose an unconstitutional remedy. If elected officials succumb to improper influences from independent expenditures; if they surrender their best judgment; and if they put expediency before principle, then surely there is cause for concern. [The] remedies enacted by law, however, must comply with the First Amendment; and, it is our law and our tradition that more speech, not less, is the governing rule. An outright ban on corporate political speech is not a permissible remedy....

The Government contends further that corporate political expenditures can be limited because of its interest in protecting dissenting shareholders from being compelled to fund corporate political speech. This asserted interest, like Austin’s antidistortion rationale, would allow the Government to ban the political speech even of media corporations. [In any event], the remedy is not to restrict speech but to consider and explore other regulatory mechanisms....

C

...For the reasons above, it must be concluded that Austin was not well reasoned. [Due] consideration leads to this conclusion: Austin should be and now is overruled. We return to the principle established [in] Bellotti that the Government may not suppress political speech on the basis of the speaker's corporate identity.] No sufficient governmental interest justifies limits on the political speech [of] corporations. [Given] our conclusion we are further required to overrule the part of McConnell that upheld BCRA §203's extension of §441b's restrictions on corporate independent expenditures.

CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS, with whom JUSTICE ALITO joins, concurring.

...The text and purpose of the First Amendment point in the same direction: Congress may not prohibit political speech, even if the speaker is a corporation or union. What makes this case difficult is the need to confront our prior decision in Austin. [Fidelity] to precedent—the policy of stare decisis—is vital to the proper exercise of the judicial function. “Stare decisis is the preferred course because it promotes the evenhanded, predictable, and consistent development of legal principles, fosters reliance on judicial decisions, and contributes to the actual and perceived integrity of the judicial process.” For these reasons, we have long recognized that departures from precedent are inappropriate in the absence of a “special justification.” [But] stare decisis is neither an “inexorable command,” nor “a mechanical formula of adherence to the latest decision,” especially in constitutional cases. If it were, segregation would be legal, minimum wage laws would be unconstitutional, and the Government could wiretap ordinary criminal suspects without first obtaining warrants....Stare decisis is instead a “principle of policy.” When considering whether to reexamine a prior erroneous holding, we must balance the importance of having constitutional questions decided against the importance of having them decided right....

[Several] considerations weigh against retaining our decision in Austin. First, [that] decision was an “aberration” insofar as it departed from the robust protections we had granted political speech in our earlier cases. Austin undermined the careful line that Buckley drew to distinguish limits on contributions to candidates from limits on independent expenditures on speech. [Second,] the validity of Austin's rationale [has] proved to be the consistent subject of dispute among Members of this Court ever since. [Citing WRTL and McConnell]. In such circumstances, it is entirely appropriate for the Court [to] address the matter with a greater willingness to consider new approaches capable of restoring our doctrine to sounder footing. [Because] continued adherence to Austin threatens to subvert the “principled and intelligible” development of our

First Amendment jurisprudence, I support the Court’s determination to overrule that decision.

JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom JUSTICE ALITO joins, and with whom JUSTICE THOMAS joins in part, concurring.

I join the opinion of the Court. I write separately to address Justice Stevens’ discussion of “Original Understandings.” This section of the dissent purports to show that today’s decision is not supported by the original understanding of the First Amendment. The dissent attempts this demonstration, however, in splendid isolation from the text of the First Amendment. It never shows why “the freedom of speech” that was the right of Englishmen did not include the freedom to speak in association with other individuals, including association in the corporate form. To be sure, in 1791 (as now) corporations could pursue only the objectives set forth in their charters; but the dissent provides no evidence that their speech in the pursuit of those objectives could be censored.

Instead of taking this straightforward approach to determining the Amendment’s meaning, the dissent embarks on a detailed exploration of the Framers’ views about the “role of corporations in society.” The Framers didn’t like corporations, the dissent concludes, and therefore it follows (as night the day) that corporations had no rights of free speech. Of course the Framers’ personal affection or disaffection for corporations is relevant only insofar as it can be thought to be reflected in the understood meaning of the text they enacted—not, as the dissent suggests, as a freestanding substitute for that text. [Even] if we thought it proper to apply the dissent’s approach of excluding from First Amendment coverage what the Founders disliked, and even if we agreed that the Founders disliked founding-era corporations; modern corporations might not qualify for exclusion. Most of the Founders’ resentment towards corporations was directed at the state-granted monopoly privileges that individually chartered corporations enjoyed. Modern corporations do not have such privileges, and would probably have been favored by most of our enterprising Founders....

But to return to, and summarize, my principal point, which is the conformity of today’s opinion with the original meaning of the First Amendment. [Its] text offers no foothold for excluding any category of speaker, from single individuals to partnerships of individuals, to unincorporated associations of individuals, to incorporated associations of individuals—and the dissent offers no evidence about the original meaning of the text to support any such exclusion....

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE GINSBURG, JUSTICE BREYER, and JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR join, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

...The basic premise underlying the Court's ruling is its iteration, and constant reiteration, of the proposition that the First Amendment bars regulatory distinctions based on a speaker's identity, including its "identity" as a corporation. While that glittering generality has rhetorical appeal, it is not a correct statement of the law. [In] the context of election to public office, the distinction between corporate and human speakers is significant. Although they make enormous contributions to our society, corporations are not actually members of it. They cannot vote or run for office. [The] financial resources, legal structure, and instrumental orientation of corporations raise legitimate concerns about their role in the electoral process. Our lawmakers have a compelling constitutional basis, if not also a democratic duty, to take measures designed to guard against the potentially deleterious effects of corporate spending in local and national races.

The majority's approach to corporate electioneering marks a dramatic break from our past. Congress has placed special limitations on campaign spending by corporations ever since the passage of the Tillman Act in 1907. [The] Court today rejects a century of history when it treats the distinction between corporate and individual campaign spending as an invidious novelty born of Austin. Relying largely on individual dissenting opinions, the majority blazes through our precedents, overruling or disavowing a body of case law including WRTL [and] McConnell....

II

...I am not an absolutist when it comes to stare decisis, [but] if this principle is to do any meaningful work in supporting the rule of law, it must at least demand a significant justification, beyond the preferences of five Justices, for overturning settled doctrine. [No] such justification exists in this case, and to the contrary there are powerful prudential reasons to keep faith with our precedents. The Court's central argument for why stare decisis ought to be trumped is that it does not like Austin. [I] am perfectly willing to concede that if one of our precedents were dead wrong in its reasoning or irreconcilable with the rest of our doctrine, there would be a compelling basis for revisiting it. But neither is true of Austin. [The] Court proclaims that "Austin is undermined by experience since its announcement." [But it] has no empirical evidence with which to substantiate [this claim.] Nor does the majority bother to specify in what sense Austin has been "undermined."...

In the end, the Court's rejection of Austin and McConnell comes down to nothing more than its disagreement with their results. Virtually every one of its arguments was made and rejected in those cases, and the majority opinion is essentially an amalgamation of resuscitated dissents. The only relevant thing that has changed since Austin and McConnell is the composition of this Court. Today's ruling thus strikes at the vitals of stare decisis, "the means by which we ensure that the law will not merely change erratically, but will develop in a principled and intelligible fashion" that "permits society to presume that bedrock principles are founded in the law rather than in the proclivities of individuals."

III

The novelty of the Court's [approach] to stare decisis is matched by the novelty of its ruling on the merits. The ruling rests on several premises. First, the Court claims [that] the First Amendment precludes regulatory distinctions based on speaker identity, including the speaker's identity as a corporation. [Second], it claims that Austin and McConnell were radical outliers in our First Amendment tradition....Each of these claims is wrong....

IDENTITY-BASED DISTINCTIONS

[The majority asserts] that "the Government cannot restrict political speech based on the speaker's...identity." [But in] a variety of contexts, we have held that speech can be regulated differentially on account of the speaker's identity, when identity is understood in categorical or institutional terms. The Government routinely places special restrictions on the speech rights of students, prisoners, members of the Armed Forces, foreigners, and its own employees. [In] contrast to the blanket rule that the majority espouses, our cases recognize that the Government's interests may be more or less compelling with respect to different classes of speakers.

The election context is distinctive in many ways, and the Court, of course, is right that the First Amendment closely guards political speech. But in this context, too, the authority of legislatures to enact viewpoint-neutral regulations based on content and identity is well settled. We have, for example, allowed state-run broadcasters to exclude independent candidates from televised debates. [Citing Forbes. Recall also Perry]. The same logic applies to this case with additional force because it is the identity of corporations, rather than individuals, that the Legislature has taken into account. [Not] only has the distinctive potential of corporations to corrupt the electoral process long been recognized, but [campaign] finance distinctions based on corporate identity tend to be less worrisome [because] the "speakers" are not natural persons, much less members of our political [community]....

In short, the Court dramatically overstates its critique of identity-based distinctions, without ever explaining why corporate identity demands the same treatment as individual identity. Only the most wooden approach to the First Amendment could justify the unprecedented line it seeks to draw.

OUR FIRST AMENDMENT TRADITION

[Another] fulcrum of the Court's opinion is the idea that Austin and McConnell are radical outliers [in] our First Amendment tradition. The Court has it exactly backwards. It is today's holding that is the radical departure from what had been settled First Amendment law. To see why, it is useful to take a long view.

1. 1. Original Understandings

[T]here is not a scintilla of evidence to support the notion that anyone believed [the First Amendment] would preclude regulatory distinctions based on the corporate form. To the extent that the Framers' views are discernible and relevant to the disposition of this case, they would appear to cut strongly against the majority's position.

[T]he Framers [held] very different views [than the majority does today] about the nature of the First Amendment right and the role of corporations in society. Those few corporations that existed at the founding were authorized by grant of a special legislative charter. [Corporations] were created, supervised, and conceptualized as quasi-public entities, "designed to serve a social function for the state." It was "assumed that [they] were legally privileged organizations that had to be closely scrutinized by the legislature because their purposes had to be made consistent with public welfare." [The] Framers thus took it as a given that corporations could be comprehensively regulated in the service of the public welfare. Unlike our colleagues, [the Framers] had little trouble distinguishing corporations from human beings, and when they constitutionalized the right to free speech in the First Amendment, it was the free speech of individual Americans that they had in mind....

Justice Scalia criticizes the foregoing discussion for failing to adduce statements from the founding era showing that corporations were understood to be excluded from the First Amendment's free speech guarantee. Of course, Justice Scalia adduces no statements to suggest the contrary proposition.... Nothing in his account dislodges my basic point that members of the founding generation held a cautious view of corporate power and a narrow view of corporate rights (not that they "despised" corporations), and that they conceptualized speech in individualistic terms. If no prominent Framer bothered to articulate that corporate speech would have lesser status than individual speech, that may well be because the contrary proposition—if not also the very notion of “corporate speech”—was inconceivable....

2. 2. Legislative and Judicial Interpretation

A century of more recent history puts to rest any notion that today’s ruling is faithful to our First Amendment tradition. At the federal level, the express distinction between corporate and individual political spending on elections stretches back to 1907, when Congress passed the Tillman Act, banning all corporate contributions to candidates. [By] the time Congress passed FECA in 1971, the bar on corporate contributions and expenditures had become such an accepted part of federal campaign finance regulation that [in Buckley] no one even bothered to argue that the bar as such was unconstitutional. [Thus], it was unremarkable, that [in FEC v. National Right to Work Committee, 459 U.S. 197 (1982)] then-Justice Rehnquist wrote for a unanimous Court that “[the] governmental interest in preventing both actual corruption and the appearance of corruption of elected representatives has long been recognized” [and that] “there is no reason why it may not...be accomplished by treating...corporations...differently from individuals.” [Several] years later, in Austin, we [held that] corporations [could] be barred from using general treasury funds to make independent expenditures in support of, or in opposition to, candidates. In the 20 years since Austin, we have reaffirmed its holding and rationale a number of times, most importantly in McConnell, where we upheld the provision challenged here....

3. Buckley and Bellotti

Against [the] extensive background of congressional regulation of corporate campaign spending, and our repeated affirmation of this regulation as constitutionally sound, the majority dismisses Austin as “a significant departure from ancient First Amendment principles.” How does the majority attempt to justify this claim? Selected passages from two cases, Buckley and Bellotti, do all of the work. [The] case on which the majority places [its primary emphasis] is Bellotti, claiming it “could not have been clearer” that Bellotti’s holding forbade distinctions between corporate and individual [expenditures]. The Court’s reliance is odd. The only thing about Bellotti that could not be clearer is that it declined to adopt the majority’s position. Bellotti ruled, in an explicit limitation on the scope of its holding, that “our consideration of a corporation’s right to speak on issues of general public interest implies no comparable right in the quite different context of participation in a political campaign for election to public office.” Bellotti, in other words, did not touch the question presented in Austin and McConnell, and the opinion squarely disavowed the proposition for which the majority cites it....

IV

Having explained [why] Austin and McConnell [sit] perfectly well with “First Amendment principles,” I come at last to the interests that are at stake....

THE ANTICORRUPTION INTEREST

...On numerous occasions we have recognized Congress’ legitimate interest in preventing the money that is spent on elections from exerting an “undue influence on an officeholder’s judgment” and from creating “the appearance of such influence,” beyond the sphere of quid pro quo relationships. [Our] “undue influence” cases [have recognized that when] private interests are seen to exert outsized control over officeholders solely on account of the money spent on (or withheld from) their campaigns, the result can depart so thoroughly “from what is pure or correct” in the conduct of Government that it amounts to a “subversion...of the electoral process.” [This] understanding of corruption has deep roots in the Nation’s history....

Rather than show any deference to a coordinate branch of Government, the majority [rejects] the anticorruption rationale without serious analysis. Today’s opinion provides no clear rationale for being so dismissive of Congress, but the prior individual opinions on which it relies have offered one: the incentives of the legislators who passed BCRA. Section 203, our colleagues have suggested, may be little more than “an incumbency protection plan,” a disreputable attempt at legislative self-dealing rather than an earnest effort to facilitate First Amendment values and safeguard the legitimacy of our political system. This possibility, the Court apparently believes, licenses it to run roughshod over Congress’ handiwork.

In my view, we should instead start by acknowledging that “Congress surely has both wisdom and experience in these matters that is far superior to ours.” [This] is not to say that deference would be appropriate if there were a solid basis for believing that a legislative action was motivated by the desire to protect incumbents or that it will degrade the competitiveness of the electoral process. [But] it is the height of recklessness to dismiss Congress’ years of bipartisan deliberation and its reasoned judgment on this basis, without first confirming that the statute in question was intended to be, or will function as, a restraint on electoral competition. [In fact, we] have no record evidence from which to conclude that BCRA §203, or any of the dozens of state laws that the Court today calls into question, reflects or fosters such invidious discrimination....

AUSTIN AND CORPORATE EXPENDITURES

Just as the majority gives short shrift to the general societal interests at stake in campaign finance regulation, it also overlooks the distinctive considerations raised by the regulation of corporate expenditures. The majority fails to appreciate that Austin's antidistortion rationale is itself an anticorruption rationale, tied to the special concerns raised by corporations. Understood properly, “antidistortion” is simply a variant on the classic governmental interest in protecting against improper influences on officeholders that debilitate the democratic process. It is manifestly not just an ““equalizing”” ideal in disguise.

1. Antidistortion

The fact that corporations are different from human beings might seem to need no elaboration, except that the majority opinion almost completely elides it. Austin set forth some of the basic differences. Unlike natural persons, corporations have “limited liability” for their owners and managers, “perpetual life,” separation of ownership and control, “and favorable treatment of the accumulation and distribution of assets...that enhance their ability to attract capital and to deploy their resources in ways that maximize the return on their shareholders’ investments.” “[T]he resources in the treasury of a business corporation [are] not an indication of popular support for the corporation’s political ideas.” “They reflect instead the economically motivated decisions of investors and customers. The availability of these resources may make a corporation a formidable political presence, even though the power of the corporation may be no reflection of the power of its ideas.” [Corporations] help structure and facilitate the activities of human beings, to be sure, and their “personhood” often serves as a useful legal fiction. But they are not themselves members of “We the People” by whom and for whom our Constitution was established. These basic points help explain why corporate electioneering is not only more likely to impair compelling governmental interests, but also why restrictions on that electioneering are less likely to encroach upon First Amendment freedoms....

...Recognizing the weakness of a speaker-based critique of Austin, the Court places primary emphasis not on the corporation’s right to electioneer, but rather on the listener’s interest in hearing what every possible speaker may have to say.

[There] are many flaws in this argument. [Austin] recognized that there are substantial reasons why a legislature might conclude that unregulated general treasury expenditures will give corporations “unfai[r] influence” in the electoral process and distort public debate in ways that undermine rather than advance the interests of listeners. [In] addition to [the] drowning out of noncorporate voices, [corporate] “domination” of electioneering can generate the impression that corporations dominate our democracy. [Citizens] may lose faith in their capacity, as citizens, to influence public policy. [The] predictable result is cynicism and disenchantment. [The] Court’s facile depiction of corporate electioneering assumes away all of these complexities....

2. Shareholder Protection

There is yet another way in which laws such as §203 can serve First Amendment values. Interwoven with Austin’s concern to protect the integrity of the electoral process is a concern to protect the rights of shareholders from a kind of coerced [speech]. When corporations use general treasury funds to praise or attack a particular candidate for office, it is the shareholders [who] are effectively footing the bill. Those shareholders who disagree with the corporation’s electoral message may find their financial investments being used to undermine their political convictions. [Austin’s] acceptance of restrictions on general treasury spending “simply allows people who have invested in the business corporation for purely economic reasons”—the vast majority of investors, one assumes—to avoid being taken advantage of, without sacrificing their economic objectives.”

The concern to protect dissenting shareholders and union members has a long history in campaign finance reform. [Indeed], we have unanimously recognized the governmental interest in “protect[ing] the individuals who have paid money into a corporation or union for purposes other than the support of candidates from having that money used to support political candidates to whom they may be opposed.” [See section E infra.]

V

...Our colleagues have arrived at the conclusion that Austin must be overruled [only] after mischaracterizing both the reach and rationale of [the relevant] authorities, and after bypassing or ignoring rules of judicial restraint used to cabin the Court’s lawmaking power. [While] American democracy is imperfect, few outside the majority of this Court would have thought its flaws included a dearth of corporate money in politics....

Note: Reflections on Citizens United

Consider the following views:

- a. Ansolabehere, Arizona Free Enterprise v. Bennett and the Problem of Campaign Finance, 2011 Sup. Ct. Rev. 39, 71–77:

Since the 1970s, political scientists have documented severe inequities in the amount of money raised and spent by candidates. [If] the ultimate objective is to create a robust marketplace of ideas where the public can learn about the choices and reach a reasoned judgment, then the approach in Buckley, [Bennett, and Citizens United] has failed. Campaign finance law in the United States has not served the ultimate purpose of the First Amendment. Rather, it has generally produced elections with one-sided political competition—a lecture, not a debate.

The past forty years of full private financing of elections have exposed serious deficiencies—especially the inadequacy of resources, the threat of corruption and bias, and the public distrust that such an approach engenders. As the Court continues to push the United States away from more modest attempts at campaign finance regulation, then, it is increasingly pushing public policy toward the one alternative that many conservatives most abhor: full public financing of all federal elections....

b. In Brown & Martin, Rhetoric and Reality: Testing the Harm of Campaign Spending, 90 NYU L. Rev. 1066 (2015), the authors note that the Court in Citizens United insisted that any perceptions members of the public might have that their elected representatives are ingratiated to large donors “would not undermine the electorate’s faith in democracy.” The authors argue that “a loss of faith by the electorate implicates a central constitutional value and is a sufficiently compelling interest to justify campaign finance regulation.” Moreover, they offer empirical evidence to demonstrate that “the Court should not have been so confident that the electorate’s faith in democracy is unaffected either by the appearance of influence or access due to campaign spending or by independent expenditures.” If it is true that large campaign expenditures undermine the faith of citizens in democracy, should that be a sufficiently compelling concern to justify otherwise unconstitutional campaign finance restrictions?

c. In Western Tradition Partnership, Inc. v. Attorney General of Montana, 271 P. 3d 1 (2010), the Montana Supreme Court distinguished Citizens United and upheld a Montana law providing that “a corporation may not make...an expenditure in connection with a candidate or a political party.” The Montana court explained that in Citizens United the Court “found that the Government did not claim that corporate expenditures had actually corrupted the political process and concluded that ‘independent expenditures, including those made by corporations, do not give rise to corruption or the appearance of corruption.’” Thus, the Court in Citizens United “determined that the government had not provided a compelling interest to justify the speech restriction at issue.” In Western Tradition Partnership, however, the Montana court found that the state had presented sufficient evidence to satisfy the strict scrutiny standard of Citizens United.

Specifically, the Montana court observed that Montana had had a long and bitter history in which its political elections had been dominated by “mining and industrial enterprises controlled by foreign trusts or corporations.” Indeed, it was precisely that history that had led the state to enact the challenged law in the first place. Moreover, the Montana court pointed to recent studies that showed that prior to Citizens United the “percentage of campaign contributions from individual voters drops sharply from 48% in states with restrictions on corporate spending to 23% in states without.” Thus, the court concluded that the challenged statute furthered “the compelling interest of the people of Montana in strong voter participation in the process.”

In American Tradition Partnership, Inc. v. Bullock, 567 U.S. 516 (2012), the Supreme Court summarily reversed in a per curiam opinion, declaring that “Montana’s arguments...either were already rejected in Citizens United, or fail to meaningfully distinguish that case.” Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Ginsburg, Sotomayor, and Kagan, dissented: “[E]ven if I were to accept Citizens United, this Court’s legal conclusion should not bar the Montana Supreme Court’s finding, made on the record before it, that independent expenditures by corporations did in fact lead to corruption or the appearance of corruption in Montana,” contrary to the Court’s assertion in Citizens United. [Thus,] Montana’s experience, like considerable experience elsewhere since the Court’s decision in Citizens United, casts grave doubt on the Court’s supposition that independent expenditures do not corrupt or appear to do so.”

d. SuperPacs. What is the connection between Citizens United and the sudden emergence since 2010 of so-called SuperPacs, which now raise and spend unlimited amounts of money in the electoral process? Political organizations known as 527s (a reference to a provision of the Internal Revenue Code) raised money from contributions and then make independent expenditures (that is, expenditures that are not coordinated with any candidate) to support or oppose the election of federal candidates. Prior to Citizens United, 527s were governed by provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Act. Those provisions prohibited individuals from contributing more than $5,000 in any calendar year to any 527 and from contributing more than $69,900 in total to 527s over the course of two years. Thus, although 527s could spend as much as they wished to support or oppose the election of federal candidates, they could not receive large contributions. Until Citizens United, no one questioned the constitutionality of this scheme.

In SpeechNow.org v. Federal Election Commission, 599 F.3d 686 (D.C. Cir. 2010), however, the D.C. Circuit held that, in light of Citizens United, those limitations on 527s were unconstitutional. The court explained:

[The] Supreme Court has recognized only one interest as sufficiently important to outweigh the First Amendment interests implicated by contributions for political speech: preventing corruption or the appearance of corruption. [In] Citizens United, [the] Court held that the government has no anti-corruption interest in limiting independent expenditures. [The] Court stated, “[W]e now conclude that independent expenditures, including those made by corporations, do not give rise to corruption or the appearance of corruption.” [The Court justified this conclusion by rejecting the logic of McConnell and other prior decisions, and narrowly construing the concept of corruption as limited only to the interest in preventing the reality or appearance of quid pro quo corruption].

In light of the Court’s holding as a matter of law that independent expenditures do not corrupt or create the appearance of quid pro quo corruption, contributions to groups that make only independent expenditures also cannot corrupt or create the appearance of corruption. The Court has effectively held that there is no corrupting “quid” for which a candidate might in exchange offer a corrupt “quo.¹⁰”

Given this analysis from Citizens United, we must conclude that the government has no anti-corruption interest in limiting contributions to an independent expenditure group such as SpeechNow. This simplifies the task of weighing the First Amendment interests implicated by contributions to SpeechNow against the government’s interest in limiting such contributions. [After all], “something...outweighs nothing every time.”...

For criticism of the conception of corruption that underlies the Court’s decision in Citizens United, see Z. Teachout, Corruption in America (2014), which argues that the modern Supreme Court has ignored the way earlier generations conceived of corruption.

McCUTCHEON v. FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION, 572 U.S. -- (2014). The federal Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act imposes two types of limits on campaign contributions. The first, called base limits, restricts how much money a donor may contribute to a particular candidate or committee. The second, called aggregate limits, restricts how much money a donor may contribute in total to all candidates or committees. In Buckley, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the base contribution limits. This case concerned the constitutionality of the aggregate contribution limits.

For the 2013–2014 election cycle, the aggregate limits permitted an individual to contribute a total of $48,600 to federal candidates and a total of $74,600 to other political committees. In the 2011–2012 election cycle, Shaun McCutcheon contributed a total of $33,088 to sixteen different federal candidates, in compliance with the then-applicable base limits. McCutcheon wanted to contribute $1,776 to each of twelve additional candidates, but was prevented from doing so by the aggregate limit on contributions to candidates. He also wanted to contribute to several additional political committees, including $25,000 to each of the three Republican national party committees, but again he was prevented from doing so by the aggregate limit on contributions to political committees. The Republican National Committee wanted to receive the contributions that McCutcheon and other potential contributors wanted to make to it—contributions otherwise permissible under the base limits for national party committees, but foreclosed by the aggregate limit on contributions to political committees.

In June 2012, McCutcheon and the RNC filed a complaint before a three-judge panel of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, maintaining that the aggregate limits on contributions to candidates and to noncandidate political committees were unconstitutional under the First Amendment. The three-judge court dismissed the complaint, holding that the aggregate limits survived First Amendment scrutiny.

The Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision, held the aggregate contribution limits unconstitutional. Chief Justice Roberts announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion, in which Justices Scalia, Kennedy, and Alito joined:

“The right to participate in democracy through political contributions is protected by the First Amendment, but that right is not absolute. Our cases have held that Congress may regulate campaign contributions to protect against corruption or the appearance of corruption. [Citing Buckley.] At the same time, we have made clear that Congress may not regulate contributions simply to reduce the amount of money in politics, or to restrict the political participation of some in order to enhance the relative influence of others. [Citing Bennett]....

“In a series of cases over the past 40 years, we have spelled out how to draw the constitutional line between the permissible goal of avoiding corruption in the political process and the impermissible desire simply to limit political speech. We have said that government regulation may not target the general gratitude a candidate may feel toward those who support him or his allies, or the political access such support may afford. [Any] regulation must instead target what we have called ‘quid pro quo’ corruption or its appearance. That Latin phrase captures the notion of a direct exchange of an official act for money. [Campaign] finance restrictions that pursue other objectives...impermissibly inject the Government ‘into the debate over who should govern.’ [Quoting Bennett.]

“The statute at issue in this case [restricts] how much money a donor may contribute in total to all candidates or committees. This case does not involve any challenge to the base limits, which we have previously upheld as serving the permissible objective of combatting corruption. [We conclude] that the aggregate limits do little, if anything, to address that concern, while seriously restricting participation in the democratic process. The aggregate limits are therefore invalid under the First Amendment....

“To put it in the simplest terms, the aggregate limits prohibit an individual from fully contributing to the campaigns of [all the candidates he wants to support], even if all contributions fall within the base limits Congress views as adequate to protect against corruption. [It] is no answer to say that the individual can simply contribute less money to more people. To require one person to contribute at lower levels than others because he wants to support more candidates or causes is to impose a special burden on broader participation in the democratic process....

“With the significant First Amendment costs for individual citizens in mind, we turn to the governmental interests asserted in this case. This Court has identified only one legitimate governmental interest for restricting campaign finances: preventing corruption or the appearance of corruption. We have consistently rejected attempts to suppress campaign speech based on other legislative objectives. No matter how desirable it may seem, it is not an acceptable governmental objective to ‘level the playing field,’ or to ‘level electoral opportunities,’ or to ‘equaliz[e] the financial resources of candidates.’....

“Moreover, while preventing corruption or its appearance is a legitimate objective, Congress may target only a specific type of corruption—‘quid pro quo’ corruption. [Spending] large sums of money in connection with elections, but not in connection with an effort to control the exercise of an officeholder’s official duties, does not give rise to such quid pro quo corruption. Nor does the possibility that an individual who spends large sums may garner ‘influence over or access to’ elected officials or political parties....

“‘When the Government restricts speech, the Government bears the burden of proving the constitutionality of its actions.’ Here, the Government seeks to carry that burden by arguing that the aggregate limits further the permissible objective of preventing quid pro quo corruption. The difficulty is that once the aggregate limits kick in, they ban all contributions of any amount. But Congress’s selection of a $5,200 base limit indicates its belief that contributions of that amount or less do not create a cognizable risk of corruption....

“For the past 40 years, our campaign finance jurisprudence has focused on the need to preserve authority for the Government to combat corruption, without at the same time compromising the political responsiveness at the heart of the democratic process, or allowing the Government to favor some participants in that process over others. [The] Government has a strong interest, no less critical to our democratic system, in combatting corruption and its appearance. We have, however, held that this interest must be limited to a specific kind of corruption—quid pro quo corruption—in order to ensure that the Government’s efforts do not have the effect of restricting the First Amendment right of citizens to choose who shall govern them. [We] conclude that the aggregate limits on contributions do not further the only governmental interest this Court accepted as legitimate in Buckley. They instead intrude without justification on a citizen’s ability to exercise ‘the most fundamental First Amendment activities.’”

Justice Thomas concurred in the judgment: “I adhere to the view that this Court’s decision in Buckley denigrates core First Amendment speech and should be overruled. [Contributions] to political campaigns, no less than direct expenditures, ‘generate essential political speech’ by fostering discussion of public issues and candidate qualifications. [This] case represents yet another missed opportunity to right the course of our campaign finance jurisprudence by restoring a standard that is faithful to the First Amendment.”

Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Ginsburg, Sotomayor, and Kagan, dissented: “Taken together with Citizens United, today’s decision eviscerates our Nation’s campaign finance laws, leaving a remnant incapable of dealing with the grave problems of democratic legitimacy that those laws were intended to resolve. The plurality’s [claim] that large aggregate contributions do not ‘give rise’ to ‘corruption’ is plausible only because the plurality defines ‘corruption’ too narrowly. [Its] definition of ‘corruption’ is inconsistent with the Court’s prior case law (with the possible exception of Citizens United) [and] it misunderstands the constitutional importance of the interests at stake. [The] history of campaign finance reform shows [that] the anticorruption interest that drives Congress to regulate campaign contributions is a far broader, more important interest than the plurality acknowledges. It is an interest in maintaining the integrity of our public governmental institutions. And it is an interest rooted in the Constitution and in the First Amendment itself. [Speech] does not exist in a vacuum. Rather, political communication seeks to secure government action. A politically oriented ‘marketplace of ideas’ seeks to form a public opinion that can and will influence elected representatives. This is not a new idea. [Citing Whitney v. California (Brandeis, J., concurring).] [Accordingly], the First Amendment advances not only the individual’s right to engage in political speech, but also the public’s interest in preserving a democratic order in which collective speech matters.

“What has this to do with corruption? It has everything to do with corruption. Corruption breaks the constitutionally necessary ‘chain of communication’ between the people and their representatives. [Where] enough money calls the tune, the general public will not be heard. Insofar as corruption cuts the link between political thought and political action, a free marketplace of political ideas loses its point. [The] ‘appearance of corruption’ can make matters worse. It can lead the public to believe that its efforts to communicate with its representatives or to help sway public opinion have little purpose. And a cynical public can lose interest in political participation altogether. The upshot is that the interests the Court has long described as preventing ‘corruption’ or the ‘appearance of corruption’ are more than ordinary factors to be weighed against the constitutional right to political speech. Rather, they are interests rooted in the First Amendment itself. They are rooted in the constitutional effort to create a democracy responsive to the people—a government where laws reflect the very thoughts, views, ideas, and sentiments, the expression of which the First Amendment protects. Given that end, we can and should understand campaign finance laws as resting upon a broader and more significant constitutional rationale than the plurality’s limited definition of ‘corruption’ suggests. We should see these laws as seeking in significant part to strengthen, rather than weaken, the First Amendment. To say this is not to deny the potential for conflict between (1) the need to permit contributions that pay for the diffusion of ideas, and (2) the need to limit payments in order to help maintain the integrity of the electoral process. But that conflict takes place within, not outside, the First Amendment’s boundaries....

“Here, as in Buckley, in the absence of limits on aggregate political contributions, donors can and likely will find ways to channel millions of dollars to parties and to individual candidates, [producing] ‘corruption’ or ‘appearance of corruption.’ The methods for using today’s opinion to evade the law’s individual contribution limits are complex, but they are well known, or will become well known, to party fundraisers. [Justice Breyer then described three such methods in detail.] The plurality [substitutes its limited understanding] of how the political process works for the understanding of Congress, [and in so doing it] creates huge loopholes in the law [and] undermines, perhaps devastates, what remains of campaign finance reform.”

Consider the following views:

a. Hellman, Defining Corruption and Constitutionalizing Democracy, 111 Mich. L. Rev. 1385 (2013):

The main front in the battle over the constitutionality of campaign finance laws has long focused on defining corruption. [But] corruption is a derivative concept, meaning it depends on a theory of the institution or official involved. [What] constitutes corruption in a democracy depends on a theory of democracy. To put the point in a more grounded fashion, what constitutes corruption of legislators depends on a view of the proper basis for decisionmaking by elected officials. [Our] campaign finance case law contains at least three distinct conceptions of legislative corruption. I call these “corruption as the deformation of judgment,” “corruption as the distortion of influence,” and “corruption as the sale of favors.”...

On one view, a legislator ought to exercise his own independent judgment about each decision he faces. [The] legislator, according to this view, should consider only the merits-based reasons that bear on the decision at hand. [Corruption as the “deformation of judgment”] occurs when non-merits-based factors influence the legislator’s judgment....

Corruption as the distortion of influence sees the legislator as properly attentive to the desires and preferences of those he represents. In a well-functioning democracy, the legislator responds to these desires and preferences. [On this view,] corruption occurs when a legislator weighs the preferences of some too heavily, especially when the legislator considers the wishes of wealthy contributors more than others....

A third view of proper legislative conduct [requires] only that the legislator not actually exchange votes or favors for money. [Corruption], on this view, is narrowly defined as quid pro quo corruption—that is, the sale of some public favor....

[W]hen the Court defines corruption [in its campaign finance case law], it inescapably puts forward a conception of the proper role of a legislator in a democracy. That is a task that the Court should be cautious to take up. [Because there] are many reasonable ways to instantiate representative democracy, [we] should eschew judicial actions that adopt one view of representative democracy [over another]. Because judicial pronouncements about what constitutes corruption entail commitments to contested conceptions of democracy, there are strong reasons for courts to avoid defining corruption.

b. R. Post, Citizens Divided: Campaign Finance Reform and the Constitution 4, 60–65 (2014):

[F]irst Amendment rights presuppose that elections [have] the property of choosing candidates whom the people trust [to act in their interests]. If the people do not believe that elected officials listen to public opinion, participation in public discourse, no matter how free, cannot create the experience of self-government. [The] democratic structure and legitimacy of our government depend on [this understanding of] electoral integrity.

Yet the Court in its campaign finance opinions has not considered the state's interest in promoting the electoral integrity required by the First Amendment. The Court has instead been preoccupied by the attempt to balance First Amendment rights against the need to prevent [quid pro quo] corruption....

If [we] reformulate our campaign finance jurisprudence upon the principle of electoral integrity, [we] may create a more enduring foundation for the contested area of campaign finance reform. [This] formulation of the issue [requires] us merely to affirm [that] Americans cannot maintain the blessings of self-government unless they believe that elections produce representatives who are responsive to public opinion. [Electoral] integrity is a compelling government interest because without it Americans have no reason to exercise the communicative rights guaranteed by the First Amendment.

[There] are good reasons to worry that electoral integrity is today under threat. Americans' trust and confidence in their representative institutions has fallen to record lows; we are [experiencing] what most regard as a crisis of representation. In such circumstances it is especially disappointing that the Court seems unwilling to recognize even the existence of the constitutional principle of electoral integrity....

c. Lessig, What an Originalist Would Understand “Corruption” to Mean, 102 Cal. L. Rev. 1, 3–11 (2014):

The United States [effectively] has two distinct elections. One election is discrete—call it the “voting election.” [All] “voters” are permitted to participate in that election. [The] other election is continuous—call it the “money election.” It happens throughout the election cycle. Any citizen [is] permitted to participate in that money election. [To] be allowed to run in the voting election [one] has to do extremely well in the money election. [In] the 2012 election cycle, 84 percent of the House candidates and 67 percent of the Senate candidates with more money than their opponents won. [The] money election produces a subtle, perhaps camouflaged bending [of the process] to keep the funders of the money election happy. [Importantly,] the relevant number of funders is [small]. [In] the 2012 presidential election 0.000032 percent [of Americans]—or 99 Americans—provided 60 percent of the individual Super PAC money spent....

[The] way we fund elections has created a dependency that conflicts with the dependency intended by the Constitution. That conflict is a corruption. [In] the Framers’ language, [the concept of “corruption”] included a collective sense—the corruption of an institution, or a people, and not just a person. [Congress] was intended to be “dependent on the people alone.” It has become dependent upon an additional dependence, “the funders” of campaigns. Because of who “the funders” are, this additional dependence is a conflicting dependence, and that conflict constitutes “corruption.”

This sense of corruption [was] perfectly familiar to the Framers. [For] the Framers, Congress was [to] have an intended dependence. That dependence was to be, as James Madison wrote in The Federalist No. 52, “on the people.” [For the Framers,] the anti-corruption challenge was [how to protect the institution] from improper dependence. [It] is this fact that makes the current Supreme Court’s jurisprudence about “corruption” so weird. [Only] a non-originalist could embrace [the Court’s] position.

d. L. Tribe and J. Matz, Uncertain Justice: The Roberts Court and the Constitution 100–101, 104–105, 108–109, 112–113 (2014):

Citizens United decisively rejected the anti-distortion justification for campaign finance laws....To be sure, money can powerfully advantage a speaker in the marketplace of ideas [and] concentrated wealth, left unregulated, can create a risk that most headlines and TV ads will be controlled by a small group....Still, it would be a mistake to leave judgments about the “proper” distribution of speech to politicians. Arming them with a roving license to level the playing field by silencing or adjusting the volume of disfavored speakers is an invitation to self-serving behavior and, ultimately, tyranny. The anti-distortion argument can too easily lead down this dangerous path, and [the Court] rightly discarded it....

[Another argument made against the Court's approach in these cases focuses on a broad conception of "corruption."] "Corruption," in this view, occurs when politicians become dependent on a wealthy clique and government is no longer responsive to the public interest. [The justices in the majority in these cases] are unreservedly hostile to such arguments. They worry that noble-sounding rationales for campaign finance laws can too easily conceal efforts by incumbents to protect themselves and punish their enemies. [The Court has not adopted] a narrow definition of corruption because it is naïve or apathetic. It has done so because it doubts that the Court [can] create workable First Amendment law that adequately guards against abuse by politicians. Embracing a broader view of the anti-corruption interest risked creating an exception that swallowed the rule....

In an age of political dysfunction, the extraordinary sums of money that candidates avidly pursue present hard questions about how to reconcile competing national values. [The Court's decisions in these cases will likely affect] policy outcomes by causing an across-the-board realignment of government priorities toward interests backed by big money. Every capable politician has an eye on the next election and a keen sense of who provided support last time, who didn't, who might be persuaded to shift their opinions, and how that might be achieved. [The Court's decisions are] therefore likely to trigger a self-reinforcing cycle. [As] the group of victorious candidates comes to consist mainly of politicians who can successfully navigate these structures and depend on them for reelection, the impetus for change among officeholders will fade. [Perhaps the best solution would be the enactment of new disclosure requirements.] In the post-Citizens United era, transparency would provide at least a measure of reassurance....

e. Given that the Court has dismissed the equality, corruption, and distortion justifications for campaign finance regulation, might the case for such regulation be strengthened by invoking an "alignment" rationale? That is, is it a problem for democracy if elected officials systematically do not represent the interests of the majority of their constituents? Consider the fact that "individuals who contribute at least $200 to federal candidates are overwhelmingly wealthy, highly educated, male, and white." In 2012, "these donors amounted to just 0.4% of the population, but supplied 64% of the funds received by candidates from individuals.” Does it matter that individuals falling within this select group tend to hold views on critical issues of public policy that are very different from those of the majority of the American people, and that legislators tend to act in accord with the views of this tiny minority of very wealthy individuals, even when they conflict with the views of the vast majority of their constituents? Is such “non-alignment” between the views of American citizens and the votes of their elected representatives a sufficiently important concern in a democracy to justify campaign finance regulations of the sort that have thus far been invalidated by the Supreme Court? See Stephanopoulos, Aligning Campaign Finance Law, 101 Va. L. Rev. 1425 (2015).

For an excellent overview of the evolution of the Supreme Court’s jurisprudence in this line of cases, and for an analysis of the fundamental shift caused by the appointments of John Roberts and Samuel Alito to replace William Rehnquist and Sandra Day O’Connor, see Kang, The Brave New World of Party Campaign Finance Law, 101 Cornell L. Rev. 531 (2016).

g. In Six Amendments: How and Why We Should Change the Constitution (2014), former Justice John Paul Stevens proposed the following amendment to the Constitution: “Neither the First Amendment nor any other provision of this Constitution shall be construed to prohibit the Congress or any state from imposing reasonable limits on the amount of money that candidates for public office, or their supporters, may spend in election campaigns.”

Note: Additional Regulation of the Electoral Process

1. Prohibiting paid petitioners. In Meyer v. Grant, 486 U.S. 414 (1988), the Court invalidated a Colorado statute prohibiting the use of paid circulators to obtain signatures for petitions to qualify proposed state constitutional amendments for inclusion on the general election ballot:

The refusal to permit appellees to pay petition circulators restricts political expression in two ways: First, it limits the number of voices who will convey appellees’ message and the hours they can speak and, therefore, limits the size of the audience they can reach. Second, it makes it less likely that appellees will garner the number of signatures necessary to place the matter on the ballot, thus limiting their ability to make the matter the focus of statewide attention. [Colorado’s] prohibition of paid petition circulators restricts access to the most effective, fundamental, and perhaps economical avenue of political discourse, direct one-on-one communication.

See also Buckley v. American Constitutional Law Foundation, 525 U.S. 182 (1999), in which the Court, relying upon Meyer, invalidated a state law providing that (a) only registered voters may circulate ballot-initiative petitions; (b) petition circulators must wear a badge identifying them by name; and (c) ballot-initiative proponents must file a report listing each petition circulator by name and stating the amount paid to each circulator.

2. Regulating campaign promises. In Brown v. Hartlage, 456 U.S. 46 (1982), petitioner, a candidate for local office in Kentucky, promised the voters that, if elected, he would reduce the salary of the office “to a more realistic level.” Petitioner was elected, but a state court declared the election void on the ground that petitioner had violated Kentucky’s Corrupt Practices Act. The Supreme Court reversed:

The [Act] prohibits a political candidate from giving, or promising to give, anything of value to a voter in exchange for his vote or support. In many of its possible applications, this provision would appear to present little constitutional difficulty, for a State may surely prohibit a candidate from buying votes. [But here, petitioner’s promise] was made openly, subject to the comment and criticism of his political opponent and to the scrutiny of the voters. [His] was a declaration of intention to exercise the fiscal powers of government office within what he believed [to] be the recognized framework of office. [Petitioner’s] promise to reduce his salary cannot be considered as inviting the kind of corrupt arrangement the appearance of which a State may have a compelling interest in avoiding.

3. Regulating the speech of judicial candidates. Minnesota elects its judges. It prohibits candidates for judicial office from announcing their views of any disputed legal issues that might come before them as judges. In Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 735 (2002), the Court, in a five-to-four decision, held that this prohibition (known as the “announce clause”) violated the first amendment.

Justice Scalia delivered the opinion of the Court. At the outset, Justice Scalia reasoned that because the “announce clause both prohibits speech on the basis of its content and burdens a category of speech that is ‘at the very core of our First Amendment freedoms’—speech about the qualifications for public office,” the State must “prove that the announce clause is (1) narrowly tailored, to serve (2) a compelling state interest.” He then observed that the State asserts two interests: “preserving the impartiality of the state judiciary and preserving the appearance of the impartiality of the state judiciary.” Defining the interest in “impartiality” as meaning that a judge should not have “a preconception in favor or against a particular legal view,” Justice Scalia said that “it is virtually impossible to find a judge who does not have preconceptions about the law,” and “pretending otherwise by attempting to preserve the ‘appearance’ of that type of impartiality can hardly be a compelling interest.”

Justice Scalia also considered another version of impartiality: “open-mindedness.” This “sort of impartiality seeks to guarantee each litigant, not an equal chance to win the legal points in the case, but at least some chance of doing so.” Justice Scalia conceded that impartiality and the appearance of impartiality in this sense “may well be...desirable in the judiciary” and that the announce clause serves these interests “because it relieves a judge from pressure to rule a certain way in order to maintain consistency with statements the judge has previously made.” Scalia nonetheless concluded, however, that “statements in election campaigns are such an infinitesimal portion of the public commitments to legal positions that judges (or judges to be) undertake, that this object of the prohibition is implausible.” Scalia offered as examples of such other statements rulings in earlier cases, statements made in classes judges teach, statements made in books, articles, speeches, and so on.

Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justices Stevens, Souter, and Breyer, dissented:

Legislative and executive officials act on behalf of the voters who placed them in office; “judge[s] represen[t] the Law.” Unlike their counterparts in the political branches, judges are expected to refrain from catering to particular constituencies or committing themselves on controversial issues in advance of adversarial presentation. [I] would differentiate elections for political offices, in which the First Amendment holds full sway, from elections designed to select those whose office it is to administer justice without respect to persons. Minnesota’s choice to elect its judges [does] not preclude [it] from installing an election process geared to the judicial office. [The] rationale underlying unconstrained speech in elections for political office—that representative government depends on the public’s ability to choose agents who will act at its behest—does not carry over to campaigns for the bench.

The Supreme Court returned to the problem posed by judicial candidates in Williams-Yulee v. Florida Bar, 575 U.S. --- (2015). On this occasion, though, the Court upheld a Florida rule that prohibited judicial candidates from “personally [soliciting] campaign funds.” Justices Scalia, Thomas, Kennedy, and Alito dissented.

Note: Regulating the Political Activities of Public Employees

1. Partisan political activity. U.S. Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 548 (1973), concerned the constitutionality of §9(a) of the Hatch Act, now codified in 5 U.S.C. §7324(a)(2), which prohibits federal employees from soliciting contributions for a partisan political purpose, taking an active part in a political campaign, soliciting votes for any candidate, or endorsing any candidate. The Court, in an opinion by Justice White, expressly reaffirmed United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75 (1947), and upheld the act:

[Until] after the Civil War, the spoils system under which federal employees came and went depending upon party service and changing administrations, was the prevalent basis for governmental employment and advancement. [That] system did not survive. [It is now] the judgment of Congress, the Executive, and the country [that] partisan political activities by federal employees must be limited if the Government is to operate effectively and fairly, elections are to play their proper part in representative government, and employees themselves are to be sufficiently free from improper influences. The restrictions [imposed] on federal employees are not aimed at particular parties, groups, or points of view, but apply equally to all partisan activities of the type described....

[The] problem in any case is to arrive at a balance between the interests of the [employee] and the [interests] of the [government]. Although Congress is free to strike a different balance than it has, [we] think the balance it [has] struck is sustainable by the obviously important interests sought to be served by [the] Hatch Act.

It seems fundamental [that] employees [of] the Government [should] administer the law in accordance with the will of Congress, rather than in accordance with [the] will of a political party. [Moreover,] it is not only important that [Government] employees in fact avoid practicing political justice, but [also] that they appear to the public to be avoiding it, if confidence in the system of representative Government is not to be eroded. [Another] major concern [is] the conviction that the rapidly expanding Government work force should not be employed to build a powerful, invincible, and perhaps corrupt political machine. [A] related concern [is] to make sure that Government employees [are] free from pressure [to] vote in a certain way or perform political chores in order to curry favor with their superiors rather than to act out of their own beliefs.

Justices Douglas, joined by Justices Brennan and Marshall, dissented: “The Hatch Act [prohibits] federal employees from taking ‘an active part in political management or in political campaigns.’ [No] one could object if employees were barred from using office time to engage in outside activities whether political or otherwise. But it is of no concern of Government what an employee does in his spare time, [unless] what he does impairs efficiency or other facets of the merits of his job. Some [activities may] affect the employee’s job performance. But his political creed, like his religion, is irrelevant. In the areas of speech, like religion, it is of no concern what the employee says in private to his wife or to the public in Constitution Hall.”

In Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601 (1973), decided on the same day as Letter Carriers, the Court upheld Oklahoma’s Merit System of Personnel Administration Act, which “serves roughly the same function as the analogous provisions of the other 49 States, and is patterned on §9(a) of the Hatch Act.” Appellants, several state employees charged with violating the Oklahoma act, maintained that the act was unconstitutionally overbroad because it had been construed to prohibit public employees from wearing political buttons and displaying political bumper stickers. Finding that appellants’ own activities could clearly be proscribed, and that the act was not “substantially” overbroad, the Court found it unnecessary to decide the overbreadth issue. See section C1 supra. Can Oklahoma constitutionally prohibit its public employees from wearing political buttons and displaying political bumper stickers? For an interesting variation, see United States v. National Treasury Employees Union, 513 U.S. 454 (1995) (invalidating a provision of the Ethics in Government Act that prohibited a broad class of government employees from accepting any compensation for making speeches or writing articles without regard to whether the subject of the speech or article or the person or group paying the honorarium had any connection with the employee’s official duties).

2. Criticizing government policy. In Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968), a teacher was dismissed from his position by the Board of Education for sending a letter to a local newspaper in connection with a recently proposed tax increase that was critical of the way in which the Board and the district superintendent of schools had handled past proposals to raise new revenue for the schools. The teacher’s dismissal resulted from a determination by the Board, after a full hearing, that the publication of the letter was “detrimental to the efficient operation and administration of the schools of the district.” The Court, in an opinion by Justice Marshall, held that the teacher’s right to freedom of speech had been violated:

An examination of the statements in appellant's letter objected to by the Board reveals that [they] consist essentially of criticism of the Board's allocation of school funds between educational and athletic programs. [The] statements are in no way directed towards any person with whom appellant would normally be in contact in the course of his daily work as a teacher. Thus no question of maintaining either discipline by immediate superiors or harmony among coworkers is presented here. Appellant's employment relationships with the Board and, to a somewhat lesser extent, with the superintendent are not the kind of close working relationships for which it can persuasively be claimed that personal loyalty and confidence are necessary to their proper functioning. Accordingly, to the extent that the Board's position here can be taken to suggest that even comments on matters of public concern that are substantially correct [may] furnish grounds for dismissal if they are sufficiently critical in tone, we unequivocally reject it.

Suppose the teacher's speech had been personal in nature—for example, suppose the teacher had made statements critical of another teacher's driving, causing tension between them. Would Pickering govern? See Connick v. Meyers, 461 U.S. 138 (1983) (“when employee expression cannot fairly be considered as relating to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community, [but concerns only matters of personal interest,] officials should enjoy wide latitude in managing their offices, without intrusive oversight by the judiciary in the name of the First Amendment”); Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378 (1987) (Pickering rather than Connick governs in a situation in which a clerical employee in the office of a county constable was fired because, after hearing of an assassination attempt against the President, she remarked to a coworker, “If they go for him again, I hope they get him,” because the remark constituted speech “on a matter of public concern.”).

Suppose the teacher's statements in Pickering had been false? The Court noted in Pickering that “in a case such as this, absent proof of false statements knowingly or recklessly made by him, a teacher's exercise of his right to speak on issues of public importance may not furnish the basis for his dismissal from public employment.”

On related issues, see Waters v. Churchill, 511 U.S. 661 (1994) (there is no violation of the first amendment when a government employer fires an employee for constitutionally protected speech if the employer reasonably believed that the speech was unprotected); Board of County Commissioners, Wabaunsee County, Kansas v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668 (1996) (independent contractors are governed by Pickering); O'Hare Truck Service, Inc. v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712

(1996) (same); Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991) (government licensees, such as attorneys participating in judicial proceedings, are governed by Pickering); Tennessee Secondary School Athletic Association v. Brentwood Academy, 551 U.S. 291 (2007) (voluntary associations are governed by Pickering); Garcetti v. Ceballos, 461 U.S. 138 (2006) (public employee who speaks pursuant to a public duty is not protected by Pickering); Borough of Duryea, Pennsylvania v. Guarnieri, 564 U.S. 379 (2011) (litigation by public employees against the government is governed by public concern standard); Lane v. Franks, 134 S. Ct. 2369 (2014) (public employee who testifies under subpoena about a matter related to his public employment is protected by the First Amendment, despite Garcetti, where his testimony was not required by “his ordinary job responsibilities”). For a thoughtful analysis of the value of public employee speech, see Kitrosser, The Special Value of Public Employee Speech, 2015 Sup. Ct. Rev. 301.

3. Patronage. In December 1970, the Sheriff of Cook County, Illinois, a Republican, was replaced by Richard Elrod, a Democrat. At that time, respondents, all Republicans, were non-civil service employees of the Cook County Sheriff’s Office. Respondent Burns was a process server; respondent Vargas was a bailiff and security guard. Following prior practice, Sheriff Elrod discharged respondents from their employment solely because they did not support and were not members of the Democratic Party. In Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976), the Court held this practice unconstitutional. In a plurality opinion, Justice Brennan explained:

The [practice] of dismissing employees on a partisan basis [is] one form of the general practice of political patronage. Patronage practice is not new to American politics. It has existed at the federal level at least since the Presidency of Thomas Jefferson. [More] recent times have witnessed a strong decline in its use, [however, and] merit systems have increasingly displaced the practice. [The] cost of the practice of patronage is the restraint it places on freedoms of belief and association. In order to maintain their jobs, respondents were required to pledge their political allegiance to the Democratic Party, work for the election of other candidates of the Democratic Party, contribute a portion of their wages to the Party, or obtain the sponsorship of a member of the Party, usually at the price of one of the first three alternatives. [An] individual who is a member of the out-party maintains affiliation with his own party at the risk of losing his job.

One interest which has been offered in justification of patronage is the need to insure effective government and the efficiency of public employees. It is argued that employees of political persuasions not the same as that of the party in control of public office will not have the incentive to work effectively and may even be motivated to subvert the incumbent administration's efforts to govern effectively. We are not persuaded. [It] is doubtful that the mere difference of political persuasion motivates poor performance. [At] all events, less drastic means for insuring government effectiveness and employee efficiency are available to the State. Specifically, employees may always be discharged for good cause, such as insubordination or poor job performance, when those bases in fact exist....

A second interest advanced in support of patronage is the need for political loyalty of employees [to] the end that representative government not be undercut by tactics obstructing the implementation of policies of the new administration, policies presumably sanctioned by the electorate. The justification is not without force, but is nevertheless inadequate to validate patronage wholesale. Limiting patronage dismissals to policymaking positions is sufficient to achieve this governmental end. Nonpolicymaking individuals usually have only limited responsibility and are therefore not in a position to thwart the goals of the in-party....

Justice Powell, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Rehnquist, dissented.

See also Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507 (1980) (the position of assistant public defender is not a “policymaking” position within the meaning of Elrod and the first amendment therefore prohibits the discharge of two assistant public defenders solely because they were Republicans and were unable to provide the necessary Democratic sponsorship when a Democratic Public Defender took office); Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62 (1990) (rejecting the argument that only those employment decisions that are the “substantial equivalent of a dismissal” violate a public employee’s rights under the first amendment and holding that Elrod also governs decisions about hiring, “promotions, transfers and recalls after layoffs based on political affiliation or support”); O’Hare Truck Service, Inc. v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712 (1996) (Elrod protects independent contractors as well as government employees.).

Note: Content-Neutral Restrictions—Final Thoughts

Consider the following evaluation: The Court has long recognized that by limiting the availability of particular means of communication, content-neutral restrictions can significantly impair the ability of individuals to communicate their views to others. This is a central first amendment concern. The Court generally tests content-neutral restrictions with an implicit balancing approach: The greater the interference with the opportunities for free expression, the greater the burden on government to justify the restriction. When the challenged restriction has a relatively severe effect, the Court invokes strict scrutiny. See, e.g., Button; Buckley (expenditure limitations); Roberts. When the challenged restriction has a significant, but not severe, effect, the Court employs intermediate scrutiny. See, e.g., Schneider; Buckley (contribution limitations); Martin. And when the restriction has a relatively modest effect, the Court applies deferential scrutiny. See, e.g., O'Brien; Heffron, section E2b, supra; Clark, section E2a. There are exceptions to this pattern, and the exceptions are often quite revealing, for they suggest the impact of additional factors, such as “public property” or “incidental effect,” that may trump the central concern of content-neutral analysis. But the general pattern is clear: As the restrictive effect increases, the standard of review increases as well. Is this an accurate description of the Court’s analysis? If so, does it reflect a satisfactory approach? See Stone, Content-Neutral Restrictions, 54 U. Chi. L. Rev. 46 (1987).

F. FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

This section examines the first amendment’s guarantee of “freedom [of] the press.” The focus is on four questions. First, in what circumstances, if any, is the press, because of its constitutionally protected status, exempt from laws of otherwise general application? Second, to what extent, if any, does the first amendment guarantee a right to “gather” news? Third, in what circumstances, if any, may government treat the press differently from other institutions? Fourth, in what circumstances, if any, may government regulate the press in order to improve the “marketplace of ideas”?

1. A “Preferred” Status for the Press?

The first amendment prohibits any law “abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press.” Does the press clause confer any rights that would not be conferred by the speech clause alone? Consider the views of Justice Stewart and Chief Justice Burger:

- a. Stewart, “Or of the Press,” 26 Hastings L.J. 631, 633–634 (1975):

The publishing business is the only organized private business that is given explicit constitutional protection. [If] the Free Press guarantee meant no more than freedom of expression, it would be a constitutional redundancy. [By] including both [the speech and press] guarantees in the First Amendment, the Founders quite clearly recognized the distinction between the two. [In] setting up the three branches of the Federal Government, the Founders deliberately created an internally competitive system. [The] primary purpose of the constitutional guarantee of a free press was [to] create a fourth institution outside the Government as an additional check on the three official branches. [The] relevant metaphor [is that] of the Fourth Estate. [The first amendment thus protects] the institutional autonomy of the press.

- b. First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 797–801 (1978) (Burger, C.J., concurring):

[There are those] who view the Press Clause as somehow conferring special and extraordinary privileges or status on the “institutional press.” [I] perceive two fundamental difficulties with [such a] reading of the Press Clause. First, although certainty on this point is not possible, the history of the Clause does not suggest that the authors contemplated a “special” or “institutional” privilege. [Most] pre-First Amendment commentators “who employed the term ‘freedom of speech’ [used] it synonymously with freedom of the press.” [The] second fundamental difficulty with interpreting the Press Clause as conferring special status on a limited group is one of definition. [The] very task of including some entities within the “institutional press” while excluding others [is] reminiscent of the abhorred licensing system [that] the First Amendment was intended to ban. [In my view,] the First Amendment does not “belong” to any definable category of persons or entities: It belongs to all who exercise its freedoms.

Consider also Associated Press v. NLRB, 301 U.S. 103 (1937). The Associated Press is a cooperative organization whose members in 1937 included approximately 1,350 newspapers. It collects, compiles, and distributes news to its members. The NLRB found that the Associated Press discharged an employee in violation of section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, which confers on employees the right to organize and to bargain collectively. The Court, in a five-to-four decision, held that application of section 7 to the Associated Press did not violate the first amendment:

The business of the Associated Press is not immune from regulation because it is an agency of the press. The publisher of a newspaper has no special immunity from the application of general laws. He has no special privilege to invade the rights and liberties of others. He must answer for libel. He may be punished for contempt of court. He is subject to the anti-trust laws. Like others he must pay equitable and nondiscriminatory taxes on his business. The regulation here in question has no relation whatever to the impartial distribution of news.

See also Dun & Bradstreet v. Greenmoss Builders, section D1, supra (the media are not entitled to any greater protection against actions for libel than other speakers); Citizen Publishing Co. v. United States, 394 U.S. 131 (1969) (Sherman Antitrust Act); Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186 (1946) (Fair Labor Standards Act); cf. Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936) (taxation). Are these decisions consistent with Justice Stewart's contention that the "publishing business is the only organized private business that is given explicit constitutional protection"? Are there some circumstances in which the first amendment exempts the press from tax, labor, antitrust, or other laws of general application?

For a particularly thoughtful analysis of the Framers' understanding of the Press Clause, see West, The "Press," Then & Now, 77 Ohio St. L.J. 49 (2016), noting that "press freedom was of paramount importance at the time of the framing. James Madison referred to liberty of the press as one of the 'choicest privileges of the people' and proposed language to make press freedom 'inviolable.' So clear was the significance of securing freedom of the press that it surpassed even the push for speech rights."

2. A Right to "Gather" News?

Branzburg v. Hayes

408 U.S. 665 (1972)

Opinion of the Court by MR. JUSTICE WHITE....

[Branzburg, a newspaper reporter, published several articles describing unlawful drug activities in Frankfort, Kentucky. He refused, on first amendment grounds, to disclose to a state grand jury the identities of the persons whose activities he had described.]

The issue in these cases is whether requiring newsmen to appear and testify before state or federal grand juries abridges the freedom of speech and press guaranteed by the First Amendment. We hold that it does not.

Petitioners [press] First Amendment claims that may be simply put: that to gather news it is often necessary to agree either not to identify the source of information published or to publish only part of the facts revealed, or both; that if the reporter is nevertheless forced to reveal these confidences to a grand jury, the source so identified and other confidential sources of other reporters will be measurably deterred from furnishing publishable information, all to the detriment of the free flow of information protected by the First Amendment. Although the newsmen [do] not claim an absolute privilege against official interrogation in all circumstances, they assert that the reporter should not be forced either to appear or to testify before a grand jury or at trial until and unless sufficient grounds are shown for believing that the reporter possesses information relevant to a crime the grand jury is investigating, that the information the reporter has is unavailable from other sources, and that the need for the information is sufficiently compelling to override the claimed invasion of First Amendment interests occasioned by the disclosure. [The] heart of the claim is that the burden on news gathering resulting from compelling reporters to disclose confidential information outweighs any public interest in obtaining the information.

We do not question the significance of free speech, press, or assembly to the country's welfare. Nor is it suggested that news gathering does not qualify for First Amendment protection; without some protection for seeking out the news, freedom of the press could be eviscerated. But these cases involve no [restriction] on what the press may publish, and no express or implied command that the press publish what it prefers to withhold. [The] use of confidential sources by the press is not forbidden or restricted. [The] sole issue before us is the obligation of reporters to respond to grand jury subpoenas as other citizens do and to answer questions relevant to an investigation into the commission of crime....

[The] First Amendment does not invalidate every incidental burdening of the press that may result from the enforcement of civil or criminal statutes of general applicability. [Citing Associated Press v. NLRB; Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling.]...

It has generally been held that the First Amendment does not guarantee the press a constitutional right of special access to information not available to the public generally. [In Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1 (1965)], for example, the Court sustained the Government's refusal to validate passports to Cuba even though that restriction "render[ed] less than wholly free the flow of information concerning that country." The ban on travel was held constitutional, for "[t]he right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information."

Despite the fact that news gathering may be hampered, the press is regularly excluded from grand jury proceedings, our own conferences, the meetings of other official bodies gathered in executive session, and the meetings of private organizations. Newsmen have no constitutional right of access to the scenes of crime or disaster when the general public is excluded, and they may be prohibited from [attending] trials if such restrictions are necessary to assure a defendant a fair trial before an impartial tribunal....

It is thus not surprising that the great weight of authority is that newsmen are not exempt from the normal duty of appearing before a grand jury and answering questions relevant to a criminal investigation. [The] prevailing constitutional view of the newsman's privilege is very much rooted in the ancient role of the grand jury. [Because] its task is to inquire into the existence of possible criminal conduct and to return only well-founded indictments, its investigative powers are necessarily broad. [On] the records now before us, we perceive no basis for holding that the public interest in law enforcement and in ensuring effective grand jury proceedings is insufficient to override the consequential, but uncertain, burden on news gathering that is said to result from insisting that reporters, like other citizens, respond to relevant questions put to them in the course of a valid grand jury investigation or criminal trial.

This conclusion [does not] threaten the vast bulk of confidential relationships between reporters and their sources. [Only] where news sources themselves are implicated in crime or possess information relevant to the grand jury's task need they or the reporter be concerned about grand jury subpoenas. Nothing before us indicates that a large number or percentage of all confidential news sources falls into either category and would in any way be deterred by our holding....

[Moreover, although the] argument that the flow of news will be diminished by compelling reporters to aid the grand jury in a criminal investigation is not [irrational, we] remain unclear how often and to what extent informers are actually deterred from furnishing information when newsmen are forced to testify before a grand jury. [The] evidence fails to demonstrate that there would be a significant constriction of the flow of news to the public if this Court reaffirms the prior common-law and constitutional rule regarding the testimonial obligations of newsmen.³³

[Furthermore, the] administration of a constitutional newsman's privilege would present practical and conceptual difficulties of a high order. Sooner or later, it would be necessary to define those categories of newsmen who qualified for the privilege, a questionable procedure in light of the traditional doctrine that liberty of the press is the right of the lonely pamphleteer [just] as much as of the large metropolitan publisher. [Almost] any author may [assert] that he is contributing to the flow of information to the public, that he relies on confidential sources of information, and that these sources will be silenced if he is forced to make disclosures before a grand jury.

In each instance where a reporter is subpoenaed to testify, the courts would also be embroiled in preliminary factual and legal determinations with respect to whether the proper predicate had been laid for the reporter's appearance: Is there probable cause to believe a crime has been committed? Is it likely that the reporter has useful information gained in confidence? Could the grand jury obtain the information elsewhere? Is the official interest sufficient to outweigh the claimed privilege?...

Finally, as we have earlier indicated, news gathering is not without its First Amendment protections, and grand jury investigations if instituted or conducted other than in good faith, would pose wholly different issues for resolution under the First Amendment. Official harassment of the press undertaken not for purposes of law enforcement but to disrupt a reporter's relationship with his news sources would have no justification. Grand juries are subject to judicial control and subpoenas to motions to quash. We do not expect courts will forget that grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment....

MR. JUSTICE POWELL, concurring.

I add this brief statement to emphasize what seems to me to be the limited nature of the Court's holding. The Court does not hold that newsmen, subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury, are without constitutional rights with respect to the gathering of news or in safeguarding their sources....

As indicated in the concluding portion of the opinion, the Court states that no harassment of newsmen will be tolerated. If a newsmen believes that the grand jury investigation is not being conducted in good faith he is not without remedy. Indeed, if the newsmen is called upon to give information bearing only a remote and tenuous relationship to the subject of the investigation, or if he has some other reason to believe that his testimony implicates confidential source relationships without a legitimate need of law enforcement, he will have access to the court on a motion to quash and an appropriate protective order may be entered. The asserted claim to privilege should be judged on its facts by the striking of a proper balance between freedom of the press and the obligation of all citizens to give relevant testimony with respect to criminal conduct. The balance of these vital constitutional and societal interests on a case-by-case basis accords with the tried and traditional way of adjudicating such questions.

In short, the courts will be available to newsmen under circumstances where legitimate First Amendment interests require protection.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, dissenting....

Today's decision will impede the wide-open and robust dissemination of ideas and counter thought which a free press both fosters and protects and which is essential to the success of intelligent self-government....

I see no way of making mandatory the disclosure of a reporter's confidential source of the information on which he bases his news story....

MR. JUSTICE STEWART, with whom MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN and MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL join, dissenting.

The Court's crabbed view of the First Amendment reflects a disturbing insensitivity to the critical role of an independent press in our society. [While] Mr. Justice Powell's enigmatic concurring opinion gives some hope of a more flexible view in the future, the Court in these cases holds that a newsmen has no First Amendment right to protect his sources when called before a grand jury. The Court thus invites state and federal authorities to undermine the historic independence of the press by attempting to annex the journalistic profession as an investigative arm of government....

A corollary of the right to publish must be the right to gather news. [The] right to gather news implies, in turn, a right to a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source. [Informants] are necessary to the news-gathering process as we know it today. [And] the promise of confidentiality may be a necessary prerequisite to a productive relationship between a newsmen and his informants....

The impairment of the flow of news cannot, of course, be proved with scientific precision, as the Court seems to demand. [But] we have never before demanded that First Amendment rights rest on elaborate empirical studies demonstrating beyond any conceivable doubt that deterrent effects exist....

Rather, on the basis of common sense and available information, we have asked, often implicitly, (1) whether there was a rational connection between the cause (the governmental action) and the effect (the deterrence or impairment of First Amendment activity), and (2) whether the effect would occur with some regularity, i.e., would not be de minimis. [Citing, e.g., NAACP v. Alabama; New York Times v. Sullivan.] Once this threshold inquiry has been satisfied, we have then examined the competing interests in determining whether there is an unconstitutional infringement of First Amendment freedoms....

Surely [the] claim of deterrence here is as securely grounded in evidence and common sense as the claims in the cases cited above. [To] require any greater burden of proof is to shirk our duty to protect values securely embedded in the Constitution....

Posed against the First Amendment's protection of the newsman's confidential relationships in these cases is society's interest in the use of the grand jury to administer justice fairly and effectively. [To] perform these functions the grand jury must have available to it every man's relevant evidence. [But] the longstanding rule making every person's evidence available to the grand jury is not absolute. The rule has been limited by the Fifth Amendment, the Fourth Amendment, and the evidentiary privileges of the common law....

In striking the proper balance between the public interest in the efficient administration of justice and the First Amendment guarantee of the fullest flow of information, we must begin with the basic proposition [that] First Amendment rights require special safeguards....

Accordingly, when a reporter is asked to appear before a grand jury and reveal confidences, I would hold that the government must (1) show that there is probable cause to believe that the newsman has information that is clearly relevant to a specific probable violation of law; (2) demonstrate that the information sought cannot be obtained by alternative means less destructive of First Amendment rights; and (3) demonstrate a compelling and overriding interest in the information....

No doubt the courts would be required to make some delicate judgments in working out this accommodation. But that, after all, is the function of courts of law. Better such judgments, however difficult, than the simplistic and stultifying absolutism adopted by the Court in denying any force to the First Amendment in these cases....

Note: A Right to Gather News?

1. Newsgathering. Does the first amendment guarantee the press a right to gather as well as to publish the news? Has the press a first amendment right to gather news through such practices as deception, burglary, wiretapping, and the bribing of sources? Suppose a reporter breaks into a government official's home to uncover evidence of corruption. Can the reporter be prosecuted? Note that this issue implicates the incidental effects doctrine. Recall O'Brien. If fraud, burglary, wiretapping, and bribery are generally unlawful, does the first amendment create a special exemption for the press? If the reporter can constitutionally be prosecuted for the break-in, the wiretap, or the bribery, does it follow that her newspaper can be punished for publishing the information? Recall Pentagon Papers, Barnicki, and Ferber. See Stone, Government Secrecy v. Freedom of the Press, 1 Harv. L. & Pol. Rev. 185 (2007).

2. Journalist's privilege. In light of Justice Powell's concurring opinion, is it fair to say that the Court divided "by a vote of four and a half to four and a half"? Stewart, "Or of the Press," 26 Hastings L. Rev. 631, 635 (1975). Note that Justice Powell joined the majority opinion in Branzburg. Suppose he had filed his concurring opinion without joining Justice White's opinion. Would that have affected the meaning of the decision?

Forty-nine states and the District of Columbia have adopted some form of journalist-source privilege, but the federal government had no such privilege. Three questions are especially vexing in crafting such a privilege: (1) Should the privilege be absolute or qualified? That is, should the government be able to overcome the privilege with a sufficient showing of need? (2) Should the privilege protect the confidentiality of a source whose disclosure is unlawful? If the purpose of the privilege is to encourage a source to communicate, does it make any sense to extend the privilege to unlawful communications? Note that this query has particular relevance to unlawful leaks of classified information. (3) Who should be able to assert the privilege? Presumably, the privilege would cover disclosures to a reporter for the Washington Post or CNN, but what about disclosures to a professor who is writing a book, to bloggers, or to the editor of a high school newspaper? See Papandrea, Citizen Journalism and the Reporter's Privilege, 91 Minn. L. Rev. 515 (2007); Stone, Why We Need a Federal Reporter's Privilege, 34 Hofstra L. Rev. 39 (2005).

3. Investigative journalism or criminal solicitation? Suppose a reporter persuades a public employee unlawfully to leak classified information. Can the reporter constitutionally be convicted of the crime of criminal solicitation? Recall O'Brien. Suppose a journalist conducts an illegal wiretap in order to prove that a congressman took a bribe. Would her conduct be protected by the first amendment? If not, is criminal solicitation any different? See G. Stone, Top Secret: When Government Keeps Us in the Dark 29–38 (2007) (arguing that because prosecution of journalists for the crime of solicitation would interject "government into the very heart of the journalist-source relationship" and thus "have a serious chilling effect" on legitimate and important journalist-source exchanges, the government should not be able to punish journalists for encouraging public employees to disclose classified information unless the journalist (a) expressly incites the leak and (b) knows that publication of the information would likely cause imminent and grave harm to the national security). Can that position be reconciled with the wiretap example or with Branzburg?

4. Newsroom searches. In Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978), the Daily, a student newspaper, published articles and photographs concerning a violent clash on campus between demonstrators and police. Thereafter, the police obtained a warrant for an immediate search of the newspaper's offices for negatives, films, and pictures that might enable them to identify some of the demonstrators. The Daily's photographic laboratories, filing cabinets, desks, and wastepaper baskets were searched, but the police found only those photographs that had already been published. The Daily brought this civil action on the theory that the decision of the police to conduct a search, rather than to proceed by subpoena duces tecum, violated the first amendment. The Daily maintained that, unlike subpoenas, "searches of newspaper offices for evidence of [crime] seriously threaten the ability of the press to gather, analyze, and disseminate news." In a five-to-three decision, the Court, in an opinion by Justice White, rejected this argument:

Properly administered, the preconditions for a warrant—probable cause, specificity with respect to the place to be searched and the things to be seized, and overall reasonableness—should afford sufficient protection against the harms that are assertedly threatened by warrants for searching newspaper offices. [Nor] are we convinced, any more than we were in [Branzburg], that confidential sources will disappear. [Whatever] incremental effect there may be in this regard [does] not make a constitutional difference.

In the Privacy Protection Act of 1980, 42 U.S.C. §2000aa, Congress prohibited any government officer to search for work product or other documents of any "person reasonably believed to have a purpose to disseminate to the public a newspaper, book, broadcast, or other similar form of public communication," unless there is either probable cause to believe that the person is involved in the crime being investigated or there is otherwise reason to believe that giving notice by subpoena would result in the loss of the evidence.

5. Breach of promise. In Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663 (1991), petitioner, who was associated with one party's campaign during the 1982 Minnesota gubernatorial race, gave court records disclosing derogatory information about another party's candidate to respondent newspapers after receiving a promise of confidentiality from the reporters. Despite this promise, the newspapers identified him in their stories, and petitioner was thereafter fired from his job. In a five-to-four decision, the Court held that the first amendment did not bar petitioner's state law action for damages for breach of promise. Justice White delivered the opinion of the Court:

Generally applicable laws do not offend the First Amendment simply because their enforcement against the press has incidental effects on its ability to gather and report the news. [There] can be little doubt that the Minnesota doctrine of promissory estoppel is a law of general applicability. It does not target or single out the press. [The] First Amendment does not forbid its application to the press.

Justices Souter, Marshall, Blackmun, and O'Connor dissented:

6. Does the press have a right to publish someone else's "property"? Consider Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co., 433 U.S. 562 (1977), in which petitioner's fifteen-second "human cannonball" act, in which he is shot from a cannon into a net some two hundred feet away, was, without his consent, filmed in its entirety at a county fair and shown on a television news program later the same day. Petitioner filed a damage action alleging an "unlawful appropriation" of his "professional property." The Court held that the first amendment did not bar petitioner's action: "[The first amendment does not give the media a right to] broadcast a performer's entire act without his consent. The Constitution no more prevents a State from requiring respondent to compensate petitioner for broadcasting his act on television than it would privilege respondent to film and broadcast a copyrighted dramatic work without liability to the copyright owner."

7. The first amendment and copyright. Is copyright protection consistent with the first amendment? See Harper & Row, Publishers v. Nation Enterprises, 471 U.S. 539 (1985) (a magazine's unauthorized publication of verbatim quotes from President Ford's unpublished memoirs constituted an actionable copyright infringement); Eldred v. Ashcroft, 537 U.S. 186 (2003) (upholding the 1998 Copyright Extension Act, which extended the duration of existing copyrights by an additional twenty years).

Does an artist have a first amendment right to use a famous movie star's image in one of her paintings? Does the first amendment protect an individual who produces and sells t-shirts that mock well-known politicians or products? See R. Tushnet, Copy This Essay: How the Fair Use Doctrine Harms Free Speech and How Copying Serves It, 114 Yale L.J. 535 (2004); Rothman, Commercial Speech, Commercial Use, and the Intellectual Property Quagmire, 101 Va. L. Rev. 1929 (2015).

For an interesting twist on this problem, see Simon & Schuster, Inc. v.

Members of the New York State Crime Victims Board, 502 U.S. 428 (1991) (invalidating New York's Son of Sam law, which required any entity contracting with a person convicted of a crime to publish any depiction of the crime to turn over any income under the contract to the Crime Victims Board, which was then required to deposit the payments in an escrow account for the benefit of any victims).

Note: A Press Right of Access to Information?

1. A right of access? To what extent, if any, does the press have a first amendment right of access to information from the government? For example, do members of the press ever have a constitutional right to be present during military operations, to interview prisoners, to demand information from government officials, or to attend criminal trials? If the right of the press to publish information about the activities of government is central to the first amendment, isn't the right of the press to obtain such information equally central? Consider BeVier, An Informed Public, An Informing Press: The Search for a Constitutional Principle, 68 Cal. L. Rev. 482, 498–499 (1980):

The effect on the flow of information [of] government denials of access to information [is] similar to the [effect of such direct restrictions on publication as punishment and censorship. But] the failure of government to [grant] access cannot be credibly argued to be the constitutional equivalent of [such direct restrictions. Punishment and censorship] interfere quite directly with the freedom to publish. When the government denies access to information, however, it poses no threat to freedom, at least if that word is given its ordinary legal meaning. [Punishment and] censorship directly undermine the value of free speech, while the denial of access to information undermines [only] the value of well-informed speech.

If there is a first amendment right of press access to government information, what are its limits? Is government under a constitutional obligation to make public all information that might enhance "the ability of our people through free and open debate to consider and resolve their own destiny"? Is it "impossible to conceive of a court making case-by-case determinations of the 'necessity' of nondisclosure in any way that would bear even the faintest resemblance [to] 'reasoned elaboration'"? BeVier, supra, at 510.

2. Access to prisons. In Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974), the Court held that professional journalists had no first amendment right to conduct face-to-face interviews of prison inmates:

The First and Fourteenth Amendments bar government from interfering in any way with a free press. The Constitution does not, however, require government to accord the press special access to information not shared by members of the public generally. It is one thing to say that a journalist is free to seek out sources of information not available to members of the general public, that he is entitled to some constitutional protection of the confidentiality of such sources, cf. [Branzburg], and that government cannot restrain the publication of news emanating from such sources. Cf. [Pentagon Papers, section B3 supra]. It is quite another thing to suggest that the Constitution imposes upon government the affirmative duty to make available to journalists sources of information not available to members of the public generally. That proposition finds no support in the words of the Constitution or in any decision of this Court.

Justices Douglas, Brennan, Marshall, and Powell dissented.

3. Access to the military. Consider Anderson, Freedom of the Press in Wartime, 77 U. Colo. L. Rev. 49, 66, 95–98 (2006): “So far as existing case law is concerned, there appears to be nothing to prevent the Pentagon from eliminating on-scene coverage of military operations, detention facilities, military hospitals, and other auxiliaries of war. [A] judicial response that leaves news about the conduct of war at the sufferance of the military is an abdication of constitutional responsibility.”

4. Are there potential dangers in recognizing a “preferred” status for the press? Consider Van Alstyne, The First Amendment and the Free Press: A Comment on Some New Trends and Some Old Theories, 9 Hofstra L. Rev. 1, 19–23 (1980):

[If] journalists may assert access to certain public facilities [in] “first amendment preference” to laypersons, [it] may follow symmetrically that the ensuing published story must meet a standard of professionalism commensurate with the privileged standing of the reporter. [The press operates] most effectively and most legitimately precisely because it forms no part of government. [The] security of the [press] from the encumbrance of public regulation [may] be at risk if one’s accent is not on the freedom of the press but is, rather, on the public’s right to know. [We] have already imposed upon radio and television substantial “public” obligations—in exchange for exclusive, cost-free licensing privileges. [There] is no reason to suppose that the matter will be different for newspapers should they, too, “succeed” in securing particular rights [that others] cannot claim under a single and indivisible amendment.

5. Access to judicial proceedings. In Gannett v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368 (1979), the defendants in a murder prosecution requested that the public and the press be excluded from a pretrial hearing on a motion to suppress allegedly involuntary confessions. The district attorney did not oppose the request, and the trial judge, finding that the adverse publicity might jeopardize the defendants' right to a fair trial, granted the closure motion. In upholding this order, the Court focused primarily on the claim that the order violated the sixth amendment's guarantee that "[in] all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a [public] trial." Although conceding that "there is a strong societal interest in public trials," the Court concluded that the sixth amendment guarantee "is personal to the accused," and that "members of the public" thus "have no constitutional right under the Sixth [Amendment] to attend criminal trials."

RICHMOND NEWSPAPERS v. VIRGINIA, 448 U.S. 555 (1980). In 1976, Stevenson was convicted of murder. The conviction was reversed, however, and two subsequent trials ended in mistrials. At the outset of his fourth trial, Stevenson moved that the proceeding be closed to the public. Neither the prosecutor nor anyone else present, including two of appellant's reporters, objected to the motion. The trial judge, acting pursuant to a Virginia statute authorizing the court, "in its discretion," to "exclude from the trial any persons whose presence would impair the conduct of a fair trial," ordered "that the Courtroom be kept clear of all parties except the witnesses when they testify." Later that day appellant moved to vacate the closure order. In defense of the order, Stevenson argued that he "didn't want information to leak out," be published by the media, perhaps inaccurately, and then be seen by the jurors. The trial judge, noting also that "having people in the Courtroom is distracting to the jury," denied the motion to vacate and ordered the trial to continue "with the press and public excluded." The following day the trial judge excused the jury and found Stevenson "not guilty." As soon as the trial ended, tapes of the proceeding were made available to the public.

In a divided set of opinions, the Court held that the order closing the trial to the press and the public was unconstitutional. Chief Justice Burger, joined by Justices White and Stevens, authored a plurality opinion: "The narrow question presented in this case is whether the right of the public and press to attend criminal trials is guaranteed under the United States Constitution. [The] origins of [the] modern criminal trial in Anglo-American justice can be traced back beyond reliable historical records. [Throughout] its evolution, the trial has been open to all who cared to observe. [This] is no quirk of history; rather, it has long been recognized as an indispensable attribute of an Anglo-American trial. [Such openness gives] assurance that the proceedings [are] conducted fairly to all concerned, and it [discourages] perjury, the misconduct of participants, and decisions based on secret bias or partiality. [Moreover,] public trials [have] significant community therapeutic value. [When] a shocking crime occurs, a community reaction of outrage and public protest often follows. Thereafter the open processes of justice serve an important prophylactic purpose, providing an outlet for community concern, hostility, and emotion....

“The Bill of Rights was enacted against the backdrop of the long history of trials being presumptively open. [In] guaranteeing freedoms such as those of speech and press, the First Amendment can be read as protecting the right of everyone to attend trials so as to give meaning to those explicit guarantees. [The] explicit, guaranteed rights to speak and to publish concerning what takes place at a trial would lose much meaning if access to observe the trial could, as it was here, be foreclosed arbitrarily. [We] hold that the right to attend criminal trials¹⁷ is implicit in the guarantees of the First Amendment; without the freedom to attend such trials, which people have exercised for centuries, important aspects of freedom of speech and ‘of the press could be eviscerated.’

“Having concluded there was a guaranteed right of the public under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to attend the trial of Stevenson’s case, we return to the closure order challenged by appellants. [The] trial judge made no findings to support closure; no inquiry was made as to whether alternative solutions would have met the need to ensure fairness; there was no recognition of any right under the Constitution for the public or press to attend the trial. [Absent] an overriding interest articulated in findings, the trial of a criminal case must be open to the public.”¹⁸

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, filed a concurring opinion: “Customarily, First Amendment guarantees are interposed to protect communication between speaker and listener. [But] the First Amendment embodies more than a commitment to free expression and communicative interchange for their own sakes; it has a structural role to play in securing and fostering our republican system of self-government. Implicit in this structural role is [the] assumption that valuable public debate [must] be informed. The structural model links the First Amendment to that process of communication necessary for a democracy to survive, and thus entails solicitude not only for communication itself, but also for the indispensable conditions of meaningful communication.

“However, because ‘the stretch of this protection is theoretically endless,’ it must be invoked with discrimination and temperance. [At] least two helpful principles may be sketched. First, the case for a right of access has special force when drawn from an enduring and vital tradition of public entree to particular proceedings or information. [Second], the value of access must be measured in specifics. Analysis is not advanced by rhetorical statements that all information bears upon public issues; what is crucial in individual cases is whether access to a particular government process is important in terms of that very process. [Our] ingrained tradition of public trials and the importance of public access to the broader purposes of the trial process tip the balance strongly toward the rule that trials be open. What countervailing interests might be sufficiently compelling to reverse this presumption of openness need not concern us now,²⁴ for the statute at stake here authorizes trial closures at the unfettered discretion of the judge and parties.”

Justice Stewart concurred in the judgment. Justice Rehnquist dissented.

GLOBE NEWSPAPER CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT, 457 U.S. 596 (1982). To protect the minor victims of sex crimes from further trauma and embarrassment and to encourage such victims to come forward and testify in a truthful and credible manner, section 16A of chapter 278 of Massachusetts General Laws requires trial judges, at trials for specified sexual offenses involving a victim under age eighteen, to exclude the press and general public from the courtroom during the testimony of the victim. The Court, in a six-to-three decision, held section 16A unconstitutional. Justice Brennan delivered the opinion of the Court:

“Richmond Newspapers firmly established for the first time that the press and general public have a constitutional right of access to criminal trials. [Where], as in the present case, the State attempts to deny the right of access in order to inhibit the disclosure of sensitive information, it must be shown that the denial is necessitated by a compelling governmental interest, and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest....

“We agree [that the Commonwealth’s interest in] safeguarding the physical and psychological well-being of a minor [is] a compelling one. But as compelling as that interest is, it does not justify a mandatory-closure rule, for it is clear that the circumstances of the particular case may affect the significance of the interest. A trial court can determine on a case-by-case basis whether closure is necessary to protect the welfare of a minor victim. Among the factors to be weighed are the minor victim’s age, psychological maturity and understanding, the nature of the crime, the desires of the victim, and the interests of parents and relatives. [Section] 16A cannot be viewed as a narrowly tailored means of accommodating the State's asserted interest....

"Nor can §16A be justified on the basis of the Commonwealth's [interest in] the encouragement of minor victims of sex crimes to come forward and provide accurate testimony. The Commonwealth has offered no empirical support for the claim that the rule of automatic closure [will] lead to an increase in the number of minor sex victims coming forward and cooperating with state authorities...." Chief Justice Burger, joined by Justice Rehnquist, dissented.

Note: Variations on the Press Right of Access

1. Voir dire hearings. In Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 464 U.S. 501 (1984), the Court held that a state court order closing the voir dire examination of prospective jurors in a criminal trial violated the first amendment. The Court explained that the "presumption of openness may be overcome only by an overriding interest based on findings that closure is essential to preserve higher values and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest." Although conceding that the "jury selection process may, in some circumstances, give rise to a compelling [privacy] interest of a prospective juror when interrogation touches on deeply personal matters," the Court concluded that the trial court in this case had not adequately considered the alternatives to closure. See also Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 478 U.S. 1 (1986) (holding that a newspaper has a first amendment right of access to the transcript of a preliminary hearing).

In what circumstances, if any, does the first amendment guarantee the media a right at attend civil trials? Deportation hearings? Congressional hearings? To what extent, if any, does the first amendment give the media a right to televise criminal trials? Richmond Newspapers was premised on a long-standing tradition of public access to criminal trials. To what extent is that an inadequate basis for the right of access? Should the First Amendment "be understood to embody an affirmative right of access to information held by the courts, which by virtue of their unique institutional position possess information that is essential for the public to effectively evaluate the workings of government and, therefore, to act as sovereigns over the government," without regard to historical precedent? Ardia, Court Transparency and the First Amendment, 38 Cardozo L. Rev. 835 (2017).

2. Conditioned access to information. Despite Richmond Newspapers, government is under no general constitutional obligation to disclose information to the press or public and indeed may ordinarily prohibit its employees from disclosing “confidential” information. To what extent, then, may government condition its voluntary disclosure of information on the press’s agreement not to publish?

Consider Seattle Times Co. v. Rhinehart, 467 U.S. 20 (1984). In a defamation action against the Seattle Times, a state court ordered the plaintiff to disclose certain information in discovery. The state court entered a protective order prohibiting the newspaper from using the disclosed information, which included the names of contributors to a controversial religious group, for any purpose other than trial of the case. The Supreme Court unanimously rejected the newspaper’s claim that the order violated the first amendment:

[The newspaper] gained the information [only] by virtue of the trial court’s discovery processes. [It had] no First Amendment right of access to [the information]. [Moreover, the] protective order prevents [the dissemination only of] information obtained through [discovery]. The newspaper is free to] disseminate the identical information [if it obtains it] through means independent of the court’s processes. [Thus], continued court control over the discovered information does not raise the same spectre of government censorship that such control might suggest in other situations. [We] therefore hold that where [a] protective order is entered on a showing of good cause, [is] limited to the context of pretrial civil discovery, and does not restrict the dissemination of the information if gained from other sources, it does not offend the First Amendment.

3. Differential Treatment of the Press

Consider the constitutionality of the following laws: (1) A sales tax of 4 percent on all sales of goods. This is challenged by a newspaper publisher who argues that, as applied to his sales, the tax constitutes an impermissible “tax on the press.” (2) A sales tax of 4 percent on all sales of goods, except that sales of newspapers, books, and periodicals are taxed at the rate of 6 percent. (3) A sales tax of 4 percent on all sales of goods, except that sales of newspapers, books, and periodicals are taxed at the rate of 2 percent. (4) A sales tax of 4 percent on all sales of goods, except that sales of newspapers are taxed at the rate of 2 percent. This is challenged by a publisher of magazines. (5) A sales tax of 4 percent on all sales of goods, except that sales of newspapers, books, and periodicals are taxed at 2 percent if the publisher has an annual profit of less than $1 million. This is challenged by the only publisher in the state who has an annual profit of more than $1 million.

MINNEAPOLIS STAR & TRIBUNE CO. v. MINNESOTA COMMISSIONER OF REVENUE, 460 U.S. 575 (1983). Minnesota imposes a sales tax on retail sales. To avoid double taxation, sales of components to be used in the production of goods that will themselves be sold at retail are exempt from the sales tax. Minnesota also imposes a use tax on the use or consumption of goods that were purchased without payment of the sales tax. The use tax is designed to eliminate the incentive of residents to buy goods in states with lower sales taxes. Until 1971, periodic publications were exempt from both the sales and the use taxes. In 1971, however, Minnesota imposed a use tax on the cost of paper and ink products consumed in the production of periodic publications. As a result, ink and paper used in such publications became the only components of goods to be sold at retail subject to the use tax. In 1974, Minnesota amended the use tax to exempt the first $100,000 worth of ink and paper consumed by a publication in any calendar year. After enactment of the $100,000 exemption, eleven publishers, producing fourteen of the 388 newspapers in Minnesota, incurred a tax liability in 1974. Appellant was one of the eleven. Because of its size, it paid approximately $600,000, or about two-thirds of the total revenue raised by the tax. The Court held that this taxing scheme violated appellant's rights under the first amendment. Justice O'Connor delivered the opinion of the Court:

“Minnesota has [created] a special tax that applies only to certain publications protected by the First Amendment. [We] must determine whether the First Amendment permits such special taxation. [There] is substantial evidence that differential taxation of the press would have troubled the Framers of the First Amendment. [The] fears of the [framers] were well-founded. [When] a State singles out the press [for special taxation], the political constraints that prevent a legislature from passing crippling taxes of general applicability are weakened, and the threat of burdensome taxes becomes acute. That threat can operate as effectively as a censor to check critical comment by the press. [Differential] taxation of the press, then, places such a burden on the interests protected by the First Amendment and we cannot countenance such treatment unless the State asserts a counterbalancing interest of compelling importance that it cannot achieve without differential taxation....

“Minnesota invites us to look beyond the form of the tax to its substance. The tax is, according to the State, merely a substitute for the sales tax, which, as a generally applicable tax, would be constitutional as applied to the press. [But] the State has offered no explanation of why it chose to use a substitute for the sales tax rather than the sales tax itself.

“[The State argues further] that this scheme actually favors the press over other businesses, because the same rate of tax is applied, but, for the press, the rate applies to the cost of components rather than to the sales price. [But we] would be hesitant to fashion a rule that automatically allowed the State to single out the press for a different method of taxation as long as the effective burden was no different from that on other taxpayers or the burden on the press was lighter than that on other businesses. One reason for this reluctance is that the very selection of the press for special treatment threatens the press not only with the current differential treatment, but with the possibility of subsequent differentially more burdensome treatment. Thus, even without actually imposing an extra burden on the press, the government might be able to achieve censorial effects, for ‘[t]he threat of sanctions may deter [the] exercise of [First Amendment] rights almost as potently as the actual application of sanctions.’ [A] second reason to avoid the proposed rule is that courts as institutions are poorly equipped to evaluate with precision the relative burdens of various methods of taxation. [The] possibility of error inherent in the proposed rule poses too great a threat to concerns at the heart of the First Amendment, and we cannot tolerate that possibility.¹³ Minnesota, therefore, has offered no adequate justification for the special treatment of newspapers....

“Minnesota’s ink and paper tax violates the First Amendment not only because it singles out the press, but also because it targets a small group of newspapers. The effect of the $100,000 exemption [is] that only a handful of publishers pay any tax at [all]. The State explains this exemption as part of a policy favoring an ‘equitable’ tax system, [but] there are no comparable exemptions for small enterprises outside the press. [We] think that recognizing a power in the State [to] tailor the tax so that it singles out only a few members of the press presents such a potential for abuse that [Minnesota’s interest in an ‘equitable’ tax system cannot] justify the scheme. [The] tax violates the First Amendment.”

Justice Rehnquist dissented. Justice White concurred in part and dissented in part.

Note: Differential Treatment

1. Preserving press neutrality. Consider Bezanson, Political Agnosticism, Editorial Freedom, and Government Neutrality toward the Press, 72 Iowa L. Rev. 1359, 1371 (1987): “[A sound] reason for making constitutionally suspect any formal singling out of the press [is] to protect the political neutrality of the press [and to] prevent the government from undermining the [neutrality of the press] by forcing [it] to engage actively in the political process [to] protect its own self-interest." Does this mean that even a law expressly benefiting the press, such as an exemption from a state's sales tax, should be invalid? Consider footnote 13 in Minneapolis Star.

2. Content-based differentiation. The Court relied on Minneapolis Star in Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221 (1987), to invalidate an Arkansas statute that imposed a state sales tax on general interest magazines but exempted religious, professional, trade, and sports journals. In an opinion by Justice Marshall, the Court invalidated the law because the discrimination was "content-based." Justice Scalia, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist, dissented.

3. Intermedia differentiation: Leathers. In Leathers v. Medlock, 499 U.S. 439 (1991), the Court considered the constitutionality of the Arkansas Gross Receipts Act, which imposes a 4 percent tax. The act expressly exempts receipts from subscription and over-the-counter newspaper and magazine sales but imposes the tax on cable television. The Court, in an opinion by Justice O'Connor, rejected petitioners' argument that such "intermedia discrimination" violates the first amendment. The Court explained that such a tax is "suspect" only if it "threatens to suppress the expression of particular ideas or viewpoints," "singles out the press," "targets a small group of speakers," or "discriminates on the basis [of] content." Because the "Arkansas tax [presents] none of these types of discrimination," the Court concluded that Arkansas's "extension of its generally applicable sales tax to [cable television], while exempting the print media, does not violate the First Amendment." Justice Marshall, joined by Justice Brennan, dissented.

4. Intermedia discrimination: Turner. In Turner Broadcasting Inc. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622 (1994), section F4, infra, the Court upheld "must carry" provisions for cable television that favored broadcast over cable programmers. The Court observed:

Regulations that discriminate among media, or among different speakers within a single medium, often present serious First Amendment concerns. [Citing Minneapolis Star and Arkansas Writers' Project.] It would be error to conclude, however, that the First Amendment mandates strict scrutiny for any speech regulation that applied to one medium (or a subset thereof) but not others. [The] taxes invalidated in Minneapolis Star and Arkansas Writers' Project [targeted] a small number of speakers [and] were structured in a manner that raised suspicions that their objective [was] the suppression of certain ideas.

But such heightened scrutiny is unwarranted [where, as here,] the differential treatment [is] not structured in a manner that carries the inherent risk of undermining First Amendment interests. The [must carry] regulations [apply] to almost all cable systems in the country, rather than just a select few. As a result, [they] do not pose the same dangers of suppression and manipulation that were posed by the more narrowly targeted regulations in Minneapolis Star and Arkansas Writers' Project.

5. Intermedia discrimination: shield laws. Suppose a journalist-shield law allows reporters for mainstream newspapers and television and radio stations to invoke the journalist-source privilege, but does not extend to bloggers. Does such intermedia discrimination violate the first amendment? Consider Stone, Why We Need a Federal Reporter's Privilege, 34 Hofstra L. Rev. 39, 48 (2005):

[Although the issue of “who is a member of the press”] was a serious constraint on the Court in Branzburg, it poses a much more manageable issue in the context of legislation. Government often treats different speakers and publishers differently from one another. Which reporters are allowed to attend a White House briefing? Which are eligible to be embedded with the military? Broadcasting is regulated, but print journalism is not. Legislation treats the cable medium differently from both broadcasting and print journalism. These categories need not conform perfectly to the undefined phrase “the press” in the First Amendment. Differentiation among different elements of the media is constitutional, as long as it is not based on viewpoint or any other invidious consideration, and as long as the differential is reasonable.

4. Regulating the Press to “Improve” the Marketplace of Ideas

In what circumstances, if any, is it appropriate for government to regulate the media in order to “improve” the system of free expression? Recall the discussion of this issue in the electoral context in section E4 supra.

MIAMI HERALD PUBLISHING CO. v. TORNILLO, 418 U.S. 241 (1974). In Tornillo, the Court considered the constitutionality of a Florida “right of reply” statute which [provided] that if a candidate for [political office] is assailed regarding his personal character or official record by any newspaper, the candidate has the right to demand that the newspaper print, free of cost to the candidate, any reply the candidate may make to the newspaper’s charges. The reply must appear in as conspicuous a place and in the same kind of type as the charges which prompted the reply, provided it does not take up more space than the charges.” The Court, in a unanimous decision, held the statute invalid. Chief Justice Burger delivered the opinion of the Court:

“[Advocates] of an enforceable right of access to the press [urge] that at the time the First Amendment [was ratified] the press was broadly representative of the people it was serving. [Entry] into publishing was inexpensive [and a] true marketplace of ideas existed in which there was relatively easy access to the channels of communication. Access advocates submit that [the press of today is] very different. [Newspapers] have become big business and [the press] has become noncompetitive and enormously powerful and influential in its capacity to manipulate popular opinion. [The] result of these vast changes has been to place in a few hands the power to inform the American people and shape public opinion. [There] tends to be a homogeneity of editorial opinion, commentary, and interpretative analysis. [The] obvious solution [would] be to have additional newspapers. But [economic factors] have made entry into the marketplace of ideas served by the print media almost impossible. [The] First Amendment interest of the public in being informed is said to be in peril....

“However much validity may be found in these arguments, [the] implementation of a remedy such as an enforceable right of access necessarily [brings] about a confrontation with the express provisions of the First Amendment. [The] argument that the Florida statute does not amount to a restriction of [the newspaper’s] right to speak because ‘the statute in question here has not prevented [the newspaper] from saying anything it wished’ begs the core question. Compelling editors or publishers to publish that which “‘reason’ tells them should not be published” is what is at issue in this case. The Florida statute operates as a command in the same sense as a statute or regulation forbidding [the newspaper] to publish specified matter. [The] Florida statute exacts a penalty on the basis of the content of a newspaper. The first phase of the penalty [is] exacted in terms of the cost in printing [and] in taking up space that could be devoted to other material the newspaper may have preferred to print. [Faced with such a penalty,] editors might well conclude that the safe course is to avoid controversy. [Thus, the government-enforced] right of access inescapably ‘dampens the vigor and limits the variety of public debate.’....

“[Moreover, even] if a newspaper would face no additional costs to comply with a compulsory access law and would not be forced to forgo publication of news or opinion by the inclusion of a reply, the Florida statute fails to clear the barriers of the First Amendment because of its intrusion into the function of editors. A newspaper is more than a passive receptacle or conduit for news, comment, and advertising. The choice of material to go into a newspaper [constitutes] the exercise of editorial control and judgment. It has yet to be demonstrated how governmental regulation of this crucial process can be exercised consistent with First Amendment guarantees of a free press as they have evolved to this time.”

Consider the possibility that the law in Tornillo was a kind of “candidate protection act,” and illegitimate because its purpose and effect were to insulate political figures from criticism. In a concurring opinion in Tornillo, Justice Brennan asserted that “the Court’s opinion [implies] no view upon the constitutionality of ‘retraction’ statutes affording plaintiffs able to prove defamatory falsehoods a statutory action to require publication of a retraction.” Do you agree? Suppose, instead of a “right-of-reply” law, Florida adopted a “right-of-access” law, requiring every newspaper to set aside one page each issue for letters to the editor, not to exceed five hundred words, to be selected for publication without regard to content. Would such a law be invalid under Tornillo? Recall PruneYard, section E4, supra.

RED LION BROADCASTING CO. V. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1960). In Red Lion, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the Federal Communication Commission’s fairness doctrine and its component regulations governing personal attacks and political editorializing. The fairness doctrine, which originated “very early in the history of broadcasting,” imposes “on radio and television broadcasters the requirement that discussion of public issues be presented on broadcast stations, and that each side of those issues must be given fair coverage.” The personal attack rule requires that when, “during the presentation of views on a controversial issue of public importance, an attack is made upon the honesty, character, integrity or like personal qualities of an identified person or group,” the attacked person or group must be given notice, a transcript, and a reasonable opportunity to respond. The political editorializing rule requires that when, in an editorial, a broadcaster endorses or opposes a political candidate, the broadcaster must notify the opposed candidate or the opponents of the endorsed candidate and give them a “reasonable opportunity” to reply.

Justice White delivered the opinion of the Court: “The broadcasters [allege] that the [challenged] rules abridge their freedom of speech and press. Their contention is that the First Amendment protects their desire to use their allotted frequencies continuously to broadcast whatever they choose, and to exclude whomever they choose from ever using that frequency. [Although] broadcasting is clearly a medium affected by a First Amendment interest, differences in the characteristics of new media justify differences in the First Amendment standards applied to them. [Where] there are substantially more individuals who want to broadcast than there are frequencies to allocate, it is idle to posit an unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish. If 100 persons want broadcast licenses but there are only 10 frequencies to allocate, all of them may have the same "right" to a license; but if there is to be any effective communication by radio, only a few can be licensed and the rest must be barred from the airwaves. It would be strange if the First Amendment, aimed at protecting and furthering communications, prevented the Government from making radio communication possible by requiring licenses to broadcast and by limiting the number of licenses so as not to overcrowd the spectrum....

"By the same token, as far as the First Amendment is concerned those who are licensed stand no better than those to whom licenses are refused. A license permits broadcasting, but the licensee has no constitutional right to be the one who holds the license or to monopolize a radio frequency to the exclusion of his fellow citizens. There is nothing in the First Amendment which prevents the Government from requiring a licensee to share his frequency with others and to conduct himself as a proxy or fiduciary with obligations to present those views and voices which are representative of his community and which would otherwise, by necessity, be barred from the airwaves. [The] people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount. [It] is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here....

"[We cannot] say that it is inconsistent with the First Amendment goal of producing an informed public capable of conducting its own affairs to require a broadcaster to permit answers to personal attacks occurring in the course of discussing controversial issues, or to require that the political opponents of those endorsed by the station be given a chance to communicate with the public. Otherwise, station owners and a few networks would have unfettered power to make time available only to the highest bidders, to communicate only their own views on public issues, people and candidates, and to permit on the air only those with whom they agreed. There is no sanctuary in the First Amendment for unlimited private censorship operating in a medium not open to all....

"It is strenuously argued, however, that if political editorials or personal attacks will trigger an obligation in broadcasters to afford the opportunity for expression to speakers who need not pay for time and whose views are unpalatable to the licensees, then broadcasters will be irresistibly forced to self-censorship and their coverage of controversial public issues will be eliminated or at least rendered wholly ineffective. Such a result would indeed be a serious matter, for should licensees actually eliminate their coverage of controversial issues, the purposes of the doctrine would be stifled. [At] this point, however, as the Federal Communications Commission has indicated, that possibility is at best speculative. [And] if experience with the administration of these doctrines indicates that they have the net effect of reducing rather than enhancing the volume and quality of coverage, there will be time enough to reconsider the constitutional implications....

“It is argued that even if at one time the lack of available frequencies for all who wished to use them justified the Government’s choice of those who would best serve the public interest by acting as proxy for those who would present differing views, or by giving the latter access directly to broadcast facilities, this condition no longer prevails so that continuing control is not justified. To this there are several answers. Scarcity is not entirely a thing of the past. Advances in technology, such as microwave transmission, have led to more efficient utilization of the frequency spectrum, but uses for that spectrum have also grown apace. [Nothing] in this record, or in our own researches, convinces us that the resource is no longer one for which there are more immediate and potential uses than can be accommodated....

“[Moreover], the fact remains that existing broadcasters have often attained their present position because of their initial government selection in competition with others before new technological advances opened new opportunities for further uses. Long experience in broadcasting, confirmed habits of listeners and viewers, network affiliation, and other advantages in program procurement give existing broadcasters a substantial advantage over new entrants, even where new entry is technologically possible. These advantages are the fruit of a preferred position conferred by the Government. Some present possibility for new entry by competing stations is not enough, in itself, to render unconstitutional the Government’s effort to assure that a broadcaster’s programming ranges widely enough to serve the public interest.

“In view of the scarcity of broadcast frequencies, the Government’s role in allocating those frequencies, and the legitimate claims of those unable without governmental assistance to gain access to those frequencies for expression of their views, we hold the [regulations] constitutional.”²⁸

Note: Regulating the Airwaves

1. Licensing the airwaves. In the Communications Act of 1934, the government, “to maintain the control of the United States over [the channels of] radio transmission; and to provide for the use of such channels, but not the ownership thereof, by persons for limited periods of time,” established the FCC and granted it broad power to license and regulate the broadcast spectrum “as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires.” In National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190 (1943), the Court held that such government licensing did not violate the first amendment because, “[unlike] other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all.” Consider the following arguments:

a. Coase, The Federal Communications Commission, 2 J.L. & Econ. 1, 14–18 (1959):

[The Court] seems to believe that federal regulation is needed because radio frequencies are limited in number and people want to use more of them than are available. But it is a commonplace of economics that almost all resources used in the economic system (and not simply radio and television frequencies) are limited in amount and scarce, in that people would like to use more than exists. [It] is true that some mechanism has to be employed to decide who [should] be allowed to use the scarce resource. But the way this is usually done [is] to employ the price mechanism, and this allocates resources to users without the need for government regulation. [An] administrative agency which attempts to perform the function normally carried out by the pricing mechanism [cannot], by the nature of things, be [fully aware] of the preferences of consumers. [Allocation by means of the pricing mechanism is thus more likely than allocation by administrative action to serve the “public convenience, interest, or necessity.”]

b. Van Alstyne, The Möbius Strip of the First Amendment: Perspectives on Red Lion, 29 S.C. L. Rev. 539, 562 (1978):

The [Coase] argument is appealing, but it is based on a fatal myopia in its failure to see how clearly freedom of speech [is] abridged by a government policy that adheres only to a private property system and a market-pricing mechanism in determining who shall be able to speak. [Allocation by means of the pricing mechanism would winnow] the field of otherwise eligible applicants strictly according to their ability to pay; it [would eliminate] from the licensing competition those who lack dollars to put in an effective bid.

c. In FCC v. Fox Television Stations, 556 U.S. 502 (2009), section D7 supra, Justice Thomas called Red Lion into question in a separate concurring opinion:

Red Lion [was] unconvincing when [it was] issued, and the passage of time has only increased doubt regarding [its] continued validity. [Red Lion] relied heavily on the scarcity of available broadcast frequencies. [Dramatic] technological advances have eviscerated the factual assumptions underlying [that decision]. Broadcast spectrum is significantly less scarce than it was 40 years ago. [And] the trend should continue. [Moreover], traditional broadcast television and radio are no longer the ‘uniquely pervasive’ media forms they once were. For most consumers, traditional broadcast media programming is now bundled with cable or satellite services. Broadcast and other video programming is also widely available over the Internet. [The] extant facts that drove this Court to subject broadcasters to unique disfavor under the First Amendment simply do not exist today.

2. Regulating the airwaves. Assuming licensing of the airwaves is not itself unconstitutional, what factors may the FCC consider in its allocation of licenses?

a. May the FCC compel an applicant for a broadcast license to ascertain the problems, needs, and interests of his community and to provide programming to meet those needs? See Ascertainment of Community Problems by Broadcast Applicants Primer, 57 F.C.C.2d 418 (1976). May the FCC, for example, deny a license to an applicant for a radio station in a community with a significant minority population unless the applicant agrees to devote a significant portion of her programming to information and entertainment designed specifically for the minority community?

b. May the FCC prohibit broadcasters from airing programs that contain profanity? May it prohibit programs that incite to crime? That are sexually explicit? That depict a racial or religious group in a degrading manner? Recall FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, section D7, supra.

c. Consider the following proposal made by Reed Hundt, then-chair of the FCC, in Hundt, The Public’s Airwaves: What Does the Public Interest Require of Television Broadcasters?, 45 Duke L.J. 1089, 1099–1100, 1105–1106 (1996):

In the aggregate, political candidates at all levels spent [$500 million in 1996] on media advertising. [The] cost of television advertising makes fundraising an enormous entry barrier for candidates seeking public office, an oppressive burden for incumbents seeking reelection, a continuous threat to the integrity of our political institutions, and a principal cause of the erosion of public respect for public service. [To address this problem,] broadcasters should be required, [as] a condition of their licenses, to provide free airtime for political candidates.

[This could be accomplished by requiring] broadcasters [to] donate [$500 million worth of] airtime to [a time] bank and [authorizing] candidates [to] draw airtime from the bank during their campaigns. [How] would we divide the time contributed to a time bank? One approach would be to grant each eligible candidate a right to a specific dollar amount of free time. Candidates would then negotiate with broadcasters for advertising time, just as they currently do, but would pay with time bank credits rather than actual dollars. Why would broadcasters accept credits? Because they would be required to provide free time worth, say, 2 percent of their annual advertising revenues as a condition of using the public airwaves for free. Indeed, it would be important for broadcasters to provide time to candidates lest they lose their licenses.

3. Repeal of the fairness doctrine. In 1987, the FCC repealed the fairness doctrine, asserting that the doctrine was unconstitutional because it “chilled” the first amendment rights of broadcasters.

4. Regulating the media to achieve a “more advanced democratic society.” Consider L. Bollinger, Images of a Free Press 133–145 (1991):

[Under the image of freedom of the press established in New York Times v. Sullivan], the goal of press freedom [was] viewed as the creation of a vast space for “uninhibited, robust, and wide-open” public discussion [and it was] assumed that the role of the Supreme Court is to stand guard against government intervention. [This approach is] insensitive to problems affecting the quality of public discussion that are posed by a laissez-faire system of modern mass media. [What is needed is a] more fundamental understanding [of press freedom].

[To achieve this more fundamental understanding, we] must address the nature of our own behavior in the discussion of public questions. [A] democratic society, like an individual, should strive to remain conscious of the biases that skew, distort, and corrupt its own thinking about public issues. [Even] in a world in which the press is entirely free and open to all voices, with a perfect market in that sense, human nature would still see to it that quality public debate and decisionmaking would not rise naturally to the surface but would [need] the buoyant support of some form of collective action [involving] public institutions.

[Although the mass media may] give viewers and readers what they “want” [through] the expression of their preferences in the marketplace, [it is nonetheless imaginable] that we—the same “we” that issue our marketplace votes for what we get—might be very concerned about [what] choices we are making in that system. [Accordingly, we may] decide together, through public regulation, that we would like to alter [the] demands we find ourselves making in that market context, [for we may] recognize that if we are left to choose on our own whether and how to inform ourselves, too many will neglect to undertake the burdens of self-education, choosing instead to pursue more pleasant things. [It] would be a more [advanced] democratic society that could act to correct deficiencies arising out of [the] citizens themselves.

TURNER BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622 (1994). The “must carry” provisions of the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992 require cable television systems to devote a portion of their channels, free of charge, to the transmission of local broadcast television stations. The rationale of these provisions was explained by the Court:

“Cable technology affords two principal benefits over broadcast. First, it eliminates the signal interference sometimes encountered in over-the-air [broadcasting]. Second, it is capable of transmitting many more channels than are available through broadcasting. [Congress] enacted the 1992 Cable Act after conducting three years of [hearings]. Congress concluded that [the] overwhelming majority of cable operators exercise a monopoly over cable service [and that] this market position gives cable operators the power and the incentive to harm broadcast competitors. The power derives from the cable operator’s ability [to refuse to transmit broadcast signals]. The incentive derives from the economic reality that ‘[c]able television systems and broadcast systems increasingly compete for television advertising revenues.’ By refusing carriage of broadcasters’ signals, cable operators [can] reduce the number of households that have access to the broadcasters’ programming, and thereby capture advertising dollars that would otherwise go to broadcast stations. [In such circumstances], Congress concluded that unless cable operators are required to carry local broadcast stations, ‘[t]here is a substantial likelihood [that] the economic viability of free local broadcast television [will] be seriously jeopardized.’ [Congress] sought to avoid the elimination of broadcast television [because] ‘[s]uch programming is...free to those who own television sets and does not require cable transmission to receive broadcast signals.’ [The] provisions are designed to [ensure] that every individual with a television set can obtain access to free television programming.”

Although the Court divided sharply on the constitutionality of the “must carry” provisions, it was unanimous in holding that the regulation of cable television should not be governed by the same constitutional standards as broadcast regulation. Justice Kennedy delivered the opinion of the Court:

“[The] rationale for applying a less rigorous standard of First Amendment scrutiny to broadcast regulation [does] not apply in the context of cable regulation. The justification for our distinct approach to broadcast regulation rests upon the unique physical limitations of the broadcast medium. As a general matter, there are more would-be broadcasters than frequencies available in the electromagnetic spectrum. And if two broadcasters were to attempt to transmit over the same frequency in the same locale, they would interfere with one another’s signals, so that neither could be heard at all. The scarcity of broadcast frequencies thus required the establishment of some regulatory mechanism to divide the electromagnetic spectrum and assign specific frequencies to particular broadcasters. [The] broadcast cases are inapposite in the present context because cable television does not suffer from the inherent limitations that characterize the broadcast medium. Indeed, given the rapid advances in fiber optics and digital compression technology, soon there may be no practical limitation on the number of speakers who may use the cable medium. Nor is there any danger of physical interference between two cable speakers attempting to share the same channel. In light of these fundamental technological differences between broadcast and cable transmission, application of the more relaxed standard of scrutiny adopted in Red Lion [is] inapt when determining the First Amendment validity of cable regulation....

“Although the Government acknowledges the substantial technological differences between broadcast and cable, it advances a second argument for application of the Red Lion framework to cable regulation. It asserts that the foundation of our broadcast jurisprudence is not the physical limitations of the electromagnetic spectrum, but rather the ‘market dysfunction’ that characterizes the broadcast market. Because the cable market is beset by a similar dysfunction, the Government maintains, the Red Lion standard of review should also apply to cable. While we agree that the cable market suffers certain structural impediments, the Government’s argument is flawed in two respects. First, as discussed above, the special physical characteristics of broadcast transmission, not the economic characteristics of the broadcast market, are what underlies our broadcast jurisprudence. Second, the mere assertion of a dysfunction or failure in a speech market, without more, is not enough to shield a speech regulation from the First Amendment standards applicable to nonbroadcast media.”

In his opinion for the Court, Justice Kennedy conceded that the “must carry” provisions interfere with cable operators’ editorial discretion by compelling them to offer carriage [to] broadcast stations,” but emphasized that “the extent of the interference does not depend upon the content of the cable operators’ programming.” Justice Kennedy therefore concluded that “the appropriate standard by which to evaluate the constitutionality of [the ‘must carry’ provisions] is [not ‘the most exacting level’ of first amendment scrutiny, but] the intermediate level of scrutiny applicable to content-neutral restrictions that impose an incidental burden on speech,” invoking the standard set forth in United States v. O’Brien, section E3, supra.

Applying this standard, Justice Kennedy, writing at this point only for himself and three other justices, remanded for further fact-finding on whether the “must carry” rules are in fact “necessary to protect the viability of broadcast television.” Justice Kennedy explained that the government “must demonstrate that the recited harms are real, not merely conjectural, and that the regulation will in fact alleviate these harms in a direct and material way....”

In a concurring opinion, Justice Stevens agreed “with most of Justice Kennedy’s reasoning,” but concluded that the “must carry” provisions should be upheld without a remand.”

Justice O’Connor, joined by Justices Scalia, Thomas, and Ginsburg, dissented in part. At the outset, Justice O’Connor observed that the act “implicates the First Amendment rights of two classes of speakers”: “First, it tells cable operators which programmers they must [carry]. Second, [it] deprives [cable programmers] of access to over one-third of an entire medium. Cable programmers may compete only for those channels that are not set aside by the must carry provisions. [It] is as if the government ordered all movie theaters to reserve at least one-third of their screening for films made by American production companies, or required all bookstores to devote one-third of their shelf space to nonprofit publishers.”

Justice O’Connor argued further that the “must carry” provisions are content-based, rather than content-neutral, because various congressional findings supporting the legislation expressed “[preferences] for diversity of viewpoints, for localism, for educational programming, and for news and public affairs.” Although the Court concluded that such findings showed “nothing more than the recognition that the services provided by broadcast television have some intrinsic value and, thus, are worth preserving against the threats posed by cable,” Justice O’Connor argued that the “controversial judgment at the heart of the statute is not that broadcast television has some value, [but] that broadcasters should be preferred over cable programmers” because of the content of broadcast programming. In Justice O’Connor’s view, the government’s “interest in ensuring access to a multiplicity of diverse and antagonistic sources of information [is] directly tied to the content of what the speakers will likely say.” Justice O’Connor therefore reasoned that the “must carry” provisions must be tested by “exacting” standards of content-based analysis and must be “narrowly tailored to a compelling state interest.” Applying this standard, Justice O’Connor concluded that the provisions could not withstand constitutional scrutiny.

Note: Turner and the Regulation of Cable

1. Turner and the problem of content. Consider Justice O’Connor’s argument that the “must carry” regulations are content-based because they were designed in part to promote “access to a multiplicity of diverse and antagonistic sources of information.” Is a city council’s decision to permit individuals to display messages in the interior of city-owned buses “content-based” because the city council’s goal is to promote “access to a multiplicity of diverse and antagonistic sources of information”? Should it make a difference whether the challenged provision attempts to achieve this goal (a) by expanding opportunities for free expression in a facially content-neutral manner or (b) by providing expanded speech opportunities for particular, otherwise underrepresented, viewpoints in an explicitly content-based manner?

2. Turner revisited. In Turner Broadcasting System Inc. v. FCC, 520 U.S. 180 (1997) (Turner II), the Court, in a five-to-four decision, upheld under “intermediate scrutiny” the constitutionality of the must-carry provisions at issue in Turner I, affirming the district court’s decision that the expanded record presented to it on remand from Turner I contained substantial evidence supporting Congress’s predictive judgment that the must-carry provisions further important governmental interests in preserving cable carriage of local broadcast stations, and that the provisions are narrowly tailored to promote those interests. In reaching this conclusion, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, emphasized that “we owe Congress’ findings deference [because Congress] ‘is far better equipped than the judiciary to “amass and evaluate the vast amounts of data” bearing upon’ legislative questions.” Thus, “we need not put our imprimatur on Congress’ economic theory in order to validate the reasonableness of its judgment,” nor should we “re-weigh the evidence de novo” or “replace Congress’ factual predictions with our own.”

Justice O’Connor, joined by Justices Scalia, Thomas, and Ginsburg, dissented. Justice O’Connor maintained that “the principal opinion” exhibits “an extraordinary and unwarranted deference for congressional judgments, a profound fear of delving into complex economic matters, and a willingness to substitute untested assumptions for evidence.” As a consequence, the principal opinion “trivializes the First Amendment issue at stake in this case.”

The bottom line seems to be that, in at least most respects, the Court will treat cable television as more analogous to the traditional print media for first amendment purposes than to the broadcast media. Is that a sensible conclusion?

Note: The First Amendment in Cyberspace

1. New technologies and the first amendment. As new technologies revolutionize communication, questions inevitably arise about how the first amendment should apply. Red Lion struggled with the novel challenges posed by broadcasting, and Denver Area wrestled with how to assess the special issues posed by cable. The Court encountered similar difficulties when it first considered motion pictures and sound trucks. Recall Kovacs v. Cooper, section E1 supra. What, then, of cyberspace? Consider the following views:

a. Fiss, In Search of a New Paradigm, 104 Yale L.J. 1613, 1614–1615 (1995):

[Much of current First Amendment analysis is premised] on an outmoded paradigm: the street corner speaker. [A] body of doctrine that did no more than protect the street corner speaker from the menacing reach of the police would leave the values served by the First Amendment vulnerable [and] largely unfulfilled. [But we are now in the midst] of a new technological revolution. [What] is happening is nothing less than a redefinition of the way we read and write, the way we talk to and correspond with one another [and] how we perform our roles as citizens. [We must begin the process of thinking] through the implications for the First Amendment of the technological revolution through which we are now living.

b. Krattenmaker and Powe, Converging First Amendment Principles for Converging Communications Media, 104 Yale L.J. 1719, 1721, 1725, 1726, 1740 (1995):

No matter how often one repeats the statement, it cannot be true that “[d]ifferent communications media [should be] treated differently for First Amendment purposes.” Should everything we knew about regulation of books have been discarded once talking motion pictures were invented? Did discovery of the personal computer [render] obsolete everything the courts said about the First Amendment and broadcasting, or cable, or telephones? [Past] complaints will be prologue for future complaints about what creators place on, and users receive from, [cyberspace]. Some will complain that an insufficient amount of the appropriate type or quality of information is available. Others [will] complain that users may be accessing information they ought not have. [In responding to these familiar issues,] only a unitary First Amendment for all media will do. [The] general principles underlying regulation of the [traditional print] media should apply fully to the new as well as the old electronic communications media.

2. The first amendment in cyberspace—some specific issues.

a. Lessig, The Path of Cyberlaw, 104 Yale L.J. 1743, 1750, 1752 (1995):

[We] can see many good reasons why someone would want to remain anonymous. [One] wants to contribute to a political discussion without suffering the costs of unpopular views; one wants to find information without revealing that one needs that information; one wants to assume a role in certain discussion groups to explore an alternative identity. [Not] all anonymity, however, is so benign. Perfect anonymity makes perfect crime possible. The ability to appear invisibly on the network [certainly] will increase the incidence of those on the network who slander, or harass or assault. [A careful] balance will have to be drawn. [Already] the extremes are well staked, with some arguing that no regulation [of anonymity] should be permitted, and others arguing that only with regulation should [anonymity] be allowed.

b. Kreimer, Technologies of Protest: Insurgent Social Movements and the First Amendment in the Era of the Internet, 150 U. Penn. L. Rev. 119, 122–124 (2001):

Given the structure of twentieth-century communications media, established or well-financed contenders in the public arena [had] a built-in advantage: the cost of disseminating arguments or information to a broad audience threatened effectively to exclude outsiders from public debate. [The internet] has changed this dynamic, for [almost] any social movement can put up a website. [From] neo-Nazism and Christian Identity to gay liberation and disability rights, [the internet] facilitates challenges to the status quo....

c. C. Sunstein, republic.com 8–9, 16, 54, 65, 71, 86 (2001):

[A] well-functioning system of free expression must meet two distinctive requirements. First, people should be exposed to materials that they would not have chosen in advance. Unplanned [encounters] are central to democracy [and people should] often come across views and topics that they have not specifically selected. Second, [citizens] should have a range of common experiences. Without shared experiences, [people may] find it hard to understand one another. [There] are serious dangers in a system in which individuals [restrict] themselves to opinions and topics of their own choosing....

The specialization of Websites [and discussion groups] is obviously important here. [For example], there are hundreds of Websites created [by] hate groups and extremist organizations [which] provide links to one another. [Such websites] are being used [to] reinforce existing convictions. [They are] permitting people [to] spread rumors, many of them paranoid and hateful. [This is an example of group polarization, which] refers to something very simple: After deliberation, people are likely to move toward a more extreme point in the direction to which the group's members were originally inclined....

With respect to the Internet, [the] implication is that groups of like-minded people, engaged in discussion with one another, will end up thinking the same thing that they thought before—but in more extreme form. [Group] polarization is unquestionably occurring on the Internet, [which] is serving as a breeding ground for extremism. [For] citizens of a heterogeneous democracy, a fragmented communications market creates considerable dangers.

Would it be constitutional for government to require websites like Facebook to make “opposing viewpoint buttons” available to users? Such buttons would automatically allow a user, with the mere push of a button, to access viewpoints that oppose the ones she has just read. See C. Sunstein, #republic 232 (2017).

d. Leiter, Cleaning Cyber-Cesspools: Google and Free Speech, in S. Levmore and M. Nussbaum, eds., The Offensive Internet 155 (2010):

I shall use the term “cyber-cesspool” to refer to those places in cyberspace—chat rooms, websites, blogs, and often the comment sections of blogs—which are devoted in whole or in part to demeaning, harassing, and humiliating individuals. [The] Internet is currently full of cyber-cesspools. [Since] cyber-cesspools are in large part beyond the reach of regulation [because] of constitutional protections, a number of commentators have suggested enhancing private remedies by, for example, making intermediaries—those who host blogs or perhaps even service providers—liable for tortious harms on their sites. This would require repeal of Section 250 of the Communications Decency Act (47 U.S.C. §230), which provides that “No provider or user of an interactive computer service shall be treated as the publisher or speaker of any information provided by another information content provider.” The effect of that simple provision has been to treat cyber-cesspools wholly differently from, for example, newspapers that decide to publish similar material. Whereas publishers of the latter are liable for the tortious letters or advertisements they publish [recall New York Times v. Sullivan, section D1 supra], owners of cyber-cesspools are held legally unaccountable for even the most noxious material on their sites, even when put on notice as to its potentially tortious nature. But why should blogs, whose circulation sometimes dwarfs that of many newspapers, be insulated from liability for actionable material they permit on their site?

3. Indecency on the Internet. In Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, section D7, supra, the Court invalidated provisions of the Communications Decency Act of 1996 (CDA) that prohibited any person from sending over the Internet in a way that would be available to a person under eighteen years of age any “indecent” material or any material that “depicts or describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards, sexual or excretory activities or organs.” In distinguishing the Internet from broadcasting, the Court explained:

[We have] observed that “[e]ach medium of expression...may present its own problems.” Thus, some of our cases have recognized special justifications for regulation of the broadcast media that are not applicable to other speakers [citing, e.g., Red Lion; Pacifica]. In these cases, the Court relied on the history of extensive government regulation of the broadcast medium, the scarcity of available frequencies at its inception, and its “invasive” nature.

Those factors are not present in cyberspace. Neither before nor after the enactment of the CDA have the vast democratic fora of the Internet been subject to the type of government supervision and regulation that has attended the broadcast industry. Moreover, the Internet is not as “invasive” as radio or television. The District Court specifically found that “[c]ommunications over the Internet do not ‘invade’ an individual’s home or appear on one’s computer screen unbidden. Users seldom encounter content ‘by accident.’” [Finally], unlike the conditions that prevailed when Congress first authorized regulation of the broadcast spectrum, the Internet can hardly be considered a “scarce” expressive commodity. It provides relatively unlimited, low cost capacity for communication of all kinds. [Our] cases provide no basis for qualifying the level of First Amendment scrutiny that should be applied to this medium.

Should local community standards apply in deciding whether sexually explicit material posted on the internet is “obscene”? See Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union, section D6, supra.

4. Registered sex offenders and the internet. Can a state constitutionally make it a crime for registered sex offenders to access any “commercial social networking Web site where the sex offender knows that the site permits minor children to become members or to create or maintain personal Web pages”? In Packingham v. North Carolina, 582 U.S. ____ (2017), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, held such a law unconstitutional because it forbids registered sex offenders from accessing even such websites as Facebook, LinkedIn, and Twitter. Noting that cyberspace is “the most important” venue today “for the exchange of views,” the Court held that even though the challenged statute was “content neutral,” it was not “narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest.” Although recognizing that the state “may pass valid laws to protect children [from] abuse,” and although assuming that “the First Amendment permits a State to enact specific, narrowly tailored laws that prohibit a sex offender from engaging in conduct that often presages sexual crime, like contacting a minor or using a website to gather information about a minor,” the Court held that the statute at issue in this case was far too “sweeping” to meet the demands of the first amendment. Indeed, this statute, the Court observed “enacts a prohibition unprecedented in the scope of First Amendment speech it burdens” because “with one broad scope” it “bars access to what for many are the principal sources for knowing current events, checking ads for employment, speaking and listening in the modern public square, and otherwise exploring the vast realms of human thought and knowledge.”

In a separate concurring opinion, Justice Alito, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Thomas, agreed that the North Carolina law swept too broadly, but suggested that, because the internet is “a powerful tool for the would-be-child abuser,” the state should have broader leeway to address this problem than implied in the majority opinion.

5. The liability of cable and internet carriers for the speech of users. In what circumstances, if any, should cable or internet carriers be liable for the libelous, obscene, or otherwise actionable speech they carry? Consider the liability of (a) a store that sells typewriters for the messages typed by purchasers; (b) a telephone company for the speech of callers; (c) a bookstore for the contents of the books it sells; (d) a news vendor for the contents of the newspapers it sells; (e) a newspaper or magazine for the statements made by guest columnists; (f) a cable operator for the programs it carries; and (g) a computer network, such as CompuServe, for the messages it transmits. Should the standards of liability differ across these different situations? Should it matter whether the defendant exercises “editorial” control? Should the defendants in all or some of these cases be liable only “if they have actual notice that the speech has previously been adjudicated illegal or unprotected”? Myerson, Authors, Editors, and Uncommon Carriers: Identifying the “Speaker” within the New Media, 71 Notre Dame L. Rev. 79, 122 (1995).

Section 230(c)(1) of the Communications Decency Act of 1996 provides immunity from liability for providers and users of an “interactive computer service” who publish information provided by others. Facebook, for example, unlike the New York Times, is not liable for otherwise actionable threats, libels, or invasions of privacy posted on its site by users. Does this make sense? Consider Tushnet, Internet Exceptionalism: An Overview from General Constitutional Law, 56 Wm. & M. L. Rev. 1637, 1665 (2015): “Suppose [that] §230 were replaced by a regime requiring that intermediaries do something to limit the distribution of harmful material—that they adopt a different business model. The question is whether such business-model regulation would be constitutionally permissible, even though the regime might be described as one in which the regulation was adopted for the purpose of restricting the dissemination of harmful information.”

6. Freedom of the press in a global society. Consider L. Bollinger, Uninhibited, Robust, and Wide-Open: A Free Press for a New Century 105–106, 116–117 (2010):

[We] are facing the emergence of a global society, with the technological capacity to provide a free and independent press to a world in desperate need of such an institution, but there is also a myriad of laws, policies, practices, and conditions that inhibit and impede that from happening. Without a central, overriding system of constitutional protections, there is a risk of a collapse to the bottom, where jurisdictions that have the least degree of freedom will undermine the freedom of those that value it the most....

This situation poses a significant challenge to the United States and the world. For a society uniquely committed to unconstrained public debate and for which knowledge of the entire world is increasingly vital, we must now see how we can achieve this goal—to make it a shared principle as well as a working reality—in a world that is not in full agreement with the American conception of a free press. [To help achieve this, the Supreme Court must] begin the process of making the shift from the constitutional paradigm of a national public forum to a global one.

Note: Free Expression—Final Thoughts

Consider Post, Recuperating First Amendment Doctrine, 47 Stan. L. Rev. 1249, 1249–1250 (1995):

Contemporary First Amendment doctrine [is] striking chiefly for its superficiality, its internal incoherence, its distressing failure to facilitate constructive judicial engagement with significant contemporary social issues connected with freedom of speech....[It] has become increasingly a doctrine of words merely, and not of things.

On the other hand, consider S. Shiffrin, The First Amendment, Democracy, and Romance 159 (1990):

American citizens not only feel a deep emotional attachment to the country, but also [a] sense of pride about the first amendment. The first amendment speaks to the kind of people we are and the kind of people we aspire to be. [It] plays an important role in the construction of an appealing story, a story about a nation that promotes independent people, a nation that affords a place of refuge for peoples all over the globe, a nation that welcomes the iconoclast, a nation that respects, tolerates, and even sponsors dissent. [The] image called up by this national picture [encourages] us to picture Walt Whitman's citizenry—vibrant, diverse, vital, stubborn, and independent. It encourages us to believe with Emerson that “America is the idea of emancipation.”

A quarter-century later, Shiffrin offered a rather different assessment: “The main problem with the First Amendment [is] that it overprotects speech. [Free] speech doctrine downplays the harm that speech can cause. Indeed, its most problematic assumption is that free speech is considered to be so valuable that it almost always outweighs other values with which it comes into conflict. Of course, free speech is ordinarily valuable, but there is no good reason to assume that it invariably should outweigh other values. Nor is that assumption harmless.”

Shiffrin goes on to note that first amendment doctrine unjustifiably runs roughshod over important competing values by protecting “privacy-invading speech,” “racist speech,” “violent video games,” “commercial advertising that encourages a materialistic and hedonistic culture,” and political contributions and expenditures that enable “corporations and wealthy individuals” to undermine democracy and thwart “the will of the people and the common good.”

S. Shiffrin, What's Wrong With the First Amendment 1–2 (2016).

On the other hand, consider Abrams, The Soul of the First Amendment xvi–xvii, xxiii (2017):

The uniquely high level of American protection for free expression does not necessarily mean that American society is better served in all respects. [Nevertheless,] adopting a legal system that defends speech in a less exuberant manner than the United States has consequences. [There] is no doubt that a price is paid, sometimes a serious one, for [America's uniquely robust protection of free speech]; the American approach is not oblivious to that price but insists (as other countries do not) that the dangers of permitting the government to decide what may and may not be said, far more often than not, outweigh any benefits that may result from suppressing or punishing [such] speech. [Indeed, the] First Amendment is the rock star of the American Constitution.

On how the Court worked out the meaning of the first amendment over time, consider Kozel, Precedent and Speech, 102 Iowa L. Rev. 1187 (2017):

[The] question is why deference to precedent—a feature the Court has described as foundational to the rule of law—is so readily overcome in the First Amendment context. [If] the purpose of stare decisis is to promote the law's stability, predictability, and impersonality, the doctrine cannot wilt at the mention of free speech. Sometimes it is better for the law to remain settled despite its failure to protect expressive liberty as vigorously as today's Court may deem appropriate.

[Indeed, without] meaningful deference to precedent, judicial interpretations of the First Amendment will fluctuate [with changes in the makeup of the Court, as illustrated perhaps most dramatically by the Court's campaign finance decisions.] Stare decisis reflects [a] conception of the law [in] which constitutional rules survive changes in judicial personnel. [Sometimes] it is better for the law to remain settled despite its failure to protect expressive liberty as vigorously as today's Court may deem appropriate.

Finally, consider D. Strauss, The Living Constitution 52–53 (2010):

[The] First Amendment—that is, the principles protecting free speech—has been a tremendous success story in American constitutional law. But where did these successful principles come from? They did not come from the text of the Constitution. The First Amendment was part of the Constitution for a century and a half before the central principles of the American regime of free speech [became] established in the law. Nor did those principles come from the original understandings. [To] the extent that we can determine the views of [the Framers], they did not think they were establishing a system of freedom of expression resembling what we have today.

The central principles of the American system of freedom of expression, in other words, are not the product of a moment of inspired constitutional genius 200-plus years ago. We owe those principles, instead, to the living, common law Constitution. The central features of First Amendment law were hammered out in fits and starts, in a series of judicial decisions and extrajudicial developments, over the course of the twentieth century. The story of the emergence of the American constitutional law of free speech is a story of evolution and precedent, trial and error—a demonstration of how the living Constitution works.

1 It was on the theory that the Smith Act [embodied] such a principle and that it had been applied only in conformity with it that this Court sustained the Act's constitutionality. [Dennis.] That this was the basis for Dennis was emphasized in [Yates], in which the Court overturned convictions for advocacy of the forcible overthrow of the Government under the Smith Act, because the trial judge's instructions had allowed convictions for mere advocacy, unrelated to its tendency to produce forcible action.

1 “Section 722. Any person who with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned, commits any of the following acts shall be deemed to have committed the offense of disorderly conduct:

- “1. Uses offensive, disorderly, threatening, abusive or insulting language, conduct or behavior;
- “2. Acts in such a manner as to annoy, disturb, interfere with, obstruct, or be offensive to others;
- “3. Congregates with others on a public street and refuses to move on when ordered by the police....

* Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965), and similar cases regarding temporary restraints of allegedly obscene materials are not in point. For those cases rest upon the proposition that “obscenity is not protected by the freedoms of speech and press.” [Here] there is no question but that the material sought to be suppressed is within the protection of the First Amendment; the only question is whether, notwithstanding that fact, its publication may be enjoined for a time because of the presence of an overwhelming national interest.

8 Section 793(e) of 18 U.S.C. provides that:

- (e) Whoever having unauthorized possession of, access to, or control over any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, instrument, appliance, or note relating to the national defense, or information relating to the national defense which information the possessor has reason to believe could be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation, willfully communicates, delivers, transmits or causes to be communicated, delivered, or transmitted, or attempts to communicate, deliver, transmit or cause to be communicated, delivered, or transmitted the same to any person not entitled to receive it, or willfully retains the same and fails to deliver it to the officer or employee of the United States entitled to receive it; is guilty of an offense punishable by 10 years in prison, a $10,000 fine, or both.

3 Approximately 394 copies of the edition of the Times containing the advertisement were circulated in Alabama. Of these, about 35 copies were distributed in Montgomery County. The total circulation of the Times for that day was approximately 650,000 copies....

10 Even a false statement may be deemed to make a valuable contribution to public debate, since it brings about "the clearer perception and livelier impression of truth, produced by its collision with error." Mill, On Liberty (Oxford: Blackwell, 1947), at 15; see also Milton, Areopagitica in Prose Works (Yale, 1959), Vol. II, at 561.

23 We have no occasion here to determine how far down into the lower ranks of government employees the "public official" designation would extend for purposes of this rule, or otherwise to specify categories of persons who would or would not be included. Nor need we here determine the boundaries of the "official conduct" concept. It is enough for the present case that respondent's position as an elected city commissioner clearly made him a public official, and that the allegations in the advertisement concerned what was allegedly his official conduct as Commissioner in charge of the Police Department....

16 "Of the desirability—indeed of the necessity—of some such protection [of the right of privacy], there can, it is believed, be no doubt. The press is overstepping in every direction the obvious bounds of propriety and of decency. Gossip is no longer the resource of the idle and of the vicious, but has become a trade, which is pursued with industry as well as effrontery. To satisfy a prurient taste the details of sexual relations are spread broadcast in the columns of the daily papers. To occupy the indolent, column upon column is filled with idle gossip, which can only be procured by intrusion upon the domestic circle. The intensity and complexity of life, attendant upon advancing civilization, have rendered necessary some retreat from the world, and man, under the refining influence of culture, has become more sensitive to publicity, so that solitude and privacy have become more essential to the individual; but modern enterprise and invention have, through invasions upon his privacy, subjected him to mental pain and distress, far greater than could be inflicted by mere bodily injury...."

* [At the outset, Justice Blackmun rejected a claim that, even if first amendment protection attached to the flow of drug price information, it is a protection enjoyed only by advertisers and not by the appellees, who were mere recipients of such information. Justice Blackmun reasoned that, "where a speaker exists, [the] protection afforded is to the communication, to its source and to its recipients both." Thus, "if there is a right to advertise, there is a reciprocal [first amendment] right to receive the advertising."—Eds.]

24 In concluding that commercial speech enjoys First Amendment protection, we have not held that it is wholly undifferentiable from other forms. There are commonsense differences between speech that does "no more than propose a commercial transaction," and other varieties. Even if the differences do not justify the conclusion that commercial speech is valueless, and thus subject to complete suppression by the State, they nonetheless suggest that a different degree of protection is necessary to insure that the flow of truthful and legitimate commercial information is unimpaired. The truth of commercial speech, for example, may be more easily verifiable by its disseminator than, let us say, news reporting or political commentary, in that ordinarily the advertiser seeks to disseminate information about a specific product or service that he himself provides and presumably knows more about than anyone else. Also, commercial speech may be more durable than other kinds. Since advertising is the sine qua non of commercial profits, there is little likelihood of its being chilled by proper regulation and forgone entirely.

Attributes such as these, the greater objectivity and hardiness of commercial speech, may make it less necessary to tolerate inaccurate statements for fear of silencing the speaker. [They] may also make it appropriate to require that a commercial message appear in such a form, or include such additional information, warnings, and disclaimers, as are necessary to prevent its being deceptive. [They] may also make inapplicable the prohibition against prior restraints....

25 We stress that we have considered in this case the regulation of commercial advertising by pharmacists. Although we express no opinion as to other professions, the distinctions, historical and functional, between professions may require consideration of quite different factors. Physicians and lawyers, for example, do not dispense standardized products; they render professional services of almost infinite variety and nature, with the consequent enhanced possibility for confusion and deception if they were to undertake certain kinds of advertising.

13 In [Jacobellis] two Justices argued that application of “local” community standards would run the risk of preventing dissemination of materials in some places because sellers would be unwilling to risk criminal conviction by testing variations in standards from place to place. [The] use of “national” standards, however, necessarily implies that materials found tolerable in some places, but not under the “national” criteria, will nevertheless be unavailable where they are acceptable. Thus, in terms of danger to free expression, the potential for suppression seems at least as great in the application of a single nationwide standard as in allowing distribution in accordance with local tastes....

7 It is conceivable that an “adult” theater can—if it really insists—prevent the exposure of its obscene wares to juveniles. An “adult” bookstore, dealing in obscene books, magazines, and pictures, cannot realistically make this claim. The legitimate interest in preventing exposure of juveniles to obscene material cannot be fully served by simply barring juveniles from the immediate physical premises of “adult” bookstores, when there is a flourishing “outside business” in these materials.

15 The state statute books are replete with constitutionally unchallenged laws against prostitution, suicide, voluntary self-mutilation, brutalizing “bare fist” prize fights, and duels, although these crimes may only directly involve “consenting adults.” Statutes making bigamy a crime surely cut into an individual’s freedom to associate, but few today seriously claim such statutes violate the First Amendment or any other constitutional provision....

16 Huffman v. United States, 152 U.S. App. D.C. 238, 470 F.2d 386 (1971). The test apparently requires an effort to distinguish between “singles” and “duals,” between “erect penises” and “semi-erect penises,” and between “ongoing sexual activity” and “imminent sexual activity.”

26 Indeed, since Stanley was decided, [the] President's Commission on Obscenity and Pornography has concluded: "In sum, empirical research designed to clarify the question has found no evidence to date that exposure to explicit sexual materials plays a significant role in the causation of delinquent or criminal behavior among youth or adults. The Commission cannot conclude that exposure to erotic materials is a factor in the causation of sex crime or sex delinquency...."

1 The conduct might have violated Minnesota statutes [prohibiting "terrorist threats," arson, or criminal damage to property]. [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

* Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, also filed a separate opinion, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

* [At the time of Davis, the Court had not as yet held the first amendment applicable to the states, thus undermining the precedential force of Davis as a "free speech" decision. It appears that the primary constitutional issue before the Court concerned dictum in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886), suggesting that the equal protection clause prohibited all forms of standardless licensing. This dictum was rejected more clearly in a series of subsequent decisions. See Lieberman v. Van de Carr, 199 U.S. 552 (1905); Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U.S. 183 (1900); Wilson v. Eureka, 173 U.S. 32 (1899).—Eds.]

10 In declaring unconstitutional an advertising policy remarkably similar to the city's policy in the present case, the California Supreme Court detailed "the paradoxical scope of the [transit] district's policy [banning political advertising]" in the following manner:

A cigarette company is permitted to advertise the desirability of smoking its brand, but a cancer society is not entitled to caution by advertisement that cigarette smoking is injurious to health. A theater may advertise a motion picture that portrays sex and violence, but the Legion for Decency has no right to post a message calling for clean films. A lumber company may advertise its wood products, but a conservation group cannot implore citizens to write to the President or Governor about protecting our natural resources. An oil refinery may advertise its products, but a citizens' organization cannot demand enforcement of existing air pollution statutes. An insurance company may announce its available policies, but a senior citizens' club cannot plead for legislation to improve our social security program. Advertisements for travel, foods, clothing, toiletries, automobiles, legal drugs—all these are acceptable, but the American Legion would not have the right to place a paid advertisement reading, "Support Our Boys in Viet Nam. Send Holiday Packages."

Wirta v. Alameda-Contra Costa Transit District, 63 Cal. 2d 51, 57–58, 434 P.2d 982, 986–987 (1967).

11 For example, the record indicates that church advertising was accepted for display on the Shaker Heights Rapid Transit System.

17 The nongovernmental appellees argue that just as the decibels emitted by a sound truck can be regulated consistently with the First Amendment, [Kovacs,] the Act may restrict the volume of dollars in political campaigns without impermissibly restricting freedom of speech. [This] comparison underscores a fundamental misconception. The decibel restriction upheld in Kovacs limited the manner of operating a soundtruck, but not the extent of its proper use. By contrast, the Act's dollar ceilings restrict the extent of the reasonable use of virtually every means of communicating information....

18 Being free to engage in unlimited political expression subject to a ceiling on expenditures is like being free to drive an automobile as far and as often as one desires on a single tank of gasoline.

20 The record indicates that, as of January 1, 1975, one full-page advertisement in a daily edition of a certain metropolitan newspaper cost $6,971.04—almost seven times the annual limit on expenditures “relative to” a particular candidate imposed on the vast majority of individual citizens and associations by [the act].

23 Statistical findings agreed to by the parties reveal that approximately 5.1% of the $73,483,613 raised by the 1,161 candidates for Congress in 1974 was obtained in amounts in excess of $1,000....

33 In this discussion, we address only the argument that the contribution limitations alone impermissibly discriminate against nonincumbents. We do not address the more serious argument that these limitations, in combination with the limitation on expenditures [invidiously] discriminate against major-party challengers and minor-party candidates.

Since an incumbent is subject to these limitations to the same degree as his opponent, the Act, on its face, appears to be evenhanded. The appearance of fairness, however, may not reflect political reality. Although some incumbents are defeated in every congressional election, it is axiomatic that an incumbent usually begins the race with significant advantages. [In some circumstances] the overall effect of the contribution and expenditure limitations enacted by Congress could foreclose any fair opportunity of a successful challenge.

However, since we decide in Part I-C, infra, that the ceilings on [expenditures] are unconstitutional under the First Amendment, we need not express any opinion with regard to the alleged invidious discrimination resulting from the full sweep of the legislation as enacted.

9 Candidates who must raise large initial contributions in order to appeal for more funds to a broader audience will be handicapped....

10 Under the Court's holding, candidates with personal fortunes will be free to contribute to their own campaigns as much as they like, since the Court chooses to view the Act's provisions in this regard as unconstitutional “expenditure” limitations rather than “contribution” limitations....

1 “In the Nation's seven largest States in 1970, 11 of the 15 major senatorial candidates were millionaires. The four who were not millionaires lost their bid for election.”....

33 In his Press Subpoenas: An Empirical and Legal Analysis, Study Report of the Reporters' Committee on Freedom of the Press 6–12, Prof. Vince Blasi [found] that slightly more than half of the 975 reporters questioned said that they relied on regular confidential sources for at least 10% of their stories. Of this group of reporters, only 8% were able to say with some certainty that their professional functioning had been adversely affected by the threat of subpoena; another 11% were not certain whether or not they had been adversely affected. [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

17 Whether the public has a right to attend trials of civil cases is a question not raised by this case, but we note that historically both civil and criminal trials have been presumptively open.

18 We have no occasion here to define the circumstances in which all or parts of a criminal trial may be closed to the public, but our holding today does not mean that the First Amendment rights of the public and representatives of the press are absolute. Just as a government may impose reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions upon the use of its streets in the interest of such objectives as the free flow of traffic, see, e.g., Cox v. New Hampshire, [section E2a supra], so may a trial judge, in the interest of the fair administration of justice, impose reasonable limitations on access to a trial. [Moreover], since courtrooms have limited capacity, there may be occasions when not every person who wishes to attend can be accommodated. In such situations, reasonable restrictions on general access are traditionally imposed, including preferential seating for media representatives....

24 For example, national security concerns about confidentiality may sometimes warrant closures during sensitive portions of trial proceedings, such as testimony about state secrets. Cf. United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 714–716 (1974).

13 If a State employed the same method of taxation but applied a lower rate to the press, so that there could be no doubt that the legislature was not singling out the press to bear a more burdensome tax, we would, of course, be in a position to evaluate the relative burdens. And, given the clarity of the relative burdens, as well as the rule that differential methods of taxation are not automatically permissible if less burdensome, a lower tax rate for the press would not raise the threat that the legislature might later impose an extra burden that would escape detection by the courts.

28 We need not deal with the argument that even if there is no longer a technological scarcity of frequencies limiting the number of broadcasters, there nevertheless is an economic scarcity in the sense that the Commission could or does limit entry to the broadcasting market on economic grounds and license no more stations than the market will support. Hence, it is said, the fairness doctrine or its equivalent is essential to satisfy the claims of those excluded and of the public generally. A related argument, which we also put aside, is that quite apart from scarcity of frequencies, technological or economic, Congress does not abridge freedom of speech or press by legislation directly or indirectly multiplying the voices and views presented to the public through time sharing, fairness doctrines, or other devices which limit or dissipate the power of those who sit astride the channels of communication with the general public....

VIII

The Constitution and Religion

The first amendment bars Congress from making laws “respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” In addition to discussing doctrinal approaches to church/state issues, this chapter examines whether the relative clarity of the constitutional text, or its history, eases the task of constitutional adjudication or reduces the necessity for other theoretical underpinnings to the constitutional law of religion.

This chapter has four sections. The first provides historical background and outlines the general approaches that courts and commentators have taken to the religion clauses. The second examines problems of establishment, highlighting the tension between the idea that the establishment clause requires some degree of separation between church and state and a history that includes substantial state support of religious activities. The third section deals with problems of free exercise, focusing on the degree to which government must or may adjust its programs to claims that the programs burden the free exercise of religion. The fourth deals with the constitutional status of legislative efforts to accommodate religion through laws that arguably relieve burdens on the free exercise of religion.

A. INTRODUCTION: HISTORICAL AND ANALYTICAL OVERVIEW

EVERSON v. BOARD OF EDUCATION, 330 U.S. 1 (1947). New Jersey authorized its local school boards to repay parents with children in private schools for the cost of bus transportation to the schools. Most of the private schools were Roman Catholic parochial institutions. By a five-to-four vote, the Court upheld the statute against an establishment clause challenge, concluding that the state could pay the fares “as part of a general program under which it pays the fares of pupils attending public and other schools.” This satisfied the first amendment’s requirement that “the state [be] neutral in its relations with groups of religious believers and non-believers.” Justice Black’s opinion for the Court “[reviewed] the background and environment of” the first amendment: “A large proportion of the early settlers of this country came here from Europe to escape the bondage of laws which compelled them to support and attend government-favored churches. The centuries immediately before and contemporaneous with the colonization of America had been filled with turmoil, civil strife, and persecutions, generated in large part by established sects determined to maintain their absolute political and religious supremacy. With the power of government supporting them, at various times and places, Catholics had persecuted Protestants, Protestants had persecuted Catholics, Protestant sects had persecuted other Protestant sects, Catholics of one shade of belief had persecuted Catholics of another shade of belief, and all of these had from time to time persecuted Jews. In efforts to force loyalty to whatever group happened to be on top and in league with the government of a particular time and place, men and women had been fined, cast in jail, cruelly tortured, and killed....

“These practices of the old world were transplanted to and began to thrive in the soil of the new America. The very charters granted by the English Crown to the individuals and companies designated to make the laws which would control the destinies of the colonials authorized these individuals and companies to erect religious establishments which all, whether believers or non-believers, would be required to support and attend. An exercise of this authority was accompanied by a repetition of many of the old-world practices and persecutions. Catholics found themselves hounded and proscribed because of their faith; Quakers who followed their conscience went to jail; Baptists were peculiarly obnoxious to certain dominant Protestant sects; men and women of varied faiths who happened to be in a minority in a particular locality were persecuted because they steadfastly persisted in worshipping God only as their own consciences dictated. And all of these dissenters were compelled to pay tithes and taxes to support government-sponsored churches whose ministers preached inflammatory sermons designed to strengthen and consolidate the established faith by generating a burning hatred against dissenters.

“These practices became so commonplace as to shock the freedom-loving colonials into a feeling of abhorrence. The imposition of taxes to pay ministers’ salaries and to build and maintain churches and church property aroused their indignation. It was these feelings which found expression in the First Amendment. [Virginia,] where the established church had achieved a dominant influence in political affairs and where many excesses attracted wide public attention, provided a great stimulus and able leadership for the movement. The people there, as elsewhere, reached the conviction that individual religious liberty could be achieved best under a government which was stripped of all power to tax, to support, or otherwise to assist any or all religions, or to interfere with the beliefs of any religious individual or group.

“The movement toward this end reached its dramatic climax in Virginia in 1785–86 when the Virginia legislative body was about to renew Virginia’s tax levy for the support of the established church. Thomas Jefferson and James Madison led the fight against this tax. Madison wrote his great Memorial and Remonstrance against the law. In it, he eloquently argued that a true religion did not need the support of law; that no person, either believer or non-believer, should be taxed to support a religious institution of any kind; that the best interest of a society required that the minds of men always be wholly free; and that cruel persecutions were the inevitable result of government-established religions. Madison’s Remonstrance received stronger support throughout Virginia, and [when] the proposed tax measure [came] up for consideration [it] not only died in committee, but the Assembly enacted the famous ‘Virginia Bill for Religious Liberty’ originally written by Thomas Jefferson. The preamble to that Bill stated among other things that Almighty God hath created the mind free; that all attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burthens, or by civil incapacitations, tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the Holy author of our religion, who being Lord both of body and mind, yet chose not to propagate it by coercions on either...; that to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves, is sinful and tyrannical; that even the forcing him to support this or that teacher of his own religious persuasion, is depriving him of the comfortable liberty of giving his contributions to the particular pastor, whose morals he would make his pattern....

And the statute itself enacted

That no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place, or ministry whatsoever, nor shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or burthened in his body or goods, nor shall otherwise suffer on account of his religious opinions or belief....

“[The] provisions of the First Amendment, in the drafting and adoption of which Madison and Jefferson played such leading roles, had the same objective and were intended to provide the same protection against governmental intrusion on religious liberty as the Virginia statute....”

The opinion summarized the meaning of the establishment clause: “[It] means at least this: Neither a state nor the Federal Government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another. Neither can force nor influence a person to go to or to remain away from church against his will or force him to profess a belief or disbelief in any religion. No person can be punished for entertaining or professing religious beliefs or disbeliefs, for church attendance or non-attendance. No tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion. Neither a state nor the Federal Government can, openly or secretly, participate in the affairs of any religious organizations or groups and vice versa. In the words of Jefferson, the clause was intended to erect ‘a wall of separation between Church and State.’ Reynolds v. United States [98 U.S. at 164].”

The dissenters agreed with Justice Black’s description of the relevant history, but argued that the New Jersey statute breached the “wall” of separation. Questions regarding state aid to nonpublic education are discussed in more detail in section B4 infra.

Note: The History of the Religion Clauses

1. Two views of the Memorial and Remonstrance. In Rosenberger v. Rectors & Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995), Justices Thomas (concurring) and Souter (in dissent) offered competing interpretations of the establishment clause’s history.

Summarizing the view of legal commentators, Justice Thomas wrote, “For some, the experience in Virginia is consistent with the view that the Framers saw the Establishment Clause simply as a prohibition on governmental preferences for some religious faiths over others. Other commentators have rejected this view, concluding that the Establishment Clause forbids not only government preferences for some religious sects over others, but also government preferences for religion over irreligion.” Justice Thomas found “much to commend the former view. [The] funding provided by the Virginia assessment was to be extended only to Christian sects, and the Remonstrance seized on this defect: ‘Who does not see that the same authority which can establish Christianity, in exclusion of all other Religions, may establish with the same ease any particular sect of Christians, in exclusion of all other Sects.’” He continued:

[Even] if Madison believed that the principle of non-establishment of religion precluded government financial support for religion per se (in the sense of government benefits specifically targeting religion), there is no indication that at the time of the framing he took the [extreme] view that the government must discriminate against religious adherents by excluding them from more generally available financial subsidies.

Justice Thomas pointed to “historical examples of funding that date back to the time of the founding. [Both] Houses of the First Congress elected chaplains.” There were “other, less familiar examples of what amount to direct funding [in] early Acts of Congress. See, e.g., Act of Feb. 20, 1833 (authorizing the State of Ohio to sell ‘all or any part of the lands heretofore reserved and appropriated by Congress for the support of religion within the Ohio Company’s...purchases... and to invest the money arising from the sale thereof, in some productive fund; the proceeds of which shall be for ever annually applied...for the support of religion within the several townships for which said lands were originally reserved and set apart, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever’).”

Justice Souter offered a different interpretation of Madison’s position. “[The] bill [to which the Remonstrance was directed would] have allowed a taxpayer to refuse to appropriate his levy to any religious society, in which case the legislature was to use these unappropriated sums to fund ‘seminaries of learning.’ While some of these seminaries undoubtedly would have been religious in character, others would not have been, as a seminary was generally understood at the time to be ‘any school, academy, college or [university].’ N. Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language (1st ed. 1828). [The] fact that the bill, if passed, would have funded secular as well as religious instruction did nothing to soften Madison’s opposition to it.”

Justice Souter continued, “Nor is it fair to argue that Madison opposed the bill only because it treated religious groups unequally. [Madison] strongly inveighed against the proposed aid for religion for a host of reasons [and] many of those reasons would have applied whether or not the state aid was being distributed equally among sects, and whether or not the aid was going to those sects in the context of an evenhanded government program. See, e.g., ¶1 (‘In matters of Religion, no man’s right is abridged by the institution of Civil Society, and...Religion is wholly exempt from its cognizance’); ¶7 (‘Experience witnesseth that ecclesiastical establishments, instead of maintaining the purity and efficacy of Religion, have had a contrary operation’). [Madison’s] Remonstrance did not argue for a bill distributing aid to all sects and religions on an equal basis, and the outgrowth of the Remonstrance and the defeat of the Virginia assessment was not such a bill; rather, it was the Virginia Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom, which [proscribed] the use of tax dollars for religious purposes.”

2. Some historical detail. Justice Souter’s concurring opinion in Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), offered this view of the first amendment’s background and early history:

When James Madison arrived at the First Congress with a series of proposals to amend the National Constitution, one of the provisions read that “the civil rights of none shall be abridged on account of religious belief or worship, nor shall any national religion be established, nor shall the full and equal rights of conscience be in any manner, or on any pretext, infringed.” Madison’s language [was] sent to a Select Committee of the House, which, without explanation, changed it to read that “no religion shall be established by law, nor shall the equal rights of conscience be infringed.” Thence the proposal went to the Committee of the Whole, which was in turn dissatisfied with the Select Committee’s language and adopted an alternative proposed by Samuel Livermore of New Hampshire: “Congress shall make no laws touching religion, or infringing the rights of conscience.”...

The House rewrote the amendment once more before sending it to the Senate, this time adopting, without recorded debate, language derived from a proposal by Fisher Ames of Massachusetts: “Congress shall make no law establishing Religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor shall the rights of conscience be infringed.” [The] House rejected the Select Committee’s version, which arguably ensured only that “no religion” enjoyed an official preference over others, and deliberately chose instead a prohibition extending to laws establishing “religion” in general....

[In] September 1789, the Senate [briefly] entertained this language: “Congress shall make no law establishing One Religious Sect or Society in preference to others, nor shall the rights of conscience be infringed.” After rejecting two minor amendments to that proposal, the Senate dropped it altogether. [Six] days later, the Senate went half circle and adopted its narrowest language yet: “Congress shall make no law establishing articles of faith or a mode of worship, or prohibiting the free exercise of religion.” The Senate sent this proposal to the House....

[The] House rejected the Senate’s version of the Establishment Clause. [The] House conferees ultimately won out, persuading the Senate to accept [the] final text of the Religion Clauses. [Unlike] the earliest House drafts or the final Senate proposal, the prevailing language is not limited to laws respecting an establishment of “a religion,” “a national religion,” “one religious sect,” or specific “articles of faith.”²

What we thus know of the Framers’ experience underscores the observation [that] confining the Establishment Clause to a prohibition on preferential aid “requires a premise that the Framers were extraordinarily bad drafters—that they believed one thing but adopted language that said something substantially different, and that they did so after repeatedly attending to the choice of language.” Laycock, “Nonpreferential” Aid....³

While some argue that the Framers added the word “respecting” simply to foreclose federal interference with State establishments of religion, the language sweeps more broadly than that. In Madison’s words, the Clause in its final form forbids “everything like” a national religious establishment, and after incorporation, it forbids “everything like” a State religious establishment. The sweep is broad enough that Madison himself characterized congressional provisions for legislative and military chaplains as unconstitutional “establishments.”...

The Framers adopted the Religion Clauses in response to a long tradition of coercive state support for religion, particularly in the form of tax assessments, but their special antipathy to religious coercion did not exhaust their hostility to the features and incidents of establishment. Indeed, Jefferson and Madison opposed any political appropriation of religion, and [they] did not always temper their rhetoric with distinctions between coercive and noncoercive state action. When, for example, Madison criticized Virginia’s general assessment bill, he invoked principles antithetical to all state efforts to promote religion. An assessment, he wrote, is improper not simply because it forces people to donate “three pence” to religion, but, more broadly, because “it is itself a signal of persecution. It degrades from the equal rank of Citizens all those whose opinions in Religion do not bend to those of the Legislative authority.” J. Madison, Memorial and Remonstrance....

[Early] Presidents included religious messages in their inaugural and Thanksgiving Day addresses. [However, Americans] today find such proclamations less controversial than did the founding generation. President Jefferson [steadfastly] refused to issue Thanksgiving proclamations of any kind, in part because he thought they violated the Religion Clauses. Letter from Thomas Jefferson to Rev. S. Miller (Jan. 23, 1808)....

It is only proposed that I should recommend, not prescribe a day of fasting & prayer. That is, that I should indirectly assume to the U.S. an authority over religious exercises which the Constitution has directly precluded from them. It must be meant too that this recommendation is to carry some authority, and to be sanctioned by some penalty on those who disregard it; not indeed of fine and imprisonment, but of some degree of proscription perhaps in public opinion.

By condemning such non-coercive state practices that, in “recommending” the majority faith, demean religious dissenters “in public opinion,” Jefferson necessarily condemned what, in modern terms, we call official endorsement of religion. He accordingly construed the Establishment Clause to forbid not simply state coercion, but also state endorsement, of religious belief and observance.⁵ And if he opposed impersonal presidential addresses for inflicting “proscription in public opinion,” all the more would he have condemned less diffuse expressions of official endorsement.

During his first three years in office, James Madison also refused to call for days of thanksgiving and prayer, though later, amid the political turmoil of the War of 1812, he did so on four separate occasions. Upon retirement, in an essay condemning as an unconstitutional “establishment” the use of public money to support congressional and military chaplains, he concluded that “religious proclamations by the Executive recommending thanksgivings & fasts are shoots from the same root with the legislative acts reviewed. Altho’ recommendations only, they imply a religious agency, making no part of the trust delegated to political rulers.”...

Madison’s failure to keep pace with his principles in the face of congressional pressure cannot erase the principles. He admitted to backsliding, and explained that he had made the content of his wartime proclamations inconsequential enough to mitigate much of their impropriety....

To be sure, the leaders of the young Republic engaged in some of the practices that separationists like Jefferson and Madison criticized. The First Congress did hire institutional chaplains, and Presidents Washington and Adams unapologetically marked days of “public thanksgiving and prayer.” Yet in the face of the separationist dissent, those practices prove, at best, that the Framers simply did not share a common understanding of the Establishment Clause, and, at worst, that they, like other politicians, could raise constitutional ideals one day and turn their backs on them the next....

3. A challenge to originalist approaches. What are the implications of the observation (if correct) that the historical materials “prove [that] the Framers [did] not share a common understanding”? Consider these observations by Justice Brennan, concurring in Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963), which held unconstitutional the practice of devotional Bible-reading in public schools:

[An] awareness of history and an appreciation of the aims of the Founding Fathers do not always resolve concrete problems. [A] more fruitful inquiry [is] whether the practices [threaten] those consequences which the Framers deeply feared; whether, in short, they tend to promote that type of interdependence between religion and state which the First Amendment was designed to prevent.

[Our] religious composition makes us a vastly more diverse people than were our forefathers. They knew differences chiefly among Protestant sects. Today the Nation is far more heterogeneous religiously. [In] the face of such profound changes, practices which may have been objectionable to no one in the time of Jefferson and Madison may today be highly offensive to many persons, the deeply devout and the nonbelievers alike.

Consider the proposition that social change, such as the expansion of government, ought to affect the interpretation of both religion clauses: When government was confined to the enforcement of the common law and relatively little else, its potential for adversely affecting religious exercises was small, and a regime of government neutrality with respect to religion might have allowed religious liberty to flourish; an expansive government means that neutral government rules may interfere substantially with religious liberty. To what extent do current controversies arise in circumstances threatening the kinds of public disorder with which the framers were familiar? Consider as well the general arguments originalists make against interpretation predicated on the (imputed) general purposes of constitutional provisions.

4. Other traditions. L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 1158–1160 (2d ed. 1988), describes another tradition:

[The] evangelical view (associated primarily with Roger Williams) [was] that “worldly corruptions [might] consume the churches if sturdy fences against the wilderness were not maintained.”...Roger Williams saw separation largely as a vehicle for protecting churches against the state. To the extent that it was possible to accept state aid without state control, he urged cooperation; indeed, he argued that the state must “countenance, encourage, and supply” those in religious service. Thus, his view has been called one of positive toleration, imposing on the state the burden of fostering a climate conducive to all religion.

Thomas Jefferson, in contrast, saw separation as a means of protecting the state from the church. [It] was Jefferson’s conviction that only the complete separation of religion from politics would eliminate the formal influence of religious institutions and provide for a free choice among political views; he therefore urged the strictest “wall of separation between church and state.”

James Madison believed that both religion and government could best achieve their high purposes if each were left free from the other within its respective sphere; he thus urged that the “tendency to a usurpation on one side or the other, or to a corrupting coalition or alliance between them, will be best guarded against by an entire abstinence [sic] of the Government from interference in any way whatever, beyond the necessity of preserving public order, & protecting each sect against trespass on its legal rights by others.”

For an analysis of Williams’s views, see Hall, Roger Williams and the Foundations of Religious Liberty, 71 B.U. L. Rev. 455 (1991).

In Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002), criticizing the Court’s decision upholding a school voucher program that allowed vouchers to be used at religiously affiliated schools, Justice Souter discussed how, in his view, the risk that religion would be corrupted by government aid was “already being realized.” He pointed to statutory provisions meaning that “the school may not give admission preferences to children who are members of the patron faith,” suggesting that “a participating religious school may [be] forbidden to choose a member of its own clergy to serve as teacher or principal over a layperson of a different religion claiming equal qualification for the job,” and suggesting that participating schools might not be allowed to “[teach] traditionally legitimate articles of faith as to the error, sinfulness, or ignorance of others, if they want government money for their schools.” What basis is there for a constitutional rule that protects religious institutions from making decisions that judges believe to be contrary to the institutions’ long-term interests?

For a discussion of the anticorruption approach to the nonestablishment principle, see Koppelman, Corruption of Religion and the Establishment Clause, 50 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 1831, 1896–1898 (2009), describing the anticorruption approach’s claims:

Religious behavior, without sincerity, is devoid of religious value. [Establishment] exaggerates the importance of doctrinal divisions. [The] state is an unreliable source of religious authority. [Religious] teachings are likely to be altered, in a pernicious way, if the teachers are agents of the state. [Establishment] tends to produce undeserved contempt toward religion. [The] legitimate authority of the state does not extend to religious questions.

With respect to the claim about altering religious teachings, why should religious leaders be precluded from considering or reconsidering their faith commitments in light of government policies? Should the fact that the anticorruption argument is founded on a contestable theological view rule it out as a general approach to the religion clauses? Do other general approaches have analogous religious foundations?

5. Federalism and incorporation. Recall that the bill of rights was adopted to allay fears that the Constitution's grants of power might authorize Congress to act in matters that should be left to the states. When the first amendment was adopted, several states had churches established by law. See W. Katz, Religion and American Constitutions 8–10 (1964) (arguing that the religion clauses were designed to bar Congress from interfering with existing establishments in the states).

The framers' concern for federalism and the language of the fourteenth amendment pose some problems for the use of the amendment to make the religion clauses applicable to the states. Consider Justice Brennan's argument in Schempp:

It has been suggested [that] absorption of the First Amendment's ban against congressional legislation "respecting an establishment of religion" is conceptually impossible because the Framers meant the Establishment Clause also to foreclose any attempt by Congress to disestablish the existing official state churches. [But] the last of the formal state establishments was dissolved more than three decades before the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified, and thus the problem of protecting official state churches from federal encroachments could hardly have been any concern of those who framed the post-Civil War Amendments. [The] Fourteenth Amendment created a panoply of new federal rights from the protection of citizens of the various States. And among those rights was freedom from such state governmental involvement in the affairs of religion as the Establishment Clause had originally foreclosed on the part of Congress.

It has also been suggested that the "liberty" guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment logically cannot absorb the Establishment Clause because that clause is not one of the provisions of the Bill of Rights which in terms protects a "freedom" of the individual. [This] contention [underestimates] the role of the Establishment Clause as a co-guarantor, with the Free Exercise Clause, of religious liberty. The Framers did not entrust the liberty of religious beliefs to either clause alone....

Finally, it has been contended that absorption of the Establishment Clause is precluded by the absence of any intention on the part of the Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment to circumscribe the residual powers of the States to aid religious activities and institutions in ways which fell short of formal establishments. That argument relies in part upon the express terms of the abortive Blaine Amendment—proposed several years after the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment—which would have added to the First Amendment a provision that “[n]o State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion....” Such a restriction would have been superfluous, it is said, if the Fourteenth Amendment had already made the Establishment Clause binding upon the States.

The argument proves too much, for the Fourteenth Amendment’s protection of the free exercise of religion can hardly be questioned; yet the Blaine Amendment would also have added an explicit protection against state laws abridging that liberty. [Further,] the religious liberty embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment would not be viable if the Constitution were interpreted to forbid only establishments ordained by Congress.

Justice Thomas discussed the federalism interpretation and its relationship to incorporation in his opinion concurring in the judgment in Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1 (2004). He would interpret the fourteenth amendment to protect a “liberty interest of being free from coercive state establishments,” and observed that such an interpretation might imply that “anything that would violate the incorporated establishment clause would actually violate the free exercise clause, further calling into doubt the utility of incorporating the establishment clause.”

Note: General Approaches to the Religion Clauses

The preceding material indicates that the religion clauses deal with the general area of religious liberty, though in differing ways. Is it useful to develop an overall approach to their interpretation? In considering the following efforts at synthesis, it may help to keep in mind the following questions about each approach: Would the approach permit Congress to exempt from the Social Security or income tax those who base their objections to payment on religious grounds? Would it require Congress to do so? Would the approach permit Congress to subsidize the operation of social services by church-related institutions? Would it require Congress to do so?

1. Strict separation. The clauses could be read to erect an absolute barrier to formal interdependence of religion and the state. Religious institutions could receive no aid whatever, direct or indirect, from the state. Nor could the state adjust its secular programs to alleviate burdens the programs placed on believers.

Strict separation has been questioned under both clauses. As to establishment, the Court in Everson argued that state-paid policemen, detailed to protect children going to and from church schools from the very real hazards of traffic, would serve much the same purpose and accomplish much the same result as state provisions intended to guarantee free transportation of a kind which the state deems to be best for the school children's welfare. And parents might refuse to risk their children to the danger of traffic accidents going to and from parochial schools, the approaches to which were not protected by policemen. Similarly, parents might be reluctant to permit their children to attend schools which the state had cut off from such general government services as ordinary police and fire protection, connections for sewage disposal, public highways and sidewalks. Of course, cutting off church schools from these services, so separate and so indisputably marked off from the religious function, would make it far more difficult for the schools to operate. But [the] First Amendment [requires] the state to be a neutral in its relations with groups of religious believers and non-believers; it does not require the state to be their adversary. State power is no more to be used so as to handicap religions than it is to favor them.

What is the relevance, if any, of the fact that "church schools" could hire private security guards and obtain other services from private providers, at the cost of increasing their tuition or subsidies from donations to the church?

2. Strict neutrality. Consider Kurland, Of Church and State and the Supreme Court, 29 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1, 5 (1961): "[Religion] may not be used as a basis for classification for purposes of governmental action, whether that action be the conferring of rights or privileges or the imposition of duties or obligations." Thus, states must use purely secular criteria as the basis for their actions. Strict neutrality does not permit, much less require, accommodation of secular programs to religious belief. It does permit aid to religious institutions that satisfy the purely secular criteria for participation in the program, at least if the courts are unwilling to conclude that the criteria were not concealed methods of using religion as a basis for the program.

3. Noncoercion and anti-indoctrination. Consider Schwarz, No Imposition of Religion: The Establishment Clause Value, 77 Yale L.J. 692, 693 (1968): The establishment clause prohibits "only aid which has as its motive or substantial effect the imposition of religious belief or practice." More broadly, the religion clauses prohibit the government from influencing religious choice. See Gianella, Religious Liberty, Nonestablishment, and Doctrinal Development, 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1381 (1967), 81 Harv. L. Rev. 513 (1968). Consider Gianella's argument that a society's institutions provide the structure within which choice is made, that different structures produce different choices, and that, in a society in which much is done in collective institutions, voluntarism requires aid to religion. 81 Harv. L. Rev. at 522–526. For example, the system of public education might be said to affect the values students come to acquire and might therefore influence their choices among religions or between religion and nonreligion. Is that an “imposition of religious belief”? If so, does it follow that state aid to religious schools, or a voucher system in which parents receive a specified sum from the state to use for the education of their children in public or private schools, is required by the Constitution? Alternatively, consider whether the use of taxes to provide aid to religious institutions is coercive or influences religious choice.

4. Nonpreferentialism. According to nonpreferentialist views, government may not favor one religion over another, nor may it disfavor any particular religious view (including antireligious views), but it may support religion in general. In a religiously pluralist society, what forms of aid are nondiscriminatory? Consider the observation by Justice Souter, in Lee v. Weisman, supra, that “a nonpreferentialist who would condemn subjecting public school graduates to, say, the Anglican liturgy would still need to explain why the government’s preference for Theistic over non-Theistic religion is constitutional.”

Should the religion clauses protect the interests of nonbelievers? Can they do so without creating a regime of hostility to religion? In a society with wide government involvement in subsidizing social activities, are refusals to subsidize religious institutions discriminatory against religion?

Dissenting in McCreary County v. ACLU of Kentucky, 545 U.S. 844 (2005), Justice Scalia, joined on this point by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Thomas, argued:

With respect to public acknowledgment of religious belief, [the] Establishment Clause permits [disregard] of polytheists and believers in unconcerned deities, just as it permits the disregard of devout atheists. [Historical] practices [demonstrate] that there is a distance between the acknowledgment of a single Creator and the establishment of a religion. [The] three most popular religions in the United States, Christianity, Judaism, and Islam—which combined account for 97.7% of all believers—are monotheistic. All of them [believe] that the Ten Commandments were given by God to Moses, and are divine prescriptions for a virtuous life. Publicly honoring the Ten Commandments is thus indistinguishable, insofar as discriminating against other religions is concerned, from publicly honoring God. Both practices are recognized across such a broad and diverse range of the population [that] they cannot be reasonably understood as a government endorsement of a particular religious viewpoint.

Justice Stevens responded to this argument in dissenting in Van Orden v. Perry, 545 U.S. 677 (2005): “[M]any of the Framers understood the word ‘religion’ in the Establishment Clause to encompass only the various sects of Christianity,” citing, among other sources, Justice Joseph Story’s Commentaries on the Constitution. “The original understanding of the type of ‘religion’ that qualified for constitutional protection under the Establishment Clause likely did not include [followers] of Judaism and Islam....The inclusion of Jews and Muslims inside the category of constitutionally favored religions surely would have shocked [Justice] Story. [The] history of the Establishment Clause’s original meaning just as strongly supports a preference for Christianity as it does a preference for monotheism.”

In his opinion in McCreary County, Justice Scalia replied, “Since most thought the Clause permitted government invocation of monotheism, and some others thought it permitted government invocation of Christianity, [Justice Stevens] proposes that it be construed not to permit any government invocation of religion at all. [Those] narrower views of the Establishment Clause were as clearly rejected as the more expansive ones.”

The majority opinion written by Justice Souter in McCreary County took the position that Justice Scalia’s argument “[failed] to consider the full range of evidence showing what the Framers believed.”

The dissent is certainly correct in putting forward evidence that some of the Framers thought some endorsement of religion was compatible with the establishment ban. [But there] is also evidence supporting the proposition that the Framers intended the Establishment Clause to require government neutrality in matters of religion....[The] fair inference is that there was no common understanding about the limits of the establishment prohibition....What the evidence does show is a group of statesmen [who] proposed a guarantee with contours not wholly worked out, leaving the Establishment Clause with edges still to be determined. And none the worse for that.

[Historical] evidence thus supports no solid argument for changing course.... [The] divisiveness of religion in current public life is inescapable. This is no time to deny the prudence of understanding the Establishment Clause to require the Government to stay neutral on religious belief, which is reserved for the conscience of the individual.

5. Voluntarism and separation. L. Tribe, supra, at 1160–1161, argues that the religion clauses rest on “a pair of fundamental [principles:] voluntarism and separation.” As to voluntarism,

[the] free exercise clause was at the very least designed to guarantee freedom of conscience by preventing any degree of compulsion in matters of belief. It prohibited not only direct compulsion but also any indirect coercion which might result from subtle discrimination; hence it was offended by any burden based specifically on one’s religion. So viewed, the free exercise clause is a mandate of religious voluntarism. The establishment clause [can] be understood as designed in part to assure that the advancement of a church would come only from the voluntary support of its followers and not from the political support of the state. Religious groups, it was believed, should prosper or perish on the intrinsic merit of their beliefs and practices....

Separatism [calls] for much more than the institutional separation of church and state; it means that the state should not become involved in religious affairs or derive its claim to authority from religious sources, that religious bodies should not be granted governmental powers, and—perhaps—that sectarian differences should not be allowed unduly to fragment the body politic. Implicit in this ideal of mutual abstinence was the principle that under no circumstance should religion be financially supported by public taxation: “for the men who wrote the Religion Clauses [the] ‘establishment’ of a religion connoted sponsorship, financial support, and active involvement of the sovereign in religious activity.”

Is the result in Everson consistent with these principles? When might the principles conflict with each other? Consider whether nondiscriminatory aid involves “indirect coercion” or “political support” of “a church” that might displace voluntary support by its members.

6. “Equal Liberty.” Eisgruber and Sager, Religious Freedom and the Constitution (2007), offer a general theory they call Equal Liberty, which contains two principles: “In the name of equality [no one] ought to be devalued on account of the spiritual foundations of their important commitments and projects.” Aside from attention to discrimination and “hostility and neglect,” religion should not be treated “as deserving special benefits or as subject to special disabilities.” In addition, a broad understanding of general constitutional liberties, such as rights of free speech and association “will allow religious practice to flourish.” Id. at 52–53. For a collection of commentaries (raising questions about how to identify “hostility and neglect,” and about the difference between this approach and others), see Book Review Colloquium, 85 Tex. L. Rev. 1185–1287 (2007).

7. Religious pluralism and the political process. Consider whether a justification for allowing governments some leeway in dealing with religion lies in the contemporary political process: The United States is a religiously pluralist society in which most religious groups are tolerant of views that diverge from their own. As proposals work their way through the political process, religiously based interest groups will affect their contours. It might be unlikely that programs threatening the values with which the religion clauses are concerned will emerge from that process. Is this pluralist sketch of the political process accurate? Are there programs on which substantial majorities can agree that disregard intense views of religious minorities, and that have substantial religious components?

In Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002), Justice Souter’s dissenting opinion argued that “[religious] teaching at taxpayer expense simply cannot be cordoned from taxpayer politics, and every major religion currently espouses social positions that provoke intense opposition. Not all taxpaying Protestant citizens [will] be content to underwrite the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church condemning the death penalty. Nor will all of America’s Muslims acquiesce in paying for the endorsement of the religious Zionism taught in many religious Jewish schools, which combines ‘a nationalistic sentiment’ in support of Israel with a ‘deeply religious’ element. Nor will every secular taxpayer be content to support Muslim views on differential treatment of the sexes, or, for that matter, to fund the espousal of a wife’s obligation of obedience to her husband, presumably taught in any schools adopting the articles of faith of the Southern Baptist Convention. Views like these, and innumerable others, have been safe in the sectarian pulpits and classrooms of this Nation not only because the Free Exercise Clause protects them directly, but because the ban on supporting religious establishment has protected free exercise, by keeping it relatively private. With the arrival of vouchers in religious schools, that privacy will go, and along with it will go confidence that religious disagreement will stay moderate.”

In connection with those observations, consider whether religious and political pluralism might combine to moderate disagreement, either through compromises that allow each religious institution to receive public assistance while maintaining its own views or through compromises that restrict all religious institutions. (Would the latter compromises violate the free speech clause?)

For a recent discussion of how pluralism should affect constitutional doctrine, see Inazu, Confident Pluralism (2016).

8. Baselines. Douglas Laycock, The Underlying Unity of Separation and Neutrality, 46 Emory L.J. 43, 49, 69–71 (1997), discusses the “no aid” and “equal access” theories, similar to strict separation and nonpreferentialism:

In the no-aid theory, the baseline is government inactivity, because doing nothing neither helps nor hurts religion. Any government aid to a religion is a departure from that baseline, and thus a departure from neutrality. In the nondiscrimination theory, the baseline is the government’s treatment of analogous secular activities; a government that pays for medical care should pay equally whether the care is provided in a religious or a secular hospital.

Laycock argues for a standard of “minimizing government influence”:

[The] underlying criterion for choosing among baselines depends on the incentives that government creates. If government says that it will pay for your soup kitchen if and only if you secularize it, that is a powerful incentive to secularize. [In] this context, the baseline of analogous secular activity is substantively neutral: if government will pay both religious and secular providers, it creates no incentive for either to change. [In] the regulatory context, substantive neutrality generally requires the baseline of government inactivity. If government says it will send you to jail if you consume peyote in a worship service, that is a powerful disincentive to religious behavior. But an exemption for religious behavior rarely encourages people to join the exempted church. [When] the claim to religious exemption is not contaminated by secular self-interest, exemption minimizes government influence on religion. [If] government were free to praise or condemn religion, celebrate religious holidays, or lead prayers or worship services, government could potentially have enormous influence on religious belief and liturgy. Government is large and highly visible; for better or worse, it would model one form of religious speech or observance as compared to others.

Is Justice Souter’s concern in Zelman-Harris that the availability of a subsidy—or exemption?—might subtly influence religious doctrine relevant to Laycock’s argument?

9. Why protect religion? Is the constitutional text alone sufficient to justify giving religion special protection? Must we also have reasons for thinking that religion ought to be specially protected? Consider these observations: (a) Laycock, Religious Liberty as Liberty, 7 J. Contemp. Legal Issues 313, 317 (1996): “First, in history that was recent to the American founders, government attempts to suppress disapproved religious views had caused vast human suffering. [Second], beliefs about religion are often of extraordinary importance to the individual—important enough to die for, to suffer for, to rebel for, to emigrate for, to fight to control the government for. [Third], beliefs at the heart of religion [are] of little importance to the civil government.” Are the first and second reasons distinctive to religion? Is the third reason true? (b) Garvey, An Anti-Liberal Argument for Religious Freedom, 7 J. Contemp. Legal Issues 275 (1996): “We protect it because religion is important.”

For recent discussions of this question, see Leiter, Why Tolerate Religion? (2012), offering a perspective from moral and political theory, and Koppelman, Defending American Religious Neutrality (2013), offering a perspective from political theory and law. For a review of these works, see Greene, Religion and Theistic Faith: On Koppelman, Leiter, Secular Purpose, and Accommodations, 49 Tulsa L. Rev. 441 (2013). See also Schwartzman, What If Religion Is Not Special?, 79 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1351 (2012):

[Many] of the most widely held normative justifications for favoring (or disfavoring) religion are prone to predictable forms of internal incoherence [and] accounts [that] manage to avoid such incoherence succeed only at the cost of committing other serious errors, especially in allowing various types of unfairness toward religious believers, nonbelievers, or both. The upshot of all this is that principles of disestablishment and free exercise ought to be conceived in terms that go beyond the category of religion. Instead of disabling or protecting only religious beliefs and practices, the law ought to provide similar treatment for comparable secular ethical, moral, and philosophical views.

Note: Defining Religion

The religion clauses require the courts to determine whether a form of belief is a “religion” within their meaning. If the free exercise clause requires the state to accommodate its secular programs to religious, but not to nonreligious (e.g., political), belief, courts must decide whether an objector’s belief is religious. The courts may be asked to decide whether the teaching of evolution or of creationism is an establishment of religion. What general considerations might guide the definitional effort?

1. Unitary or variable definitions? Justice Rutledge, dissenting in Everson, supra:

"Religion" appears only once in the [First] Amendment. But the word governs two prohibitions and governs them alike. It does not have two meanings, one narrow to forbid "an establishment" and another, much broader, for securing "the free exercise thereof." "Thereof" brings down "religion" with its entire and exact content, no more and no less, from the first into the second guaranty, so that Congress and now the states are as broadly restricted concerning the one as they are regarding the other.

L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 826–828 (1st ed. 1978):

At least through the nineteenth century, religion was given the same fairly narrow reading in the two clauses: "religion" referred to theistic notions respecting divinity, morality, and worship, and was recognized as legitimate and protected only insofar as it was generally accepted as "civilized" by Western standards....

[But religion] in America, always pluralistic, has become radically so in the latter part of the twentieth century. [There] are, of course, many traditionally theistic American theologians, but for many others there has been a shift in religious thought from a theocentric, transcendental perspective to forms of religious consciousness that stress the immanence of meaning in the natural order....

[Clearly,] the notion of religion in the free exercise clause must be expanded beyond the closely bounded limits of theism to account for the multiplying forms of recognizably legitimate religious exercise. It is equally clear, however, that in the age of the affirmative and increasingly pervasive state, a less expansive notion of religion was required for establishment clause purposes lest all "humane" programs of government be deemed constitutionally suspect. Such a twofold definition of religion—expansive for the free exercise clause, less so for the establishment clause—may be necessary to avoid confronting the state with increasingly difficult choices that the theory of permissible accommodations [could] not indefinitely resolve....

Is Tribe's approach consistent with the language of the Constitution? In the second edition of his treatise, Tribe calls this proposal "a dubious solution to a problem that [may] not exist at all" because courts can and should focus on the more important ideas of tolerance and establishment. L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 1186–1187 (2d ed. 1988).

2. An expansive definition by the Supreme Court: the conscientious objector cases. The Court's most extended consideration of the definition of religion occurred in a series of cases interpreting a federal statute granting an exemption from compulsory military service to any person “who, by reason of religious training and belief, is conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form” and defining “religious training and belief” as “an individual's belief in relation to a Supreme Being involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation, but [not] any essentially political, sociological, or philosophical views or a merely personal moral code.” (The reference to a “Supreme Being” was deleted in 1967.)

The Court interpreted these provisions in United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 (1965). Seeger stated on his draft form that he “preferred to leave the question as to his belief in a Supreme Being open,” and that he had a “belief in and devotion to goodness and virtue for their own sakes, and a religious faith in a purely ethical creed [without] belief in God, except in the remotest sense.” The Court unanimously found that Seeger qualified for the statutory exemption. The test was “whether a given belief that is sincere and meaningful occupies a place in the life of its possessor parallel to that filled by the orthodox belief in God of one who clearly qualifies for the exemption. Where such beliefs have parallel positions in the lives of their respective holders we cannot say that one is ‘in relation to a Supreme Being’ and the other is not.” The Court mentioned “the richness and variety of spiritual life in our country.”

Justice Douglas, concurring in Seeger, thought that a broadly defined exemption was required by the free exercise clause and by concepts of equal protection. The plurality in Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333 (1970), applied the Seeger test to grant an exemption to someone who crossed off the word “religious” on the draft form. Justice Harlan concurred only in the result. He argued that Seeger had stretched the statutory language to its limit. “Congress [could eliminate] all exemptions for conscientious objectors. Such a course would be wholly ‘neutral.’ [However,] having chosen to exempt, it cannot draw the line between theistic or nontheistic religious beliefs on the one hand and secular beliefs on the other.” To do so would violate the establishment clause.

In Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437 (1971), the Court held that the statutory exemption was unavailable to those who had religious objections “relating to a particular conflict.” It rejected the claim that the free exercise clause required that the exemption be available to such “selective” objectors and concluded that an exemption limited to objectors to all wars was sufficiently neutral to avoid establishment clause problems. The “de facto discrimination among religions” was not an establishment of religion because the discrimination “serves a number of purposes having nothing to do with a design to foster or favor any sect, religion, or cluster of religions [such] as the hopelessness of converting a sincere conscientious objector into an effective fighting man.” The “interest in maintaining a fair system” might be defeated by requiring the draft system to inquire into the “enormous number of variables” that make selective objection “ultimately subjective.” “There is a danger that as between two would-be objectors, both having the same complaint against a war, that objector would succeed who is more articulate, better educated, or better counseled.” This danger was greater “the more discriminating and complicated the basis of classification.” Justice Douglas dissented.

For an argument that protection should be extended to claims based on conscience as well as religion, see Smith, Converting the Religious Equality Amendment into a Statute with a Little “Conscience,” 1996 BYU L. Rev. 645.

3. The futility of definition? Commentators, drawing on modern theology, have suggested that religion must involve “ultimate concern” or belief in “extratemporal consequences” or in a “transcendent reality.” See, e.g., Note, Toward a Constitutional Definition of Religion, 91 Harv. L. Rev. 1056 (1978); Choper, Defining “Religion” in the First Amendment, 1982 U. Ill. L. Rev. 579. Are the following belief systems religions? Does it matter whether the issue is free exercise or establishment? (a) Transcendental meditation (see Malnak v. Yogi, 592 F.2d 197 (3d Cir. 1979), finding that a school board established religion when it authorized the teaching of TM in the public schools); (b) pantheism (see Africa v. Pennsylvania, 662 F.2d 1025 (3d Cir. 1981), finding a system strongly resembling pantheism not a religion when its adherent sought to require prison officials to provide him with a diet of raw foods only); (c) secular humanism (see Grove v. Mead School District, 753 F.2d 1528 (9th Cir. 1985), finding no establishment clause violation in allowing public school students to satisfy requirements by reading a book said to advance secular humanism).

Consider Freeman, The Misguided Search for the Constitutional Definition of “Religion,” 71 Geo. L.J. 1519, 1553, 1556 (1983): A “religious belief system” has some of the following “relevant features”: belief in a supreme being, belief in a transcendent reality, a moral code, a worldview accounting for people’s role in the universe, sacred rituals, worship and prayer, a sacred text, membership in a social organization. But “there is no single feature or set of features that constitutes the essence of religion.” Rather, “a belief system [may] be more or less religious depending on how closely it resembles [the] paradigm” having all eight features.

How can the religion clauses be interpreted unless there is a definition of religion? Consider whether it would be possible to develop doctrines by accepting all sincerely proffered claims that a belief is religious and then determining whether the state's secular goals justify imposing a burden on that belief or whether the state's secular goals justify its adopting the program at issue. Freeman suggests that such doctrines might be unacceptable because the courts would be unable to distinguish between belief systems at the core of the concept of religion and those at its periphery; distaste for granting a free exercise exemption to the peripheral religion might distort the doctrines dealing with the balance between secular goals and burdens on religion.

4. Determining sincerity. In United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78 (1944), the leaders of the "I Am" religion were indicted for mail fraud. The religion, an offshoot of the theosophy movement, was centered in the western states. Its founder, Guy Ballard, was said to have met a Master Saint Germain, who used Ballard as a messenger. Ballard's widow and son were charged with making representations that they knew were false regarding their power to cure diseases. The Supreme Court held that the jury could not be allowed to determine the truth or falsity of the representations about the Ballards' ability to cure. It could determine only whether the Ballards believed the representations they made. "Men may believe what they cannot prove. [Religious] experiences which are as real as life to some may be incomprehensible to others. [If] one could be sent to jail because a jury in a hostile environment found [his] teachings false, little indeed would be left of religious freedom." Justice Jackson would have gone further:

I do not see how we can separate an issue as to what is believed from considerations as to what is believable. [Any] inquiry into intellectual honesty in religion raises profound psychological problems. [It] seems to me an impossible task for juries to separate fancied [religious experiences] from real ones, dreams from happenings, and hallucinations from true clairvoyance. [Further,] I do not know what degree of skepticism or disbelief in a religious representation amounts to an actionable fraud. [Religious] symbolism is even used by some with the same mental reservations one has in teaching of Santa Claus or Uncle Sam or Easter bunnies or dispassionate judges.

Chief Justice Stone, whose dissent was joined by Justices Roberts and Frankfurter, countered, "[If] it were shown that a defendant [had] asserted [that] he had physically shaken hands with St. Germain in San Francisco on a day named, or that [by] the exertion of his spiritual power he 'had in fact cured [hundreds] of persons...,' it would be open to the Government to submit to the jury proof that he had never been in San Francisco and that no such cures had ever been effected." Justice Jackson agreed that a church leader could be prosecuted for fraud if he or she "represents that funds are being used to build a church when in fact they are being used for personal purposes." How does that differ from what the Ballards were charged with?

Note that inquiries into sincerity may be a disguised attempt to question whether the underlying belief is religious at all. Would that justify or cast doubt on the propriety of inquiries into sincerity?

B. THE ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE

In Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), the Court identified three "tests" for determining whether a statute violates the establishment clause: "First, the statute must have a secular legislative purpose; second, its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion; finally, the statute must not foster 'an excessive government entanglement with religion.'" The so-called Lemon test has not been formally repudiated by the Supreme Court. A majority of the justices sitting in 2011 have criticized it, and it has not been relied on by a majority to invalidate any practice since 1985. For an overview of developments, see Lupu, The Lingering Death of Separationism, 62 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 230 (1994). In a concurring opinion in Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District, 508 U.S. 384 (1993), Justice Scalia criticized the Lemon test by analogizing it to "a ghoul in a late-night horror movie that repeatedly sits up in its grave and shuffles abroad, after being repeatedly killed and buried. [It] is there to scare us [when] we wish it to do so, but we can command it to return to the tomb at will. When we wish to strike down a practice it forbids, we invoke it; when we wish to uphold a practice it forbids, we ignore it entirely. [Such] a docile and useful monster is worth keeping around, at least in a somnolent state; one never knows when one might need him."

The materials that follow are organized around some more particularized themes that can be connected to the components of the Lemon test. Sections B1 and B2 deal with two ways—coercion and endorsement—in which government practices might be said to "advance" (or inhibit) religion. Section B3 deals with issues that arise in connection with identifying whether a government practice has a religious or a secular purpose. Section B4 discusses cases and problems in which the effects, principal or otherwise, of a government program might be said to advance (or inhibit) religion.

1. The Anticoercion Principle

Lee v. Weisman

505 U.S. 577 (1992)

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

School principals in the public school system of the city of Providence, Rhode Island, are permitted to invite members of the clergy to offer invocation and benediction prayers as part of the formal graduation ceremonies for middle schools and for high schools. The question before us is whether including clerical members who offer prayers as part of the official school graduation ceremony is consistent with the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment, provisions the Fourteenth Amendment makes applicable with full force to the States and their school districts....

[Following the school district's custom, a middle school principal invited a member of the clergy, Rabbi Leslie Guttermann, to deliver prayers at the school's graduation exercises. The principal gave Rabbi Guttermann a pamphlet, "Guidelines for Civic Occasions," prepared by the National Conference of Christians and Jews. The pamphlet recommended that prayers at civic ceremonies be composed with "inclusiveness and sensitivity." Rabbi Guttermann's invocation was:

God of the Free, Hope of the Brave. For the legacy of America where diversity is celebrated and the rights of minorities are protected, we thank You. May these young men and women grow up to enrich it. For the liberty of America, we thank You. May these new graduates grow up to guard it. For the political process of America in which all its citizens may participate, for its court system where all may seek justice we thank You. May those we honor this morning always turn to it in trust. For the destiny of America we thank You. May the graduates of Nathan Bishop Middle School so live that they might help to share it. May our aspirations for our country and for these young people, who are our hope for the future, be richly fulfilled.

[The benediction was similar in content.

[Deborah Weisman, a student at the school, challenged the practice of having prayers at public school graduations.]

These dominant facts mark and control the confines of our decision: State officials direct the performance of a formal religious exercise at promotional and graduation ceremonies for secondary schools. Even for those students who object to the religious exercise, their attendance and participation in the state-sponsored religious activity are in a fair and real sense obligatory, though the school district does not require attendance as a condition for receipt of the diploma....

[It] is beyond dispute that, at a minimum, the Constitution guarantees that government may not coerce anyone to support or participate in religion or its exercise, or otherwise act in a way which “establishes a [state] religion or religious faith, or tends to do so.”[Lynch v. Donnelly, infra.] The State’s involvement in the school prayers challenged today violates these central principles.

That involvement is as troubling as it is undenied. A school official, the principal, decided that an invocation and a benediction should be given; this is a choice attributable to the State, and from a constitutional perspective it is as if a state statute decreed that the prayers must occur. The principal chose the religious participant, here a rabbi, and that choice is also attributable to the State. The reason for the choice of a rabbi is not disclosed by the record, but the potential for divisiveness over the choice of a particular member of the clergy to conduct the ceremony is apparent.

Divisiveness, of course, can attend any state decision respecting religions, and neither its existence nor its potential necessarily invalidates the State’s attempts to accommodate religion in all cases. The potential for divisiveness is of particular relevance here though, because it centers around an overt religious exercise in a secondary school environment where [subtle] coercive pressures exist and where the student had no real alternative which would have allowed her to avoid the fact or appearance of participation.

The State’s role did not end with the decision to include a prayer and with the choice of clergyman. Principal Lee provided Rabbi Guttermann with a copy of the “Guidelines for Civic Occasions,” and advised him that his prayers should be nonsectarian. Through these means the principal directed and controlled the content of the prayer. “[It] is a cornerstone principle of our Establishment Clause jurisprudence that it is no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as a part of a religious program carried on by government,” Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 425 (1962), and that is what the school officials attempted to do.

Petitioners argue [that] the directions for the content of the prayers were a good-faith attempt by the school to ensure that the sectarianism which is so often the flashpoint for religious animosity be removed from the graduation ceremony. The concern is understandable, as a prayer which uses ideas or images identified with a particular religion may foster a different sort of sectarian rivalry than an invocation or benediction in terms more neutral. [The] question is not the good faith of the school in attempting to make the prayer acceptable to most persons, but the legitimacy of its undertaking that enterprise at all when the object is to produce a prayer to be used in a formal religious exercise which students, for all practical purposes, are obliged to attend....

The First Amendment's Religion Clauses mean that religious beliefs and religious expression are too precious to be either proscribed or prescribed by the State. The design of the Constitution is that preservation and transmission of religious beliefs and worship is a responsibility and a choice committed to the private sphere, which itself is promised freedom to pursue that mission. It must not be forgotten then, that while concern must be given to define the protection granted to an objector or a dissenting non-believer, these same Clauses exist to protect religion from government interference....

These concerns have particular application in the case of school officials, whose effort to monitor prayer will be perceived by the students as inducing a participation they might otherwise reject. [Our precedents] caution us to measure the idea of a civic religion against the central meaning of the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment, which is that all creeds must be tolerated and none favored. The suggestion that government may establish an official or civic religion as a means of avoiding the establishment of a religion with more specific creeds strikes us as a contradiction that cannot be accepted.

The degree of school involvement here made it clear that the graduation prayers bore the imprint of the State and thus put school-age children who objected in an untenable position....

[It] is argued that [high] school students no doubt have been required to attend classes and assemblies and to complete assignments exposing them to ideas they find distasteful or immoral or absurd or all of these. Against this background, students may consider it an odd measure of justice to be subjected during the course of their educations to ideas deemed offensive and irreligious, but to be denied a brief, formal prayer ceremony that the school offers in return. This argument [overlooks] a fundamental dynamic of the Constitution.

The First Amendment protects speech and religion by quite different mechanisms. Speech is protected by insuring its full expression even when the government participates, for the very object of some of our most important speech is to persuade the government to adopt an idea as its own. The method for protecting freedom of worship and freedom of conscience in religious matters is quite the reverse. In religious debate or expression the government is not a prime participant, for the Framers deemed religious establishment antithetical to the freedom of all. The Free Exercise Clause embraces a freedom of conscience and worship that has close parallels in the speech provisions of the First Amendment, but the Establishment Clause is a specific prohibition on forms of state intervention in religious affairs with no precise counterpart in the speech provisions. The explanation lies in the lesson of history that was and is the inspiration for the Establishment Clause, the lesson that in the hands of government what might begin as a tolerant expression of religious views may end in a policy to indoctrinate and coerce. A state-created orthodoxy puts at grave risk that freedom of belief and conscience which are the sole assurance that religious faith is real, not imposed....

The lessons of the First Amendment are as urgent in the modern world as in the 18th Century when it was written. One timeless lesson is that if citizens are subjected to state-sponsored religious exercises, the State disavows its own duty to guard and respect that sphere of inviolable conscience and belief which is the mark of a free people. To compromise that principle today would be to deny our own tradition and forfeit our standing to urge others to secure the protections of that tradition for themselves.

[There] are heightened concerns with protecting freedom of conscience from subtle coercive pressure in the elementary and secondary public schools. [What] to most believers may seem nothing more than a reasonable request that the nonbeliever respect their religious practices, in a school context may appear to the nonbeliever or dissenter to be an attempt to employ the machinery of the State to enforce a religious orthodoxy.

[The] school district's supervision and control of a high school graduation ceremony places public pressure, as well as peer pressure, on attending students to stand as a group or, at least, maintain respectful silence during the Invocation and Benediction. This pressure, though subtle and indirect, can be as real as any overt compulsion. Of course, in our culture standing or remaining silent can signify adherence to a view or simple respect for the views of others. And no doubt some persons who have no desire to join a prayer have little objection to standing as a sign of respect for those who do. But for the dissenter of high school age, who has a reasonable perception that she is being forced by the State to pray in a manner her conscience will not allow, the injury is no less real. [For] many, if not most, of the students at the graduation, the act of standing or remaining silent was an expression of participation in the Rabbi's prayer. That was the very point of the religious exercise. It is of little comfort to a dissenter, then, to be told that for her the act of standing or remaining in silence signifies mere respect, rather than participation. What matters is that given our social conventions, a reasonable dissenter in this milieu could believe that the group exercise signified her own participation or approval of it.

Finding no violation under these circumstances would place objectors in the dilemma of participating, with all that implies, or protesting. [We] think the State may not, consistent with the Establishment Clause, place primary and secondary school children in this position. Research in psychology supports the common assumption that adolescents are often susceptible to pressure from their peers towards conformity, and that the influence is strongest in matters of social convention. To recognize that the choice imposed by the State constitutes an unacceptable constraint only acknowledges that the government may no more use social pressure to enforce orthodoxy than it may use more direct means....

There was a stipulation in the District Court that attendance at graduation and promotional ceremonies is voluntary. [Law] reaches past formalism. And to say a teenage student has a real choice not to attend her high school graduation is formalistic in the extreme. [Everyone] knows that in our society and in our culture high school graduation is one of life's most significant occasions. A school rule which excuses attendance is beside the point. [A] student is not free to absent herself from the graduation exercise in any real sense of the term "voluntary," for absence would require forfeiture of those intangible benefits which have motivated the student through youth and all her high school years....

The importance of the event is the point the school district and the United States rely upon to argue that a formal prayer ought to be permitted, but it becomes one of the principal reasons why their argument must fail. Their contention [is] that the prayers are an essential part of these ceremonies because for many persons an occasion of this significance lacks meaning if there is no recognition, however brief, that human achievements cannot be understood apart from their spiritual essence. We think the Government's position [fails] to acknowledge that what for many of Deborah's classmates and their parents was a spiritual imperative was for [Deborah] Weisman religious conformance compelled by the State. While in some societies the wishes of the majority might prevail, the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment is addressed to this contingency and rejects the balance urged upon us. The Constitution forbids the State to exact religious conformity from a student as the price of attending her own high school graduation. This is the calculus the Constitution commands.

The Government's argument gives insufficient recognition to the real conflict of conscience faced by the young student. The essence of the Government's position is that with regard to a civic, social occasion of this importance it is the objector, not the majority, who must take unilateral and private action to avoid compromising religious scruples, here by electing to miss the graduation exercise. This turns conventional First Amendment analysis on its head. It is a tenet of the First Amendment that the State cannot require one of its citizens to forfeit his or her rights and benefits as the price of resisting conformance to state-sponsored religious practice. To say that a student must remain apart from the ceremony at the opening invocation and closing benediction is to risk compelling conformity in an environment analogous to the classroom setting, where we have said the risk of compulsion is especially high.

We do not hold that every state action implicating religion is invalid if one or a few citizens find it offensive. People may take offense at all manner of religious as well as nonreligious messages, but offense alone does not in every case show a violation. We know too that sometimes to endure social isolation or even anger may be the price of conscience or nonconformity. But, [the] conformity required of the student in this case was too high an exaction to withstand the test of the Establishment Clause. The prayer exercises in this case are especially improper because the State has in every practical sense compelled attendance and participation in an explicit religious exercise at an event of singular importance to every student, one the objecting student had no real alternative to avoid....

[Our] society would be less than true to its heritage if it lacked abiding concern for the values of its young people, and we acknowledge the profound belief of adherents to many faiths that there must be a place in the student's life for precepts of a morality higher even than the law we today enforce. [A] relentless and all-pervasive attempt to exclude religion from every aspect of public life could itself become inconsistent with the Constitution. We recognize that, at graduation time and throughout the course of the educational process, there will be instances when religious values, religious practices, and religious persons will have some interaction with the public schools and their students. But these matters, often questions of accommodation of religion, are not before us. The sole question presented is whether a religious exercise may be conducted at a graduation ceremony in circumstances where [young] graduates who object are induced to conform. No holding by this Court suggests that a school can persuade or compel a student to participate in a religious exercise. That is being done here, and it is forbidden by the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment.

For the reasons we have stated, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

JUSTICE BLACKMUN, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS and JUSTICE O'CONNOR join, concurring....

[It] is not enough that the government restrain from compelling religious practices: it must not engage in them either....⁶

Our decisions have gone beyond prohibiting coercion, [because] the Court has recognized that “the fullest possible scope of religious liberty,” Schempp (Goldberg, J., concurring) [section A supra], entails more than freedom from coercion. The Establishment Clause protects religious liberty on a grand scale; it is a social compact that guarantees for generations a democracy and a strong religious community—both essential to safeguarding religious liberty. “Our fathers seem to have been perfectly sincere in their belief that the members of the Church would be more patriotic, and the citizens of the State more religious, by keeping their respective functions entirely separate.” Religious Liberty, in Essays and Speeches of Jeremiah S. Black 53 (C. Black ed. 1885) (Chief Justice of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania)....

[A concurring opinion by Justice Souter, joined by Justices Stevens and O’Connor, is omitted.]

JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE, JUSTICE WHITE, and JUSTICE THOMAS join, dissenting....

[In] holding that the Establishment Clause prohibits invocations and benedictions at public-school graduation ceremonies, the Court [lays] waste a tradition [that] is a component of an even more longstanding American tradition of nonsectarian prayer to God at public celebrations generally....

I...

From our Nation’s origin, prayer has been a prominent part of governmental ceremonies and proclamations. The Declaration of Independence “[appealed] to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions” and avowed “a firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence.” In his first inaugural address, after swearing his oath of office on a Bible, George Washington deliberately made a prayer a part of his first official act as President:

it would be peculiarly improper to omit in this first official act my fervent supplications to that Almighty Being who rules over the universe, who presides in the councils of nations, and whose providential aids can supply every human defect, that His benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States a Government instituted by themselves for these essential purposes.

Such supplications have been a characteristic feature of inaugural addresses ever since....

Our national celebration of Thanksgiving likewise dates back to President Washington. [This] tradition of Thanksgiving Proclamations—with their religious theme of prayerful gratitude to God—has been adhered to by almost every President....

II

The Court presumably would separate graduation invocations and benedictions from other instances of public “preservation and transmission of religious beliefs” on the ground that they involve “psychological coercion.” [A] few citations of “research in psychology” that have no particular bearing upon the precise issue here cannot disguise the fact that the Court has gone beyond the realm where judges know what they are doing. The Court’s argument that state officials have “coerced” students to take part in the invocation and benediction at graduation ceremonies is, not to put too fine a point on it, incoherent.

A

[According] to the Court, students at graduation who want “to avoid the fact or appearance of participation,” in the invocation and benediction are psychologically obligated “[to] stand as a group or, at least, maintain respectful silence” during those prayers. This assertion [does] not say [that] students are psychologically coerced to bow their heads, place their hands in a Dürer-like prayer position, pay attention to the prayers, utter “Amen,” or in fact pray. [It] claims only that students are psychologically coerced “to stand...or, at least, maintain respectful silence.” Both halves of this disjunctive [merit] particular attention.

[The] Court’s notion that a student who simply sits in “respectful silence” during the invocation and benediction [has] somehow joined—or would somehow be perceived as having joined—in the prayers is nothing short of ludicrous. We indeed live in a vulgar age. But surely “our social conventions” have not coarsened to the point that anyone who does not stand on his chair and shout obscenities can reasonably be deemed to have assented to everything said in his presence. Since the Court does not dispute that students exposed to prayer at graduation ceremonies retain [the] free will to sit, there is absolutely no basis for the Court’s decision....

But let us assume the very worst, that the nonparticipating graduate is “subtly coerced”...to stand! Even that half of the disjunctive does not remotely establish a “participation” (or an “appearance of participation”) in a religious exercise. [If] it is a permissible inference that one who is standing is doing so simply out of respect for the prayers of others that are in progress, then how can it possibly be said that a “reasonable dissenter...could believe that the group exercise signified her own participation or approval”? [Maintaining] respect for the religious observances of others is a fundamental civic virtue that government [can] and should cultivate—so that even if [the] displaying of such respect might be mistaken for taking part in the prayer, I would deny that the dissenter’s interest in avoiding even the false appearance of participation constitutionally trumps the government’s interest in fostering respect for religion generally.

[The] Court itself has not given careful consideration to its test of psychological coercion. For if it had, how could it observe [that] students stood for the Pledge of Allegiance, which immediately preceded Rabbi Guttermann’s invocation? [Recital] of the Pledge would appear to raise the same Establishment Clause issue as the invocation and benediction.

III...

[The] coercion that was a hallmark of historical establishments of religion was coercion of religious orthodoxy and of financial support by force of law and threat of penalty. Typically, attendance at the state church was required; only clergy of the official church could lawfully perform sacraments; and dissenters, if tolerated, faced an array of civil disabilities....

The Establishment Clause was adopted to prohibit such an establishment of religion at the federal level (and to protect state establishments of religion from federal interference). I will further acknowledge for the sake of argument that, as some scholars have argued, by 1790 the term “establishment” had acquired an additional meaning—“financial support of religion generally, by public taxation”—that reflected the development of “general or multiple” establishments, not limited to a single church. But that would still be an establishment coerced by force of law. And I will further concede that our constitutional tradition [has], with a few aberrations, ruled out of order government-sponsored endorsement of religion—even when no legal coercion is present, and indeed even when no ersatz, “peer-pressure” psycho-coercion is present—where the endorsement is sectarian, in the sense of specifying details upon which men and women who believe in a benevolent, omnipotent Creator and Ruler of the world, are known to differ (for example, the divinity of Christ). But there is simply no support for the proposition that the officially sponsored nondenominational invocation and benediction read by Rabbi Guttermann—with no one legally coerced to recite them—violated the Constitution of the United States. To the contrary, they are so characteristically American they could have come from the pen of George Washington or Abraham Lincoln himself....

IV...

The reader has been told much in this case about the personal interest of Mr. Weisman and his daughter, and very little about the personal interests on the other side. They are not inconsequential. Church and state would not be such a difficult subject if religion were, as the Court apparently thinks it to be, some purely personal avocation that can be indulged entirely in secret, like pornography, in the privacy of one's room. For most believers it is not that, and has never been. Religious men and women of almost all denominations have felt it necessary to acknowledge and beseech the blessing of God as a people, and not just as individuals, because they believe in the "protection of divine Providence," as the Declaration of Independence put it, not just for individuals but for societies; because they believe God to be, as Washington's first Thanksgiving Proclamation put it, the "Great Lord and Ruler of Nations." One can believe in the effectiveness of such public worship, or one can deprecate and deride it. But the longstanding American tradition of prayer at official ceremonies displays with unmistakable clarity that the Establishment Clause does not forbid the government to accommodate it....

I must add one final observation: The founders of our Republic knew the fearsome potential of sectarian religious belief to generate civil dissension and civil strife. And they also knew that nothing, absolutely nothing, is so inclined to foster among religious believers of various faiths a toleration—no, an affection—for one another than voluntarily joining in prayer together, to the God whom they all worship and seek. Needless to say, no one should be compelled to do that, but it is a shame to deprive our public culture of the opportunity, and indeed the encouragement, for people to do it voluntarily. The Baptist or Catholic who heard and joined in the simple and inspiring prayers of Rabbi Guttermann on this official and patriotic occasion was inoculated from religious bigotry and prejudice in a manner that can not be replicated. To deprive our society of that important unifying mechanism, in order to spare the nonbeliever what seems to me the minimal inconvenience of standing or even sitting in respectful nonparticipation, is as senseless in policy as it is unsupported in law.

For the foregoing reasons, I dissent.

Note: The Anticoercion Principle

1. Defining coercion. Does treating the psychological impact of a practice on dissenters as coercive create a “dissenter’s veto”? Is it more accurate to describe the problem in Lee as one of government endorsement of religion, which on the margin induces someone to engage in prayer, rather than one of government coercion? Should there be a parallel concern (under the free exercise clause?) for the “coercion” of some religious students when presented with material—about evolution, for example—inconsistent with their religious beliefs?

Consider this perspective on Lee:

[The] harm inflicted by government-sponsored religious exercises is two-fold. First, civic religious exercises force religious minorities to sever civil communion to avoid spiritual pollution. [The] second harm is that civic religious exercises wound the civil community by compelling the severance of religious minorities and thus fracturing community. [In] contrast with Justice Scalia’s proposed inoculation against bigotry, [a] very different view of toleration [does] not necessarily engender affection among believers of different stripes, but simply civil cooperation. [Roger Williams] and the Separatists [remind] us that we must deny to ecumenical impulses any right to a smug place of preeminence in the history of religious freedom in America.

T. Hall, Separating Church and State: Roger Williams and Religious Liberty 158, 159–160 (1998).

2. The scope of the principle. In Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), a public school allowed those who objected to state-written prayers recited at the beginning of classes to remain silent or be excused from attendance. The Court said, “When the power, prestige and financial support of government is placed behind a particular religious belief, the indirect coercive pressure upon religious minorities to conform to the prevailing officially approved religion is plain.” Justice Stewart would have remanded a similar case for development of the facts involving coercion:

[The] duty laid upon government in connection with religious exercises in the public schools is that of refraining from so structuring the school environment as to put any kind of pressure on a child to participate in those exercises; it is not that of providing an atmosphere in which children are kept scrupulously insulated from any awareness that some of their fellows may want to open the school day with prayer, or of the fact that there exist in our pluralistic society differences of religious belief. [Certain] types of exercises would present situations in which no possibility of coercion on the part of secular officials could be claimed to exist. Thus, if such exercises were held either before or after the official school day, or if the school schedule were such that participation were merely one among a number of desirable alternatives, it could hardly be contended that the exercises did anything more than to provide an opportunity for the voluntary expression of religious belief. [If] the exercises were held during the school day, and no equally desirable alternative were provided by the school authorities, the likelihood that children might be under at least some psychological compulsion to participate would be great. In such a case as the latter, however, I think we would err if we assumed such coercion in the absence of any evidence.

School District of Abington Township v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 316–318 (1963).

Consider the argument of Carter, Parents, Religion, and Schools: Reflections on Pierce, 70 Years Later, 27 Seton Hall L. Rev. 1194, 1214 (1997):

[If] beginning the school day with a prayer is unconstitutional because it prefers religion over nonreligion, then why is not a curriculum devoid of any religious observance unconstitutional because it prefers non-religion over religion? [By] compelling school attendance, [the] state as much as announces that what occurs in its schools is of vital importance. So if none of the material is religious, children will receive the message that the state deems religion unimportant. [The] ban on prayer must be intended to help individuals to make up their own minds [about] what religions to follow. But prayer and other formal religious instruction are hardly the only things that can do that. [If] our concern is for state interference with religious choice, we would surely want to take a hard look at the curriculum and rid it of other topics of instruction that make it difficult for individuals to make up their own minds about what religions to follow.

3. Coercion, free exercise, and free speech. The free exercise and free speech clauses protect against coercion away from a person's beliefs. Would it violate a student's free exercise right to compel her to stand respectfully during the benediction? Her free speech right? If neither right would be violated, the anticoercion principle might guard against direct violations that are difficult to identify on a case-by-case basis. Should such a principle be regarded as an establishment clause or a free exercise/free speech principle? If free exercise and free speech rights are not implicated, the establishment clause might deal with structural relations between religion and government rather than with individual rights. How could the Court identify impermissible structural relations except by referring to individual rights?

N. Feldman, The Intellectual Origins of the Establishment Clause, 77 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 346, 351, 424 (2002), argues that “[liberty] of conscience [was] the central value invoked by the states that proposed constitutional amendments on the question of religion, and the purpose that underlay the Establishment Clause when it was enacted,” and that “the Constitution [protects] liberty of conscience [only] in the sphere of government action that relates specifically to religion.” What does the establishment clause understood in this way add to the free exercise and free speech clauses?

4. Prayers at football games. Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000), held unconstitutional a district’s policy that authorized students to vote, first, whether to allow “invocations” at high school football games, and then to choose a person to deliver them. Relying on Board of Regents v. Southworth, Chapter 7, section E5, supra, Justice Stevens, writing for six justices, concluded that the speech the selected student gave would not be private speech because of the policy authorizing an election in which a majority would determine whether to have invocations. The Court then held that an invocation at a high school football game violated the principle established in Lee. The establishment clause was designed “to remove debate over this kind of issue from governmental supervision or control.” Some students, such as cheerleaders and team members, were compelled to attend the games, and other students would feel “immense social pressure” and “truly genuine desire” to attend the games. The delivery of a religious invocation would therefore coerce them in the way condemned in Lee. Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Thomas dissented.

Does the distinction between permissible private speech and arguably impermissible government speech make sense in the contexts of Lee and Santa Fe? Consider the suggestion in Brady, The Push to Private Religious Expression: Are We Missing Something?, 70 Fordham L. Rev. 1147, 1199 (2002), that “the most promising approach is for students of all perspectives to ‘opt in’ to the educational process by voicing and defending differing views” in these contexts. Would school authorities have to develop guidelines setting out the limits beyond which student speech could not go in these contexts? If so, would those guidelines convert private into government speech? Would school authorities be barred from developing such guidelines by free speech principles?

2. The Nonendorsement Principle and De Facto Establishments

Lynch v. Donnelly

465 U.S. 668 (1984)

THE CHIEF JUSTICE [BURGER] delivered the opinion of the Court....

Each year, in cooperation with the downtown retail merchants' association, the City of Pawtucket, Rhode Island, erects a Christmas display as part of its observance of the Christmas holiday season. The display is situated in a park owned by a nonprofit organization and located in the heart of the shopping district. The display is essentially like those to be found in hundreds of towns or cities across the Nation—often on public grounds—during the Christmas season. The Pawtucket display comprises many of the figures and decorations traditionally associated with Christmas, including, among other things, a Santa Claus house, reindeer pulling Santa's sleigh, candy-striped poles, a Christmas tree, carolers, cutout figures representing such characters as a clown, an elephant, and a teddy bear, hundreds of colored lights, a large banner that reads "SEASONS GREETINGS," and the crèche at issue here. All components of this display are owned by the City....

[The court of appeals held that maintaining the crèche violated the establishment clause.] [Rather] than mechanically invalidating all governmental conduct or statutes that confer benefits or give special recognition to religion in general or to one faith—as an absolutist approach would dictate—the Court has scrutinized challenged legislation or official conduct to determine whether, in reality, it establishes a religion or religious faith, or tends to do so....

In each case, the inquiry calls for line drawing; no fixed, per se rule can be framed....

In the line-drawing process we have often found it useful to inquire whether the challenged law or conduct has a secular purpose, whether its principal or primary effect is to advance or inhibit religion, and whether it creates an excessive entanglement of government with religion. [Lemon.] But, we have repeatedly emphasized our unwillingness to be confined to any single test or criterion in this sensitive area....

[In] this case, the focus of our inquiry must be on the crèche in the context of the Christmas season....¹²

[When] viewed in the proper context of the Christmas Holiday season, it is apparent that, on this record, there is insufficient evidence to establish that the inclusion of the crèche is a purposeful or surreptitious effort to express some kind of subtle governmental advocacy of a particular religious message. In a pluralistic society a variety of motives and purposes are implicated. The City, like the Congresses and Presidents, however, has principally taken note of a significant historical religious event long celebrated in the Western World....

The narrow question is whether there is a secular purpose for Pawtucket's display of the crèche. The display is sponsored by the City to celebrate the Holiday and to depict the origins of that Holiday. These are legitimate secular purposes....

The dissent asserts some observers may perceive that the City has aligned itself with the Christian faith by including a Christian symbol in its display and that this serves to advance religion. We can assume, arguendo, that the display advances religion in a sense; but our precedents plainly contemplate that on occasion some advancement of religion will result from governmental action. [Here,] whatever benefit to one faith or religion or to all religions, is indirect, remote and incidental; display of the crèche is no more an advancement or endorsement of religion than the Congressional and Executive recognition of the origins of the Holiday itself as "Christ's Mass," or the exhibition of literally hundreds of religious paintings in governmentally supported museums....

The Court has acknowledged that the "fears and political problems" that gave rise to the Religion Clauses in the 18th century are of far less concern today. [Everson.] We are unable to perceive the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Vicar of Rome, or other powerful religious leaders behind every public acknowledgment of the religious heritage long officially recognized by the three constitutional branches of government. Any notion that these symbols pose a real danger of establishment of a state church is far-fetched indeed....

[Reversed.]

JUSTICE O'CONNOR, concurring....

I

The Establishment Clause prohibits government from making adherence to a religion relevant in any way to a person's standing in the political community. Government can run afoul of that prohibition in two principal ways. One is excessive entanglement with religious institutions, which may interfere with the independence of the institutions, give the institutions access to government or governmental powers not fully shared by nonadherents of the religion, and foster the creation of political constituencies defined along religious lines. The second and more direct infringement is government endorsement or disapproval of religion. Endorsement sends a message to nonadherents that they are outsiders, not full members of the political community, and an accompanying message to adherents that they are insiders, favored members of the political community. Disapproval sends the opposite message....

III

The central issue in this case is whether Pawtucket has endorsed Christianity by its display of the crèche. To answer that question, we must examine both what Pawtucket intended to communicate in displaying the crèche and what message the City's display actually conveyed. The purpose and effect prongs of the Lemon test represent these two aspects of the meaning of the City's action.

The meaning of a statement to its audience depends both on the intention of the speaker and on the "objective" meaning of the statement in the community. Some listeners need not rely solely on the words themselves in discerning the speaker's intent: they can judge the intent by, for example, examining the context of the statement or asking questions of the speaker. Other listeners do not have or will not seek access to such evidence of intent. They will rely instead on the words themselves; for them the message actually conveyed may be something not actually intended. [Examination] of both the subjective and the objective components of the message communicated by a government action is therefore necessary to determine whether the action carries a forbidden meaning.

The purpose prong of the Lemon test asks whether government's actual purpose is to endorse or disapprove of religion. The effect prong asks whether, irrespective of government's actual purpose, the practice under review in fact conveys a message of endorsement or disapproval. An affirmative answer to either question should render the challenged practice invalid.

A

The purpose prong of the Lemon test requires that a government activity have a secular purpose. That requirement is not satisfied [by] the mere existence of some secular purpose, however dominated by religious purposes. The proper inquiry under the purpose prong of Lemon [is] whether the government intends to convey a message of endorsement or disapproval of religion.

Applying that formulation to this case, I would find that Pawtucket did not intend to convey any message of endorsement of Christianity or disapproval of non-Christian religions. The evident purpose of including the crèche in the larger display was not promotion of the religious content of the crèche but celebration of the public holiday through its traditional symbols. Celebration of public holidays, which have cultural significance even if they also have religious aspects, is a legitimate secular purpose....

[Under the effect prong, what] is crucial is that a government practice not have the effect of communicating a message of government endorsement or disapproval of religion. It is only practices having that effect, whether intentionally or unintentionally, that make religion relevant, in reality or public perception, to status in the political community.

Pawtucket's display of its crèche, I believe, does not communicate a message that the government intends to endorse the Christian beliefs represented by the crèche. Although the religious and indeed sectarian significance of the crèche [is] not neutralized by the setting, the overall holiday setting changes what viewers may fairly understand to be the purpose of the display—as a typical museum setting, though not neutralizing the religious content of a religious painting, negates any message of endorsement of that content. The display celebrates a public holiday. [The] holiday itself has very strong secular components and traditions. Government celebration of the holiday [generally] is not understood to endorse the religious content of the holiday, just as government celebration of Thanksgiving is not so understood. The crèche is a traditional symbol of the holiday that is very commonly displayed along with purely secular symbols, as it was in Pawtucket.

These features combine to make the government's display of the crèche in this particular physical setting no more an endorsement of religion than such governmental "acknowledgments" of religion as [printing] of "In God We Trust" on coins, and opening court sessions with "God save the United States and this honorable court." Those government acknowledgments of religion serve, in the only ways reasonably possible in our culture, the legitimate secular purposes of solemnizing public occasions, expressing confidence in the future, and encouraging the recognition of what is worthy of appreciation in society. For that reason, and because of their history and ubiquity, those practices are not understood as conveying government approval of particular religious beliefs. The display of the crèche likewise serves a secular purpose—celebration of a public holiday with traditional symbols. It cannot fairly be understood to convey a message of government endorsement of religion. It is significant in this regard that the crèche display apparently caused no political divisiveness prior to the filing of this lawsuit, although Pawtucket had incorporated the crèche in its annual Christmas display for some years. For these reasons, I conclude that Pawtucket's display of the crèche does not have the effect of communicating endorsement of Christianity.

JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom JUSTICE MARSHALL, JUSTICE BLACKMUN, and JUSTICE STEVENS join, dissenting....

I...

[The] nativity scene, unlike every other element of the Hodgson Park display, reflects a sectarian exclusivity that the avowed purposes of celebrating the holiday season and promoting retail commerce simply do not encompass. [The] inclusion of a distinctively religious element like the crèche [demonstrates] that a narrower sectarian purpose lay behind the decision to include a nativity scene.

The “primary effect” of including a nativity scene in the City’s display is [to] place the government’s imprimatur of approval on the particular religious beliefs exemplified by the crèche.....

[The] Court, by focusing on the holiday “context” in which the nativity scene appeared, seeks to explain away the clear religious import of the crèche. [It] blinks reality to claim [that] by including such a distinctively religious object as the crèche in its Christmas display, Pawtucket has done no more than make use of a “traditional” symbol of the holiday, and has thereby purged the crèche of its religious content and conferred only an “incidental and direct” benefit on religion....

[The] City has done nothing to disclaim government approval of the religious significance of the crèche, to suggest that the crèche represents only one religious symbol among many others that might be included in a seasonal display truly aimed at providing a wide catalogue of ethnic and religious celebrations, or to disassociate itself from the religious content of the crèche....

Finally, [even] in the context of Pawtucket’s seasonal celebration, the crèche retains a specifically Christian religious meaning. I refuse to accept the notion implicit in today’s decision that non-Christians would find that the religious content of the crèche is eliminated by the fact that it appears as part of the City’s otherwise secular celebration of the Christmas holiday. The nativity scene [is] the chief symbol of the characteristically Christian belief that a divine Savior was brought into the world and that the purpose of this miraculous birth was to illuminate a path toward salvation and redemption. For Christians, that path is exclusive, precious and holy. But for those who do not share these beliefs, the symbolic re-enactment of the birth of a divine being who has been miraculously incarnated as a man stands as a dramatic reminder of their differences with Christian faith. [To] be so excluded on religious grounds by one’s elected government is an insult and an injury that, until today, could not be countenanced by the Establishment Clause....

When government decides to recognize Christmas day as a public holiday, it does no more than accommodate the calendar of public activities to the plain fact that many Americans will expect on that day to spend time visiting with their families, attending religious services, and perhaps enjoying some respite from pre-holiday activities. [When public] officials participate in or appear to endorse the distinctively religious elements of this otherwise secular event, they encroach upon First Amendment freedoms. For it is at that point that the government brings to the forefront the theological content of the holiday, and places the prestige, power and financial support of a civil authority in the service of a particular faith.

[Unlike] such secular figures as Santa Claus, reindeer and carolers, a nativity scene represents far more than a mere “traditional” symbol of Christmas. The essence of the crèche’s symbolic purpose and effect is to prompt the observer to experience a sense of simple awe and wonder appropriate to the contemplation of one of the central elements of Christian dogma—that God sent His son into the world to be a Messiah. [The] crèche is far from a mere representation of a “particular historic religious event.” It is, instead, best understood as a mystical re-creation of an event that lies at the heart of Christian faith. To suggest, as the Court does, that such a symbol is merely “traditional” and therefore no different from Santa’s house or reindeer is not only offensive to those for whom the crèche has profound significance, but insulting to those who insist for religious or personal reasons that the story of Christ is in no sense a part of “history” nor an unavoidable element of our national “heritage.”...

II...

Intuition tells us that some official “acknowledgment” is inevitable in a religious society if government is not to adopt a stilted indifference to the religious life of the people. It is equally true, however, that if government is to remain scrupulously neutral in matters of religious conscience, as our Constitution requires, then it must avoid those overly broad acknowledgments of religious practices that may imply governmental favoritism toward one set of religious beliefs....

[At] least three principles—tracing the narrow channels which government acknowledgments must follow to satisfy the Establishment Clause—may be identified. First, although the government may not be compelled to do so by the Free Exercise Clause, it may, consistently with the Establishment Clause, act to accommodate to some extent the opportunities of individuals to practice their religion. [That] principle would justify government’s decision to declare December 25th a public holiday.

Second, [while] a particular governmental practice may have derived from religious motivations and retain certain religious connotations, it is nonetheless permissible for the government to pursue the practice when it is continued today solely for secular reasons. [The] mere fact that a governmental practice coincides to some extent with certain religious beliefs does not render it unconstitutional. Thanksgiving Day, in my view, fits easily within this principle, for despite its religious antecedents, the current practice of celebrating Thanksgiving is unquestionably secular and patriotic....

Finally, we have noted that government cannot be completely prohibited from recognizing in its public actions the religious beliefs and practices of the American people as an aspect of our national history and culture. While I remain uncertain about these questions, I would suggest that such practices as the designation of "In God We Trust" as our national motto, or the references to God contained in the Pledge of Allegiance can best be understood [as] a form of "ceremonial deism," protected from Establishment Clause scrutiny chiefly because they have lost through rote repetition any significant religious content. Moreover, these references are uniquely suited to serve such wholly secular purposes as solemnizing public occasions, or inspiring commitment to meet some national challenge in a manner that simply could not be fully served in our culture if government were limited to purely non-religious phrases....

The crèche fits none of these categories....

III...

The intent of the Framers with respect to the public display of nativity scenes is virtually impossible to discern primarily because the widespread celebration of Christmas did not emerge in its present form until well into the nineteenth century. Carrying a well-defined Puritan hostility to the celebration of Christ's birth with them to the New World, the founders of the Massachusetts Bay Colony pursued a vigilant policy of opposition to any public celebration of the holiday. To the Puritans, the celebration of Christmas represented a "Popish" practice lacking any foundation in Scripture....

During the eighteenth century, sectarian division over the celebration of the holiday continued. [D]enominational differences continued to dictate differences in attitude toward the holiday. [Many] nonconforming Protestant groups, including the Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, and Methodists, continued to regard the holiday with suspicion and antagonism well into the nineteenth century. This pattern of sectarian division concerning the holiday suggests that for the Framers of the Establishment Clause, who were acutely sensitive to such sectarian controversies, no single view of how government should approach the celebration of Christmas would be possible....

Furthermore [the] public display of nativity scenes as part of governmental celebrations of Christmas does not come to us supported by an unbroken history of widespread acceptance. It was not until 1836 that a State first granted legal recognition to Christmas as a public holiday. [Congress] did not follow the States' lead until 1870 when it established December 25th, along with the Fourth of July, New Year's Day, and Thanksgiving, as a legal holiday in the District of Columbia....

[The] City's action should be recognized for what it is: a coercive, though perhaps small, step toward establishing the sectarian preferences of the majority at the expense of the minority, accomplished by placing public facilities and funds in support of the religious symbolism and theological tidings that the crèche conveys....

I dissent.

JUSTICE BLACKMUN, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS joins, dissenting....

The crèche has been relegated to the role of a neutral harbinger of the holiday season, useful for commercial purposes, but devoid of any inherent meaning and incapable of enhancing the religious tenor of a display of which it is an integral part. The city has its victory—but it is a Pyrrhic one indeed.

The import of the Court's decision is to encourage use of the crèche in a municipally sponsored display, a setting where Christians feel constrained in acknowledging its symbolic meaning and non-Christians feel alienated by its presence. Surely, this is a misuse of a sacred symbol....

Note: The Nonendorsement Principle

1. Applying the nonendorsement principle. In County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573 (1989), a majority of the Court joined Justice Blackmun's opinion adopting Justice O'Connor's "no endorsement" analysis as a general guide in establishment clause cases. Shifting majorities on the Court held unconstitutional a freestanding display of a nativity scene on the main staircase of a county courthouse, but upheld the display of a Jewish menorah placed next to the city's Christmas tree and a statement declaring the city's "salute to liberty." One majority concluded that the "setting" of the nativity scene, which was the "single element" in the display, "celebrate[d] Christmas in a way that has the effect of endorsing a patently Christian message."

Justice Blackmun, writing for himself, concluded that the display of the menorah was permissible. "The menorah's message is not exclusively religious," and it stood next to a Christmas tree and a sign saluting liberty, with the effect of “creat[ing] an ‘overall holiday setting’ that represents both Christmas and Chanukah—two holidays, not one.” Justice O’Connor agreed that the display of the menorah was permissible. Although the menorah had religious content, she said, the overall display “sends a message of pluralism and freedom to choose one’s own beliefs.” Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens dissented as to the menorah. Justice Brennan argued that the Christmas tree was a religious symbol, and that Chanukah was not a holiday with secular dimensions. The government’s message in the “salute to liberty” was not religious, but “patriotic,” and “the government’s use of religion to promote its own cause is undoubtedly offensive to those whose religious beliefs are not bound up with their attitude toward the Nation.”

Justice Kennedy, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices White and Scalia, rejected the majority’s adoption of the “no endorsement” test, saying that it “reflects an unjustified hostility toward religion.” He argued that the establishment clause “permits government some latitude in recognizing and accommodating the central role religion plays in our society.” To him, the Court’s decisions disclose two limiting principles: government may not coerce anyone to support or participate in any religion or its exercise; and it may not, in the guise of avoiding hostility or callous indifference, give direct benefits to religion in such a degree that it in fact “establishes a [state] religion or religious faith, or tends to do so.” [Lynch.] [Symbolic] recognition or accommodation of religious faith may violate the Clause in an extreme case, [such as] the permanent erection of a large Latin cross on the roof of city hall [because] such an obtrusive year-round religious display would place the government’s weight behind an obvious effort to proselytize on behalf of a particular religion. [Absent] coercion, the risk of infringement of religious liberty by passive or symbolic accommodation is minimal.

Are the ceremonial or symbolic endorsements of religion at issue in these cases more or less important for the principle of nonestablishment than monetary subsidies to church-related education? Than the practice of prayer in the public schools?

2. Is the nonendorsement principle justifiable? Consider the argument in N. Feldman, From Liberty to Equality: The Transformation of the Establishment Clause, 90 Cal. L. Rev. 673, 677, 718 (2002), that the nonendorsement principle rests on a mistaken reduction of the establishment clause to a principle of equality: “Religious minorities are not uniquely vulnerable to political inequality, and religious discrimination in the United States has not been noticeably worse than discrimination on the basis of political ideology, immigrant status, or language. [The] political-equality approach [cannot] provide a compelling answer to the question ‘what is special about religion?’ [The] harms associated with [exclusion] are no worse than the harms associated with other sorts of second-class citizenship and identity exclusion.”

3. The appropriate perspective. Justice O’Connor would prohibit actions reasonably perceived as endorsement or disapproval. Perceived by whom? If by religious minorities, is she correct in concluding that reasonable Jews would not perceive the crèche as endorsement of Christianity? Consider the observation of S. Feldman, Principle, History, and Power: The Limits of the First Amendment Religion Clauses, 81 Iowa L. Rev. 833, 863 (1996): “In Lynch, the Court supported its conclusion by noting that [nobody] had complained about the crèche even though it had been publicly displayed for forty years. To the Court, this silence meant that the crèche had not generated dissension. [The] Court overlooked the possibility [that] Christian cultural imperialism had produced the silence of religious outgroup members. Silence often demonstrates domination, not consensus.”

Suppose the government does not intend to endorse religion, but an observer might infer endorsement from the government’s actions. How much must that person know about the government’s real position?

In Capitol Square Review & Advisory Board v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995), the Court divided over whether, and under what circumstances, an unattended display of a privately owned cross on public property could constitute an unconstitutional endorsement of religion. The Ku Klux Klan applied for a permit to display a cross in Capitol Square, the plaza surrounding Ohio’s Statehouse. The square is a public forum that has been used for speeches and demonstrations. Before the Klan’s application, unattended displays owned by private parties had been placed on the square three times: a “thermometer” showing the progress of a United Way fund drive, some booths during an arts festival, and a menorah.

Justice Scalia, writing for a plurality of four justices, concluded that the Constitution prohibited government endorsement of religion, but not “the government’s neutral treatment of private religious expression.” The plurality agreed that “giving sectarian religious speech preferential access to a forum close to the seat of government (or anywhere else for that matter) would violate the Establishment Clause.” It “could conceive of a case in which a governmental entity manipulates its administration of a public forum [in] such a manner that only certain religious groups take advantage of it, creating an impression of endorsement that is in fact accurate." But "private religious speech cannot be subject to veto by those who see favoritism where there is none."

Justices O'Connor, Souter, and Breyer concurred in the judgment. Justices O'Connor and Souter both stressed the importance of having "a sign disclaiming government sponsorship or endorsement" on the cross, which would "[help] remove doubt about State approval of [the] religious message." According to Justice O'Connor, "[when] the reasonable observer would view a government practice as endorsing religion, [it] is our duty to hold the practice invalid. [The Establishment] Clause is more than a negative prohibition against certain narrowly defined forms of government favoritism; it also imposes affirmative obligations that may require a State [to] take steps to avoid being perceived as supporting or endorsing a private religious message. [The Clause] forbids a State from [remaining] studiously oblivious to the effects of its actions." To determine whether "the State's own actions [actually] convey a message of endorsement," courts must conduct the inquiry "from the perspective of a hypothetical observer who is presumed to possess a certain level of information that all citizens might not share." The reasonable observer "must be deemed aware of the history and context of the community and forum in which the religious display occurs [and] the general history of the place in which the cross is displayed. [An] informed member of the community will know how the public space in question has been used in the past."

Justice Souter argued that "[given] the domination of the square by the government's own displays, one would not be a dimwit as a matter of law to think that an unattended religious display here was endorsed by the government." He found the permit denial unconstitutional only because the board had failed to grant the application "subject to the condition that the Klan attach a disclaimer sufficiently clear and large to preclude any reasonable inference that the cross was there to 'demonstrat[e] the government's allegiance to, or endorsement of, Christian faith.'"

Justice Stevens dissented. He argued, "If a reasonable person could perceive a government endorsement of religion from a private display, then the State may not allow its property to be used as a forum for that display. [So] it is with signs and symbols left to speak for themselves on public property. The very fact that a sign is installed on public property implies official recognition and reinforcement of its message. That implication is especially strong when the sign stands in front of the seat of the government itself. The reasonable observer of any symbol placed unattended in front of any capital in the world will normally assume that the sovereign which is not only the owner of that parcel of real estate but also the lawgiver for the surrounding territory has sponsored and facilitated its message.”

Justice Ginsburg also dissented, arguing that the display at issue in the case had an inadequate disclaimer. She reserved judgment on whether “a sturdier disclaimer” would have been sufficient.

4. Divisiveness as a criterion. In McCreary County v. ACLU of Kentucky, 545 U.S. 844 (2005), the Court defended the principle of neutrality between religion and irreligion as “respond[ing] to one of the major concerns that prompted adoption of the Religion Clauses. The Framers and the citizens of their time intended [to] guard against the civic divisiveness that follows when the Government weighs in on one side of religious debate.” Is the question of the divisiveness occasioned by an enactment, or the potential that a proposed enactment would be divisive, an empirical question? What is the baseline against which divisiveness is to be measured? Consider the possibility that a judicial decision prohibiting a practice as an establishment of religion might be as divisive as, or more divisive than, the legislature’s adoption of that practice. If divisiveness or its potential therefor is not an empirical but a conceptual matter, what are the components of the concept?

For a full discussion of the cases discussing divisiveness, see Garnett, Religion, Division, and the First Amendment, 94 Geo. L.J. 1667 (2006). Garnett concludes that the “divisiveness” argument “has rarely been outcome-determinative or done much real work,” and that none of the versions of the argument he describes are convincing: “That concerns about ‘political division along religious lines’ are real and reasonable does not mean that they can or should supply the enforceable content of the First Amendment’s prohibition on establishments of religion.” Id. at 1670.

5. De facto establishments. Consider M. Howe, The Garden and the Wilderness 11–12 (1965):

[Roger Williams’s] principle of separation endorsed a host of favoring tributes to faith [so] substantial that they have produced in the aggregate what may fairly be described as a de facto establishment of religion [in which] the religious institution as a whole is maintained and activated by forces not kindled directly by government. [Some] elements of our religious establishment are, of course, reinforced by law. Whenever that situation prevails, as it does, for instance, when the law secures the sanctity of Sunday, the courts are apt to seek out a secular justification for the favoring enactment and, by this evasive tactic, meet the charge that an establishment de jure exists. [Yet] the Supreme Court, by pretending that the American principle of separation is predominantly Jeffersonian and by purporting to outlaw even those aids in religion which do not affect religious liberties, seems to have endorsed a governmental policy aimed at the elimination of de facto establishments.

For an argument that most aspects of “ceremonial deism” violate the Court’s establishment clause doctrine, see Epstein, Rethinking the Constitutionality of Ceremonial Deism, 96 Colum. L. Rev. 2083 (1996). In McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420 (1961), the Court rejected an establishment clause challenge to laws requiring that most large-scale commercial enterprises remain closed on Sundays. The Court’s review of history demonstrated that Sunday closing laws were originally efforts to promote church attendance. “But, despite the strongly religious origin of these laws, nonreligious arguments for Sunday closing began to be heard more distinctly.” The Court said that the Constitution “does not ban federal or state regulation of conduct whose reason or effect merely happens to coincide with the tenets of some or all religions.” It concluded that, “as presently written and administered, most [Sunday closing laws] are of a secular rather than of a religious character.” They “provide a uniform day of rest for all citizens. [To] say that the States cannot prescribe Sunday as a day of rest for these purposes solely because centuries ago such laws had their genesis in religion would give a constitutional interpretation of hostility to the public welfare rather than one of mere separation of church and State.” As of 1961, was Howe’s characterization of Sunday closing laws more accurate than the Court’s? As of the present?

6. History as a guide. In Walz v. Tax Commission, 397 U.S. 664 (1970), the Court noted that every state had a property tax exemption for churches, and that the federal income tax has since its inception exempted religious organizations. It found “significant” that Congress exempted churches from real estate taxes in 1802. “[An] unbroken practice of according the exemption to churches, openly and by affirmative state action, not covertly or by state inaction, is not something to be lightly cast aside.” Justice Brennan, concurring, agreed that “the existence from the beginning of the Nation’s life of a practice [is] a fact of considerable import in the interpretation of abstract constitutional language. [The] more longstanding and widely accepted a practice, the greater its impact upon constitutional interpretation.” He found two “secular purposes” for the exemption: Churches, like other exempt groups, “contribute to the well-being of the community in a variety of nonreligious ways,” and they “uniquely contribute to the pluralism of American society.”

Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983), relied on a “unique history” to uphold the constitutionality of opening legislative sessions with prayers led by a state-employed chaplain. The history ran from colonial times to the present and included the first Congress's hiring a chaplain in 1789, only three days before it reached final agreement on the language of the first amendment:

[Historical] evidence sheds light not only on what the draftsmen intended the Establishment Clause to mean, but also on how they thought that Clause applied to the practice authorized by the First Congress—their actions reveal their intent. [In] light of the unambiguous and unbroken history of more than 200 years, there can be no doubt that the practice of opening legislative sessions with prayer has become part of the fabric of our society.

Did Lynch rely on history in an appropriate way? Did Walz and Marsh? Is Justice Brennan correct in distinguishing Lynch from Walz and Marsh? In Walz, the Court stated that tax exemptions had not “given the remotest sign of leading to an established church,” and in Marsh, it said that the fear that “prayer in this context risks the beginning of the establishment the founding Fathers feared [was] not well-founded.” Is that the “lesson of history” with respect to de facto establishments?

7. The Pledge of Allegiance, history, and ceremonial deism. In Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1 (2004), the Court refused, on standing grounds, to consider the merits of a challenge to the constitutionality of the inclusion of the words “under God” in the Pledge of Allegiance. Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices O’Connor and Thomas disagreed with that holding and wrote opinions explaining why they believed that the constitutional challenge should be rejected on the merits. Chief Justice Rehnquist relied on history to show that “our national culture allows public recognition of our Nation’s religious history and character.” He wrote, “I do not believe that the phrase ‘under God’ in the Pledge converts its recital into a ‘religious exercise.’...Instead, it is a declaration of belief in allegiance and loyalty to the United States flag and the Republic....The phrase [is] in no sense a prayer, nor an endorsement of any religion....Reciting the Pledge, or listening to others recite it, is a patriotic exercise, not a religious one; participants promise fidelity to our flag and our Nation, not to any particular God, faith, or church.”

Justice Thomas wrote, “It is difficult to see how [the phrase] does not entail an affirmation that God exists.” For him, “as a matter of our precedent, the Pledge policy is unconstitutional.” He would overrule Lee v. Weisman and eliminate its test of “coercion,” replacing it with a test of “legal compulsion.”

Justice O’Connor relied on the endorsement test, and characterized the phrase in the Pledge as an example of permissible “ceremonial deism,” although she called it a “close question.” Ceremonial deism, which involved “solemnizing an event and recognizing a shared religious history,” included expressions that had “legitimate nonreligious purposes.” Those purposes were revealed “when a given practice has been in place for a significant portion of the Nation’s history, and when it is observed by enough persons that it can fairly be called ubiquitous.” Further, ceremonial deism was characterized by the “absence of worship or prayer” and by a “highly circumscribed reference to God.” Brief references tend “to confirm that the reference is being used to acknowledge religion or to solemnize an event rather than to endorse religion in any way,” and “it makes it easier for those participants who wish to ‘opt out’ [to] do so without having to reject the ceremony entirely [and] tends to limit the ability of government to express a preference for one religious sect over another.” Also, “no religious acknowledgement could claim to be an instance of ceremonial deism if it explicitly favored one particular religious belief system over another.” She also observed that “[a]ny coercion that persuades an onlooker to participate in an act of ceremonial deism is inconsequential, as an Establishment Clause matter, because such acts are simply not religious in character.”

TOWN OF GREECE v. GALLOWAY, 134 S. Ct. 1811 (2014). Town of Greece v. Galloway involved the prayer practices of the town board of Greece, a suburb of Rochester, New York. Starting in 1999, the board opened its meetings with, among other matters, a prayer given by guest chaplains chosen from a list of congregations in the town directory, nearly all of which are Christian. Some of the ministers “spoke in a distinctly Christian idiom,” including invoking “the saving sacrifice of Jesus Christ on the cross.”

Justice Kennedy wrote an opinion that was in part for the Court, and in part only for himself and Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito. The Court upheld the town’s practices. It relied heavily on Marsh, which “[must] not be understood as permitting a practice that would amount to a constitutional violation if not for its historical foundation. The case teaches instead that the Establishment Clause must be interpreted ‘by reference to historical practices and understandings.’ [The] Court’s inquiry [must] be to determine whether the prayer practice in the town of Greece fits within the tradition long followed in Congress and the state legislatures.” But “[an] insistence on nonsectarian or ecumenical prayer as a single, fixed, standard is not consistent with the tradition of legislative [prayer]. [To] hold that invocations must be nonsectarian would force the legislatures [and] the courts [to] act as supervisors and censors of religious speech, [which] would involve government in religious matters to a far greater degree [than] is the case under the town’s current practice.” Justice

Kennedy also wrote, “If the course and practice over time shows that the invocations denigrate nonbelievers or religious minorities, threaten damnation, or preach conversion, many present may consider the prayer to fall short of the desire to elevate the purpose of the occasion and to unite lawmakers in their common effort. That circumstance would present a different [case].” Noting that “two remarks” by guest chaplains “strayed from the rationale set out in Marsh,” he wrote that “they do not despoil a practice that on the whole reflects and embraces our tradition. Absent a pattern of prayers that over time denigrate, proselytize, or betray an impermissible government purpose, a challenge based solely on the content of a prayer will not likely establish a constitutional violation.” The town’s efforts to locate guest chaplains were “reasonable,” and did “not reflect an aversion or bias on the part of town leaders against minority faiths. So long as the town maintains a policy of nondiscrimination, the Constitution does not require it to search beyond its borders for non-Christian prayer givers in an effort to achieve religious balancing.”

In the part of the opinion joined only by the Chief Justice and Justice Alito, Justice Kennedy addressed and rejected the argument that the prayer practice coerced participation. As to coercion, “The inquiry remains a fact-sensitive one that considers both the setting in which the prayer arises and the audience to whom it is directed,” again “valuated against the backdrop of historical practice.” “It is presumed that the reasonable observer is acquainted with this tradition and understands that its purposes are to lend gravity to public proceedings and to acknowledge the place religion holds in the lives of many private citizens, not to afford government an opportunity to proselytize or force truant constituents into the pews. That many appreciate these acknowledgments of the divine in our public institutions does not suggest that those who disagree are compelled to join the expression or approve its content.” But “[t]he analysis would be different if town board members directed the public to participate in the prayers, singled out dissidents for opprobrium, or indicated that their decisions might be influenced by a person’s acquiescence in the prayer opportunity.” Addressing the respondents’ claim that “the prayers gave them offense and made them feel excluded and disrespected,” Justice Kennedy wrote, “Offense [does] not equate to coercion.”

Justice Thomas, joined in part by Justice Scalia, wrote separately. Justice Thomas repeated his argument that the Establishment Clause was not made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth Amendment. In addition, he argued that “the municipal prayers [bear] no resemblance to the coercive state establishments that existed at the founding.” The coercion relevant to Establishment Clause analysis “is actual legal coercion, [not] the ‘subtle coercive pressures' allegedly felt by [respondents]."

Justice Kagan, joined by Justices Ginsburg, Breyer, and Sotomayor, dissented. Justice Breyer also dissented in a separate opinion. For Justice Kagan, "[t]he practice [here] differs from the one sustained in [Marsh] because Greece's town meetings involve participation by ordinary citizens, and the invocations given—directly to those citizens—were predominantly sectarian. [Greece's] Board did nothing to recognize religious diversity. [The] Town never sought (except briefly when this suit was filed) to involve, accommodate, or in any way reach out to adherents of non-Christian religions." She agreed that "Greece's Board [has] legislative functions," but its "meetings are also occasions for ordinary citizens to engage with and petition their government, often on highly individualized matters. That feature calls for Board members to exercise special care to ensure that the prayers offered [respect] each and every member of the community as an equal citizen." The sessions in Marsh at which prayers were offered were "floor sessions [for] elected lawyers. Members of the public take no part. [Greece's] town meetings [revolve] around ordinary members of the community," who "urge [changes] in the Board's policies [and] then, in which are essentially adjudicatory hearings, they request the Board to grant [applications] for various permits."

Let's say that a Muslim citizen of Greece goes before the Board to [request] some permit. [Just] before she gets to speak her piece, a minister deputized by the Town asks her to pray "in the name of God's only son Jesus Christ." She must think [that] Christian worship has become entwined with local governance. And now she faces a choice—to pray alongside the majority [or] somehow to register her deeply felt difference. [That] is no easy call—especially given that the room is small and her every action [will] be noticed. She does not wish to be rude to her neighbors, nor does she wish to aggravate the Board members whom she will soon be trying to persuade. And yet she does not want to acknowledge Christ's divinity. [So] assume she declines to participate with the others in the first act of the meeting—or even [stands] up and leaves the room. [She] becomes a different kind of citizen. [And] she thus stands at a remove, based solely on religion, from her fellow citizens and her elected representatives. Everything about that situation [infringes] the First Amendment.

Justice Kagan would allow some prayer activities. "What the circumstances here demand is the recognition that we are a pluralistic people. [If] the Town Board had let its chaplains know that they should speak in nonsectarian terms, [then] no one would have valid grounds for complaint. [Or] it might have invited clergy of many faiths to serve as chaplains. [But] Greece could not do what it did: infuse a participatory government body with one (and only one) faith.” For her, “[when] a citizen stands before her government, [her] religious beliefs do not enter into the picture. The government she faces favors no particular religion, either by word or by deed. And that government [imposes] no religious tests on its citizens, sorts none of them by faith, and permits no exclusion based on belief. When a person goes to court, a polling place, or an immigration proceeding, [government] officials do not engage in sectarian worship, nor do they ask her to do likewise. They all participate in the business of government not as Christians, Jews, Muslims (and more), but only as Americans—none of them different from any other for that civic purpose.”

Justice Alito, joined by Justice Scalia, responded to Justice Kagan in a concurring opinion, calling “the narrow aspect” of her dissent’s objections to the holding “really quite niggling.” He argued that “there [is] no historical support for the proposition that only generic prayer is allowed” and observed that “as our country has become more diverse, composing a prayer that is acceptable to all members of the community who hold religious beliefs has become [harder.]” Further, “if a town attempts to go beyond simply recommending that a guest chaplain deliver a prayer that is broadly acceptable, [the] town will [encounter] sensitive problems,” including possible prescreening or reviewing prayers. The alternative of compiling a list of clergy from numerous traditions to serve as guest chaplains meant that Justice Kagan’s objection was only the “[the] town’s clerical employees did a bad job in compiling the list” they used.

Note: The Significance of Religious Pluralism

1. Religious pluralism and the political process. What does the Court mean in Lynch by saying that the crèche must be considered “in the proper context”? Is Justice Blackmun correct in his claim that religion’s victory is Pyrrhic? Consider Kurland, The Religion Clauses and the Burger Court, 34 Cath. U. L. Rev. 1, 13–14 (1984): “The crèche opinion was sleazy. [I] would think that devout Christians might take umbrage at the government, in the form of the judiciary, for labeling a depiction of the birth of the Christ child as a nonreligious symbol, like a Christmas tree or a banner proclaiming ‘Seasons Greetings.’”

Does the emphasis on context suggest that there is no religious content to the use of the crèche? Or that the undeniable religious content is relatively modest? Should the Court insist that permissible de facto establishments have a low level of religious content? Consider the following argument: Contemporary society is pluralist in religion and in politics. Some religious groups oppose all governmental support of religion; others would support sectarian aid but oppose nondenominational aid; and others would support nondenominational aid. As some of these groups seek to secure legislation, they will have to adjust their programs to obtain majority support. The likely outcome of pluralist political bargaining in contemporary society on matters relating to religion is legislation having relatively modest religious content. The political process is therefore sufficient to guard against the evils at which the establishment clause is directed. Does this argument underestimate the degree to which a “least common denominator” religion may raise serious concern about establishment?

Does the crèche in Lynch demonstrate less governmental support for religion than nondenominational voluntary school prayer? Than student-led prayer groups held in school buildings before or after school hours? Is it sufficient to say that the Court regarded the school prayer cases as involving statutes that had no secular purposes?

2. A cross as a war memorial? Salazar v. Buono, 559 U.S. 700 (2010), considered but did not definitively resolve an establishment clause challenge to the 2004 transfer to private ownership of federal land on which a Latin cross had been erected in 1934. The cross was located in a remote area of the Mojave National Preserve, accessible via a blacktop road. Justice Kennedy, in an opinion joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito, wrote, “Although certainly a religious symbol, the cross was not emplaced [to] promote a Christian message. [Time] also has played a role. The cross had stood [for] nearly seven decades before the [transfer]. By then, the cross and the cause it commemorated had become entwined in the public consciousness. Members of the public gathered regularly [to] pay their respects. [Congress] ultimately designated the cross as a national memorial. [It] is reasonable to interpret the congressional designation as giving recognition to the historical meaning that the cross had attained. [The] goal of avoiding governmental endorsement does not require eradication of all religious symbols in the public realm. [The] Constitution does not oblige government to avoid any public acknowledgement of religion’s role in society. Rather, it leaves room to accommodate divergent values within a constitutionally permissible framework. [A] Latin cross is not merely a reaffirmation of Christian beliefs. It is a symbol often used to honor and respect those whose heroic acts, noble contributions, and patient striving help secure an honored place in history for this Nation and its people. Here, one Latin cross in the desert evokes far more than religion. It evokes thousands of small crosses in foreign fields marking the graves of Americans who fell in battles [whose] tragedies are compounded if the fallen are forgotten.”

Concurring, Justice Alito observed that “Congress’ consistent goal [has] been to commemorate our Nation’s war dead and to avoid the disturbing symbolism that would have been created by the destruction of the monument.” Justices Scalia and Thomas concurred in the judgment, finding that the challenger lacked standing.

Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Ginsburg and Sotomayor, dissented. “[After] the transfer it would continue to appear to any reasonable observer that the Government has endorsed the cross, [particularly because] the Government has designated the cross as a national memorial. [After] the transfer, a well-informed observer would know that the cross was no longer on public land, but would additionally be aware [that the] cross was once on public land, [Congress] transferred it to a specific purchaser in order to preserve its [display], and the Government maintained a reversionary interest in the land. [Even] though Congress recognized this cross for its military associations, the solitary cross conveys an inescapable sectarian message. [Making] a plain, unadorned Latin cross a war memorial does not make the cross secular. It makes the war memorial sectarian.” In a footnote, Justice Stevens observed, “The cross is not a universal symbol of sacrifice. It is a symbol of one particular sacrifice, and that sacrifice carries deeply significant meaning for those who adhere to the Christian faith.” Justice Breyer also dissented.

3. Nondiscrimination. In Walz, Justice Harlan’s concurring opinion stated that “[the] Court must survey meticulously the circumstances of governmental categories to eliminate [religious] gerrymanders. [The] critical question is whether the circumference of legislation encircles a class [sufficiently] broad.” What is the basis for choosing between defining the class in Lynch as the crèche alone or defining it as the entire holiday display?

3. Impermissible Purposes: The School Prayer Cases

Note: Problems with a Purpose Test

1. Determining impermissible legislative purposes. Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980), held unconstitutional a Kentucky statute requiring that a copy of the Ten Commandments be posted on the walls of each public classroom. The Court found that this requirement had “no secular legislative purpose”: The commandments were “undeniably a sacred text in the Jewish and Christian faiths,” and “if the posted copies [are] to have any effect at all, it will be to induce the school children to read, meditate upon, perhaps to venerate and obey, the Commandments. However desirable this might be as a matter of private devotion, it is not a permissible state objective under the Establishment Clause.” Justice Rehnquist’s dissent relied on a statement in the statute that its purpose was secular and argued that the requirement had a secular purpose because “the Ten Commandments have had a significant secular impact on the development of secular legal codes of the Western World.”

Stone relied heavily on the school prayer cases. In Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), the New York Board of Regents drafted and recommended that school districts have classes recite aloud the following prayer: “Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and beg Thy blessings upon us, our parents, our teachers and our Country.” Justice Black, writing for the Court, stated that “in this country it is no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as a part of a religious program carried on by government.”

In Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963), the Court held unconstitutional a state law requiring that ten verses from the Bible be read aloud at the opening of each day of public school. Justice Clark’s opinion for the Court stated that Bible-reading had a religious character and found the state’s policy of permitting nonattendance was not “consistent with the contention that the Bible is here used either as an instrument for nonreligious moral inspiration or as a reference for the teaching of secular subjects.” Justice Stewart dissented, finding “a substantial free exercise claim” that “a compulsory state educational system so structures a child’s life that if religious exercises are held to be an impermissible activity in schools, religion is placed at an artificial and state-created disadvantage.”

Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985), held unconstitutional an Alabama statute authorizing schools to set aside one minute at the start of the school day “for meditation or voluntary prayer.” The statute amended an earlier one authorizing a moment of silence “for meditation.” The Court drew on Madison and Everson to conclude that “the individual freedom of conscience [embraces] the right to select any religious faith or none at all” because “religious beliefs worthy of respect are the product of free and voluntary choice by the faithful.” The bill’s sponsor stated that it was “an ‘effort to return voluntary prayer’ to the public schools.” The Court said that the statute served “no secular purpose” not already served by the “meditation” statute. It noted that the statute could not be a permissible accommodation of religion because, prior to its enactment, “there was no governmental practice impeding students from silently praying for one minute at the beginning of the school day. [What] was missing [was] the State’s endorsement and promotion of religion and a particular religious practice.”

Justice O’Connor concurred in the judgment on the ground that the statute’s

“purpose and likely effect [were] to endorse and sponsor voluntary prayer in the public schools.” She argued that simple “moment of silence” statutes were constitutional because “a moment of silence is not inherently religious [and because] a pupil who participates in a moment of silence need not compromise his or her belief.” Thus, the “State does not necessarily endorse any activity that might occur during the period. Even if a statute specifies that a student may choose to pray silently during a quiet moment, the State has not thereby encouraged prayer over other specified alternatives. [The] crucial question is whether the state has conveyed or attempted to convey the message that children should use the moment of silence for prayer.” She also wrote, “[A] legislature [might] enunciate a sham secular [purpose, but] our courts are capable of distinguishing a sham secular purpose from a real one.”

Chief Justice Burger dissented, noting that the bill’s sponsor testified that “one of his purposes [was] to clear up a widespread misunderstanding that a schoolchild is legally prohibited from [praying] once he steps inside a public school building.”

Is it accurate to say that each of these statutes had no purpose other than the promotion of religion? Alternatively, do the statutes have no substantial secular purposes? Consider whether the purposes discussed in Lynch v. Donnelly are substantial.

2. Determining legislative purpose: nondiscrimination and gerrymandering. Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228 (1982), involved a Minnesota statute imposing reporting requirements on religious organizations that solicit more than 50 percent of their funds from nonmembers. The legislative history included one legislator’s statement that “what you’re trying to get at here is the people who are running around streets and soliciting people” and another’s that he was “not sure why we’re so hot to regulate the Moonies anyway.” Five members of the Court, in an opinion by Justice Brennan, held that the statute violated “the clearest command of the Establishment Clause [—that] one religious denomination cannot be officially preferred over another.” Such “denominational preferences” must be “justified by a compelling governmental interest, and [be] closely fitted to further that interest.” The state’s “interest in protecting its citizens from abusive practices” might be compelling, but the 50 percent rule was not closely fitted to preventing abuse. The distinctions in the statute “engender a risk of politicizing religion” and “led the Minnesota legislature to discuss the characteristics of various sects with a view towards ‘religious gerrymandering.’” Justice White, joined by Justice Rehnquist, dissented on the ground that the statute was not “a deliberate and explicit preference for some religious denominations over others” because it “names no churches or denominations. [Some] religions will qualify and some will not, but this depends on the source of their contributions, not on their brand of religion."

McCreary County v. ACLU of Kentucky, 545 U.S. 844 (2005), revisited the issue of government posting of the Ten Commandments, and applied the "impermissible purpose" test. Noting that "[examination] of purpose is a staple of statutory interpretation [and] governmental purpose is a key element of a good deal of constitutional doctrine," the Court, in an opinion by Justice Souter, adhered to the proposition that "scrutinizing purpose does make practical sense [where] an understanding of official objective emerges from readily discoverable fact, without any judicial psychoanalysis of a drafter's heart of hearts. The eyes that look to purpose belong to an "objective observer," one who takes account of the traditional external signs that show up in the "text, legislative history, and implementation of the statute."..." Justice Souter's opinion described prior cases invoking the "purpose" test as holding government action unconstitutional "only because openly available data supported a commonsense conclusion that a religious objective permeated the government's action." Government action does not violate the establishment clause, the Court continued, where it has a secular purpose that is "genuine, not a sham, and not merely secondary to a religious objective."

On the same day, the Court upheld the display of the Ten Commandments on the statehouse grounds in Austin, Texas. Van Orden v. Perry, 545 U.S. 677 (2005). The dispositive vote was cast by Justice Breyer, who wrote, "If the relation between government and religion is one of separation, but not of mutual hostility and suspicion, one will inevitably find difficult borderline cases. And in such cases, I see no test-related substitute for the exercise of legal judgment. That judgment is not a personal judgment. Rather, [it] must take account of context and consequences measured in light of those purposes. [No] exact formula can dictate a resolution to such fact-intensive cases."

Justice Breyer's opinion in Van Orden found "determinative" the fact that "40 years passed in which the presence of this monument, legally speaking, went unchallenged....And I am not aware of any evidence suggesting that this was due to a climate of intimidation. [Those] 40 years suggest more strongly than can any set of formulaic tests that few individuals [are] likely to have understood the monument as amounting [to] a government effort to favor a particular religious sect, primarily to promote religion over nonreligion, [or] to 'work deterrence' of any 'religious belief.'" In light of McCreary County and Van Orden, can a government body hereafter, without violating the establishment clause, develop a program in which the Ten Commandments are posted with public support? Consider these observations, from Koppelman, The New American Civil

Religion: Lessons for Italy, 41 Geo. Wash. Int'l L. Rev. 861, 866 (2010):

Douglas Laycock thinks that a lesson [is] that “separationist groups should sue immediately when they encounter any religious practice newly sponsored by the government.” That is precisely the right lesson. [New] sponsorship of religious practices is far more likely to represent a contemporaneous effort to intervene in a live religious controversy than the perpetuation of old forms.

3. A critique of the search for impermissible purposes. In his dissenting opinion in Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987), Justice Scalia offered this critique of the “purpose” test:

[While] it is possible to discern the objective “purpose” of a statute (i.e., the public good at which its provisions appear to be directed), or even the formal motivation for a statute where that is explicitly set forth, [discerning] the subjective motivation of those enacting the statute is, to be honest, almost always an impossible task. The number of possible motivations, to begin with, is not binary, or indeed even finite. In the present case, for example, a particular legislator [may] have thought the bill would provide jobs for his district, or may have wanted to make amends with a faction of his party he had alienated on another vote, or he may have been a close friend of the bill’s sponsor, or he may have hoped the Governor would appreciate his vote and make a fund-raising appearance for him, or he may have been pressured to vote for a bill he disliked by a wealthy contributor or by a flood of constituent mail, or he may have been seeking favorable publicity, or he may have been reluctant to hurt the feelings of a loyal staff member who worked on the bill, or he may have been settling an old score with a legislator who opposed the bill, or he may have been mad at his wife who opposed the bill, or he may have been intoxicated and utterly unmotivated when the vote was called, or he may have accidentally voted “yes” instead of “no,” or, of course, he may have had (and very likely did have) a combination of some of the above and many other considerations. To look for the sole purpose of even a single legislator is probably to look for something that does not exist.

Putting that problem aside, however, where ought we to look for the individual legislator’s purpose? We cannot of course assume that every member present [agreed] with the motivation expressed in a particular legislator’s pre-enactment floor or committee statement. [Can] we assume, then, that they all agree with the motivation expressed in the staff-prepared committee reports they might have [read]? Should we consider post-enactment floor statements? Or post-enactment testimony from legislators, obtained expressly for the lawsuit? Should we consider media reports on the realities of the legislative bargaining? [Legislative] histories can be contrived and sanitized, favorable media coverage orchestrated, and postenactment recollections conveniently distorted. Perhaps most valuable of all would be more objective indications—for example, evidence regarding the individual legislators' religious affiliations. And if that, why not evidence regarding the fervor or tepidity of their beliefs?

Having achieved, through these simple means, an assessment of what individual legislators intended, we must still confront the question [how] many of them must have the invalidating intent. If a state senate approves a bill by vote of 26 to 25, and only one of the 26 intended solely to advance religion, is the law unconstitutional? What if 13 of the 26 had that intent? What if 3 of the 26 had the impermissible intent, but 3 of the 25 were simply attempting to "balance" the votes of their impermissibly motivated colleagues? Or is it possible that the intent of the bill's sponsor is alone enough to invalidate it—on a theory, perhaps, that even though everyone else's intent was pure, what they produced was the fruit of a forbidden tree?

Does this critique cast doubt on all doctrines relying on locating legislative purposes? Are inquiries into legislative purposes easier or more difficult in this context than in the equal protection setting, for example?

4. A critique of the "ban" on impermissible purposes. Does the ban on impermissible purposes imply that a legislator may not rely on religious convictions as a reason for supporting or opposing legislation?

In Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980), the Court rejected an establishment clause attack on a statute restricting public financing of abortions. The challengers argued that the statute "incorporates into law the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church." The Court responded that "the fact that the funding restrictions [may] coincide with the religious tenets of the Roman Catholic Church does not, without more, contravene the Establishment Clause." It mentioned that many statutory prohibitions, such as those against larceny, similarly coincided with religious tenets. Are such prohibitions distinguishable on the ground that more religious traditions converge in condemning them than condemn abortion? What more would be needed to establish a first amendment violation? Suppose the challengers showed that religious motivations not broadly shared among many religions played a substantial part in the enactment. Should the burden shift to the state to show a substantial secular purpose?

Consider these observations:

Legislation must be justified in terms of secular objectives, but when people reasonably think that shared premises of justice and criteria for determining truth cannot resolve critical questions of fact, fundamental questions of value, or the weighing of competing benefits and harms, they do appropriately rely on religious convictions that help them answer these questions. Not only is such reliance appropriate for ordinary citizens, legislators in similar instances may also rely on their own religious convictions and those of their constituents, and occasionally such reliance is warranted even for judges. Though reliance on religious convictions may be appropriate in these settings, argument in religious terms is often an inapt form of public dialogue.

K. Greenawalt, Religious Convictions and Political Choice 12 (1988).

On the use of “argument in religious terms,” S. Carter, The Culture of Disbelief 23 (1993), observes, “One good way to end a conversation—or start an argument—is to tell a group of well-educated professionals that you hold a political position (preferably a controversial one, such as being against abortion or pornography) because it is required by your understanding of God’s will.” How might the conversation continue? Magarian, Religious Argument, Free Speech Theory, and Democratic Dynamism, 86 Notre Dame L. Rev. 119, 138, 140 (2011), argues that “[political] arguments grounded solely in what the believer views as divinely inspired insight can destabilize public political debate [because] such arguments foreclose dialogue with nonbelievers,” as do arguments that “[replicate] the position of an authoritative religion, based on the believer’s submission to the leader’s authority,” but that the risk of introducing instability is outweighed by the contribution such arguments make to dynamism in public policy.

5. Course selection: the creationism controversy. Consider Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968). In 1928, Arkansas enacted a statute prohibiting “the teaching in its public schools and universities of the theory that man evolved from other species of life.” The Court held the statute, “a product of the upsurge of ‘fundamentalist’ religious fervor of the twenties,” unconstitutional. The law “selects from a body of knowledge a particular segment which it proscribes for the sole reason that it is deemed to conflict with a particular religious doctrine. [The] First Amendment does not permit the State to require that teaching and learning must be tailored to the principles or prohibitions of any religious sect or dogma,” despite the “State’s undoubted right to prescribe the curriculum for its public schools.” The Court said that “[no] suggestion has been made that [the statute] may be justified by considerations of state policy other than the religious views of some of its citizens.” Justice Black, concurring, would distinguish Epperson from the case of “a state law prohibiting all teaching of human development.” Suppose such a prohibition was motivated (a) by a new upsurge of fundamentalism that viewed the subject as inculcating antireligious values or (b) by a judgment that, as Justice Black put it, “it would be best to remove this controversial subject from its schools.”

In Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Brennan, held unconstitutional a Louisiana statute requiring public schools to teach “creation science” whenever they taught the theory of evolution. Examining the structure of the statute and statements made in the course of its adoption, the Court concluded that the statute had no secular purpose despite the statement in the statute’s text that it was designed to promote “academic freedom.” The Court stated that the statute would not promote academic freedom in the sense of “enhancing the freedom of teachers to teach what they will” or even “teaching all the evidence” in part because it required that curriculum guides be developed for creation science but not for evolution. The Court also stressed that the case presented “[the] same historic and contemporaneous antagonisms between the teachings of certain religious denominations and the teaching of evolution” that it had found in Epperson. “The preeminent purpose of the Louisiana legislature was clearly to advance the religious viewpoint that a supernatural being created humankind.”

The Court’s analysis concluded:

We do not imply that a legislature could never require that scientific critiques of prevailing scientific theories be taught. [Teaching] a variant of scientific theories about the origins of humankind to school children might be validly done with the clear secular intent of enhancing the effectiveness of science instruction. But because the primary purpose of the [Louisiana] Act is to endorse a particular religious doctrine, the Act furthers religion in violation of the Establishment Clause.

Justice Powell’s concurring opinion, in which Justice O’Connor joined, agreed that the statute had no secular purpose. Justice Scalia wrote a long dissent, in which Chief Justice Rehnquist joined. His examination of the legislative history led him to conclude that one purpose of the statute was to advance academic freedom, as it stated, in the sense of enhancing “students’ freedom from indoctrination,” which the legislature believed was occurring in biology courses that presented only the theory of evolution.

Could a legislature prohibit the teaching of evolution because it was a scientifically questionable theory whose acceptance by many scientists resulted from their antireligious biases? What sort of legislative hearings or findings would be required? Could a judge reassess the legislature's evaluation of the scientific status of the theory of evolution? In the absence of an illicit motivation of the sort found in Aguillard, does the Constitution require states to teach only the truth in matters of science? Political theory?

4. Facially Neutral Statutes That Incidentally Aid Religion: Permissible and Impermissible Effects

Note: The Problem and Its Background

1. The basic problem. The school prayer cases indicate that, de facto establishments aside, legislation with the sole (or predominant?) purpose of aiding religion is unconstitutional. Sometimes the Court will treat legislation that does not use religion as a basis for classification as a religious gerrymander, inferring an impermissible purpose from the statute's structure and history. More complex problems arise when the Court is unwilling to infer an impermissible purpose for a statute that does not use religion as a basis for classification, yet the legislation substantially aids religious institutions.

The Court has examined this problem most extensively in cases questioning legislative efforts to support nonpublic education. Below the college level, nearly all such education occurs in schools affiliated with churches, so that usually 75 percent or more of the aid goes to church-related schools. The Court's first substantial decision was Everson. The Court said that the first amendment "requires the state to be a neutral in its relations with groups of religious believers and non-believers; it does not require the state to be their adversary." It should not be interpreted "to prohibit [the state] from extending its general state law benefits to all its citizens without regard to their religious belief." The bus transportation statute "does no more than provide a general program to help parents get their children, regardless of their religion, safely and expeditiously to and from accredited schools."

Justice Rutledge's dissent was joined by Justices Frankfurter, Jackson, and Burton. He contended that the first amendment "broadly forbids state support, financial or other, of religion in any guise, form or degree. It outlaws all use of public funds for religious purposes." In this case, "parents pay money to send their children to parochial schools and funds raised by taxation are used to reimburse them. This not only helps the children to get to school and the parents to send them. It aids them in a substantial way to get [religious] training and teaching" in part because "transportation [is] as essential to education as any other element.” He argued that it was impossible to apportion the expenditures between the parochial schools’ religious instruction and their instruction in secular subjects.

The transportation subsidy makes it less expensive for parents to provide their children with a comprehensive religious education. In this sense, the subsidy “supports” or “aids” religion. But if the legislation is truly neutral, should this kind of support violate the Constitution? Is it distinguishable from the provision of general police and fire protection to churches and parochial schools, which could purchase private security services to provide those protections? In Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995), Justice Souter, for four dissenters, argued that these forms of aid should be limited to “essential public benefits.” Justice Thomas, in a separate concurring opinion, responded that to do so would be inconsistent with “[our] Nation’s tradition of allowing religious adherents to participate in evenhanded government programs.”

2. Subsequent developments. Laycock, A Survey of Religious Liberty in the United States, 47 Ohio St. L.J. 409, 443–446 (1986), describes six theories that “have been endorsed by one or more justices.” They are (a) the “no-aid theory: that any state money paid to a religious school or its students expands the school’s budget and thereby aids religion”; (b) the “purchase-of-services theory: that state money paid to a religious school is simply a purchase of educational services”; (c) the “equal-treatment theory[, which] holds that government is obligated to pay for the secular aspects of education in religious schools [or] that government is free to make such payments if it wishes”; (d) the “child-benefit theory: that the state can provide educational benefits directly to children or their parents, even if the benefits are used at or in connection with a religious school [but] cannot provide the same aid directly to the school”; (e) the “tracing theory, [which] tries to trace each dollar of government money to see what the school spent it on”; and (f) the “little-bit theory[: that] a little bit of aid to religious schools is permissible, but it must be structured in a way that keeps it from becoming too much.” Which of these theories explains which of the cases? Which, if any, makes sense of the Constitution?

Mueller v. Allen

463 U.S. 388 (1983)

[Minnesota’s income tax statute permitted taxpayers to deduct from their gross income actual expenses incurred for “tuition, textbooks and transportation” for the education of their children in elementary and secondary schools. The deduction, available for expenses incurred in sending children to public as well as nonpublic schools, was limited to $500 per child in elementary school and $700 per child in secondary school. About 820,000 children attended public schools in Minnesota, while about 91,000 attended nonpublic schools, 95 percent of them in religiously affiliated schools. The court of appeals held that the statute did not violate the establishment clause.]

JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court....

One fixed principle in this field is our consistent rejection of the argument that “any program which in some manner aids an institution with a religious affiliation” violates the Establishment Clause. Hunt v. McNair, 413 U.S. 734, 742 (1973). For example, [a] state may reimburse parents for expenses incurred in transporting their children to school [Everson], and [it] may loan secular textbooks to all schoolchildren within the state [Board of Education v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236 (1968)]....

A state’s decision to defray the cost of educational expenses incurred by parents—regardless of the type of schools their children attend—evidences a purpose that is both secular and understandable. An educated populace is essential to the political and economic health of any community, and a state’s efforts to assist parents in meeting the rising cost of educational expenses plainly serves this secular purpose of ensuring that the state’s citizenry is well educated. Similarly, Minnesota, like other states, could conclude that there is a strong public interest in assuring the continued financial health of private schools, both sectarian and nonsectarian. By educating a substantial number of students such schools relieve public schools of a correspondingly great burden—to the benefit of all taxpayers. In addition, private schools may serve as a benchmark for public schools, in a manner analogous to the “TVA yardstick” for private power companies....

We turn therefore to the more difficult but related question whether the Minnesota statute has “the primary effect of advancing the sectarian aims of the nonpublic schools.” [Lemon.] In concluding that it does not, we find several features of the Minnesota tax deduction particularly significant. First, an essential feature of Minnesota’s arrangement is the fact that §290.09, subd. 22, is only one among many deductions [available] under the Minnesota tax laws. [The] Minnesota legislature’s judgment that a deduction for educational expenses fairly equalizes the tax burden of its citizens and encourages desirable expenditures for educational purposes is entitled to substantial deference.

Other characteristics of §290.09, subd. 22, argue equally strongly for the provision’s constitutionality. Most importantly, the deduction is available for educational expenses incurred by all parents, including those whose children attend public schools and those whose children attend nonsectarian private schools or sectarian private [schools:] “the provision of benefits to so broad a spectrum of groups is an important index of secular effect.”

We also agree [that,] by channeling whatever assistance it may provide to parochial schools through individual parents, Minnesota has reduced the Establishment Clause objections to which its action is subject. It is true, of course, that financial assistance provided to parents ultimately has an economic effect comparable to that of aid given directly to the schools attended by their children. It is also true, however, that under Minnesota’s arrangement public funds become available only as a result of numerous, private choices of individual parents of school-age children. [It] is noteworthy that...our recent cases invalidating state aid to parochial schools have involved the direct transmission of assistance from the state to the schools themselves....Where, as here, aid to parochial schools is available only as a result of decisions of individual parents no “imprimatur of State approval” [Widmar, Chapter 7, section E2, supra] can be deemed to have been conferred on any particular religion, or on religion generally.

We find it useful [to] compare the attenuated financial benefits flowing to parochial schools from the section to the evils against which the Establishment Clause was designed to protect. These dangers are well-described by our statement that “[w]hat is at stake as a matter of policy [in Establishment Clause cases] is preventing that kind and degree of government involvement in religious life that, as history teaches us, is apt to lead to strife and frequently strain a political system to the breaking point.” It is important, however, to “keep these issues in perspective”:

At this point in the 20th century we are quite far removed from the dangers that prompted the Framers to include the Establishment Clause in the Bill of Rights. The risk of significant religious or denominational control over our democratic processes—or even a deep political division along religious lines—is remote, and when viewed against the positive contributions of sectarian schools, any such risk seems entirely tolerable in light of the continuing oversight of this Court.

[Wolman v. Walter, 443 U.S. 229 (1977)] (Powell, J., concurring in part, concurring in the judgment in part, and dissenting in part). The Establishment Clause of course extends beyond prohibition of a state church or payment of state funds to one or more churches. We do not think, however, that its prohibition extends to the type of tax deduction established by Minnesota. The historic purposes of the clause simply do not encompass the sort of attenuated financial benefit, ultimately controlled by the private choices of individual parents, that eventually flows to parochial schools from the neutrally available tax benefit at issue in this case.

Petitioners argue that, notwithstanding the facial neutrality of §290.09, subd. 22, in application the statute primarily benefits religious institutions. Petitioners rely [on] a statistical analysis of the type of persons claiming the tax deduction. They contend that most parents of public school children incur no tuition expenses and that other expenses deductible under §290.09, subd. 22, are negligible in value; moreover, they claim that 96% of the children in private schools in 1978–1979 attended religiously-affiliated institutions. Because of all this, they reason, the bulk of deductions taken under §290.09, subd. 22, will be claimed by parents of children in sectarian schools....

[We] would be loath to adopt a rule grounding the constitutionality of a facially neutral law on annual reports reciting the extent to which various classes of private citizens claimed benefits under the law. [The] fact that private persons fail in a particular year to claim the tax relief to which they are entitled—under a facially neutral statute—should be of little importance in determining the constitutionality of the statute permitting such relief.

Finally, [if] parents of children in private schools choose to take especial advantage of the relief provided by §290.09, subd. 22, it is no doubt due to the fact that they bear a particularly great financial burden in educating their children. More fundamentally, whatever unequal effect may be attributed to the statutory classification can fairly be regarded as a rough return for the benefits [provided] to the state and all taxpayers by parents sending their children to parochial schools. In the light of all this, we believe it wiser to decline to engage in the type of empirical inquiry into those persons benefited by state law which petitioners urge....

Turning to the third part of the Lemon inquiry, we have no difficulty in concluding that the Minnesota statute does not “excessively entangle” the state in religion. The only plausible source of the “comprehensive, discriminating, and continuing state surveillance” necessary to run afoul of this standard would lie in the fact that state officials must determine whether particular textbooks qualify for a deduction. In making this decision, state officials must disallow deductions taken [for] “instructional books and materials used in the teaching of religious tenets, doctrines or worship, the purpose of which is to inculcate such tenets, doctrines or worship.” Making decisions such as this does not differ substantially from making the types of decisions approved in earlier opinions of this Court. In

[Board of Education v. Allen], for example, the Court upheld the loan of secular textbooks to parents or children attending nonpublic schools; though state officials were required to determine whether particular books were or were not secular, the system was held not to violate the Establishment Clause. The same result follows in this case....

[Affirmed.]

JUSTICE MARSHALL, with whom JUSTICE BRENNAN, JUSTICE BLACKMUN, and JUSTICE STEVENS join, dissenting.

I...

A

[Direct] government subsidization of parochial school tuition is impermissible because “the effect of the aid is unmistakably to provide desired financial support for nonpublic, sectarian institutions.” “[A]id to the educational function of [parochial] schools...necessarily results in aid to the sectarian enterprise as a whole” because “[t]he very purpose of those schools is to provide an integrated secular and religious education.” [Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349 (1973).]...

Indirect assistance in the form of financial aid to parents for tuition payments is similarly impermissible. [By] ensuring that parents will be reimbursed for tuition payments they make, the Minnesota statute requires that taxpayers in general pay for the cost of parochial education and extends a financial “incentive to parents to send their children to sectarian schools.”...

B...

...[The] bulk of the tax benefits afforded by the Minnesota scheme are enjoyed by parents of parochial school children not because parents of public school children fail to claim deductions to which they are entitled, but because the latter are simply unable to claim the largest tax deduction that Minnesota authorizes. [Parents] who send their children to free public schools are simply ineligible to obtain the full benefit of the deduction except in the unlikely event that they buy $700 worth of pencils, notebooks, and bus rides for their school-age children. Yet parents who pay at least $700 in tuition to nonpublic, sectarian schools can claim the full deduction even if they incur no other educational expenses....

The majority also asserts that the Minnesota statute is distinguishable from the statute struck down in Nyquist in another respect: the tax benefit available under Minnesota law is a “genuine tax deduction,” whereas the New York law provided a benefit which, while nominally a deduction, also had features of a “tax credit.”...

This is a distinction without a difference. [The] deduction afforded by Minnesota law was “designed to yield a [tax benefit] in exchange for performing a specific act which the State desires to encourage.” [Nyquist.]...

ZELMAN v. SIMMONS-HARRIS, 536 U.S. 639 (2002). In an opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, the Court upheld a school voucher program with the following characteristics, as described in the syllabus to the Court’s opinion. The program “gives educational choices to families in any Ohio school district that is under state control pursuant to a federal-court order. The program provides tuition aid for certain students in the Cleveland City School District, the only covered district, to attend participating public or private schools of their parent’s choosing and tutorial aid for students who choose to remain enrolled in public school. Both religious and nonreligious schools in the district may participate, as may public schools in adjacent school districts. Tuition aid is distributed to parents according to financial need, and where the aid is spent depends solely upon where parents choose to enroll their children. The number of tutorial assistance grants provided to students remaining in public school must equal the number of tuition aid scholarships. In the 1999–2000 school year, 82% of the participating private schools had a religious affiliation, none of the adjacent public schools participated, and 96% of the students participating in the scholarship program were enrolled in religiously affiliated schools. [Cleveland] schoolchildren also have the option of enrolling in community schools, which are funded under state law but run by their own school boards and receive twice the per-student funding as participating private schools, or magnet schools, which are public schools emphasizing a particular subject area, teaching method, or service, and for which the school district receives the same amount per student as it does for a student enrolled at a traditional public school.”

Finding “no dispute that the program [was] enacted for the valid secular purpose of providing educational assistance to poor children in a demonstrably failing public school system,” the Court said that “[the] question presented is whether the Ohio program [has] the forbidden ‘effect’ of advancing or inhibiting religion.” The Court concluded that the program did not have such an effect.

"[W]here a government aid program is neutral with respect to religion, and provides assistance directly to a broad class of citizens who, in turn, direct government aid to religious schools wholly as a result of their own genuine and independent private choice, the program is not readily subject to challenge under the Establishment Clause. A program that shares these features permits government aid to reach religious institutions only by way of the deliberate choices of numerous individual recipients. The incidental advancement of a religious mission, or the perceived endorsement of a religious message, is reasonably attributable to the individual recipient, not to the government, whose role ends with the disbursement of benefits."

It continued, "[the] Ohio program is neutral in all respects toward religion. It is part of a general and multifaceted undertaking by the State of Ohio to provide educational opportunities to the children of a failed school district. It confers educational assistance directly to a broad class of individuals defined without reference to religion, i.e., any parent of a school-age child who resides in the Cleveland City School District. The program permits the participation of all schools within the district, religious or nonreligious. Adjacent public schools also may participate and have a financial incentive to do so. Program benefits are available to participating families on neutral terms, with no reference to religion. The only preference stated anywhere in the program is a preference for low-income families, who receive greater assistance and are given priority for admission at participating schools.

"There are no 'financial incentives' that 'skew' the program toward religious schools. Such incentives '[are] not present...where the aid is allocated on the basis of neutral, secular criteria that neither favor nor disfavor religion, and is made available to both religious and secular beneficiaries on a nondiscriminatory basis.' The program here in fact creates financial disincentives for religious schools, with private schools receiving only half the government assistance given to community schools and one-third the assistance given to magnet schools. Adjacent public schools, should any choose to accept program students, are also eligible to receive two to three times the state funding of a private religious school. Families too have a financial disincentive to choose a private religious school over other schools. Parents that choose to participate in the scholarship program and then to enroll their children in a private school (religious or nonreligious) must copay a portion of the school's tuition. Families that choose a community school, magnet school, or traditional public school pay nothing. Although such features of the program are not necessary to its constitutionality, they clearly dispel the claim that the program 'creates... financial incentives for parents to choose a sectarian school.'"

On whether the program gave “genuine opportunities for Cleveland parents to select secular educational options for their school-age children,” the Court argued that “Cleveland schoolchildren enjoy a range of educational choices: They may remain in public school as before, remain in public school with publicly funded tutoring aid, obtain a scholarship and choose a religious school, obtain a scholarship and choose a nonreligious private school, enroll in a community school, or enroll in a magnet school. That 46 of the 56 private schools now participating in the program are religious schools does not condemn it as a violation of the Establishment Clause. The Establishment Clause question is whether Ohio is coercing parents into sending their children to religious schools, and that question must be answered by evaluating all options Ohio provides Cleveland schoolchildren, only one of which is to obtain a program scholarship and then choose a religious school.”

Relying on Mueller, the Court rejected the argument that “we should attach constitutional significance to the fact that 96% of scholarship recipients have enrolled in religious schools. They claim that this alone proves parents lack genuine choice, even if no parent has ever said so. We need not consider this argument in detail, since it was flatly rejected in Mueller, where we found it irrelevant that 96% of parents taking deductions for tuition expenses paid tuition at religious schools.” Explaining why it rejected the argument, the Court pointed out that “[the] 96% figure [discounts] entirely (1) the more than 1,900 Cleveland children enrolled in alternative community schools, (2) the more than 13,000 children enrolled in alternative magnet schools, and (3) the more than 1,400 children enrolled in traditional public schools with tutorial assistance. Including some or all of these children in the denominator of children enrolled in nontraditional schools during the 1999–2000 school year drops the percentage enrolled in religious schools from 96% to under 20%. The 96% figure also represents but a snapshot of one particular school year. In the 1997–1998 school year, by contrast, only 78% of scholarship recipients attended religious schools.”

Justices O’Connor and Thomas wrote concurring opinions. Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer dissented. Justice Souter’s dissent asserted that “the espoused criteria of neutrality in offering aid, and private choice in directing it, [are] nothing but examples of verbal formalism.” To apply the neutrality test, he argued, “it makes sense to focus on a category of aid that may be directed to religious as well as secular schools, and ask whether the scheme favors a religious direction. Here, one would ask whether the voucher provisions [were] written in a way that skewed the scheme toward benefiting religious schools. [The] majority looks not to the provisions for tuition vouchers, but to every provision for educational [opportunity]. The majority then finds confirmation that ‘participation of all schools’ satisfies neutrality by noting that the better part of total state educational expenditure goes to public schools, thus showing there is no favor of religion. The illogic is patent. If regular, public schools (which can get no voucher payments) ‘participate’ in a voucher scheme with schools that can, and public expenditure is still predominantly on public schools, then the majority’s reasoning would find neutrality in a scheme of vouchers available for private tuition in districts with no secular private schools at all. ‘Neutrality’ as the majority employs the term is, literally, verbal and nothing more.” Justice Souter also criticized the Court for what he described as its abandonment of the previously enforced limitation on provision of “substantial” aid to religious institutions.

Note: Purpose and Effect in Aid to Nonpublic Education—Benevolent Neutrality?

1. A forerunner: Mitchell. Justice Thomas, writing for a plurality in Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000), proposed that statutes providing aid to “religious, irreligious, and areligious” institutions should generally be constitutional because “no one would conclude that any indoctrination that any particular recipient conducts has been done at the behest of the government. [If] the government is offering assistance to recipients who provide [a] broad range of indoctrination, the government itself is not thought responsible for any particular indoctrination.” Mitchell upheld a statute that provided funds for state education agencies to lend computers, including software, and library books, to nonpublic schools. The amount available to a school was determined by that school’s enrollment. Justice Thomas’s opinion rejected as “arbitrary” the distinction between direct and indirect aid to the religious missions of religious schools. It also found irrelevant the possibility that some forms of aid might be diverted to religious uses: “[A] concern for divertibility, as opposed to improper content, is misplaced [because] it is boundless [and] thus has only the most attenuated [link] to any realistic concern for preventing an ‘establishment of religion.’”

Justice O’Connor, joined by Justice Breyer, concurred in the judgment. She criticized the plurality’s “near-absolute position with respect to neutrality.” She also believed “significant” the “distinction between a per-capita school-aid program and a true private-choice program. [In] terms of public perception, a government program of direct aid to religious schools based on the number of students attending each school differs meaningfully from the government distributing aid directly to individual students who, in turn, decide to use the aid at the same religious schools. In the former example, if the religious school uses the aid to inculcate religion in its students, it is reasonable to say that the government has communicated a message of endorsement.” She found the program in Mitchell constitutional because it provided sufficient guarantees that the aid would not be diverted to religious uses and because the evidence of actual diversion was de minimis. Justices Souter, Stevens, and Ginsburg dissented.

2. Vouchers. What, if any, limits does the establishment clause place on voucher programs? What are the criteria for determining whether a program allows participants to exercise “genuine choice” among secular and religious options? Justice O’Connor’s concurring opinion in Zelman argued that choice should be determined by “consider[ing] all reasonable educational alternatives to religious schools that are available to parents,” and pointed out that “[when] one considers the option to attend community schools, the percentage of students enrolled in religious schools falls to 62.1 percent. If magnet schools are included, [this] percentage falls to 16.5 percent.”

Justice Souter’s dissent criticized this focus as “confused” because it “ignores the reason for having a private choice criterion in the first place. [It] is a criterion for deciding whether indirect aid to a religious school is legitimate because it passes through private hands that can spend or use the aid in a secular school. The question is whether the private hand is genuinely free to send the money in either a secular direction or a religious one. The majority now has transformed this question [into] a question about selecting from examples of state spending (on education) including direct spending on magnet and community public schools that goes through no private hands and could never reach a religious school under any circumstance. When the choice test is transformed from where to spend the money to where to go to school, it is cut loose from its very purpose.” He concluded, “If ‘choice’ is present whenever there is any educational alternative to the religious school to which vouchers can be endorsed, then there will always be a choice and the voucher can always be constitutional, even in a system in which there is not a single private secular school as an alternative to the religious school.” For an analysis of the fiscal and political limits on voucher programs, see Ryan and Heise, The Political Economy of School Choice, 111 Yale L.J. 2043 (2002).

3. Express discrimination? Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712 (2004), upheld against a free exercise challenge a Washington State program that awarded merit scholarships to college students, but excluded students pursuing degrees in devotional theology. Chief Justice Rehnquist noted that the religion clauses allowed some “play in the joints,” and that the Washington program involved that consideration. “[We] can think of few areas in which a State’s antiestablishment interests come more into play. [Given] the historic and substantial state interest at issue, we [cannot] conclude that the denial of funding for vocational religious instruction alone is inherently constitutionally suspect.” Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, dissented, arguing that “[when] the State makes a public benefit generally available, that benefit becomes part of the baseline against which burdens on religion are measured; and when the State withholds that benefit from some individuals solely on the basis of religion, it violates the Free Exercise Clause no less than if it had imposed a special tax.” Here, “[no] field of study but religion is singled out for disfavor. [The student] seeks only equal treatment....” The majority responded, “[Training] for religious professions and training for secular professions are not fungible. [The] subject of religion is one in which [the Constitution] embod[ies] distinct views [that] find no counterpart with respect to other callings or professions.”

Trinity Lutheran Church v. Comer, 137 S. Ct. 2012 (2017), dealt with a state program providing funding for replacing playground surfaces with materials made from recycled tires. The state excluded churches from eligibility for the grants. Trinity Lutheran ran a child- and day-care center, with a playground, located on church property. Chief Justice Roberts, writing for the Court, held that the exclusion violated the Free Exercise Clause but “put[ting] Trinity Lutheran to a choice: It may participate in an otherwise available benefit program or remain a religious institution. [The] express discrimination here is not the denial of a grant, but rather the refusal to allow the Church—solely because it is a church—to compete with secular organizations for a grant.” Such an exclusion “must withstand the strictest scrutiny.” The state’s reasons for the exclusion, “a policy preference for skating as far as possible from religious establishment concerns,” “cannot qualify as compelling.”

A footnote, joined only by four Justices, stated, “We do not address religious uses of funding or other forms of discrimination.” Would it be constitutionally permissible for a state to exclude from a program for reconstructing buildings damaged in a hurricane applications from churches to restore to their original condition windows depicting religious scenes? To exclude church buildings from a program to restore historic buildings? Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, above, held that it was constitutionally permissible to include religiously affiliated schools in programs providing vouchers to parents who send their children to non-public schools. Does Trinity Lutheran Church imply that religiously affiliated schools must be included in such programs?

4. Further questions about vouchers. The Court in Locke rejected in a footnote the argument that the exclusion was an unconstitutional viewpoint restriction, saying that the scholarship program “is not a forum for speech.” Its “purpose [is] to assist students [with] the cost of postsecondary education, not to ‘encourage a diversity of views from private speakers.’”

Many proposed voucher programs bar the use of vouchers at schools that discriminate in admissions or employment on the basis of race, gender, religion, or sexual orientation, or at schools that do not offer particular subjects. As applied to schools that discriminate because of religious belief (for example, the belief that women with children should not be employed outside the home) or refuse to teach some subject (for example, evolutionary theory) because of religious belief, are such provisions violations of the first amendment right of expressive association, or the free exercise clause? For discussions, see Tushnet, Vouchers after Zelman, 2002 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1; Berg, Vouchers and Religious Schools: The New Constitutional Questions, 72 U. Cin. L. Rev. 151 (2003).

5. The meaning of neutrality. Will a requirement of neutrality increase the cost of providing aid to nonpublic schools and thereby alter the political dimensions of the issue? Consider this justification for upholding direct appropriations to private schools: Public schools are subsidized through ordinary appropriations; neutrality is achieved by the separate appropriations to private schools. Finding the latter to violate neutrality artificially divides a unitary system of state-supported education that, taken as a whole, is neutral. Consider the proposal in Choper, The Establishment Clause and Aid to Parochial Schools, 56 Cal. L. Rev. 260, 266 (1968), that aid should be allowed “so long as such aid does not exceed the value of the secular educational service rendered by the school.” How likely is it that a legislature, constrained by pluralist politics and tax limitations, would enact a program that violated this test? Does it simply restate the requirement of neutrality?

Berg, Religion Clause Anti-Theories, 72 Notre Dame L. Rev. 693, 703–704 (1997), argues that “[government] should, as much as possible, minimize the effect it has on the voluntary, independent religious decisions of the people as individuals and in voluntary groups. The baseline against which effects on religion should be compared is a situation in which religious beliefs and practices succeed or fail solely on their merits—as those merits are presented and judged by individuals and groups, not by government.” Consider the assumptions implicit in the term “the merits” in this formulation.

For a discussion of the problem of identifying an appropriate baseline, see Gedicks, The Rhetoric of Church and State: A Critical Analysis of Religion Clause Jurisprudence 57–58, 60 (1995): “How does one identify the baseline measure of religious neutrality? [In] the modern welfare state, [government] aid to both individuals and organizations is widespread and pervasive. Since in the United States most persons and entities are entitled to some kind of government aid, religious neutrality would generally seem to require that this aid not be denied to otherwise qualified recipients simply because they are religious. Indeed, to deny aid to such persons and entities constitutes a tax on religious exercise which skews private choice away from religion. [If] one were to imagine a world of minimalist government in which secular public schools did not exist, then government action mandating religious instruction [would] violate neutrality.” Berg discusses some implications of Gedicks’s position: “[If] a system of subsidized secular public schools does, in fact, discourage religiously informed education, why can’t government include religious teaching in the public school curriculum? [Any] statement the government makes is bound to favor one faith over another.” Berg, supra, at 743.

Consider the implications of the argument that voucher and similar programs have a disparate impact on different religious denominations because of their positions on the propriety of accepting government aid even in the form of vouchers. Should the fact that the disparate impact results from religiously motivated choices be sufficient to dispel concerns about sect preference? Consider these observations:

All institutions [have] an intense interest in their own survival. Programs distributing aid under the neutrality principle offer financial inducements for religious groups to participate in certain programs that “government” desires for the nation and that may [conflict] with certain tenets of the nation’s faith communities. These programs easily can [tempt] religious groups to go against their basic principles in order to secure government funding and receive the same benefits [as] other faith traditions. [It] will be those programs that center on social issues more “in the gray” respecting a faith community’s belief system that will begin the [assimilation] of our nation’s religious traditions. [If a group] buckles to [the] government-supplied financial incentive and chooses to participate, after many years [will] the members of the community even remember the original position of their [tradition?] [One] might easily predict the homogenization of America’s diverse faith traditions into a form of civil religion that encourages a malleability of doctrine shaped by the designs of government programs.

Davis, A Commentary on the Supreme Court’s “Equal Treatment” Doctrine as the New Constitutional Paradigm for Protecting Religious Liberty, 46 J. Church & St. 717, 733–734 (2004).

6. Indirect versus direct aid. Do the cases support a distinction between direct aid—payments or donations of goods and services made to religiously affiliated schools—and indirect aid—payments made to parents who then use the funds to pay such schools? Would it be constitutional for a state to pay a portion of the salary of mathematics teachers in nonpublic schools as part of a “general program” of paying the salaries of all mathematics teachers? In Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995), Justice Souter argued that the Court’s approach “would permit a State to pay all the bills of any religious institution.” Justice Kennedy’s opinion for the Court responded that the student publication involved was “not a religious institution, at least in the usual sense of that term.” After Rosenberger, must a state include religiously affiliated schools in any voucher program it adopts? What is the basis for the proposition that direct aid to religious institutions is impermissible?

7. Monetary versus nonmonetary aid. Justice Thomas’s opinion in Mitchell noted that prior cases had found “‘special Establishment Clause dangers’ when money is given to religious schools or entities directly rather than [indirectly]. But [we] refuse to allow a ‘special’ case to create a rule for all cases.” Justice O’Connor wrote, “If [a] per-capita-aid program is identical in relevant constitutional respects to a true private-choice program, then there is no reason that [the] government should be precluded from providing direct money payments to religious organizations [based] on the number of persons belonging to each organization.” If the distinction between direct and indirect aid is “arbitrary” when nonmonetary resources are involved, is it less arbitrary when money is involved?

8. Administrative and political entanglement. Administrative entanglement occurs when public officials are required to scrutinize the use of public funds to ensure that they are not used for sectarian purposes. Lemon also discussed political entanglement. Public funds completely devoted to secular purposes result in an equal amount of nonpublic funds becoming available for sectarian purposes. Are direct and unrestricted grants to nonpublic schools therefore constitutional? Lemon argued that such grants had a “divisive political potential,” as partisans would force candidates “to declare” on issues that will lead people to “find their votes aligned with their faith.” Although political division is “normal and healthy,” division “along religious lines was one of the principal evils against which the First Amendment was intended to protect. [To] have States [divide] on [these] [would] tend to confuse and obscure other issues of great urgency.” Political fragmentation is “likely to be intensified” where “successive and very likely permanent annual appropriations that benefit relatively few religious groups” are involved.

Is the idea of political entanglement misconceived? Mueller stated that the language in Lemon about political entanglement must be “confined to cases where direct financial subsidies are paid.” Is the distinction between direct subsidies and indirect tax benefits consistent with the realities of the legislative process? Note that legislatures must determine annual levels of direct subsidies. Would the use of some formula—for example, a stated proportion of the appropriations for public schools—avoid the political entanglement problems raised in Lemon?

Is there any reason to regard interest groups organized around religion as different, and more suspect, actors in the political process than interest groups organized around economic interests?

9. Aid to “pervasively sectarian” institutions. In Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589 (1988), the Court considered the constitutionality of the Adolescent Family Life Act, which authorizes federal grants to public and private organizations, including organizations with institutional ties to religious denominations, for counseling services and research in the area of premarital adolescent sexual relations and pregnancy. Applying the Lemon standard, the Court held that the act on its face did not violate the establishment clause. “[It] is clear from the face of the statute that the [act] was motivated primarily, if not entirely, by a legitimate secular purpose—the elimination or reduction of social and economic problems caused by teenage sexuality, pregnancy, and parenthood.” Further, the “services to be provided under the [act] are not religious in character.” Moreover, although the act “takes a particular approach toward dealing with adolescent sexuality and pregnancy—for example, two of its stated purposes are to ‘promote self-discipline’ [and] to ‘promote adoption as an alternative’ [to abortion]—[that] approach is not inherently religious....” Although conceding that “the Establishment Clause ‘[prohibits] government-financed [indoctrination] into the beliefs of a particular religious faith,’” the Court reasoned that, when the aid flows to religiously affiliated institutions that are not pervasively sectarian, “we [will not] presume that it [will] be used in a way that would have the primary effect of advancing religion.” The Court remanded for a determination whether the act was unconstitutional “as applied,” which would turn on such determinations as whether any of the grantees under the act were “pervasively sectarian” and whether any of the “aid has been used to fund ‘specifically religious activit[ies] in an otherwise substantially secular setting.’”

Justice Thomas’s plurality opinion in Mitchell concluded that the doctrine barring pervasively sectarian institutions from receiving aid that was otherwise permissible should be rejected. “The pervasively sectarian recipient has not received any special favor, and it is most bizarre that the Court would [reserve] special hostility for those who take their religion seriously, who think that their religion should affect the whole of their lives, or who make the mistake of being effective in transmitting their views to children.” In addition, “the inquiry into the recipient’s religious views [is offensive].” Finally, “hostility to aid to pervasively sectarian schools has a shameful pedigree that we do not hesitate to disavow.” That pedigree involved hostility to Catholic parochial schools. Justice O’Connor’s opinion concurring in the judgment did not address the doctrine; the dissent treated the question of the degree of an institution’s sectarianism as relevant to constitutional analysis.

10. Neutrality, steering, and “real choice.” What considerations are relevant in determining whether a neutral program offers participants a real choice or steers them toward religious institutions? Lupu and Tuttle, Sites of Redemption: A Wide-Angle Look at Government Vouchers and Sectarian Service Providers, 18 J.L. & Pol. 537, 561, 565 (2002), suggest the following considerations: the extent to which participants are constrained in choosing the religious provider rather than not participating at all; the extent to which there are nonreligious institutions providing the services and able to accept the vouchers; the ease with which new providers can start up, making the market more or less dynamic in response to demand; and the degree to which the government’s purpose is connected to a character change itself tied to religious transformation. How might these factors bear on voucher programs for the provision of child care services? For the provision of drug treatment programs offered as alternatives to incarceration?

11. Facially neutral statutes that incidentally burden religion. To what extent may government officials take religion into account in seeking to deter crime? May police officials direct special attention to religious institutions whose doctrine—as interpreted by the officials—suggests that church members are more likely to commit crime than members of other religious institutions? Huq, The Signaling Function of Religious Speech in Domestic Counterterrorism, 89 Tex. L. Rev. 833 (2011), argues that such actions pose threats to the “epistemic authority” of religious institutions in defining their doctrine (by deterring the development of definitions that public officials might misinterpret as signaling a greater propensity to commit crime), but that current doctrine does not afford robust protection to epistemic authority. Should it?

Note: Concluding Observations

Consider these observations from K. Karst, Law’s Promise, Law’s Expression 149 (1994): “Today the risk of religious polarization does seem to have lessened in the resource-allocation context, where the issues can be seen as part of the everyday grist of the political mill. [Issues] concerning governmental deployments of the symbols of religion [have] a greater capacity to polarize [because] they are not the subject of multilateral negotiation and they do not invite compromise [and because] any such symbol has a diffuse meaning, and so serves as a handy referent for a whole world view.” To similar effect, consider Lupu, Government Messages and Government Money: Santa Fe, Mitchell v. Helms, and the Arc of the Establishment Clause, 42 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 771, 801 (2001):

[Issues] involving government resources in support of religion quite frequently [are] truly about “church.” [When] the state provides resources to such entities, it typically does so on the theory that churches may effectively assist in the state’s secular work. [Government] message cases [are] very different in their character: [They] involve officials of the state doing the work of faith institutions—that is, preaching, proselytizing, [and] generally spreading the Word or respect for the Word. [Government] message cases are not about institutional connection between agencies of government and agencies. [They are] about the political misappropriation of religious themes.

Do these observations reconcile Mueller with Lynch and Lee? Do they justify the Court’s decisions?

C. THE FREE EXERCISE CLAUSE: REQUIRED ACCOMMODATIONS

Religious beliefs and expression are forms of speech and, as such, are protected by the free speech clause of the first amendment. Some early free speech decisions involving religious expression relied on the free exercise clause as well. See, e.g., Cantwell v. Connecticut, Chapter 7, section B2, supra; Lovell v. Griffin, Chapter 7, section C2, supra. What, if anything, does the free exercise clause add to the free speech clause?

Note: From Reynolds to Smith

The Court’s discussions of required accommodations of religion have tended to ignore examination of the intentions of the drafters of the first amendment, except by referring in general terms to their interest in religious liberty. McConnell, The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion, 103 Harv. L. Rev. 1409, 1512 (1990), concludes on the basis of an examination of pre-1787 practice, the debates over the Constitution and the bill of rights, and contemporaneous political theory that “exemptions were not common enough to compel the inference that the term ‘free exercise of religion’ necessarily included an enforceable right to exemption. [Without] overstating the force of the evidence, however, it is possible to say that the [doctrine] of free exercise exemptions is more consistent with the original understanding than is a position that leads only to the facial neutrality of legislation.” How do legislative practices of exemption support a constitutional requirement of exemption? For a study of the same materials coming equally cautiously to the opposite conclusion, see Hamburger, A Constitutional Right of Religious Exemption: An Historical Perspective, 60 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 915 (1992).

Until 1963, the Supreme Court had not squarely held that the free exercise clause protects religious beliefs differently, or more extensively, than the free speech clause protects political beliefs. Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1879), upheld a conviction of a Mormon for bigamy, rejecting a free exercise defense. The Court said that under the first amendment “Congress was deprived of all legislative power over mere opinion, but was left free to reach actions which were in violation of social duties or subversive of good order. [Laws] are made for the government of actions, and while they cannot interfere with mere religious belief and actions, they may with practices.” In Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940), the Court said that the free exercise clause “embraces two concepts,—freedom to believe and freedom to act. The first is absolute, but in the nature of things, the second cannot be. Conduct remains subject to regulation for the protection of society. [Reynolds.] [In] every case the power to regulate must be so exercised as not [unduly] to infringe the protected freedom.”

BRAUNFELD v. BROWN, 366 U.S. 599 (1961). Pennsylvania’s law requiring that businesses be closed on Sundays was challenged on free exercise grounds by Orthodox Jews, whose religion required that they close their stores on Saturdays. They alleged that the Sunday closing laws placed them at a competitive disadvantage so severe as to force them out of business. Chief Justice Warren’s plurality opinion rejected the free exercise claim. Citing Reynolds, it said, “[The] statute [does] not make criminal the holding of any religious belief or opinion, nor does it force anyone to embrace any religious belief. [It simply] make[s] the practice of their religious beliefs more expensive. [To] strike down [legislation] which imposes only an indirect burden on the exercise of religion [would] radically restrict the operating latitude of the legislature. [We] are a cosmopolitan nation made up of people of almost every conceivable religious preference. [Consequently,] it cannot be expected, much less required, that legislators enact no law regulating conduct that may in some way result in an economic disadvantage to some religious sects and not to others because of the special practices of the various religions. [If] the State regulates conduct by enacting a general law within its power, the purpose and effect of which is to advance the State's secular goals, the statute is valid despite its indirect burden on religious observance unless the State may accomplish its purposes by means which do not impose such a burden." An exemption for Saturday-observers was not required because it "might well undermine the State's goal of providing a day that, as best possible, eliminates the atmosphere of commercial noise and activity. [Enforcement] problems would be more difficult [and Saturday-observers] might well [receive] an economic advantage over their competitors who must close on that day."

Justice Brennan, in dissent, described the state's interest as "the mere convenience of having everyone rest on the same day" and called the plurality's concern about a system allowing exemptions "fanciful." This "[exalts] administrative convenience to a constitutional level high enough to justify making one religion economically disadvantageous." Justice Stewart's dissent said that the law "compels an Orthodox Jew to choose between his religious faith and his economic survival. That is a cruel choice. It is a choice which I think no State can constitutionally demand. For me this is not something that can be swept under the rug and forgotten in the interest of enforced Sunday togetherness."

SHERBERT v. VERNER, 374 U.S. 398 (1963). Mrs. Sherbert, a Seventh-Day Adventist, was fired by her employer because she would not work on Saturday, her church's Sabbath. She was unable to find other employment in her town that would allow her to observe her Sabbath. She sought unemployment compensation, which was denied because she had lacked good cause to refuse suitable work. (The unemployment systems in most states, but not Sherbert's, treated inability to find work that would allow observance of the worker's Sabbath to be "good cause" for refusing to accept job offers.)

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Brennan, held that the denial of unemployment compensation violated the free exercise clause. The denial "imposes [a] burden on the free exercise" of religion. "Here not only is it apparent that appellant's declared ineligibility for benefits derives solely from the practice of her religion, but the pressure upon her to forego that practice is unmistakable. The ruling forces her to choose between following the precepts of her religion and forfeiting benefits, on the one hand, and abandoning one of the precepts of her religion in order to accept work, on the other hand. Governmental imposition of such a choice puts the same kind of burden upon the free exercise of religion as would a fine imposed against appellant for her Saturday worship."

The Court then considered "whether some compelling state interest [justifies] the substantial infringement of appellant's First Amendment right." The only interest asserted was prevention of the filing of fraudulent claims, but, according to the Court, the Constitution required that the state demonstrate that "no alternative forms of regulations would combat such abuses without infringing First Amendment rights." Unlike Braunfeld, where allowing exemptions would necessarily impair the interest in preserving a uniform day of rest, here exemptions could be administered without undermining the unemployment compensation system.

Justice Stewart concurred in the result. "The guarantee of religious liberty embodied in the Free Exercise Clause affirmatively requires government to create an atmosphere of hospitality and accommodation to individual belief or disbelief. [Our] Constitution commands the positive protection by government of religious freedom [for] each of us."

Justice Harlan, joined by Justice White, dissented. The Court's holding, he said, meant that "the State [must] single out for financial assistance those whose behavior is religiously motivated, even though it denies such assistance to others whose identical behavior [is] not religiously motivated." Justice Harlan believed that the state could choose "to create an exception to its eligibility requirements for persons like the appellant," but he could not "subscribe to the conclusion that the State is constitutionally compelled to carve out an exception to its general rule of eligibility in the present case. Those situations in which the Constitution may require special treatment on account of religion are, in my view, few and far between. [Such] compulsion in the present case is particularly inappropriate in light of the indirect, remote, and insubstantial effect of the decision below on the exercise of appellant's religion and in light of the direct financial assistance to religion that today's decision requires."

WISCONSIN v. YODER, 406 U.S. 205 (1972). Yoder, a member of the Old Order Amish, was fined five dollars for refusing to send his children to school after they had completed the eighth grade. His children were ages fourteen and fifteen; Wisconsin required school attendance until age sixteen. The Amish object to high school education because of their desire to live in a "church community separate and apart from the world." They believe that high schools expose children to worldly matters and emphasize “intellectual and scientific accomplishments, self-distinction, competitiveness, worldly success, and social life with other students,” in contrast to the Amish desire for “informal learning-through-doing [and] wisdom, rather than technical knowledge; community welfare, rather than competition.” Basic education is acceptable to them because it prepares children “to read the Bible [and] to be good farmers and citizens.” The state supreme court held that the conviction violated the free exercise clause, and the Supreme Court affirmed.

Chief Justice Burger’s opinion for the Court acknowledged the state’s “interest in universal education,” but required that it be balanced “when it impinges on fundamental rights and interests” to assure that “there is a state interest of sufficient magnitude to override the [free exercise] interest.” “[Only] those interests of the highest order and those not otherwise served can overbalance legitimate claims of free exercise of religion.” The Court first asked whether the Amish claim was “rooted in religious belief. [If] the Amish asserted their claims because of their subjective evaluation and rejection of the contemporary secular values accepted by the majority, much as Thoreau rejected the social values of his time and isolated himself at Walden Pond, their claims would not rest on a religious basis. Thoreau’s choice was philosophical and personal rather than religious, and such belief does not rise to the demands of the Religion Clauses.” But the Amish way of life was “one of deep religious conviction, shared by an organized group and intimately related to daily living.” Compulsory high school education required the Amish “to perform acts undeniably at odds with fundamental tenets of their religious beliefs” and “[carried] with it a very real threat of undermining the Amish community.”

The Court rejected the state’s effort to rely on the distinction between belief and action; “in this context belief and action cannot be neatly confined in logic-tight compartments.” Nor was it dispositive that the requirement was facially neutral, for even such a regulation “may offend the constitutional requirement for governmental neutrality if it unduly burdens the free exercise of religion [Sherbert.]” The Court accepted the state’s argument that “some degree of education is necessary to prepare citizens to participate effectively and intelligently in our open political system [and] to be self-reliant and self-sufficient participants in society.” But the additional one or two years of formal high school education “would do little to serve those interests.” The state also argued that the Amish fostered ignorance, but the Court said that the record showed “that the Amish community has been a highly successful social unit within our society, even if apart from the conventional ‘mainstream.’ Its members are productive and very law-abiding members of society; they reject public welfare in its usual modern forms.” The Court also rejected as “highly speculative” the state’s claim that its requirement served the interest in providing those Amish children who eventually leave the community with an adequate basis for “making their way in the world.” It said that “there is nothing in this record to suggest that the Amish qualities of reliability, self-reliance, and dedication to work would fail to find ready markets in today’s society.” The Court emphasized that it was “not dealing with a way of life and mode of education by a group claiming to have recently discovered some ‘progressive’ or more enlightened process for rearing children for modern life.” In light of the Amish’s “long history as a successful and self-sufficient segment of American society,” and their showing of “the adequacy of their alternative mode of continuing informal vocational education in terms of precisely those overall interests that the State advances,” a showing “that probably few other religious groups or sects could make, and weighing the minimal difference between what the State would require and what the Amish already accept, it was incumbent on the State to show with more particularity how its admittedly strong interest in compulsory education would be adversely affected by granting an exemption to the Amish.”

Justice Douglas’s dissent focused on the potential conflict of interest between Amish parents and their children, some of whom might wish to attend high school in order to be in a position to choose whether to adhere to or “to break from the Amish tradition.” The Court replied that, in the absence of evidence of actual conflicts, allowing the state to compel high school attendance because of “the potential” that some parents might “act contrary to the best interests of their children by foreclosing their opportunity to make an intelligent choice between the Amish way of life and that of the outside world” would create “such an intrusion by a State into family decisions in the area of religious training” as itself to raise “grave questions of religious freedom.”

Note: Problems of Mandatory Accommodation

1. Unemployment cases. The Court followed Sherbert in three later unemployment compensation cases, which presented minor variations on the basic claim. In Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Commission, 480 U.S. 136 (1987), the claimant’s beliefs had changed during the course of her employment, but the Court held that “the timing of [the] conversion is immaterial.” Frazee v. Illinois Department of Employment Security, 489 U.S. 829 (1989), applied Sherbert to a person who was not a member of an established religious sect or church, one of whose tenets was a prohibition on Sunday work, but who sincerely believed that “as a Christian, he could not work on ‘the Lord’s Day.’” See also Thomas v. Review Board, 450 U.S. 707 (1981).

2. Taxation. United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252 (1982), rejected a claim for a constitutionally required exemption from paying the Social Security tax. Lee, a member of the Old Order Amish, was a self-employed farmer and carpenter, who did not pay the Social Security tax for his Amish employees because “the Amish believe it sinful not to provide for their own elderly and therefore are religiously opposed to the national social security system.” The Court found that the limitation on religious liberty was “essential to accomplish an overriding governmental interest.” Mandatory participation in the Social Security system was “indispensable to [its] fiscal vitality.” Chief Justice Burger’s opinion for the Court said, “Unlike [Yoder], it would be difficult to accommodate the comprehensive social security system with myriad exceptions flowing from a wide variety of religious beliefs. [There] is no principled way [to] distinguish between general taxes and those imposed under the Social Security Act. If, for example, a religious adherent believes war is a sin, and if a certain percentage of the federal budget can be identified as devoted to war-related activities, such individuals would have a similarly valid claim to be exempt from paying that percentage of the income tax. The tax system could not function if denominations were allowed to challenge the tax system because tax payments were spent in a manner that violates their religious belief.”

Justice Stevens concurred in the judgment but criticized the Court for overstating the risk that “a myriad of other claims” would occur. He noted that “in the typical case [of general taxes], the taxpayer is not in any position to supply the government with an equivalent substitute for the objectionable use of his money.” Justice Stevens noted that, “if tax exemptions were dispensed on religious grounds, every citizen would have an economic motivation to join the favored sects [while no] comparable economic motivation could explain the conduct of the [employee] in Sherbert,” where employer-dictated changes in work arrangements forced Sherbert out of a job.

3. Restricted environments.

a. The military. Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503 (1986), rejected a free exercise challenge to an Air Force regulation prohibiting the wearing of headgear while indoors as applied to an orthodox Jewish officer who was disciplined for wearing a yarmulke. Writing for the Court, Justice Rehnquist emphasized the deference owed to military judgments concerning the need to “foster instinctive obedience, unity, commitment, and esprit de corps. [The] desirability of dress regulations in the military is decided by the appropriate military officials, and they are under no constitutional mandate to abandon their considered professional judgment.”

Justice Stevens, joined by Justices White and Powell, wrote a concurring opinion. Although acknowledging that petitioner presented “an especially attractive case for an exception” from the regulations, Justice Stevens worried about the application of such an exemption to members of other religious groups, wishing to wear turbans, saffron robes, and dreadlocks:

The very strength of [petitioner’s] claim creates the danger that a similar claim on behalf of a Sikh or a Rastafarian might readily be dismissed as “so extreme, so unusual, or so faddish an image that public confidence in his ability to perform his duties will be destroyed” [quoting from Justice Brennan’s dissenting opinion]. If exceptions from dress code regulations are to be granted on the basis of a multifactored test[, inevitably] the decisionmaker’s evaluation of the character and the sincerity of the requestor’s faith—as well as the probable reaction of the majority to the favored treatment of a member of that faith—will play a critical part in the decision. [The] Air Force has no business drawing distinctions between such persons when it is enforcing commands of universal application.

In a dissenting opinion joined by Justice Marshall, Justice Brennan found “totally implausible” the claim that the group identity of the Air Force would be threatened by the wearing of yarmulkes. “To the contrary, a yarmulke worn with a United States military uniform is an eloquent reminder that the shared and proud identity of United States servicemen embraces and unites religious and ethnic pluralism.” Although turbans, saffron robes, and dreadlocks were not before the Court, Justice Brennan noted that “a reviewing court could legitimately give deference to dress and grooming rules that have a reasoned basis in, for example, functional utility, health and safety considerations, and the goal of a polished, professional appearance. It is the lack of any reasoned basis for prohibiting yarmulkes that is so striking here.”

In a separate dissenting opinion, Justice Blackmun acknowledged that the Air Force could consider not only the costs of allowing petitioner to wear a yarmulke but also the cumulative costs of accommodating other requests for religious exemptions. He also acknowledged that “to allow noncombat personnel to wear yarmulkes but not turbans or dreadlocks because the latter seem more obtrusive [would] be to discriminate in favor of this country’s more established, mainstream religions.” Nevertheless, he rejected the Air Force’s argument because it “simply has not shown any reason to fear that a significant number of enlisted personnel and officers would request religious exemptions that could not be denied on neutral grounds such as safety, let alone that granting these requests would noticeably impair the overall image of the service.”

b. Prisons. O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342 (1987), concerned a challenge by Muslim prisoners to a prison policy that prevented them from attending Jumu'ah, a weekly Muslim congregational service mandated by the Koran. Prison regulations, adopted for security reasons, prevented prisoners with respondents' classification from being inside the building where the service was held. The Court held that in a prison context alleged infringements on free exercise interests “are judged under a ‘reasonableness’ test less restrictive than that ordinarily applied to [infringements] of fundamental constitutional rights.” Applying this reasonableness test to the facts before it, the Court concluded that the restriction was justified by security concerns.

4. The concept of burdens: internal government operations. Is there a constitutionally cognizable burden in the following cases?

Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693 (1986), rejected religion-based objections to a federal statute requiring applicants for certain welfare benefits to provide the states with their Social Security numbers and requiring the states to use the numbers in administering the program. Appellees had applied for such benefits, including food stamps. They contended that providing a Social Security number for their two-year-old daughter and use of that number by the government would violate their religious beliefs.

Writing for eight justices, Chief Justice Burger rejected appellees' claim that the free exercise clause was infringed when the government used the number. “Never to our knowledge has the Court interpreted the First Amendment to require the Government itself to behave in ways that the individual believes will further his or her spiritual development. [The] Free Exercise Clause affords an individual protection from certain forms of governmental compulsion; it does not afford an individual a right to dictate the conduct of the Government’s internal procedures.” The Court did not definitively rule on the claim that appellees could not be required to apply for Social Security numbers, although a majority of the justices indicated that, were the Court to reach the issue, they would hold that free exercise required that appellees could not be so required.

Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, 485 U.S. 439 (1988), rejected a free exercise challenge to the Forest Service's plan to permit timber harvesting and road construction in part of a national forest that was traditionally used by various Indian tribes as sacred areas for religious rituals. The Court held, in an opinion by Justice O'Connor, that the government did not have to show a compelling need to engage in the relevant projects:

In both [Roy and Lyng] the challenged governmental action would interfere significantly with private persons' ability to pursue spiritual fulfillment according to their own religious beliefs. In neither case, however, could the affected individuals be coerced by the Government's action into violating their religious beliefs; nor would either governmental action penalize religious activity by denying any person an equal share of the rights, benefits, and privileges enjoyed by other citizens.

The Court acknowledged that indirect coercion or penalties on the free exercise of religion; not just outright prohibitions, are subject to scrutiny under the First Amendment. [But] this [cannot] imply that incidental effects of government programs, which may make it more difficult to practice certain religions but which have no tendency to coerce individuals into acting contrary to their religious beliefs, require government to bring forward a compelling justification for its otherwise lawful actions. The crucial word in the constitutional text is "prohibit."

The Court noted that the projects at issue "could have devastating effects on traditional Indian religious practices...intimately and inextricably bound up with the unique features" of the area, but it concluded that "government simply could not operate if it were required to satisfy every citizen's religious needs and desires."

In a dissenting opinion joined by Justices Marshall and Blackmun, Justice Brennan criticized the Court's conception of "coercion":

Ultimately, the Court's coercion test turns on a distinction between governmental actions that compel affirmative conduct inconsistent with religious belief, and those governmental actions that prevent conduct consistent with religious belief. [The] crucial word in the constitutional text, as the Court itself acknowledges, is "prohibit," a comprehensive term that in no way suggests that the intended protection is aimed only at governmental actions that coerce affirmative conduct. [Religious] freedom is threatened no less by governmental action that makes the practice of one's chosen faith impossible than by governmental programs that pressure one to engage in conduct inconsistent with religious belief.

In what sense is the land in Lyng more "the government's" than was the money in Sherbert? Note that in Lyng there was even greater coercion than in Sherbert—an across-the-board foreclosure rather than a financial inducement to abandon religious practice.

Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith
494 U.S. 872 (1990)

JUSTICE SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case requires us to decide whether the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment permits the State of Oregon to include religiously inspired peyote use within the reach of its general criminal prohibition on use of that drug, and thus permits the State to deny unemployment benefits to persons dismissed from their jobs because of such religiously inspired use....

[Smith was a member of the Native American Church, which has as part of its religious ritual the supervised consumption of peyote. Peyote is a “controlled substance” under Oregon law, possession of which is a criminal offense. Smith was fired from his job at a private drug rehabilitation clinic because he ingested peyote as part of his church’s ritual. He sought unemployment benefits, which were denied because he had been discharged for work-related misconduct. On his appeal from the denial of benefits, the Oregon Supreme Court held that state law did not contain an exemption from its criminal statute for religious consumption of peyote, that the criminal ban was unconstitutional as applied to the consumption of peyote in this setting, and that Smith was therefore entitled to unemployment compensation.]

II

Respondents’ claim for relief rests on our decisions [which held] that a State could not condition the availability of unemployment insurance on an individual’s willingness to forgo conduct required by his religion. [However,] the conduct at issue in those cases was not prohibited by law....

A

[The] free exercise of religion means, first and foremost, the right to believe and profess whatever religious doctrine one desires....

[The] “exercise of religion” often involves not only belief and profession but the performance of (or abstention from) physical acts: assembling with others for a worship service, participating in sacramental use of bread and wine, proselytizing, abstaining from certain foods or certain modes of transportation.

[A] state would be “prohibiting the free exercise [of religion]” if it sought to ban such acts or abstentions only when they are engaged in for religious reasons, or only because of the religious belief that they display. It would doubtless be unconstitutional [to] prohibit bowing down before a golden calf.

Respondents in the present case, however, seek to carry the meaning of “prohibiting the free exercise [of religion]” one large step further. They contend that their religious motivation for using peyote places them beyond the reach of a criminal law that is not specifically directed at their religious practice, and that is concededly constitutional as applied to those who use the drug for other reasons. They assert, in other words, that “prohibiting the free exercise [of religion]” includes requiring any individual to observe a generally applicable law that requires (or forbids) the performance of an act that his religious belief forbids (or requires). As a textual matter, we do not think the words must be given that meaning. It is no more necessary to regard the collection of a general tax, for example, as “prohibiting the free exercise [of religion]” by those citizens who believe support of organized government to be sinful, than it is to regard the same tax as “abridging the freedom...of the press” of those publishing companies that must pay the tax as a condition of staying in business. It is a permissible reading of the text [to] say that if prohibiting the exercise of religion [is] not the object of the tax but merely the incidental effect of a generally applicable and otherwise valid provision, the First Amendment has not been offended.

[That] reading is the correct one. We have never held that an individual’s religious beliefs excuse him from compliance with an otherwise valid law prohibiting conduct that the State is free to regulate. On the contrary, the record of more than a century of our free exercise jurisprudence contradicts that proposition. [We] first had occasion to assert that principle in [Reynolds]....

Subsequent decisions have consistently held that the right of free exercise does not relieve an individual of the obligation to comply with a “valid and neutral law of general applicability on the ground that the law proscribes (or prescribes) conduct that his religion prescribes (or proscribes).” United States v. Lee (Stevens, J., concurring in judgment)....

The only decisions in which we have held that the First Amendment bars application of a neutral, generally applicable law to religiously motivated action have involved not the Free Exercise Clause alone, but the Free Exercise Clause in conjunction with other constitutional protections, such as freedom of speech and of the press, see [Cantwell], or the right of parents, acknowledged in Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), to direct the education of their children, see Wisconsin v. Yoder....¹

The present case does not present such a hybrid situation, but a free exercise claim unconnected with any communicative activity or parental right. Respondents urge us to hold [that] when otherwise prohibitable conduct is accompanied by religious convictions, not only the convictions but the conduct itself must be free from governmental regulation. We have never held that, and decline to do so now. “[Our] cases do not at their farthest reach support the proposition that a stance of conscientious opposition relieves an objector from any colliding duty fixed by a democratic government.” Gillette v. United States.

Respondents argue that even though exemption from generally applicable criminal laws need not automatically be extended to religiously motivated actors, at least the claim for a religious exemption must be evaluated under the balancing test set forth in Sherbert v. Verner. [We] have never invalidated any governmental action on the basis of the Sherbert test except the denial of unemployment compensation. Although we have sometimes purported to apply the Sherbert test in contexts other than that, we have always found the test satisfied. In recent years we have abstained from applying the Sherbert test (outside the unemployment compensation field) at all [citing Roy, Lyng, Goldman, and O'Lone].

Even if we were inclined to breathe into Sherbert some life beyond the unemployment compensation field, we would not apply it to require exemptions from a generally applicable criminal law. The Sherbert test [was] developed in a context that lent itself to individualized governmental assessment of the reasons for the relevant conduct. [Our] decisions in the unemployment cases stand for the proposition that where the State has in place a system of individual exemptions, it may not refuse to extend that system to cases of “religious hardship” without compelling reason.

Whether or not the decisions are that limited, they at least have nothing to do with an across-the-board criminal prohibition on a particular form of conduct. [The] government’s ability to enforce generally applicable prohibitions of socially harmful conduct, like its ability to carry out other aspects of public policy, “cannot depend on measuring the effects of a governmental action on a religious objector’s spiritual development.” [Lyng.] To make an individual’s obligation to obey such a law contingent upon the law’s coincidence with his religious beliefs, except where the State’s interest is “compelling”—permitting him, by virtue of his beliefs, “to become a law unto himself” [Reynolds]—contradicts both constitutional tradition and common sense.²

The “compelling interest” requirement seems benign, because it is familiar from other fields. But using it as the standard that must be met before the government may accord different treatment on the basis of race, or before the government may regulate the content of speech, is not remotely comparable to using it for the purpose asserted here. What it produces in those other fields—equality of treatment, and an unrestricted flow of contending speech—are constitutional norms; what it would produce here—a private right to ignore generally applicable laws—is a constitutional anomaly.³

Nor is it possible to limit the impact of respondents’ proposal by requiring a “compelling state interest” only when the conduct prohibited is “central” to the individual’s religion. It is no more appropriate for judges to determine the “centrality” of religious beliefs before applying a “compelling interest” test in the free exercise field, than it would be for them to determine the “importance” of ideas before applying the “compelling interest” test in the free speech field. What principle of law or logic can be brought to bear to contradict a believer’s assertion that a particular act is “central” to his personal faith? Judging the centrality of different religious practices is akin to the unacceptable “business of evaluating the relative merits of differing religious claims.” United States v. Lee (Stevens, J., concurring).⁴

If the “compelling interest” test is to be applied at all, then, it must be applied across the board, to all actions thought to be religiously commanded. Moreover, if “compelling interest” really means what it says (and watering it down here would subvert its rigor in the other fields where it is applied), many laws will not meet the test. Any society adopting such a system would be courting anarchy, but that danger increases in direct proportion to the society’s diversity of religious beliefs, and its determination to coerce or suppress none of them. Precisely because “we are a cosmopolitan nation made up of people of almost every conceivable religious preference,” Braunfeld v. Brown, and precisely because we value and protect that religious divergence, we cannot afford the luxury of deeming presumptively invalid, as applied to the religious objector, every regulation of conduct that does not protect an interest of the highest order. The rule respondents favor would open the prospect of constitutionally required religious exemptions from civic obligations of almost every conceivable kind—ranging from compulsory military service, to the payment of taxes, to health and safety regulation such as manslaughter and child neglect laws, compulsory vaccination laws, drug laws, and traffic laws, to social welfare legislation such as minimum wage laws, child labor laws, animal cruelty laws, environmental protection laws, and laws providing for equality of opportunity for the races. The First Amendment's protection of religious liberty does not require this.

Values that are protected against government interference through enshrinement in the Bill of Rights are not thereby banished from the political process. Just as a society that believes in the negative protection accorded to the press by the First Amendment is likely to enact laws that affirmatively foster the dissemination of the printed word, so also a society that believes in the negative protection accorded to religious belief can be expected to be solicitous of that value in its legislation as well. It is therefore not surprising that a number of States have made an exception to their drug laws for sacramental peyote use. But to say that a nondiscriminatory religious-practice exemption is permitted, or even that it is desirable, is not to say that it is constitutionally required, and that the appropriate occasions for its creation can be discerned by the courts. It may fairly be said that leaving accommodation to the political process will place at a relative disadvantage those religious practices that are not widely engaged in; but that unavoidable consequence of democratic government must be preferred to a system in which each conscience is a law unto itself or in which judges weight the social importance of all laws against the centrality of all religious beliefs.

[Reversed.]

JUSTICE O'CONNOR, with whom JUSTICE BRENNAN, JUSTICE MARSHALL, and JUSTICE BLACKMUN join as to [Part] II, concurring in the judgment....

II...

A

[Because] the First Amendment does not distinguish between religious belief and religious conduct, conduct motivated by sincere religious belief, like the belief itself, must therefore be at least presumptively protected by the Free Exercise Clause.

[A] law that prohibits [conduct] that happens to be an act of worship for someone [manifestly] does prohibit that person's free exercise of his religion. A person who is barred from engaging in religiously motivated conduct is barred from freely exercising his religion. Moreover, that person is barred from freely exercising his religion regardless of whether the law prohibits the conduct only when engaged in for religious reasons, only by members of that religion, or by all persons. It is difficult to deny that a law that prohibits religiously motivated conduct, even if the law is generally applicable, does not at least implicate First Amendment concerns.

The Court responds that generally applicable laws are “one large step” removed from laws aimed at specific religious practices. The First Amendment, however, does not distinguish between laws that are generally applicable and laws that target particular religious practices. Indeed, few States would be so naive as to enact a law directly prohibiting or burdening a religious practice as such. Our free exercise cases have all concerned generally applicable laws that had the effect of significantly burdening a religious practice. If the First Amendment is to have any vitality, it ought not be construed to cover only the extreme and hypothetical situation in which a State directly targets a religious practice....

To say that a person’s right to free exercise has been burdened, of course, does not mean that he has an absolute right to engage in the conduct. Under our established First Amendment jurisprudence, we have recognized that the freedom to act, unlike the freedom to believe, cannot be absolute. Instead, we have respected both the First Amendment’s express textual mandate and the governmental interest in regulation of conduct by requiring the Government to justify any substantial burden on religiously motivated conduct by a compelling state interest and by means narrowly tailored to achieve that interest. The compelling interest test effectuates the First Amendment’s command that religious liberty is an independent liberty, that it occupies a preferred position, and that the Court will not permit encroachments upon this liberty, whether direct or indirect, unless required by clear and compelling governmental interests “of the highest order” [Yoder]....

[In] each of the [cases] cited by the Court to support its categorical rule, we rejected the particular constitutional claims before us only after carefully weighing the competing interests. That we rejected the free exercise claims in those cases hardly calls into question the applicability of First Amendment doctrine in the first place. Indeed, it is surely unusual to judge the vitality of a constitutional doctrine by looking to the win-loss record of the plaintiffs who happen to come before us.

B...

[The] essence of a free exercise claim is relief from a burden imposed by government on religious practices or beliefs, whether the burden is imposed directly through laws that prohibit or compel specific religious practices, or indirectly through laws that, in effect, make abandonment of one’s own religion or conformity to the religious beliefs of others the price of an equal place in the civil community....

Legislatures, of course, have always been “left free to reach actions which were in violation of social duties or subversive of good order.” [Reynolds.] Yet because of the close relationship between conduct and religious belief, “[i]n every case the power to regulate must be so exercised as not, in attaining a permissible end, unduly to infringe the protected freedom.” [Cantwell.] Once it has been shown that a government regulation or criminal prohibition burdens the free exercise of religion, we have consistently asked the Government to demonstrate that unbending application of its regulation to the religious objector “is essential to accomplish an overriding governmental interest” [Lee], or represents “the least restrictive means of achieving some compelling state interest” [Thomas]. To me, [the] approach more consistent with our role as judges to decide each case on its individual merits [is] to apply this test in each case to determine whether the burden on the specific plaintiffs before us is constitutionally significant and whether the particular criminal interest asserted by the State before us is compelling. Even if, as an empirical matter, a government’s criminal laws might usually serve a compelling interest in health, safety, or public order, the First Amendment at least requires a case-by-case determination of the question, sensitive to the facts of each particular claim. Given the range of conduct that a State might legitimately make criminal, we cannot assume, merely because a law carries criminal sanctions and is generally applicable, that the First Amendment never requires the State to grant a limited exemption for religiously motivated conduct....

[The cases] cited by the Court for the proposition that we have rejected application of the Sherbert test outside the unemployment compensation field are distinguishable because they arose in [narrow], specialized contexts....

[There] is nothing talismanic about neutral laws of general applicability or general criminal prohibitions, for laws neutral toward religion can coerce a person to violate his religious conscience or intrude upon his religious duties just as effectively as laws aimed at religion. Although the Court suggests that the compelling interest test, as applied to generally applicable laws, would result in a “constitutional anomaly,” the First Amendment unequivocally makes freedom of religion, like freedom from race discrimination and freedom of speech, a “constitutional nor[m],” not an “anomaly.” [As] the language of the Clause itself makes clear, an individual’s free exercise of religion is a preferred constitutional activity. See, e.g., McConnell, Accommodation of Religion, 1985 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1, 9 (“[T]he text of the First Amendment itself ‘singles out’ religion for special protections.”). A law that makes criminal such an activity therefore triggers constitutional concern—and heightened judicial scrutiny—even if it does not target the particular religious conduct at issue. Our free speech cases similarly recognize that neutral regulations that affect free speech values are subject to a balancing, rather than categorical, approach. The Court’s parade of horribles not only fails as a reason for discarding the compelling interest test, it instead demonstrates just the opposite; that courts have been quite capable of applying our free exercise jurisprudence to strike sensible balances between religious liberty and competing state interest.

Finally, the Court today suggests that the disfavoring of minority religions is an “unavoidable consequence” under our system of government and that accommodation of such religions must be left to the political process. In my view, however, the First Amendment was enacted precisely to protect the rights of those whose religious practices are not shared by the majority and may be viewed with hostility. The history of our free exercise doctrine amply demonstrates the harsh impact majoritarian rule has had on unpopular or emerging religious groups such as the Jehovah’s Witnesses and the Amish. [The] compelling interest test reflects the First Amendment’s mandate of preserving religious liberty to the fullest extent possible in a pluralistic society. For the Court to deem this command a “luxury” [is] to denigrate “[t]he very purpose of a Bill of Rights.”

[Part III of Justice O’Connor’s opinion concluded that Oregon’s prohibition satisfied the compelling state interest test. She agreed that the prohibition placed a “severe burden” on the free exercise of religion, but said that the state had a “significant interest” in controlling drug use. Finding the question close, she concluded that “uniform application” of the prohibition is “essential to accomplish” the overriding purpose of preventing physical harm caused by drug use. Selective exemptions for religious believers would “seriously impair” the state’s interest.]

JUSTICE BLACKMUN, with whom JUSTICE BRENNAN and JUSTICE MARSHALL join, dissenting....

I

In weighing respondents’ clear interest in the free exercise of their religion against Oregon’s asserted interest in enforcing its drug laws, it is important to articulate in precise terms the state interest involved. It is not the State’s broad interest in fighting the critical “war on drugs” [but] the State’s narrow interest in refusing to make an exception for the religious, ceremonial use of peyote.

[Failure] to reduce the competing interests to the same plane of generality tends to distort the weighing process in the State's favor....

The carefully circumscribed ritual context in which respondents used peyote is far removed from the irresponsible and unrestricted recreational use of unlawful drugs.⁶ The Native American Church's internal restrictions on, and supervision of, its members' use of peyote substantially obviate the State's health and safety concerns....⁷

The State's apprehension of a flood of other religious claims is purely speculative. Almost half the States and the Federal Government have maintained an exemption for religious peyote use for many years, and apparently have not found themselves overwhelmed by claims to other religious exemptions.⁸ Allowing an exemption for religious peyote use would not necessarily oblige the State to grant a similar exemption to other religious groups. The unusual circumstances that make the religious use of peyote compatible with the State's interests in health and safety and in preventing drug trafficking would not apply to other religious claims. Some religions, for example, might not restrict drug use to a limited ceremonial context, as does the Native American Church. Some religious claims involve drugs such as marijuana and heroin, in which there is significant illegal traffic, with its attendant greed and violence, so that it would be difficult to grant a religious exemption without seriously compromising law enforcement efforts....

Note: Should Accommodation Be Required?

1. Free exercise and free speech. United States v. O'Brien, Chapter 7, section E3, supra, held that facially neutral statutes serving important purposes unrelated to suppression of speech are constitutional if the incidental impact on speech is no greater than necessary. Is the Court correct in stating that Smith transfers the O'Brien approach to the free exercise area? Gedicks, The Normalized Free Exercise Clause, 75 Ind. L.J. 77 (2000), argues that Smith adopts a "rational basis" standard of review and thereby "contradicts the Court's Speech Clause doctrine governing [incidental] burdens on speech occurring as the result of otherwise legitimate government regulations of conduct or the time, place, or manner of expression," which requires that such regulations satisfy an intermediate standard of review. Is Gedicks's description of free speech doctrine accurate?

2. The scope of Smith. How broadly does Smith undermine a doctrine of mandatory accommodation?

a. Individualized determinations. Was the unemployment commission in Sherbert in a position to balance the impairment of free exercise against the prevention of fraudulent claims? Consider Brownstein, Protecting Religious Liberty: The False Messiahs of Free Speech Doctrine and Formal Neutrality, 18 J.L. & Pol. 119, 191–192 (2002): Under the “individualized determination” exception, “[religion] is granted something like most favored nation status. If any secular interest can justify an exemption from a law, then the state must recognize that religious interests also deserve to be exempt from the law. [But an] extraordinary range of laws contain exemptions to their application, including most civil rights laws [and] even homicide statutes. [This] militates against such an understanding.” See also Duncan, Free Exercise Is Dead, Long Live Free Exercise: Smith, Lukumi, and the General Applicability Requirement, 3 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 850, 868 (2001): “[A] law burdening religious conduct is underinclusive, with respect to any particular government interest, if the law fails to pursue that interest uniformly against other conduct that causes similar damage to that government interest.” Does this meet Brownstein’s concerns?

b. Hybrid claims. Is the Court’s explanation of Yoder persuasive? Consider the proposition that, because there is no substantive due process right, independent of a religious claim, to keep children out of school, and there is no religious claim, independent of a due process claim, to do so, the two inadequate arguments taken together cannot add up to a valid claim. Consider Brownstein, Protecting Religious Liberty: The False Messiahs of Free Speech Doctrine and Formal Neutrality, 18 J.L. & Pol. 119, 191–192 (2002): “A hybrid rights situation involves a neutral law of general applicability that substantially burdens the exercise of religion and sufficiently burdens some other constitutionally protected interest to invoke the application of the requisite standard of review [short] of strict scrutiny.” Brownstein argues that this idea is coherent but inconsistent with “basic constitutional intuitions.” “Hybrid rights analysis suggests that religious people should be treated preferentially with regard to the exercise of fundamental rights when their religious beliefs influence the way they exercise their rights. [That] cannot be right. There is an equality dimension to liberty rights. [Religious] people do not get special treatment with respect to these basic freedoms. No one does.”

c. Expressive association rights. Suppose a state adopts an antidiscrimination statute, creating civil liability and prohibiting discrimination on the basis of gender. Must a church-related school comply with that statute by hiring a teacher with a one-year-old child if the church’s tenets demand that women with small children raise them at home and not participate in the paid workforce? Does the Court’s discussion of cases in which free exercise claims are joined with other claims, such as freedom of association, adequately deal with this problem?

d. The political process. Although the political process protected the sacramental use of wine during Prohibition, it has not fully protected the sacramental use of peyote. What limitations does this suggest on reliance on the political process to protect religious liberty interests? (Congress responded to Smith with the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, found unconstitutional on federalism grounds in City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997).)

e. Invidious motivation. Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520 (1993), invalidated a city's ban on "ritual slaughter" as applied to animal sacrifices conducted by the church as part of its practice of the Santeria religion. The Court found that the background of the ban, and its specific language and exemptions, demonstrated that "suppression of the central element of the Santeria worship service was the object of the ordinances." The background "demonstrates animosity to Santeria adherents and their religious practices; the ordinances by their own terms target this religious exercise; the texts of the ordinances were gerrymandered with care to proscribe religious killings of animals but to exclude almost all secular killings; and the ordinances suppress much more religious conduct than is necessary to achieve the legitimate ends asserted in their defense." The ordinances did not satisfy the "rigorous scrutiny" required of regulations that are not neutral or of general application because they were "not drawn in narrow terms to accomplish" the objectives of protecting animals from inhumane slaughter or avoiding unhealthy methods of disposing of animal carcasses. Justice Blackmun, joined by Justice O'Connor, concurred in the judgment, saying that, "when a law discriminates against religion as such, [it] automatically will fail strict scrutiny [because] by definition, [it] is not precisely tailored to a compelling governmental interest."

Is Hialeah best understood as involving an impermissibly motivated antireligious gerrymander, that is, a statute that, though neutral on its face, actually reaches only religious activities? For the suggestion that the Court's approach, following Smith's "focus[] on persecutory motivation, [elicits] the same kind of ad hominem argumentation that is reflected in 'purpose' cases under the Establishment Clause," see Smith, Free Exercise Doctrine and the Discourse of Disrespect, 65 U. Colo. L. Rev. 519, 558 (1994).

3. (Implicit) denominational preferences? Williams and Williams, Volitionalism and Religious Liberty, 76 Cornell L. Rev. 769, 772, 777, 908 (1991), argue that Smith resulted from "the Court's profound discomfort with nonvolitionalist beliefs" that "acknowledge the possibility that some religious consequences for individuals may be caused by activities or events over which they had no free choice or control," as in Lyng and Bowen v. Roy. On their analysis, free exercise claims lie along a spectrum ranging from "exemption" claims to “ordering” claims, “the remedy for which consists primarily of reordering some aspect of the government’s program not limited in application to the individual claimant.” They suggest that under a pre-Smith analysis, “ordering” claims, which typify those made by people with nonvolitionalist beliefs, “are, as a practical matter, likely to impose greater burdens on the government than will exemption claims.” Does this raise questions about denominational preference? Note that, on some views, neither religious belief in general nor commitment to Christianity in particular results from volitional choices. See Garvey, An Anti-Liberal Argument for Religious Freedom, 7 J. Contemp. Legal Issues 275, 278 (1996): “The individual does not have complete control over choosing the religious option. It is God who makes the choice.”

Greene, The Political Balance of the Religion Clauses, 102 Yale L.J. 1611 (1993), argues that the establishment clause bars “enacting legislation for the express purpose of advancing the values believed to be commanded by religion,” and that “precisely because religion should be excluded from politics in this way, [the] Free Exercise Clause requires the recognition of religious faith as a ground for exemption from legal obligation. [These] exemptions are merely the appropriate remedy for the damage that precluding religious values from grounding law causes religious people.” The establishment clause ban arises because, when legislation is enacted for the express purpose of advancing religious values, “a nonbeliever is effectively denied participation in the political process because the nonbeliever cannot discuss the matter on the terms that the religious believers have set.” According to Greene, because one type of argument is thereby excluded from political negotiations, those who would make it are entitled to a compensatory offset.

D. PERMISSIBLE ACCOMMODATION

Statutes that attempt to accommodate the concerns of adherents of religion lie at the borderland of the free exercise and establishment clauses. They promote “free exercise values,” in the sense that they allow believers to pursue their religious beliefs without hindrance, but legislatures are rarely compelled by the free exercise clause to adopt statutory accommodations. Such statutes are in tension with some formulations of the requirements of the establishment clause because they have the purpose of advancing religion in the sense just specified. Are such accommodations constitutional? If so, why?

Consider these positions:

1. There is no tension. No regulation promoting free exercise values can violate nonestablishment values, and no statute promoting nonestablishment values impairs free exercise ones. But consider Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, infra.

2. There is no tension. Only statutory accommodations required by the free exercise clause are constitutional, and all other efforts to serve “free exercise values” are unconstitutional. Why should a legislature ever enact a statutory accommodation if this is the test? If the free exercise clause requires some accommodation, what reasons are there to think that court-devised accommodations will be more appropriate than legislative ones?
3. The tension should be resolved by preferring free exercise values to nonestablishment ones. The expansive role of the modern state creates many opportunities for facially neutral statutes to burden religious belief and reduces the role previously played by many religious institutions. Religious intolerance poses serious threats in a religiously diverse society, so that when legislation advances free exercise values, it should be encouraged. Consider the extent to which the problems discussed in Chapter 9, section B, infra, as well as the issue of state aid to religious schools, could be recast as efforts by the state to advance free exercise values.
4. The tension should be resolved by preferring nonestablishment values to free exercise ones. Mainstream religions have a powerful advantage in the political process over marginal religions and over nonreligion. Legislation is likely to enhance the positions of mainstream religions. In the long run, religious minorities will be better off under a regime of strict separation, even though the application of neutral regulations may sometimes affect them adversely.
5. There need be no tension. If states are barred from using religion as a basis for either conferring benefits or imposing burdens, legislators will be required to use neutral rules to accomplish their goals, and the legislation resulting from a political process constrained by a requirement of neutrality will threaten neither free exercise nor nonestablishment values.

Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos

483 U.S. 327 (1987)

JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

Section 702 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 exempts religious organizations from Title VII’s prohibition against discrimination in employment on the basis of religion. The question presented is whether applying the §702 exemption to the secular nonprofit activities of religious organizations violates the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. The District Court held that it does....

[The appellee was a janitor at the Deseret Gymnasium, a nonprofit facility, open to the public, run by the Mormon church. He was fired after he failed to qualify for a certificate stating that he was a member of the church eligible to attend its temples because he observed the church's standards involving church attendance, tithing, and abstinence from coffee, tea, alcohol, and tobacco.]

“This Court has long recognized that the government may (and sometimes must) accommodate religious practices and that it may do so without violating the Establishment Clause.” [Hobbie, section C1, supra.] It is well established, too, that “[t]he limits of permissible state accommodation to religion are by no means co-extensive with the noninterference mandated by the Free Exercise Clause.” [Walz, section B1, supra.] There is ample room under the Establishment Clause for “benevolent neutrality which will permit religious exercise to exist without sponsorship and without interference.” At some point, accommodation may devolve into “an unlawful fostering of religion” [Hobbie], but these are not such cases, in our view....

Lemon requires first that the law at issue serve a “secular legislative purpose.” This does not mean that the law’s purpose must be unrelated to religion—that would amount to a requirement “that the government show a callous indifference to religious groups,” Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306, 314 (1952), and the Establishment Clause has never been so interpreted. Rather, Lemon’s “purpose” requirement aims at preventing the relevant governmental decisionmaker—in this case, Congress—from abandoning neutrality and acting with the intent of promoting a particular point of view in religious matters.

Under the Lemon analysis, it is a permissible legislative purpose to alleviate significant governmental interference with the ability of religious organizations to define and carry out their religious missions. Appellees argue that there is no such purpose here because §702 provided adequate protection for religious employers [when] it exempted only the religious activities of such employers from the statutory ban on religious discrimination. We may assume for the sake of argument that [that] exemption was adequate in the sense that the Free Exercise Clause required no more. Nonetheless, it is a significant burden on a religious organization to require it, on pain of substantial liability, to predict which of its activities a secular court will consider religious. The line is hardly a bright one, and an organization might understandably be concerned that a judge would not understand its religious tenets and sense of mission. Fear of potential liability might affect the way an organization carried out what it understood to be its religious mission. [Congress's] purpose was to minimize governmental "interfer[ence] with the decision-making process in religions." [This] purpose does not violate the Establishment Clause.

The second requirement under Lemon is that the law in question have "a principal or primary effect...that neither advances nor inhibits religion." Undoubtedly, religious organizations are better able now to advance their purposes than they were prior to the 1972 amendment to §702. [A] law is not unconstitutional simply because it allows churches to advance religion, which is their very purpose. For a law to have forbidden "effects" under Lemon, it must be fair to say that the government itself has advanced religion through its own activities and influence....

The District Court appeared to fear that sustaining the exemption would permit churches with financial resources impermissibly to extend their influence and propagate their faith by entering the commercial, profit-making world. The cases before us [involve] a nonprofit activity instituted over 75 years ago. [Moreover], we find no persuasive evidence in the record before us that the Church's ability to propagate its religious doctrine through the Gymnasium is any greater now than it was prior to the passage of the Civil Rights Act in 1964. In such circumstances, we do not see how any advancement of religion achieved by the Gymnasium can be fairly attributed to the Government, as opposed to the Church.¹⁵

We find unpersuasive the District Court's reliance on the fact that §702 singles out religious entities for a benefit. Although the Court has given weight to this consideration in its past decisions, it has never indicated that statutes that give special consideration to religious groups are per se invalid. [Where], as here, government acts with the proper purpose of lifting a regulation that burdens the exercise of religion, we see no reason to require that the exemption come packaged with benefits to secular entities....

[In] a case such as this, where a statute is neutral on its face and motivated by a permissible purpose of limiting governmental interference with the exercise of religion, we see no justification for applying strict scrutiny to a statute that passes the Lemon test. The proper inquiry is whether Congress has chosen a rational classification to further a legitimate end. [As] applied to the nonprofit activities of religious employers, §702 is rationally related to the legitimate purpose of alleviating significant governmental interference with the ability of religious organizations to define and carry out their religious missions.

[Reversed.]

JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom JUSTICE MARSHALL joins, concurring in the judgment.

I write separately to emphasize that my concurrence in the judgment rests on the fact that these cases involve a challenge to the application of §702's categorical exemption to the activities of a nonprofit organization. I believe that the particular character of nonprofit activity makes inappropriate a case-by-case determination whether its nature is religious or secular.

[Any] exemption from Title VII's proscription on religious discrimination necessarily has the effect of burdening the religious liberty of prospective and current employees. An exemption says that a person may be put to the choice of either conforming to certain religious tenets or losing a job opportunity, a promotion, or, as in this case, employment itself. The potential for coercion created by such a provision is in serious tension with our commitment to individual freedom of conscience in matters of religious belief.

At the same time, religious organizations have an interest in autonomy in ordering their internal affairs, so that they may be free to "select their own leaders, define their own doctrines, resolve their own disputes, and run their own institutions. Religion includes important communal elements for most believers. They exercise their religion through religious organizations, and these organizations must be protected by the [free exercise clause]." Laycock, Towards a General Theory of the Religion Clauses: The Case of Church Labor Relations and the Right to Church Autonomy, 81 Colum. L. Rev. 1373, 1389 (1981). For many individuals, religious activity derives meaning in large measure from participation in a larger religious community. Such a community represents an ongoing tradition of shared beliefs, an organic entity not reducible to a mere aggregation of individuals. Determining that certain activities are in furtherance of an organization's religious mission, and that only those committed to that mission should conduct them, is thus a means by which a religious community defines itself. Solicitude for a church's ability to do so reflects the idea that furtherance of the autonomy of religious organizations often furthers individual religious freedom as well.

The authority to engage in this process of self-definition inevitably involves what we normally regard as infringement on free exercise rights, since a religious organization is able to condition employment in certain activities on subscription to particular religious tenets. We are willing to countenance the imposition of such a condition because we deem it vital that, if certain activities constitute part of a religious community's practice, then a religious organization should be able to require that only members of its community perform those activities.

This rationale suggests that, ideally, religious organizations should be able to discriminate on the basis of religion only with respect to religious activities, so that a determination should be made in each case whether an activity is religious or secular. This is because the infringement on religious liberty that results from conditioning performance of secular activity upon religious belief cannot be defended as necessary for the community's self-definition. Furthermore, the authorization of discrimination in such circumstances [puts] at the disposal of religion the added advantages of economic leverage in the secular realm. As a result, the authorization of religious discrimination with respect to nonreligious activities [has] the effect of furthering religion in violation of the Establishment Clause.

What makes the application of a religious-secular distinction difficult is that the character of an activity is not self-evident. As a result, determining whether an activity is religious or secular requires a searching case-by-case analysis. This results in considerable ongoing government entanglement in religious affairs. Furthermore, this prospect of government intrusion raises concern that a religious organization may be chilled in its free exercise activity. While a church may regard the conduct of certain functions as integral to its mission, a court may disagree. A religious organization therefore would have an incentive to characterize as religious only those activities about which there likely would be no dispute, even if it genuinely believed that religious commitment was important in performing other tasks as well. As a result, the community's process of self-definition would be shaped in part by the prospects of litigation. A case-by-case analysis for all activities therefore would both produce excessive government entanglement with religion and create the danger of chilling religious activity.

The risk of chilling religious organizations is most likely to arise with respect to nonprofit activities. [Nonprofits] historically have been organized specifically to provide certain community services, not simply to engage in commerce. Churches often regard the provision of such services as a means of fulfilling religious duty and of providing an example of the way of life a church seeks to foster.

Nonprofit activities therefore are most likely to present cases in which characterization of the activity as religious or secular will be a close question. [This] substantial potential for chilling religious activity makes inappropriate a case-by-case determination of the character of a nonprofit organization, and justifies a categorical exemption for nonprofit activities. Such an exemption demarcates a sphere of deference with respect to those activities most likely to be religious. It permits infringement on employee free exercise rights in those instances in which discrimination is most likely to reflect a religious community's self-definition. While not every nonprofit activity may be operated for religious purposes, the likelihood that many are makes a categorical rule a suitable means to avoid chilling the exercise of religion....

JUSTICE O'CONNOR, concurring in the judgment....

In Wallace v. Jaffree, I noted a tension in the Court's use of the Lemon test to evaluate an Establishment Clause challenge to government efforts to accommodate the free exercise of religion: "On the one hand, a rigid application of the Lemon test would invalidate legislation exempting religious observers from generally applicable government obligations. By definition, such legislation has a religious purpose and effect in promoting the free exercise of religion. On the other hand, judicial deference to all legislation that purports to facilitate the free exercise of religion would completely vitiate the Establishment Clause. Any statute pertaining to religion can be viewed as an 'accommodation' of free exercise rights."

In my view, the opinion for the Court leans toward the second of the two unacceptable options described above. [The] Court seems to suggest that the "effects" prong of the Lemon test is not at all implicated as long as the government action can be characterized as "allowing" religious organizations to advance religion, in contrast to government action directly advancing religion.

This distinction seems to me to obscure far more than to enlighten. Almost any government benefit to religion could be recharacterized as simply "allowing" a religion to better advance itself, unless perhaps it involved actual proselytization by government agents....

The necessary first step in evaluating an Establishment Clause challenge to a government action lifting from religious organizations a generally applicable regulatory burden is to recognize that such government action does have the effect of advancing religion. The necessary second step is to separate those benefits to religion that constitutionally accommodate the free exercise of religion from those that provide unjustifiable awards of assistance to religious organizations. [The] inquiry [should] be "whether government's purpose is to endorse religion and whether the statute actually conveys a message of endorsement."...

[These] cases involve a government decision to lift from a nonprofit activity of a religious organization the burden of demonstrating that the particular nonprofit activity is religious as well as the burden of refraining from discriminating on the basis of religion. Because there is a probability that a nonprofit activity of a religious organization will itself be involved in the organization's religious mission, in my view the objective observer should perceive the government action as an accommodation of the exercise of religion rather than as a government endorsement of religion.

It is not clear, however, that activities conducted by religious organizations solely as profit-making enterprises will be as likely to be directly involved in the religious mission of the organization....

[An opinion by Justice Blackmun, concurring in the judgment, is omitted.]

TEXAS MONTHLY v. BULLOCK, 489 U.S. 1 (1989). A sharply divided Court held unconstitutional a statute that exempted religious publications from a state sales tax. Justice Brennan's opinion, joined by Justices Marshall and Stevens, said that "government policies with secular objectives [may] incidentally benefit religion. The nonsectarian aims of government and religious groups often overlap, and this Court has never required that public authorities refrain from implementing reasonable measures to advance legitimate secular goals merely because they would thereby relieve religious groups of costs they would otherwise incur [citing Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981), and Walz, below]." However, in such cases, "the benefits derived by religious organizations flowed to a large number of nonreligious groups as well. Indeed, were those benefits confined to religious organizations, they could not have appeared other than as state sponsorship of religion." The exemption for religious publications "lacks sufficient breadth to pass scrutiny under the Establishment Clause. [Insofar] as [the] subsidy is conferred upon a wide array of nonsectarian groups as well as religious groups in pursuit of some legitimate secular end, the fact that religious groups benefit incidentally does not deprive the subsidy of the secular purpose and primary effect mandated by the Establishment Clause. However, when government directs a subsidy exclusively to religious organizations that is not required by the Free Exercise Clause and that either burdens nonbeneficiaries markedly or cannot reasonably be seen as removing a significant state-imposed deterrent to the free exercise of religion, [it] 'provide[s] unjustifiable awards of assistance to religious organizations' and cannot but 'conve[y] a message of endorsement' to slighted members of the community [Amos]. This is particularly true where, as here, the subsidy is targeted at writings that promulgate the teachings of religious faiths." If the state subsidized groups contributing to the community's "cultural, intellectual, and moral betterment," the exemption for religious publications would be permitted, but "if Texas sought to promote reflection and discussion about questions of ultimate value and the contours of a good and meaningful life, then a tax exemption would have to be available to an extended range of associations whose publications were substantially devoted to such matters.”

Justice Scalia’s dissent, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Kennedy, argued that the tax exemption was a permissible accommodation of religion. For him, breadth of coverage is relevant only where the state justifies its legislation on entirely secular grounds, but “where accommodation of religion is the justification, by definition religion is being singled out.” Although “it is not always easy to determine when accommodation slides over into promotion, and neutrality into favoritism,” the tax exemption was an easy case because imposing a general sales tax on the sale of religious publications was at least arguably unconstitutional as a burden on religion. (Does this argument survive Smith, section C, supra?) Justice Brennan’s opinion rejected this argument on the ground that it was obviously not unconstitutional to impose a general sales tax on religious publications. For Justice Brennan, accommodations must not “impose substantial burdens on nonbeneficiaries [or must be] designed to alleviate government intrusions that might significantly deter adherents of a particular faith from conduct protected by the Free Exercise Clause.” The tax exemption did burden nonbeneficiaries by increasing their tax bills and did not alleviate a “demonstrated and possibly grave imposition on religious activity sheltered by the Free Exercise Clause.”

Justice Blackmun, whose opinion concurring in the result was joined by Justice O’Connor, expressed more sympathy with the accommodation argument. He argued that the tax exemption was unconstitutional because it was “limited to the sale of religious literature by a religious organization.” (Justice White also concurred in the result, relying on Arkansas Writers’ Project v. Ragland, Chapter 7, section F3, supra.)

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF KIRYAS JOEL VILLAGE SCHOOL DISTRICT v. GRUMET, 512 U.S. 687 (1994). The village of Kiryas Joel in New York is a religious enclave of Satmar Hasidim, a group of Orthodox Jews “who make few concessions to the modern world and go to great lengths to avoid assimilation.” Most children in the village are educated in private religious schools. Educating handicapped children in such schools is quite expensive, and the village residents arranged to have a public school system provide education for their handicapped children in an annex to one of the religious schools. That arrangement ended when the Court held a similar arrangement unconstitutional in Aguilar v. Felton, 473 U.S. 402 (1985). The children were then sent to schools in the neighboring public school system. The village residents found the education there unsatisfactory in part because the children suffered “panic, fear and trauma” from “leaving their own community and being with people whose ways were so different.” In 1989, the New York legislature enacted a statute designating the village of Kiryas Joel as a separate school district. The Supreme Court held the statute unconstitutional.

Justice Souter’s opinion for the Court stated, “The fact that this school district was created by a special and unusual Act of the legislature [gives] reason for concern whether the benefit received by the Satmar community is one that the legislature will provide equally to other religious (and nonreligious) groups.” For the Court, “[the] fundamental source of constitutional concern [is] that the legislature itself may fail to exercise governmental authority in a religiously neutral way. The anomalously case-specific nature of the legislature’s exercise of state authority in creating this district for a religious community leaves the Court without any direct way to review such state action for the purpose of safeguarding a principle at the heart of the Establishment Clause, that government should not prefer one religion to another, or religion to irreligion.” The difficulty was that Kiryas Joel had not received its authority “simply as one of many communities eligible for equal treatment under a general law,” so the Court could not be sure “that the next similarly situated group seeking a school district of its own will receive one; [a] legislature’s failure to enact a special law is itself unreviewable.” The Court agreed that the state could “accommodate religious needs by alleviating special burdens,” but creating a separate district “singles out a particular religious sect for special treatment” and thereby violated the principle that “neutrality as among religions must be honored.”

Justice Stevens, joined by Justices Blackmun and Ginsburg, added that, to meet the concerns about “panic, fear and trauma,” the state “could have taken steps to alleviate the children’s fear by teaching their schoolmates to be tolerant and respectful of Satmar customs. Action of that kind would raise no constitutional concerns and would further the strong public interest in promoting diversity and understanding in the public schools.” But the state’s response, “a solution that affirmatively supports a religious sect’s interest in segregating itself and preventing its children from associating with their neighbors,” was unconstitutional. It “increased the likelihood that they would remain within the fold, faithful adherents of their parents’ religious faith,” and thereby “provided official support to cement the attachment of young adherents to a particular faith.”

Justice Kennedy, concurring, argued that “[the] real vice of the school district [is] that New York created it by drawing political boundaries on the basis of religion.” He criticized the Court’s broader analysis. “[By] creating the district, New York did not impose or increase any burden on non-Satmars, compared to the burden it lifted from the Satmars, that might disqualify the District as a genuine accommodation.” There was no evidence “that the legislature has denied another religious community like the Satmars its own school district under analogous circumstances. The legislature, like the judiciary, is sworn to uphold the Constitution, and we have no reason to presume that the New York Legislature would not grant the same accommodation in a similar future case. The fact that New York singled out the Satmars for this special treatment indicates nothing other than the uniqueness of the handicapped Satmar children’s plight. It is normal for legislatures to respond to problems as they arise—no less so when the issue is religious accommodation.”

Justice O’Connor argued that “[the] Satmars’ living arrangements were accommodated by their right—a right shared with all other communities, religious or not, throughout New York—to incorporate themselves as a village.” In her view, “one’s religion ought not affect one’s legal rights or duties or benefits,” even when the government was “acting to accommodate religion.” Permissible accommodations could not involve “discriminations based on sect. [A] draft law may exempt conscientious objectors, but it may not exempt conscientious objectors whose objections are based on theistic belief (such as Quakers) as opposed to nontheistic belief (such as Buddhists) or atheistic belief.” The New York statute “benefits one group” and should be treated “as a legislatively drawn religious classification.” It was, for Justice O’Connor, “a close question, because the Satmars may be the only group who currently need this particular accommodation. The legislature may well be acting without any favoritism, so that if another group came to ask for a similar district, the group might get it on the same terms as the Satmars. But the nature of the legislative process makes it impossible to be sure of this. [A] group petitioning for a law may never get a definite response, or may get a ‘no’ based not on the merits but on the press of other business or the lack of an influential sponsor. Such a legislative refusal to act would not normally be reviewable by a court. Under these circumstances, it seems dangerous to validate what appears to me a clear religious preference.” According to Justice O’Connor, “A district created under a generally applicable scheme would be acceptable even though it coincides with a village which was consciously created by its voters as an enclave for their religious group.”

Justice Scalia’s dissent was joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Thomas. “[The] Founding Fathers would be astonished to find that the Establishment Clause [has] been employed to prohibit characteristically and admirably American accommodation of the religious practices (or more precisely, cultural peculiarities) of a tiny minority sect.” As he saw it, “[T]he Court’s ‘no guarantee of neutrality’ argument is an assertion of this Court’s inability to control the New York Legislature's future denial of comparable accommodation. [Most] efforts at accommodation seek to solve a problem that applies to members of only one or a few religions. Not every religion uses wine in its sacraments, but that does not [require] the State granting such an exemption to explain in advance how it will treat every other claim for dispensation from its controlled-substances laws." The Court should not require "some 'up front' legislative guarantee of equal treatment for [other] sects."

Note: When—If Ever—Should Accommodations of Religion Be Permitted?

1. The attractions of a doctrine of permissible accommodation. Consider McConnell, Accommodation of Religion, 1985 Sup. Ct. Rev. 1, 1–3:

The much-discussed "tension" between the two Religion Clauses largely arises from the Court's substitution of a misleading formula (the three-part Lemon [test]) and subsidiary, instrumental, values (especially the separation of church and state) in place of the central value of religious liberty. [Between] the accommodations compelled by the Free Exercise Clause and the benefits to religion prohibited by the Establishment Clause there exists a class of permissible government actions toward religion, which have as their purpose and effects the facilitation of religious liberty. [Only] an interpretation of the Religion Clauses based on religious liberty [satisfactorily] distinguishes permissible accommodations from impermissible establishments.

See also McConnell, Accommodation of Religion: An Update and a Response to the Critics, 60 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 685 (1992).

2. The scope of the principle. Walz v. Tax Commission, 397 U.S. 664 (1970), held constitutional the practice of granting churches exemptions from the property tax. Chief Justice Burger's opinion for the Court said that the "purpose of a property tax exemption is neither the advancement nor the inhibition of religion. [The state] has not singled out one particular church [or] even churches as such; rather, it has granted exemption to all houses of worship within a broad class of property owned by nonprofit, quasi-public corporations [which the state considers] beneficial and stabilizing influences in community life." After describing the ways in which denial of tax exemption would "expand the involvement of government" with religion, the Court said, "The exemption creates only a minimal and remote involvement between church and state. [It] restricts the fiscal relationship between [them], and tends to complement and reinforce the desired separation insulating each from the other.” Fiscal support of religion through the tax system is thus not the imposition of religion on nonbelievers.

3. Permissible accommodations and antidiscrimination legislation. Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, 472 U.S. 703 (1985), held unconstitutional a Connecticut statute providing, “No person who states that a particular day of the week is observed as his Sabbath may be required by his employer to work on that day.” Chief Justice Burger’s opinion for the Court said that the statute imposes “an absolute duty to conform [business] practices to the particular religious practices of the employee. [The] State thus commands that Sabbath religious concerns automatically control over all secular interests at the workplace; the statute takes no account of the convenience or interests of the employer or those of other employees who do not observe a Sabbath.” Justice O’Connor, joined by Justice Marshall, concurred, objecting to the “special and [absolute] protection” given to Sabbath observers over those with other “ethical and religious beliefs and practices.” “The message conveyed is one of endorsement of a particular religious belief, to the detriment of those who do not share it.”

Why are the statute’s absolute nature and targeting on a particular religious practice impermissible? Consider the implications of Justice Brennan’s emphasis in Texas Monthly that permissible accommodations must be sufficiently broad: The broader the accommodation, the more significantly it impairs the majority’s ability to accomplish the substantive aims it seeks—raising revenue, for example. A requirement of breadth therefore makes permissible accommodations self-limiting, reducing the possibility that serious erosions of the nonestablishment value will occur.

Consider 42 U.S.C. §§2000e-2(a), 2000e(j):

It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer to [discriminate] against any individual with respect to his compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment [because] of such individual’s [religion; the] term “religion” includes all aspects of religious observance and practice, as well as belief, unless an employer demonstrates that he is unable to reasonably accommodate an employee’s [religious] observance or practice without undue hardship on the conduct of the employer’s business.

These provisions were construed in Trans World Airlines v. Hardison, 432 U.S. 63 (1977), as not requiring an employer to adjust its seniority system to allow junior employees to avoid work on their Sabbaths by displacing senior employees entitled by the system to work on the other days. “To require TWA to bear more than a de minimis cost in order to give Hardison Saturdays off is an undue hardship.” In Thornton, Justice O’Connor’s opinion distinguished title VII because it required reasonable, not absolute, accommodation of all religious beliefs and practices. “[An] objective observer would perceive it as an anti-discrimination law rather than an endorsement of religion or a particular religious practice.”

The opinions suggest that the more a statutory accommodation places a burden on nonbeneficiaries, the less likely it is a permissible accommodation. Consider the argument that, to the contrary, the greater the burden, the more permissible the accommodation because those feeling the burden will have more political influence in striking an appropriate balance.

How should the following problems be analyzed: (a) A state’s antidiscrimination laws do not prohibit discrimination against LGBTQ individuals by places of public accommodation. The state enacts a statute providing that no one operating a place of public accommodation may be required to provide goods or services to any person if the operator has a religion-based objection to providing the goods or services. (b) A state’s antidiscrimination laws prohibit discrimination against LGBTQ individuals. The state enacts a statute providing that no one covered by the antidiscrimination law shall be held liable for failure to provide goods or services to anyone if the person has a religion-based objection to doing so. What burdens are relevant to determining the constitutionality of this accommodation? As to burdens on the business operator, must the government accept the operator’s assessment of the substantiality of the burden, or may it assess that burden independently? As to burdens on customers, consider that some burdens are material, such as the need to procure the goods or services elsewhere, and some are dignitary. How should the latter be assessed?

4. Permissible accommodations and sect preference. Lupu, The Lingering Death of Separationism, 62 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 230, 270 (1994), says that New York in Kiryas Joel “predictably responded to the circumstances and political strength of the affected sect. [Is] it imaginable that New York State would create a new public school district at the behest of an insular group of Branch Davidians or members of the Unification Church?” If the presumption is that the legislature would not do so, how can the courts ever learn whether the legislature is in fact willing to act in a sect-neutral manner?

Does Kiryas Joel raise serious questions about state laws protecting the practice of labeling certain foods kosher (i.e., satisfying certain religious requirements) by making it a fraudulent practice to label a food as kosher when it has not received the approval of a specific religious institution? For a discussion, see Greenawalt, Religious Law and Civil Law: Using Secular Law to Assure Observance of Practices with Religious Significance, 71 S. Cal. L. Rev. 781, 793–796 (1998).

5. The doctrine's justification. On what theory of the establishment clause are statutory accommodations of religious practices permissible? Note that statutory accommodations have the purpose of benefiting religious belief as against nonbelief. Consider these possibilities:

a. Justice Souter's concurring opinion in Lee v. Weisman section B1, supra, observed, “[Accommodation] must lift a discernible burden on the free exercise of religion. Concern for the position of religious individuals in the modern regulatory state cannot justify official solicitude for a religious practice unburdened by general rules. [Religious] students cannot complain that omitting prayers from their graduation ceremony would, in any realistic sense, ‘burden’ their spiritual callings.” Note that the Court in Amos concedes that the church’s free exercise rights would not be violated by requiring it to comply with the ban on religious discrimination as to the employees there. “Burden,” thus, means some impairment of free exercise values short of a violation of free exercise rights.

b. Statutory accommodations are permissible solely to alleviate burdens that violate the free exercise clause, but legislatures have some leeway to determine what an appropriate balance is, or to devise accommodations that differ from judicially devised ones because of institutional differences between courts and legislatures.

c. Legislatures have substantial discretion to promote “free exercise values” by enacting statutory accommodations. Why is not voluntary devotional prayer in public schools a permissible accommodation? Consider also Chief Justice Burger’s argument in dissent in Jaffree, section B3, supra, that Alabama’s moment of silence statute “accommodates the purely private, voluntary religious choices of the individual pupils who wish to pray while at the same time creating a time for nonreligious reflection for those who do not choose to pray.” Are such practices insufficiently broad to satisfy the doctrine’s requirements?

Can any of these theories support the accommodation in Kiryas Joel?

Gedicks, The Normalized Free Exercise Clause, 75 Ind. L.J. 77 (2000), argues that the doctrine of permissible accommodations is inconsistent with equal protection doctrine dealing with affirmative action, which subjects assertedly benign legislation based on suspect traits to strict scrutiny. With which account of the doctrine of permissible accommodations is equal protection doctrine inconsistent?

6. The Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) and the Religious Land

Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The Religious Freedom Restoration Act was held unconstitutional with respect to state legislation, but remains applicable to federal legislation. See Gonzales v. O’Centro Espírita Beneficiente Unidão, 546 U.S. 418 (2005). For a controversial application of the Act, see Burwell v. Hobby Lobby Stores, Inc., __ U.S. __ (2014) (rejecting the argument that, with respect to those entitled to raise RFRA claims, the statute “did no more than codify this Court’s pre-Smith precedents” and holding that a closely held, for-profit corporation with religious objections to certain forms of birth control was entitled to a statutory exemption from a requirement that any insurance policy it provided to its workers cover contraception).

The RLUIPA, enacted in 2000, provides, “No government shall impose a substantial burden on the religious exercise of a person residing in or confined to an institution,” unless the burden furthers “a compelling governmental interest” by “the least restrictive means.” Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. 709 (2005), rejected a facial establishment clause challenge to this provision of the RLUIPA, finding it to be a permissible accommodation of religion “because it alleviates exceptional government-created burdens on private religious exercise.” The provision “covers state-run institutions [in] which the government exerts a degree of control unparalleled in civilian society and severely disabling to private religious exercise.” Institutionalized persons are “dependent on the government’s permission and accommodation for exercise of their religion.” The Court interpreted the statutory standards to conform to prior constitutional decisions indicating that “an accommodation must be measured so that it does not override other significant interests. [We] have no cause to believe that RLUIPA would not be applied in an appropriately balanced way, with particular sensitivity to security concerns.” Citing Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003), the Court observed that “[c]ontext matters” in applying the statutory “compelling government interest” standard, and quoted legislative history indicating that “[l]awmakers supporting [the act] were mindful of the urgency of discipline, order, safety, and security in penal institutions” and “anticipated that courts would apply the Act’s standard with ‘due deference’” to the judgment of prison administrators. “Should inmate requests for religious accommodations become excessive, impose unjustified burdens on other institutionalized persons, or jeopardize the effective functioning of an institution, the facility would be free to resist the imposition. In that event, adjudication in as-applied challenges would be in order.”

E. FREE EXERCISE, FREE SPEECH, AND THE RIGHT OF EXPRESSIVE ASSOCIATION

HOSANNA-TABOR EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH & SCHOOL v. EEOC, 565 U.S. 171 (2012). Cheryl Perich was a “called” teacher at a school operated by the Lutheran Church. “Called” teachers completed special training, including theological study. Most of Perich’s classes were in secular subjects, but she did teach a religion class. After Perich took disability leave for narcolepsy, her employer asked that she resign. She refused and informed the school that she had consulted a lawyer. The school then fired her, citing among other things her threats to take legal action. Perich filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which after an investigation sued the school for retaliating against Perich for threatening to file her lawsuit under the Americans with Disabilities Act. The school sought dismissal of the EEOC lawsuit, invoking the “ministerial exemption.” That exemption, written into some nondiscrimination statutes but not the ADA’s antiretaliation provision, is available to religious institutions in connection with the employment of “ministers.”

Chief Justice Roberts, writing for a unanimous Court, held that both the establishment and free exercise clauses required that religious institutions be able to invoke a ministerial exemption, and that Perich was a minister within the constitutionally required exemption. “The members of a religious group put their faith in the hands of their ministers. Requiring a church to accept or retain an unwanted minister, or punishing a church for failing to do so, intrudes upon more than a mere employment decision. Such action interferes with the internal governance of the church, depriving the church of control over the selection of those who will personify its beliefs. [This] infringes the Free Exercise Clause, which protects a religious group’s right to shape its own faith and mission through its appointments. According to the state the power to determine which individuals will minister to the faithful also violates the Establishment Clause, which prohibits government involvement in such ecclesiastical decisions.”

The Court found “untenable” the position that church interests were adequately protected by the right of expressive association implicit in the first amendment. That position would lead to the conclusion that “the First Amendment analysis should be the same, whether the association in question is the Lutheran Church, a labor union, or a social club. That result is hard to square with the text of the First Amendment itself, which gives special solicitude to the rights of religious organizations.” Although the ADA’s antiretaliation provision was “a valid and neutral law of general applicability,” Employment Division v. Smith was inapposite because it “involved government regulation of only outward physical acts. The present case [concerns] government interference with an internal church decision that affects the faith and mission of the church itself.”

The Court refused “to adopt a rigid formula for deciding when an employee qualifies as a minister. It is enough for us to conclude [that] the exception covers Perich. [Hosanna-Tabor] held Perich out as a minister, with a role distinct from that of most of its members. [Her] title as a minister reflected a significant degree of religious training followed by a formal process of commissioning. [Her] job duties reflected a role in conveying the Church’s message and carrying out its mission.” Concurring, Justice Thomas wrote that “the Religion Clauses require civil courts [to] defer to a religious organization’s good-faith understanding of who qualifies as a minister. [The] question of whether an employee is a minister is itself religious in nature, and the answer will vary widely. Judicial attempts to fashion a civil definition of ‘minister’ through a bright-line test or multi-factor analysis risk disadvantaging those religious groups whose beliefs, practices, and membership are outside of the ‘mainstream’ or unpalatable to some.” Also concurring, Justice Alito, joined by Justice Kagan, wrote that defining who was a minister “should focus on the function performed by persons who work for religious bodies,” and “[should] apply to any ‘employee’ who leads a religious organization, conducts worship services or important religious ceremonies or rituals, or serves as a messenger or teacher of its faith.”

Note: The Relation between the Religion Clauses and Other Protections of Expression

1. The scope of exemption. The justices discussed how to determine who was a minister for purposes of the constitutionally required exemption. What are the criteria for determining whether an entity is a church entitled to the exemption?

2. Free exercise versus other protected first amendment rights? Many activities associated with religion are forms of expression, either expressly (prayer) or as action that can be described as symbolic speech (some or all religious rituals). Would the analysis of the restriction on the use of peyote in Smith differ were that use characterized as symbolic speech? Conversely, why is a decision to hire or fire an employee not an “outward physical act”? Could the restriction on ritual sacrifice invalidated in Hialeah be characterized as discrimination against expressive activity based on its content? Epps, What We Talk about When We Talk about Free Exercise, 30 Ariz. St. L.J. 563, 577–578 (1998), argues that distinctive free exercise issues arise only in connection with “rituals that are of a concededly religious nature with symbolic content but for which there is an empirical basis to believe that [the] ritual action may also have permanent consequences in the physical world.”

3. The right of expressive association. Had Congress not exempted it from regulation, would the right to expressive association of the church employer in Amos be violated by applying the antidiscrimination law to its workers in the nonprofit gymnasium? In a profit-making activity associated with the church? What accommodations, permissible under the Court’s doctrine, would be required not by the free exercise clause as interpreted in Smith but by the right of expressive association? Is there a principled reason for distinguishing churches as expressive associations from other expressive associations such as labor unions? Is the textual basis for such a distinction strong enough to outweigh legislative judgments that all expressive associations should be required to conform to neutral laws of generally applicability, subject to a balancing test responsive to the concern that invoking such a law would interfere with the organization’s ability to disseminate its message? See Magarian, Justice Stevens, Religion, and Civil Society, 2011 Wis. L. Rev 733. For a discussion of the right of expressive association, see Chapter 7, section E5, supra.

Observing that “[to] say that the Establishment Clause requires the [ministerial] exemption is to say that regulation of a religious institution violates the Establishment Clause[, which] is very odd,” and that “[interference] with religious practice naturally raises Free Exercise concerns, but it is unclear how such regulation establishes a religion,” Bhagwat, Religious Associations: Hosanna-Tabor and the Instrumental Value of Religious Groups, 92 Wash. U. L. Rev. 73, 84 (2014), argues that the decision, while correct, should have rested on a more vigorous application of the right of expressive association.

4. Content- or viewpoint-based discrimination. Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981), invoked the free speech clause to require a state university to make its facilities available to a student prayer group, just as it would make them available to other groups seeking to use the public forum it created. The Court held that a policy of “nondiscrimination against religious speech” would not violate the establishment clause. See also Lamb’s Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District, 508 U.S. 384 (1993), invalidating a school district’s restriction on the after-hours use of its facilities by religious groups, finding the restriction viewpoint-based; Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995), invalidating a university policy authorizing payment from the Student Activities Fund for the printing costs of a variety of student publications, but prohibiting payment for any student publication that “primarily promotes or manifests a particular belief in or about a deity or an ultimate reality.” These cases find no establishment clause problem because, according to Lamb’s Chapel, “There would have been no realistic danger that the community would think that the District was endorsing religion or any particular creed.” See also Capitol Square Review & Advisory Board v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995), finding no establishment clause violation in allowing a private group to display a Latin cross on public property and therefore requiring the board to permit the display.

Consider these comments on Rosenberger and related cases:

The student Christian group won the funding of printing for its publication but at the price of having its religious message reduced to the commonality of every other form of human speech. [The] petitioners were willing to give up the special status that religion is otherwise granted. [By] wishing not to deny religion its place in a marketplace of ideas, the Court denied the special place held by religion in our constitutional framework. [If] “preaching the word” [is] only speech, it is outside the restraints of the Establishment Clause. But “preaching the word” is not mere speech; it is religion and must, therefore, suffer the inconvenience of full protection only when disassociated from the power of government....

The concept of equal treatment [sounds] alluringly democratic, pluralistic, and fair. [But] in fact it may signal the triumph of the postmodern relativist mind in which every statement is of equal value to any other. One’s religious beliefs would be protected equally and at the same level as one’s right to [live] in a certain [neighborhood]. [One’s] religious faith will become on par with every other worldview and life belief. [Equality] is a hallmark of American democracy, but it should not rule in every case.

Davis, A Commentary on the Supreme Court’s “Equal Treatment” Doctrine as the New Constitutional Paradigm for Protecting Religious Liberty, 46 J. Church & St. 717, 720–721, 736–737 (2004). For a related view, see Gellman and Looper-Friedman, Thou Shalt Use the Equal Protection Clause for Religion Cases (Not Just the Establishment Clause), 10 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 666 (2008). Justice White, the only dissenter in Widmar, criticized the Court for arguing that “religious worship qua speech is not different from any other variety of protected speech. [This] proposition is plainly wrong. Were it right, the Religion Clauses would be emptied of any independent meaning in which religious practice took the form of speech.” He would have distinguished between “verbal acts of worship and other verbal acts,” saying that “the line may be difficult to draw in many cases,” but that doing so was necessary in order to avoid the result that the university could “offer a class entitled ‘Sunday Mass,’ [indistinguishable] from a class entitled ‘The History of the Catholic Church.’” The Court responded by noting that the distinction between worship and speech about religion had no “intelligible content” because “there is no indication when ‘singing hymns, reading scripture, and teaching biblical principles’ cease to be [‘speech,’] despite their religious subject matter [and] become ‘worship.’”

The Equal Access Act, 20 U.S.C. §4071 (1984), provides, “It shall be unlawful for any public secondary school which receives Federal financial assistance and which has a limited open forum to deny equal access [to] any students who wish to conduct a meeting within that limited open forum on the basis of the religious, political, philosophical, or other content of the speech at such meetings.” A limited open forum is created when the school allows “noncurriculum related student groups to meet on school premises during noninstructional time.” The Court upheld the constitutionality of the Equal Access Act in Board of Education of Westside Community Schools v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226 (1990). Justice O’Connor’s plurality opinion on the constitutional question concluded that “the logic of Widmar applies” to the Equal Access Act. Prohibiting discrimination on the basis of political as well as religious speech was a secular purpose under Lemon. Equal access would not have the effect of conveying a message of government endorsement of religion. “We think that secondary school students are mature enough and are likely to understand that a school does not endorse or support student speech that it merely permits on a nondiscriminatory basis.” Congress had made a similar determination, and Justice O’Connor said that the Court should not “lightly second-guess [legislative] judgments, particularly where the judgments are based in part on empirical determinations,” as this one was. She noted that “the broad spectrum of officially recognized student groups [counteracts] any possible message of official endorsement of or preference for religion or a particular religion. [To] the extent that a religious club is merely one of many different student-initiated voluntary clubs, students should perceive no message of government endorsement of religion.”

5. Religion in politics.

a. Church members as political actors. Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961), invalidated a provision in the Maryland Constitution requiring state officials to declare their belief in the existence of God. “[Neither] a State nor the Federal Government can constitutionally force a person ‘to profess a belief or disbelief in any religion’ [and] neither can aid those religions based on a belief in the existence of God as against those religions founded on different beliefs.”

In McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618 (1978), the Court invalidated, without dissent, a provision of the Tennessee Constitution barring ministers from serving as legislators or as delegates to the state’s constitutional convention. Chief Justice Burger's plurality opinion reviewed the history of such disqualifications, which were in effect in seven of the original states and which were adopted by six states later admitted to the Union. Disqualification was designed "to assure the success of a new political experiment, the separation of church and state." But "as the value of the disestablishment experiment was perceived, 11 of the 13 States [gradually] abandoned that limitation," until by 1900 only Maryland and Tennessee retained it. The opinion continued, "[The] right to the free exercise of religion unquestionably encompasses the right to preach [and] to be a minister." If the disqualification "were viewed as depriving the clergy of a civil right solely because of their religious beliefs," Torcaso would control. But the disqualification was triggered by the minister's status, defined "in terms of conduct and activity rather than in terms of belief." Thus, the relevant precedent was Yoder, which required an "interest of the highest order." But the state had "failed to demonstrate that [the] dangers of clergy participation in the political process have not lost whatever validity they may once have enjoyed. [The] American experience provides no persuasive support for the fear that clergymen in public office will be less careful of anti-establishment interests or less faithful to their oaths of civil office than their unordained counterparts."

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall and Justice Stewart, submitted separate concurring opinions arguing that Torcaso controlled. Justice Brennan wrote, "[Freedom] of belief [embraces] freedom to profess or practice that belief, even including doing so to earn a livelihood." Tennessee's rule was therefore "absolutely prohibited," and no balancing of interests was required. Justice Brennan argued that public debate of religious ideas [may] arouse emotion, [but] the mere fact that a purpose of the Establishment Clause is to reduce or eliminate religious divisiveness or strife, does not place religious discussion, association, or political participation in a status less preferred than rights of [political] participation generally. [Religionists] no less than members of any other group enjoy the full measure of protection afforded speech. [The] antidote which the Constitution provides against zealots who would inject sectarianism into the political process is to subject their ideas to refutation in the market-place of ideas and their platforms to rejection at the polls. With these safeguards [and] with judicial enforcement of the Establishment Clause, any measure of success they achieve must be short-lived, at best.

Justice White concurred in the judgment, relying on the equal protection clause rather than the free exercise clause, because he did not see how the minister “has been deterred in the observance of his religious beliefs.”

What result in McDaniel under the free speech clause? Is the confidence expressed by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Brennan in the political process warranted? Should a state be precluded from taking a more jaundiced view of the efficacy of the political process in matters of religion?

b. Churches as political actors. Larkin v. Grendel’s Den, 459 U.S. 116 (1982), held unconstitutional a statute granting churches and schools the power to veto the issuance of liquor licenses to restaurants within five hundred feet of the church or school buildings. The Court acknowledged the “interest in being insulated from certain kinds of commercial establishments,” but found that delegating the veto power to churches had the effect of advancing religion and “provides a significant symbolic benefit to religion in the minds of some.” Further, the statute “enmeshes churches in the exercise of substantial governmental powers.” Note that delegation of similar authority to other private organizations is unlikely to raise federal constitutional questions.

Justice Souter, writing only for a plurality in Kiryas Joel, regarded the New York statute as a delegation of state power to a religious institution, barred by Larkin. Justice Scalia’s dissent called “breathtaking” this “steamrolling of the difference between civil authority held by a church, and civil authority held by members of a church.” It “boils down to the quite novel proposition that any group of citizens (say, the residents of Kiryas Joel) can be invested with political power, but not if they all belong to the same religion. Of course such disfavoring of religion is positively antagonistic to the purposes of the Religion Clauses.”

Note: Concluding Observations

Do the preceding materials demonstrate that contemporary religion clause doctrine is hostile to religion in the name of neutrality? In a religiously pluralist nation with an expansive government, is neutrality toward religion possible? Are the two religion clauses incompatible in such a nation? The establishment clause requires (some sort of) neutrality, while the free exercise clause requires (some sort of) preference to religion and may permit other preferences. Does the concept of benevolent neutrality reconcile the clauses? When does a permissible benevolence become a prohibited encouragement? Consider whether the religion clauses are incompatible because of religious pluralism: Any purported benevolent encouragement of some or many religions will discourage others; given the range of actions required by some religions and prohibited by others, no regulation can be neutral in its effects as between some religions and others or between religion and nonreligion.

2 Some commentators have suggested that by targeting laws respecting “an” establishment of religion, the Framers adopted the very nonpreferentialist position whose much clearer articulation they repeatedly rejected. See, e.g., R. Cord, Separation of Church and State 11–12. Yet the indefinite article before the word “establishment” is better seen as evidence that the Clause forbids any kind of establishment, including a nonpreferential one. If the Framers had wished, for some reason, to use the indefinite term to achieve a narrow meaning for the Clause, they could far more aptly have placed it before the word “religion.” See Laycock, “Nonpreferential” Aid to Religion: A False Claim About Original Intent, 27 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 875, 884–885 (1986).

3 In his dissent in Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985), the Chief Justice rested his nonpreferentialist interpretation partly on the post-ratification actions of the early national government. Aside from the willingness of some (but not all) early presidents to issue ceremonial religious proclamations, which were at worst trivial breaches of the establishment clause, he cited such seemingly preferential aid as a treaty provision, signed by Jefferson, authorizing federal subsidization of a Roman Catholic priest and church for the Kaskaskia Indians. But this proves too much, for if the establishment clause permits a special appropriation of tax money for the religious activities of a particular sect, it forbids virtually nothing. See Laycock, “Nonpreferential” Aid 915. Although evidence of historical practice can indeed furnish valuable aid in the interpretation of contemporary language, acts like the one in question prove only that public officials [can] turn a blind eye to constitutional principle.

5 [The] “proscription” to which Jefferson referred was [by] the public and not the government, whose only action was a noncoercive recommendation. And one can call any act of endorsement a form of coercion, but only if one is willing to dilute the meaning of “coercion” until there is no meaning left. Jefferson’s position straightforwardly contradicts the claim that a showing of “coercion,” under any normal definition, is a prerequisite to a successful establishment clause claim. At the same time, Jefferson’s practice, like Madison’s, sometimes diverged from principle, for he did include religious references in his inaugural speeches. Homer nodded....

6 As a practical matter, of course, anytime the government endorses a religious belief there will almost always be some pressure to conform. “When the power, prestige and financial support of government is placed behind a particular religious belief, the indirect coercive pressure upon religious minorities to conform to the prevailing officially approved religion is plain.” Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 431 (1962). [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

12 Justice Brennan states that “by focusing on the holiday ‘context’ in which the crèche appear[s],” the Court seeks to “explain away the clear religious import of the crèche,” and that it has equated the crèche with a Santa’s house or a talking wishing well. Of course this is not true. [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

1 Both lines of cases have specifically adverted to the non-free exercise principle involved.
...

2 Justice O’Connor seeks to distinguish Lyng [and] Roy, on the ground that those cases involved the government’s conduct of “its own internal affairs,” which is different because, as Justice Douglas said in Sherbert, “the Free Exercise Clause is written in terms of what the government cannot do to the individual, not in terms of what the individual can exact from the government.” [It] is hard to see any reason in principle or practicality why the government should have to tailor its health and safety laws to conform to the diversity of religious belief, but should not have to tailor its management of public lands, or its administration of welfare programs.

3 [Just] as we subject to the most exacting scrutiny laws that make classifications based on race, or on the content of speech, so too we strictly scrutinize governmental classifications based on religion, see McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618 (1978). But we have held that race-neutral laws that have the effect of disproportionately disadvantaging a particular racial group do not thereby become subject to compelling-interest analysis under the Equal Protection Clause, see Washington v. Davis, and we have held that generally applicable laws unconcerned with regulating speech that have the effect of interfering with speech do not thereby become subject to compelling interest analysis under the First Amendment....

4 [Dispensing] with a “centrality” inquiry is utterly unworkable. [There] is no way out of the difficulty that, if general laws are to be subjected to a “religious practice” exception, both the importance of the law at issue and the centrality of the practice at issue must reasonably be considered. [Relocated footnote.—Eds.]

6 [Respondents’] use of peyote seems closely analogous to the sacramental use of wine by the Roman Catholic Church. During Prohibition, the Federal Government exempted such use of wine from its general ban on possession and use of alcohol. However compelling the Government’s then general interest in prohibiting the use of alcohol may have been, it could not plausibly have asserted an interest sufficiently compelling to outweigh Catholics’ right to take communion.

7 The use of peyote is, to some degree, self-limiting. The peyote plant is extremely bitter, and eating it is an unpleasant experience, which would tend to discourage casual or recreational use.

8 Over the past years, various sects have raised free exercise claims regarding drug use. In no reported case, except those involving claims of religious peyote use, has the claimant prevailed.

15 Undoubtedly, [appellee’s] freedom of choice in religious matters was impinged upon, but it was the Church[, and] not the Government, who put him to the choice of changing his religious practices or losing his job. This is a very different case than Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, Inc., 472 U.S. 703 (1985). In Caldor, the Court struck down a Connecticut statute prohibiting an employer from requiring an employee to work on a day designated by the employee as his Sabbath. In effect, Connecticut had given the force of law to the employee’s designation of a Sabbath day and required accommodation by the employer regardless of the burden which that constituted for the employer or other employees....

State Action

It is a commonplace that the commands of the Constitution are directed to governmental entities, not to private parties. This observation leads to the “state action” requirement: When private individuals or companies act, they are generally free from constitutional restrictions. The text of the Constitution seems to support this conclusion; it generally applies to governments, not to private actors.

Is there a good reason for this limitation on the Constitution’s reach? On a standard view, the limitation is based on the judgment that government is generally uniquely powerful and dangerous—far more so than private entities. Government is what we have most to fear. One reason (it is often said) is that it has a monopoly on the legitimate use of force. In any case, the limitation of constitutional requirements to state actors is unquestionably important. Every day, it affects the reach of the Constitution.

Note, however, that for at least two reasons the state action limitation, standing by itself, may tell us less than we might think. First, there is a sense in which the state action requirement is merely a truism. The Constitution must be directed to state actors, because if it were directed solely to private parties, there would be no enforceable means to make those parties obey constitutional commands. For example, the thirteenth amendment prohibition against slavery is sometimes said to be an exception to the state action doctrine; even private acts of enslavement are unconstitutional. But the thirteenth amendment must be read as a directive to government officials to punish enslavement; otherwise, the right not to be enslaved would be meaningless.

Second, and more fundamentally, the statement that the Constitution controls only government conduct tells us nothing about what the Constitution requires the government to do. Perhaps some constitutional provisions require government to control private conduct. Even if a private person’s denial of equal treatment to African Americans does not itself violate the fourteenth amendment, it remains possible that the state’s decision to permit private persons to deny equal treatment to African Americans violates that amendment. Whether it does so depends on what the fourteenth amendment means. The state action doctrine says that the government and not some private person must be the defendant. But it does not say that the government is under no obligation to stop private people from injuring other people. In fact, it is generally agreed that states violate the equal protection clause if they protect whites against murder and assault but fail to protect African Americans against murder and assault.

To have meaning, then, the state action doctrine must be supplemented by some substantive ideas about the meaning of relevant constitutional provisions. This chapter examines the Court's efforts to develop these ideas.

A. STATE ACTION, FEDERALISM, AND INDIVIDUAL AUTONOMY

A state action requirement might be thought to define an area that must remain beyond the reach of national power—at least national judicial power. Consider, for example, Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 936 (1982):

Careful adherence to the “state action” requirement preserves an area of individual freedom by limiting the reach of federal law and federal judicial power. [A] major consequence is to require the courts to respect the limits of their own power as directed against state governments and private interests. Whether this is good or bad policy, it is a fundamental fact of our political order.

The notion that “limiting the reach of federal law” serves to “preserve individual freedom” has considerable appeal, but it is not an uncontroversial one. The fourteenth amendment, for example, was premised to some degree on the opposite assumption—that an extension of federal law was essential to the preservation of individual rights. See Chapter 5, section A, supra. Nonetheless, the Court’s analysis of the state action issue has long been influenced by the assumed link among individual freedom, state action requirements, and restrictions on federal power. Indeed, this “fundamental fact of our political order” was central to the Court’s earliest effort to articulate a state action doctrine.

1. State Action and Federalism

The modern Court has held that state action is a prerequisite to the assertion of rights contained in both the first eight amendments (originally applicable only to the federal government) and the fourteenth amendment (applicable to the states).

But historically the requirement attracted little attention until passage of the Reconstruction amendments after the Civil War.

After the ratification of these amendments, the Court was required to decide the extent to which they changed the traditional balance between state and federal authority. One view was that the new amendments gave the federal government plenary authority to protect individual rights—against both public and private actors. A second view was that the amendments left untouched the states’ traditional functions and authorized federal intervention only when the states defaulted in their primary obligations. See Chapter 5, section A2, supra.

The Court’s earliest state action decision looked to principles of federalism to give content to the doctrine.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS CASES, 109 U.S. 3 (1883). The Civil Rights Act of 1875 provided that all persons were “entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances, on land or water, theatres, and other places of public amusement; subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.” Private persons violating these rights were subject to civil damages and criminal penalties. The constitutionality of the act was challenged on the ground that it was not authorized by any substantive grant of power to the federal government. In an eight-to-one decision, the Court agreed and invalidated the act.

Justice Bradley delivered the Court’s opinion: “Has Congress constitutional power to make such a law? Of course, no one will contend that the power to pass it was contained in the Constitution before the adoption of the [thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth] amendments....

“[The] fourteenth amendment is prohibitory in its character, and prohibitory upon the states. [Individual] invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment....

“[The Civil Rights Act, in contrast,] proceeds ex directo to declare that certain acts committed by individuals shall be deemed offences, and shall be prosecuted and punished by proceedings in the courts of the United States. It does not profess to be corrective of any constitutional wrong committed by the states. [It] applies equally to cases arising in States which have the justest laws respecting the personal rights of citizens, and whose authorities are ever ready to enforce such laws, as to those which arise in States that may have violated the prohibition of the amendment. In other words, it steps into the domain of local jurisprudence and lays down rules for the conduct of individuals in society towards each other, and imposes sanctions for the enforcement of those rules, without referring in any manner to any supposed action of the State or its authorities....

“The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any [State] authority, is simply a private wrong, or a crime of that individual; an invasion of the rights of the injured party, it is true, whether they affect his person, his property, or his reputation; but if not sanctioned in some way by the State, or not done under State authority, his rights remain in full force, and may presumably be vindicated by resort to the laws of the State for redress. An individual cannot deprive a man of his right to vote, to hold property, to buy and sell, to sue in the courts, or to be a witness or a juror; he may, by force or fraud, interfere with the enjoyment of the right in a particular case; [but] unless protected in these wrongful acts by some shield of State law or State authority, he cannot destroy or injure the right; he will only render himself amenable to satisfaction or punishment; and amenable therefor to the laws of the State where the wrongful acts are committed.”

Defenders of the act also relied on Congress’s power to enforce the thirteenth amendment, which abolished slavery. The Court agreed that the thirteenth amendment, unlike the fourteenth, authorized legislation that was “primary and direct in its character; for the amendment is not a mere prohibition of State laws establishing or upholding slavery, but an absolute declaration that slavery or involuntary servitude shall not exist in any part of the United States.”

Nonetheless, the Court concluded that the statute was not authorized under the thirteenth amendment because the refusal to serve a person in a public accommodation was no more than an ordinary civil injury and not a badge of slavery. “[Such] an act of refusal has nothing to do with slavery or involuntary servitude, and [if] it is violative of any right of the party, his redress is to be sought under the laws of the State; or if those laws are adverse to his rights and do not protect him, his remedy will be found in the corrective legislation which Congress has adopted, or may adopt, for counteracting the effect of State laws, or State action, prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment. It would be running the slavery argument into the ground to make it apply to every act of discrimination which a person may see fit to make as to the guests he will entertain, or as to the people he will take into his coach or cab or car, or admit to his concert or theatre, or deal with in other matters of intercourse or business....

“When a man has emerged from slavery, and by the aid of beneficent legislation has shaken off the inseparable concomitants of that state, there must be some stage in the progress of his elevation when he takes the rank of a mere citizen, and ceases to be the special favorite of the law, and when his rights as a citizen, or a man, are to be protected in the ordinary modes by which other men's rights are protected."

Only Justice Harlan dissented from the Court's opinion: "The [majority] opinion in these cases proceeds, it seems to me, upon grounds entirely too narrow and artificial. I cannot resist the conclusion that the substance and spirit of the recent amendments of the Constitution have been sacrificed by a subtle and ingenious verbal criticism....

"[Since] slavery [was] the moving or principal cause of the adoption of [the thirteenth] amendment, and since that institution rested wholly upon the inferiority, as a race, of those held in bondage, their freedom necessarily involved immunity from, and protection against, all discrimination against them, because of their race, in respect of such civil rights as belong to freemen of other races. Congress, therefore, under its express power to enforce that amendment, by appropriate legislation, may enact laws to protect that people against the deprivation, because of their race, of any civil rights granted to other freemen in the same State; and such legislation may be of a direct and primary character, operating upon States, their officers and agents, and, also upon, at least, such individuals and corporations as exercise public functions and wield power and authority under the State....

"The assumption that [the fourteenth] amendment consists wholly of prohibitions upon State laws and State proceedings in hostility to its provisions, is unauthorized by its language. The first clause of the first section—'All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the State wherein they reside'—is of a distinctly affirmative character....

"The citizenship thus acquired by [the black] race, in virtue of an affirmative grant from the nation, may be protected, not alone by the judicial branch of the government, but by congressional legislation of a primary direct character; this, because the power of Congress is not restricted to the enforcement of prohibitions upon State law or State action. It is, in terms distinct and positive, to enforce 'the provisions of this article' of the amendment; not simply those of a prohibitive character, but the provisions—all of the provisions—affirmative and prohibitive, of the amendment....

"It is, I submit, scarcely just to say that the colored race has been the special favorite of the laws. The statute of 1875, now adjudged to be unconstitutional, is for the benefit of citizens of every race and color. What the nation, through Congress, has sought to accomplish in reference to that race is,—what had already been done in every State of the Union for the white race—to secure and protect rights belonging to them as freemen and citizens; nothing more.

“[Today] it is the colored race which is denied, by corporations and individuals wielding public authority, rights fundamental in their freedom and citizenship. At some future time, it may be that some other race will fall under the ban of race discrimination. If the constitutional amendments be enforced, according to the intent with which, as I conceive, they were adopted, there can not be, in this republic any class of human beings in practical subjection to another class, with power in the latter to dole out to the former just such privileges as they may choose to grant.”

Note: Federalism and the Substantive Content of the State Action Doctrine

The Court has long read The Civil Rights Cases to establish “the essential dichotomy [between] deprivation by the State, subject to scrutiny under [the fourteenth amendment,] and private conduct [against] which the Fourteenth Amendment offers no shield.” Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 349 (1974). And the Court in The Civil Rights Cases did assert that “[individual] invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the [fourteenth] amendment.” But by itself this proposition tells us little about what should count as a state invasion of individual rights.

Perhaps it counts as a state invasion of individual rights for a state to fail to remedy acts of racial discrimination undertaken by owners of public accommodations who are required by state law to serve the public. Consider in this regard the Court’s argument in The Civil Rights Cases that a wrongful act, unsupported by state authority, cannot by itself violate legal rights so long as the victim can look to state law for redress; consider especially its complaint that the 1875 act “applies equally to cases arising in States which have the justest laws respecting the personal rights of citizens, and whose authorities are ever ready to enforce such laws, as to those which arise in States that may have violated the prohibition of the amendment.” Is the Court suggesting that the national government might control private discrimination if the states are failing to do so?

Consider also Justice Bradley’s comments on the fourteenth amendment in correspondence with Circuit Judge (later Justice) Wood, written twelve years before he authored the majority opinion in The Civil Rights Cases: “[The fourteenth amendment] not only prohibits the making or enforcing of laws which shall abridge the privileges of the citizen; but prohibits the states from denying to all persons within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. [Denying] includes inaction as well as action. And denying the equal protection of the laws includes the omission to protect, as well as the omission to pass laws for protection.” (The correspondence is quoted in Bell v. Maryland, 378 U.S. 226, 309–310 (1964) (Goldberg, J., concurring).)

Under this view of the matter, The Civil Rights Cases may stand for the proposition that the states are the primary guarantors of the rights of their citizens, and that the federal government may protect those rights if—but only if—the states fail to do so. Note that this position suggests both a broad and a narrow conception of federal power. It is broad in the sense that it treats state failures to act as state action for purposes of the fourteenth amendment; it is narrow in the sense that it incorporates a federalism-based limit on the federal government’s power to act.

This view was, however, severely qualified, and perhaps even rejected, in United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000), where the Court held that the Violence against Women Act was beyond congressional power under the fourteenth amendment. Congress defended the act, which created a federal cause of action by victims against perpetrators of “a crime of violence motivated by gender,” in part on the ground that states had not provided sufficient “protection” against such crimes, and hence a federal cause of action was necessary to ensure equal protection of the laws. The Court acknowledged legislative findings of bias in state criminal justice systems, but emphasized that Congress could not reach private conduct, which the act purported to do, by making ordinary people defendants. This appears to be an authoritative ruling that Congress cannot reach private conduct under section 5 of the fourteenth amendment even when states are failing to provide protection.

To the claim that the civil action was necessary to counteract state discrimination, the Court said that the remedy did not have a “congruence and proportionality” to the injury sought to be prevented. The act “visits no consequence whatever on any [state official] involved in investigating or prosecuting” sex-related crimes. Because it did not punish state officials, and because it “applies uniformly throughout the nation,” it was different from other cases in which Congress was allowed, under section 5 of the fourteenth amendment, to proceed prophylactically.

If states in fact fail to provide “equal protection” to women who are subject to violence, why isn’t a federal civil rights action against private actors a perfectly reasonable response, not to private action, but to violations of “equal protection” on the part of the states?

2. State Action and Individual Autonomy

Morrison makes clear that the state action limitation cannot be reduced to the federalism idea that the national government can protect rights only when the states fail to do so. Might we look instead to principles about the scope of individual autonomy to give substantive content to the limitation?

According to this view, the Constitution is designed primarily to protect individual freedom. Without some sort of state action doctrine, private autonomy would be subject to the same limitations as government autonomy. Instead of protecting individual rights from legislative interference, the Constitution might subject them to judicial interference.

It is easy to imagine the extreme consequences that might follow. Newspapers, radio stations, websites, and social media pages might be prohibited from promoting their preferred point of view. Social clubs and private homeowners might be precluded from choosing their guests on political or racial grounds. Is that troublesome? If so, might these consequences be avoided by a different interpretation of the relevant constitutional provision? Consider in this regard Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS) v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973). Respondents claimed that the refusal of broadcasters to accept their editorial advertisements violated the first amendment. The Federal Communications Commission rejected this contention and refused to require that broadcasters accept such advertisements. The Court agreed with the commission.

In a portion of his plurality opinion joined by only two other justices, Chief Justice Burger argued that the first amendment claim failed because the broadcasters' decision could not be attributed to the government:

Were we to read the First Amendment to spell out governmental action in the circumstances presented here, few licensee decisions on the content of broadcasts or the processes of editorial evaluation would escape constitutional scrutiny....

[It] would be anomalous for us to hold, in the name of promoting the constitutional guarantees of free expression, that the day-to-day editorial decisions of broadcast licensees are subject to the kind of restraints urged by respondents. To do so in the name of the First Amendment would be a contradiction. Journalistic discretion would in many ways be lost to the rigid limitations that the First Amendment imposes on Government. Application of such standards to broadcast licensees would be antithetical to the very ideal of vigorous, challenging debate on issues of public interest.

The result in CBS maximizes the journalistic freedom of broadcasters, who need not account to a court or government agency for their editorial decisions.

But it arguably does so at the expense of the freedom of those wishing to present editorial advertisements, who may be prevented from securing a forum. Can the state action requirement be understood as the Court's technique for balancing the conflicting rights of private individuals in cases such as CBS? For an argument along these lines, see Glennon and Nowak, A Functional Analysis of the Fourteenth Amendment "State Action" Requirement, 1976 Sup. Ct. Rev. 221.

How should a court go about striking this balance? In cases where some substantive constitutional provision limits the government's power to act, the answer may appear to be easy. For example, it would almost certainly be unconstitutional for the government to dictate editorial policies to newspapers. Similarly, Justice Bradley believed that the federal government lacked the constitutional power to regulate the "private" conduct in question in the Civil Rights Cases. If it is unconstitutional for the government to act in these cases, it must be constitutional for it not to act.

"Easy" cases may be atypical, however. More often, a finding of no state action means only that the Constitution does not of its own force regulate the private activity. It does not follow from such a finding that the private actor is constitutionally immune from legislative regulation.

For example, in CBS, Chief Justice Burger suggested elsewhere in his opinion that Congress could require networks to accept editorial advertising. Similarly, in Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976), the Court held that the decision of a privately owned shopping center to exclude peaceful picketers could not be attributed to the government and, therefore, did not violate the first amendment. But in PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74 (1980), the Court rejected a shopping center owner's first amendment objection when a state chose to outlaw such exclusions.

Is there a coherent theory of individual autonomy that explains these results? Such a theory would have to explain why the government should not be held accountable for outcomes that it could, but chooses not to, change. It would have to distinguish between state "action" that impermissibly interferes with private autonomy and state "inaction" that allows such interference to go uncorrected.

The next section explores the Court's attempt to formulate such a theory.

B. PURE INACTION AND THE THEORY OF GOVERNMENTAL NEUTRALITY

In Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345 (1974), Justice Rehnquist, writing for the Court, summarized state action jurisprudence as follows:

[The state action] inquiry must be whether there is a sufficiently close nexus between the State and the challenged action of the [private] entity so that the action of the latter may be fairly treated as that of the State itself. The true nature of the State's involvement may not be immediately obvious, and detailed inquiry may be required to determine whether the test is met.

Typically, the Court has organized this “detailed inquiry” under two rubrics. (1) Sometimes (though rarely!) the Court finds that a private actor must be subject to constitutional requirements because the state has delegated a traditional state (or “public”) function to a private entity. (2) Sometimes the Court finds that a private actor must be subject to constitutional requirements (a) because the state has become entangled with a private entity or (b) because the state has approved, encouraged, or facilitated private conduct. Cases decided under these rubrics are considered below. Note, however, that the nexus inquiry is relevant only if one is attempting to make the state responsible for what is otherwise private conduct. When the state itself is acting—when, in other words, the state’s involvement is “immediately obvious”—no further inquiry is necessary.

Unfortunately, though, this formulation involves some oversimplification. In virtually every “state action” case, it is possible to find some “immediately obvious” conduct of the state that contributes in some way to the alleged constitutional violation. For example, state officials stand ready to enforce background tort and criminal rules that inevitably will favor one party to a dispute rather than the other. If this state involvement “counted” as state action, the state would always be responsible for private conduct. Consequently, before exploring ways in which private conduct is attributed to the state, it is necessary to explore in more detail the concept of state inaction.

1. Pure Inaction

DESHANEY v. WINNEBAGO COUNTY DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES, 489 U.S. 189 (1989). When petitioner Joshua DeShaney was one year old, a Wyoming court granted his parents a divorce and awarded custody to his father. Shortly thereafter the father moved to Winnebago County, Wisconsin. Two years later respondent social workers working for Winnebago County began receiving reports that the father was physically abusing Joshua. The caseworkers carefully noted each of these reports, as well as Joshua’s suspicious injuries, but took no action to remove him from his father’s custody. Eventually, when Joshua was four years old, his father beat him so severely that he suffered permanent brain injuries that left him profoundly retarded and confined to an institution for life. This was an action brought by Joshua and his mother claiming that the state's conduct deprived him of his liberty in violation of the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment.

Justice Rehnquist delivered the Court's opinion: "[Nothing] in the language of the Due Process Clause itself requires the State to protect the life, liberty, and property of its citizens against invasion by private actors. The Clause is phrased as a limitation on the State's power to act, not as a guarantee of certain minimal levels of safety and security. [Nor] does history support such an expansive reading of the constitutional text. [Its] purpose was to protect the people from the State, not to ensure that the State protected them from each other. The Framers were content to leave the extent of governmental obligation in the latter area to the democratic political processes....

"Petitioners contend, however, that even if the Due Process Clause imposes no affirmative obligation on the State to provide the general public with adequate protective services, such a duty may arise out of certain 'special relationships' created or assumed by the State with respect to particular individuals....

"We reject this argument. It is true that in certain limited circumstances the Constitution imposes upon the State affirmative duties of care and protection with respect to particular individuals....

"[But these cases] stand only for the proposition that when the State takes a person into its custody and holds him there against his will, the Constitution imposes upon it a corresponding duty to assume some responsibility for his safety and general well-being. [The] affirmative duty to protect arises not from the State's knowledge of the individual's predicament or from its expressions of intent to help him, but from the limitation which it has imposed on his freedom to act on his own behalf.

"Judges and lawyers, like other humans, are moved by natural sympathy in a case like this to find a way for Joshua and his mother to receive adequate compensation for the grievous harm inflicted upon them. But before yielding to that impulse, it is well to remember once again that the harm was inflicted not by the state of Wisconsin, but by Joshua's father. [In] defense of [the state officials] it must also be said that had they moved too soon to take custody of the son away from the father, they would likely have been met with charges of improperly intruding into the parent-child relationship, charges based on the same Due Process Clause that forms the basis for the present charge of failure to provide adequate protection."

Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall and Blackmun, dissented: "It may well be, as the Court decides, that the Due Process Clause as construed by our prior cases creates no general right to basic governmental services. That, however, is not the question presented here....

“In a constitutional setting that distinguishes sharply between action and inaction, one’s characterization of the misconduct alleged [may] effectively decide the case. Thus, by leading off with a discussion (and rejection) of the idea that the Constitution imposes on the States an affirmative duty to take basic care of their citizens, the Court foreshadows—perhaps even preordains—its conclusion that no duty existed even on the specific facts before us....

“The Court’s baseline is the absence of positive rights in the Constitution and a concomitant suspicion of any claim that seems to depend on such rights. From this perspective, the DeShaneys’ claim is first and foremost about inaction (the failure, here, of respondents to take steps to protect Joshua), and only tangentially about action (the establishment of a state program specifically designed to help children like Joshua). And from this perspective, holding these Wisconsin officials liable—where the only difference between this case and one involving a general claim to protective services is Wisconsin’s establishment and operation of a program to protect children—would seem to punish an effort that we should seek to promote.

“I would begin from the opposite direction. I would focus first on the action that Wisconsin has taken with respect to Joshua and children like him, rather than on the actions that the State failed to take....

“Wisconsin law invites—indeed, directs—citizens and other governmental entities to depend on local departments of social services such as respondent to protect children from abuse....

“In these circumstances, a private citizen, or even a person working in a government agency other than [the Department of Social Services] would doubtless feel that her job was done as soon as she had reported her suspicions of child abuse to [the department]. If [the department] ignores or dismisses these suspicions, no one will step in to fill the gap. [Conceivably], then, children like Joshua are made worse off by the existence of this program when the persons and entities charged with carrying it out fail to do their jobs.”

Justice Blackmun also filed a dissenting opinion.

Flagg Brothers v. Brooks

436 U.S. 149 (1978)

MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented by this litigation is whether a warehouseman’s proposed sale of goods entrusted to him for storage, as permitted by New York Uniform Commercial Code §7-210, is an action properly attributable to the State of New York. [Section 7-210 provides that after proper notification, a warehouseman may satisfy a lien on goods in his possession by selling the goods.]

I

[When respondent Brooks was evicted from her apartment, the city marshal arranged for storage of her possessions in petitioner's warehouse. After a series of disputes over the validity of petitioner's charges for moving and storage, petitioner sent Brooks a letter threatening sale of the possessions. Brooks thereupon initiated this action, claiming, inter alia, that the sale pursuant to section 7-210 without a prior judicial hearing would violate the due process clause. She relied on a series of decisions in which the Court had held that due process requires that debtors be afforded a hearing before a creditor can utilize remedies involving the deprivation of property. See North Georgia Finishing, Inc. v. Di-Chem, Inc., 419 U.S. 601 (1975); Fuentes v. Shevin, 407 U.S. 67 (1972); Sniadach v. Family Finance Corp., 395 U.S. 337 (1969). Brooks was later joined in her action by respondent Jones, whose goods had also been stored by petitioner following her eviction.]

II

[It] must be noted that respondents have named no public officials as defendants in this action. The city marshal, who supervised their evictions, was dismissed from the case by the consent of all the parties. This total absence of overt official involvement plainly distinguishes this case from earlier decisions imposing procedural restrictions on creditors' remedies such as [North Georgia Finishing; Fuentes; and Sniadach]. In those cases, the Court was careful to point out that the dictates of the Due Process Clause "attac[h] only to the deprivation of an interest encompassed within the Fourteenth Amendment's protection." [Fuentes.] While as a factual matter any person with sufficient physical power may deprive a person of his property, only a State or a private person whose action "may be fairly treated as that of the State itself," [Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345 (1974)], may deprive him of "an interest encompassed within the Fourteenth Amendment's protection" [Fuentes]. Thus, the only issue presented by this case is whether Flagg Brothers' action may fairly be attributed to the State of New York. We conclude that it may not.

III

Respondents' primary contention is that New York has delegated to Flagg Brothers a power "traditionally exclusively reserved to the State." [Jackson.] They argue that the resolution of private disputes is a traditional function of civil government, and that the State in §7-210 has delegated this function to Flagg Brothers. Respondents, however, have read too much into the language of our previous cases. While many functions have been traditionally performed by governments, very few have been "exclusively reserved to the State." ...

[The] proposed sale by Flagg Brothers under §7-210 is not the only means of resolving this purely private dispute. Respondent Brooks has never alleged that state law barred her from seeking a waiver of Flagg Brothers' right to sell her goods at the time she authorized their storage. Presumably, respondent Jones, who alleges that she never authorized the storage of her goods, could have sought to replevy her goods at any time under state law. The challenged statute itself provides a damages remedy against the warehouseman for violations of its provisions. This system of rights and remedies, recognizing the traditional place of private arrangements in ordering relationships in the commercial world, can hardly be said to have delegated to Flagg Brothers an exclusive prerogative of the sovereign.¹⁰

Whatever the particular remedies available under New York law, we do not consider a more detailed description of them necessary to our conclusion that the settlement of disputes between debtors and creditors is not traditionally an exclusive public function.¹¹ ...

IV

Respondents further urge that Flagg Brothers' proposed action is properly attributable to the State because the State has authorized and encouraged it in enacting §7-210. [This] Court, however, has never held that a State's mere acquiescence in a private action converts that action into that of the State.

[It] is quite immaterial that the State has embodied its decision not to act in statutory form. If New York had no commercial statutes at all, its courts would still be faced with the decision whether to prohibit or to permit the sort of sale threatened here the first time an aggrieved bailor came before them for relief. [If] the mere denial of judicial relief is considered sufficient encouragement to make the State responsible for those private acts, all private deprivations of property would be converted into public acts whenever the State, for whatever reason, denies relief sought by the putative property owner.

[Here,] the State of New York has not compelled the sale of a bailor's goods, but has merely announced the circumstances under which its courts will not interfere with a private sale. Indeed, the crux of respondents' complaint is not that the State has acted, but that it has refused to act. This statutory refusal to act is no different in principle from an ordinary statute of limitations whereby the State declines to provide a remedy for private deprivations of property after the passage of a given period of time.

[Reversed.]

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN took no part in the consideration or decision in these cases.

[Justice Marshall's dissenting opinion is omitted.]

MR. JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom MR. JUSTICE WHITE and MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL join, dissenting....

[The] question is whether a state statute which authorizes a private party to deprive a person of his property without his consent must meet the requirements of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. This question must be answered in the affirmative unless the State has virtually unlimited power to transfer interests in private property without any procedural protections....

In determining that New York's statute cannot be scrutinized under the Due Process Clause, the Court reasons that the warehouseman's proposed sale is solely private action because the state statute "permits but does not compel" the sale (emphasis added), and because the warehouseman has not been delegated a power "exclusively reserved to the State" (emphasis added). Under this approach a State could enact laws authorizing private citizens to use self-help in countless situations without any possibility of federal challenge. A state statute could authorize the warehouseman to retain all proceeds of the lien sale, even if they far exceeded the amount of the alleged debt; it could authorize finance companies to enter private homes to repossess merchandise; or indeed, it could authorize "any person with sufficient physical power," to acquire and sell the property of his weaker neighbor. An attempt to challenge the validity of any such outrageous statute would be defeated by the reasoning the Court uses today: The Court's rationale would characterize action pursuant to such a statute as purely private action, which the State permits but does not compel, in an area not exclusively reserved to the State.

As these examples suggest, the distinctions between "permission" and "compulsion" on the one hand, and "exclusive" and "nonexclusive," on the other, cannot be determinative factors in state-action analysis. There is no great chasm between “permission” and “compulsion” requiring particular state action to fall within one or the other definitional camp. [In] this case, the State of New York, by enacting §7-210 of the Uniform Commercial Code, has acted in the most effective and unambiguous way a State can act. This section specifically authorizes petitioner Flagg Brothers to sell respondents’ possessions; it details the procedures that petitioner must follow; and it grants petitioner the power to convey good title to goods that are now owned by respondents to a third party.

[Cases] such as North Georgia Finishing must be viewed as reflecting this Court’s recognition of the significance of the State’s role in defining and controlling the debtor-creditor relationship. The Court’s language to this effect in the various debtor-creditor cases has been unequivocal. In Fuentes v. Shevin the Court stressed that the statutes in question “abdicated effective state control over state power.” And it is clear that what was of concern in Shevin was the private use of state power to achieve a nonconsensual resolution of a commercial dispute.

[It] is important to emphasize that, contrary to the Court’s apparent fears, this conclusion does not even remotely suggest that “all private deprivations of property [will] be converted into public acts whenever the State, for whatever reason, denies relief sought by the putative property owner.” The focus is not on the private deprivation but on the state authorization. “[W]hat is always vital to remember is that it is the state’s conduct, whether action or inaction, not the private conduct, that gives rise to constitutional attack.” Friendly, The Dartmouth College Case and The Public-Private Penumbra, 12 Texas Quarterly, No. 2, p. 17 (1969) (Supp.) (emphasis in original). The State’s conduct in this case takes the concrete form of a statutory enactment, and it is that statute that may be challenged....

Finally, it is obviously true that the overwhelming majority of disputes in our society are resolved in the private sphere. But it is no longer possible, if it ever was, to believe that a sharp line can be drawn between private and public actions.

[In] the broadest sense, we expect government “to provide a reasonable and fair framework of rules which facilitate commercial transactions....” This “framework of rules” is premised on the assumption that the State will control non-consensual deprivations of property and that the State’s control will, in turn, be subject to the restrictions of the Due Process Clause. The power to order legally binding surrenders of property and the constitutional restrictions on that power are necessary corollaries in our system. In effect, today’s decision allows the State to divorce these two elements by the simple expedient of transferring the implementation of its policy to private parties. Because the Fourteenth Amendment does not countenance such a division of power and responsibility, I respectfully dissent.

LUGAR v. EDMONDSON OIL CO., 457 U.S. 922 (1982). Lugar was indebted to Edmondson Oil, a company that sued him in state court. Ancillary to that action, and pursuant to state law, Edmondson Oil filed an ex parte petition for prejudgment attachment of certain of Lugar's property. Acting on the petition, the clerk of the state court issued a writ of attachment, which was executed by the county sheriff. This effectively sequestered Lugar's property, although he remained in possession of it. The state court subsequently held a hearing on the propriety of the attachment and ordered it dismissed because Edmondson had failed to establish the statutory grounds for it. Lugar thereupon brought this federal action, alleging that Edmondson had acted jointly with the state to deprive him of his property without due process of law. In a five-to-four decision, the Court distinguished Flagg Brothers and held that Lugar had alleged sufficient state involvement to make out a due process violation.

Justice White delivered the Court's opinion: "Beginning with [Sniadach], the Court has consistently held that constitutional requirements of due process apply to garnishment and prejudgment attachment procedures whenever officers of the State act jointly with a creditor in securing the property in dispute. [In] each of these cases state agents aided the creditor in securing the disputed property; but in each case the federal issue arose in litigation between creditor and debtor in the state courts and no state official was named as a party. Nevertheless, in each case the Court entertained and adjudicated the defendant-debtor's claim that the procedure under which the private creditor secured the disputed property violated federal constitutional standards of due process. Necessary to that conclusion is the holding that private use of the challenged state procedures with the help of state officials constitutes state action for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment....

"Our cases have [insisted] that the conduct allegedly causing the deprivation of a federal right be fairly attributable to the State. These cases reflect a two-part approach to this question of 'fair attribution.' First, the deprivation must be caused by the exercise of some right or privilege created by the State or by a rule of conduct imposed by the State or by a person for whom the State is responsible. [Second], the party charged with the deprivation must be a person who may fairly be said to be a state actor. This may be because he is a state official, because he has acted together with or has obtained significant aid from state officials, or because his conduct is otherwise chargeable to the State. Without a limit such as this, private parties could face constitutional litigation whenever they seek to rely on some state rule governing their interactions with the community surrounding them....

“Flagg Brothers focused on the [second] component of the state-action principle. [Undoubtedly] the State was responsible for the statute [authorizing Flagg Brothers’ conduct]. The response of the Court, however, focused not on the terms of the statute but on the character of the defendant: [Action] by a private party pursuant to this statute, without something more, was not sufficient to justify a characterization of that party as a ‘state actor.’....

“While private misuse of a state statute does not describe conduct that can be attributed to the State, the procedural scheme created by the statute obviously is the product of state action....

“[We] have consistently held that a private party’s joint participation with state officials in the seizure of disputed property is sufficient to characterize that party as a ‘state actor’ for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment.”

Justice Powell, joined by Justices Rehnquist and O’Connor, dissented: “[The Court] holds that respondent, a private citizen who did no more than commence a legal action of a kind traditionally initiated by private parties, thereby engaged in ‘state action.’ This decision is as unprecedented as it is implausible. It is plainly unjust to the respondent, and the Court makes no argument to the contrary. Respondent, who was represented by counsel, could have had no notion that his filing of a petition in state court, in the effort to secure payment of a private debt, made him a ‘state actor’ liable in damages for allegedly unconstitutional action by the Commonwealth of Virginia....

“[It] is not disputed that the Virginia Sheriff and Clerk of Court, the state officials who sequestered petitioner’s property in the manner provided by Virginia law, engaged in state action. Yet petitioner, while alleging constitutional injury from this action by state officials, did not sue the State or its agents....

“From the occurrence of state action taken by the Sheriff who sequestered petitioner’s property, it does not follow that respondent became a ‘state actor’ simply because the Sheriff was. This Court, until today, has never endorsed this non sequitur.”

Chief Justice Burger filed a separate dissenting opinion.

Note: The Problem of the Passive State

1. “Pure” inaction. At the beginning of his opinion for the Court in DeShaney, Justice Rehnquist characterizes the due process clause as “a limitation on the State’s power to act, [rather than] a guarantee of certain minimal levels of safety and security.” Similarly, in Flagg Brothers he observes that “the crux of respondents’ complaint is not that the State has acted, but that it has refused to act.” Even if we assume that the state’s involvement in these disputes can be fairly characterized as a “mere” refusal to act, why should that fact make a constitutional difference? Does the Constitution always permit the government to acquiesce passively in an existing situation? Consider the view that whether the Constitution permits government to do this is a question about the meaning of the relevant constitutional provision, and that any “state action” doctrine is unhelpful in answering that question.

Many equal protection cases can be characterized as involving state inaction. For example, in Plyler v. Doe, Chapter 6, section E5, supra, the Court held that the state’s failure to provide public education for “undocumented” immigrant children violated the equal protection clause. Although the Court was narrowly divided on the substantive equal protection issue, not even the dissenters claimed that the challenge should fail because of the absence of state action. Of course, the state’s failure to act in these situations is embedded in a context where the state is also acting; discrimination claims involve selective inaction. But is it fair to characterize New York and Wisconsin as wholly passive with regard to the disputes in DeShaney and Flagg Brothers? Didn’t the state take some affirmative steps?

2. Natural law and “invisible” state action. None of the DeShaney opinions focused on the most direct way in which state action “positively” contributed to Joshua DeShaney’s injury: the network of statutes and common law rules that grant custody and control of minor children to their biological parents. (State responsibility for this outcome is particularly obvious on the facts of DeShaney, where a state court, albeit in Wyoming rather than in Wisconsin, had adjudicated a custody dispute regarding the boy in connection with his parents’ divorce.) Consider whether the state action doctrine has embedded within it unarticulated baselines formed by natural law assumptions about the “rightness” of certain initial allocations—such as the allocation of children to their biological parents—and whether these assumptions blind the court to state action that creates or maintains this “natural” state of affairs. Consider the possibility that the state action doctrine thus depends not at all on whether there has been state action, but on whether the state has deviated from a course of action that seems natural or desirable.

Compare DeShaney to Baltimore City Department of Social Services v. Bouknight, 493 U.S. 549 (1990), where the Court rejected the argument that a parent of a child under court supervision could invoke the fifth amendment privilege against compelled incrimination to refuse to produce the child.

Bouknight, like DeShaney, involved a parent who had previously abused her biological child and who was under court supervision. But whereas in DeShaney the Court deemed irrelevant the governmental conduct relating to child custody decisions, that conduct was crucial to the result in Bouknight. The Court analogized childrearing to heavily regulated industries, where the fifth amendment privilege has generally been available in only diluted form:

When a person assumes control over items that are the legitimate object of the government's non-criminal regulatory powers, the ability to invoke the privilege is reduced....Once Maurice was adjudicated a child in need of assistance, his care and safety became the particular object of the States' regulatory interests....The government demands production of the very public charge entrusted to a custodian, and makes the demand for compelling reasons unrelated to criminal law enforcement and as part of a broadly applied regulatory regime.

The Bouknight Court did not cite DeShaney—a case decided a year earlier. Are the two cases consistent?

3. Statutes as state action. In Flagg Brothers, the legislature had enacted a statute granting Flagg Brothers the right to sell the furniture. Why isn't this state action? Is the Court correct that the existence of the statute is "quite immaterial" because it merely "embodie[s] the state's] decision not to act"? Sniadach and Lugar make clear that sometimes, judicial enforcement of statutory mandates at the behest of private parties does amount to state action. So long as courts stand ready to enforce the statutory mandate, why should it matter whether the parties actually resort to judicial enforcement?

Compare Reitman v. Mulkey, 387 U.S. 369 (1967). Between 1959 and 1963, California enacted various fair housing acts that prohibited racial discrimination in the sale or rental of private dwellings. In 1964, through the initiative process, California voters enacted Proposition 14, which amended the state's constitution to prohibit the state from denying the "right of any person [to] decline to sell, lease or rent [property] to such person or persons as he, in his absolute discretion, chooses." Respondents, alleging that petitioners had refused to rent them an apartment because of their race, brought an action in state court based on the fair housing acts. They contended that Proposition 14, which had the effect of repealing the acts, violated the equal protection clause. The California Supreme Court ruled in their favor, and in a five-to-four decision, the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed.

The Court, in an opinion by Justice White, agreed with petitioners that the mere repeal of a statute prohibiting racial discrimination was not unconstitutional. (The Court did not make entirely clear whether this would be because the repeal would not implicate sufficient state action or whether it would be because it would not violate the equal protection clause.) But the California Supreme Court had not read either our cases or the Fourteenth Amendment as establishing an automatic constitutional barrier to the repeal of an existing law prohibiting racial discrimination in housing. [The state court] held the intent of [Proposition 14] was to authorize private racial discrimination in the housing market, to repeal the [fair housing acts] and to create a constitutional right to [discriminate]....

[Private] discriminations in housing were now not only free from [the antidiscrimination statutes] but they also enjoyed far different status than was true before the passage of those statutes. The right to discriminate, including the right to discriminate on racial grounds, was now embodied in the State's basic charter, immune from legislative, executive, or judicial regulation at any level of the state government. Those practicing racial discriminations need no longer rely solely on their personal choice. They could now invoke express constitutional authority, free from censure or interference of any kind from official sources.

Justice Harlan, joined by Justices Black, Clark, and Stewart, dissented:

[A]ll that has happened is that California has effected a pro tanto repeal of its prior statutes forbidding private discrimination. This runs no more afoul of the Fourteenth Amendment than would have California's failure to pass any such antidiscrimination statutes in the first instance. The fact that such repeal was also accompanied by a constitutional prohibition against future enactment of such laws by the California Legislature cannot well be thought to affect, from a federal constitutional standpoint, the validity of what California has done. The Fourteenth Amendment does not reach such state constitutional action any more than it does a simple legislative repeal of legislation forbidding private discrimination.

Can Reitman and Flagg Brothers be reconciled?

4. Flagg Brothers and Lugar. Does Lugar provide an adequate explanation for the result in Flagg Brothers? The Court's opinion in Lugar at least has the virtue of recognizing the obvious—that is, that the conduct of the state legislature in enacting a statute is “state action” for purposes of the Constitution. But according to Lugar, the state action problem in Flagg Brothers was created by the fact that the actual defendant before the Court was a private actor who was merely invoking his statutory rights. In Lugar, of course, the defendant was also a private party. But, there, the defendant had relied on state assistance to assert his rights, and this joint conduct was sufficient to make the private party a state actor for constitutional purposes.

Does this distinction make sense? How did the private petitioners in Reitman rely on state assistance in asserting their rights? Recall that the state activity in Lugar did not involve any actual shift in possession of the property in question. The sheriff merely served on Lugar a piece of paper announcing Lugar's legal obligations. Would the situation be functionally different if these obligations were embodied in a statute and Lugar read of them in a codification printed by the state?

5. Tarkanian and Brentwood Academy. Compare Flagg Brothers and Lugar with National Collegiate Athletic Association v. Tarkanian, 488 U.S. 179 (1988), and Brentwood Academy v. Tennessee Secondary School Athletic Association, 531 U.S. 288 (2001). Tarkanian arose out of a National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) investigation of the University of Nevada, Las Vegas (a state university) and its highly successful basketball coach, Tarkanian, for violations of NCAA rules.

Under pressure from the NCAA, the university removed Tarkanian, who thereupon sued both the NCAA and the university, claiming that their conduct violated his rights to substantive and procedural due process. The lower courts found that the NCAA's conduct constituted state action subject to constitutional restraint, and that both the NCAA and the university had violated Tarkanian's constitutional rights. In a five-to-four opinion written by Justice Stevens, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the lower court insofar as it had held the NCAA constitutionally liable.

The Court began its analysis by noting that the situation "uniquely mirrors the traditional state action case," and that it required the court "to step through an analytical looking glass to resolve it." In more typical cases, such as Lugar and Flagg Brothers, a private party has taken steps that cause harm to the plaintiff, and the issue is whether the state was sufficiently involved to treat this private conduct as state action. Here, in contrast, the university—concededly a state actor—had suspended Tarkanian. "Thus, the question is not whether [the university] participated to a critical extent in the NCAA's activities, but whether [the university's] actions in compliance with the NCAA rules and recommendations turned the NCAA's conduct into state action."

The Court concluded that university compliance did not transform the NCAA into a state actor. "It would be ironic indeed to conclude that the NCAA's imposition of sanctions against [the university]—sanctions that [the university] and its counsel steadfastly opposed during protracted adversary proceedings—is fairly attributable to the State of Nevada. It would be more appropriate to conclude that [the university] had conducted its athletic program under the color of policies adopted by the NCAA, rather than that those policies were developed and enforced under color of Nevada law.”

The Court distinguished Tarkanian in Brentwood Academy, a five-to-four decision written by Justice Souter. The case involved a statewide association incorporated to regulate interscholastic athletic competition among public and private secondary schools. On this occasion, the Court held that the association was a state actor. It distinguished Tarkanian as follows:

[The] NCAA’s policies were shaped not by the University of Nevada alone, but by several hundred member institutions, most of them having no connection with Nevada, and exhibiting no color of Nevada law. Since it was difficult to see the NCAA, not as a collective membership, but as surrogate for the one State, we held the organization’s connection with Nevada too insubstantial to ground a state action claim.

But dictum in Tarkanian pointed to a contrary result on facts like ours, with an organization whose member public schools are all within a single State. “The situation would, of course, be different if the [Association’s] membership consisted entirely of institutions located within the same State, many of them public institutions created by the same sovereign.”...

Just as we foresaw in Tarkanian, the “necessarily fact-bound inquiry” [Lugar] leads to the conclusion of state action here. The nominally private character of the Association is overborne by the pervasive entwinement of public institutions and public officials in its composition and workings.

6. Pope. Consider also the Court’s reading of Lugar and Flagg Brothers in Tulsa Professional Collection Services v. Pope, 485 U.S. 478 (1988). Oklahoma’s probate laws require that claims arising under a contract be presented to the executor of the estate within two months of the publication of a notice advising creditors of the commencement of probate proceedings. A creditor who had not received actual notice and failed to file a claim within two months argued that the constructive notice provision violated due process. In an opinion by Justice O’Connor, the Court held that the creditor had a property interest that was protected by the due process clause. It went on to note, however, that the fourteenth amendment protected this interest only from deprivation by state action. On the state action question, it summarized the holdings of Lugar and Flagg Brothers as follows:

Private use of state sanctioned private remedies and procedures does not rise to the level of state action, see, e.g., [Flagg Brothers]. Nor is the state's involvement in the mere running of a general statute of limitation generally sufficient to implicate due process. [But] when private parties make use of state procedures with the overt, significant assistance of state officials, state action may be found. See, e.g., [Lugar].

The Court went on to hold that, although the mere state promulgation of the limitation period would not constitute state action (what does this mean?), the probate court's "pervasive and substantial" involvement with the probate proceedings was sufficient.

It may appear that Pope's "pervasive and substantial" involvement test is inconsistent with Lugar. Consider the possibility that Pope is distinguishable because the creditor was invoking the Constitution to secure the affirmative assistance of the state in Pope, while the debtor was invoking the Constitution to ward off state interference in Lugar. Taken together, do Pope and Lugar mean Ms. Brooks could have broken into Flagg Brothers' warehouse, stolen the furniture, and then successfully asserted the unconstitutionality of section 7-210 as a defense to a criminal prosecution?

2. Judicial Action and the Theory of Government Neutrality

Shelley v. Kraemer

334 U.S. 1 (1948)

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE VINSON delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases present for our consideration questions relating to the validity of court enforcement of private agreements, generally described as restrictive covenants, which have as their purpose the exclusion of persons of designated race or color from the ownership or occupancy of real property. Basic constitutional issues of obvious importance have been raised....

[In each of the two cases before the Court, black families had purchased homes burdened by restrictive covenants, signed by property owners in the neighborhood, that prohibited occupancy by nonwhites. Respondents brought these actions in state court seeking to specifically enforce the covenant provisions. In each case, the state court upheld the provision and ruled that respondents were entitled to an injunction prohibiting petitioners from occupying the property.]

It cannot be doubted that among the civil rights intended to be protected from discriminatory state action by the Fourteenth Amendment are the rights to acquire, enjoy, own and dispose of property. Equality in the enjoyment of property rights was regarded by the framers of that Amendment as an essential precondition to the realization of other basic civil rights and liberties which the Amendment was intended to guarantee. Thus, [42 U.S.C. §1982], derived from §1 of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 which was enacted by Congress while the Fourteenth Amendment was also under consideration, provides:

All citizens of the United States shall have the same right, in every State and Territory, as is enjoyed by white citizens thereof to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property....

It is likewise clear that restrictions on the right of occupancy of the sort sought to be created by the private agreements in these cases could not be squared with the requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment if imposed by state statute or local ordinance. We do not understand respondents to urge the contrary....

But the present cases [do] not involve action by state legislatures or city councils. Here the particular patterns of discrimination and the areas in which the restrictions are to operate, are determined, in the first instance, by the terms of agreements among private individuals. Participation of the State consists in the enforcement of the restrictions so defined. The crucial issue with which we are here confronted is whether this distinction removes these cases from the operation of the prohibitory provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Since the decision of this Court in the Civil Rights Cases, the principle has become firmly embedded in our constitutional law that the action inhibited by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment is only such action as may fairly be said to be that of the States. That Amendment erects no shield against merely private conduct, however discriminatory or wrongful.

We conclude, therefore, that the restrictive agreements standing alone cannot be regarded as violative of any rights guaranteed to petitioners by the Fourteenth Amendment. So long as the purposes of those agreements are effectuated by voluntary adherence to their terms, it would appear clear that there has been no action by the State and the provisions of the Amendment have not been violated.

But here there was more. These are cases in which the purposes of the agreements were secured only by judicial enforcement by state courts of the restrictive terms of the agreements.

[That] the action of state courts and judicial officers in their official capacities is to be regarded as action of the State within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, is a proposition which has long been established by decisions of this Court....

One of the earliest applications of the prohibitions contained in the Fourteenth Amendment to action of state judicial officials occurred in cases in which Negroes had been excluded from jury service in criminal prosecutions by reason of their race or color. These cases demonstrate, also, the early recognition by this Court that state action in violation of the Amendment's provisions is equally repugnant to the constitutional commands whether directed by state statute or taken by a judicial official in the absence of statute. Thus, in Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303 (1880), this Court declared invalid a state statute restricting jury service to white persons as amounting to a denial of the equal protection of the laws to the colored defendant in that case. In the same volume of the reports, the Court in Ex parte Virginia, [100 U.S. 339 (1880)], held that a similar discrimination imposed by the action of a state judge denied rights protected by the Amendment, despite the fact that the language of the state statute relating to jury service contained no such restrictions.

The action of state courts in imposing penalties or depriving parties of other substantive rights without providing adequate notice and opportunity to defend, has, of course, long been regarded as a denial of the due process of law guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

In numerous cases, this Court has reversed criminal convictions in state courts for failure of those courts to provide the essential ingredients of a fair hearing....

But the examples of state judicial action which have been held by this Court to violate the Amendment's commands are not restricted to situations in which the judicial proceedings were found in some manner to be procedurally unfair. It has been recognized that the action of state courts in enforcing a substantive common-law rule formulated by those courts, may result in the denial of rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment, even though the judicial proceedings in such cases may have been in complete accord with the most rigorous conceptions of procedural due process....

Against this background of judicial construction, extending over a period of some three-quarters of a century, we are called upon to consider whether enforcement by state courts of the restrictive agreements in these cases may be deemed to be the acts of those States; and, if so, whether that action has denied these petitioners the equal protection of the laws which the Amendment was intended to insure.

We have no doubt that there has been state action in these cases in the full and complete sense of the phrase. The undisputed facts disclose that petitioners were willing purchasers of properties upon which they desired to establish homes. The owners of the properties were willing sellers; and contracts of sale were accordingly consummated. It is clear that but for the active intervention of the state courts, supported by the full panoply of state power, petitioners would have been free to occupy the properties in question without restraint.

These are not cases, as has been suggested, in which the States have merely abstained from action, leaving private individuals free to impose such discriminations as they see fit. Rather, these are cases in which the States have made available to such individuals the full coercive power of government to deny to petitioners, on the grounds of race or color, the enjoyment of property rights in premises which petitioners are willing and financially able to acquire and which the grantors are willing to sell. The difference between judicial enforcement and nonenforcement of the restrictive covenants is the difference to petitioners between being denied rights of property available to other members of the community and being accorded full enjoyment of those rights on an equal footing.

Respondents urge, however, that since the state courts stand ready to enforce restrictive covenants excluding white persons from the ownership or occupancy of property covered by such agreements, enforcement of covenants excluding colored persons may not be deemed a denial of equal protection of the laws to the colored persons who are thereby affected. This contention does not bear scrutiny. The parties have directed our attention to no case in which a court, state or federal, has been called upon to enforce a covenant excluding members of the white majority from ownership or occupancy of real property on grounds of race or color. But there are more fundamental considerations. The rights created by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment are, by its terms, guaranteed to the individual. The rights established are personal rights. It is, therefore, no answer to these petitioners to say that the courts may also be induced to deny white persons rights of ownership and occupancy on grounds of race or color. Equal protection of the laws is not achieved through indiscriminate imposition of inequalities.

Nor do we find merit in the suggestion that property owners who are parties to these agreements are denied equal protection of the laws if denied access to the courts to enforce the terms of restrictive covenants and to assert property rights which the state courts have held to be created by such agreements. The Constitution confers upon no individual the right to demand action by the State which results in the denial of equal protection of the laws to other individuals. And it would appear beyond question that the power of the State to create and enforce property interests must be exercised within the boundaries defined by the Fourteenth Amendment. Cf. Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946)....

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Missouri and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Michigan must be reversed.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE REED, MR. JUSTICE JACKSON, and MR. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

Note: Shelley v. Kraemer, State Inaction, and the Theory of Government Neutrality

1. State action as a nonissue. Chief Justice Vinson devotes virtually all of his opinion to a demonstration that judicial action is “state action” within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. Why is this question hard? Suppose it is true that private agreements, taken simply as such, are not state action. How could anyone doubt that there is nonetheless state action when a state judge issues an injunction enforceable by the state marshal and ultimately supported by the threat of contempt and incarceration in a state institution? Compare Shelley v. Kraemer with New York Times v. Sullivan, Chapter 1, section D, supra, where the Court held that the first amendment required proof of “actual malice” to support libel judgments in favor of public officials. Sullivan, like Shelley, concerned the constitutionality of a state common law rule invoked in the course of private litigation. Yet in Sullivan the Court devoted only a cursory paragraph to the state action problem and focused almost all its attention on the substantive constitutional question.

2. The real issue in Shelley? Shelley is the mirror image of Sullivan. After completing his lengthy discussion of the state action question, Chief Justice Vinson devoted only a single paragraph to petitioner’s substantive contention about the meaning of the equal protection clause. But surely this is a hard question—and perhaps it is the real issue in the case. On this view, the state action question was simple; of course judicial enforcement of contracts is state action. The difficult issue was one of equal protection law. On what theory does a rule requiring uniform enforcement of any privately made covenant deny equality? Why does Chief Justice Vinson think that it is relevant that only whites have chosen to use the rule? What does he mean when he says that the equal protection clause bars the “indiscriminate imposition of inequalities”?

3. State action and the Washington v. Davis problem. Consider the following argument: As Shelley itself illustrates, it will always be possible to find some state actor implicated, in some way and at some point, in the alleged constitutional violation. The appropriate question to ask is whether, as a substantive matter, this governmental action is unconstitutional. When one asks this question in Shelley, the reason for the intense controversy over the Court's holding becomes clearer. Recall that in Washington v. Davis, Chapter 5, section C2, supra, the Court held that a statute neutral on its face should not be subject to heightened scrutiny simply because of its disproportionate racial impact. Such statutes need satisfy only low-level review unless they were enacted for a discriminatory purpose. See Chapter 5, section C2, supra.

If this is so, the question becomes: Was Missouri law regarding restrictive covenants neutral on its face in the Washington v. Davis sense? That question—the equal protection question—was the difficult one in Shelley. Consider L. Tribe, Constitutional Choices 260 (1985):

Like other states, Missouri treats most restraints on alienability of real estate as judicially unenforceable: to enforce any such restraint, a state court must first find that the substance of the restraining covenant is reasonable and consistent with public policy. Therefore, the issue is not whether any judicial enforcement of racially invidious private arrangements constitutes racially invidious state action, but whether a state may choose automatically to enforce restrictive covenants that discriminate against blacks while generally regarding alienability restraints as anathema. The real “state action” in Shelley was Missouri’s facially discriminatory body of common and statutory law—the quintessence of a racist state policy.

Compare Strauss, Discriminatory Intent and the Taming of Brown, 56 U. Chi. L. Rev. 935, 968 (1989):

[This] selective enforcement argument is not a satisfactory theoretical justification of Shelley. The argument makes Shelley contingent: it implicitly concedes that Shelley would not be correct in any state that happened to enforce all, or most, restrictive covenants. The holding of Shelley is not limited in this way, and the moral appeal of the result in Shelley [would] be very strong even in a state that enforced all restrictive covenants.

Is Shelley nonetheless consistent with Washington v. Davis because in Shelley, but not Washington, the state itself would be required to base a decision on the race of one of the litigants?

As you read the remaining material, consider the extent to which the controversy over “state action” in the equal protection context is really a controversy concerning the meaning and scope of Washington v. Davis and the principle of governmental neutrality that it embodies. When the Court says that there is no “state action,” is it really saying that the state action is facially neutral and therefore not subject to heightened review?

4. The reach of Shelley. It would be a mistake to read some of the more sweeping language in Shelley literally. There are certainly situations in which an individual can invoke judicial processes to effectuate a discriminatory intent. It is safe to assume that no court would inquire into the racist motives of an individual invoking state trespass laws against uninvited dinner guests at a private home.

Is there something about restrictive covenants that makes the invocation of judicial processes especially troublesome in that context? Is it relevant that a network of restrictive covenants operates as the functional equivalent of zoning laws and therefore serves an essentially “governmental” function? (The “public function” strand of state action jurisprudence is discussed in section D infra.) That the state’s enforcement of the covenant prevented a willing buyer and seller from dealing with each other?

a. Governmental neutrality and the problem of money damages. Consider the award of money damages for violation of restrictive covenants. Does Shelley apply if a court imposes damages on a white seller but does not prevent the African American purchaser from securing possession? In Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249 (1953), respondent entered a restrictive covenant prohibiting the use or occupancy of his property by nonwhites. He then violated the covenant by permitting nonwhites to move into the premises. Petitioners, property owners in the same neighborhood who were also parties to the covenant, sued for damages. The Court held that Shelley barred the suit:

To compel respondent to respond in damages would be for the State to punish her for her failure to perform her covenant to continue to discriminate against non-Caucasians in the use of her property. [If] the State may thus punish respondent for her failure to carry out her covenant, she is coerced to continue to use her property in a discriminatory manner, which in essence is the purpose of the covenant. Thus, it becomes not respondent’s voluntary choice but the State’s choice that she observe her covenant or suffer damages. The action of a state court at law to sanction the validity of the restrictive covenant here involved would constitute state action as surely as it was state action to enforce such covenants in [equity].

Chief Justice Vinson, the author of Shelley, was the sole dissenter:

The Shelley case, resting on the express determination that restrictive covenants are valid between the parties, dealt only with a state court's attempt to enforce them directly against innocent third parties whose right to enjoy their property would suffer immediate harm. [In] this case, the plaintiffs have not sought such relief. The suit is directed against the very person whose solemn promise helped to bring the covenant into existence. The plaintiffs ask only that respondent do what she in turn had a right to ask of plaintiffs—indemnify plaintiffs for the bringing about of an event which she recognized would cause injury to the plaintiffs.

b. State enforcement of discriminatory testamentary and inter vivos dispositions of property. Consider Pennsylvania v. Board of Directors of City Trusts, 353 U.S. 230 (1957). In a will probated in 1831, Stephen Girard left a fund to be held in trust for erection and operation of a school for “poor white male orphans.” The will named the city of Philadelphia as the trustee, and the school was administered by a state agency. When petitioners were denied admission to the school because of their race, they brought this action. The state court denied relief, but the Supreme Court, in a brief per curiam opinion, reversed: “The Board which operates Girard College is an agency of the State of Pennsylvania. Therefore, even though the Board was acting as a trustee, its refusal to admit [petitioners] to the college because they were Negroes was discrimination by the State.”

On remand in City Trusts, the state court appointed private trustees in order to comply with the terms of Girard’s will. In Pennsylvania v. Brown, 392 F.2d 120 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 391 U.S. 921 (1968), the court of appeals held that the substitution was unconstitutional.

Compare City Trusts with Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296 (1966). In 1911, U.S. Senator Augustus O. Bacon executed a will that devised to the mayor and city council of Macon, Georgia, a tract of land to be used as a park. The will provided that the park should be used by white people only and was to be under the control of a board of managers, all of whom were to be white. At first, the city ran the park on a segregated basis, but when it began to admit blacks, members of the board of managers brought this suit asking that the city be removed as trustee. The city thereupon resigned as trustee, and the state court appointed new, private trustees to run the park. Black intervenors challenged this decision. The Supreme Court held that the park could not be run on a racially segregated basis. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Douglas, stated:

If a testator wanted to leave a school or center for the use of one race only and in no way implicated the State in the supervision, control, or management of that facility, we assume arguendo that no constitutional difficulty would be encountered. [This] park, however, is in a different posture. For years it was an integral part of the City of Macon's activities. [The] momentum it acquired as a public facility is certainly not dissipated ipso facto by the appointment of "private" trustees. So far as this record shows, there has been no change in municipal maintenance and concern over this facility. [If] the municipality remains entwined in the management or control of the park, it remains subject to the restraints of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Court went on to suggest that the park should be treated as a public institution because it was serving a "public function" and was "municipal" in character. (The "public function" strand of the state action doctrine is considered in section D infra.) Justice White concurred in the result on the ground that the trust was tainted by state legislation that validated racially discriminatory conditions. Justices Black, Harlan, and Stewart dissented.

On remand, the state court held that Senator Bacon's intention to provide a park for whites only had become impossible to fulfill. Since this limitation was, in the court's view, central to Bacon's intention, it declined to reform the trust and held instead that the trust had failed, and that the parkland reverted to the testator's heirs. In Evans v. Abney, 396 U.S. 435 (1970), the Court affirmed in a six-to-two decision. Justice Black, a dissenter in Newton, wrote for the Court: "We are of the opinion that in ruling as they did the Georgia courts did no more than apply well-settled general principles of Georgia law to determine the meaning and effect of a Georgia will." Justices Douglas and Brennan dissented.

The Court maintained that Shelley was "easily distinguishable" because "[here] the effect of the Georgia decision eliminated all discrimination against Negroes in the park by eliminating the park itself, and the termination of the park was a loss shared equally by the white and Negro citizens of Macon since both races would have enjoyed a constitutional right of equal access to the park's facilities had it continued." Compare Justice Brennan's dissenting opinion:

Shelley v. Kraemer stands at least for the proposition that where parties of different races are willing to deal with one another a state court cannot keep them from doing so by enforcing a privately devised racial restriction....

[So] far as the record shows, this is a case of a state court's enforcement of a racial restriction to prevent willing parties from dealing with one another. The decision of the Georgia courts thus, under Shelley v. Kraemer, constitutes state action denying equal protection.

The Court in Abney rejected petitioners' argument that the action of the Georgia court violates the United States Constitution in that it imposes a drastic "penalty," the "forfeiture" of the park, merely because of the city's compliance with the constitutional mandate expressed by this Court in Evans v. Newton. [We] think [that] the will of Senator Bacon and Georgia law provide all the justification necessary for imposing such a "penalty."...

[The] Georgia Supreme Court [interpreted] Senator Bacon's will as embodying a preference for termination of the park rather than its integration. Given this, the Georgia court had no alternative under its relevant trust laws, which are long standing and neutral with regard to race, but to end the Baconsfield trust and return the property to the Senator's heirs.

Compare Justice Brennan's views: "When it is as starkly clear as it is in this case that a public facility would remain open but for the constitutional command that it be operated on a nonsegregated basis, the closing of that facility conveys an unambiguous message of community involvement in racial discrimination."

Recall Palmer v. Thompson, Chapter 5, section C2, supra, decided only a year after Abney. In Palmer, Justice Black, again writing for the Court, held that a municipality's decision to close a swimming pool, rather than comply with court-ordered integration, was constitutionally permissible. Given Palmer, does anything turn on the state action analysis in Abney, or is the Abney decision, once again, fully explicable in terms of substantive equal protection doctrine?

c. State enforcement of trespass laws. Does Shelley prohibit judicial enforcement of facially neutral trespass laws at the behest of a property owner who attempts to exclude the defendants for racial reasons? This issue was posed in a series of cases involving sit-in demonstrations in racially segregated restaurants in the early 1960s. Although the Court managed to reverse all the resulting convictions, it never reached the Shelley issue. See, e.g., Bell v. Maryland, 378 U.S. 226 (1964) (convictions reversed and remanded for consideration of the effect of an intervening change in state law); Peterson v. Greenville, 373 U.S. 244 (1963) (conviction reversed because official state policy encouraged segregation). But although no majority opinion reached the issue, individual justices engaged in spirited debate about the relevance of Shelley. Consider, for example, the views of Justice Black in Bell v. Maryland, supra. Justice Black argued that [the] [Fourteenth] Amendment does not forbid a State to prosecute for crimes committed against a person or his property, however prejudiced or narrow the victim's views may be. [Such] a doctrine would [severely] handicap a State's efforts to maintain a peaceful and orderly society. Our society has put its trust in a system of criminal laws to punish lawless conduct. [Instead] of attempting to take the law into their own hands, people have been taught to call for police protection to protect their rights wherever possible. It would betray our whole plan for a tranquil and orderly society to say that a citizen, because of his personal prejudices, habits, attitudes, or beliefs, is cast outside the law's protection and cannot call for the aid of officers sworn to uphold the law and preserve the peace.

Justice Black distinguished Shelley:

It seems pretty clear that the reason judicial enforcement of the restrictive covenants in Shelley was deemed state action was not merely the fact that a state court had acted, but rather that it had acted "to deny to petitioners, on the grounds of race or color, the enjoyment of property rights in premises which petitioners are willing and financially able to acquire and which the grantors are willing to sell." [Quoting from Shelley.] [This] means that the property owner may, in the absence of a valid statute forbidding it, sell his property to whom he pleases and admit to that property whom he will; so long as both parties are willing [parties]. [But] equally, when one party is unwilling, as when the property owner chooses not to sell to a particular person or not to admit that person, then [he] is entitled to rely on the guarantee or due process of law, that is, "law of the land," to protect his free use and enjoyment of property and to know that only by valid legislation, passed pursuant to some constitutional grant of power, can anyone disturb this free use.

Shortly after Bell the public accommodations controversy was mooted when Congress enacted the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which, inter alia, prohibited racial discrimination in most places of public accommodation. In Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States, 379 U.S. 241 (1964), and Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294 (1964), the Court unanimously upheld the constitutionality of the act. See Chapter 2, section C, supra.

5. The state action issue in comparative constitutional law. Many of the world's constitutional systems have confronted the state action problem. Outside the United States, the problem is usually described as one involving the horizontal effect of constitutional norms such as procedural fairness, free expression, and nondiscrimination: In the absence of applicable statutes, to what extent do such norms apply to the actions of nongovernmental actors? (Consider why the reference to statutes is important, and note in the U.S. cases in this chapter those in which the state-action problem arises because of seeming “gaps” in statutory regulation.) Other constitutional systems deal with the problem in two ways.

a. Direct horizontal effect. The Constitution of South Africa, §8(2), provides: “A provision of the Bill of Rights binds a natural or a juristic person if, and to the extent that, it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the right and the nature of any duty imposed by the right.” Consider why this provision is so awkward in its formulation, and so apparently limited in its application.

b. Indirect horizontal effect. More commonly, constitutional courts give constitutional norms “indirect” horizontal effect. This approach originated with the German Constitutional Court, in the case of Erich Lüth, 7 BverfGE 198 (1958). Under this approach, constitutional norms do not apply of their own force to a nongovernmental actor’s actions, but they must be taken into account when the courts apply nonconstitutional statutory or common law rules to those actions. Constitutional norms, that is, must shape the interpretation of statutes and the common law. The U.S. system of federalism makes this approach unavailable to the federal courts when dealing with state law (why?). It raises questions of the extent to which interpretation influenced by constitutional norms can override the conclusions a court would reach by applying “ordinary” methods of statutory interpretation or common law development. Note in the U.S. cases in this chapter those in which the Court might have dealt with the state action problem, as it arose in connection with federal statutes, by interpreting the statutes in light of constitutional norms, and consider why the Court did not do so.

C. CONSTITUTIONALLY IMPERMISSIBLE DEPARTURES FROM NEUTRALITY: STATE SUBSIDIZATION, APPROVAL, AND ENCOURAGEMENT

1. State Subsidization of Private Conduct

Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority

365 U.S. 715 (1961)

MR. JUSTICE CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court.

In this action for declaratory and injunctive relief it is admitted that the Eagle Coffee Shoppe, Inc., a restaurant located within an off-street automobile parking building in Wilmington, Delaware, has refused to serve appellant food or drink solely because he is a Negro. The parking building is owned and operated by the Wilmington Parking Authority, an agency of the State of Delaware, and the restaurant is the Authority's lessee. Appellant claims that such refusal abridges his rights under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. [We conclude] that the exclusion of appellant under the circumstances shown to be present here was discriminatory state action in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment....

[The City of Wilmington created the Wilmington Parking Authority for the purpose of constructing parking facilities. Before beginning construction of the facility at issue here, the parking authority entered into a series of long-term leases with commercial tenants in order to provide needed capital for its debt service requirements. One such lease was made with Eagle for a period of twenty years, renewable for another ten years. The space leased to Eagle was directly accessible from the street and had no marked public entrance leading from the parking portion of the facility into the restaurant. The parking authority agreed to complete construction expeditiously, including decorative finishing of the leased premises and necessary utility connections. Eagle, in turn, spent some $220,000 to make the space suitable for its operation, and to the extent such improvements were attached to the realty, it enjoyed the parking authority's tax exemption. The lease contained no requirement that restaurant services be made available to the general public on a nondiscriminatory basis, although the parking authority had statutory authority to adopt rules respecting the use of its facilities so long as they would not impair the security of its bondholders. When the building was completed, the parking authority placed official signs in appropriate places indicating the public character of the building and flew from mastheads on the roof both the state and national flags.

[On being refused service by Eagle because of his race, appellant filed this lawsuit. The trial court granted his motion for summary judgment, but the Delaware Supreme Court reversed.]

[To] fashion and apply a precise formula for recognition of state responsibility under the Equal Protection Clause is an "impossible task" which "This Court has never attempted." Kotch v. Pilot Commrs., 330 U.S. 552, 556. Only by sifting facts and weighing circumstances can the nonobvious involvement of the State in private conduct be attributed its true significance....

[The] Delaware Supreme Court seems to have placed controlling emphasis on its conclusion [that] only some 15% of the total cost of the facility was "advanced" from public funds; that the cost of the entire facility was allocated three-fifths to the space for commercial leasing and two-fifths to parking space; that anticipated revenue from parking was only some 30.5% of the total income, the balance of which was expected to be earned by the leasing; that the Authority had no original intent to place a restaurant in the building, it being only a happenstance resulting from the bidding; that Eagle expended considerable moneys on furnishings; that the restaurant's main and marked public entrance is on Ninth Street without any public entrance direct from the parking area; and that "the only connection Eagle has with the public facility...is the furnishing of the sum of $28,700 annually in the form of rent which is used by the Authority to defray a portion of the operating expense of an otherwise unprofitable enterprise." While these factual considerations are indeed validly accountable aspects of the enterprise upon which the State has embarked, we cannot say that they lead inescapably to the conclusion that state action is not present. Their persuasiveness is diminished when evaluated in the context of other factors which must be acknowledged.

The land and building were publicly owned. As an entity, the building was dedicated to "public uses" in performance of the Authority's "essential governmental functions." 22 Del. Code, §§501, 514. The costs of land acquisition, construction, and maintenance are defrayed entirely from donations by the City of Wilmington, from loans and revenue bonds and from the proceeds of rentals and parking services out of which the loans and bonds were payable. Assuming that the distinction would be significant, the commercially leased areas were not surplus state property, but constituted a physically and financially integral and, indeed, indispensable part of the State's plan to operate its project as a self-sustaining unit. Upkeep and maintenance of the building, including necessary repairs, were responsibilities of the Authority and were payable out of public funds. It cannot be doubted that the peculiar relationship of the restaurant to the parking facility in which it is located confers on each an incidental variety of mutual benefits. Guests of the restaurant are afforded a convenient place to park their automobiles, even if they cannot enter the restaurant directly from the parking area. Similarly, its convenience for diners may well provide additional demand for the Authority's parking facilities. Should any improvements effected in the leasehold by Eagle become part of the realty, there is no possibility of increased taxes being passed on to it since the fee is held by a tax-exempt government agency. Neither can it be ignored, especially in view of Eagle's affirmative allegation that for it to serve Negroes would injure its business, that profits earned by discrimination not only contribute to, but also are indispensable elements in, the financial success of a governmental agency.

Addition of all these activities, obligations and responsibilities of the Authority, the benefits mutually conferred, together with the obvious fact that the restaurant is operated as an integral part of a public building devoted to a public parking service, indicates that degree of state participation and involvement in discriminatory action which it was the design of the Fourteenth Amendment to condemn. It is irony amounting to grave injustice that in one part of a single building, erected and maintained with public funds by an agency of the State to serve a public purpose, all persons have equal rights, while in another portion, also serving the public, a Negro is a second-class citizen, offensive because of his race, without rights and unentitled to service, but at the same time fully enjoys equal access to nearby restaurants in wholly privately owned buildings. [In] its lease with Eagle the Authority could have affirmatively required Eagle to discharge the responsibilities under the Fourteenth Amendment imposed upon the private enterprise as a consequence of state participation. But no State may effectively abdicate its responsibilities by either ignoring them or by merely failing to discharge them whatever the motive may be. It is of no consolation to an individual denied the equal protection of the laws that it was done in good faith. [By] its inaction, the Authority, and through it the State, has not only made itself a party to the refusal of service, but has elected to place its power, property and prestige behind the admitted discrimination. The State has so far insinuated itself into a position of interdependence with Eagle that it must be recognized as a joint participant in the challenged activity, which, on that account, cannot be considered to have been so "purely private" as to fall without the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Because readily applicable formulae may not be fashioned, the conclusions drawn from the facts and circumstances of this record are by no means declared as universal truths on the basis of which every state leasing agreement is to be tested. Owing to the very "largeness" of government, a multitude of relationships might appear to some to fall within the Amendment's embrace, but that, it must be remembered, can be determined only in the framework of the peculiar facts or circumstances present. [Specifically] defining the limits of our inquiry, what we hold today is that when a State leases public property in the manner and for the purpose shown to have been the case here, the proscriptions of the Fourteenth Amendment must be complied with by the lessee as certainly as though they were binding covenants written into the agreement itself....

Reversed and remanded.

[A concurring opinion by Justice Stewart and dissents by Justice Frankfurter and Justice Harlan (joined by Justice Whittaker) have been omitted.]

Note: Subsidies, Penalties, and the Search for a Baseline

1. State subsidization. Does Burton stand for the general proposition that state subsidization of discriminatory conduct is unconstitutional? On this view, the state is not obligated to prohibit or penalize such conduct, but neither is it permitted to accord benefits to those who engage in it. But surely it is not unconstitutional, for example, for the state to provide police and fire protection to establishments that discriminate. Some subsidies or benefits are acceptable. Moreover, any theory that makes “subsidies” of discriminatory conduct unconstitutional, but does not require government to impose “penalties” on such conduct, ultimately rests on our ability to distinguish between the withholding of a benefit, on the one hand, and the imposition of a burden, on the other.

Consider, for example, Norwood v. Harrison, 413 U.S. 455 (1973), in which the Court confronted a constitutional challenge to a Mississippi statutory program under which textbooks were purchased by the state and lent to students in both public and private schools, without reference to whether any participating private school had racially discriminatory policies. The Court unanimously struck down the program as applied to discriminatory schools. Defenders of the program relied on Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), which had established the constitutional right of parents to provide private education for their children. They argued that Pierce rights would be infringed by lending free textbooks to public school children but withholding them from certain private school children. The Court rejected this argument:

In Pierce, the Court affirmed the right of private schools to exist and to operate; it said nothing of any supposed right of private or parochial schools to share with public schools in state largesse, on an equal basis or otherwise. [It] is one thing to say that a State may not prohibit the maintenance of private schools and quite another to say that such schools must, as a matter of equal protection, receive state aids.

Having disposed of appellees’ argument that the textbook aid was constitutionally required, the Court went on to hold that it was constitutionally impermissible: “A State may not grant the type of tangible financial aid here involved if that aid has a significant tendency to facilitate, reinforce, and support private discrimination.” The Court was careful to note, however, that its holding did not extend to all types of state assistance:

Textbooks are a basic educational tool and, like tuition grants, they are provided only in connection with schools; they are to be distinguished from generalized services government might provide to schools in common with others. Moreover, the textbooks provided to private school students by the State in this case are a form of assistance readily available from sources entirely independent of the State. [The] State has neither an absolute nor operating monopoly on the procurement of school textbooks; anyone can purchase them on the open market.

After Norwood, would it be unconstitutional for the state to grant the same tax-exempt status to discriminatory private schools that it grants to other charitable and nonprofit institutions? See McGlotten v. Connally, 338 F. Supp. 448 (D.D.C. 1972) (tax-exempt status of discriminatory fraternal orders unconstitutional). Compare Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574 (1983) (Internal Revenue Service decision to deny tax-exempt status to private schools engaging in racial discrimination permissible as matter of statutory construction). Is there a constitutionally relevant distinction between tax exemptions for discriminatory institutions and direct monetary subsidies to them? (For a more detailed discussion of these issues in connection with the establishment and free exercise clauses of the first amendment, see Chapter 8, section B4, supra.)

One year after Norwood the Court again considered whether the provision of “generalized” government services to private discriminatory groups constituted an impermissible departure from neutrality. Gilmore v. City of Montgomery, 417 U.S. 556 (1974), arose out of the fifteen-year struggle by African Americans in Montgomery, Alabama, to desegregate the city’s public parks. After protracted litigation involving repeated efforts by the city to avoid the original desegregation order, the district court enjoined the city from allowing use of city-owned recreational facilities by any private group that was racially segregated or had a racially discriminatory admissions policy. The court of appeals sustained this order insofar as it restrained the use of city facilities by private schools when the use was “exclusive” and not in common with other citizens. With respect to “nonexclusive” use by private school children and use by nonschool groups, however, the court of appeals reversed.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Blackmun, affirmed that portion of the court of appeals decision prohibiting exclusive use of city facilities by segregated private schools. Emphasizing the city’s affirmative duty to desegregate its public schools, the Court argued that “the city’s actions significantly enhanced the attractiveness of segregated private schools, formed in reaction against the federal court school order, by enabling them to offer complete athletic programs. [We] are persuaded [that] this assistance significantly tended to undermine the federal court order mandating the establishment and maintenance of a unitary school system in Montgomery.”

With regard to nonexclusive use by school groups and use by nonschool groups, however, the Court found that the record was insufficiently developed to render a decision. To guide the district court on remand, the Court noted that nonexclusive access by segregated school groups might well undermine outstanding school desegregation orders. “For example, all-white private school basketball teams might be invited to participate in a tournament conducted on public recreational facilities with desegregated private and public school teams. [Such] assistance, although proffered in common with fully desegregated groups, might so directly impede the progress of court-ordered school desegregation within the city that it would be appropriate to fashion equitable relief.”

Use by segregated nonschool groups might also undermine the outstanding decree to desegregate park facilities:

For example, the record contains indications that there are all-white private and all-Negro public Dixie Youth and Babe Ruth baseball leagues for children, all of which use city-provided ballfields. [Were] the District Court to determine that this dual system came about as a means of evading the parks decree, or of serving to perpetuate the separate-but-equal use of city facilities on the basis of race, through the aid and assistance of the city, further relief would be appropriate.

The Court cautioned, however, that [traditional] state monopolies, such as electricity, water, and police and fire protection—all generalized governmental services—do not by their mere provision constitute a showing of state involvement in invidious discrimination. The same is true of a broad spectrum of municipal recreational facilities: parks, playgrounds, athletic facilities, amphitheaters, museums, zoos, and the like. It follows, therefore, that the portion of the District Court’s order prohibiting the mere use of such facilities by any segregated “private group, club, or organization” is invalid because it was not predicated upon a proper finding of state action.

If, however, the city or other governmental entity rations otherwise freely accessible recreational facilities, the case for state action will naturally be stronger than if the facilities are simply available to all comers without condition or reservation. Here, for example, petitioners allege that the city engages in scheduling softball games for an all-white church league and provides balls, equipment, fields, and lighting. The city's role in that situation would be dangerously close to what was found to exist in Burton, where the city "elected to place its power, property and prestige behind the admitted discrimination." We are reminded, however, that the Court has never attempted to formulate "an infallible test for determining whether the State...has become significantly involved in private discriminations" so as to constitute state action [quoting Reitman, section B1, supra].

2. State dependence on discriminatory conduct. In Burton, the Court pointed out that "profits earned by discrimination not only contribute to, but also are indispensable elements in, the financial success of a governmental agency." Should the result in Burton have been different if Eagle were able to show that its refusal to serve blacks resulted in reduced profits? If the parking authority had charged it a lower rent so as not to capture any of the profits earned from Eagle's discriminatory conduct? Justice Clark's opinion relies on the "mutual benefits" conferred by Eagle and the parking authority on each other. Note that there is a tension between the need to avoid conferring benefits on the private actor and the need to avoid public capture of the benefits from discrimination. For example, the state could avoid benefiting from the discriminatory conduct by not taxing the profits attributable to the discrimination. But by pursuing this policy, the state would in effect subsidize the discriminatory conduct. Does the need to avoid this dilemma explain the constitutional requirement that the state divorce itself entirely from discriminatory private entities when the benefits conferred are "mutual"?

3. State action as symbolism. Does the result in Burton depend on the "message" sent to the general public when a discriminatory private entity rents space in a public building? Notice Justice Clark's emphasis on the state and federal flags that flew over the parking facility. In these circumstances, is there a risk that the public would interpret Eagle's presence in the building as connoting state approval of its policies? That it would perceive Eagle as a state entity? Should the result in the case be different if the parking authority prominently posted signs stating that it did not approve of the racial policies of its tenants?

RENDELL-BAKER v. KOHN, 457 U.S. 830 (1982). Petitioners were employees of the New Perspectives School, a privately owned institution specializing in "problem" students. Nearly all of the school's students were referred to it by public institutions. It was heavily regulated by public authorities, and between 90 and 99 percent of its operating budget came from public funds.

Petitioners were discharged after disagreeing with certain school policies. They claimed that their discharge violated their constitutional rights to free speech and procedural due process. Chief Justice Burger wrote the Court's opinion:

"[The] Court of Appeals concluded that the fact that virtually all of the school's income was derived from government funding was the strongest factor to support a claim of state action. But [we] conclude that the school's receipt of public funds does not make the discharge decisions acts of the State.

"The school [is] not fundamentally different from many private corporations whose business depends primarily on contracts to build roads, bridges, dams, ships, or submarines for the government. Acts of such private contractors do not become acts of the government by reason of their significant or even total engagement in performing public contracts....

"[The] decisions to discharge the petitioners were not compelled or even influenced by any state regulation. Indeed, in contrast to the extensive regulation of the school generally, the various regulators showed relatively little interest in the school's personnel matters....

"[Petitioners] argue that there is a 'symbiotic relationship' between the school and the State similar to the relationship involved in Burton. [But] in Burton, the Court [stressed] that the restaurant was located on public property and that the rent from the restaurant contributed to the support of the garage. In response to the argument that the restaurant's profits, and hence the State's financial position, would suffer if it did not discriminate, the Court concluded that this showed that the State profited from the restaurant's discriminatory conduct. The Court viewed this as support for the conclusion that the State should be charged with the discriminatory actions. Here the school's fiscal relationship with the State is not different from that of many contractors performing services for the government. No symbiotic relationship such as existed in Burton exists here."

Justice White wrote a separate opinion concurring in the judgment.

Justice Marshall, with whom Justice Brennan joined, dissented: "The State has delegated to the New Perspectives School its statutory duty to educate children with special needs. The school receives almost all of its funds from the State, and is heavily regulated. This nexus between the school and the State is so substantial that the school's action must be considered state action. I therefore dissent."

SAN FRANCISCO ARTS & ATHLETICS, INC. v. UNITED STATES OLYMPIC COMMITTEE, 483 U.S. 522 (1987). The Amateur Sports Act of 1978 gave the United States Olympic Committee the exclusive right to use the term “Olympic.” When petitioner organized and began to promote the “Gay Olympic Games,” the committee brought suit under the statute to enjoin petitioner from using the word “Olympic.” Petitioner responded by pointing out that the committee had allowed other groups to use the word “Olympic.” It argued that the committee’s discriminatory selection of such groups violated the equal protection component of the fifth amendment due process clause.

In a five-to-four decision, the Supreme Court held that the committee’s selection of groups permitted to use the term was not state action. Justice Powell delivered the Court’s opinion: “The fact that Congress granted [the committee] a corporate charter does not render [it] a government agent. All corporations act under charters granted by a [government]. [Nor] is the fact that Congress has granted the [committee] exclusive use of the word ‘Olympic’ dispositive. All enforceable rights in trademarks are created by some governmental [act]....

“The [Committee’s] choice of how to enforce its exclusive right [simply] is not a governmental decision. There is no evidence that the Federal Government coerced or encouraged the [Committee] in the exercise of its rights. At most, the Federal Government, by failing to supervise the [Committee’s] use of its rights, can be said to exercise ‘[m]ere approval of or acquiescence in the initiatives’ of the [Committee]. [This] is not enough to make the [Committee’s] actions those of the Government.”

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented: “The [Committee] and the Federal Government exist in a symbiotic relationship sufficient to provide a nexus between the [Committee’s] challenged action and the Government. First, as in Burton, the relationship here confers a variety of mutual benefits. [The] Act gave the [Committee] authority and responsibilities that no private organization in this country had ever held....

“Second, in the eye of the public, [the] connection between the decisions of the United States Government and those of the United States Olympic Committee is profound....

“Even more importantly, there is a close financial and legislative link between the [Committee’s] alleged discriminatory exercise of its word-use authority and the financial success of both the [Committee] and the Government. It would certainly be ‘irony amounting to grave injustice’ if, to finance the team that is to represent the virtues of our political system, the [Committee] were free to employ government-created economic leverage to prohibit political speech. [Burton.]”

Justice O’Connor, joined by Justice Blackmun, also dissented from the Court’s state action determination.

Note: State Action as Coercion or Significant Encouragement

1. United States Olympic Committee and Burton. Does United States Olympic Committee help explain what factors triggered the finding of state action in Burton? Justice Powell's opinion relies on an earlier decision, Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S. 991 (1982), where the Court rejected a procedural due process challenge to the decisions, made without hearings by state-subsidized nursing homes, to downgrade the level of treatment for patients receiving Medicaid payments. Although Medicaid regulations required the nursing home to maintain different levels of care for patients and to transfer patients when necessary, and although the state responded to the transfers by reducing Medicaid payments, the Court held that no state action was present because the state was not responsible for the individual transfer decisions. The Court summarized the law as follows:

[Although] the factual setting of each case will be significant, our precedents indicate that a State normally can be held responsible for a private decision only when it has exercised coercive power or has provided such significant encouragement, either overt or covert, that the choice must in law be deemed to be that of the State. Mere approval of or acquiescence in the initiatives of a private party is not sufficient to justify holding the State responsible for those initiatives under the terms of the Fourteenth Amendment.

2. Rendell-Baker and Burton. According to Rendell-Baker, Burton stands for the proposition that the state may not profit from discriminatory conduct. Is that a fair reading of Burton? Assuming that it is, might not the school in Rendell-Baker pass on to the state some of the savings it realizes from avoiding the cost of due process hearings just as the restaurant in Burton passed on some of the profits derived from racial discrimination?

3. Rendell-Baker and the recognition of public actors. The Court begins its analysis in Rendell-Baker with the assumption that the New Perspectives School is "private." If the school itself were a "public" institution, there would be no doubt that its decision to discharge petitioners would be "state action." But given the fact that the school received virtually all of its funds from public sources, why does the Court begin with the assumption that it is "private"?

Presumably what makes the New Perspectives School private is the fact that the state exercises less pervasive control over it than it would over a state instrumentality; thus, the state did not produce the objectionable conduct at issue. But the very issue in dispute in Rendell-Baker was the degree of control the state was obligated to exercise. Surely the acts of state police officers would be attributable to the state even if state law left them largely unconstrained in exercising their discretion.

Compare Rendell-Baker with Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339 (1880), where a state judge discriminated against blacks in the selection of juries in violation of state law. The Court rejected the defendant's argument that he was not a state actor because the state had prohibited the conduct in question. “[As] he acts in the name and for the State, and is clothed with the State’s power, his act is that of the State. This must be so, or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning.” See also Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91 (1945) (state police officer who exceeds his authority under state law is nonetheless a state actor acting under color of law). Is the Rendell-Baker “coercion or significant encouragement” test consistent with Ex parte Virginia and Screws?

Compare Rendell-Baker to West v. Atkins, 487 U.S. 42 (1988), where the Court held that a private physician, under contract with the state to provide medical services for inmates at a state prison, was a state actor for constitutional purposes. Writing for eight justices, Justice Blackmun rejected the argument that the doctor’s actions were not attributable to the state because he was exercising independent medical judgment. In a footnote, the Court distinguished Rendell-Baker and Blum as follows:

Where the issue is whether a private party is engaged in activity that constitutes state action, it may be relevant that the challenged activity turned on judgments controlled by professional standards, where those standards are not established by the State. The Court has held that “a State normally can be held responsible for a private decision only when it has exercised coercive power or has provided such significant encouragement, either overt or covert, that the choice must in law be deemed to be that of the State.” [Blum; Rendell-Baker.] In both Blum and Rendell-Baker, the fact that the private entities received state funding and were subject to state regulation did not, without more, convert their conduct into state action....

This determination cannot be transformed into the proposition that no person acts under color of state law where he is exercising independent professional judgment. [Blum] and Rendell-Baker provide no support for respondent’s argument that a physician, employed by the State to fulfill the State’s constitutional obligations, does not act under color of state law merely because he renders medical care in accordance with professional obligations.

Why wasn’t the New Perspectives School “employed by the State to fulfill the State's constitutional obligations”?

4. Lebron and Brentwood Academy. For an extended discussion of the distinction between private and government actors, see Lebron v. National Railroad Passenger Corp., 513 U.S. 374 (1995). The controversy arose when Lebron sought to rent a huge, illuminated billboard known as the “Spectacular” in New York’s Pennsylvania Station. Lebron wished to use the space to display a photo montage parodying Coors beer commercials and attacking the brewery for its alleged support of right-wing causes. Pennsylvania Station was owned by Amtrak, a corporation created by Congress to avert the threatened extinction of passenger train service. The United States owned all of Amtrak’s preferred stock, and the President appointed a majority of its board of directors. When Amtrak refused to rent the space to Lebron, he sued, claiming that his first amendment rights had been violated. The court of appeals held that Amtrak was not a government actor and therefore rejected Lebron’s claim. In an eight-to-one decision, the Supreme Court reversed.

Writing for the majority, Justice Scalia began by noting that, although the Court had “held once [see Burton] and said many times that actions of private entities can sometimes be regarded as governmental action for constitutional purposes,” it was unnecessary “to traverse this difficult terrain in the present case, since [Amtrak] is not a private entity but the Government itself.”

In reaching this conclusion, the Court found irrelevant Congress’s own declaration that Amtrak was not a government actor. Nor was Amtrak’s corporate form determinative.

It surely cannot be that government [is] able to evade the most solemn obligations imposed in the Constitution by simply resorting to the corporate form. On that thesis, Plessy v. Ferguson can be resurrected by the simple device of having the State of Louisiana operate segregated trains through a state-owned Amtrak. [Amtrak was a government actor because it was] established and organized under federal law for the very purpose of pursuing federal governmental objectives, under the direction and control of federal governmental appointees.

The Court reaffirmed the public status of Amtrak in Department of Transportation v. Association of American Railroads, 135 S. Ct. 1225 (2015), but this time in a context that expanded, rather than reduced Amtrak’s power. Federal law granted Amtrak and the Federal Railroad Administration joint authority to issue “metrics and standards” that address the performance and scheduling of passenger railroad services. Respondents challenged this authority as an unconstitutional delegation of lawmaking authority to a private entity. In an opinion written by Justice Kennedy, that largely tracked the reasoning of Lebron, the Court rejected the challenge on the ground that Amtrak was a government actor.

The Court reached a similar conclusion in a different factual setting in Brentwood Academy v. Tennessee Secondary School Athletic Association, 531 U.S. 288 (2001). The issue in the case was whether a statewide association incorporated to regulate athletic competition among public and private secondary schools was a state actor when it enforced a rule against a private member school. In a five-to-four decision written by Justice Souter, the Court held that it was.

The Court relied upon the fact that “84% of [the Association’s] membership [consisted of] public schools, represented by officials acting in their official capacity to provide an integral element of secondary public schooling.”

There would be no recognizable Association, legal or tangible, without the public school officials, who do not merely control but overwhelmingly perform all but the purely ministerial acts by which the Association exists and functions in practical terms. Only the 16% minority of private school memberships prevents this entwinement of the Association and the public school system from being total and their identities totally indistinguishable.

The Court distinguished Rendell-Baker as follows:

Facts that address [“coercion” and “encouragement”] are significant, but no one criterion must necessarily be applied. When [the] relevant facts show pervasive entwinement to the point of largely overlapping identity, the implication of state action is not affected by pointing out that the facts might not loom large under a different test.

5. Edmonson. In Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614 (1991), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, held that a private civil litigant who used peremptory challenges to exclude jurors on account of race was a state actor for constitutional purposes. The Court based this conclusion in part on the “overt, significant assistance of state officials” in the discriminatory conduct:

[A] private party could not exercise its peremptory challenges absent the overt, significant assistance of the court. The government summons jurors, constrains their freedom of movement, and subjects them to public scrutiny and examination. [Without] the direct and indispensable participation of the judge, who beyond all question is a state actor, the peremptory challenge system would serve no purpose. By enforcing a discriminatory peremptory challenge, the court “has not only made itself a party to the [biased act], but has elected to place its power, property and prestige behind the [alleged] discrimination.” [Burton.]

2. State Licensing and Authorization

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION v. POLLAK, 343 U.S. 451 (1952).

Capital Transit Company was a privately owned corporation providing bus and streetcar service in the District of Columbia under a franchise from Congress. In 1948, it began experimenting with a “music as you ride” program under which radio programs were amplified through loudspeakers in the streetcars and buses. In 1949, the Public Utilities Commission, which regulated Capital, ordered an investigation of the program to determine whether it was “consistent with public convenience, comfort and safety.” The commission concluded that the use of radios was not inconsistent with the public interest and dismissed its investigation. Some of Capital’s passengers thereupon appealed the commission’s decision, and the court of appeals reversed, holding that the broadcasts deprived passengers of liberty without due process of law. Justice Burton delivered the Court’s opinion:

“It was held by the court below that the action of Capital Transit in installing and operating the radio receivers, coupled with the action of the Public Utilities Commission in dismissing its own investigation of the practice, sufficiently involved the Federal Government in responsibility for the radio programs to make the First and Fifth Amendments [applicable] to this radio service....

“[We agree. In reaching this result,] we do not rely on the mere fact that Capital Transit operates a public utility on the streets of the District of Columbia under authority of Congress. Nor do we rely upon the fact that, by reason of such federal authorization, Capital Transit now enjoys a substantial monopoly of street railway and bus transportation in the District of Columbia. We do, however, recognize that Capital Transit operates its service under the regulatory supervision of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia which is an agency authorized by Congress. We rely particularly upon the fact that that agency, pursuant to protests against the radio program, ordered an investigation of it and, after formal public hearings, ordered its investigation dismissed on the ground that the public safety, comfort and convenience were not impaired thereby.”

The Court then reached the merits and held that the broadcasts were not unconstitutional.

Moose Lodge No. 107 v. Irvis

407 U.S. 163 (1972)

MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Appellant Moose Lodge is a local branch of a national fraternal organization. Lodge policy restricts membership to whites and prohibits members from bringing black guests to the lodge dining room and bar. When appellee, a black man, was refused service because of his race, he filed this action, naming as defendants both Moose Lodge and the Pennsylvania Liquor Authority. He claimed that, because the liquor authority had issued Moose Lodge a license that authorized the sale of alcoholic beverages on its premises, the refusal of service was "state action." He sought an injunction requiring the liquor authority to revoke Moose Lodge's license so long as it continued its discriminatory practices. The court below ruled in his favor.]

The Court has never held, of course, that discrimination by an otherwise private entity would be violative of the Equal Protection Clause if the private entity receives any sort of benefit or service at all from the State, or if it is subject to state regulation in any degree whatever. Since state-furnished services include such necessities of life as electricity, water, and police and fire protection, such a holding would utterly emasculate the distinction between private as distinguished from state conduct set forth in The Civil Rights Cases and adhered to in subsequent decisions. Our holdings indicate that where the impetus for the discrimination is private, the State must have "significantly involved itself with invidious discriminations," [Reitman], in order for the discriminatory action to fall within the ambit of the constitutional prohibition....

Here there is nothing approaching the symbiotic relationship between lessor and lessee that was present in [Burton]. Unlike Burton, the Moose Lodge building is located on land owned by it, not by any public authority. Far from apparently holding itself out as a place of public accommodation, Moose Lodge quite ostentatiously proclaims the fact that it is not open to the public at large. Nor is it located and operated in such surroundings that although private in name, it discharges a function or performs a service that would otherwise in all likelihood be performed by the State. In short, while Eagle was a public restaurant in a public building, Moose Lodge is a private social club in a private building.

With the exception hereafter noted, the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board plays absolutely no part in establishing or enforcing the membership or guest policies of the club that it licenses to serve liquor. There is no suggestion in this record that Pennsylvania law, either as written or as applied, discriminates against minority groups either in their right to apply for club licenses themselves or in their right to purchase and be served liquor in places of public accommodation. The only effect that the state licensing of Moose Lodge to serve liquor can be said to have on the right of any other Pennsylvanian to buy or be served liquor on premises other than those of Moose Lodge is that for some purposes club licenses are counted in the maximum number of licenses that may be issued in a given municipality....

The District Court was at pains to point out in its opinion what it considered to be the “pervasive” nature of the regulation of private clubs by the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board....

However detailed this type of regulation may be in some particulars, it cannot be said to in any way foster or encourage racial discrimination. Nor can it be said to make the State in any realistic sense a partner or even a joint venturer in the club’s enterprise. The limited effect of the prohibition against obtaining additional club licenses when the maximum number of retail licenses allotted to a municipality has been issued, when considered together with the availability of liquor from hotel, restaurant, and retail licensees, falls far short of conferring upon club licensees a monopoly in the dispensing of liquor in any given municipality or in the State as a whole. We therefore hold that, with the exception hereafter noted, the operation of the regulatory scheme enforced by the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board does not sufficiently implicate the State in the discriminatory guest policies of Moose Lodge to make the latter “state action” within the ambit of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The District Court found that the regulations of the Liquor Control Board adopted pursuant to statute affirmatively require that “[e]very club licensee shall adhere to all of the provisions of its Constitution and By-Laws.”...

The effect of this particular regulation on Moose Lodge under the provisions of the Constitution placed in the record in the court below would be to place state sanctions behind its discriminatory membership rules....

Even though the Liquor Control Board regulation in question is neutral in its terms, the result of its application in a case where the constitution and bylaws of a club required racial discrimination would be to invoke the sanctions of the State to enforce a concededly discriminatory private rule. State action, for purposes of the Equal Protection Clause, may emanate from rulings of administrative and regulatory agencies as well as from legislative or judicial action. [Shelley] makes it clear that the application of state sanctions to enforce such a rule would violate the Fourteenth Amendment....

[Appellee] was entitled to a decree enjoining the enforcement of [the] regulations promulgated by the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board insofar as [they require] compliance by Moose Lodge with provisions of its constitution and bylaws containing racially discriminatory provisions. He was entitled to no more....

Reversed and remanded.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, with whom MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL joins, dissenting.

[The] fact that a private club gets some kind of permit from the State or municipality does not make it ipso facto a public [enterprise]....

[Liquor] licenses in Pennsylvania, unlike driver's licenses, or marriage licenses, are not freely available to those who meet racially neutral qualifications. There is a complex quota system. [What] the majority neglects to say is that the quota for Harrisburg, where Moose Lodge No. 107 is located, has been full for many years. No more club licenses may be issued in that city.

This state-enforced scarcity of licenses restricts the ability of blacks to obtain liquor, for liquor is commercially available only at private clubs for a significant portion of each week....

[A dissenting opinion by Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, is omitted.]

Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Co.

419 U.S. 345 (1974)

MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court....

[Metropolitan Edison, a privately owned utility, holds a certificate of public convenience issued by a state utility commission authorizing it to provide electricity to its customers. As a condition for holding this certificate, it is subject to extensive state regulation. Under a provision of its general tariff filed with the state commission, it has the right to discontinue service to a customer on reasonable notice of nonpayment of bills. After a lengthy dispute, Metropolitan Edison terminated Jackson's service for alleged nonpayment. Jackson thereupon brought this action, claiming that the termination constituted state action depriving her of property in violation of the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment.]

[The] mere fact that a business is subject to state regulation does not by itself convert its action into that of the State for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment. Nor does the fact that the regulation is extensive and detailed, as in the case of most public utilities, do so. [Pollak.] It may well be that acts of a heavily regulated utility with at least something of a governmentally protected monopoly will more readily be found to be “state” acts than will the acts of an entity lacking these characteristics. But the inquiry must be whether there is a sufficiently close nexus between the State and the challenged action of the regulated entity so that the action of the latter may be fairly treated as that of the State itself. [Moose Lodge.] The true nature of the State’s involvement may not be immediately obvious, and detailed inquiry may be required in order to determine whether the test is met. [Burton]....

[Petitioner] first argues that “state action” is present because of the monopoly status allegedly conferred upon Metropolitan by the State of Pennsylvania. As a factual matter, it may well be doubted that the State ever granted or guaranteed Metropolitan a monopoly.⁸ But assuming that it had, this fact is not determinative in considering whether Metropolitan’s termination of service to petitioner was “state action” for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment. In Pollak, [we] expressly disclaimed reliance on the monopoly status of the transit authority. Similarly, although certain monopoly aspects were presented in Moose Lodge No. 107, we found that the Lodge’s action was not subject to the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment. In each of those cases, there was insufficient relationship between the challenged actions of the entities involved and their monopoly status. There is no indication of any greater connection here.

We also reject the notion that Metropolitan’s termination is state action because the State “has specifically authorized and approved” the termination practice. In the instant case, Metropolitan filed with the Public Utility Commission a general tariff—a provision of which states Metropolitan’s right to terminate service for nonpayment. This provision has appeared in Metropolitan’s previously filed tariffs for many years and has never been the subject of a hearing or other scrutiny by the Commission. Although the Commission did hold hearings on portions of Metropolitan’s general tariff relating to the general rate increase, it never even considered the reinsertion of this provision in the newly filed general tariff. The provision became effective 60 days after filing when not disapproved by the Commission....

The case most heavily relied on by petitioner is [Pollak]. [It] is not entirely clear whether the Court alternatively held that Capital Transit’s action was action of the “state” for First Amendment purposes, or whether it merely assumed, arguendo, that it was and went on to resolve the First Amendment question adversely to the bus riders.¹⁶ In either event, the nature of the state involvement there was quite different than it is here. The District of Columbia Public Utilities Commission, on its own motion, commenced an investigation of the effects of the piped music, and after a full hearing concluded not only that Capital Transit's practices were "not inconsistent with public convenience, comfort, and safety," but also that the practice "in fact, through the creation of better will among passengers,...tends to improve the conditions under which the public ride." Here, on the other hand, there was no such imprimatur placed on the practice of Metropolitan about which petitioner complains. The nature of governmental regulation of private utilities is such that a utility may frequently be required by the state regulatory scheme to obtain approval for practices a business regulated in less detail would be free to institute without any approval from a regulatory body. Approval by a state utility commission of such a request from a regulated utility, where the commission has not put its own weight on the side of the proposed practice by ordering it, does not transmute a practice initiated by the utility and approved by the Commission into "state action." At most, the Commission's failure to overturn this practice amounted to no more than a determination that a Pennsylvania utility was authorized to employ such a practice if it so desired. Respondent's exercise of the choice allowed by state law where the initiative comes from it and not from the State, does not make its action in doing so "state action" for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment.

[Affirmed.]

[Dissenting opinions by Justices Douglas, Brennan, and Marshall are omitted.]

Note: Licensing, Authorization, and Entwinement as State Action

1. Pollak and the failure to regulate. If Congress had chosen not to regulate bus and railway service at all, the Court presumably would have held that the decision of a private company to install radio service was not "state action." Why does the government's refusal to prohibit this practice become state action when it is part of a pervasive pattern of regulation? (a) Perhaps licensing justifies a state action finding because it eliminates competitive pressures that otherwise might prevent the private entity from engaging in the challenged conduct. (b) Perhaps the absence of an alternative source for the service increases the costs of the challenged conduct to those objecting to it. Note that Pollak rejects Capital Transit's monopoly status as a basis for finding state action.

Is the symbolic significance of the state's affirmative imprimatur on the activity dispositive? Recall that in Flagg Brothers, the Court treats a statute authorizing Flagg Brothers' sale as "immaterial" because it merely "embodied [the state's] decision not to act in statutory form."

2. Licensing and government neutrality. Is the requirement of government neutrality relevant to the Pollak problem? Was the action of the Public Utilities Commission a departure from neutrality? Does it matter that its statutory mandate required it to prohibit the radio broadcast if it found that the practice was not in the public interest?

In Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973), the Federal Communications Commission refused to require broadcast licensees to accept editorial advertising. The Court rejected a first amendment attack on the broadcasters' practice. In a portion of his opinion joined by only two other justices, Chief Justice Burger argued that the Federal Communications Commission's decision did not make the actions of the broadcasters "state action." He distinguished Pollak as follows:

[In Pollak] Congress had expressly authorized the agency to undertake plenary intervention into the affairs of the carrier and it was pursuant to that authorization that the agency investigated the challenged policy and approved it on public interest standards. [Here], Congress has not established a regulatory scheme for broadcast licensees as pervasive as the regulation of public transportation in Pollak. More important, [Congress] has affirmatively indicated in the Communications Act that certain journalistic decisions are for the licensee, subject only to the restrictions imposed by evaluation of its overall performance under the public interest standard. In Pollak there was no suggestion that Congress had considered worthy of protection the carrier's interest in exercising discretion over the content of communications forced on passengers.

Did the regulatory schemes in Moose Lodge and Jackson depart from the requirement of governmental neutrality? Both schemes are facially neutral in the Washington v. Davis sense. Do government-enforced monopolies in these contexts nonetheless constitute subsidies for conduct that threatens constitutional values? Answering this question presumably involves a comparison between the status quo and the situation that would exist if the government were completely passive. Is such a comparison meaningful?

D. CONSTITUTIONALLY REQUIRED DEPARTURES FROM NEUTRALITY: THE PUBLIC FUNCTION DOCTRINE

Marsh v. Alabama

326 U.S. 501 (1946)

MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

In this case we are asked to decide whether a State, consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, can impose criminal punishment on a person who undertakes to distribute religious literature on the premises of a company-owned town contrary to the wishes of the town's management. The town, a suburb of Mobile, Alabama, known as Chickasaw, is owned by the Gulf Shipbuilding Corporation. Except for that it has all the characteristics of any other American town. The property consists of residential buildings, streets, a system of sewers, a sewage disposal plant and a "business block" on which business places are situated. A deputy of the Mobile County Sheriff, paid by the company, serves as the town's policeman. Merchants and service establishments have rented the stores and business places on the business block and the United States uses one of the places as a post office [and] according to all indications the residents use the business block as their regular shopping center. To do so, they now, as they have for many years, make use of a company-owned paved street and sidewalk located alongside the store fronts in order to enter and leave the stores and the post office. Intersecting company-owned roads at each end of the business block lead into a four-lane public highway which runs parallel to the business block at a distance of thirty feet. There is nothing to stop highway traffic from coming onto the business block and upon arrival a traveler may make free use of the facilities available there. In short the town and its shopping district are accessible to and freely used by the public in general and there is nothing to distinguish them from any other town and shopping center except the fact that the title to the property belongs to a private corporation.

Appellant, a Jehovah's Witness, came onto the sidewalk [and] undertook to distribute religious literature. In the stores the corporation had posted a notice which read as follows: "This Is Private Property, and Without Written Permission, No Street, or House Vendor, Agent or Solicitation of Any Kind Will Be Permitted." [The] deputy sheriff arrested her and she was charged in the state court with violating [a state statute] which makes it a crime to enter or remain on the premises of another after having been warned not to do so. Appellant contended that to construe the state statute as applicable to her activities would abridge her right to freedom of press and religion contrary to the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution. This contention was rejected and she was convicted....

Had the title to Chickasaw belonged not to a private but to a municipal corporation and had appellant been arrested for violating a municipal ordinance rather than a ruling by those appointed by the corporation to manage a company town it would have been clear that appellant's conviction must be reversed. [Our] question then narrows down to this: Can those people who live in or come to Chickasaw be denied freedom of press and religion simply because a single company has legal title to all the town?

[We] do not agree that the corporation's property interests settle the question. [Ownership] does not always mean absolute dominion. The more an owner, for his advantage, opens up his property for use by the public in general, the more do his rights become circumscribed by the statutory and constitutional rights of those who use it. Thus, the owners of privately held bridges, ferries, turnpikes and railroads may not operate them as freely as a farmer does his farm. Since these facilities are built and operated primarily to benefit the public and since their operation is essentially a public function, it is subject to state regulation....

Whether a corporation or a municipality owns or possesses the town the public in either case has an identical interest in the functioning of the community in such manner that the channels of communication remain free. [The] managers appointed by the corporation cannot curtail the liberty of press and religion of these people consistently with the purposes of the Constitutional guarantees, and a state statute, as the one here involved, which enforces such action by criminally punishing those who attempt to distribute religious literature clearly violates the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

Many people in the United States live in company-owned towns. These people, just as residents of municipalities, are free citizens of their State and country. Just as all other citizens they must make decisions which affect the welfare of community and nation. To act as good citizens they must be informed. In order to enable them to be properly informed their information must be uncensored. There is no more reason for depriving these people of the liberties guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments than there is for curtailing these freedoms with respect to any other citizen.

When we balance the Constitutional rights of owners of property against those of the people to enjoy freedom of press and religion, as we must here, we remain mindful of the fact that the latter occupy a preferred position. [In] our view the circumstance that the property rights to the premises where the deprivation of liberty, here involved, took place, were held by others than the public, is not sufficient to justify the State's permitting a corporation to govern a community of citizens so as to restrict their fundamental liberties and the enforcement of such restraint by the application of a state statute.

[Reversed and remanded.]

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

[Justice Frankfurter's concurring opinion is omitted.]

MR. JUSTICE REED, dissenting....

What the present decision establishes as a principle is that one may remain on private property against the will of the owner and contrary to the law of the state so long as the only objection to his presence is that he is exercising an asserted right to spread there his religious views. This is the first case to extend by law the privilege of religious exercises beyond public places or to private places without the assent of the owner....

[CHIEF JUSTICE VINSON] and MR. JUSTICE BURTON join in this dissent.

Note: The “Public Function” Theory and the Passive State

1. Marsh and Shelley. Note that Justice Black might have written an opinion in Marsh that paralleled the Court's analysis two years later in Shelley. He might have focused attention on state court enforcement of Alabama's trespass statute and held that this judicial conduct violated the first amendment. But although Justice Black makes brief reference to the state prosecution, his analysis focuses on the conduct of the company town rather than on the conduct of the state court. Why should decisions of this “private” entity be treated as if they were state decisions? Would the town's actions have been unconstitutional if its owners had physically ejected Marsh without resorting to the state's legal processes?

2. “Public functions” and private power. Some language in Marsh supports the view that the town was subject to constitutional constraint because it was acting “like” a state. Thus, Justice Black points out that, except for its private ownership, Chickasaw had “all the characteristics of any other American town.” Why is this relevant?

To the extent that the opinion rests on this premise, it seems to stand for the proposition that there are limits on the extent to which the state may escape constitutional restraints by “delegating” to private parties functions traditionally performed by the state. Does the opinion make clear what those limits are or why they were exceeded in this case?

Some passages in Marsh suggest that the difficulty was not with the state's delegation of public functions to a private entity, but with its failure to act in the face of widespread violation of constitutional values. Viewed in this light, the opinion is a rare acknowledgment that individual freedom may on occasion be threatened as much by private as by public action. From this perspective, Gulf Shipbuilding's status was "public" because its power rivaled that of the state rather than because of any particular function it had assumed. Whereas constitutional liberty is normally associated with limits on governmental authority, in Marsh the Court arguably thought that the Constitution required the government to intervene actively to control exercises of private power.

3. The reach of the public function doctrine. In what other circumstances should the state's delegation of governmental power to private entities—or failure to control exercises of private power—be subject to constitutional constraint? Consider the following applications of the public function doctrine:

a. The "white primary" cases. In a series of cases involving the effective exclusion of blacks from Texas elections, the Court held that the discriminatory policies of "private" political organizations could be attributed to the state. Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U.S. 536 (1927), held that the fourteenth amendment had been violated when blacks were denied ballots in the state Democratic Party primary pursuant to a Texas statute that stated, "[In] no event shall a Negro be eligible to participate in a Democratic Party primary election held in the State of Texas." Texas thereupon rewrote the statute to provide that the State Executive Committee of the party in power could prescribe the qualifications of its members for voting. In Nixon v. Condon, 286 U.S. 73 (1932), the Court once again found that the denial of the franchise to blacks was unconstitutional. Since the committee was acting under authority expressly delegated by the state, the Court reasoned that its decisions could be attributed to the state.

In Grovey v. Townsend, 295 U.S. 45 (1935), however, where the policy of racial exclusion had been adopted by the state party convention without specific statutory authorization, the Court held that there was no state action and therefore no constitutional violation. In the Court's view, the exclusionary policy was voluntarily adopted by the Democratic Party, which was not an organ of the state. The policy was no more than a refusal of party membership with which "the State need have no concern."

Grovey was overruled in Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944). The Court stated that "[the] privilege of membership in a party may be, as this Court said in [Grovey,] no concern of a State. But when, as here, that privilege is also the essential qualification for voting in a primary to select nominees for a general election, the State makes the action of the party the action of the State."

Although the Court was unambiguous in holding that the Democratic Party's exclusionary policy could be attributed to the state, the exact basis for the attribution was less clear. In part, the state action finding seemed to rest on the "public function" performed by party officials. Thus, the Court wrote that "the place of the primary in the electoral scheme makes clear that state delegation to a party of the power to fix the qualifications of primary elections is delegation of a state function that may make the party's action the action of the State."

But the state action finding seemed to rest as well on actual state involvement in the primary election process:

When primaries become a part of the machinery for choosing officials, state and national, as they have here, the same tests to determine the character of discrimination or abridgement should be applied to the primary as are applied to the general election. If the State requires a certain electoral procedure, prescribes a general election ballot made up of party nominees so chosen and limits the choice of the electorate in general elections for state offices, practically speaking, to those whose names appear on such a ballot, it endorses, adopts and enforces the discrimination against Negroes, practiced by a party entrusted by Texas law with the determination of the qualifications of participants in the primary.

Finally, another passage in the opinion suggested that the state had an affirmative constitutional obligation to prevent private organizations from abridging electoral rights:

The United States is a constitutional democracy. Its organic law grants to all citizens a right to participate in the choice of elected officials without restriction by any State because of race. This grant to the people of the opportunity for choice is not to be nullified by a State through casting its electoral process in a form which permits a private organization to practice racial discrimination in the election. Constitutional rights would be of little value if they could be thus indirectly denied.

Although the Court maintained virtual unanimity in Smith, controversy over which strand of the opinion was determinative erupted nine years later in Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461 (1953), the last in this series of cases. Terry concerned the exclusion of blacks from "pre-primaries" held by the Jaybird Democratic Association, a Texas political organization. The Jaybirds maintained that they were not a political party at all but rather a self-governing voluntary club. Their election was not regulated by the state, and there was no legal connection between victory in that election and nomination by the Democratic Party to run in the subsequent general election. As a practical matter, however, white voters generally abided by the "recommendations" of the Jaybirds, and the Jaybird president testified that a purpose of his organization was to exclude blacks from the voting process. The Jaybirds were so successful in this endeavor that victors in the Jaybird primary had almost without exception run and won without opposition in the Democratic primaries and the general election that followed.

Although eight justices agreed that exclusion of blacks from the Jaybird primary violated the fifteenth amendment, no opinion attracted a majority. Writing for three justices, Justice Black focused on the state's failure to control private conduct that effectively deprived blacks of political power:

The only election that has counted in this Texas county for more than fifty years has been that held by the Jaybirds from which Negroes were excluded. The Democratic primary and the general election have become no more than the perfunctory ratifiers of the choice that has already been made in Jaybird elections from which Negroes have been excluded. It is immaterial that the state does not control that part of this elective process which it leaves for the Jaybirds to manage. [The] effect of the whole procedure, Jaybird primary plus Democratic primary plus general election, is to do precisely that which the Fifteenth Amendment forbids—strip Negroes of every vestige of influence in selecting the officials who control the local county matters that intimately touch the daily lives of citizens.

Writing only for himself, Justice Frankfurter found state involvement because state election officials had participated as voters in the Jaybird primary. The four other justices who found the requisite state action joined an opinion by Justice Clark. In his view, the record established that the Jaybirds operated, "as part and parcel of the Democratic Party, an organization existing under the auspices of Texas law." It followed that the result was dictated by Smith v. Allwright. "[When] a state structures its electoral apparatus in a form which devolves upon a political organization the uncontested choice of public officials, that organization itself, in whatever disguise, takes on those attributes of government which draw the Constitution's safeguards into play." Justice Minton cast the sole dissenting vote.

If the state had attempted to control participation in the Jaybird primary, might not the Jaybirds have had a plausible first amendment complaint?

Compare Terry to Tashjian v. Republican Party, 479 U.S. 208 (1986). In Tashjian, the Court upheld the Republican Party's constitutional challenge to a state law that prohibited nonparty members from participating in party primaries. (The Republicans had adopted a party rule permitting independents to vote in its primaries.) The Court held that

[the] Party's attempt to broaden the base of public participation in and support for its activities is conduct undeniably central to the exercise of the right of association. [The] freedom to join together in furtherance of common political beliefs "necessarily presupposes the freedom to identify the people who constitute the association."

Why wasn't the Jaybirds' "freedom to identify the people who constitute the association" constitutionally protected?

When private groups effectively secure the power normally associated with the state, why shouldn't they be subject to the same restrictions? Is it relevant that the Jaybirds were able to wield this power only because of the voluntary decision by most white voters to adhere to the result of the Jaybird primary? Recall that on one theory, this sort of "voluntary" exclusion of discrete and insular minorities from private coalitions is precisely why laws discriminating against such minorities are subject to heightened scrutiny. See Chapter 5, section C1, supra. If the results of such exclusionary coalitions are constitutionally suspect, might the Constitution be thought to establish limits on the ability to form the coalitions in the first place?

For the Court's most recent treatment of the issue of state action and political parties, see Morse v. Republican Party of Virginia, 517 U.S. 186 (1996). The case presented the Court with a question of statutory construction—whether the Virginia Republican Party was obligated under the 1965 Voting Rights Act to obtain preclearance before changing the qualifications for participation in a state nominating convention. In the course of answering this question (in the affirmative), the Court had occasion to distinguish its prior state action precedents:

In [Flagg Brothers] this Court concluded that the [defendants were] not acting under authority explicitly or implicitly delegated by the State when they carried out the challenged actions. In this case, however, [the] Party acted under the authority conferred by the Virginia election code. It was the Commonwealth of Virginia—indeed only Virginia—that had exclusive power to reserve one of the two special ballot provisions for the Party.

Compare Justice Thomas's dissent:

The Party's selection of a candidate at a convention does not satisfy [the exclusive public function] test. [We] have carefully distinguished the "conduct" of an election by the State from the exercise of private political rights within that State-created framework. Providing an orderly and fair process for the selection of public officers is a classic exclusive state function....

[By] contrast, convening the members of a political association in order to select the person who can best represent and advance the group's goals is not, and historically has never been, the province of the State—much less its exclusive province.

To be sure, the Party takes advantage of favorable State law when it certifies its candidate for automatic placement on the ballot. Nevertheless, according to our state action cases, that is no basis for treating the Party as the State. The State's conferral of benefits upon an entity—even so great a benefit as monopoly status—is insufficient to convert the entity into a State actor.

b. Private property and public functions. Does the public function doctrine help to explain other cases where the Court has placed constitutional limits on the owners of private property? Does it explain Shelley?

In Evans v. Newton, section B2, supra, the Court's opinion invalidating the exclusion of blacks from the park created by Senator Bacon's will rested in part on the public character of the facility:

The service rendered even by a private park of this character is municipal in nature. It is open to every white person, there being no selective element other than race. Golf clubs, social centers, luncheon clubs, schools such as Tuskegee was at least in origin, and other like organizations in the private sector are often racially oriented. A park, on the other hand, is more like a fire department or police department that traditionally serves the community. Mass recreation through the use of parks is plainly in the public domain; and state courts that aid private parties to perform that public function on a segregated basis implicate the State in conduct proscribed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

The public function doctrine also played a role for at least some of the justices in analyzing state responsibility for the racial exclusions at issue in the sit-in cases. See section B2, supra. For example, in a long concurring opinion in Bell v. Maryland, section B2, supra, Justice Goldberg argued that restaurants were places of "public accommodation" that the framers of the fourteenth amendment assumed would be subject to governmental control:

Prejudice and bigotry in any form are regrettable, but it is the constitutional right of every person to close his home or club to any person or to choose his social intimates and business partners solely on the basis of personal prejudice including race. These and other rights pertaining to privacy and private association are themselves constitutionally protected liberties. [But the] broad acceptance of the public in this and in other restaurants clearly demonstrates that the proprietor's interest in private or unrestricted association is slight. The relationship between the modern innkeeper or restaurateur and the customer is relatively impersonal and evanescent. [As] the history of the common law and, indeed, of our own times graphically illustrates, the interests of proprietors of places of public accommodation have always been adapted to the citizen's felt need for public accommodations, a need which is basic and deep-rooted.

Note that the opinion for the Court in Evans and Justice Goldberg's concurrence in Bell both emphasize the strand in Marsh that focused on the "inherently" public or private character of the activity involved. Both opinions tend to underplay the strand that focused on the degree to which private entities exercise the kind of coercive power normally associated with the state. Which version of the public function doctrine is more persuasive?

4. Retreat from Marsh? The modern Court has demonstrated considerable reluctance to burden private entities with constitutional requirements through the public function doctrine. Very few functions are now "public" for purposes of the state action doctrine. In the Court's current formulation, a function must be traditionally an exclusive state function in order to be subject to the Constitution. Thus, although shopping centers are generally as open to the public as parks, the Court has held that their owners are not bound by the first amendment. See Hudgens v. NLRB, infra, this section. Although major utilities arguably exercise coercive power rivaling that of the state, the Court has refused to impose the requirements of procedural due process on them. See Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Co., section C2, supra, and infra this section. And in Flagg Brothers, section B1, supra, the Court rejected respondents' argument that "dispute resolution" was a public function. But it did find it necessary to warn that there are a number of state and municipal functions not covered by our election cases or governed by the reasoning of Marsh which have been administered with a greater degree of exclusivity by States and [municipalities]. Among these are such functions as education, fire and police protection, and tax collection. We express no view as to the extent, if any, to which a city or State might be free to delegate to private parties the performance of such functions and thereby avoid the strictures of the Fourteenth Amendment.

As you read the material below, consider whether the Court has embraced either the view of the public function doctrine emphasizing the “inherently public” character of the activity or the version emphasizing private coercion. In its current form, does the doctrine take sufficient account of the need to leave “private space” free from government control? Is it sufficiently attentive to the risk that constitutional values will be undermined by private power?

JACKSON v. METROPOLITAN EDISON CO., 419 U.S. 345 (1974).

This case, which is summarized in more detail at section C2 supra, arose when Metropolitan, a privately owned utility holding a certificate of public convenience issued by the Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, terminated Jackson’s electrical service for alleged nonpayment of bills. Jackson claimed that her due process rights were violated because she was not accorded a hearing prior to the termination. Justice Rehnquist delivered the Court’s opinion:

“Petitioner [urges] that state action is present because respondent provides an essential public service required to be supplied on a reasonably continuous basis by [state law], and hence performs a ‘public function.’ We have, of course, found state action present in the exercise by a private entity of powers traditionally exclusively reserved to the State. [Nixon v. Condon; Marsh; Evans v. Newton.] If we were dealing with the exercise by Metropolitan of some power delegated to it by the State which is traditionally associated with sovereignty, such as eminent domain, our case would be quite a different one. But while the Pennsylvania statute imposes an obligation to furnish service on regulated utilities, it imposes no such obligation on the State. The Pennsylvania courts have rejected the contention that the furnishing of utility services is either a state function or a municipal duty.

“Perhaps in recognition of the fact that the supplying of utility service is not traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the State, petitioner invites the expansion of the doctrine of this limited line of cases into a broad principle that all businesses ‘affected with the public interest’ are state actors in all their actions.

“We decline the invitation for reasons stated long ago in Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502 (1934), in the course of rejecting a substantive due process attack on state legislation:

It is clear that there is no closed class or category of businesses affected with a public interest....The phrase “affected with a public interest” can, in the nature of things, mean no more than that an industry, for adequate reason, is subject to control for the public good. In several of the decisions of this court wherein the expressions “affected with a public interest,” and “clothed with a public use,” have been brought forward as the criteria...it has been admitted that they are not susceptible of definition and form an unsatisfactory test....

“Doctors, optometrists, lawyers, Metropolitan, and Nebbia’s upstate New York grocery selling a quart of milk are all in regulated businesses, providing arguably essential goods and services, ‘affected with a public interest.’ We do not believe that such a status converts their every action, absent more, into that of the State.”

Justice Douglas filed a dissenting opinion: “I agree that doctors, lawyers, and grocers are not transformed into state actors simply because they provide arguably essential goods and services and are regulated by the State. In the present case, however, respondent is not just one person among many; it is the only public utility furnishing electric power in the city. When power is denied a householder, the home, under modern conditions, is likely to become unlivable.”

Justice Marshall also filed a dissenting opinion: “Private parties performing functions affecting the public interest can often make a persuasive claim to be free of the constitutional requirements applicable to governmental institutions because of the value of preserving a private sector in which the opportunity for individual choice is maximized. Maintaining the private status of parochial schools [advances] just this value. In the due process area, a similar value of diversity may often be furthered by allowing various private institutions the flexibility to select procedures that fit their particular needs. But it is hard to imagine any such interests that are furthered by protecting privately owned public utility companies from meeting the constitutional standards that would apply if the companies were state owned. The values of pluralism and diversity are simply not relevant when the private company is the only electric company in town.”

Note: Public Functions as “Exclusive Prerogatives” of the State

1. Post-Jackson developments. In a series of decisions since Jackson, the Court has rejected “public function” arguments in many contexts:

a. Shopping centers. The Court overruled a prior decision and held that Marsh did not apply to picketing on the grounds of a private shopping center in Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976). It distinguished Marsh on the ground that shopping centers invited the public onto their property for only a limited purpose. Justice Marshall, joined by Justice Brennan, dissented.

b. Dispute resolution. As noted above, in Flagg Brothers, section B1, supra, the Court held that resolution of disputes between creditors and debtors is not a “public function.” The Court focused primarily on the “exclusivity” requirement. “Creditors and debtors have had available to them historically a far wider number of choices than has one who would be an elected public official, or a member of Jehovah’s Witnesses who wished to distribute literature in Chickasaw, Ala., at the time Marsh was decided.”

c. Schools. In Rendell-Baker, section C1, supra, the Court held that a private school for “maladjusted” high school students was not subject to constitutional constraints. The Court reached this conclusion even though students were placed in the program by public officials and virtually all of the school’s funding came from public sources. With regard to petitioners’ public function argument, the Court conceded that “[there] can be no doubt that the education of maladjusted high school students is a public function.” But in the Court’s view, that was “only the beginning of the inquiry.” It must further be shown that the function has been “traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the State. [Quoting from Jackson.]” Here, the state had elected to provide services for these students at public expense, but “[that] legislative policy choice in no way makes these services the exclusive province of the State. [That] a private entity performs a function which serves the public does not make its acts state action.” Justice Marshall, joined by Justice Brennan, dissented.

d. Nursing homes. In Blum v. Yaretsky, section C1, supra, a case decided on the same day as Rendell-Baker, the Court announced that nursing homes in receipt of federal Medicaid payments were not performing a public function when they decided on the level of care for their patients. The Court rejected respondents’ argument that the Medicaid statute and state law made the state responsible for providing every Medicaid patient with nursing home services. Moreover, “[even] if respondents’ characterization of the State’s duties were correct, [it] would not follow that decisions made in the day-to-day administration of a nursing home are the kind of decisions traditionally and exclusively made by the sovereign for and on behalf of the public.” Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented.

e. Amateur sports. In San Francisco Arts & Athletics, Inc. v. United States Olympic Committee, section C1, supra, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Powell, held that the United States Olympic Committee was not a state actor. The Amateur Sports Act of 1978 created the committee as a “private [corporation] established under Federal law.” The act imposed certain requirements on the committee, provided for some funding for it, and granted it exclusive use of the word “Olympic.” The Court held that [the act] merely authorized the [committee] to coordinate activities that always have been performed by private entities. Neither the conduct nor the coordination of amateur sports has been a traditional governmental function.

Compare Justice Brennan's dissenting opinion:

In the Amateur Sports Act of 1978, Congress placed the power and prestige of the United States Government behind a single, central sports organization. Congress delegated to the [committee] functions that Government actors traditionally perform—the representation of the Nation abroad and the administration of all private organizations in a particular economic sector. The representation function is of particular significance here [because] an organization that need not adhere to the Constitution cannot meaningfully represent this Nation. The Government is free, of course, to “privatize” some functions it would otherwise perform. But such privatization ought not automatically release those who perform government functions from constitutional obligations.

f. Peremptory challenges. Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614 (1991), is a rare exception to the modern Court’s hostility to the public function doctrine. The Court relied in part on the doctrine to hold that private litigants in civil cases were state actors for constitutional purposes when they utilized peremptory challenges to eliminate jurors on the basis of race. Writing for six justices, Justice Kennedy argued that [the] peremptory challenge is used in selecting an entity that is a quintessential governmental body, having no attributes of a private actor....

If a government confers on a private body the power to choose the government’s employees or officials, the private body will be bound by the constitutional mandate of race-neutrality. [At] least a plurality of the Court recognized this principle in [Terry v. Adams]. There we found state action in a scheme in which a private organization known as the Jaybird Democratic Association conducted whites-only elections to select candidates to run in a Democratic primary [election]....

The principle that the selection of state officials, other than through election of all qualified voters, may constitute state action applies with even greater force in the context of jury selection through peremptory challenges. Though the motive of a peremptory challenge may be to protect a private interest, the objective of jury selection proceedings is to determine representation on a governmental body.

Justice O'Connor, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Scalia, wrote a dissenting opinion.

See also Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42 (1992) (holding that a defense attorney in a criminal trial who utilizes peremptory strikes on a racially discriminatory basis is a government actor for constitutional purposes).

2. Jackson and the legacy of Marsh. Recall that the public function doctrine, as first stated in Marsh, seemed to rest on two interlocking rationales. First, constitutional restraints were appropriate because company towns had the power to undermine freedom as effectively as the state. Second, state intervention to control this power was not itself subversive of individual liberty because company towns were already open to the public and serving public functions. Much of the debate in the post-Marsh cases stems from disagreement about which of these rationales is dominant. Does either of the original Marsh rationales survive Jackson? The emphasis on alternative means of dispute resolution in Flagg Brothers arguably relates to the degree of coercive power possessed by creditors. The argument that shopping centers extend an invitation to the public for only limited purposes seems responsive to the “open to the public” rationale. More generally, however, the Court now appears ready to exempt “private” entities from constitutional responsibilities even in situations in which both Marsh requirements are satisfied.

Instead of inquiring into the power of the private entity and its claim to individual autonomy, the Jackson Court asked whether its function has “traditionally” been performed by the state and whether it is the “exclusive” prerogative of the state. Even if this test is workable (see infra this Note), why should the “state action” question turn on these factors? Note, for example, that even the municipal functions at stake in Marsh were hardly the “exclusive” prerogatives of the state. Indeed, Justice Black argued that constitutional constraints were necessary precisely because “[many] people in the United States live in company-owned towns.” Would it have made an important difference if such towns were a new development or had existed for a long time?

3. Public functions, baselines, and natural law. What does it mean for a function to be traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the state? Whether a function is “exclusively” the state’s may depend on how the function is characterized. In Flagg Brothers, for example, it may make an important difference whether one thinks of the function as “dispute resolution” (nonexclusive) or as the compelled transfer of property interests (arguably exclusive). Does the Jackson test ultimately depend on a “natural law” view of the functions appropriately attributable to state and individual? Consider in this connection the Jackson Court's reliance on Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502 (1934). In Nebbia, which marked the beginning of the end of the "Lochner era," the Court upheld the constitutionality of state legislation fixing the price of milk. See Chapter 6, section D, supra. Before the demise of Lochner, the Court treated the private sphere as a preconstitutional given that neither legislature nor court had the power to alter. In more recent years, the Court has generally followed Nebbia and, at least in the area of "social and economic legislation," treated the division between public and private as a matter of legislative discretion. Is the use of Nebbia ironic in light of the fact that something like Lochner is plausibly at work in Justice Rehnquist's opinion itself? Does a version of Lochner survive as a "natural" barrier to judicial, as opposed to legislative, invasions of the private sphere? Is there good reason to treat legislative and judicial invasions differently?

Consider L. Seidman and M. Tushnet, Remnants of Belief: Contemporary Constitutional Issues 67–68 (1996):

[The] New Deal constitutional revolution left the public/private distinction in tatters. But although the story of its demise has been told many times, most renditions have ignored a remarkable paradox. At the moment when the distinction collapsed as a limitation on governmental power, it replicated itself as a limitation on federal judicial power. For the very reason that Lochner-like reasoning was rejected as a restraint on government intervention, it had to be accepted as a restraint on judicial intervention.

[The new empowerment of government meant that] in the absence of a state action doctrine courts would have been free to order a comprehensive allocation of resources on their own initiative. Since the government was now empowered to distribute goods in any way it chose, its failure to do so had to be treated as a governmental decision that was subject to constitutional review....

Restraint on the judiciary was therefore necessary to make the space for the newly unrestrained political branches to engage in the vigorous government intervention at the heart of the New Deal....

We are now [in] a position to understand why [state action opinions] are [unsatisfactory]. The critique of the public-private distinction that made a reformulated state action doctrine necessary also made it impossible. [State] action cases are hard because the New Deal revolution necessitated a newly formulated state action requirement to curb judicial power and simultaneously demolished the analytic tools that could have been used to articulate the requirement convincingly.

E. UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONDITIONS AND THE BENEFIT/BURDEN DISTINCTION

At many places in this book, we have seen the problem of “unconstitutional conditions”—the problem that arises when government attaches constitutionally troublesome “strings” to government benefits, such as housing, employment, money, or licenses. Suppose, for example, the government says that only Democrats may work in the State Department, or that members of the Central Intelligence Agency must agree not to write about their activities, or that welfare beneficiaries must allow searches of their homes, or that medical facilities receiving federal funds must agree not to perform certain medical procedures. The question raised by the problem of unconstitutional conditions is how, and whether, these sorts of cases should be treated differently from “ordinary” constitutional cases.

The general problem is ubiquitous. It has clear connections to the state action doctrine because it might be said that when a state “merely” conditions a benefit, it has done nothing with respect to the person who does not receive the benefit. Moreover, as we shall see, the burden/benefit distinction raises questions about appropriate baselines for deciding whether government has behaved neutrally—questions similar to those raised in the state action context.

The following cases have been considered in other parts of this book. We offer excerpts from the majority opinions (notably, all four produced divided Courts) in order to give a sense of why they all involved arguably unconstitutional conditions.

RUST v. SULLIVAN, 500 U.S. 173 (1991). In this case, the Court upheld a new administrative interpretation of a statute. The statute said that federal funds for family services shall not “be used in programs where abortion is a method of family planning.” The new administrative interpretation was that federal funds could not be used not only for abortion itself but also for all activities that “encourage, promote or advocate abortion as a method of family planning.” In an opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, the Court said:

“The Government can, without violating the Constitution, selectively fund a program to encourage certain activities it believes to be in the public interest, without at the same time funding an alternate program which seeks to deal with the problem in another way. In so doing, the Government has not discriminated on the basis of viewpoint; it has merely chosen to fund one activity to the exclusion of the other....

“[Petitioners’] assertions ultimately boil down to the position that if the government chooses to subsidize one protected right, it must subsidize analogous counterpart rights. But the Court has soundly rejected that proposition. Within far broader limits than petitioners are willing to concede, when the government appropriates public funds to establish a program it is entitled to define the limits of that program....

“Petitioners also contend that the restrictions on the subsidization of abortion-related speech contained in the regulations are impermissible because they condition the receipt of a benefit...on the relinquishment of a constitutional right, the right to engage in abortion advocacy and counseling. [Petitioners] argue that ‘even though the government may deny [a]...benefit for any number of reasons, there are some reasons upon which the government may not rely. It may not deny a benefit to a person on a basis that infringes his constitutionally protected interests—especially, his interest in freedom of speech.’

“Petitioners’ reliance on these cases is unavailing, however, because here the government is not denying a benefit to anyone, but is instead simply insisting that public funds be spent for the purposes for which they were authorized. The Secretary’s regulations do not force the Title X grantee to give up abortion-related speech; they merely require that the grantee keep such activities separate and distinct from Title X activities....

“In contrast, our ‘unconstitutional conditions’ cases involve situations in which the government has placed a condition on the recipient of the subsidy rather than on a particular program or service, thus effectively prohibiting the recipient from engaging in the protected conduct outside the scope of the federally funded program. In [FCC v. League of Women Voters, infra, this section,] we invalidated a federal law providing that noncommercial television and radio stations that receive federal grants may not ‘engage in editorializing.’ Under the law, a recipient of federal funds was ‘barred absolutely from all editorializing’ because it ‘is not able to segregate its activities according to the source of its funding’ and thus ‘has no way of limiting the use of its federal funds to all non-editorializing activities.’...

“Similarly, in [Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington, infra, this section,] we held that Congress could [reasonably] refuse to subsidize the lobbying activities of tax-exempt charitable organizations by prohibiting such organizations from using tax-deductible contributions to support their lobbying efforts. In so holding, we explained that such organizations remained free ‘to receive deductible contributions to support...nonlobbying activit[ies].’...

“The condition that federal funds will be used only to further the purposes of a grant does not violate constitutional rights....

“The same principles apply to petitioners’ claim that the regulations abridge the free speech rights of the grantee’s staff. [The] regulations, which govern solely the scope of the Title X project’s activities, do not in any way restrict the activities of those persons acting as private individuals. The employees’ freedom of expression is limited during the time that they actually work for the project; but this limitation is a consequence of their decision to accept employment in a project, the scope of which is permissibly restricted by the funding authority.”

MAHER v. ROE, 432 U.S. 464 (1977). The Court upheld a state regulation granting Medicaid benefits for childbirth, but denying such benefits for nontherapeutic abortions (i.e., abortions that are not “medically necessary”). Justice Powell delivered the opinion of the Court:

“The Constitution imposes no obligation on the States to pay the pregnancy-related medical expenses of indigent women, or indeed to pay any of the medical expenses of indigents. But when a State decides to alleviate some of the hardships of poverty by providing medical care, the manner in which it dispenses benefits is subject to constitutional limitations. Appellees’ claim is that [the State] must accord equal treatment to both abortion and childbirth, and may not evidence a policy preference by funding only the medical expenses incident to childbirth. This [presents] a question [under] the Equal Protection Clause....

“This case involves no discrimination against a suspect class. An indigent woman desiring an abortion does not come within the limited category of [suspect classes]. Nor does the fact that the impact of the regulation falls upon those who cannot pay lead to a different conclusion.

“The [regulation] before us is different in kind from the laws invalidated in our previous [decisions. It] places no obstacles—absolute or otherwise—in the pregnant woman’s path to an abortion. An indigent woman who desires an abortion suffers no disadvantage as a consequence of [the State’s] decision to fund childbirth; she continues as before to be dependent on private sources for the service she desires. The State may have made childbirth a more attractive alternative, thereby influencing the woman’s decision, but it has imposed no restriction on access to abortions that was not already there. The indigency that may make it difficult—and in some cases, perhaps, impossible—for some women to have abortions is neither created nor in any way affected by [the] regulation. [The challenged] regulation does not impinge upon the fundamental right recognized in Roe.

“[Appellees] rely on [Shapiro v. Thompson, infra, this section, and Memorial Hospital v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250 (1974)]. Appellees’ reliance on the penalty analysis of [those decisions] is misplaced. [Shapiro] and Maricopa County recognized that denial of welfare to one who had recently exercised the right to travel [was] sufficiently analogous to a criminal fine to justify strict judicial scrutiny. If [the State] denied general welfare benefits to all women who had obtained abortions and who were otherwise entitled to the benefits, we would have a close analogy [to] Shapiro, and strict scrutiny might be [appropriate]. But the claim here is that the State ‘penalizes’ the woman’s decision to have an abortion by refusing to pay for it. Shapiro and Maricopa County did not hold that States would penalize the right to travel [by] refusing to pay the bus fares of the indigent [travelers]. Sherbert v. Verner [see Chapter 8, section C, supra] similarly is inapplicable here....

“Our conclusion signals no retreat from [Roe]. There is a basic difference between direct state interference with a protected activity and state encouragement of an alternative [activity]. Constitutional concerns are greatest when the State attempts to impose its will by force of law; the State’s power to encourage actions deemed to be in the public interest is necessarily far broader.

...”

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS v. SEBELIUS, 567 U.S. 519 (2012). Under the Medicaid program, Congress provides grants to the states to pay for the health care of poor people. To receive the grants, states must contribute to the program, cover certain specified individuals, and meet other conditions. In the Affordable Care Act, as part of an effort to provide insurance to all Americans, Congress expanded the Medicaid program to provide coverage to all individuals above the age of 65 and below 133 percent of the poverty level. For the first few years, the federal government would bear the full cost of the expansion, but then its share would decline gradually to 90 percent. States that decline to accept the expansion would lose all Medicaid funding.

Twenty-six states challenged Congress’s authority to enact the expansion under the so-called “spending clause” of the Constitution, article I, section 8, clause 1. They maintained that the withdrawal of all Medicaid funding if they did not participate in the expansion was a threat rather than an offer and, therefore, exceeded Congress’s spending clause power.

Although no opinion garnered majority support, the Court upheld the expansion but held that the threatened withdrawal of all Medicaid funding was unconstitutional. In an opinion joined by Justices Breyer and Kagan, Chief Justice Roberts stated that “[we] have long recognized that Congress may use [the spending] power to grant federal funds to the States, and may condition such a grant upon the States' 'taking certain actions that Congress could not require them to take....'

"But when 'pressure turns into compulsion,' legislation runs contrary to our system of federalism....

"We have upheld Congress's authority to condition the receipt of funds on the States' complying with restrictions on the use of those funds, because that is the means by which Congress ensures that the funds are spent according to its view of the 'general Welfare.' Conditions that do not here govern the use of the funds, however, cannot be justified on that basis. When, for example, such conditions take the form of threats to terminate other significant independent grants, the conditions are properly viewed as a means of pressuring the States to accept policy changes....

"Medicaid spending accounts for over 20 percent of the average State's total budget, with federal funds covering 50 to 83 percent of those costs. The threatened loss of over 10 percent of a State's overall budget [is] economic dragooning that leaves the States with no real option but to acquiesce in the Medicaid expansion.

"Here, the Government claims that the Medicaid expansion is properly viewed merely as a modification of the existing program because the States agreed that Congress could change the terms of Medicaid when they signed on in the first place. The Government observes that the Social Security Act, which includes the original Medicaid provisions, contains a clause expressly reserving '[t]he right to alter, amend, or repeal any provision' of that statute.

"The Medicaid expansion, however, accomplishes a shift in kind, not merely degree. The original program was designed to cover medical services for four particular categories of the needy: the disabled, the blind, the elderly, and needy families with dependent children. Previous amendments to Medicaid eligibility merely altered and expanded the boundaries of these categories. Under the Affordable Care Act, Medicaid is transformed into a program to meet the health care needs of the entire nonelderly population with income below 133 percent of the poverty level. It is no longer a program to care for the neediest among us, but rather an element of a comprehensive national plan to provide universal health insurance coverage...."

A joint opinion written by Justices Scalia, Thomas, Kennedy, and Alito, agreed that the Medicaid expansion was unconstitutionally coercive, but would have invalidated the expansion itself, not just the threat of withdrawal of funds.

"[The] legitimacy of attaching conditions to federal grants to the States depends on the voluntariness of the States' choice to accept or decline the offered package. Therefore, if States really have no choice other than to accept the package, the offer is coercive, and the conditions cannot be sustained under the spending power....

“When a heavy federal tax is levied to support a federal program that offers large grants to the States, States may, as a practical matter, be unable to refuse to participate in the federal program and to substitute a state alternative. Even if a State believes that the federal program is ineffective and inefficient, withdrawal would likely force the State to impose a huge tax increase on its residents, and this new state tax would come on top of the federal taxes already paid by residents to support subsidies to participating States....”

Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justice Sotomayor, disagreed. “Medicaid, as amended by the ACA [is] not two spending programs; it is a single program with a constant aim—to enable poor persons to receive basic health care when they need it. Given past expansions, plus express statutory warning that Congress may change the requirements participating States must meet, there can be no tenable claim that the ACA fails for lack of notice....

“At bottom, my colleagues’ position is that the States’ reliance on federal funds limits Congress’ authority to alter its spending programs. This gets things backwards: Congress, not the States, is tasked with spending federal money in service of the general welfare. And each successive Congress is empowered to appropriate funds as it sees fit. When the 110th Congress reached a conclusion about Medicaid funds that differed from its predecessors’ view, it abridged no State’s right to ‘existing,’ or ‘pre-existing,’ funds. [For] in fact, there are no such funds. There is only money States anticipate receiving from future Congresses.”

NOLLAN v. CALIFORNIA COASTAL COMMISSION, 483 U.S. 825 (1987). In this case, the California Coastal Commission conditioned the grant of a permit to rebuild appellants’ house on their transfer to the public of an easement across their beachfront property. The Court held that the attempt to impose this condition was a taking in the form of an unconstitutional condition. Justice Scalia wrote for the Court:

“Justice Brennan [suggests] that the Commission’s public announcement of its intention to condition the rebuilding of houses on the transfer of easements of access caused the Nollans to have ‘no reasonable claim to any expectation of being able to exclude members of the public’ from walking across their beach.

“[But] the right to build on one’s own property—even though its exercise can be subjected to legitimate permitting requirements—cannot remotely be described as a ‘government benefit.’ [Nor] are the Nollans’ rights altered because they acquired the land well after the Commission had begun to implement its policy. So long as the Commission could not have deprived the prior owners of the easement without compensating them, the prior owners must be understood to have transferred their full property rights in conveying the lot.

“Given, then, that requiring uncompensated conveyance of the easement outright would violate the Fourteenth Amendment, the question becomes whether requiring it to be conveyed as a condition for issuing a land use permit alters the outcome....

“[If] the Commission attached to the permit some condition that would have protected the public’s ability to see the beach notwithstanding construction of the new house—for example, a height limitation, a width restriction, or a ban on fences—so long as the Commission could have exercised its police power (as we [assume] it could) to forbid construction of the house altogether, imposition of the condition would also be constitutional. Moreover, [the] condition would be constitutional even if it consisted of the requirement that the [appellants] provide a viewing spot on their property for passersby with whose sighting of the ocean their new house would interfere. Although such a requirement [would] have to be considered a taking if it were not attached to a development permit, the Commission’s assumed power to forbid construction of the house in order to protect the public’s view of the beach must surely include the power to condition construction upon some concession by the owner, even a concession of property rights, that serves the same end....

“The evident constitutional propriety disappears, however, if the condition substituted for the prohibition utterly fails to further the end advanced as the justification for the prohibition. When that essential nexus is eliminated, the situation becomes the same as if California law forbade shouting fire in a crowded theater, but granted dispensations to those willing to contribute $100 to the state treasury. [In] short, unless the permit condition serves the same governmental purpose as the development ban, the building restriction is not a valid regulation of land use but ‘an out-and-out plan of extortion.’...”

The Court elaborated on its Nollan holding in Koontz v. St. Johns River Water Management District, 570 U.S. ____ 133 S. Ct. 2586 (2013), where it held that the same principle was applicable when, instead of accepting the condition, as the landowner had in Nollan, the landholder rejected the condition leading to the denial of a permit. Writing for five justices, Justice Alito stated:

“Our decisions [reflect] two realities of the permitting process. The first is that land-use permit applicants are especially vulnerable to the type of coercion that the unconstitutional conditions doctrine prohibits because the government often has broad discretion to deny a permit that is worth far more than property it would like to take. By conditioning a building permit on the owner’s deeding over a public right-of-way, for example, the government can pressure an owner into voluntarily giving up property for which the Fifth Amendment would otherwise require just compensation. So long as the building permit is more valuable than any just compensation the owner could hope to receive for the right-of-way, the owner is likely to accede to the government's demand no matter how unreasonable. Extortionate demands of this sort frustrate the Fifth Amendment right to just compensation, and the unconstitutional conditions doctrine prohibits them.

"The second reality of the permitting process is that many proposed land uses threaten to impose costs on the public that dedications of property can offset. [Insisting] that landowners internalize the negative externalities of their conduct is a hallmark of responsible land-use policy, and we have long sustained such regulations against constitutional attack.

"Nollan [accommodates] both realities by allowing the government to condition approval of a permit on the dedication of property to the public so long as there is a 'nexus' and 'rough proportionality' between the property the government demands and the social costs of the applicant's proposal. Our precedents thus enable permitting authorities to insist that applicants bear the full costs of their proposals while still forbidding the government from engaging in 'out-and-out...extortion' that would thwart the Fifth Amendment right to just compensation."

Note: Benefits, Burdens, and Coercion

1. Origins of the unconstitutional conditions doctrine. The cases suggest that some, but not at all, conditions on government benefits are constitutionally troublesome. But this is a relatively new development. For a long time, courts concluded that the government could accompany benefits with whatever conditions it chose. This position was reflected in many opinions by Justice Holmes, who, in a case involving a discharge of a police officer for his political views, responded: "The petitioner may have a constitutional right to talk politics, but he has no constitutional right to be a policeman....The servant cannot complain, as he takes the employment on the terms that are offered him." McAuliffe v. Mayor of New Bedford, 155 Mass. 216, 220, 29 N.E. 517, 518 (1892). Eventually the Court concluded that this position was too broad. Suppose, for example, access to federally funded Medicaid was limited to people with a certain political view; surely this could not be acceptable. Before the New Deal, the Court invalidated a state's effort to allow companies to use public highways only after receiving a permit certifying that the business was for the "public convenience and necessity." Frost & Frost Trucking Co. v. Railroad Commission, 271 U.S. 583 (1926). Thus, the Court started to give birth to the idea—recognized in Rust v. Sullivan—that government may not use its “greater power” to deny a benefit altogether as a justification for exercising the “lesser power” to grant the benefit on such terms as it chooses. See Van Alstyne, The Demise of the Right-Privilege Distinction in Constitutional Law, 81 Harv. L. Rev. 1439 (1968).

2. The “greater power” and the question of waiver. The Court’s general repudiation of Holmes’s position raises many questions, especially because that position seems quite logical. Exactly why is government prohibited from exercising “the lesser power”? And how can someone who has voluntarily waived her constitutional rights be heard to complain about the waiver? Consider, for example, the practice of plea bargaining. In over 90 percent of criminal cases, defendants give up their constitutional right to a jury trial in exchange for a reduced sentence. Should we be troubled by this practice? Suppose, for example, that a judge offered a convicted sex offender the option of serving a shorter prison sentence if he agreed to undergo chemical castration? If the defendant remains free to reject the offer, does the offer make him worse off? Suppose that the shorter sentence were conditioned on regular church attendance? For a qualified defense of Holmes’s position, see Easterbrook, Insider Trading, Secret Agents, Evidentiary Privileges, and the Production of Information, 1981 Sup. Ct. Rev. 309.

Consider these responses to the Holmes position:

a. The Constitution limits the reasons for government action. If the government says that welfare recipients must vote for the President, it has acted for an illegitimate reason. The illegitimacy of the reason dooms the law. Hence, both the “greater power” and the “waiver” arguments are unconvincing.

b. The government may not do indirectly what it may not do directly. It may not bring about what is in the end a constitutionally forbidden result by using its power over dollars, jobs, and licenses. See Sullivan, Unconstitutional Conditions, 102 Harv. L. Rev. 1413 (1989), for general discussion of this argument and argument a above.

c. “[The waiver argument] ignores monopoly and collective action problems, which also induce individuals to take actions that benefit their private, but not the social interest....The reasons that lead us not to enforce some private bargains can thus explain why certain bargains between the government and the individual are not enforced....[Limits] on the types of gains that the state can hope to extract by bargaining with its citizens can limit the social loss associated with strategic behavior....The imposition of a condition on a grant is often an attempt to shift some portion of [the general social surplus] from some persons or interest groups to others....The bargain that is made with one citizen may have the effect of freezing other citizens out of the market or setting them at a competitive disadvantage.” Epstein, Foreword: Unconstitutional Conditions, State Power, and the Limits of Consent, 102 Harv. L. Rev. 4, 14, 102–103 (1988).

d. The problem with the waiver argument is that in many cases, a seemingly individual waiver has serious systemic effects, extending far beyond the single case. Individual citizens may often find it in their interest to give up the right of free speech in return for government benefits. But if government is permitted to obtain a number of individual waivers of the free speech right, the aggregate effect on free speech could be substantial, and the deliberative processes of the community could be skewed. See Cole, Beyond Unconstitutional Conditions: Charting Spheres of Neutrality in Government-Funded Speech, 67 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 675 (1992). See generally R. Epstein, Bargaining with the State (1994), for general discussion of this and related points.

3. The shape of the doctrine. The cases suggest three points that seem to organize much of current law:

a. Government is under no obligation to subsidize activity, including, for example, speech, voting, or abortion. Refusals to subsidize are by themselves acceptable, even if people have a constitutional right to do the relevant activity and to be free from coercion in so doing. See, e.g., Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980); Rust; Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540 (1983) (upholding a federal statute saying that contributions to an otherwise tax-exempt organization, other than a tax-exempt veterans’ organization, are not tax deductible if a substantial part of the organization’s activities consists of attempts to influence legislation).

b. In the first amendment context, government may speak however it wishes. Public officials may say whatever they want. See Rust.

c. Government may not use its power over funds or other benefits to pressure people (or states) to relinquish rights that they “otherwise have,” or to “penalize” the exercise of constitutional rights, at least when the limitation on exercise of the rights is unrelated to the purpose of the funding. Government cannot say that, as a condition for receiving welfare, poor people must agree to vote for a certain political party. It cannot tell you that if you want a driver’s license, you must agree not to criticize the President or not to have an abortion. See FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1983); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969) (holding that government may not limit welfare benefits to people who have not recently exercised their constitutional right to interstate travel); Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963) (holding that government may not condition receipt of unemployment benefits on recipient's willingness to work on the Sabbath).

4. “Mere” subsidies. These propositions raise several questions. For one thing, it may be hard to know in which of the three categories a certain case falls. When do we have a mere failure to subsidize, and when do we have an impermissible penalty? A useful guide comes from FCC v. League of Women Voters, supra, and Regan v. Taxation with Representation, supra. In the first case, the Court said that government could not prohibit noncommercial education stations receiving funding from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting from engaging in editorializing. In the second case, the Court said that it was permissible for the government not to subsidize—through a tax deduction—attempts to influence legislation. The cases were different because Taxation with Representation involved a ban on the use of taxpayer funds, whereas League of Women Voters involved a ban on the use of private as well as taxpayer funds. This is the basic point on which the Court is insisting in Rust v. Sullivan.

But sometimes this distinction is not so clear. The majority in Rust v. Sullivan thought that the case fell into category a; the dissenters thought that it fell into category c. But it might even be urged that the relevant category was b. Government consists, after all, of its employees, and perhaps anyone who accepts money is to that extent a government employee. Can you respond to the argument that Rust was an easy case because it involved government speech?

5. Baselines. The trickiest category may well be c. How do we know when the restriction is unrelated to the purpose of the funding? Compare, for example, Chief Justice Roberts’s opinion in Sebelius where he treats the Medicaid expansion as a new, unrelated program, with Justice Ginsburg’s dissent, where she treats it as merely an extension of the existing program. When Congress first enacted Medicaid, could it have required coverage of all individuals whose income was below 133 percent of the federal poverty line? If so, would the Medicaid expansion in the Affordable Care Act have been constitutional if, in the first section of the Act, Congress repealed Medicaid and, in the second section, reenacted it together with the expansion? Compare Sebelius (Ginsburg, J.) (“A ritualistic requirement that Congress repeal and reenact spending legislation in order to enlarge the population served by a federally funded program would advance no constitutional principle and would scarcely serve the interests of federalism.”) with id. (Roberts, C.J.) (“[It] would certainly not be that easy. Practical constraints would plainly inhibit, if not preclude, the Federal Government from repealing the existing program and putting every feature of Medicaid on the table for political reconsideration. Such a massive undertaking would hardly be ‘ritualistic.’”).

Consider in this regard Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980), involving a prohibition on the use of federal Medicaid funds for the performance of medically necessary abortions. See Chapter 6, section F2, supra. In Harris, the Court, following Maher, said that it was dealing with a mere failure to subsidize: “[A] woman’s freedom of choice [does not carry] with it a constitutional entitlement to the financial resources to avail herself of the full range of protected choices.” In a dissenting opinion, Justice Marshall argued that poor women would “otherwise” receive Medicaid payments: “Appellees have met the statutory requirements for eligibility, but they are excluded because the treatment that is medically necessary involves the exercise of a fundamental right.” In a footnote, the Court responded: “A substantial constitutional question would arise if Congress had attempted to withhold all Medicaid benefits from an otherwise eligible candidate because that candidate had exercised her constitutionally protected freedom to terminate her pregnancy by abortion.... [But a] mere refusal to fund protected activity, without more, cannot be equated with the imposition of a ‘penalty’ on that activity.” In short, Justice Marshall thought the case involved a penalty, whereas the Court thought it was dealing with a mere refusal to subsidize.

Who gets the better of the argument? And how does the Court tell whether there is a subsidy or a penalty? The answer must depend on the identification of the normal or natural state of affairs—just as in the distinction between a “threat” and an “offer.” Thus, the problem “lies in the challenge to specify an appropriate normal course of events from which to judge deviations.” See Kreimer, Allocational Sanctions, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1293, 1359 (1984); see also Nozick, Coercion, in Philosophy, Science, and Method 440, 447 (S. Morgenbesser et al. eds., 1969), suggesting that threats involve a departure from a baseline of the “normal course of events.” Should the “normal course” be determined by asking what has been done historically? By asking what would in fact be done if the condition were invalidated? See Kreimer, supra, for discussion. Here, there is a question about government neutrality that runs parallel to the questions in the state action area. For a suggestion that the subsidy/penalty distinction is impossible to administer and constitutionally irrelevant, see C. Sunstein, The Partial Constitution 298–301 (1993).

Consider in this regard whether the baseline problem may be different depending on whether one is dealing with a substantive right or a right to equality (embedded, for example, in the equal protection clause). When dealing with a substantive right, the baseline is often thought to be a world without government action. Thus, it might be said, government funding of live child births, but not abortions, does not coerce women into not having abortions because they are no worse off than they would have been if there were no funding at all. (Put differently, the financial pressure not to have an abortion is the product of private markets, rather than state action.) Compare this case to a hypothetical law that funded abortions for white people but not for people of color. Here, the baseline might be taken to be the treatment that white people receive. Even if people of color are no less able to obtain an abortion than they would have been if there were no funding, they are denied equality; this denial might be treated as an independent injury, apart from deprivation of the substantive benefit. How far does the equality argument extend? Consider the extent to which “baseline shifting” in the equality context provides an escape from state action limitations on constitutional obligation.

6. The search for legitimate motivations. Perhaps one can make sense of the cases not by asking about baselines, but by asking whether the government has a legitimate motivation for the condition that is said to be unconstitutional. If, for example, government said that companies that operate nuclear power plants must agree to allow inspections—and thus to waive their fourth amendment rights—in return for a license, the condition would almost certainly be constitutional. It would be seen as a legitimate effort to ensure safety. See in this regard Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980), discussed in Chapter 7, section B3, supra, which upholds the CIA secrecy agreement on the ground that it is a legitimate effort to promote national security interests. By contrast, if government says that welfare beneficiaries must agree to vote for the President, no legitimate motivation is apparent. Instead the government is trying to regulate political behavior.

If the cases are explored in this way, there is no unitary unconstitutional conditions doctrine but instead a set of results that depend on the particular constitutional provision at issue—on what sorts of motivations it allows government to have. And if the issue is explored in this way, the question involves the meaning of the relevant provision, as (arguably) in the state action context. See, for pertinent discussion, Sullivan, supra; Epstein, Foreword, supra; Sunstein, Why the Unconstitutional Conditions Doctrine Is an Anachronism, 70 B.U. L. Rev. 593 (1990); McConnell, The Selective Funding Problem: Abortions and Religious Schools, 104 Harv. L. Rev. 989 (1991). And consider the suggestion that this line of thought leads to the conclusion that “[in] a crucial sense, all constitutional cases are unconstitutional conditions cases. Ordinary property rights are created by a government....When the government says that it will take your property if you do something, it is, in essence, imposing a condition on a right that it has conferred.” Sunstein, The Partial Constitution, supra, at 293.

7. Selective subsidies and the limits of Rust v. Sullivan. Should Rust be read for all that it is worth? Suppose the government decides to fund the Democratic convention but not the Republican convention or to subsidize broadcasters only to the extent that they are praising the current government. Wouldn't this be acceptable in light of Rust? If such selective subsidies would be unconstitutional, how can they be distinguished from funding speech opposing the use of illegal drugs but not speech favoring the use of illegal drugs? Does it matter that the speech in Rust was ancillary to conduct that government sought not to fund?

The Court has shed some light on these questions in subsequent cases. In Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995), the Court struck down a University of Virginia policy authorizing university subsidies of some student publications but forbidding subsidies for student publications that "primarily promotes or manifests a particular belief in or about a deity or an ultimate reality." The University cited Rust, which appears strongly supportive of the selective subsidy. But the Court distinguished and narrowed its prior decision in such a way as to leave unsettled the status of viewpoint discrimination in government funding.

The Court explained that government can "regulate the content of what is or is not expressed when it is the speaker or when it enlists private entities to convey its own message." Thus, Rust was merely a case in which the government "used private speakers to transmit specific information pertaining to its own program." This means that a government appropriation of "public funds to promote a particular policy of its own" can legitimately be accompanied by appropriate "steps to ensure that its message is neither garbled nor distorted by the grantee." But it does not follow that government may impose "viewpoint-based restrictions" when the government "does not itself speak or subsidize transmittal of a message it favors but instead expends funds to encourage a diversity of views from private speakers." In this case, the University of Virginia did not contend that those who were eligible for university support are the university's agents; student organizations "are not subject to its control and are not its responsibility." Thus, when the university has decided to pay private speakers "who convey their own messages," it "may not silence the expression of selected viewpoints."

There is obvious tension between Rust and Rosenberger, and the implications of the two cases, taken together, are far from clear. The distinction seems to be that in Rosenberger the university did not contend that it was attempting to "convey its own message" or implement "its own program." But what if the university said that its funding policies involved "its own program," broadly speaking? What if the university denied that its purpose was “to encourage a diversity of views from private speakers”? What if the university said that it sought to encourage diversity, but subject to certain restrictions, on the ground that some funding decisions would create too much entanglement between the state and religion? In any case, Rosenberger could be understood broadly or very narrowly, and as the opinion is written, it is not clear that it stands as a barrier to a government decision to refuse to fund art that it deems offensive, even on the basis of viewpoint.

Compare in this regard the Court’s most sustained encounter with the question of government funding of the arts, National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569 (1998). There, the Court was asked to assess a statute asking the NEA, in establishing procedures to assess the artistic merit of applicants, to “take into consideration general standards of decency and respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public.” The Court upheld the statute against facial attack; but what is especially important here is what the Court did not say. The Court did not conclude that government could give out taxpayer funds however it chose. It did not accept a “strong” reading of Rust v. Sullivan, which would allow government to choose, in its discretion, its preferred candidates for public subsidization. Instead, the Court found it necessary to emphasize that the statute at issue was not, in fact, a form of viewpoint discrimination. Thus, the Court said that the considerations listed in the statute are “susceptible to multiple interpretation,” and nothing in the law was introduced that “in practice, would effectively preclude or punish the expression of particular views.” Both the “decency” and the “respect” criteria could be understood in a constitutional fashion, as, for example, attempting to give special consideration to “projects and productions...that reach, or reflect the culture of, a minority, inner city, rural, or tribal community.” Because artistic funding was necessarily based on content discrimination, this case was not covered by Rosenberger, which was (in the Court’s view) an indiscriminate effort to encourage a diversity of views from the private sphere. And the Court left open the possibility that in particular cases, “the denial of a grant may be shown to be the product of invidious viewpoint discrimination.” Thus, any “penalty on disfavored viewpoints” would present “a different case.” Justice Souter dissented on the ground that this was in fact a form of viewpoint discrimination; Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, concurred in the result, invoking a strong reading of Rust and suggesting that government may “earmark NEA funds for projects it deems to be in the public interest without thereby abridging speech.”

It is not so easy to reconstruct the law as constituted by Rust, Rosenberger, and Finley. The strong version of Rust appears to have been rejected by the Court; unambiguous viewpoint discrimination appears to be impermissible, even with respect to the allocation of government funds for art. On the other hand, government may itself speak as it wishes, and if government wants to create a “program” for a proposed point of view, and to enlist private speakers in the endeavor, it is permitted to do exactly that. Thus, for example, government might have a project for democracy, or a project for the reduction of smoking among teenagers, and it might pay private speakers to help. It might even be possible for government to have a special artistic project whose purpose is to encourage (for example) celebration of the nation’s natural beauty. In such cases, Rust would probably govern. (But what about a program to promote a sitting President’s reelection?) Where the government is engaged in a general funding process for art, however, it is unlikely to be permitted to discriminate on the basis of viewpoint. Of course, the distinction between a specific program and a general funding process is very far from transparent.

8. Examples. Test your understanding of unconstitutional conditions by exploring the following cases.

(a) Government funds public schools but not private schools. Are parents of children attending private schools being subjected to an unconstitutional condition? See McConnell, supra, for discussion. Compare Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712 (2004) (upholding state statute prohibiting state aid to post-secondary students pursuing degrees in theology).

(b) Suppose there is a great deal of criminal activity in a public housing project. The government asks all tenants to sign—as a condition for subsidized housing—an agreement that random searches will be allowed in homes. Is this an unconstitutional condition? What if 90 percent, or 60 percent, or 10 percent of the tenants are in favor of this proposal?

(c) The government decides not to fund artistic activity containing nudity. May an artist complain if his work has not been funded because it contains nudity? Compare Southeastern Promotions v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546 (1975) (holding that a municipal board’s refusal to lease a public auditorium for a production of the musical “Hair” on the ground that nudity was not in the best interests of the community was unconstitutional).

(d) May the government say that Medicaid benefits will be unavailable for any medical expense related to reproduction?

(e) May the government say that, as a condition for receiving a permit to build an expansion of your house near the National Seashore, you will allow access to the beach? See Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 U.S. 374 (1994), and Nollan, supra.

(f) For an interesting unconstitutional conditions decision, see Agency for International Development v. Alliance for Open Society International, 133 S. Ct. 2321 (2013). By statute, Congress authorized the appropriation of billions of dollars to fund efforts by nongovernmental organizations to combat HIV/AIDS worldwide. Congress also imposed two conditions on the receipt of funds: (1) no funds “may be used to promote or advocate the legalization or practice of prostitution”; and (2) no funds may be used by an organization “that does not have a policy explicitly opposing prostitution.”

The Court struck down the second condition. It emphasized a distinction between two kinds of conditions: (1) those that define the limits of the government spending program (specifying the activities Congress wants to subsidize) and (2) those that seek to leverage funding to regulate speech outside the contours of the federal program itself. While Congress may limit its own spending, so that cases that fall within category (1) are permissible, Congress faces constitutional limits when it restricts speech in category (2).

The Court held that the restriction at issue fell into the second category: “By demanding that funding recipients adopt—as their own—the Government’s view on an issue of public concern, the condition by its very nature affects ‘protected conduct outside the scope of the federally funded program.’ By requiring recipients to profess a specific belief, the [requirement] goes beyond defining the limits of the federally funded program to defining the recipient.” In the Court’s view, the requirement “goes beyond preventing recipients from using private funds in a way that would undermine the federal program. It requires them to pledge allegiance to the Government’s policy of eradicating prostitution.”

Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, dissented. He contended that the requirement at issue “is nothing more than a means of selecting suitable agents to implement the Government’s chosen strategy to eradicate HIV/AIDS. That is perfectly permissible under the Constitution.” In his view, “the government may enlist the assistance of those who believe in its ideas to carry them to fruition; and it need not enlist for that purpose those who oppose or do not support the ideas. That seems to me a matter of the most common sense. For example: One of the purposes of America’s foreign-aid programs is the fostering of goodwill towards this country. If the organization Hamas—reputed to have an efficient system for delivering welfare—were excluded from a program for the distribution of U.S. food assistance, no one could reasonably object. And that would remain true if Hamas were an organization of United States citizens entitled to the protection of the Constitution. [And] the same is true when the rejected organization is not affirmatively opposed to, but merely unsupportive of, the object of the federal program, which appears to be the case here.

(Respondents do not promote prostitution, but neither do they wish to oppose it.) A federal program to encourage healthy eating habits need not be administered by the American Gourmet Society, which has nothing against healthy food but does not insist upon it.”

F. SOME FINAL THOUGHTS

Some commentators have argued that the state action requirement need never prevent a litigant from securing a decision on the merits of a constitutional claim. On this view, it will always be possible to find some government actor whose decisions are responsible for the conduct to which the plaintiff objects—and good lawyers can always structure litigation that will challenge the constitutionality of that official’s conduct.

Is this so? Maybe not. Consider the difference between the conduct of large companies, such as Google and Facebook, and the conduct of state governments, such as New York and California. The former need not worry about the Constitution. The same is true of innumerable small companies, which can do their business without thinking about the due process clause, free speech, or the equal protection clause.

There is a good argument that most of American constitutional doctrine is premised on the assumption that personal freedom is linked to the absence of government power. This assumption is built into the very language of constitutional rights: speech is said to be “free” when the government passes no laws abridging it; no process is said to be “due” unless the government changes the status quo by depriving individuals of life, liberty, or property.

Is this assumption justified? Does it embody the right conception of freedom? Does it entail undue respect for baselines formed by current distributions of wealth and power? Could one imagine a system of constitutional law that functioned without it?

10 It is undoubtedly true, as our Brother Stevens says in dissent, that “respondents have a property interest in the possessions that the warehouseman proposes to sell.” But that property interest is not a monolithic, abstract concept hovering in the legal stratosphere. It is a bundle of rights in personality, the metes and bounds of which are determined by the decisional and statutory law of the State of New York. The validity of the property interest in these possessions which respondents previously acquired from some other private person depends on New York law. It would intolerably broaden, beyond the scope of any of our previous cases, the notion of state action under the Fourteenth Amendment to hold that the mere existence of a body of property law in a State, whether decisional or statutory, itself amounted to “state action” even though no state process or state officials were ever involved in enforcing that body of law.

This situation is clearly distinguishable from cases such as [North Georgia Finishing; Fuentes; and Sniadach]. In each of those cases a government official participated in the physical deprivation of what had concededly been the constitutional plaintiff’s property under state law before the deprivation occurred. The constitutional protection attaches not because, as in North Georgia Finishing, a clerk issued a ministerial writ out of the court, but because as a result of that writ the property of the debtor was seized and impounded by the affirmative command of the law of Georgia. The creditor in North Georgia Finishing had not simply sought to pursue the collection of his debt by private means permissible under Georgia law; he had invoked the authority of the Georgia court, which in turn had ordered the garnishee not to pay over money which previously had been the property of the debtor. See Virginia v. Rives, 100 U.S. 313, 318 (1880); Shelley v. Kraemer, 343 U.S. 1 (1948)....

11 It may well be, as my Brother Stevens’ dissent contends, that “[t]he power to order legally binding surrenders of property and the constitutional restrictions on that power are not necessary correlatives in our system.” But here New York, unlike Florida in Fuentes, Georgia in North Georgia Finishing, and Wisconsin in Sniadach, has not ordered respondents to surrender any property whatever. It has merely enacted a statute which provides that a warehouseman conforming to the provisions of the statute may convert his traditional lien into good title. There is no reason whatever to believe that either Flagg Brothers or respondents could not, if they wished, seek resort to the New York courts in order to either compel or prevent the “surrenders of property” to which that dissent refers, and that the compliance of Flagg Brothers with applicable New York property law would be reviewed after customary notice and hearing in such a proceeding.

8 [As] petitioner admits, such public utility companies are natural monopolies created by the economic forces of high threshold capital requirements and virtually unlimited economy of scale. Regulation was superimposed on such natural monopolies as a substitute for competition and not to eliminate it....

16 At one point the Court states: “We find in the reasoning of the court below a sufficiently close relation between the Federal Government and the radio service to make it necessary for us to consider those Amendments.” Later, the opinion states: “We, therefore, find it appropriate to examine into what restriction, if any, the First and Fifth Amendments place upon the Federal Government...assuming that the action of Capital Transit...amounts to sufficient Federal Government action to make the First and Fifth Amendments applicable thereto.” (Emphasis added.)
